"If we can get all of those creative juices in a certain direction, we might be able to see some really amazing stuff down the road."

"My fear was that he would never be in our world"

Teenage college student?

Developer of his own original theory on quantum physics?

Paid researcher at 13?

This is not what Jake's parents expected from a child whose first few years were spent in silence.

"Oh my gosh, when he was 2, my fear was that he would never be in our world at all," said Kristine Barnett, 36, Jake's mother.

"He would not talk to anyone. He would not even look at us."

Child psychologists assessed Jake at the time and diagnosed behavioral characteristics of a borderline autistic child. He was impaired, they said, and had a lack of "spontaneous seeking to share enjoyment," difficulty showing emotion and interacting with others.

Diagnosis: mildly autistic.

"My biggest fear," his mom said last week, with tears welling up in her eyes, "was that he had lost the ability to say, 'I love you' to us."

By age 3, Jake was the focus of a more intense evaluation from a team of psychologists, therapists and a diagnostic teacher.

Their report indicated that while Jake continued to struggle with social activities and physical development, he was showing signs of academic skills that were above his age level.

Diagnosis: Asperger's syndrome, a somewhat milder condition related to autism.

After hearing this, Jake's parents decided to pay closer attention to the things their first-born son was doing — rather than the things he was not.

For example, Jake often recited the alphabet — forward and then backward. He used Q-tips to create vivid geometrical shapes on the living room floor. He solved 5,000-piece puzzles (rather quickly). And he once soaked in a state road map and ended up memorizing every highway and license plate prefix.

And perhaps most amazingly, he could recite the mathematical constant pi out to 70 digits.

"I'm at 98 now," Jake said, interrupting his mom during an interview.

And then, a week later, he was up to 200 digits after the decimal point — forward and backward.

At 3, his head was in the stars

The Barnetts decided it was time to follow Jake's lead, adopting a method that some parents of children with autism use — floor-time therapy — to help foster developmental growth. They let their children focus intently on subjects they like, rather than trying to conform them to "normal" things.

For Jake, that meant astronomy. As a 3-year-old, he loved looking at a book about stars, over and over again.

So off they went on a tour of the Holcomb Observatory and Planetarium at Butler University.

Kristine Barnett will never forget the day.

"We were in the crowd, just sitting, listening to this guy ask the crowd if anyone knew why the moons going around Mars were potato-shaped and not round," she recalls. "Jacob raised his hand and said, 'Excuse me, but what are the sizes of the moons around Mars?'"

The lecturer answered, and "Jacob looked at him and said the gravity of the planet...is so large that (the moons') gravity would not be able to pull them into a round shape."

Silence.

"That entire building...everyone was just looking at him, like, 'Who is this 3-year-old?'"

After that, the Barnetts began to feed Jake's hunger for knowledge, through more books and more visits to the planetarium. By the time he was 8, he got permission to sit in on an advanced astronomy class at IUPUI.

Meanwhile, his math skills were reaching astronomical levels.

By the time he was in fifth grade, Jake had become bored with elementary math. He was a student, first at Carey Ridge Elementary School and then at Westfield Intermediate School, an experience he now says he enjoyed for a while.

"The first couple of years were great, but then eventually the math started being, like, OK, we've been discussing this for a while, and it really isn't that hard," Jake said. "Can I move on to calculus now? Can I move on to algebra now?"

The boredom did not go unnoticed at home. Jake was coming home from school quiet, huddling in a safe space in the house and starting to show signs of withdrawing.

"I was really afraid we were going to lose him back into the world he was in when he was 2," his mom said.

Frank Lawlis, a Texas-based psychologist who serves as a testing supervisor for the American Mensa organization — a society for geniuses — said it would not have been unusual for a child with symptoms of autism to regress backward after a brief time of growth.

"One of the aspects of autism is that these kids' brains grow at an accelerated rate and then, generally speaking, there is kind of a reversal that happens," said Lawlis, who last year wrote The Autism Answer, a book for parents of children with autism.

"The theory is that the brain reaches a certain capacity, can't grow, becomes inflamed, and then a reversal effect occurs. It's just a theory, but it's very common."

That did not happen to Jake, thanks in part to a third psychological evaluation done nearly two years ago. It showed that this fifth-grader was not regressing but was simply bored and needed to be stimulated — in a very big way.

As in dropping out of school.

"Indeed, it would not be in Jacob's best interest to force him to complete academic work that he has already mastered," clinical neurophysiologist Carl S. Hale, Merrillville, said in a report provided by the Bernetts.

"He needs work at an instructional level, which currently is a post college graduate level in mathematics, i.e., a post master's degree. In essence, his math skills are at the level found in someone who is working on a doctorate in math, physics, astronomy and astrophysics."

The Bernetts were blown away. They knew Jake was smart, but doctorate-level smart?

"I flunked math," Kristine said with a laugh. "I know this did not come from me."

Off to college, where he tutors classmates

Encouraged by this new assessment, the Bernetts made the tough decision to pull Jake out of Westfield Washington Schools and enroll him in IUPUI's early college entrance program that caters to gifted and talented kids — although typically they are advanced high school students, not 12-year-old whiz kids.

As he prepared for the more rigorous work of a college class, Jake decided he ought to make sure he could master all high school-level math that would be required in college.

"In one two-week period, he sat on our front porch and learned all of his high school math," Kristine said. "He tested out of algebra 1 and 2, geometry, trigonometry and calculus."

At this point, Jake's math IQ — which has been measured at 170 (top of the Wechsler Intelligence Scale for Children) — could not get any higher.

"You could tell right off the bat, his performance has been outstanding," said Ross, who, at age 46 with a Ph.D. from Boston University, has never seen a kid as smart as Jake.

"When he asks a question, he is always two steps ahead of the lecture," Ross said. "Everyone in the class gets quiet. Poor kid... He sits right in the front row, and they all just look at him.

"He will come to see me during office hours and ask even more detailed questions. And you can tell he's been thinking these things through."

Jake is driven by Mom or Dad from his home in Hamilton County to IUPUI's campus, where he attends classes a few days each week. In between classes, he spends time at the Honors College lounge, where he has become a go-to guy for much older classmates needing tutoring.

"A lot of people come to him for help when they don't understand a physics problem," said Anderson, his class partner. "People come up to him all the time and say, 'Hey Jake, can you help me?'"

"A lot of people think a genius is hard to talk to, but Jake explains things that would still be over their head."

His professor has noticed.

"Is he a genius? Well, yeah," Ross said. "Kids his age would normally have problems adding fractions, and he is helping out some of his fellow students."

If Jake stays on track, Ross could see him working someday at a government lab or an observatory. Maybe he'll be a professor or a highly respected researcher.

"He can do anything he wants."

A normal boy, except for the numbers

Despite this new experience, his parents insist that Jake remain close with his friends in Westfield. Social activity is important, they know.

For Jake, life is not all centered on math and astrophysics.

He also likes playing video games. ("Guitar Hero" and "Halo: Reach" are his current favorites.) He plays basketball with friends, has a girlfriend and recently attended his first dance.

He likes music — classical, which he plays by memory on a piano, but he also plays some contemporary songs he hears on the radio. He loves sci-fi movies and the Disney Channel. He watches documentaries on the History Channel.

A normal kid.

But then, late at night, when the TV is off, the homework is done and everyone in the house is sleeping, the numbers start to percolate again.

They percolate so much that he has trouble sleeping. His parents got so worried a few years ago that they took him for medical tests, but no malady was diagnosed. He just can't fall asleep easily.

"A lot keeps me awake," Jake said. "I scare people."

The numbers that keep him from snoozing are the same that led him to develop his own theory of physics — an original work that proposed a "new expanded theory of relativity" and takes what Einstein developed even further.

His mom, still not sure whether her son was truly a genius at work or a kid at play, decided to send a video of Jake explaining his theory to the prestigious Institute for Advanced Study near Princeton University, one of the world's leading centers for theoretical research and intellectual inquiry.

That's where astrophysics Professor Scott Tremaine does his work. Tremaine is one of the world's leading scientists and is an expert in the evolution of planetary systems, comets, black holes, galaxies — all the stuff Jake really likes.

In a letter to the Barnetts, Tremaine confirmed the brilliance.

"I'm impressed by his interest in physics and the amount that he has learned so far," Tremaine wrote in an email, provided by the family. "The theory that he's working on involves several of the toughest problems in astrophysics and theoretical physics.

"Anyone who solves these will be in line for a Nobel Prize."

He then encouraged Jake to spend as much time as possible to learn more and to further develop his theory.

Contacted by The Indianapolis Star, Tremaine confirmed the exchange of notes.

"I have seen a YouTube video in which Jake describes his theory, and I have spoken with his mother and corresponded with both her and Jake by email," Tremaine said. "I hope that Jake continues his interest in physics and mathematics."

Thinking big is what he does

Meanwhile, Jake is moving on to his next challenge: proving that the big-bang theory, the event some think led to the formation of the universe, is, well, wrong.

Wrong?

He explains.

"There are two different types of when stars end. When the little stars die, it's just like a small poof. They just turn into a planetary nebula. But the big ones, above 1.4 solar masses, blow up in one giant explosion, a supernova," Jake said. "What it does, is, in larger stars there is a larger mass, and it can fuse higher elements because it's more dense."

OK...trying to follow you.

"So you get all the elements, all the different materials, from those bigger stars. The little stars, they just make hydrogen and helium, and when they blow up, all the carbon that remains in them is just in the white dwarf; it never really comes off.

"So, um, in the big-bang theory, what they do is, there is this big explosion and there is all this temperature going off and the temperature decreases really rapidly because it's really big. The other day I calculated, they have this period where they suppose the hydrogen and helium were created, and, um, I don't care about the hydrogen and helium, but I thought, wouldn't there have to be some sort of carbon?"

He could go on and on.

And he did.

"Otherwise, the carbon would have to be coming out of the stars and hence the Earth, made mostly of carbon, we wouldn't be here. So I calculated, the time it would take to create 2 percent of the carbon in the universe, it would actually have to be several micro-seconds. Or a couple of nanoseconds, or something like that. An extremely small period of time. Like faster than a snap. That isn't gonna happen."

"Because of that," he continued, "that means that the world would have never been created because none of the carbon would have been given 7 billion years to fuse together. We'd have to be 21 billion years old . . . and that would just screw everything up."

So, we had to ask.

If not the big bang, then how did the universe come about?

"I'm still working on that," he said. "I have an idea, but...I'm still working out the details."

20110329-05	19:03	GaryC	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	------------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

In Anderson, the jobs are gone because the unions got greedy and reckless.

20110329-06	20:14	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

Dear GaryC,

I believe that, just as in Wisconsin, both sides of the negotiations screwed up. I guarantee you, no union has ever asked for more than it would take me to do that work. But in a climate of nurture and protectionism, all parties could have benefited.

Besides, I believe your argument is beyond the scope of our current Boreas!

Additionally, I think even your example of the auto industry in Anderson is suspect. I don't see how the U.S. auto industry problems can be laid only at the feet of the unions. The politics of free trade helped. The fact that profits were distributed excessively to investors for years rather than being reinvested is partly at fault.

You see, my father worked for GM all his life. He taught me everything I know about the stock market, from a very young age. The third factor that hurt the U.S. auto makers was, that for years, they made largely sh*t cars. My father would buy a new Chevy and it would never run right, despite repeated trips to the dealer.

Friends would buy Jeeps or other cars and have the transmissions fall out after a few thousand miles. One friend's big new Jeep SUV I remember well, was after 1000 miles! Bodies would rust out after two or three years, or less. Paint would fade and/or peel. Chrome would rust after a year. Meanwhile, the Japanese, then the Germans were investing and applying American statistical quality control and making better cars. They were allowed to flood the American market with these cars by our friendly politicians. At that time, Japanese wages were less than half American wages, and I maintain that American wages have never been too high for the realities of the American cost of living. And, yes, I agree the unions were probably partly at fault, but, as I've said, management sat across the table and agreed to everything. Yet you blame nothing on precious management?

But, seriously, none of this union stuff has anything to do with our current problems. We've been sold down the river by our free-trading politicians, paid-off with huge campaign contributions from large corporations, banks, and rich investors. Illegal immigration comes from the same cause. The American worker can never compete against the slave labor and polluters in China, for instance, which I have seen firsthand. We don't need China and India demanding the world's limited oil supplies. We should have stayed isolationist and let the world be, for the good of American jobs and prosperity.

We had it all and gave it away. For what? Cheap cr*p that doesn't work or last from fricking Wal-Mart? Our generation took the richest country ever seen, handed to us by the Greatest Generation (our parents) and squandered it into joblessness and debt. And you want to blame it on the powerless poor? Come on!

20110329-07 20:20 SteveB Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"

Dear Pam,

I wonder why I continue to think everyone can see the light when I know that can't be true?

20110329-08 19:35 SteveB Re: What Has America Become?

Dear Dick,

I believe many of these issues are red herrings. They are lies told by our politicians to pit citizens against each other. We're supposed to believe black people are the problem, or immigrants are the problem, or criminals are the problem, or poor people are the problem, or unions are the problem, or abortion or guns are the problem. BS! Diversionary tactics!

As I have said many times, all of our problems result from a totally corrupt political system. The uber rich (as my friend, Dennis, likes to call them) people and corporations and even foreign governments get everything they want, or think they want, because they "bribe" political candidates of both parties with huge, unfettered campaign contributions. This creates debts for politicians greedy for power. The entire system is as corrupt as the worst Mexican policeman.

No problems will be solved until real campaign finance reform can be forced on these crooks. But that's just my opinion. Notice that you will never hear any living politician saying this, but Eisenhower did.

20110330-01 17:46 SteveB "5 Can-Do Companies Made in America"

Wall Street and the government may not be alive and well, but American ingenuity, entrepreneurship, education, and—thank God—some government assistance for start-ups are more than alive and well. Let's just don't let the Republican ideologues kill them all off. We need to protect and nurture what we have, not give it all to our economic enemies for big campaign contributions.

"5 Can-Do Companies Made in America" by Michael Brush, MSN Money

Mar. 15, 2011, (<http://money.msn.com/stock-broker-guided/5-great-young-companies-made-in-america-brush.aspx>)

Think the U.S. economy no longer has what it takes to lead the world? Consider these five examples of American entrepreneurship and innovation, and you might have to think again.

Despite obvious improvements in the economy, we still hear a refrain that's all too common on the way out of a recession: America has lost its edge, so its economy is never coming back.

It sounds like former President Jimmy Carter, but this pessimistic whine now regularly emanates from conservatives, who apparently don't mind bashing America as long as it means they can take a shot at President Barack Obama.

I'll respond with one word: poppycock.

Despite the impressive growth in emerging markets, the U.S. still ranks consistently high for the kind of moxie and can-do attitude it takes to invent breakthrough technologies and products, and in creating fast-growing, job-producing companies, say academics at Babson College in Massachusetts who study these things.

A recent count, by a Babson College professor, of the most entrepreneurial companies in the world shows that 60% of them are based in the U.S., even though the U.S. accounts for only 23% of the global economy.

So take a deep breath. We're not losing our edge, and entrepreneurs here are going to keep on thinking up the next big idea, to the envy of much of the world. Don't take just my word for it. Some of our best entrepreneurs, the consummate optimists who know more about these things than I do, say exactly the same thing.

"What I don't understand is where the fright comes from," says Andy Ory, the co-founder and CEO of the tech company Acme Packet (APKT, news), which plans to expand its workforce by more than 40% this year. "I think this country has an enormous opportunity."

"We definitely have challenges ahead of us, but I think people are too pessimistic," agrees Colin Angle, the co-founder and CEO of iRobot (IRBT, news). "The U.S. is the best entrepreneur incubator in the world. This is our lifeblood, and this is how we are going to win. People should get out and pursue some ideas."

There's money to be made

For investors, there's money to be made in all this, on two levels.

First, the unfounded pessimism confirms to me that not all of the expected good developments in the economy are priced in to stocks. People are still too negative. Indeed, the price-earnings ratio of the S&P 500 is at 13.7, or almost exactly where it was during the Armageddon lows of Mar., 2009, notes James Paulsen, the chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. Sure-stocks are up 100%, but earnings are up a lot, too. The takeaway: You can buy stocks now for further gains this year, though a 10% correction at some point is likely.

Second, if you invest in entrepreneurial companies, you are likely to do better than the market. I base this conclusion on research by Joel Shulman, a mutual-fund manager who teaches at Babson, which consistently ranks high for its entrepreneur training programs.

Shulman, an expert on entrepreneurs, concedes that there's no way to truly identify the entrepreneurial spark in managers without talking to them in person. Since it would be tough to interview so many managers, he instead hunts for the fingerprints of entrepreneurs in company financials, by looking for the key attributes that he says show up when you have a real entrepreneur at the helm.

These include measures such as a preponderance of sales from internal growth instead of acquisitions, low costs, big ownership stakes by key managers, low executive turnover and superior return on invested capital, among others. For the past six years, Shulman has used this approach to find entrepreneurial companies and invest in them, and the results are impressive.

From Aug., 2005 through the end of last year, his managed accounts are up an average of 12% a year, compared with a gain of 0.7% for the Russell 3000. Shulman recently launched a mutual fund that invests on this basis, called EntrepreneurShares Global Fund.

5 that exemplify

Together with Shulman, I've identified five relatively young companies whose stocks should outperform over the next several years because they are among the most dynamic entrepreneurial companies in the U.S.

The names: Chipotle Mexican Grill (CMG, news); Acme Packet, which makes gear that help phones and other devices work better on the Internet; iRobot, the robotics company; Intuitive Surgical (ISRG, news), which makes consoles that help doctors perform surgery; and Zoltek (ZOLT, news), which makes carbon fibers used in wind-turbine blades, cars, planes and other applications.

Their stories also illustrate four key factors that successful entrepreneurs and experts say set the good ol' American can-do spirit apart.

1. Entrepreneurs in the U.S. have vast support systems.

This will sound a little too "Kumbaya" for hard-nosed conservatives, but a major reason for our entrepreneurial success is the vast support network of family and friends that the budding entrepreneur can draw upon.

One of my favorite examples here is Chipotle, the popular and rapidly growing Mexican-food chain, if only because it has grown into a huge company from the humble beginnings of a father's loan to his son to launch a startup. The restaurant has its origins in founder Steve Ells' early jobs in restaurants after culinary school.

While working as a line cook in San Francisco, Ells noticed the popularity of Mexican food. That inspired him to open the first Chipotle in Denver, with help from his father's $85,000 loan. The two calculated they would need to sell about 100 burritos a day to turn a profit; a month later, the restaurant was selling 1,000 per day. Now the chain has more than 1,000 restaurants, and its stock is up more than fivefold since its 2006 initial public offering, trading above $250. But it can probably go higher, as it is growing its store base by about 13% a year.

Angle of iRobot cites this same factor as key in bringing his company through the lean years for a decade before 2002, when his robots finally started to bring in real money. "Without a lot of support and encouragement, things would have fallen apart," Angle says.

2. Failure is acceptable, as long as you get up again.

In many cultures, if you fail in your business "you will be socially outcast and friends and family will look down on you," says Abdul Ali, who teaches entrepreneurship at Babson. "In the U.S., if you fail you feel bad, but you move on. You are not ostracized or castigated."

Ory, who co-founded Acme Packet with Patrick McLampy, says that "serial entrepreneurs" who try and try again are "incredibly important because they have made a lot of mistakes and learned a lot." In the early days of Acme Packet about 10 years ago, Ory learned a lot about what would work because he persistently presented product ideas to potential customers and got feedback.

Now his company sells gear that helps establish set traffic pathways along the Internet, allowing applications in phone, video and multimedia work better. Sales reached $231.2 million last year, from almost nothing a decade ago. Aside from that kind of impressive organic sales growth, the fact that its core management team is still in place marks Acme Packet as an entrepreneurial company, Shulman says.

3. Our education system fosters entrepreneurship.

It's popular these days to bash our education system, but actually it's still one of our best assets. Angle says iRobot never would have taken shape without the experiences and contacts he got at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. One key factor was that MIT lets undergraduates work closely with professors early on. "As opposed to graduating with a degree, I graduated with a relationship with professor Rodney Brooks, who became a co-founder of iRobot. Without that, iRobot would not have happened."

MIT also exposed him to other entrepreneurs, including several members of his fraternity who had founded companies. "These were not godlike folks I could never aspire to be like," Angle says. "They were guys I could beat at beer pong, and I thought, why couldn't I be like them and create a company, too?" Today, his company sells popular household robots such as the Roomba floor vacuum and Verro pool cleaner, as well as robots used by the military and police.

Angle says the use of robots will grow steadily over the next two decades to help with tasks like folding laundry, preparing food, cleaning bathrooms and providing home health care for the elderly. He sees more business applications in industrial cleaning and energy development. His company's sales have increased from $13 million in 2002 to a projected $440 million or more this year.

You may think MIT is the exception, but lots of universities regularly develop and transfer know-how and technology to private startups. One of Shulman's favorite companies here is Intuitive Surgical, which sells high-tech consoles with robotic arms that help doctors perform minimally invasive surgery. Known as the da Vinci Surgical System, these devices were developed with help from SRI International and Stanford University, Johns Hopkins University, the University of California at Santa Barbara and MIT. Intuitive Surgical has sold about 1,750 of these systems, and last year they were used in about 278,000 surgical procedures. Sales reached $1.4 billion last year, almost double from 2008.

4. We are a nation of immigrants.

Immigrants get a bad rap these days, but in terms of entrepreneurship, new ideas and job growth, they are one of our best assets. "We attract the best and the brightest from around the world, people who come here and want to stay and that's how we build our economy," Shulman says.

A great example of this is Zoltek, which makes carbon fibers used in wind-turbine blades, the bodies of cars made by Tesla Motors (TSLA, news), Corvettes, planes and sports equipment. The company was shaped by Hungarian immigrant Zolt Rumy, who came here in 1957. Frustrated by challenges in getting military contracts for carbon fiber used in planes at a company he ran in the late 1980s, Rumy figured out a way to make carbon fibers more cheaply so they could be used in the private sector.

"That was a brand-new concept, and it changed the whole carbon-fiber industry," Rumy says. He sees more uses ahead in areas like automobiles, deep-sea drilling and aerospace to reduce the weight of things like floors, luggage bins and seats.

Rumy says many immigrants are keener to take advantage of the opportunities to start a business in the U.S., because they often come from cultures where it's impossible to do this. "In a lot of other systems, people may be entrepreneurial, but the system takes it out of them," he says.

This is just another way of saying that innovators and mavericks are looked up to here. While in many cultures, people with long-term family wealth get the most respect, "here in America if you've created wealth, people think you are smart and they look up to you," Ory says.

There's one more lesson here for conservatives out to dramatically cut the size of government: Loans and grants from the government can make all the difference for a startup.

Angle says iRobot succeeded in part because of substantial research funding from the government early on. The company hired 150 people last year and now has 650 employees. And Chipotle's Eells launched an early restaurant with the help of a Small Business Administration loan. Last year, Chipotle sales more than doubled to $1.8 billion since 2006, and the chain employs about 26,500 people.

(At the time of publication, Michael Brush did not own shares of any company mentioned in this column.)

"Will Republican Voters Believe Anything? The Right's Hyperbolic, Dysfunctional World" by Gary Younge

Mar. 28, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/150409/>)

(To have credibility within the Republican party is to have none outside it. They act as if all their Kool-Aid has been spiked.)

Polls suggest there are between one in three and one in four Americans who would believe anything. More than a third thought President George Bush did a good job during Hurricane Katrina; half of those thought he was excellent.

Throughout most of 2008, as the economy careered into depression, just over one in four believed Bush was handling the economy well. As Bush prepared to leave office in Jan., 2009, bequeathing bank bailouts, rampant unemployment, and Iraq and Afghanistan in tatters, a quarter of the country approved of his presidency.

These are national polls that span the political spectrum. So you can imagine how concentrated the distortions become when filtered through the tainted lens of the right. A poll earlier this month revealed that a quarter of Republicans believe a community rights organisation called Acorn will try to steal the election for Barack Obama next year, while 31% aren't sure whether it will or not. It won't. Because Acorn does not exist. It was defunded and disbanded after a successful sting operation by conservatives a couple of years ago.

Meanwhile, a poll last month showed that a majority of Republicans likely to vote in the primaries still believe Obama was not born in the United States. He was. But no number of verified birth certificates will convince them.

Such is the nature of the electorate that will select Obama's principal opponent for the 2012 election. And such is the reason why a viable Republican contender has yet to emerge despite trough-loads of money and the Republican successes of the midterms. Among Republicans the latest polls suggest a crowded, splintered field of possibles with Mike Huckabee leading on 19%, followed by Mitt Romney on 15%, Sarah Palin on 12% and Newt Gingrich on 10%.

And if Republicans are unconvinced, Democrats are untroubled. When Obama is pitted against any of them in six states he took from Republicans in 2008, polls suggest he would win all but one—he would lose to Huckabee in North Carolina by 1%. He fares best against Palin, trouncing her by double figures everywhere but Ohio. Despite his favourability ratings suggesting the nation is evenly divided on his job performance, a national Pew poll suggests 47% would back Obama's re-election against 37% who would prefer a Republican and 16% who did not know.

The challenge for the primaries is neither new nor unique to the right. The tension between appealing to the base and to moderates is the perennial test of any successful candidate in national United States politics. To win the party nomination you must appeal to your motivated base. To take the country as a whole you generally must engage the wavering centre.

What is relatively new, however, is the level of logical dysfunction and hyperbole within the American right, trapped in a fetid media ecosystem where all the Kool-Aid has been spiked. In short, what you need to say and do to be credible within the Republican party essentially deprives you of credibility outside it. The Republicans seem to realise this, but like an obese glutton at an all-you-can-eat buffet, they just can't seem to help themselves.

When asked which of their possible contenders they believe to be qualified for the job they can think of one, Mitt Romney, and even then barely 50% believe so. The person they say they like the most, Sarah Palin, is also the one they believe is least qualified: only 29% believe she can actually do the job.

This was evident in Iowa, the state that holds the first caucuses in the primary process next year, where many of the possible candidates converged over the weekend. On Friday, at a forum for Iowa pastors called "Rediscovering God in America", Mississippi governor Haley Barbour, an outsider, vowed to do "everything that we can to stop abortion". The next day at the Conservative Principles Conference, where Barbour spoke, abortion didn't come up. "It is absolutely critical that we elect a new president," he said. "I think the best way, perhaps the only way, is for us to make sure the 2012 campaign is focused on policy." He added: "The American people agree with us on policy."

When it comes to Libya, Newt Gingrich has vacillated from "Exercise a no-fly zone this evening", on Fox News 12 days before bombing started, to "I would not have intervened" four days afterwards. Meanwhile, congresswoman Michele Bachmann, who once called for an investigation of "anti-American" lawmakers, told the conference: "It can't just be a Republican. Do you hear me? It can't just be a Republican." She urged Iowa conservatives to set the tone for the nation, saying: "We need to have people who have guts, who you won't see melt like wax when they get there."

Some feared that Iowa, which holds such a crucial role in the nomination process, could be too extreme to pick a competitive candidate. "We look like Camp Christian out here," Doug Gross, a Republican activist and former nominee for governor, told the New York Times. "If Iowa becomes some extraneous rightwing outpost, you have to question whether it is going to be a good place to vet your presidential candidates."

Strategically the division between social and fiscal conservatism has largely been settled. With just a few exceptions only social conservatives (anti-abortion, anti-gay marriage, pro-gun) can get elected within the Republican party, so it has ceased to be much of an issue in primaries. Once nominated, candidates stress only fiscal conservatism for fear of scaring away centrists. Once elected they emphasize both, evidenced by the growing efforts to restrict access to abortion by legislators who barely raised the issue of abortion on the stump.

When I saw Rand Paul speak before 35 people in Leitchfield, Kentucky, just over a year ago, he never mentioned abortion, and nor did anyone else. "I'm not running for preacher," he told me. "I'm running for office." Now he's a senator who supports slashing aid to planned parenthood. Meanwhile, the Kentucky legislature has recently passed a bill requiring a woman to view an ultrasound before she has an abortion. But the strategic question of where and how to strike a balance between principle and pragmatism, or even whether such a balance is desirable, still eludes them. So too does any consensus on the kind of facts—Obama's religion and place of birth being just the two most obvious—that would enable others to take them seriously.

With little more than 18 months to go before the election there is still time for a candidate to emerge who can fudge the difference and straddle the divide. An event like the Arizona shootings might also force a reckoning between the right and reality. But generally speaking, incumbent presidents lose elections; challengers don't win them. Obama is vulnerable on many fronts. With unemployment still high, poverty and home repossessions growing, Guantánamo still open, two old wars not yet over and a new one just begun, he deserves more than token opposition. There is just over a third of the country who think that Republicans are providing it. But then they believe anything.

(Gary Younge is a feature writer and columnist for the Guardian based in the U.S.)

20110331-02	18:51	Robert	Fw: Obamacare
-------------	-------	--------	---------------

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com pretty much blows this out of the water because the points made concern an earlier version of the bill, not the final bill as passed. Big difference. Below is really a condensed list of all the mainly inaccurate points listed in the Snopes.com article: <http://www.snopes.com/politics/medical/kithil.asp>.—SteveB]

YOU ARE NOT GOING TO LIKE THIS: Obama Care Highlighted by Page Number

THE CARE BILL HB3200

THIS IS THE 2ND OFFICIAL WHO HAS OUTLINED THESE PARTS OF THE CARE BILL

Judge Kithil of Marble Falls , TX—HB3200 highlighted pages most egregious. Please read this..... especially the reference to pages 58 & 59

JUDGE KITHIL wrote:

 Page 50/section 152: The bill will provide insurance to all non-U.S. residents, even if they are here illegally.

 Page 58 and 59: The government will have real-time access to an individual's bank account and will have the authority to make electronic fund transfers from those accounts.

 Page 65/section 164: The plan will be subsidized (by the government) for all union members, union retirees and for community organizations (such as the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now—ACORN).

 Page 203/line 14-15: The tax imposed under this section will not be treated as a tax. (How could anybody in their right mind come up with that?)

 Page 241 and 253: Doctors will all be paid the same regardless of specialty, and the government will set all doctors' fees.

 Page 272. section 1145: Cancer hospital will ration care according to the patient's age.

 Page 317 and 321: The government will impose a prohibition on hospital expansion; however, communities may petition for an exception.

 Page 425, line 4-12: The government mandates advance-care planning consultations. Those on Social Security will be required to attend an "end-of-life planning" seminar every five years. (Death counseling..)

 Page 429, line 13-25: The government will specify which doctors can write an end-of-life order.

HAD ENOUGH???? Judge Kithil then goes on:

"Finally, it is specifically stated that this bill will not apply to members of Congress. Members of Congress are already exempt from the Social Security system, and have a well-funded private plan that covers their retirement needs. If they were on our Social Security plan, I believe they would find a very quick 'fix' to make the plan financially sound for their future."

Honorable David Kithil, Marble Falls, Texas

All of the above should give you the point blank ammo you need to support your opposition to Obamacare. Please send this information on to all of your email contacts.

20110401-01	12:43	Dennis	"What's Behind the Oil Spike to $107 (and Counting...)"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Before the overheated political rhetoric starts up again about escalating gas prices, read the following from an expert on the subject:

Why oil costs what it does...

"What's Behind the Oil Spike to $107 (and Counting...)" by Kent Moors, Oil and Energy Investor

Apr. 1, 2011, (<http://oilandenergyinvestor.com/2011/04/whats-behind-oil-spike-to-107-and-counting/>)

Crude oil prices continue to rise, increasing significantly to close yesterday at $106.62 a barrel for West Texas Intermediate (WTI) futures in New York and $117.36 a barrel for Brent in London. Already this morning, WTI hit a new two-and-a-half-year high of $107.83.

The latest rise is not a result of new geopolitical developments — although they do continue to weigh on the market.

Nor is it a result of any short-term inventory problems in either the U.S. or western Europe. In fact, available supply of both crude oil and finished products continues to run considerably above five-year averages. American stockpiles are now at multi-year highs.

This spike is our introduction to a very quickly changing oil sector... one in which demand is coming from new quarters, and concerns are increasing over sufficient balance among regions.

It has been some time since the OECD (Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development) countries — essentially Europe, North America, Australia, Korea, and Japan — have actually controlled this market. Demand now comes from developing, not developed, economies.

And that is prompting a new oil dynamic.

What occurs on a day-to-day basis in the U.S. — still the largest end-user market in the world — has a declining impact on price. This affects both crude oil and finished products such as gasoline, diesel, high-end kerosene (jet fuel), and low-sulfur heating oil.

There is an important point to remember from all of this.

The Global Oil Market Is An Integrated One

Regardless of how much surplus inventory may exist in an individual national economy, prices for gasoline (or diesel or heating oil or jet fuel) are still fundamentally driven by what occurs elsewhere.

Neither "Drill, baby, drill" nor "Fortress America" will have the impact their proponents anticipate. In fact, the idea that domestic crude can reduce gasoline prices is fundamentally incorrect.

Domestic crude is considerably more expensive to extract than oil exported from elsewhere. And since the cost of crude is the single largest component in the cost of refining, having the source closer to home does not translate into less expensive refined products.

Now, if this is a national security argument, pricing considerations take a secondary seat.

Security deals with having supply under control; it does not address price.

If Americans were to accept paying more at the pump (and we are talking way more here — well over $5 a gallon, as we will see in a moment) as a necessary cost of weaning ourselves from Middle East sourcing, then the solution would be simple.

Unfortunately, it is the pricing side that captures the attention.

And if we are concerned with the price of oil and gasoline, diesel, etc., with the net impact of rising oil prices on the U.S. economy and recovery, of jobs, tax base, and industrial infrastructure at risk, then importing from abroad becomes the cheaper option.

The security/pricing tradeoff is both the most all-encompassing and the most politically misused element in the entire energy debate.

Yet it does bring the real issue into focus.

Domestic Production Is Unrealistic

Each one-dollar rise in the price of a barrel of crude oil translates, on average, into a 2.5-cent increase at the pump for a gallon of regular gasoline, and closer to a 3.2-cent increase for a gallon of diesel.

Let me put what this means for American domestic production into perspective.

During the second week of July 2008, when oil prices hit $147.27 a barrel, with gasoline nationwide on average over $4.20 and diesel over $4.60 per gallon, there were more than 360,000 capped wells in west Texas holding, in aggregate, millions of barrels of crude oil.

But even at with oil at $147.27, it was too expensive to open them up. These are "stripper wells," the source of over 60% of the crude pumped daily in the U.S. Each well provides less than 10 barrels of oil a day but upwards to 200 barrels of water.

And that disproportionately increases the cost of extraction.

At the time, I estimated it would take a price of $183 a barrel to make these wells profitable enough to allow an oil flow. That $35.73 price difference (between the actual $147.27 and the required $183) would have catapulted gasoline prices to an average of $5.09 and diesel to $5.74 per gallon. And that was almost three years ago.

It is little wonder, then, that we are experiencing a rise in imported gasoline and other oil products into the U.S. It is becoming cheaper to refine them abroad.

This is the real reason we will not see new refineries built in the American market.

The actual barriers to new refineries are not environmental regulations or NIMBY (not in my back yard) sentiment. Rather — even forgetting about the billions in expense involved — it would take about a decade to bring a new refinery on-line from scratch. Well before that period expires, the more cost-effective approach is simply to import what additional oil product is needed.

So the current spike in oil prices is not an aberration. It is not because of events in Libya, or Syria or Bahrain or Egypt. It results from the built-in pricing problems of the market itself.

This will guarantee higher oil product prices, supported by a number of the other elements we have been discussing here over the past 15 months.

As another presidential election cycle begins, you need to keep this in mind. Political rhetoric aside, the gasoline pricing issue and the cost of crude are not a result of Democrats, Republicans, Independents, Vegetarians, Reformed Druids, or any other political party or movement. They come from the oil market itself.

We will continue to bounce from crisis to crisis until we recognize this fact... and begin the genuine, difficult, exasperating, long, and incredibly expensive process of moving from a crude-based economy to a more balanced energy model.

20110403-01	10:28	SteveB	Alternative Vehicle Fuels, Hydrogen
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------------

Dear Jim,

I hope you are doing well and enjoying spring. I had an idea the other night that I wanted to get your thoughts on.

Almost all the taxis and many of the cars in Santa Cruz run on natural gas. They often use a tank in the trunk just like your BBQ uses, and all the gas stations sell gas as well as gasoline. I wonder, with gasoline costing what it does, and with our plentiful supplies of natural gas, why we aren't doing that here?

Last night, I woke up in the middle of the night thinking of a way the new, cheap hydrogen could be used to do the same thing without fuel cells, which aren't really ready yet—a way hydrogen might be able to be used in existing internal combustion engines just as natural gas can. It's kind of an invention needing a patent and development.

<http://www.technologyreview.com/Energy/20134/?a=f>

I know hydrogen is a dangerous substance. I once was consulting for a company in Massachusetts where they used hydrogen as a reducing agent. They had a giant tank of liquid hydrogen outside the plant. One day, there was a huge explosion. My office window looked out at the parking lot and hydrogen storage tank. A big hydrogen truck was parked there and I saw the driver, in his special suit, running around beating the flames on his suit. There was an immediate evacuation siren. I happened to have a guy from an outside company working near the explosion. I was sure he didn't know what to do. I got on a golf cart (the place was big) and started heading toward the explosion as fast as I could go, even though everyone else was going in the other direction and yelling at me to turn around. Well, I got him OK, put him aboard and got out of there, the whole time thinking we were about to die. Fortunately, there were no more explosions and the delivery truck and storage tank did not explode. The problem had been a leaky valve on the truck. I was told later that if the big tank had exploded, the entire plant would have been just a giant crater. Because of this experience, I've always thought battery-powered electric cars to be superior to hydrogen powered cars because of the dangers of distributing hydrogen.

But I wonder if hydrogen could be rendered less explosive? The way this might work is like this: air is about 20% oxygen. Let's say the gas tank on the car were filled with 20% hydrogen and 80% nitrogen. A pressure-regulated fuel injector system would supply the hydrogen mix and air to the cylinders in the proper proportions (approx, 2:1) to burn all the hydrogen and produce water vapor exhaust.

Do you think this hydrogen mixture would be suitably less explosive than hydrogen alone, and less dangerous? Maybe feasible?

20110403-02	17:38	SteveB	"Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

Income inequality...

This article is as clear as the streams in Montana.

It is a must read! It explains and proves pretty much everything I have been saying since before the last Presidential election. I hope you will read it carefully. If you think these premises are wrong, you might want to re-examine which side you are on—the side of how we became the greatest nation on Earth, or the side of our present decline and fall. I don't believe I put that in terms too strong. The future of America hangs in the balance.

"Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" by Joseph E. Stiglitz, Vanity Fair

May, 2011, (<http://www.vanityfair.com/society/features/2011/05/top-one-percent-201105>)

Americans have been watching protests against oppressive regimes that concentrate massive wealth in the hands of an elite few. Yet in our own democracy, 1 percent of the people take nearly a quarter of the nation's income—an inequality even the wealthy will come to regret.

The top 1 percent may have the best houses, educations, and lifestyles, says the author, but "their fate is bound up with how the other 99 percent live."

It's no use pretending that what has obviously happened has not in fact happened. The upper 1 percent of Americans are now taking in nearly a quarter of the nation's income every year. In terms of wealth rather than income, the top 1 percent control 40 percent. Their lot in life has improved considerably. Twenty-five years ago, the corresponding figures were 12 percent and 33 percent. One response might be to celebrate the ingenuity and drive that brought good fortune to these people, and to contend that a rising tide lifts all boats.

That response would be misguided. While the top 1 percent have seen their incomes rise 18 percent over the past decade, those in the middle have actually seen their incomes fall. For men with only high school degrees, the decline has been precipitous—12 percent in the last quarter century alone. All the growth in recent decades—and more—has gone to those at the top. In terms of income equality, America lags behind any country in the old, ossified Europe that President George W. Bush used to deride. Among our closest counterparts are Russia with its oligarchs and Iran. While many of the old centers of inequality in Latin America, such as Brazil, have been striving in recent years, rather successfully, to improve the plight of the poor and reduce gaps in income, America has allowed inequality to grow.

Economists long ago tried to justify the vast inequalities that seemed so troubling in the mid-19th century—inequalities that are but a pale shadow of what we are seeing in America today. The justification they came up with was called "marginal productivity theory." In a nutshell, this theory associated higher incomes with higher productivity and a greater contribution to society. It is a theory that has always been cherished by the rich. Evidence for its validity, however, remains thin. The corporate executives who helped bring on the recession of the past three years—whose contribution to our society, and to their own companies, has been massively negative—went on to receive large bonuses. In some cases, companies were so embarrassed about calling such rewards "performance bonuses" that they felt compelled to change the name to "retention bonuses" (even if the only thing being retained was bad performance). Those who have contributed great positive innovations to our society, from the pioneers of genetic understanding to the pioneers of the Information Age, have received a pittance compared with those responsible for the financial innovations that brought our global economy to the brink of ruin.

Some people look at income inequality and shrug their shoulders. So what if this person gains and that person loses? What matters, they argue, is not how the pie is divided but the size of the pie. That argument is fundamentally wrong. An economy in which most citizens are doing worse year after year—an economy like America's—is not likely to do well over the long haul. There are several reasons for this.

First, growing inequality is the flip side of something else: shrinking opportunity.

Whenever we diminish equality of opportunity, it means that we are not using some of our most valuable assets—our people—in the most productive way possible. Second, many of the distortions that lead to inequality—such as those associated with monopoly power and preferential tax treatment for special interests—undermine the efficiency of the economy. This new inequality goes on to create new distortions, undermining efficiency even further. To give just one example, far too many of our most talented young people, seeing the astronomical rewards, have gone into finance rather than into fields that would lead to a more productive and healthy economy.

Third, and perhaps most important, a modern economy requires “collective action”—it needs government to invest in infrastructure, education, and technology. The United States and the world have benefited greatly from government-sponsored research that led to the Internet, to advances in public health, and so on. But America has long suffered from an under-investment in infrastructure (look at the condition of our highways and bridges, our railroads and airports), in basic research, and in education at all levels. Further cutbacks in these areas lie ahead.

None of this should come as a surprise—it is simply what happens when a society’s wealth distribution becomes lopsided. The more divided a society becomes in terms of wealth, the more reluctant the wealthy become to spend money on common needs. The rich don’t need to rely on government for parks or education or medical care or personal security—they can buy all these things for themselves. In the process, they become more distant from ordinary people, losing whatever empathy they may once have had. They also worry about strong government—one that could use its powers to adjust the balance, take some of their wealth, and invest it for the common good. The top 1 percent may complain about the kind of government we have in America, but in truth they like it just fine: too gridlocked to re-distribute, too divided to do anything but lower taxes.

Economists are not sure how to fully explain the growing inequality in America. The ordinary dynamics of supply and demand have certainly played a role: laborsaving technologies have reduced the demand for many “good” middle-class, blue-collar jobs. Globalization has created a worldwide marketplace, pitting expensive unskilled workers in America against cheap unskilled workers overseas. Social changes have also played a role—for instance, the decline of unions, which once represented a third of American workers and now represent about 12 percent.

But one big part of the reason we have so much inequality is that the top 1 percent want it that way. The most obvious example involves tax policy. Lowering tax rates on capital gains, which is how the rich receive a large portion of their income, has given the wealthiest Americans close to a free ride. Monopolies and near monopolies have always been a source of economic power—from John D. Rockefeller at the beginning of the last century to Bill Gates at the end. Lax enforcement of anti-trust laws, especially during Republican administrations, has been a godsend to the top 1 percent. Much of today’s inequality is due to manipulation of the financial system, enabled by changes in the rules that have been bought and paid for by the financial industry itself—one of its best investments ever. The government lent money to financial institutions at close to 0 percent interest and provided generous bailouts on favorable terms when all else failed. Regulators turned a blind eye to a lack of transparency and to conflicts of interest.

When you look at the sheer volume of wealth controlled by the top 1 percent in this country, it’s tempting to see our growing inequality as a quintessentially American achievement—we started way behind the pack, but now we’re doing inequality on a world-class level. And it looks as if we’ll be building on this achievement for years to come, because what made it possible is self-reinforcing. Wealth begets power, which begets more wealth. During the savings-and-loan scandal of the 1980s—a scandal whose dimensions, by today’s standards, seem almost quaint—the banker Charles Keating was asked by a congressional committee whether the $1.5 million he had spread among a few key elected officials could actually buy influence. “I certainly hope so,” he replied. The Supreme Court, in its recent Citizens United case, has enshrined the right of corporations to buy government, by removing limitations on campaign spending.

The personal and the political are today in perfect alignment. Virtually all U.S. senators, and most of the representatives in the House, are members of the top 1 percent when they arrive, are kept in office by money from the top 1 percent, and know that if they serve the top 1 percent well they will be rewarded by the top 1 percent when they leave office. By and large, the key executive-branch policymakers on trade and economic policy also come from the top 1 percent. When pharmaceutical companies receive a trillion-dollar gift—through legislation prohibiting the government, the largest buyer of drugs, from bargaining over price—it should not come as cause for wonder. It should not make jaws drop that a tax bill cannot emerge from Congress unless big tax cuts are put in place for the wealthy. Given the power of the top 1 percent, this is the way you would expect the system to work.

America's inequality distorts our society in every conceivable way. There is, for one thing, a well-documented lifestyle effect—people outside the top 1 percent increasingly live beyond their means. Trickle-down economics may be a chimera, but trickle-down behaviorism is very real. Inequality massively distorts our foreign policy.

The top 1 percent rarely serve in the military—the reality is that the “all-volunteer” army does not pay enough to attract their sons and daughters, and patriotism goes only so far. Plus, the wealthiest class feels no pinch from higher taxes when the nation goes to war: borrowed money will pay for all that. Foreign policy, by definition, is about the balancing of national interests and national resources. With the top 1 percent in charge, and paying no price, the notion of balance and restraint goes out the window. There is no limit to the adventures we can undertake; corporations and contractors stand only to gain. The rules of economic globalization are likewise designed to benefit the rich: they encourage competition among countries for business, which drives down taxes on corporations, weakens health and environmental protections, and undermines what used to be viewed as the “core” labor rights, which include the right to collective bargaining. Imagine what the world might look like if the rules were designed instead to encourage competition among countries for workers. Governments would compete in providing economic security, low taxes on ordinary wage earners, good education, and a clean environment—things workers care about. But the top 1 percent don't need to care.

Or, more accurately, they think they don't. Of all the costs imposed on our society by the top 1 percent, perhaps the greatest is this: the erosion of our sense of identity, in which fair play, equality of opportunity, and a sense of community are so important. America has long prided itself on being a fair society, where everyone has an equal chance of getting ahead, but the statistics suggest otherwise: the chances of a poor citizen, or even a middle-class citizen, making it to the top in America are smaller than in many countries of Europe. The cards are stacked against them. It is this sense of an unjust system without opportunity that has given rise to the conflagrations in the Middle East: rising food prices and growing and persistent youth unemployment simply served as kindling. With youth unemployment in America at around 20 percent (and in some locations, and among some sociodemographic groups, at twice that); with one out of six Americans desiring a fulltime job not able to get one; with one out of seven Americans on food stamps (and about the same number suffering from “food insecurity”)—given all this, there is ample evidence that something has blocked the vaunted “trickling down” from the top 1 percent to everyone else. All of this is having the predictable effect of creating alienation—voter turnout among those in their 20s in the last election stood at 21 percent, comparable to the unemployment rate.

In recent weeks we have watched people taking to the streets by the millions to protest political, economic, and social conditions in the oppressive societies they inhabit. Governments have been toppled in Egypt and Tunisia. Protests have erupted in Libya, Yemen, and Bahrain. The ruling families elsewhere in the region look on nervously from their air-conditioned penthouses—will they be next? They are right to worry. These are societies where a minuscule fraction of the population—less than 1 percent—controls the lion's share of the wealth; where wealth is a main determinant of power; where entrenched corruption of one sort or another is a way of life; and where the wealthiest often stand actively in the way of policies that would improve life for people in general.

As we gaze out at the popular fervor in the streets, one question to ask ourselves is this: When will it come to America? In important ways, our own country has become like one of these distant, troubled places.

Alexis de Tocqueville once described what he saw as a chief part of the peculiar genius of American society—something he called “self-interest properly understood.”

The last two words were the key. Everyone possesses self-interest in a narrow sense: I want what's good for me right now! Self-interest “properly understood” is different. It means appreciating that paying attention to everyone else's self-interest—in other words, the common welfare—is in fact a precondition for one's own ultimate well-being. Tocqueville was not suggesting that there was anything noble or idealistic about this outlook—in fact, he was suggesting the opposite. It was a mark of American pragmatism. Those canny Americans understood a basic fact: looking out for the other guy isn't just good for the soul—it's good for business.

The top 1 percent have the best houses, the best educations, the best doctors, and the best lifestyles, but there is one thing that money doesn't seem to have bought: an understanding that their fate is bound up with how the other 99 percent live. Throughout history, this is something that the top 1 percent eventually do learn. Too late.

20110403-03	18:10	Charis	Re: “Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%”
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveB,

I'm not disagreeing, but this study doesn't seem to have taken into account the hundreds of millions of dollars that the upper 1% actually DO donate.

[OK. The rich give to charity. If it were enough, why hasn't poverty been wiped off the map? Look how many people are homeless in any given American city. What the rich 1% or even 2% or even 100% give is clearly not enough to solve the problem, even with governmental help. —SteveB]

20110403-04 18:32 SteveB Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%"

Dear Charis,

It may seem like a lot, and I'm sure some good works get done for some needy folks, but it doesn't seem to be enough to stop the decline and fall of America, does it? All that giving is really just a tiny drop in a gigantic bucket.

That's because the rich, as a group, actually contribute less of their income to needy causes than does the middle class. Look it up.

You may have a little experience with people on welfare or food stamps or unemployment or (anymore) social security. And, remember, people basically pay for unemployment and social security themselves. In my experience, these people lead very marginal existences on meagre funds. And, over the years, the proportion of people making so little money as to get these benefits, given mainly for their children, has been drastically reduced. I'm not saying any of that is good or bad. But let me ask you this, how many people have you ever known who lived on the largess of the rich? None, in my case.

Also, most people aren't looking for hand-outs. They're looking for good jobs, which are very hard to find anymore.

There is no arguing the dire straits we are in, only how we pull ourselves out of it, and the rich don't seem to be helping anyone but themselves, while the greatest country on Earth caves in around their ears.

20110404-01 08:24 SteveB Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" America

Dear Charis,

Everyone's individual experience is different. In my life, I have not seen any deterioration in the American people's work ethic or drive. To me, that is just basic human nature. It has always been what it has always been and will always be until our genes change, which they have not. I think you have been unlucky in the people you have known.

In my life, I have been lucky to travel to at least 25 foreign countries, many of which I lived and worked in. I have been to all 48 lower states, again living and working in many. I have known many people from India, running hotels and convenience stores, all hard-working. I have known the maids at my hotels, many illegal, like Mariana, our current maid. Honest and hard-working. I have worked with very many American factory and restaurant workers of all races. I am proud to say I have known almost all of them. Good people. All these good folks, though, are struggling. This didn't use to be the case when I was growing up in Indiana.

What I have seen, though, is a growing sense of hopelessness and even despair starting to creep into the American psyche.

This didn't come from welfare or hand-outs, which have been drastically reduced in our lifetimes and, frankly, goes mainly to a small minority of unfortunate people. All public assistance in America makes up less than a minuscule 1% of the GDP.

What is wrong with America has, in my opinion, been created by greed, corruption, and abrogation of responsibility at the top, not by laziness at the bottom. Surely you would have to agree that is much more consistent with human nature as we know it than the converse.

The problems created by this group (with the help of our politicians) include the recent Great Recession (still in progress), the huge federal and state debts, the wars, the loss of our manufacturing base, our dependence on China and foreign oil, our lack of adequate health care, our deteriorating infrastructure and educational system, and our apparently dismal future.

Common people are the exact same as they've always been. As they were when they built the greatest economy with their sweat. Unfortunately, greed and exploitation are also the same as they have always been.

Where are the jobs? Where is opportunity? Where is a living wage? Where is the life shared by my parents and your parents and my old barber in Greencastle and the guy who worked at the shoe store, all of whom were humble people, yet able to drive OK if not new cars, live in OK if not big, new houses, send their kids to college, and dream of a better life for the future? Where has all that gone?

13% of the houses in America lay empty. 20% in Florida. 23% in Sarasota. The housing bubble was not created by common people going into debt to provide housing for their families. It was caused by the big banks, by the fat cats. It didn't happen in Canada (which I am very familiar with), where people seem to me to be exactly like us. Yet, in America, people are without work, many without shelter, many—believe it or not—hungry, and many, many without adequate health care...in the richest country the world has ever seen, in the "land of opportunity". And this is the fault of the common man, who seeks only to work and provide for his/her family? With what it costs to live in the U.S., how can anyone except the rich live without going into debt? Where's the cheap housing (even now), where's the public transportation, where are anything but part-time jobs at Wal-Mart for slave wages?

Believe me, America's problems cannot be laid on the backs of the struggling poor! I believe this is a myth created by those who would control and exploit us.

20110404-02	08:52	Charis	Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" America
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveB,

Like I said, I don't disagree with much of what you're saying. The problem is I've worked with the welfare system (WIC) and the United Way, Crisis Intervention, Mental Health Association, and various police organizations (I know, I'm a trained officer, weird right?) in states like Minnesota (among migrant workers), California (Fresno, poorest city in the U.S. in 2008), Houston (40% of the population is illegal Mexicans) and Miami (a little of everything) and what made me bitter was that you see over and over again hundreds of people (homeless, suicidal, domestic abuse, drug and alcohol addiction, or just plain unemployed, etc.) who are desperately poor, who have more options in the U.S. than in any other country (free food, free housing, free utility bills, free medical care, free schooling, free interpreters, free job training, free counseling, free childcare, etc.) and who do not WANT to work. They want hand-outs. We even saw this at homeless shelters. The men and women are asked to help clean the kitchen or sweep the floors or clear the tables and they walk out! They say they'd rather be on the streets where people don't make them work! This is one point (the poor wanting to work point). And of course I'm not saying this is everyone. Just that I can cite, literally, hundreds of cases for you of women who called us to rescue them from domestic abuse only to drop the charges and return to the guy over and over again, homeless people who don't want the help they could take advantage of, people who could receive job training but insist they don't need or want it—and let's not even begin with the hundreds of illegals who are looking for ways to bilk the system for all they can get—free.

Secondly, I still believe Americans are living in lala-land and have not gotten a grip on reality. People spend in excess on things they don't need or can't afford knowing in advance they can't afford them, then blame it on the system. Yes, banks should not have offered credit so easily, but where were people's morals when they applied for those loans knowing full well they would not be able to pay them off for example? (not everyone, of course) but let's be truthful—hundreds of thousands of people applied for loans knowing full well they wouldn't pay them off.

I'm not justifying the wealthy, the government or the system. I'm just saying it's too easy to blame them for all of the country's problems. I fully believe everyone involved is to blame. All too many people know how the system is and take advantage of it and there although there are real "victims", I think the whole "I'm a victim" mentality is really wrong. We are a product of our decisions and therefore we must pay the consequences. Really, is no one responsible for their actions anymore?

20110404-03 10:19 SteveB Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" America

Dear Charis,

I guess it's just, then, that I've known the working people and you've known the non-working people.

20110407-01 11:20 Dennis "New American Socialism" & "An American Tragedy Brewing" & "One of the Most Obvious Frauds Ever Foisted on the American People"

The following essay is by an investment advisor with a decidedly libertarian conservative perspective. I think you'll find it interesting in its analysis as a political observer and concerned investor. While Stansberry chooses to call the current American political and economic system a variant of state socialism, "New American Socialism," it seems to me to be a variant of old fashioned corporate fascism or nationalist socialism. But whatever he wants to call it, I won't quibble with his conclusion about who's getting all the profits and benefits and who's getting the short end of the stick from the gaming of the system.

"New American Socialism" by Porter Stansberry

No one knows what to call it...

That's part of the problem. It's difficult to criticize something that doesn't yet have a proper name.

You can't just call our economic system "socialism." It's not. There's a profit motive and private ownership of nearly all assets. Socialism has neither of these. Besides, far too many people have become far too rich in our system to simply label it "socialism."

If you have ever traveled to an actual socialist country — with a power grid that never works, little public sanitation, petty graft at every turn, and endemic, horrifying poverty — you realize our system and real socialism aren't the same at all.

But our system isn't truly capitalism, either. The State intervenes in almost every industry, often in a big and expensive way. With government at all levels making up more than 40% of GDP, it's fair to say we live in a State dominated society.

And as with all socialist experiments, it is the poor who suffer the worst economic outcomes. It is their cash savings that get wiped out by inflation. It is their jobs that disappear when regulations reduce capital investment or government debt crowds out private capital in the markets.

If the poor knew the first thing about economics, they wouldn't keep voting for socialist politicians and their programs. Alas, they don't even know the basics.

The poor in America, like the poor everywhere, still believe you can rob Peter to pay Paul. They still believe their "leaders" are trying to serve their best interests. It is a sad hoax. What has really happened is clear: Bamboozling the poor has become a way of life for American politicians. And the poor's willingness — even eagerness — to embrace the resulting economic slavery is the linchpin of our system.

But it's not only the poor who have become addicted to the system.

Businessmen like Warren Buffett embrace it, too — despite its limitations and taxes. Buffett calls it the "American System." He says it's the greatest system for creating wealth the world has ever seen.

We're not so sure.

Yes, it certainly makes it easy for big businessmen like Buffett to become wealthy. But those same benefits don't accrue to the society at large. For example... even though the value of America's production has soared over the last 40 years and asset prices have risen considerably, our debts have grown even more.

When you adjust for debt and inflation, you discover America hasn't gotten richer at all. Yes, we have become more affluent. And yes, some individuals have gotten vastly richer. But as a whole, when you add back the debts we've racked up, the country hasn't gotten richer at all.

Since the end of the gold standard in 1971, real after-tax wages, per capita, stagnated. On average, we haven't gotten any richer at all in 40 years. What happened over the last 40 years?

Why did so many people rush so eagerly into debt? Why did they borrow more and more to buy the same things at ever-higher prices — again and again and again? And why do people in America continue to work, day after day, for jobs that offer no opportunity and declining real wages? Most important, how did a few people end up getting so rich from this merry-go-round economic system that never takes us anywhere?

To answer this question, we need only answer one core question: Who benefits?

Whose wealth and power increases with inflation? Whose stature in society grows alongside the government? Who profits from increased spending on wars, prisons, and social programs that are doomed to fail? And most of all... who profits from an explosion in debt?

A certain class of people has the power to not only protect itself from these policies but to profit as well. These people have used the last 40 years to produce massive amounts of paper wealth. And they are now desperately trying to convert those paper accounts into real wealth, which explains the exploding price of farmland and precious metals.

This explosion of wealth at the top of the "food chain" is the main feature of what I call New American Socialism. It's a system fueled by paper money, the constant expansion of debt, and a kind of corruption that's hard to police because it occurs within the boundaries of the law.

Like the European and totalitarian socialism of the last 100 years, New American Socialism harnesses the power of the State to grow and maintain production. Like in traditional socialism, the poor pay the costs of New American Socialism. But unlike socialist systems of the past, this new American version has one critical improvement...

In the New American Socialism, the power of the system produces private profits.

In this way, it provides a huge incentive to entrepreneurs and politicians to work together on behalf of the system. This is what keeps the system going. This is what keeps it from collapsing upon itself. And this, unfortunately, is why the imbalances in the world economy will continue to grow until the entire global monetary system itself implodes.

"An American Tragedy Brewing" by Porter Stansberry

As I explained, in "New American Socialism," the power of the system produces private profits. It began when Nixon took us off the gold standard. Without the tie to gold, the amount of economic mischief our government could engineer became practically limitless.

Today, I'll show you an example of how New American Socialism works and how thoroughly corrupted the system has become, and I'll begin to set up our challenge as investors today...

While you're reading today's essay, I want you to think about whether you're willing to make a profit on a business that couldn't survive without government protection... whose products aren't saleable in a real market. In other words: How mercenary are you?

To answer that question, we're going to take a look at a tragedy that's brewing right now...

For many decades, the government has supported higher education in America. Does the government give money to actual students based on their achievement? Yes... but that's a small part of the program. Most of the government money spent comes via access to student loans — so-called Title IV funding.

A host of rules apply to these loans, but knowing just a few of them is instructive. The most important rule relates to a college's total revenue mix.

To access Title IV funding, a college cannot receive more than 90% of its revenue from government-related sources. The government is allowing the market to determine whether or not a college is useful and legitimate by requiring it to earn only 10% of its revenues from private sources. (Does this sound smart to you? It's tantamount to requiring only a tiny down payment to buy a house. It's dangerous because the student — and the college — doesn't have much skin in the game.)

There's another important rule. Colleges can lose access to government backed funds if loans made to previous students experience default rates in excess of 25% for three consecutive years. (Naturally, the rule has a key loophole, which I'll discuss in a moment.)

These two key rules, which leave the government on the hook for 90% of the risk of the student loans, led to the creation and massive growth of the for-profit education industry.

Clever entrepreneurs realized a traditional college education wasn't practical for many students who lacked either the cognitive ability to succeed at a traditional college or the desire to acquire a liberal arts education. What many students wanted, could master, and could afford were essentially trade schools that taught skills in demand from local employers. For-profit education grew up competing with poorly funded community colleges. And they had a major advantage: huge marketing budgets.

Let me show you what this means in terms of how these for-profit schools spend the Title IV money they receive.

Apollo is the largest company in the for-profit education space. In 2009, Apollo grew its total revenues by $833 million. Yes, you read that correctly — $833 million in revenue growth during a severe recession. Its Title IV funding rose by $1.1 billion. That is, the amount of government-related loans and grants it received increased by more than its total revenue growth. The company became even more dependent on the government.

Where did the money go? Not toward education. In 2009, Apollo increased its spending on faculty and other instructional costs by $99 million. That is, out of every $1 it got extra from the government, it spent roughly $0.09 on actual education.

Instead, a lot of money went to shareholders. Since 2008, Apollo has spent more than $1 billion buying back its own stock. But most of the money went to its executives. Apollo currently spends almost $1.5 billion annually on compensation for its administrators and salesmen.

In one way, you can argue for-profit education executives have earned their paychecks. Enrollment is booming, with the public showing a clear preference for the curriculum offered by the for-profit schools. Since 1986, enrollment in the sector has grown six fold. The U.S. now has 2,800 for-profit institutions of higher learning. About 10% of all college students are now enrolled in for-profit schools.

And you can make a good case these firms are providing a valuable service at a reasonable price. Supporters of the industry note that average revenue per student is the lowest at for-profit colleges: $11,130, while public universities average $18,922 per student and private not-for-profit colleges received $37,869 per student.

So are these students (and our society) getting a bargain? Does foisting 90% of the risk on government lead to positive outcomes? No, not really. Instead, much like Fannie Mae did to housing, these government guarantees create huge incentives for selling college to students who can't afford it. It also makes college more expensive and less affordable.

The most recent examination of student-loan repayment shows for-profit education students have much higher default rates. In 2008, the national default rate on student loans was 7%. The default rate for private not-for-profit schools (the most expensive) was 4%. The default rate for public not-for-profit school loans was 6%. The default rate for private for-profit schools was 11.6%. U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan said of the numbers:

The data tells us that students attending for-profit schools are the most likely to default... Far too many for-profit schools are saddling students with debt that they cannot afford in exchange for degrees and certificates they cannot use.

When you look at the default figures in aggregate, the problem jumps out at you. Students at for-profit schools represent 26% of the borrower population. They make up 43% of all defaults.

When I saw that number, the first thing that occurred to me was... "Wait a minute... I thought schools get kicked out of the program if default rates reach 25% for three consecutive years? How can for-profit schools represent so much of the default rate when they make up so few of the students borrowing?"

The answer is — borrowers who default after the first two years of repayment aren't counted.

What?!

That's right. To count as a default, you have to stop repaying your student loans in the first two years after graduation. The repayments required during this time are extremely low — much like the teaser rate on a subprime mortgage. The real extent of the problem can't be understood until you see the actual default rate on all loans. After all, the real default rate isn't the percentage of students who default in the first two years. It's the percentage of borrowers who never repay their debts. What is the real number? Well, we don't know. The Department of Education won't make that data public.

What we do know is the companies themselves write off between 50% and 60% of the private loans they make to their students.

The companies use these private loans to make sure they stay within the 90% rule that governs access to the government's backing. That's tantamount to the many second mortgages that were made on the side to homebuyers, so they could afford their down payments. And not surprisingly, when folks buy a home using 100% borrowed money or when they get a college degree using 100% borrowed money, they frequently won't (or can't) pay the loan back.

I have no objection to a private lender who decides to lend to poor credit risks — even for things like an expensive home or degree. But let that lender bear the risk. Don't pass those risks to me via government protection.

Obviously, with 50% to 60% of these loans defaulting, the only real profit in the system comes from the government's protection. And the scary part is the amount of government money flooding into these schools is soaring. Historically, little government money was available to these schools — only $2 billion to $4 billion a year. But then... with the right kind of legal corruption... the floodgates opened.

Sally Stroup was the head lobbyist for Apollo. In 2002, she became the assistant secretary of the Department of Education under President Bush. Guess what happened next?

Stroup gutted the rules that governed which students these schools could recruit. Government funding for for-profit college education is now more than $20 billion a year. And at current growth rates, within 10 years, 40% of all government-backed college funding will go to for-profit education.

Call it socialism. Call it New American Socialism. Call it compassionate conservatism. It doesn't matter what you call it, the rules of the game are clear: The government takes all of the risk while investors and executives keep all of the profits.

This brings me back to the challenge I outlined above. After reading today's essay, would you buy shares of Apollo? They're cheap, trading at about 3.5 times cash earnings, and the U.S. Treasury has essentially guaranteed its future revenues.

That's certainly attractive. But knowing what you now know about the for-profit education business, do you want to own this company?

"One of the Most Obvious Frauds Ever Foisted on the American People" by Porter Stansberry

Yesterday, I left you with a question...

Over the past few days, I've described what I call New American Socialism. As I've shown you, it's a kind of legal corruption whereby the risks of doing business are assumed by the taxpayers... but the profits still accrue to private enterprise.

The corruption has infected one industry after another. And it's weighing down our economy... But I've actually preferred having it in many of the stocks I've recommended over the years. It tends to be good for investors.

So the question now is, am I still interested in buying into New American Socialism? It's a difficult question... and the answer is complicated. So bear with me...

In yesterday's essay, I described a tragedy unfolding in the education sector. If you missed the essay, I suggest you go back and give it a read. You'll find the numbers disturbing. Essentially, the for-profit education industry is selling a product its customers cannot afford.

This industry games the rules of the government and spends a fortune on lobbying — more than $12 million in the last year. This industry would literally not exist without government-guarantees standing behind 90% of its revenues.

And Wall Street experts estimate this industry will rack up around $250 billion in credit losses over the next decade — an amount of money that exceeds the losses from Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac so far.

All these risks will eventually cost the U.S. Treasury billions of dollars. You see, this industry overwhelmingly targets women and minorities — people who are often up against a wall financially. These students will never be able to repay these debts.

While these students have no financial skin in the game (many borrow 100% of their tuition), they face enormous consequences down the road from this scheme... Student loans are notoriously difficult to discharge, and many borrowers will be crippled financially by the obligations they cannot afford.

The facts of this situation are incontrovertible and well known — even inside the current president's administration. And yet... even when all of these facts were studied and reviewed... what did the president do?

Critics had demanded so-called "gainful employment" regulations that would limit how much a student could borrow to an amount of money he would likely be able to repay based on the current employment and income track record of other alumni. Obviously, such sensible regulation was never likely to be implemented by Washington... especially not by a minority president when the funding in question goes overwhelmingly to poor, minority students.

Instead, in early June, Obama's administration promulgated a new set of rules that were supposed to address the abuses and the risks of the government's generous funding rules for for-profit education.

The new rules actually loosen the funding requirements — substantially. Colleges will be eligible for federal support as long as at least 35% of their students are repaying their loans over the first three years. Now, up to 65% of the students can default. And what about limiting loan amounts to ability to repay? Loan amounts may not exceed 30% of anticipated discretionary income.

How will students pay for food, housing, transportation, insurance, etc. if they're spending 30% of their incomes on student loans?

Rather than tightening the standards, the new rules actually loosen the standards. They also go further in guaranteeing continued federal support. Under the new rules, no schools will lose funding until 2015 at the soonest, to give them time to adapt to the new "standards," which were trumpeted as a major reform.

Only in Washington D.C.

The for-profit education "business" is one of the most obvious frauds ever foisted on the American people. The industry has been structured to take advantage of the least sophisticated members of society. It promises benefits the average student is unlikely to achieve: a better job and a better life. Instead, these students are saddled with unpayable debts and enjoy no corresponding increase in wages.

Assuming the government should not do anything to protect the students from this fraud, shouldn't the risks of perpetrating this fraud be left with the companies themselves? Let for-profit education companies guarantee these loans. Let them take the risk that these debts will never be repaid. But that's not how New American Socialism works. What happens is, all the profits of this scam go to the executives and the shareholders. The risk goes to the government.

Our leaders are now so corrupted by New American Socialism they can't even stop the for-profit education scheme I describe above.

The facts, by the way, aren't even in dispute. This is the obvious stuff — the stuff no one can really dispute. If our leaders let this industry rack up $250 billion in bad debts over the next decade, how can we expect them to do anything to stop our massive annual deficits and our runaway federal debt?

If the administration can't stop the for-profit education industry from getting its hands into the U.S. Treasury, whom will it stop? Nobody. So the only real question is: Do I want to be buying stocks — any stocks — right now?

When I consider the unsustainable debts and unfunded liabilities the government has taken on... and the upcoming credit crisis New American Socialism has created... I arrive at the answer: "No."

20110407-02	11:20	SteveB	"Sailor, 85, Crosses Atlantic on Raft with Friends" Let's Go!
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

So...what are you guys waiting for? Let's go!

"Sailor, 85, Crosses Atlantic on Raft with Friends" by MSNBC

Apr. 7, 2011, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/42467925/ns/world_news-americas/?GT1=43001)

('What else do you do when you get on in years?' he says.)

(PHILIPSBURG, St. Maarten) An 85-year-old British sailor who dreamed of crossing the Atlantic on a raft as a young boy has completed the journey in 66 days with three friends.

The 2,800-mile crossing to this Caribbean island, led by Anthony Smith of London, took about two months and was generally smooth except for damage to two rudders on the large, sail-powered raft.

"Some people say it was mad," he told The Associated Press when he arrived in St. Maarten Wednesday. "But it wasn't mad. What else do you do when you get on in years?"

The jovial crew said they wanted to raise awareness about the environment and to prove the elderly are capable of embarking on adventures that are mistakenly considered dangerous.

They also aimed to raise money for the British nonprofit group WaterAid, which provides potable water to impoverished communities.

The crew of the An-Tiki included John Russell, David Hildred, captain Anthony Smith and Andrew Bainbridge.

A stroke of bad luck paid for the trip, courtesy of Smith, who was hit by a van and broke his hip.

"I got some compensation money," he said. "So what do you blow the compensation money on? You blow it on a raft."

The crew departed from the Canary Islands after bad weather delayed their trip for about a month. Smith delivered a farewell speech — in nearly impeccable Spanish — to a crowd gathered on the dock and then waved goodbye.

The raft, named An-Tiki after Thor Heyerdahl's famous Kon-Tiki raft, was loaded with food including oranges, avocados, potatoes, cabbages and a pumpkin. Once the store-bought bread was consumed, sailing master David Hildred began making it from scratch in a small oven.

Hildred, a civil engineer who lives in the British Virgin Islands, also was summoned to help fix the rudders that broke three days into the trip.

The raft was built with four water supply pipes nearly 40 feet long, and 14 cross pipes. Seven pipes held the crew's fresh water supply.

"Water strikes at the very heart of need," Smith told the U.K.'s Press Association news agency. "To voyage almost 3,000 miles upon the salty kind makes us intensely aware of places in the world that are without adequate supplies."

The raft also had a nearly 40-foot long mast and a 400-square-foot sail. Twin rudders provided the steering, along with centerboards and two oars.

The raft traveled at an average speed of 4 knots, with the crew taking turns to keep watch when they were not reading or playing cards.

"I think all of us enjoyed our night watches when it was just oneself for company," Smith said. "Not an awful lot to see, but it was great."

A whale played alongside the raft one day, and a school of mahi-mahi followed the raft almost the entire journey, said crew member John Russell, 61, of Britain.

"The wildlife was just fantastic," he said. "There is nothing to be scared of. We were all old men."

Halfway across the Atlantic, Smith celebrated his 85th birthday with a chocolate cake that his doctor, Andrew Bainbridge, cooked on board.

The crew intended to end their trip in the Bahamas, but strong winds and currents forced them to the Dutch Caribbean island of St. Maarten.

"Yes, of course it's a success," Smith said with a smile. "How many people do you know who have rafted across the Atlantic? ... The word mutiny was only spoken about two or three times a day."

(The Associated Press contributed to this report.)

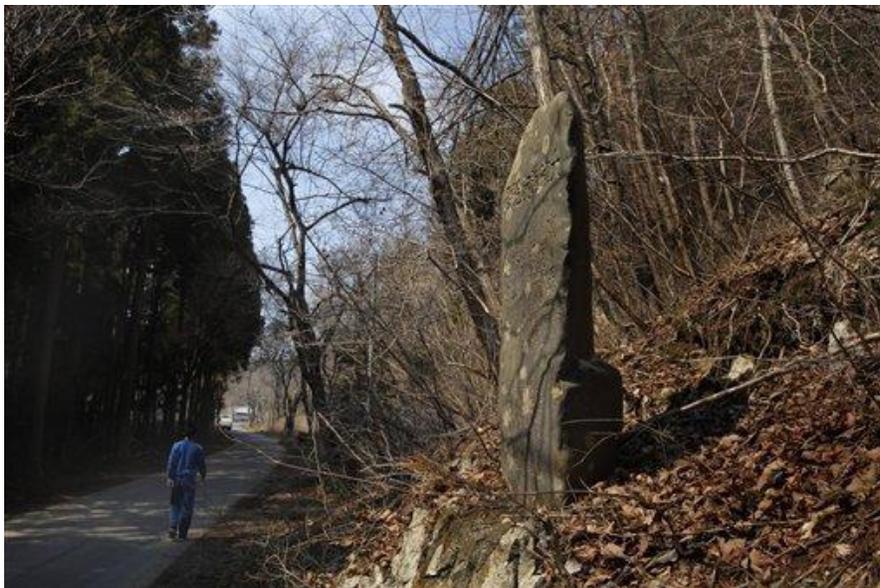

Sometimes it pays to heed history's warnings...

I guess the idiot engineers of the nuclear plant and coastal cities thought their ancestors were the idiots. Beware the sins of arrogance and pride. Our modern structures—even civilization itself—is oh so fragile and precariously balanced...

"Tsunami-Hit Towns Forgot Warnings from Ancestors" by Jay Alabaster, AP

Apr. 6, 2011, (http://www.nola.com/politics/index.ssf/2011/04/japans_tsunami-hit_towns_forgo.html)

Modern sea walls failed to protect coastal towns from Japan's destructive tsunami last month. But in the hamlet of Aneyoshi, a single centuries-old tablet saved the day.

"High dwellings are the peace and harmony of our descendants," the stone slab reads. "Remember the calamity of the great tsunamis. Do not build any homes below this point."

It was advice the dozen or so households of Aneyoshi heeded, and their homes emerged unscathed from a disaster that flattened low-lying communities elsewhere and killed thousands along Japan's northeastern shore.

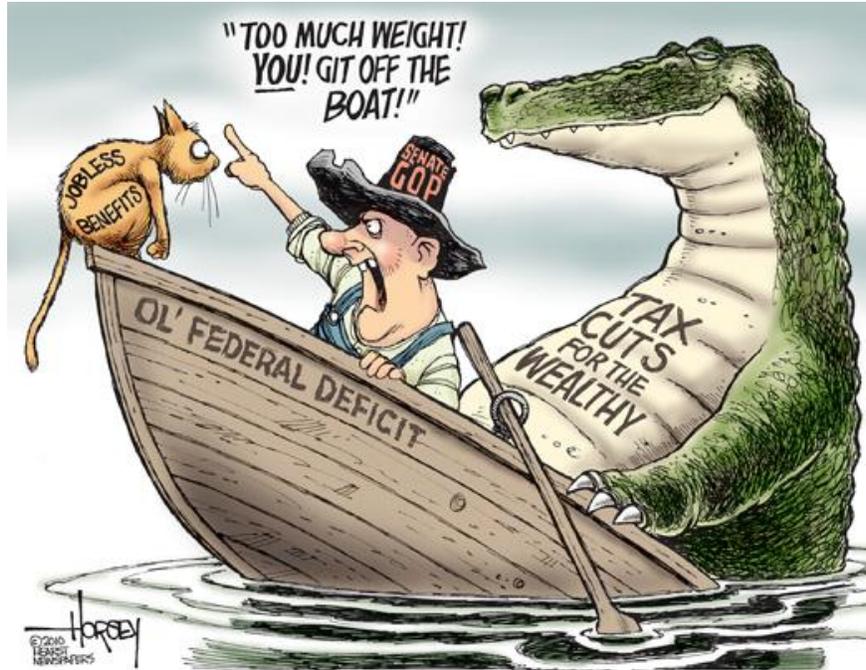

Hundreds of such markers dot the coastline, some more than 600 years old. Collectively they form a crude warning system for Japan, whose long coasts along major fault lines have made it a repeated target of earthquakes and tsunamis over the centuries.

[How strange they didn't heed the warning. —SteveB]

20110413-01 18:44 SteveB from the "Economic Crisis" topic at Spengler's Forum

Some good stuff from the "Economic Crisis" topic at Spengler's Forum, posted by Endovelico

Aug. 15, 2010, (<http://spengler.atimes.net/viewtopic.php?t=16215&sid=bb3274b17d8c9f1d5f35622ac8409129>)

I think it worthwhile to start a thread in which the various aspects of the present economic crisis may be discussed, and articles by reputed economists may be brought to your attention.

Joseph Stiglitz is fast becoming my favourite economist, and I am enjoying every page I read from his latest book Freefall. For starters I'm posting here one of his latest comments on the crisis, hoping it will help all of you becoming more aware of what is going on. I especially dedicate it to Cassowary...

from Taming Finance in an Age of Austerity, by Joseph E. Stiglitz

July 8, 2010, (<http://www.project-syndicate.org/commentary/stiglitz127/English>)

(NEW YORK) It was not long ago that we could say, "We are all Keynesians now." The financial sector and its free-market ideology had brought the world to the brink of ruin. Markets clearly were not self-correcting. Deregulation had proven to be a dismal failure.

The "innovations" unleashed by modern finance did not lead to higher long-term efficiency, faster growth, or more prosperity for all. Instead, they were designed to circumvent accounting standards and to evade and avoid taxes that are required to finance the public investments in infrastructure and technology—like the Internet—that underlie real growth, not the phantom growth promoted by the financial sector.

The financial sector pontificated not only about how to create a dynamic economy, but also about what to do in the event of a recession (which, according to their ideology, could be caused only by a failure of government, not of markets). Whenever an economy enters recession, revenues fall, and expenditures—say, for unemployment benefits—increase. So deficits grow.

Financial-sector deficit hawks said that governments should focus on eliminating deficits, preferably by cutting back on expenditures. The reduced deficits would restore confidence, which would restore investment—and thus growth. But, as plausible as this line of reasoning may sound, the historical evidence repeatedly refutes it.

When U.S. President Herbert Hoover tried that recipe, it helped transform the 1929 stock-market crash into the Great Depression. When the International Monetary Fund tried the same formula in East Asia in 1997, downturns became recessions, and recessions became depressions.

The reasoning behind such episodes is based on a flawed analogy. A household that owes more money than it can easily repay needs to cut back on spending. But when a government does that, output and incomes decline, unemployment increases, and the ability to repay may actually decrease. What is true for a family is not true for a country.

More sophisticated advocates warn that government spending will drive up interest rates, thus “crowding out” private investment. When the economy is at full employment, this is a legitimate concern. But not now: given extraordinarily low long-term interest rates, no serious economist raises the “crowding out” issue nowadays.

In Europe, especially Germany, and in some quarters in the U.S., as government deficits and debt grow, so, too, do calls for increased austerity. If heeded, as appears to be the case in many countries, the results will be disastrous, especially given the fragility of the recovery. Growth will slow, with Europe and/or America possibly even slipping back into recession.

Stimulus spending, the deficit hawks’ favorite bogeyman, did not cause most of the increased deficits and debt, which are the result of “automatic stabilizers”—the tax cuts and spending increases that automatically accompany economic fluctuations. So, as austerity undermines growth, debt reduction will be marginal at best.

Keynesian economics worked: if not for stimulus measures and automatic stabilizers, the recession would have been far deeper and longer, and unemployment much higher. This does not mean that we should ignore the level of debt. But what matters is long-term debt.

There is a simple Keynesian recipe: First, shift spending away from unproductive uses—such as wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, or unconditional bank bailouts that do not revive lending—toward high-return investments. Second, encourage spending and promote equity and efficiency by raising taxes on corporations that don’t reinvest, for example, and lowering them on those that do, or by raising taxes on speculative capital gains (say, in real estate) and on carbon- and pollution-intensive energy, while cutting taxes for lower-income payers.

There are other measures that might help. For example, governments should help banks that lend to small- and medium-size enterprises, which are the main source of job creation—or establish new financial institutions that would do so—rather than supporting big banks that make their money from derivatives and abusive credit card practices.

Financial markets have worked hard to create a system that enforces their views: with free and open capital markets, a small country can be flooded with funds one moment, only to be charged high interest rates—or cut off completely—soon thereafter. In such circumstances, small countries seemingly have no choice: financial markets’ diktat on austerity, lest they be punished by withdrawal of financing.

But financial markets are a harsh and fickle taskmaster. The day after Spain announced its austerity package, its bonds were downgraded. The problem was not a lack of confidence that the Spanish government would fulfill its promises, but too much confidence that it would, and that this would reduce growth and increase unemployment from its already intolerable level of 20%. In short, having gotten the world into its current economic mess, financial markets are now saying to countries like Greece and Spain: damned if you don’t cut back on spending, but damned if you do as well.

Finance is a means to an end, not an end in itself. It is supposed to serve the interests of the rest of society, not the other way around. Taming financial markets will not be easy, but it can and must be done, through a combination of taxation and regulation—and, if necessary, government stepping in to fill some of the breaches (as it already does in the case of lending to small- and medium-size enterprises.)

Unsurprisingly, financial markets do not want to be tamed. They like the way things have been working, and why shouldn’t they? In countries with corrupt and imperfect democracies, they have the wherewithal to resist change. Fortunately, citizens in Europe and America have lost patience. The process of tempering and taming has begun. But there is far more yet to do.

Posted by Endovelico:

Another delightful article by Stiglitz, too long to post here, but of which I quote a paragraph (<http://www.lrb.co.uk/v32/n08/joseph-stiglitz/the-non-existent-hand>):

We should be clear about this: economic theory never provided much support for these free-market views. Theories of imperfect and asymmetric information in markets had undermined every one of the 'efficient market' doctrines, even before they became fashionable in the Reagan-Thatcher era. Bruce Greenwald and I had explained that Adam Smith's hand was not in fact invisible: it wasn't there. Sanford Grossman and I had explained that if markets were as efficient in transmitting information as the free marketeers claimed, no one would have any incentive to gather and process it. Free marketeers, and the special interests that benefited from their doctrines, paid little attention to these inconvenient truths.

Posted by Booklady's Ghost:

Here's a list that should dampen any hopeful for Obama's Hope & Change:

"40 Bizarre Statistics That Reveal The Horrifying Truth About The Collapse Of The U.S. Economy" from The Truth

July 20,2010, (<http://thetruthwins.com/archives/40-bizarre-statistics-that-reveal-the-horrifying-truth-about-the-collapse-of-the-u-s-economy>)

There's no use sugar-coating it. The U.S. economy is collapsing. The following are 40 bizarre statistics that reveal the truth about the collapse of the U.S. economy...

1. According to one shocking new survey, 28% of U.S. households have at least one member that is looking for a full-time job.
2. A recent Pew Research survey found that 55 percent of the U.S. labor force has experienced either unemployment, a pay decrease, a reduction in hours or an involuntary move to part-time work since the recession began.
3. There are 9.2 million Americans that are unemployed but that are not receiving an unemployment insurance check.
4. In America today, the average time needed to find a job has risen to a record 35.2 weeks.
5. According to one analysis, the United States has lost 10.5 million jobs since 2007.
6. China's trade surplus (much of it with the United States) climbed 140 percent in June compared to a year earlier.
7. This is what American workers now must compete against: in China a garment worker makes approximately 86 cents an hour and in Cambodia a garment worker makes approximately 22 cents an hour.
8. According to a poll taken in 2009, 61 percent of Americans "always or usually" live paycheck to paycheck. That was up significantly from 49 percent in 2008 and 43 percent in 2007.
9. According to a recent poll conducted by Bloomberg, 71% of Americans say that it still feels like the economy is in a recession.
10. Banks repossessed 269,962 U.S. homes during the second quarter of 2010, which was a new all-time record.
11. Banks repossessed an average of 4,000 South Florida properties a month in the first half of 2010, up 83 percent from the first half of 2009.

12. According to RealtyTrac, a total of 1.65 million U.S. properties received foreclosure filings during the first half of 2010.
13. The Mortgage Bankers Association recently announced that demand for loans to purchase U.S. homes has sunk to a 13-year low.
14. Only the top 5 percent of U.S. households have earned enough additional income to match the rise in housing costs since 1975.
15. 1.41 million Americans filed for personal bankruptcy in 2009, a 32 percent increase over 2008.
16. Back in 1950 each retiree's Social Security benefit was paid for by 16 workers. Today, each retiree's Social Security benefit is paid for by approximately 3.3 workers. By 2025 it is projected that there will be approximately two workers for each retiree.
17. According to a new poll, six of 10 non-retirees believe that Social Security won't be able to pay them benefits when they stop working.
18. 43 percent of Americans have less than $10,000 saved for retirement.
19. According to one survey, 36 percent of Americans say that they don't contribute anything to retirement savings.
20. According to one recent survey, 24% of American workers say that they have postponed their planned retirement age in the past year.
21. The Conference Board's Consumer Confidence Index declined sharply to 52.9 in June. Most economists had expected that the figure for June would be somewhere around 62.
22. Retail sales in the U.S. fell in June for a second month in a row.
23. Vacancies and lease rates at U.S. shopping centers continued to get worse during the second quarter of 2010.
24. Consumer credit in the United States has contracted during 15 of the past 16 months.
25. During the first quarter of 2010, the total number of loans that are at least three months past due in the United States increased for the 16th consecutive quarter.
26. Things are now so bad in California that in the region around the state capitol, Sacramento, there is now one closed business for every six that are still open.
27. The state of Illinois now ranks eighth in the world in possible bond-holder default. The state of California is ninth.
28. More than 25 percent of Americans now have a credit score below 599, which means that they are a very bad credit risk.
29. On Friday, U.S. regulators closed down three banks in Florida, two in South Carolina and one in Michigan, bringing to 96 the number of U.S. banks to be shut down so far in 2010.
30. The FDIC's deposit insurance fund now has negative 20.7 billion dollars in it, which represents a slight improvement from the end of 2009.
31. The U.S. federal budget deficit has topped $1 trillion with three months still to go in the current budget year.
32. According to a U.S. Treasury Department report to Congress, the U.S. national debt will top $13.6 trillion this year and climb to an estimated $19.6 trillion by 2015.

33. The M3 money supply plunged at a 9.6 percent annual rate during the first quarter of 2010.
34. According to a new poll of Americans between the ages of 44 and 75, 61% said that running out money was their biggest fear. The remaining 39% thought death was scarier.
35. One study found that as of 2007, the bottom 80 percent of American households held about 7% of the liquid financial assets.
36. The bottom 40 percent of all income earners in the United States now collectively own less than 1 percent of the nation's wealth.
37. The number of Americans with incomes below the official poverty line rose by about 15% between 2000 and 2006, and by 2008 over 30 million U.S. workers were earning less than $10 per hour.
38. According to one recent study, approximately 21 percent of all children in the United States are living below the poverty line in 2010. the highest rate in 20 years.
39. For the first time in U.S. history, more than 40 million Americans are on food stamps, and the U.S. Department of Agriculture projects that number will go up to 43 million Americans in 2011.
40. A new Rasmussen Reports national telephone survey has found that just 23% of American voters nationwide believe the federal government today has the consent of the governed.

Posted by Endovelico:

This is very much what Stiglitz is writing about. What surprises me is the inability of voters, in the U.S. and in Europe, to rebel against their mainstream parties and vote for more radical alternatives. When will people wake up and realize that banks must be strictly controlled / nationalized?

20110416-01	09:51	SteveB	"Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
-------------	-------	--------	--

America's problems don't come from the bottom of the "economic ladder". They come from the top!

"Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud" by Bill Lindner, Digital Journal

Apr. 15, 2011, (<http://www.digitaljournal.com/article/305680#ixzz1Jh4BbdKN>)

(A report released by the U.S. Senate paints a scathing picture of mortgage fraud on Wall Street enabled by the malfeasance and blatant disregard for oversight by Federal agencies that regulated them.)

A 650-page report (PDF), titled Wall Street and the Financial Crisis: Anatomy of a Financial Collapse, released by the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations chaired by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich) cites 5,800 internal documents and the private communications of bank executives, credit rating agencies, investors and regulators and details Wall Street's fraudulent business practices and conflicts of interest that fueled the mortgage meltdown, undermined public trust in the U.S. markets in the months leading to the financial crisis, and reveals reckless activities that were ignored by the banks and their federal regulators.

As Washington has tried to ignore the massive Wall Street fraud—for which no one on Wall Street or their enablers has been put behind bars—responsible for the latest economic crisis in the hopes that it would go away, Senator Carl Levin, and Senator Tom Coburn (R-Okla) blasted Wall Street after 2-year bipartisan investigation on the main culprits responsible for the crisis. As noted by Common Dreams, the report (PDF) comes at a time when much of the feeling from Washington lawmakers is that Wall Street is being over-regulated by the new Dodd-Frank rules.

The Senate Committee's report names several institutions that played a central role in the mortgage crisis, including Washington Mutual, the Office of Thrift Supervision, credit ratings agencies Standard & Poor's and Moody's Investors Service, Goldman Sachs and Deutsche Bank.

Four key areas of causes of the financial crisis were cited by the Senate panel:

1. Risky mortgage lending as exemplified by Washington Mutual, which became the biggest U.S. bank ever to fail in Sept., 2008.
2. The failure of regulators to clamp down on lending abuses and risky conduct at banks in the years leading up to the housing bust and financial crisis.
3. The AAA ratings given by big credit rating agencies to high-risk subprime mortgages that later went bad and helped cause the housing bust.
4. The role of investment banks like Goldman Sachs and the finance deals they put together, which flooded the markets with risky securities

Pulling Back the Curtain on Shoddy, Risky, Deceptive Practices

In an interview, Senator Levin reportedly said "The report pulls back the curtain on shoddy, risky, deceptive practices"—often referred to as 'sh*tty deals' by Senator Levin—"on the part of a lot of major financial institutions. The overwhelming evidence is that those institutions deceived their clients and deceived the public, and they were aided and abetted by deferential regulators and credit ratings agencies who had conflicts of interest."

Included in the bipartisan Senate report (PDF) were 19 recommendations for changes to regulatory and industry practices such as creating strong conflict-of-interest policies at the country's banks and requiring banks to hold higher reserves against risky mortgages. It also suggests that federal regulators examine its findings for violations of laws and recommends that criminal charges be brought. In fact Sen. Levin believes that Goldman executives weren't being truthful about its activity, and said he would refer their testimony to the Department of Justice (DoJ) and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) for criminal investigations. "In my judgment, Goldman clearly misled their clients and they misled the Congress," Sen. Levin said.

The report reveals more information on the way Goldman Sachs touted investments to clients on one hand and bet against them on the other. Similar accusations against Goldman by the SEC led to a $550 million dollar settlement—of which $250 million was returned to investors, $300 million went to the U.S. Treasury, and zero went to the defrauded homeowners—last year, but Levin and his committee don't think that punishment fit the crime. From the report (PDF):

When Goldman Sachs realized the mortgage market was in decline, it took actions to profit from that decline at the expense of its clients. New documents detail how, in 2007, Goldman's Structured Products Group twice amassed and profited from large net short positions in mortgage related securities. At the same time the firm was betting against the mortgage market as a whole, Goldman assembled and aggressively marketed to its client's poor quality CDOs that it actively bet against by taking large short positions in those transactions.

New documents and information detail how Goldman recommended four CDOs, Hudson, Anderson, Timberwolf, and Abacus, to its clients without fully disclosing key information about those products, Goldman's own market views, or its adverse economic interests. For example, in Hudson, Goldman told investors that its interests were "aligned" with theirs when, in fact, Goldman held 100% of the short side of the CDO and had adverse interests to the investors, and described Hudson's assets were "sourced from the Street," when in fact, Goldman had selected and priced the assets without any third party involvement.

New documents also reveal that, at one point in May 2007, Goldman Sachs unsuccessfully tried to execute a "short squeeze" in the mortgage market so that Goldman could scoop up short positions at artificially depressed prices and profit as the mortgage market declined.

Financial Industry Chose Profits over Propriety

The Senate report adds volumes of new evidence to previously disclosed information showing that much of the financial industry chose profits over propriety during the mortgage lending spree and more evidence on regulatory failures that helped deepen the financial crisis. Senator Levin and his committee found 3,400 places in Goldman documents where its officials used the phrase "net short," a reference to negative bets. Goldman profited greatly at the expense of their clients by using abusive practices.

A new aspect of Goldman's mortgage malfeasance during 2007 was uncovered by the Senate's investigation. That year, as Goldman tried building its bet against housing, it drove down the cost of shorting the mortgage market by squeezing those who had made negative bets, including Deutsche Bank. Goldman tried to put on the squeeze so that it could add to its negative bets more cheaply and protect itself against the housing collapse. Due to being so large, Goldman had the power to drive prices in whatever direction it wanted. Goldman reportedly abandoned its plans in June 2007 when two Bear Stearns hedge funds collapsed due to bad mortgage bets.

The Senate report (PDF) reveals that Deutsche Bank, which has not been accused of wrongdoing by Government investigators, by shedding light on a trader named Greg Lippmann, who has since left the bank and joined a hedge fund. As early as 2005, Lippmann was negative about housing and pitched his idea of shorting the market to professional investors on Wall Street. Lippmann referred to risky mortgage securities as "pigs" and responded that he "would take it and try to dupe someone" according to the report. Lippmann's fraudulent activities helped reduce Deutsche's overall losses.

In 2006 and 2007, banks reportedly created about a trillion dollars worth of Collateralized Debt Obligation (CDO) deals—fraudulently complex practices that helped destroy the economy in 2008. Emails provided to the Senate committee revealed that Lippmann called the bank's operation "CDO machines" and characterized such securities as a "Ponzi scheme." When interviewed by the committee, Lippmann quickly changed course, saying that his descriptions were used to defend his negative view of the market.

Goldman denies any wrongdoing. A Goldman spokesman said in a recent statement: "While we disagree with many of the conclusions of the report, we take seriously the issues explored by the subcommittee. We recently issued the results of a comprehensive examination of our business standards and practices and committed to making significant changes that will strengthen relationships with clients, improve transparency and disclosure and enhance standards for the review, approval and suitability of complex instruments." As Wall Street's nefariously fraudulent history has repeatedly proved, nothing will change. Think Wall Street execs and its enablers will face jail time? Don't bet on it.

20110416-02	11:49	Dale	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
-------------	-------	------	--

Dear SteveB,

Come on man. It seems laughingly hypocritical for you of all people to cite a Senate report as your source of wisdom. The Senate never misses an opportunity to pander for votes and this report is a prime example of making the mysterious and anonymous "Wall Street" out as THE bogeyman, while carefully not blaming anyone who might actually be a voting constituent. It's politicking 101.

[I see nothing wrong with the facts presented, Senate or no Senate. And how would it be "hypocritical" in any way? They were paid to try to get to the truth, however imperfectly. To be completely cynical is a defense mechanism. —SteveB]

As for where problems come from, specifically the Mortgage/Housing bubble, Wall Street didn't create the catastrophe, but they did a lot to support it. If it were just Wall Street's creation of financial instruments and knowing manipulation of the law and lack of oversight, it would have been a "problem." To get "bubbles" it takes a lot of levels: greedy land/property speculators, greedy real estate sales people, greedy local mortgage brokers who facilitated fraudulent applications, greedy mortgage companies (management and all other levels) who looked the other way while pocketed their bonuses, and.....finally.....Wall Street geniuses who do what they always do, + stay one step ahead of regulation by creating innovative financial "products" and processes that are so complex the government can't understand them. In this case Wall Street didn't understand them either.

I've worked in the financial industry for almost 20 years and I can assure you, Congress (both houses) and the SEC are about the last people to catch on to anything happening in the markets. They are lawyers, by and large, not educated or experienced in financial markets, even in the SEC. Their first job is to keep their job, or set up their next job as a lobbyist/consultant. Using their postmortem reports as some kind of "proof" of a thesis is ridiculous.

Now we can add greedy Senators to the cast of culprits. [Consider them added many years ago. So...in reality, Dale, you are the biggest conspiracy theorist of all? —SteveB]

20110416-03 12:01 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear Dale and SteveB,

Well said Dale. I think SteveB forgets the role of Clinton, Dodd and Frank in this mess. The report is mostly correct but does not explain the role of politicians to make it happen.

20110416-04 12:22 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear Dale,

You argue my case from a knowledgeable position. Thank you.

No one ever said any of these folks were without culpability. The entire system is corrupt. Total rats. Congress and the regulators most of all. I expect greed from capitalists. Yet here is at least one honorable man showing the world the truth, if they will listen.

But, of course, Wall Street got their bailouts and huge bonuses. Now the budget has to be balanced on the backs of the middle class, the old, college students needing Pell Grants...medical care and research, and education. Sure...makes perfect sense...to the billionaires who know so much more than the rest of us...

20110416-05 13:26 Dale Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

To a hammer, everything looks like a nail. To a dedicated conspiracy theorist, every person with wealth is greedy, corrupt, unethical, etc.

This will fall on deaf ears, but I'll "say" it anyway. There are intelligent, hard working, inventive risk takers willing to put their savings, small and large, on the line to build businesses. They create jobs for their own employees and for suppliers; they fund retirement accounts and support health insurance programs; they provide useful products/services, which all of us are more than happy to buy; they pay large $$ in taxes (whether you like the %'s or not) and last, but not least, they give huge amounts to charities.

The ENTIRE system is NOT corrupt, but it is not perfect either. To hammer away indiscriminately and always blame the "hidden hand" is a loser's game. [That's not what we do here. We find the "hidden hand". —SteveB]

20110416-06 14:18 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear Dale,

Have been there and done that myself. I've owned one business or another since I was in high school. I have no problem at all with people being rich, even filthy rich. But I have shown time and time again that the numbers prove that these good folks are not, at this moment in history, carrying their fair share of the weight.

Do you really think everything is OK? Look around you! Where is the manufacturing? Where is the middle class? Where are the jobs? What is the status of the federal budget and the national debt with our workers not able to work? Where is the investment in America that low taxes for the rich were supposed to generate? Why is the system of legal immigration so broken? Why can't the wars be stopped and the military budget shrunk? What good does free trade do us?

Why has the standard of living of average people we've known all our lives declined so far? Why is everyone you meet so worried? Where are the answers to these questions? Do you have them? If so, please spill the beans to the rest of us.

If things were OK, we wouldn't need to be having this discussion. Perhaps you think things are fine or have some other theory? If I'm wrong about the causes of our problems, have at it and prove it. You think the unwashed poor are trying to drag us down to their level? Why can't those bastards just be happy with nothing? Maybe they should move to China where they can work as slaves? Maybe they should just "eat cake"?

The system is literally bankrupt and so are these outdated philosophies. It's time all Americans shared the pain, or we're all sunk, especially our children and grandchildren. The growing ranks of the poor and the unemployed, the average people going bankrupt because of medical problems, the millions working at part-time jobs at Wal-Mart, etc., not making a living wage, all these folks are bearing their part of the suffering. Why not the rich too? Why is it such anathema to even say that?

And, no, not all rich folks and corporations are corrupt...only the politicians, the big financial institutions, many of the largest corporations, and, yes, even—amazingly—some of the rich folks. Are you so innocent as to believe that unbridled greed for money and power simply do not exist? Do you really think the way campaigns are financed in America constitutes anything but corruption of the grossest kind? That, sir, is no conspiracy theory! The "hand" is not so "hidden" as you would like me to believe.

20110416-07 14:22 SteveB Friends of the Middle

Dear Dale,

She's a former teacher and sailing buddy who is on my side and doesn't want to hear the Republican party line.

I, on the other hand, really welcome your communications and hope that we can delve deeper into all this mess the country is currently in.

Just hoping to make things better for all of us, (even though I'm more than OK myself).

20110416-08 15:27 Bill Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB et al.,

I'll suggest that it was those who originate mortgages who are the prime movers here. The experienced ones knew there was a high percentage of people who could not maintain mortgage payments, particularly among what is known as "sub-prime." Yet these people continued to make those mortgages, because they knew they could send this toxic waste downstream via structured securities facilitated by the Wall Street crowd, who just wanted to do deals and take a slice, rather than carefully underwrite what they were doing and selling. In the middle period of the bubble the Wall Street underwriting crows knew exactly what they were doing but did not stop or moderate in any fashion. The ratings firms were then collaterally negligent or even complicit in giving high ratings to those structured securities backed by the dirty paper from the mortgage originators. I heard several of these ratings people being grilled, and they could not defend what they did. Finally, in this train of greed and negligence, were the writers of CDOs, AIG Financial Products being the big boy, that supposedly protected the creditworthiness of the toxic mortgage securities.

These derivatives were the final, ultra-volatile element that kicked the house of cards and greed and set it tumbling.

Should someone, e. g. government regulators, have blown the whistle? Hell yes, although responsibility—here Congress failed—was unfortunately diffuse, and the Bush administration wasn't disposed to do a damn thing. It was another tulip-bulb fest with some securities that too few people understood thrown in to aggravate the tumult and tumble.

20110416-09 16:49 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear Bill,

Yes, I agree with everything you said. Once again, our politicians of both parties sold us down the river by not doing their jobs. Gee...now why would they do that? Maybe...money!!!!

20110416-10 16:51 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

No, votes which lead to power which leads to money.

20110416-11 16:54 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear GaryC,

No, money...which leads to votes...which leads to power...which leads to more money, etc.! This is the current cycle of corruption in our government.

200110416-12 16:56 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB,

Please admit it was not Republicans this time. The evidence is overwhelming the other way.

20110416-13 17:08 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear GaryC,

I'll give Democrats blame for their part, sure. They didn't blow the whistle either. But, as my friend Bill said, the Bush administration looked the other way. They served their buddies on Wall St. All the worst results happened under Bush's watch, including the Great Recession. It is all so obvious to any nonpartisan who believes neither party line nor the Republican dogma, no matter how many times it is repeated. For instance:

Low taxes mean jobs, low taxes mean jobs, low taxes mean jobs...substitute growth or opportunity for jobs if you wish.

Well, we've had low effective taxes, especially for the rich and big corporations like GE for a long time now. Yet, where are the jobs? Where is the growth? Where is the opportunity? Where is the middle class? Where is balancing the budget? Oh, ya, that was Clinton!

20110416-14 18:07 Charis Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

This goes back to what I was saying to you the other day. Yes, corporate giants, govt., etc are all to blame. But every citizen who ever took out a loan knowing they weren't qualified to pay them back, every citizen who over drafted their bank account buying that second or third car, and every citizen who maxed out their credit card (and you cannot deny there are millions who have done that) are also to blame. The vast majority of Americans live on money they haven't yet earned, buy with plastic, and live beyond their means and that cannot be denied.

Not clicking on "reply all" lest I get nitpicked jajaja.

20110416-15 18:45 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear Charis,

I believe people carry balances on their credit cards because they have no choice. They can't make enough money to live. I've been there. None of these balances has ever brought the country to its knees. That's a fact.

I believe very few people took out loans "knowing" they couldn't repay. They lost their jobs and/or they didn't understand Wall Street and the banks and the government were creating a giant bubble that would burst, leaving them totally unable to sell their houses after values plummeted . They were told real estate values would always rise. You and I have both heard that nearly all our lives. You can't blame people for believing it. I know many smart people here in Florida, where 23% of the homes and condos sit vacant, who were caught in this trap. None of them were trying to get something for nothing. Very many of the mortgage foreclosures have proven to be fraudulent. That's not the fault of the people either.

I have faith in people who struggle. I know them. I have contempt for the greedy who take advantage of them. People and human nature are exactly the same as they were in Biblical days, and the greedy are still figuring out new ways to fleece their neighbors, then get bailed-out by their cronies. No one bails-out the little people, many of whom are now homeless. Same old, same old.

20110416-16 20:50 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB,

No, votes which lead to power which leads to money.

20110417-01 11:37 SteveB "Governor Walker: Collective-Bargaining Law Doesn't Save Money"

Finally! A Republican tells the truth!

It was all just another attempt at union busting for dogmatic political reasons!

Shame on you, Gov. Walker!

"Walker: Collective-Bargaining Law Doesn't Save Money" by Zachary Roth, The Lookout

Apr 15, 2011, (<http://news.yahoo.com/blogs/lookout/walker-collective-bargaining-law-doesn-t-save-money-20110415-125743-597.html>)

Remember how Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin was insisting that his controversial law to end collective bargaining for most public employees was needed to help save money and balance the budget?

Well, he's now acknowledging that's not exactly true.

During testimony before the House Oversight and Government Affairs committee in Washington, Walker, a Republican, was badgered by Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) about how much money his law would actually save, reports the Capitol Times of Madison. The topic of the hearing, after all, was state and municipal debt, so Kucinich wondered how the collective bargaining law was relevant.

After some hemming and hawing by Walker, Kucinich asked flat out: "How much money does it save Gov. Walker? Just answer the question."

"It doesn't save any," Walker responded.

Last month, the effort by Walker and Wisconsin Republican legislators to pass the collective bargaining measure brought thousands of protesters to the state Capitol for weeks. The bill ultimately passed, but is on hold after Democrats challenged the procedure used for passing it.

Walker and Republicans have said that the law is needed to help reduce public-sector pensions and benefits that they see as lavish, and balance the budget. Democrats and unions have said they're willing to negotiate on those issues, and see the law as an effort to curb the political power of the labor movement.

And it looks Walker just bolstered their case.

20110417-02 16:50 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB,

If you want to read an unbiased book about the cause and consequences of the housing boom and bust, read Thomas Sowell's book The Housing Boom and Bust. He is a BLACK economics professor. I doubt it changes your mind as it places the blame on mostly Democrats (and some Republicans) but it does trace the origins and results of bad housing policies which created bad lending standards which led to collateralization of worthless loans and Wall Street firms playing both sides. My opinion is that without the pressure of the Clinton administration to create "affordable" housing, the lending policies of Fannie and Freddie would not have been corrupted. Wall Street reacts to fill a void. When the politicians create an opportunity, Wall Street finds a way to make money off of it.

20110418-01 08:35 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear GaryC,

"When the politicians create an opportunity, Wall Street finds a way to make money off of it." ... and destroy the economy. As I have said, greed rules.

I have stated: there is plenty of blame for both parties. Do the two of you agree with that?

Both parties are corrupted by our method campaign financing. Neither party acts in the interest of the country as a whole and its long term future. I find this very sad. It is also why I feel fervent partisanship and toeing the party line of either party is so wrong, especially that of the lying Republicans, whose tax cuts and wars are destroying us. I say this not as a Democrat, but as a Republicrat!

20110418-02 08:59 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB,

I don't think Dale or I see it is as a Democratic problem. It is both parties but you tend to always blame the Republicans first and then admit that the Democrats may have had a very little hand in the mess. Again, term limits and primary election changes would make for better candidates and better government.

20110418-03 11:19 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear GaryC,

Nope. I reject your characterization. I was a Republican first, but a Goldwater Republican. I believe in government being as small as possible and staying as much as possible out of my life, my pocket, and, especially, my bedroom, my science, and my religious life. But government has very important functions or the rich and powerful control us all. I feel completely sold-out by these Republican jerks, starting even before the idiot George W. and the senile John McCain.

I believe that nothing is as simple as current Republican ideology states, including me and my views. I believe the same is true of your views, which is why it sort of amazes me the vehemence with which you guys defend the party line talking points.

I think you knee-jerk associate my concern for the common man with Democrats and liberalism. You flatter the Democrats, in my opinion. Anything that goes against the Republican party line must be Democratic and liberal, right? Or socialist? I reject those terms and those arguments. I believe a country, any country, must think of the general good—the U.S., Libya, Egypt, Syria, Iran, Bolivia, Cuba, etc. included. I believe that is the just and fair point of view, but also the most practical view overall. Prosperity must be prosperity for all, or there will be hell to pay in the long run, mark my words. What is good for the middle class is good for all. That is certainly no welfare state.

Here's a great example of Republican lies: Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid are "entitlements". Something for nothing. Right? Yet these programs are almost entirely paid for by the people. It is only the stealing scoundrels in Washington who have ensured they don't pay for themselves, and they easily could and should. I know for sure that you and I will never get out of these programs what we have paid in, therefore the word "entitlements" is a blatant lie told for political purposes. I guess they want to steal the rest of the money. In reality, Social Security, for instance, is really just retirement insurance, paid for by the retiree while he works.

Republicans...I don't think I really need to say more about this bunch of incompetents and hypocrites than to simply name the people who appear to be Republican Presidential hopefuls: senile John McCain (not this time around, thank God!), Sarah Palin (hahaha, quitter, a complete laughing stock), Donald Trump (get serious! nearly a complete laughing stock), Ron Paul (dangerous), Mike Huckabee (this fundamentalist will never stay out of anyone's bedroom), Newt Gingrich (evil), Haley Barbour (Mississippi, need I say more?), Michele Bachmann (no idea how government works, way radical, stupid), Mitt Romney (maybe the best of the bunch, but a Mormon pu*sy. Have you ever read the book of Mormon? Laughable...written on gold plates by Jesus, but they managed to lose them! He would be controlled by the church. Besides, I don't think he's radically fundamentalist enough to get the nomination.) There are other rascals, but they all seem to be claiming they don't want the job. Need I say more? Bobby Jindal? LOL

Unfortunately for you and me and everyone else, the Republican party has lost its way, is morally bankrupt, totally the slave of special interests, and is more and more irrelevant to mainstream voters. I would bet good money that they will be crushed in the 2012 election, on both federal and state levels.

I won't even mention that all of our current problems, from all I can see, have been caused by this totally discredited (to thoughtful people) Republican ideology, blindly applied by George W., Newt, and other idiots. Barry G. and Dwight D.E., where are you when we really need you?

20110419-01 07:56 Dale Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB,

Yipes! Steve, this rant is a little scary. Get a grip, please. I don't want to see my friend linked to a shopping mall shooting.

[What is he talking about? The only rant here is GaryC's. —SteveB]

20110419-02 08:24 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear Dale,

Geez! I'm the calm, happy one!

Remember, I'm the guy who is retired (except for my books, stocks, cattle, and future restaurant), lives in paradise, and is married to a beautiful, young lawyer. Life is indeed good for me.

Excuse me for being concerned about people other than myself, who are so obviously being given the shaft.

Again, if you really think things are hunky-dory in the good ole' U.S. of A., well...you must be the only person in the entire world with that opinion. Since I don't believe you really have that opinion (though you won't admit to that), let's do something to help!

20110419-03 09:17 GaryC Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear SteveB,

Believe me, Dale is very philanthropic. The issue is really do we take from the hard working people and give to the less fortunate (or lazy) or do we teach the less fortunate skills to help themselves. I believe in the latter. Most successful people feel this way. I am successful due to hard work and education.

[Then where is the help for the poor? Why haven't you taught them the skills they need? Why wait for the government you don't need? 100,000 U.S. Veterans are homeless. Why? Where's the 1% when we really need them? Anything the government does is irrelevant to what you say the 1% will do out of the kindness of their hearts. Well, why haven't they done it already, then? What's stopping them? Competition from the government? Not enough free enterprise there, that helping the poor? —SteveB]

Never in the history of the earth has stealing from the rich worked for the betterment of the poor. Did Russia, Cuba, East Germany, China (before capitalism) work for the betterment of the poor. Please tell me one example in history where the wealthy were taxed into oblivion that the poor were better off.

[None of these cases is proven, nor are any of them relevant. These characterizations of simple progressive taxes are inflammatory and ridiculous, and you know it. —SteveB]

The most recent example I can think of was in the early 70's in England where the top tax rate was over 90% (95% I think). The result was that the high income people (actors, musicians, etc.) mostly left the country and the per capita income of the poor went down. If 100% of all of the income of everyone in the U.S. who makes over $135,000 was taxed, do you know how much it would reduce the deficit? Very very little.

[Yet Great Britain is doing at least as well as the U.S., while providing healthcare and retirement for its people. How do they do that? Socialism? —SteveB]

I am curious about one thing though, what turned you into a socialist? If you are a businessman as you seem to be, why are you so against capitalism? If you are so pi*sed about the way things are going in the U.S., why are you living in Bolivia? Are you drawing social security from the U.S. and living in Bolivia? If so, good for you that you have gotten the benefits of your hard work and can live a better life in Bolivia.

[Nothing I have ever said is anti-capitalist in any way, shape, or form. In fact, I recently proposed eliminating all income taxes on all businesses in the U.S. If someone disagrees with you, GaryC, about simple governmental strategies, you immediately start the name calling. —SteveB]

20110419-04 10:47 SteveB Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"

Dear GaryC,

I will assume a lot of this is joking instead of Republican dogma.

Surely even a capitalist like me can see that:

1. The country is in trouble.
2. People are going to have to sacrifice.
3. Taxes on the richest Americans are certifiably the lowest in 50 years and the biggest corporations aren't paying their fair share.
4. These folks need to pay a little more and suffer a little too.
5. The theory that low corporate and personal tax rates equate to investment and jobs in America has been proven by the last many years to be totally bogus.
6. You're right about parts of Europe having higher tax rates, but these rates have led to too much immigration, not any exodus. No one is "being taxed into oblivion". What a joke. You are wrong about your "facts", especially the one about taxing income over $135,000. I'm just saying, if everyone has to give up something, why not include the richest? Especially since doing otherwise has not been good for the country.

I have sent out emails that prove these facts. If the Republican party line works, where is the prosperity? People largely pay for "entitlements". The military and lack of regulation and revenue are what's killing us, not the "lazy" poor. And very close to all the "poor" people I've ever known work like dogs. They are certainly not "lazy". What an elitist idea!

You're right. We need to put more resources into education, not less. The Republicans want to destroy the entire educational system, based on all I've seen. Jeez! That's the first thing they always want to cut. Can't possibly touch the military! None of this makes me a socialist. Or even radical. Just fed up with the lies and America being sold down the river.

I live in Bolivia because it's a better place to live in so many ways. It's where most of my friends and family live. It's got so much more opportunity than the U.S. right now. But that doesn't mean I don't love and mourn for my homeland.

I think you must know in your heart that I'm right. Otherwise, please tell me how things are so great in the U.S. and we have no problems. Please stop the knee-jerking and get serious.

20110420-01 08:59 SteveB "The Donald Trumped on Abortion Question?"

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

This article (below) is a little long (online), but worthwhile. The article itself is short and amazing, but it is the world of comments following that I find so fascinating. One thing they tend to verify (though many were written, perhaps, very quickly) is that the American educational system ain't workin' too well. (All the more reason to cut funding, right?)

First, Trump proves himself to be another incompetent Republican(?) idiot. This is important whether you like him or not.

And, for sure, abortion isn't the most crucial issue on the table this election cycle (I hope!), but I find it telling in this instance. Call it, as it was with Palin, a litmus test for stupidity. (Republicans love that idea of a Right to Privacy, but don't understand Roe v. Wade. In the case of these two idiots, they don't even know about it, apparently.)

If you can wade through the comments (and I hope you will, they are truly entertaining and enlightening), you might get an idea of how truly stupid the rank and file Republicans can be.

Republicans...I don't think I really need to say more about this bunch of incompetents and hypocrites than to simply name the people who appear to be Republican Presidential hopefuls: senile John McCain (not this time around, thank God!), Sarah Palin (hahaha, quitter, a complete laughing stock), Donald Trump (get serious! nearly a complete laughing stock), Ron Paul (dangerous), Mike Huckabee (this fundamentalist will never stay out of anyone's bedroom), Newt Gingrich (evil), Haley Barbour (Mississippi, need I say more?), Michele Bachmann (no idea how government works, way radical, stupid), Mitt Romney (maybe the best of the bunch, but a Mormon pu*sy. Have you ever read the book of Mormon? Laughable...written on gold plates by Jesus, but they managed to lose them! He would be controlled by the church. Besides, I don't think he's radically fundamentalist enough to get the nomination.) There are other rascals, but they all seem to be claiming they don't want the job. Need I say more? Bobby Jindal?

Unfortunately for you and me and everyone else, the Republican party has lost its way, is morally bankrupt, totally the slave of special interests, and is more and more irrelevant to mainstream voters. I would bet good money that they will be crushed in the 2012 election, on both federal and state levels.

I won't even mention that all of our current problems, from all I can see, have been caused by this totally discredited (to thoughtful people) Republican ideology, blindly applied by George W., Newt, and other idiots. Barry G. and Dwight D.E., where are you when we really need you?

"The Donald Trumped on Abortion Question?" by Vaughn Ververs, MSNBC

Apr. 19, 2011, (<http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/04/19/6495853-the-donald-trumped-on-abortion-question>)

In his lengthy interview with NBC's Savannah Guthrie, Donald Trump appeared stumped when asked about the legal principle that served as the cornerstone for the Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion. Here's the key part of the interview:

Guthrie: Is there a right to privacy in the Constitution?

Trump: I guess there is, I guess there is. And why, just out of curiosity, why do you ask that question?

When pressed to explain how his position on the right to privacy "squares" with his anti-abortion position, Trump responded: "Well, that's a pretty strange way of getting to pro-life. I mean, it's a very unique way of asking about pro-life. What does that have to do with privacy? How are you equating pro-life with privacy?"

Guthrie asked, "Well, you know about the Roe v. Wade decision." Trump responded, "Yes, right, sure. Look, I am pro-life. I've said it. I'm very strong there."

The exchange was reminiscent of former Alaska Governor Sarah Palin's response to a similar question during the 2008 presidential campaign. In one of a series of interviews with CBS News' Katie Couric that were widely seen as damaging to Palin's image, the vice presidential nominee was asked: "Do you think there's an inherent right to privacy in the Constitution?" Palin responded, "I do. Yeah, I do."

Given that the Supreme Court used the "right to privacy" reasoning as the foundation for the Roe ruling, anti-abortion activists and candidates have long insisted no such right exists.

20110422-01 08:51 SteveB To: Ali Velshi; Market Speculation

Dear Ali Velshi (@CNN.com):

Let me first say that I think you're doing a great job on CNN and it's good to have you there every morning.

Today you were talking about speculation in commodity markets, particularly the crude oil markets. You said that speculation is core to our capitalist system and marketplaces.

You are right when it comes to stock markets, but in commodity markets, this speculation (for the purpose of making money only) creates artificial demand and bubbles. People buy oil futures who don't want oil, running up the price. I believe a change should be made. Anyone who buys commodity futures must take delivery of what they buy, or face a hefty fine.

This simple rule change would immediately stop greedy speculation from artificially raising commodity prices for all of us.

Thank you and keep up the good work.

20110422-02 17:16 SteveB "Why Glenn Beck Lost It"

Dear SteveM,

And as I predicted, none of Glenn Beck's predictions have come true. He has been proven to be nothing more than a hate monger.

"Why Glenn Beck Lost It" by Dana Milbank, The Washington Post

Apr. 6, 2011, (http://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/2011/04/06/AFNEgnqC_story.html)

(The popular host will end his controversial daily program on the Fox News Channel later this year.)

On Friday, the unemployment rate dropped to 8.8 percent, as businesses added jobs for the 13th straight month. On Wednesday, Fox News announced that it was ending Glenn Beck's daily cable-TV show. These are not unrelated events.

When Beck's show made its debut on Fox News Channel in Jan., 2009, the nation was in the throes of an economic collapse the likes of which had not been seen since the 1930s. Beck's angry broadcasts about the nation's imminent doom perfectly rode the wave of fear that had washed across the nation, and the relatively unknown entertainer suddenly had 3 million viewers a night—and tens of thousands answering his call to rally at the Lincoln Memorial.

But as the recession began to ease, Beck's apocalyptic forecasts and ominous conspiracies became less persuasive, and his audience began to drift away. Beck responded with a doubling-down that ultimately brought about his demise on Fox.

He pushed further into dark conspiracies, urging his viewers to hoard food in their homes and to buy freeze-dried meals for sustenance when civilization breaks down. He spun a conspiracy theory in which the American left was in cahoots with an emerging caliphate in the Middle East. And, most ominously, he began to traffic regularly in anti-Semitic themes.

This vile turn for Beck reached its logical extreme two weeks ago, when he devoted his entire show to a conspiracy theory about various bankers, including the Rothschilds, to create the Federal Reserve. To make this case, Beck hosted the conspiracy theorist G. Edward Griffin, who has publicly argued that the anti-Semitic tract "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion" "accurately describes much of what is happening in our world today."

Griffin's Web site dabbles in a variety of anti-Semitic conspiracy theories, including his view that "present-day political Zionists are promoting the New World Order."

A month earlier, Beck, on his radio program, had described Reform rabbis as "generally political in nature," adding: "It's almost like Islam, radicalized Islam in a way."

A few months before that, he had attacked the Jewish billionaire George Soros, a Holocaust survivor, as a "puppet master" and read descriptions of him as an "unscrupulous profiteer" who "sucks the blood from people." Beck falsely called Soros "a collaborator" with Nazis who "saw people into the gas chambers."

Fox deserves credit for finally putting an end to this. Its joint statement with Beck's production company, claiming that they will "work together to develop and produce a variety of television projects," is almost certainly window-dressing; you can be confident Fox won't have Beck reopening what his Fox News colleague Shepard Smith dubbed the "fear chamber."

In banishing Beck, about whom I wrote a critical book last year, Fox has made an important distinction: It's one thing to promote partisan journalism, but it's entirely different to engage in race baiting and fringe conspiracy claims. Bill O'Reilly and Sean Hannity may have their excesses, but their mainstream conservatism is in an entirely different category from Beck.

Fox has rightly, if belatedly, declared that there is no place for Beck's messages on its airwaves, and Beck will return to the fringes, where such ideas have always existed. Because his end-of-the-world themes will no longer be broadcast by a mainstream outlet, there will be less of a chance for him to inspire off-balance characters to violence.

There are, happily, signs that the influences that undermined Beck are doing the same to other purveyors of fear. The March Washington Post-ABC News poll found that Sarah Palin's favorability rating among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents had dropped to 58 percent from 70 percent in October and 88 percent in 2008. Her negative ratings among Republicans are higher than those of other prospective Republican presidential candidates.

In another indication of abating anger, a CNN poll released last week found that the percentage of the public viewing the Tea Party unfavorably had increased to 47 percent, from 26 percent in Jan., 2010. Thirty-two percent have a favorable view.

Beck, in losing his mass-media perch, is repeating the history of Father Charles Coughlin, the radio priest of the Great Depression. Economic hardship gave him an audience even greater than Beck's, but as his calls to drive "the money changers from the temple" became more vitriolic, his broadcast sponsors dropped him. He gradually faded from relevance as his angry themes lost their hold on Americans and his anti-Semitism became more pronounced.

It is a sign of the nation's health and resilience that Beck, after 27 months at Fox, is meeting a similar end.

20110425-01	11:37	SteveB	Fw: Photo: Congressmen Playing on the Job
-------------	-------	--------	---

In case you don't believe it, see: <http://www.snopes.com/photos/politics/solitaire.asp>.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

All these a-holes should be fired in the next election...every single one of them (435 + 100/3) from both parties!

This picture is worth a trillion $$$

House Minority Leader pictured standing, far right, speaks while colleagues play solitaire Monday night as the House convened to vote on a new budget. (AP)

The guy sitting in the row in front of these two....he's on Facebook, and the guy behind Hennessy is checking out the baseball scores.

These are the folks that couldn't get the budget out by Oct. 1, and are about to control your health care, cap and trade, and the list goes on and on..

Should we buy them larger screen computers—or—a ticket home, permanently?

This is one of their 3-DAY WORK WEEKS that we all pay for (salary is about $179,000 per year).

KEEP THIS GOING! DON'T LET IT STOP WITH YOU!

20110425-02	19:10	SteveB	"Five Myths About Planned Parenthood"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------------

"Five Myths About Planned Parenthood" by Clare Coleman, The Washington Post

Apr. 15, 2011, (http://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/five-myths-about-planned-parenthood/2011/04/14/AFogj1iD_story.html)

I was a Planned Parenthood affiliate chief executive, supervising a network of clinics in New York State, during the early days of this terrible recession. We ran deficits, cut hours, closed centers and laid off staff members. In a recession, things get very difficult—more and more people are in need, while government funds lag and donations dwindle. But still we did not turn patients away, even if they could not pay. At the same time, we had to fight political battles to preserve women's rights to basic care and information about their sexual health. Those battles continue: Thursday, the House voted to defund Planned Parenthood permanently; the Senate opposed that measure. Amid the debate, let's address some of the misperceptions about this nearly 100-year-old health-care organization.

1. Planned Parenthood's federal funding frees up other money to pay for abortions.

Opponents of Planned Parenthood insist that giving the organization federal dollars allows it to spend other money in its budget to provide abortions. That is not possible—there is no other money.

Title X is a federal grant program that exists solely to help low-income and uninsured people access contraceptives and sexual health care; 5.2 million people use the program annually. But Congress has never appropriated enough money to take care of the estimated 17 million Americans who need publicly funded family-planning care. There always are more patients than subsidies.

Further, a Title X grant is designed to help with costs, not to fully cover them. So, family-planning programs are required to find other money to support the Title X project—not the other way around. For patients who qualify for Medicaid, reimbursement rates for reproductive health services are lower than the cost of the care. A typical family-planning visit might cost upward of $200, including the exam, lab tests and contraceptive method, but the Medicaid reimbursement rate may be as low as $20.

2. Ninety percent of what Planned Parenthood does is provide abortions.

That is what Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said this month in a speech against federal support for Planned Parenthood; his staff later said his assertion was “not intended to be a factual statement.”

Here is a factual statement: Planned Parenthood’s abortion care represents 3 percent of its medical services—332,000 terminations out of a total of 11.4 million services provided in 2009. Nearly all the care offered at Planned Parenthood health centers is preventive services and screenings, including contraception, testing for sexually transmitted infections, pap smears and breast exams. Title X funds cannot be used for abortion care at any time, for any reason. Federal Medicaid funds can be used to reimburse a provider for an abortion when the pregnancy would endanger the life of the woman or resulted from rape or incest.

States can use their local tax dollars to support abortion care for low-income women, and 17 states do so under Medicaid. The capital city did, too—until last week, when Congress overturned the District’s Medicaid abortion coverage.

3. Defunding Planned Parenthood will reduce abortions.

Contraception prevents the need for abortions, but most politicians who oppose abortion do not support birth control, either. Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the chief House sponsor of a bill to bar abortion providers such as Planned Parenthood from Title X, has praised a few elements of the program: pregnancy tests, breast cancer screening and HIV testing. He never mentions Title X’s essential work for 41 years—to provide information about and access to birth control, which 99 percent of Americans will use in their lifetime.

Women spend about five years either being pregnant or trying to get pregnant, and about 30 years trying not to get pregnant; the Guttmacher Institute estimates that half of the country’s unintended pregnancies end in abortion. If Pence wants to prevent abortions, he should lead the charge to triple Title X funding.

Instead, Pence has voted to eliminate Title X, and he has no answer for where the 5.2 million people served by that program would get care. Planned Parenthood centers offer contraception to nearly 2.5 million patients a year and serves 36 percent of all Title X patients.

Barring Planned Parenthood from participating in federal programs would lead to less access to birth control, more unintended pregnancies and more abortions.

4. Planned Parenthood serves only teenagers and prostitutes.

I’ve never had a chance to talk to Glenn Beck, who implied recently on his Fox radio show that only “hookers” use Planned Parenthood. But when I worked for the organization, I would ask our supporters to picture this: You’re a 22-year-old woman with a job you don’t love, a toddler you’d die for and no health insurance. You live paycheck to paycheck, and you always know to the penny how much cash you’ve got until the end of the month. You’re rushing home on Route 9 to relieve your mom, who’s with the kid, and the engine light on the car comes on. You feel a wave of panic. You know you’re always one emergency away from everything falling apart. That’s our patient—I always have her in my mind.

Inside the Beltway, it is easy to forget that millions live on that edge. Our typical patient is a working woman between 20 and 24, maybe in school, often with children. But our centers nationwide see women and men of all ages, races, income levels, and marital and social statuses. The number of men seen in Title X-funded centers has tripled in the past 10 years, and the fastest-growing group of women served by Title X is those over 44.

5. People don’t really need Planned Parenthood.

Three million patients each year visit Planned Parenthood's more than 800 health centers in every state, in big cities and small towns. In some areas, Planned Parenthood and the Title X-funded system are the only sexual health providers for hundreds of miles.

We screen people for high blood pressure, anemia and diabetes; we counsel them about smoking cessation and obesity; we connect them to other primary-care providers and social services. The huge response to the attack on family planning and on Planned Parenthood—hundreds of thousands of Americans signing petitions, showing up at rallies, calling Congress—is extraordinary. But it doesn't surprise me. One in five American women has gone to Planned Parenthood at some point in her life, for respectful, compassionate, quality care. And now those Americans are going to have our back.

(Clare Coleman is the president and chief executive officer of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association. She headed a Planned Parenthood network in New York's Hudson Valley, and worked in the U.S. House and as a lobbyist for Planned Parenthood.)

20110426-01	10:56	SteveB	"Henry Ford, Charles Kettering and the 'Fuel of the Future'" Alcohol
-------------	-------	--------	--

A long read, but a good historical view of our current energy problems. If we would have made good decisions instead of political decisions 100 years ago.

"Henry Ford, Charles Kettering and the 'Fuel of the Future'" by Bill Kovarik

1998, (<http://www.radford.edu/~wkovarik/papers/fuel.html>)

Introduction

When Henry Ford told a New York Times reporter that ethyl alcohol was "the fuel of the future" in 1925, he was expressing an opinion that was widely shared in the automotive industry. "The fuel of the future is going to come from fruit like that sumac out by the road, or from apples, weeds, sawdust — almost anything," he said. "There is fuel in every bit of vegetable matter that can be fermented. There's enough alcohol in one year's yield of an acre of potatoes to drive the machinery necessary to cultivate the fields for a hundred years."

Ford's optimistic appraisal of cellulose and crop based ethyl alcohol fuel can be read in several ways. First, it can be seen as an oblique jab at a competitor. General Motors (and Charles Kettering) had come to considerable grief that summer of 1925 over another octane boosting fuel called tetraethyl lead, and government officials had been quietly in touch with Ford engineers about alternatives to leaded gasoline additives.

More importantly to Ford, in 1925 the American farms that Ford loved were facing an economic crisis that would later intensify with the depression. Although the causes of the crisis were complex, one possible solution was seen in creating new markets for farm products. With Ford's financial and political backing, the idea of opening up industrial markets for farmers would be translated into a broad movement for scientific research in agriculture that would be labeled "Farm Chemurgy."

Historiographic Notes

The history of ethyl alcohol fuel has been partially explored by Giebelhaus, Bernton and this author, but the historical focus of all three works tended to be on the U.S. Farm Chemurgy Movement in the 1930s. The context of Ford's support has not been well understood. And the ideas of Charles F. Kettering, in particular, have been grossly misrepresented.

American farmers embraced the vision of new markets for farm products, especially alcohol fuel, three times in the 20th century: around 1906, again in the 1930s with Ford's blessing, and most recently, during the oil crisis of the 1970s. By the mid-1980s over one hundred corn alcohol production plants had been built and over a billion gallons of ethyl alcohol were sold per year in the fuel market. In the late 1980s and 1990s, with an apparently permanent world oil glut and rock bottom fuel prices, most of the alcohol plants shut down. Some observers joked that ethyl alcohol was the fuel of the future — and always would be. "Gasohol" had become passe.

Why, then, delve so deeply into this history?

Even if infinite amounts of petroleum were available, the history of alternative energy sources is worthy of study from many points of view, not the least of which is the pragmatic need to understand alternatives to oil supply from politically unstable regions of the world. Francis Garvan noted the problem in a speech promoting alcohol fuel at the Dearborn, Mich. "Chemurgy" Conference on Agriculture, Industry and Science in 1936.

They say we have foreign oil. It is ... in Persia, and it is in Russia. Do you think that is much defense for your children?

Another pragmatic reason to consider the history of alternative fuels involves the risk of continued reliance on oil relative to global climate change — a problem more recently appreciated.

Aside from pragmatic justifications, historians of technology have long noted a general preoccupation with "success stories" to an extent that might be called "whiggish." Research into some of the "roads not taken" would provide history with better focus and broader perspective, according to historian John Staudenmier. The direction a technology takes is too often seen as a result of pre-determined or inevitable conditions that arise from intrinsic properties of a technology, rather than from industry preference or policy choice.

Ethyl alcohol has long been used as an automotive fuel in two ways: First, it replaces gasoline outright in a somewhat modified internal combustion engine; and secondly, it is an effective "octane booster" when mixed with gasoline in blends of 10 to 30 percent and requires no engine modification. These blends achieve the same octane boosting (or anti-knock) effects as petroleum-derived aromatics like benzene or metallic additives like tetraethyl lead.

Many people are familiar with "Gasohol," a popular fuel blend in the American Midwest in the late 1970s, which was a blend of ten percent ethyl alcohol and gasoline. (Fuel pumps are now simply labeled "with 10 percent ethanol.") Most people are not familiar with the other fuel blends using alcohol. "Gasonol" (with an "n") was a blend of 20 percent sugar cane alcohol with gasoline and kerosene used in the Philippines in the 1930s. Koolmotor, Benzalcohol, Moltaco, Lattybentyl, Natelite, Alcool and Agrol are some of the other obscure but interesting blends of fuels once found in Britain, Italy, Hungary, Sweden, South Africa, Brazil and the U.S. (respectively) in the 1920s and 1930s.

Economic issues have generally worked against the use of alcohol in favor of petroleum, but it is simplistic to view the problem simply in terms of relative consumer expense. Prices for ethyl alcohol blends and high octane gasoline are in the same relative range, and alcohol has been cheaper at times in various countries, depending on international politics and national tariff and incentive program.

In the cultural and political context, alternative fuels — especially ethyl alcohol — have held a symbolic and politically strategic significance among advocates and opponents alike that goes far beyond the simple substitution of one product for another. Opponents have seen ethyl alcohol fuel as a scheme for robbing taxpayers to enrich farmers, as turning food for the poor into fuel for the rich, as compounding soil erosion problems, and as a marginally useful enhancement or replacement fuel for a transportation system that is poorly designed in the first place.

Advocates have seen in alcohol fuels the potential for revolutionizing agricultural economics, for dispelling city smog, and for curbing the power of the petroleum industry over the economy. In addition, the idea that agriculture and biological resources could be primary sources of energy, the idea that humankind could live on solar "income" rather than fossil fuel "capital," has held a fascination for several generations of automotive and agricultural engineers. Proponents could see in ethyl alcohol the potential to help strike balance between city and farm and the prospect of civilizing and humanizing industrial machinery.

For example, this hope is graphically depicted in the symbolism used at the 1902 Paris alcohol fuel exposition. On the cover of the exposition's proceedings, a muse with an overflowing bouquet of roses looks down over the steering wheel with a confident smile. She is a portrait of wisdom and beauty, firmly in control of a gentle machine which seems appropriately located in some lush flower garden.

Rhetoric of the technological sublime, as it has been called, frequently attends the birth of any new technology, and of course there is nothing surprising about the high hopes of French automobile enthusiasts for alcohol fuel in 1902. While the spirit of the marriage was not always as artfully depicted, many of the great scientific minds of the 20th century expressed their support and interest specifically in alcohol as a high quality fuel and the general idea of opening vast new industrial markets for farm products. These included Henry Ford, Alexander Graham Bell, Thomas Edison and Charles F. Kettering.

Bell called alcohol "a wonderfully clean-burning fuel ... that can be produced from farm crops, agricultural wastes, and even garbage." Henry Ford, who idealized country life despite his contribution to the urbanization of America, hoped that alcohol could help power a rural renaissance. Thomas Edison backed the idea of industrial uses for farm products, and respected Ford's vision of the fuel of the future. Charles Kettering and protégés Thomas Midgely and T.A. Boyd noted that the "most direct route which we now know for converting energy from its source, the sun, into a material suitable for use as a fuel is through vegetation to alcohol..." Kettering's interest is particularly important because, as we will see, he was enthusiastic about alcohol fuel even after the discovery of tetraethyl lead. In fact, Kettering originally planned that the octane boosting power of leaded gasoline would pave the way for the fuel of the future — ethyl alcohol from cellulosic biomass.

The broad ranging competition between gasoline and alcohol fuels around the turn of the century is not today as well known today as a similar competition between steam and electric automobiles with gasoline powered automobiles. Nevertheless, the competition from alcohol fuel was a well recognized fact at the time. Hundreds of magazine articles, reports, books and technical papers were written about alcohol fuel from the 1900 - 1926 period before and during the "Ethyl" leaded gasoline controversy, and hundreds more were published in the 1926-1960 period.

Ethyl Alcohol Fuel before the Discovery of Petroleum

The history of energy is loaded with inaccuracies and myths. One myth is that Edwin Drake's first oil well, drilled in Pennsylvania in 1859, arrived in the nick of time to replace a rapidly dwindling supply of whale oil. Actually, as we will see, a variety of lamp fuels were common in the U.S. and Europe through the 19th and early 20th centuries. These fuels offered the most logical starting point in the search for portable liquid fuels which inventors would use in the internal combustion engine.

Lamp fuels included all kinds of vegetable oils (castor, rapeseed, peanut); animal oils (especially whale oil and tallow from beef or pork,); refined turpentine from pine trees; and alcohols, especially wood alcohol (methanol or methyl alcohol) and grain alcohol (ethanol or ethyl alcohol). The most popular fuel in the U.S. before petroleum was a blend of alcohol and turpentine called "camphene" or simply "burning fluid."

The "whale oil myth," appears in many places, most recently in the history of the oil industry, The Prize, which hailed kerosene as "the new light which pushed back the night and extended the working day." It was a "marvel to eyes that had strained to see by means of a lighted rag," A recent Smithsonian exhibit provided a similar perspective: "It was the discovery of petroleum in 1859 that kindled the revolution in artificial lighting," the exhibit said. "Kerosene ...was cheap and relatively clean. Lamp companies had sprung up immediately and by the 1870s virtually everyone could enjoy indoor lighting." This traditional error is found in many other accounts of the history of energy. According to a 1960 history, "petroleum arrived on the scene in answer to a world-wide quest for a new source of artificial light." In an Ethyl Corp. magazine of 1943, for example, we find the following:

During the first half of the 19th century, scientists eagerly sought to develop better lighting fuels ... At that time, rural America for the most part depended on whale oil and sperm oil lamps to light its homes, and upon beeswax and tallow candles. Supplies, however, were limited and were becoming insufficient to meet a constantly growing demand.

These accounts seem to be inspired examples of rhetoric of the technological sublime. They are also fiction. In fact, kerosene came into an already well-established liquid fuel system with full scale production, distribution and end-use technology well in place. In other words, kerosene replaced other fuels; it did not emerge to light up a previously dark world.

In the 30 or 40 years before petroleum was discovered in Pennsylvania, the leading fuel was "camphene" (sometimes simply called "burning fluid"). It was a blend of high-proof ethyl alcohol with 20 to 50 percent turpentine to color the flame and a few drops of camphor oil to mask the turpentine smell. Alcohol for camphene was an important mainstay for distilleries, and many sold between one third and 80 percent of their product on the fuel market.¹⁸ The first U.S. patent for alcohol as a lamp fuel was awarded in 1834 to S. Casey, of Lebanon, Maine but it is clear that alcohol was routinely used a fuel beforehand. Samuel Morey used the readily available alcohol in the first American prototype internal combustion engine at the surprisingly early date of 1826. We should note that Morey's work was lost in the enthusiasm for the steam engine and a lack of funding. No other internal combustion engine would be developed until Nicholas Otto began his experiments 35 years later.

By the late 1830s, alcohol blends had replaced increasingly expensive whale oil in most parts of the country. It "easily took the lead as the illuminant" because it was "a decided improvement on other oils then in use," (especially lard oils) according to a lamp manufacturer's "History of Light." By 1860, thousands of distilleries churned out at least 90 million gallons of alcohol per year for lighting. In the 1850s, camphene (at $.50 per gallon) was cheaper than whale oil ($1.30 to $2.50 per gallon) and lard oil (90 cents per gallon). It was about the same price as coal oil, which was the product first marketed as "kerosene" (literally "sun fuel").

Kerosene from petroleum was a good fuel when it arrived in the 1860s: it was usually not too volatile, it burned brightly and it was fairly cheap. A gradual shift from camphene to kerosene might have occurred, but instead, a $2.08 per gallon tax on alcohol was imposed in stages between 1862 and 1864 as part of the Internal Revenue Act to pay for the Civil War. The tax was meant to apply to beverage alcohol, but without any specific exemption, it was also applied to fuel and industrial uses for alcohol. "The imposition of the internal-revenue tax on distilled spirits ... increased the cost of this 'burning fluid' beyond the possibility of using it in competition with kerosene..," said Rufus F. Herrick, an engineer with the Edison Electric Testing Laboratory who wrote one of the first books on the use of alcohol fuel.

While a gradual shift from burning fluid (or spirit lamps) to kerosene did occur in Europe during the last half of the 19th century, the American alcohol tax meant that kerosene became the primary fuel virtually overnight, and the distilleries making lamp fuel lost their markets. The tax "had the effect of upsetting [the distilleries] and in some cases destroying them," said IRS commissioner David A. Wells in 1872. "The manufacture of burning fluid for lighting suddenly ceased; happily, it was replaced by petroleum, which was about to be discovered." Similarly, C.J. Zintheo, of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, said that 90 million gallons of alcohol per year were used for lighting, cooking, and industry before the tax was imposed. Meanwhile, use of oil shot up from almost nothing in 1860 to over 200 million gallons in 1870. "The effect was disastrous to great industries, which, if [they were to be] saved from ruin, had to be rapidly revolutionized," according to Irish engineer Robert N. Tweedy.

The distress in the alcohol industry may be reflected in the number of patents for various combinations of burning fluids. Between 1861 and 1867, the patent office issued 32 different patents for burning fluids, alcohol or camphene blends; only five had been awarded in the previous 33 years. After 1867, no patents for "burning fluids" are listed. The dramatic increase in numbers of patents, as alcohol became prohibitively expensive, may reflect desperate attempts to find new combinations of inflammable liquids to replace the product of the rapidly dying alcohol fuel industry .

Thus, the growth of the petroleum industry in the 1860s was greatly aided by the heavy federal tax on its primary competitor .The myth that petroleum was at first a dramatic deliverance from the darkness, and then the only important fuel for the horseless carriage, indicates the extent to which oil industry historians have been influenced by the rhetoric of the technological sublime. In fact, early automotive inventors resorted to both petroleum and alcohol spirit lamp fuels as readily available energy sources.

Fodder for the Horseless Carriage

The idea of replacing the external combustion steam engine with an internal combustion liquid fuel engine seized the world's imagination in the late 19th century, but the origins of internal combustion engines can be traced back to early experiments with gunpowder in the late 1600s. Historian Lyle Cummins has noted that at least a dozen inventors tried to develop some form of internal combustion engine by the early 19th century.

The first authentic internal combustion engine in America, developed by Samuel Morey around 1826, ran on ethyl alcohol and turpentine. It powered an experimental wagon and a small boat at eight miles per hour up the Connecticut river. Morey, like many other inventors, was never able to attract financing for his idea and only the prototype was built.

Another early developer of the internal combustion engine was German inventor Nicholas August Otto. In 1860, Otto used ethyl alcohol as a fuel in an early engine because it was widely available for spirit lamps throughout Europe. He devised a carburetor which, like Morey's, heated the alcohol to help it vaporize as the engine was being started. But a January 1861 patent application with the Kingdom of Prussia was turned down, probably because heated alcohol carburetion was already being widely used in spirit lamps. It is interesting to note that Otto's initial financing came from Eugen Langen, who owned a sugar refining company that probably had links to the alcohol markets of Europe. Of course, the Otto & Langen company went on to success in the 1870s by producing stationary gas engines (usually powered by coal gas) and the later "Otto-cycle" engine was fueled primarily with gasoline but was still adaptable to alcohol or benzene from coal.

Numerous other engine prototypes were developed using alcohol or turpentine, including U.S. inventor George Brayton's engine developed in the 1870s. However, at the dawn of the automotive age, kerosene was widely available and gasoline, although volatile and dangerous for lamps, was cheap and very much in surplus.

Promoting Alcohol Fuel in Europe 1890 — 1914

During the 1890 — 1914 time period, German, French and British scientists and government officials were worried about the longevity of oil reserves and the unpredictable nature of oil supplies from Russia and America. "The oil trust battles between Rockefeller, the Rothschilds, the Nobels and Marcus Samuel's Shell kept prices in a state of flux, and engines often had to be adaptable to the fuel that was available," said Cummins. Manufacturing companies in Germany, England and France sold engines equipped to handle a variety of fuels. In tropical nations where oil supplies were quite irregular, and in closed environments such as mines and factories, alcohol engines were often preferred.

With few domestic oil reserves, France and Germany especially were eager to encourage widespread development of a fuel that could be readily distilled from domestic farm products. Research at the Experimental Mechanical Laboratory of Paris and at the Deutsche Landwirtschaftliche Gesellschaft in Berlin in the 1890s helped pave the way for expanded use of alcohol fuel. By 1896, horseless carriages were showing up on roads in Europe and the United States, and internal combustion engines were also beginning to replace steam engines in light machinery and farm equipment. The question of whether gasoline or alcohol was the better fuel often provoked spirited debate, and numerous races between cars with different fuels were held in Europe.

One of these races took place in 1899 with four alcohol fueled vehicles racing from Paris to Chantilly. Only one made the entire distance. Two years later, 50 vehicles ranging from light quadracycles to heavy trucks made the 167 mile trek from Paris to Roubaix. The rallies were sponsored by the Automobile Club of Paris and fuels varying from pure alcohol to 50 percent alcohol and 50 percent gasoline were measured for each vehicle before and after the 1902 rally. Most drivers apparently preferred the 50-50 blend.

Exhibits of automobiles held every year contained large proportions of alcohol fueled cars, and the growing enthusiasm was reflected in the 1902 Paris exhibit (mentioned above in the introduction). The exhibit was devoted to alcohol powered automobiles, farm machinery and a wide variety of lamps, stoves, heaters, laundry irons, hair curlers, coffee roasters and every conceivable household appliance and agricultural engine powered by alcohol. Many of these were not experimental items but represented a well established industry. By one estimate, some 95,000 alcohol fueled stoves and 37,000 spirit lamps were made in Germany in 1902. The exhibit published a set of papers and speeches, and was reported in many newspapers and technical journals of the day. Eight other exhibitions and congresses on alcohol fuels took place — in Germany, France, Italy and Spain between 1901 and 1904. Meanwhile, French fuel alcohol production rose from 2.7 million gallons in 1900 to 5.7 million gallons in 1903 and 8.3 million in 1905. Enthusiasm over the marriage of agriculture and industry in alcohol fuel was not the only motivation for French interest. A very practical problem was the decline in French sugar beet exports and rising surplus of many crops. Another concern was the increase in oil imports from the U.S. and the lack of domestic oil reserves.

Germans were also concerned about a domestic fuel supply that would also provide farmers with new markets for crops. In 1899, the German government organized the Centrale für Spiritus Verwertung (office of alcohol sales) which maintained alcohol prices at an equilibrium with petroleum at around the equivalent of 27 cents per gallon through subsidies to alcohol producers and a tariff on imported oil. Other incentives included scientific prizes, including a medallion from the emperor offered for the best alcohol engines. As a result, alcohol production rose from 10 million gallons to about 26 million gallons between 1887 and 1904. "To Kaiser William II, it seems, we are indebted for the great, new industry," said a New York Times magazine writer in 1906. "Not that he discovered the fuel, but that he forced its use on Germany. The Kaiser was enraged at the Oil Trust of his country, and offered prizes to his subjects and cash assistance ... to adapt [alcohol] to use in the industries."

According to a representative of the Otto Gas Engine Works of Philadelphia, by 1906 ten percent of the engines being produced by the firm's parent company in Germany were designed to run on pure ethyl alcohol, while one third of the heavy locomotives produced at the Deutz Gas engine works of Germany ran on pure ethyl alcohol. Alcohol engines were advertised as safer than steam engines (as they did not give off sparks from smokestacks) and far cleaner than kerosene or gasoline engines. In a survey conducted around 1903, some 87 percent of German farmers considered alcohol engines to be equal or superior to steam engines in performance. Conflicting reports on the number of German distilleries at least give some idea of the scale of the enterprise. By one 1906 account, some 72,000 distilleries operated, of which 57,000 were small farm "Materialbrennereien" stills producing a total of 27 million gallons. Another account, from 1914, put the number at 6,000 distilleries producing 66 million gallons of alcohol per year.

These alcohol stills may have had the effect of prolonging World War I. According to Irish engineer Robert Tweedy, when oil shortages seemed likely to paralyze Germany's transportation system in 1915, thousands of engines were quickly modified. "Every motor car in the empire was adapted to run on alcohol. It is possible that Germany would have been beaten already [by 1917] if production of alcohol had not formed an important part of the agricultural economy."

U.S. Congress Lifts Alcohol Tax in 1906

American farmers watched the growing use of alcohol fuel in Europe with great interest. Their markets were glutted with grain surpluses created when vast new tracts of virgin prairie were plowed under to produce bumper crops. To absorb these surpluses, many looked to the market for liquid fuels created by the widespread acceptance of the automobile. It seemed logical to replace their declining market for horses by growing fuel for the horseless carriage.

Several attempts had already been made to remove the $2.08 federal tax placed on alcohol during the Civil War.. In 1894 the Wilson tariff bill allowed a rebate of taxes on alcohol for industrial uses, but the Treasury Dept. refused to issue regulations. Manufacturers tried to claim the rebate but lost in court. In 1896 a joint committee studied the issue, and minutes show opposition from wood alcohol (methyl) producers.

In 1906, the farm lobby found an ally in President Theodore Roosevelt, a bitter foe of the oil industry. Although embroiled in other disputes at the time, Roosevelt sent a message of support for the repeal of the alcohol tax to the House of Representatives, saying it provided a possible check to the depredations of the oil trust. In April, 1906, a bill to repeal the alcohol sales tax sailed through the House on a 224 to 7 vote with widespread support from farm-belt representatives. Additional support came from the Temperance Party, which saw in alcohol fuel a beneficial use for a pernicious commodity.

When the Senate Finance Committee attempted to table the "Free Alcohol" bill, the president of the Automobile Club of America said that he was considerably surprised and disappointed at the Senate committee, although he did not think Standard Oil would oppose the bill. "Gasoline is growing scarcer, and therefore dearer, all the time... Automobiles cannot use gasoline for all time, of that I am sure, and alcohol seems to be the best substitute that has yet appeared." U.S. Senator Champ Clark of Missouri, however, placed "the Rockefellers" squarely in the opposing camp as attempting to retain the tax on a potential competitor.

By mid-May, 1906, the Senate committee relented and the New York Times reported the bill was likely to be approved. "It is only the heavy tax imposed by the United States that has prevented the use of a large number of vegetable products for the manufacture of exceedingly cheap and available alcohol," a Times editorial said. These sources included potatoes in the West, sugar beets in Michigan, and cheap imported molasses in the east. A report from the U.S. ambassador to Cuba noted alcohol made their cost 10 cents per gallon, and with improved methods in the U.S. it could cost even less when made from imported molasses. "The chief opponents, at least the open opponents, have been the manufacturers of wood alcohol," the Times said.

Auto manufacturers supported the bill wholeheartedly. A representative of the Detroit Board of Commerce, James S. Capen, told the Senate Finance Committee that alcohol was "preferable" to gasoline because it was safer, "absolutely clean and sanitary," and because "artificial shortages" could not raise the price in the future. The biggest problem for auto makers, Capen said, was not so much cost as the question of long term supply.

The Senate passed the bill May 24, 1906, and the New York Times again noted the low cost of alcohol (14 cents from corn, nine and a half cents from molasses) as compared to the high price of kerosene and gasoline (18 and 22 cents, respectively). "The new fuel and illuminant will utilize completely an important class of agricultural crops and byproducts thus benefiting in a double sense the farms and villages throughout the country," an editorial said. Roosevelt signed the bill June 8, 1906.

Additional bills specifically exempting farm stills from government controls passed shortly afterwards, and triumphant farm belt senators, like North Dakota's Hansbrough, proclaimed that "every farmer could have a still" to supply heat, light and power at low prices. "Advocates look forward with hope to a big change in the farmers life," the New York Times reported. "If the law accomplishes what is hoped it will... make a revolution on the farm."

Experts noted that while alcohol would probably not drive out gasoline entirely, "it will find its field as every other fuel energy has." More typical was the statement of a National Grange master who predicted an immediate market for 100 million gallons of alcohol. Along with a large additional market for farm crops, alcohol would serve as a "balance wheel to maintain an equilibrium" in commodity prices.

The lofty farm rhetoric obscured a difficult economic picture, but the bill kindled interest in alcohol fuels among farmers who wanted new markets and automakers who wanted to continue to have a market if oil were to run out. Pure alcohol fuel went on sale in Peoria, Illinois at 32 cents per gallon in January, 1907 as the tax took effect, and prices elsewhere hovered around 25 to 30 cents. At the same time, gasoline prices at 18 to 22 cents per gallon were beginning to drop as new Texas oil fields came on line and found markets on the East Coast. These new fields were brought in by independent oil companies, especially Gulf and the Texas Co. (Texaco). Suddenly, the future for alcohol fuel seemed more remote than anticipated.

"Of all the chimerical projects ever foisted upon Congress, the free denatured alcohol scheme has proved the greatest disappointment," said a news column in the New York Times in 1907. With only ten alcohol plants built under the new law, "gasoline, kerosene and electricity are still being used." One disappointed farm machinery manufacturer said the problem was a lack of frugality among Americans; the manufacturer said German farm stills often used "cull" crops that had been partly damaged or spoiled. Meanwhile, an Internal Revenue commissioner noted that Germany protected farm alcohol with tariffs on petroleum imports, and said that fuel prices there were the equivalent of 15 to 27 cents per gallon. U.S.D.A. set up a demonstration small scale alcohol still in the Bureau of Chemistry with "the aim of creating a body of experts who would return to their districts filled up with enthusiasm and knowledge which would be served out to farmers." In 1908, fourteen experts were trained; in 1909 only four could be trained, and the project was abandoned. The U.S. commissioner of revenue noted in 1910 that no alcohol had been used for fuel, and in 1911 he reported that a new industrial alcohol industry was unlikely.

Attempts to revive the moribund hopes of the alcohol industry proved futile. In 1914 the Free Alcohol bill was amended again to decrease the regulatory burden, but one observer said that the small distillery "is only a myth in this country." In 1915, Congressional hearings on more demonstrations and proposals for an Industrial Alcohol Commission within the Department of Agriculture were held, but the proposals were turned down. "The theater is open, the stage is set, but the play does not begin. There are no actors..." said Tweedy.

Alcohol from grain and potatoes, at about 25 to 30 cents per gallon, was far too expensive to compete with petroleum, but alcohol from Cuban molasses, at 10 cents per gallon, was thought to be competitive. Some observers suspected a conspiracy in the fact that Standard Oil of New Jersey had financial ties to the Caribbean alcohol market. The influence of an oil company over the alcohol industry was "a combination which many will regard as sinister," said Tweedy. In 1942, Senate committees began looking into the extent to which the oil industry had controlled other industries, including the alcohol industry and the rubber industry. Attorney General Thurmond Arnold testified that anti-trust investigations had taken place into the oil industry's influence in the alcohol industry in the 1913-1920 period, in the early 1920s, and between 1927 and 1936. "Renewed complaints in 1939 were brought to the anti-trust division but because of funds no action was taken," Arnold said. Then the investigation of 1941 which exposed a "marriage" between Standard Oil Co. and the German chemical company I.G. Farben also brought new evidence concerning complex price and marketing agreements between du Pont Corp., a major investor in and producer of leaded gasoline, U.S. Industrial Alcohol Co. and their subsidiary, Cuba Distilling Co. The investigation was eventually dropped, like dozens of others in many different kinds of industries, due to the need to enlist industry support in the war effort. However, the top directors of many oil companies agreed to resign and oil industry stocks in molasses companies were sold off as part of a compromise worked out with Arnold.

Scientific Investigations of Alcohol Fuels 1890 - 1920

Scientific journals contain hundreds of references to alcohol fuel at the dawn of the automotive era. Research during the earliest decades tended to focus on pure alcohol as a replacement for petroleum. The focus shifted to the anti-knock ("octane" boosting) properties of alcohol blends in gasoline during the 1915 to 1936 period because of an increasing need for anti-knock gasoline and because of improvements in anhydrous alcohol production techniques.

Studies of alcohol as an internal combustion engine fuel began in the U.S. with the Edison Electric Testing Laboratory and Columbia University in 1906. Elihu Thomson reported that despite a smaller heat or B.T.U. value, "a gallon of alcohol will develop substantially the same power in an internal combustion engine as a gallon of gasoline. This is owing to the superior efficiency of operation..." Other researchers confirmed the same phenomena around the same time.

U.S.D.A. tests in 1906 also demonstrated the efficiency of alcohol in engines and described how gasoline engines could be modified for higher power with pure alcohol fuel or for equivalent fuel consumption, depending on the need. The U.S.

Geological Service and the U.S. Navy performed 2000 tests on alcohol and gasoline engines in 1907 and 1908 in Norfolk, Va. and St. Louis, Mo. They found that much higher engine compression ratios could be achieved with alcohol than with gasoline. When the compression ratios were adjusted for each fuel, fuel economy was virtually equal despite the greater B.T.U. value of gasoline. "In regard to general cleanliness, such as absence of smoke and disagreeable odors, alcohol has many advantages over gasoline or kerosene as a fuel," the report said. "The exhaust from an alcohol engine is never clouded with a black or grayish smoke." U.S.G.S. continued the comparative tests and later noted that alcohol was "a more ideal fuel than gasoline" with better efficiency despite the high cost.

The French War Office tested gasoline, benzene and an alcohol-benzene blend in road tests in 1909, and the results showed that benzene gave higher mileage than gasoline or the alcohol blend in existing French trucks. The British Fuel Research Board also tested alcohol and benzene mixtures around the turn of the century and just before World War I, finding that alcohol blends had better thermal efficiency than gasoline but that engines developed less brake horsepower at low rpm. On the other hand, a British researcher named Watson found that thermal efficiencies for alcohol, benzene and gasoline were very nearly equal.

These experiments are representative of work underway before and during World War I. The conclusions were so definitive that Scientific American concluded in 1918: "It is now definitely established that alcohol can be blended with gasoline to produce a suitable motor fuel ..." By 1920, the consensus, Scientific American said, was "a universal assumption that [ethyl] alcohol in some form will be a constituent of the motor fuel of the future." Alcohol met all possible technical objections, and although it was more expensive than gasoline, it was not prohibitively expensive in blends with gasoline. "Every chemist knows [alcohol and gasoline] will mix, and every engineer knows [they] will drive an internal combustion engine."

During and after the war, the British Fuel Research Board actively researched military and civilian fuels. W.R. Ormandy in 1918 said that alcohol and coal based fuels could replace oil in the post-war period, and Ormandy noted that only five percent of the American grain crop would meet requirements for a blended fuel. The board's committee on "power alcohol" noted the absence of technical problems a year later, although it concluded that "alcohol cannot compete with gasoline at present prices." Harold B. Dixon, working for the board and other governmental departments, reported in 1920 that higher possible engine compression compensated for alcohol's low caloric value. A mixture of alcohol with 20 percent benzene or gasoline "runs very smoothly, and without knocking." Also, B.R. Tunnison reported in 1920 the anti-knock effects of alcohol blends in gasoline and said mileage was improved.

Another significant set of British experiments was performed by the London General Omnibus Co. in 1919 comparing gasoline with blends of ethyl alcohol and benzene. Mileage was about the same, with gasoline slightly ahead. "In all other respects the [alcohol] fuel compared favorably with petrol [gasoline], and exhibited the characteristics of other alcohol mixtures in respect of flexibility, absence of knocking and cleanliness." The absence of knocking is significant, since London omnibus studies were widely reported and well known two years before leaded gasoline was discovered and six years before oil industry representatives told government officials that alternatives to leaded gasoline did not exist. The bus experiment also showed that a large scale switch from petroleum was technically feasible. "We are fast squandering the oil that has been stored in the fuel beds, and it seems so far as our present knowledge takes us that it is to the fuels experimented with that we must turn for our salvation," said the omnibus company engineer in a technical journal.

Despite the value of demonstrating the flexibility of technology, road tests proved to be an unreliable index of mileage and thermal efficiency. A German road test of benzene alcohol blends found that the 50 /50 alcohol benzene mixture had 30 percent better mileage than gasoline. Because of the unreliability of such road tests, Thomas Midgely in the U.S. and H.R. Ricardo in Britain developed reference engines, indicators, and measuring apparatus for showing the exact extent of knocking. Midgely's system led to the development of iso-octane as a reference fuel, and eventually, the "octane" system of measuring anti-knock. Ricardo's work focused in part on testing fuels at various compression ratios up to the point where they would begin knocking, or what he termed the "highest useful compression ratio." Ethyl alcohol had a 7.5 value, with commercial gasolines then available at 4.5 to 6. Ricardo also developed the Toluene Index, which like "octane" measured anti-knock with a reference fuel. Ricardo concluded that the low burning rate of alcohol lessens the tendency to knock, and that, using toluene as the reference point at 100 anti-knock, alcohol had a 130 rating.

Several difficulties with alcohol fuels were known: cold starting was one, and E.C. Freeland and W.G. Harry noted in a chemical society paper that blends of small amounts of ether in alcohol could solve the problem. Another problem was "phase separation," noted above. But the tendency of alcohol and gasoline to separate at lower temperatures in the presence of water could be easily overcome with "binders," and was noted by Thomas Midgely, among others. These were small amounts of additives such as higher-carbon alcohols (such as propyl or butyl alcohol), ethers and / or benzene. Operating practice was also important in dealing with alcohol fuels. Fuel distributors and chemists used anhydrous (low water content) alcohol and avoided storing alcohol-gasoline blends in tanks with water "bottoms." Swedish researcher E. Hubendick said that the danger of separation "can be ignored in my estimation" because even if it did occur, it would never stop the motor in the way that a small amount of water in the gas tank would.

In short, technical research into ethyl alcohol as a fuel ranged from neutral to extremely positive, with very few negative findings. By 1925, an American researcher speaking at the same New York Chemists Club told an audience:

Composite fuels made simply by blending anhydrous alcohol with gasoline have been given most comprehensive service tests extending over a period of eight years. Hundreds of thousands of miles have been covered in standard motor car, tractor, motor boat and aeroplane engines with highly satisfactory results... Alcohol blends easily excel gasoline on every point important to the motorist. The superiority of alcohol gasoline fuels is now safely established by actual experience... [Thus] the future of alcohol motor fuels is largely an economic problem.

Yet in the 1930s, oil industry opponents of alcohol blends in the U.S. claimed that technical problems prohibited their use. "Alcohol is much inferior, gallon for gallon, to gasoline as a motor fuel," claimed the American Petroleum Industries Committee. While admitting there was some anti-knock advantage, the committee said the blends would be "unstable in the presence of small amounts of accidental moisture." The American Petroleum Institute's Conger Reynolds, in a 1939 barb aimed at Henry Ford and the Farm Chemurgy conferences of the 1930s, said:

"With all due deference for the dream chemists, armchair farmers and platform orators who have touted alcohol-gasoline as the greatest of all fuels, oil industry technologists know and automotive engineers know that it is not as satisfactory a fuel as straight gasoline of normal quality."

The context of Reynolds speech to fellow oil men was that of fending off (by his count) 19 federal bills and 31 state bills on alcohol gasoline tax incentives and blending programs between 1933 and 1939. To be forced to use alcohol gasoline would mean giving consumers an inferior fuel at an exorbitant cost, Reynolds said. At the time, the API had virtually no technical data to back up claims of inferiority. The vast bulk of scientific research pointed very much in favor of alcohol blended fuels. That soon changed as industry-sponsored tests found phase separation, cold starting and other problems. Ten years later, British researcher S.J.W. Pleeth would observe:

The bias aroused by the use of alcohol as a motor fuel has produced [research] results that are incompatible with each other ... Countries with considerable oil deposits — such as the U.S. — or which control oil deposits of other lands — such as Holland — tend to produce reports antithetical to the use of fuels alternative to petrol; countries with little or no indigenous oil tend to produce favorable reports. The contrast ... is most marked. One can scarcely avoid the conclusion that the results arrived at are those best suited to the political or economic aims of the country concerned or the industry sponsoring the research. We deplore this partisan use of science, while admitting its existence, even in the present writer.

U.S. Automakers, Alcohol Fuels and Ethyl Leaded Gasoline

Before World War I, U.S. automakers were aware of the potential for alcohol fuel, but given the short-term economic picture, stayed with gasoline and low compression engines. Most popular cars, such as the Ford Model T, had low compression engines, an adjustable carburetor and a spark advance that made it possible to switch from gasoline to alcohol to kerosene as needed. Despite Ford's later support for alcohol fuel in the 1920s and 1930s, the only fuel the company actually handled was "Fordsol," benzene from Ford factory coking operations and regular gasoline. Some early auto manufacturers, such as the Olds Gas Power Company, offered a simple mixer attachment for alcohol and found that "under actual operating conditions... the fuel consumption per horsepower is about the same, pound for pound, whether using alcohol or gasoline." The Hart-Parr Company, a tractor manufacturer based in Charles City, Iowa, commented in 1907: "We have watched with great interest, and added our efforts to help bring about the free use of alcohol for power purposes... Our engine is so constructed that alcohol can be used with very little change ..."

Minneapolis Steel and Machinery Co. began making alcohol engines for tractors in 1909, and with increasing demand for alcohol powered farm equipment after World War I, began intensive studies on a more efficient alcohol engine. "In our opinion alcohol is an ideal fuel," said researcher A.W. Scarratt, because it vaporized at a practically constant temperature and it formed no carbon deposits. "We believe the entire automobile industry should get behind this idea and bring it to pass as quickly as possible so as to provide another source of fuel supply and to bring down the operating costs of all equipment depending now on hydrocarbon fuels."

After World War I, the focus of fuel research shifted into two directions. One research direction led to the discovery of a metallic additive called tetra ethyl lead. The story of how General Motors researchers Thomas Midgley and Charles F. Kettering discovered it has often been told. However, the second research direction into the "fuel of the future" is not well known.

Kettering and Midgley's initial research into fuel involved work on DELCO generators and airplane engines in World War I. In a report on the war research, Midgley wrote: "Engineers have heretofore believed knocking to be the unavoidable result of too high a compression, and while the fact that [ethyl] alcohol did not knock at extremely high compressions was well known, it was [erroneously] attributed to its extremely high ignition point .." The point was generally understood by scientists and military technology experts. For example, a naval committee concluded in 1920 that alcohol gasoline blends "withstand high compression without producing knock."

Kettering, who had become General Motors vice president of research and the president of the Society of Automotive Engineers, noted two directions in fuel research in a 1919 speech to the society. There was, he said, a "high percentage" direction, with blends of up to 20 percent or more of benzene or alcohol; the other was a "low percentage" additive, such as iodine, which was too expensive to be practical but pointed to the possibility of other additives. The low percentage research effort would lead to the discovery of leaded gasoline in 1921.

Around 1920 and 1921, Kettering came to believe that alcohol fuel from renewable resources would be the answer to the compression problem and the possibility of an oil shortage. Along with his British counterpart, H.R. Ricardo, Kettering settled on alcohol as the key to unshackling the internal combustion engine from non-renewable fossil fuels," said historian Stuart Leslie. "Ethanol (ethyl alcohol) never knocked, it could be produced by distilling waste vegetable material, and it was almost pollution-free. Ricardo compared alcohol fuel to living within a man's means, implying that fossil fuels were a foolish squandering of capital."

At Kettering's urging, General Motors began to consider just what would be involved in a total switch from petroleum to alcohol fuel. One G.M. researcher reported that some 46 percent of all foodstuffs would have to be converted to alcohol to replace gasoline on a BTU for BTU basis. In another G.M. study, T.A. Boyd surveyed the steep rise in number of new cars and the increasing difficulty of providing new fuel supplies. The solution, Boyd said, would be to use other fuels, and benzene and alcohol "appear to be very promising allies" to petroleum. Alcohol was the "most direct route ... for converting energy from its source, the sun, into a material that is suitable for a fuel..." Boyd said.

Despite advantages of cleanliness and high antiknock rating, there were supply problems. In 1921, about 100 million gallons of industrial alcohol supply was available. Overall, enough corn, sugar cane and other crops were available to produce almost twice the 8.3 billion gallon per year demand for gasoline. But the possibility of using such a large amount of food acreage for fuel "seems very unlikely," he said. In a speech around 1921, Kettering noted that "industrial alcohol can be obtained from vegetable products ... [but] the present total production of industrial alcohol amounts to less than four percent of the fuel demands, and were it to take the place of gasoline, over half of the total farm area of the United States would be needed to grow the vegetable matter from which to produce this alcohol."

Kettering, Midgley and Boyd apparently framed the question in terms of totally replacing gasoline, although a related goal of the research was to create antiknock additives. It stands to reason that if a 20 percent blend of alcohol were to be used in all fuel, then (using Boyd's figure) only about nine percent of grain and sugar crops would be needed. Since grain was in surplus after the war, American farmers probably would have welcomed a new market for their crop, and the kinds of supply problems in the G.M. and du Pont studies would probably not have materialized. Also, with Prohibition, distillers would have welcomed a new use for their services. Another problem with Kettering's analysis demonstrates a lack of understanding of agriculture and the distilling industry. Grain is not "used" for fuel; it is fed to cattle after it is distilled with no loss in food value. This is as true of brewers' grains from beer distilleries as it is of fuel facilities.

Thus, supply of an additive would not have been the problem that G.M. engineers apparently assumed that it would have been. However, since the original studies on fuel alcohol are missing from the archives, and it is difficult to fathom the reason for their narrow frame of reference. One reasonable explanation is that Kettering, Boyd and Midgley were preoccupied with the long-term replacement of petroleum. In 1920 and 1921 they were not technically or politically opposed to ethyl alcohol as a straight fuel or in blends with gasoline. Kettering spoke out against taxes on alcohol as an impediment to fuel research and helped overcome other obstacles. In 1920, K.W. Zimmerschied of G.M.'s New York headquarters wrote Kettering to note that foreign use of alcohol fuel "is getting more serious every day in connection with export cars, and anything we can do toward building our carburetors so they can be easily adapted to alcohol will be appreciated by all." Kettering assured him that the adaptation "is a thing which is very readily taken care of," and said that G.M. could rapidly change the floats in carburetors from lacquered cork to metal. Midgley also filed a patent application for a blend of alcohol and cracked (olefin) gasoline on February 28, 1920, clearly intending it to be an antiknock fuel.

The problem of the long-term resource base for the fuel of the future continued to worry Kettering and Midgley. At one point they became interested in work on cellulose conversion to fermentable sugar being performed by Prof. Harold Hibbert at Yale University. Hibbert was a visionary, and pointed out that the 1920 U.S.G.S. oil reserve report had serious implications for his work. "Does the average citizen understand what this means?" he asked. "In from 10 to 20 years this country will be dependent entirely upon outside sources for a supply of liquid fuels... paying out vast sums yearly in order to obtain supplies of crude oil from Mexico, Russia and Persia." But chemists might be able to solve the problem, Hibbert said, by converting abundant cellulose waste from farm crops, timber operations and seaweed into ethyl alcohol. In the summer of 1920, Boyd and his family moved to New Haven so that he could study with Hibbert. Boyd found Hibbert impressive but the volume of literature about cellulose hydrolysis and synthesis was overwhelming. When Midgley came east in late July, he was more interested in meeting Standard Oil Co. officials than with Hibbert, and Boyd left without a clear sense of where the cellulose research could go.

Boyd did insist that a source of alcohol "in addition to foodstuffs" must be found, and that the source would undoubtedly be cellulose: "It is readily available, it is easily produced and its supply is renewable." Using it and returning farm crop residues to the soil would not harm soil fertility. But the problem of developing a commercial process for cellulose conversion to alcohol was serious, he had learned in his stay with Hibbert. A ton of wood yielded only 20 gallons of alcohol in the least expensive "weak acid" process, whereas a commercially profitable "weak acid" process would need a yield of at least 50 gallons, and possibly 60 to 65. Such yields had been achieved with the "strong acid" process, but that technology was complex and more expensive. Still, success might be found if the "strong acid" yield could be obtained in a weak acid process, and as a result, "the danger of a serious shortage of motor fuel would disappear," Boyd said. "The great necessity for and the possibilities of such a process justify a large amount of further research."

To promote the idea of alcohol blended fuels among automotive and chemical engineers, Midgley drove a high compression ratio car (7:1) from Dayton to an October, 1921 Society of Automotive Engineers (SAE) meeting in Indianapolis using a 30 percent alcohol blend in gasoline. This was only two months before tetraethyl lead was discovered. "Alcohol has tremendous advantages and minor disadvantages," Midgley told fellow SAE members in a discussion. Advantages included "clean burning and freedom from any carbon deposit... [and] tremendously high compression under which alcohol will operate without knocking... Because of the possible high compression, the available horsepower is much greater with alcohol than with gasoline..." Minor disadvantages included low volatility, difficulty starting, and difficulty in blending with gasoline "unless a binder is used." Another unnamed engineer (probably from G.M., possibly Boyd) noted that a seven and a half percent increase in power was found with the alcohol-gasoline blend "...without producing any 'pink' [knock] in the engine. We have recommended the addition of 10 percent of benzyl [benzene] to our customers who have export trade that uses this type of fuel to facilitate the mixing of the alcohol and gasoline." In a formal part of the presentation, Midgley mentioned the cellulose project. "From our cellulose waste products on the farm such as straw, corn-stalks, corn cobs and all similar sorts of material we throw away, we can get, by present known methods, enough alcohol to run our automotive equipment in the United States," he said. The catch was that it would cost $2 per gallon. However, other alternatives looked even more problematic — oil shale wouldn't work, and coal would only bring in about 20 percent of the total fuel need.

Midgley and Kettering's interest in ethyl alcohol fuel did not fade once tetraethyl lead was discovered as an antiknock in December, 1921. In fact, not only was ethyl alcohol a source of continued interest as an antiknock agent, but more significantly, it was still considered to be the fuel that would eventually replace petroleum. A May, 1922 memo from Midgley to Kettering was a response to a report on alcohol production from the Mexican "century" plant, a desert plant that contains fermentable sugars. Midgley said he was "not impressed" with the process as a way to make motor fuel:

Unquestionably alcohol is the fuel of the future and is playing its part in tropical countries situated similar [sic] to Mexico. Alcohol can be produced in those countries for approximately 7 - 1/2 cents per gallon from many other sources than the century plant, and the quantities which are suggested as possibilities in this report are insignificantly small compared to motor fuel requirements. However, as a distillery for beverage purposes, these gentlemen may have a money making proposition.

Even as chemists tinkered with various processes to produce tetraethyl lead in a nearby lab, Midgley and Boyd continued working on alcohol for fuel. In a June 1922 Society of Automotive Engineers paper, they said:

That the addition of benzene and other aromatic hydrocarbons to paraffin base gasoline greatly reduces the tendency of these fuels to detonate [knock] ... has been known for some time. Also, it is well known that alcohol

... improves the combustion characteristics of the fuel ...The scarcity and high cost of gasoline in countries where sugar is produced and the abundance of raw materials for making alcohol there has resulted in a rather extensive use of alcohol for motor fuel. As the reserves of petroleum in this country become more and more depleted, the use of benzene and particularly of alcohol in commercial motor fuels will probably become greatly extended." (Italics indicate section omitted from printed version).

In September, 1922, Midgley and Boyd wrote that "vegetation offers a source of tremendous quantities of liquid fuel." Cellulose from vegetation would be the primary resource because not enough agricultural grains and other foods were available for conversion into fuel. "Some means must be provided to bridge the threatened gap between petroleum and the commercial production of large quantities of liquid fuels from other sources. The best way to accomplish this is to increase the efficiency with which the energy of gasoline is used and thereby obtain more automotive miles per gallon of fuel." At the time the paper was written, in late spring or early summer 1922, tetraethyl lead was still a secret within the company, but it was about to be announced to fellow scientists and test marketed. The reference to a means to "bridge the threatened gap" and increase in the efficiency of gasoline clearly implies the use of tetraethyl lead or some other additive to pave the way to new fuel sources.

This inference is consistent with an important statement in an unpublished 1936 legal history of Ethyl Gasoline for the du Pont corporation:

It is also of interest to recall that an important special motive for this [tetraethyl lead] research was General Motors' desire to fortify itself against the exhaustion or prohibitive cost of the gasoline supply, which was then believed to be impending in about twenty-five years; the thought being that the high compression motors which should be that time have been brought into general use if knocking could be overcome could more advantageously be switched to [ethyl] alcohol.

Thus, during the time Kettering and Midgley researched anti-knock fuels (1916 to 1925), and especially after tetraethyl lead was discovered in December of 1921, there were two "ethyls" on the horizon for General Motors: Ethyl leaded gasoline, which would serve as a transitional efficiency booster for gasoline, and ethyl alcohol, the "fuel of the future" that would keep America's cars on the roads no matter what happened to domestic or world oil supply. Thus, Kettering's strategy in the post World War I years was to prepare cars for high-octane alternative fuels.

Clearly, G.M. switched gears sometime in 1923 or 1924. When controversy broke out about the public health impacts of leaded gasoline in 1924, Midgley and Kettering told the media, fellow scientists and the government that no alternatives existed. "So far as science knows at the present time," Midgley told a meeting of scientists, "tetraethyl lead is the only material available which can bring about these [antiknock] results, which are of vital importance to the continued economic use by the general public of all automotive equipment, and unless a grave and inescapable hazard exists in the manufacture of tetraethyl lead, its abandonment cannot be justified." And at a Public Health Service conference on leaded gasoline in 1925, Kettering said: "We could produce certain [antiknock] results and with the higher gravity gasolines, the aromatic series of compounds, alcohols, etc... [to] get the high compression without the knock, but in the great volume of fuel of the paraffin series [petroleum] we could not do that." Even though experts like Alice Hamilton of Harvard University insisted that alternatives to leaded gasoline were available, the Public Health Service allowed leaded gasoline to remain on the market in 1926. (Leaded gasoline was banned in 1986 in the U.S. for the same public health concerns that had been expressed 60 years earlier).

Interestingly, Kettering and Midgley came up with another fuel called "Synthol" in the summer of 1925, at a time when the fate of leaded gasoline was in doubt. Synthol was made from alcohol, benzene and a metallic additive — either tetraethyl lead or iron carbonyl. Used in combination with a new high compression engine much smaller than ordinary engines, Synthol would "revolutionize transportation." When Ethyl leaded gasoline was permitted to return to the market in 1926, Kettering and Midgley dropped the Synthol idea.

By the mid-1930s, the alliance between General Motors, DuPont Corp. and Standard Oil to produce Ethyl leaded gasoline succeeded beyond all expectations: 90 percent of all gasoline contained lead. Public health crusaders who found this troubling still spoke out in political forums, but competitors were not allowed to criticize leaded gasoline in the commercial marketplace. In a restraining order forbidding such criticism, the Federal Trade Commission said Ethyl gasoline "is entirely safe to the health of [motorists] and to the public in general when used as a motor fuel, and is not a narcotic in its effect, a poisonous dope, or dangerous to the life or health of a customer, purchaser, user or the general public."

Direct comparison between leaded gasoline and alcohol blends proved so controversial in the 1920s and 1930s that government studies were kept quiet or not published. For instance, a Commerce Department report dated May 15, 1925 detailed dozens of instances of alcohol fuel use worldwide. The report was printed only five days before the Surgeon General's hearing on Ethyl leaded gasoline. Yet it was never mentioned in the news media of the time, or in extensive bibliographies on alcohol fuel by Iowa State University researchers compiled in the 1930s. Another instance of a "buried" government report was that of U.S.D.A. and Navy engine tests, conducted at the engineering experiment station in Annapolis. Researchers found that Ethyl leaded gasoline and 20 percent ethyl alcohol blends in gasoline were almost exactly equivalent in terms of brake horsepower and useful compression ratios. The 1933 report was never published.

International Use of Alcohol Fuels, 1920s and 30s

By the mid-1920s ethyl alcohol was routinely blended with gasoline in every industrialized nation except the United States. Ten to twenty five percent alcohol blends with gasoline were common in Scandinavian countries, where alcohol was made from paper mill wastes; in France, Germany and throughout continental Europe, where alcohol was made from surplus grapes, potatoes and other crops; and in Australia, Brazil, Cuba, Hawaii, the Philippians, South Africa, and other tropical regions, where it was made from sugar cane and molasses. In some countries, especially France, gasoline retailers were required to blend in large volumes of alcohol with all gasoline sold. Germany, Brazil and others also followed the "mandatory blending" model. In other countries, such as Sweden, Ireland and Britain, alcohol blends received tax advantages.

In France, insecure supplies of oil during World War I led to a research program at the Pasteur Institute on sources of alcohol, including marine biomass sources like kelp. Continued research by a national fuels committee appointed in 1921 led to a recommendations of a national fuel consisting of 40 to 50 percent alcohol, and on Feb. 28, 1923, "Article 6" required gasoline importers to buy at alcohol from a state monopoly at a volume of at least 10 percent of their gasoline imports. "Article 7" provided a five-Franc per hectoliter tax on gasoline to help subsidize the alcohol monopoly. The blend, often reaching as much as 50 percent in some fuels, was not well accepted by consumers who were using engines which were specifically adapted to gasoline. At a minimum, carburetor settings needed to be changed to allow a greater fuel volume when the percentage of alcohol in the gasoline rose above 20 to 30 percent, and bitter complaints flowed in from motor clubs and garages. Amendments to the law in 1926 and 1931 helped create a more workable blend, and alcohol fuel use rose from 7.8 million gallons per year in 1925 to 20 million gallons in 1932.

Although the French government was initially one of the most enthusiastic toward alcohol, by 1932 so many other nations had surpassed the French effort that one proponent explained the "slowness" in reviving alcohol fuels use. It "is due in part to the poor results obtained when such fuels were first introduced and also to the casting of discredit upon such fuels by its adversaries who profit in the fuel business," said Charles Schweitzer, a research chemist in the Melle complex. Schweitzer also noted that alcohol was far preferable to leaded gasoline from a public health standpoint.

National initiatives were also under way in Britain, Italy and Germany, and tax incentives were passed in all three nations to encourage the use of alcohol or alcohol blended fuels.

In England, a Departmental Committee on Industrial Alcohol reported in 1905 that alcohol from potatoes would be more expensive than gasoline, even though farmers wanted an alcohol industry built to absorb crop surpluses. In 1915 "agitation" for an alcohol industry was noted. A Fuel Research Board experimented with alcohol production between 1917 and 1924, and reported that while economics of traditional crops were marginal, novel crops like Jerusalem artichokes might be useful. "The most economical source [of alcohol] may be found ultimately in some of the luxuriant tropical growths within the Empire," an article in SAE Journal said. Even so, it continued attention to power alcohol was important. "Looking at the fuel question very broadly, the dominant fact is that almost all the fuel supplies at present used are what lawyers call wasting securities... As mineral fuels grow dearer, the advantage of fuels of vegetable origin must become accentuated." By the 1930s, two major blends of up to 30 percent alcohol — Cleveland Discoll (part owned by Standard Oil of New Jersey) and Cities Service — were widely used. Discoll continued to be used until the 1970s.

German firms such as I.G. Farben had by the early 1920s come up with a process for making synthetic methanol from coal, a development which was widely reported in the popular and technical press. Observing the synthesis of methanol and other fuels, the editor of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry said: "We do not predict that these will necessarily be the fuels to supplement our diminishing petroleum reserves ... But who shall say? The field is new and the opportunities are correspondingly great." The German ethyl alcohol monopoly of the pre-World War I (the Centrale fur Spiritus Verwerthung) had apparently fallen apart in the post-war chaos, but in September, 1926 a commercial fuel called "Monopolin" was introduced and "favorably received due to its anti-knock qualities." The fuel, which included I.G. Farben's octane-boosting iron carbonyl additive, was endorsed by a famous race car driver of the era, Herbert Ernst, and alcohol use in fuel climbed from a quarter million gallons in 1923 to 46 million gallons in 1932. In 1930 gasoline importers were required to buy from 2.5 to 6 percent alcohol relative to their gasoline import volumes, but around 1933, I.G.

Farben and several oil companies acquired 51 percent of Monopolin. Production of alcohol did not diminish, but climbed by 1937 to about 52 million gallons per year as part of Hitler's war preparations.

In Italy, the first Congress of Industrial Chemistry which took place in April 1924 focused strongly on fuel problems, with a large percentage of the papers concerned with alcohol fuels. A strong scientific endorsement of the idea of using surplus crops in the national fuel mix led to a national decree on mandatory use of alcohol fuels in 1925. Several oil companies initially refused to blend alcohol with gasoline, but government pressures prevailed. By the late 1920s blends included Benzalcohol (20% ethanol and 10% benzene) and Robur (30% ethanol, 22% methanol, 40% gasoline and other additives). Other nations, such as Hungary, Poland, and Brazil would follow the French and Italian examples with mandatory alcohol and gasoline blends in national fuels in the 1920s and 30s, while the tax incentive approach was adopted by many other European nations such as Switzerland, Sweden, Germany and Czechoslovakia.

The total use of alcohol as a substitute fuel in Europe may have never exceeded five percent, according to the American Petroleum Institute. Synthetic gasoline and benzene created by I.G. Farben from coal substituted for seven percent and 6.5 percent respectively of European petroleum by 1937. Synthetic gasoline was cheaper (at 17 to 19 cents per gallon) than alcohol at around 25 cents per gallon, API said.

In tropical nations where sugarcane was abundant and petroleum sources distant, blends and straight alcohol fuels were common. A tractor operator for American Sugar Co. in Cuba in the 1921-24 period recalled using cheap molasses derived alcohol by the barrel at a time when gasoline was expensive to import. The practice was to start the tractors with gasoline (which cost 40 to 50 cents per gallon) and then run them on alcohol (at 5 cents per gallon) for the rest of the day. When the tractors were to be idled over a weekend or between harvests, a little gasoline was injected into the cylinders to minimize corrosion. In 1931 the Brazilian government followed the French example and required alcohol mixtures in five percent of imported oil; blending continued sporadically through the 1950s. When the oil price shocks hit Brazil in the 1970s, the relatively recent technological expertise with alcohol fuel blends was a factor in that nation's adoption of an extensive alcohol fuels program.

Alcohol use in fuel dropped by 25 percent in 1937 as Europe shifted gears and prepared for war. Crop failures in 1938 and 1939 eliminated surpluses and, temporarily, the need for an alcohol fuels program for farmers. With the outbreak of World War II, virtually all industrial alcohol production shifted to ammunition, and crop surpluses disappeared for a decade.

U.S. Commercial Alcohol Fuels Programs

Alcohol blended fuel was adopted in isolated instances in America during the 1920s and early 1930s. One World War I era American blend was "Alcogas." Little is known about it, although a photo of a service station at an unknown location survives and references to Alcogas are found in the technical literature. Another 1920s blend was made from potatoes. The alcohol was distilled in Spokane and the blended fuel, called "Vegaline," was widely sold in Idaho and Washington state. "There was no apparent difference in the operation of the vehicle whether it was fueled by the Standard Oil pump or the Vegaline pump," said Ralph Curtis, a Washington resident. Curtis' great-grandfather was an enthusiastic investor in Vegaline. "He would tell us that by adding this alcohol to gasoline that the farmers of our area would benefit. His theory was that production of the alcohol would not be limited to cull potatoes but [could include] other unmarketable fruits and vegetables." The Vegaline plant was caught up in the great depression of 1929 and closed its doors.

An apparently formative experience for the oil industry was Standard Oil's attempt to market a 10 percent alcohol blend in Baltimore for a few months in 1923. At the time, industrial alcohol from molasses was selling for less than 20 cents per gallon, while retail gasoline prices had reached an all-time high of 28 cents per gallon. But "difficulties" stopped the experiment, according to a cryptic 1933 internal memo of the American Petroleum Institute's "Special Technical Committee" on alcohol fuels. The memo did not refer to Standard itself, but said that a major company had experienced the difficulties. A 1939 publication would later identify Standard as the company in question. All that is known about the difficulties is that they were "largely were of a marketing and car operating nature and resulted from the instability of the alcohol-gasoline in the presence of water." Standard apparently did not clean out its fuel storage tanks and viewed the resulting "problem" as a difficulty inherent in using the fuel rather than in the fuel handling system. Standard did not document the experiment or publicize its results. No reference to it is found in the Baltimore Sun during this period. However, the American Petroleum Institute used this single incident as a technical justification for opposition to alcohol blended fuels in the 1930s.

Alcogas, Vegaline and other sporadic attempts to market an alcohol blended fuel never caught on in the 1920s, due to primarily to economic disadvantages but also to Prohibition and opposition by the oil industry. By the 1930s, with the country caught in the depths of the Great Depression, new ideas were welcome. Corn prices had dropped from 45 cents per bushel to 10 cents, it was only natural that people in Midwestern business and science would begin thinking about new uses for farm products, and indeed, alcohol fuel turned out to be the most controversial of these proposals. The battle between U.S. farmers and the oil industry in the 1930s over alcohol fuel has been reviewed by Giebelhaus and Bernton but aspects of this tumultuous debate has yet to be fully explored.

Many scientists, businessmen and farmers believed that to make their own fuel would help put people back to work and ease the severe problems of the Depression. Nearly three dozen bills to subsidize alcohol fuel were taken up in eight states in the 1930s. Most of the subsidy proposals involved forgiveness of state sales taxes. Not surprisingly, the incentives had the most support in the central farm states such as Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois and South Dakota. Legislation did pass in Nebraska and South Dakota, but the tax break passed by the Iowa legislature was struck down by the state supreme court. The Nebraska legislature also petitioned the U.S. Congress for a law making 10 percent ethyl alcohol blending mandatory throughout the U.S. This proposal, along with a national tax incentive and other pro-alcohol bills, were defeated in Congress in the 1930s.

The thinking behind these proposals had little to do with energy substitution. Rather, it was "a form of farm relief and not energy relief," said Ralph Hixon, who along with Leo Christensen and others in Iowa State University's chemistry department, had been testing blends of alcohol and gasoline. "We found that it was one of the very best fuels, it gave a performance greater than Ethyl," Hixon said. The Ames chemists worked with local gasoline retailers to put a 10 percent alcohol blend with gasoline on sale in Ames service stations in 1932. The alcohol-gasoline pump at the Square Deal stations operated until the late 1930s, and the blend sold for 17 cents. It was "in competition with Ethyl," which also sold for 17 cents at the same stations. Some 200,000 gallons of Agricultural Blended Motor Fuel were eventually sold in an Iowa campaign in the early 1930s.

Similar efforts, not as well backed up with research and documentation, broke out all over the Midwest. In Lincoln, Nebraska, the University of Nebraska and the Earle Coryell gasoline company marketed several hundred thousand gallons of "Corn Alcohol Gasoline Blend." In Peoria, Illinois, the Illinois Agricultural Association teamed up with Keystone Steel & Wire Co. and Hiram Walker distillery to produce half a million gallons of "HiBall" and "Alcolene" blended fuels. In Yankton, South Dakota, Gurney Oil Co. marketed 200,000 gallons of blended fuel.

After legislative setbacks in 1933, the movement for alcohol fuels then came to be seen as part of a broader campaign for industrial uses for farm crops to help fight the Depression. It was called "farm chemurgy," and it was, in part, a populist Republican alternative to Democratic President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's agricultural policies. Henry Ford backed the idea by sponsoring a conference at Dearborn, Mich. in 1935. The conference created the National Farm Chemurgic Council, and annual conferences followed.

Another key supporter of the farm chemurgy concept was the Chemical Foundation, quasi-federal agency which administered German patent royalties as part of reparations for World War I. The Chemical Foundation, with Ford's blessing, decided in 1936 to finance an experimental alcohol manufacturing and blending program in the Midwest. The chemurgy movement, with alcohol fuel as a controversial centerpiece, had far outstripping original legislative proposals and had grown into an unprecedented mixture of agronomy, chemistry and Prairie Populism. Many felt that the time had come to compete directly with the oil industry. By 1937 motorists from Indiana to South Dakota were urged to use Agrol, an ethyl alcohol blend with gasoline. Two types were available — Agrol 5, with five to seven percent alcohol, and Agrol 10, with twelve and a half to 17 and a half percent alcohol. "Try a tank full — you'll be thankful," the Agrol brochures said. The blend was sold to high initial enthusiasm at 2,000 service stations. However, Agrol plant managers complained of sabotage and bitter infighting by the oil industry, and market prices were also a major influence. Although Agrol sold for the same price as its "main competitor," leaded gasoline, it cost wholesalers and retailers an extra penny to handle it and cut into their profit "spread," Business Week said. "Novelty appeal plus ballyhoo provided sufficient increase in gallonage to offset the difference in spread. Now jobbers and dealers, having done their share, are again plugging the old house brands with four and a half cent spreads. Agrol is in the last pump — for those who want it."

By 1939, the Atchison Agrol plant closed its doors, not in bankruptcy, but without viable markets to continue. The experiment had failed, but it was not the end of the story. As war broke out two years later, California assembly considered a motion to create an auxiliary fuel from surplus fruits and vegetables. President Franklin Roosevelt wrote the speaker of the assembly and said:

While it is true that a number of foreign countries process agricultural materials for the production of alcohol as a motor fuel, it is equally true that the motor fuel economy of countries possessing no petroleum resources is very different from such economy in the United States. It has never been established in this country that the conversion of agricultural products into motor fuel is economically feasible or necessary for national defense. On the other hand, it has been recognized for a long time that a real need exists in this country for the development of all the information possible on this very contentious subject..."

Roosevelt's intense political feud with the Republican forces who backed chemurgy, and especially with Sen. Guy Gillette over the Supreme Court issue in the late 1930s, would have led him to oppose virtually anything that the Midwestern Republicans advanced, but Roosevelt's judgment was premature. Several months later, as war industry plans were accelerated, the need for alcohol became apparent. Within two years, chemists and agricultural engineers from Midwestern universities who had tried their alcohol production ideas at the Agrol plant would be mass producing enormous quantities of ethyl alcohol for synthetic "Buna-S" rubber and for aviation fuel. From a pre-war peak production of 100 million gallons of alcohol per year, well over 600 million gallons of new capacity was created. The alcohol based system which in 1942 seemed capable of providing only one-third of the raw materials for the total synthetic rubber demand ended up supplying three quarters and making a significant impact on the war effort. The Agrol experience had clearly helped pave the way for this war effort, in terms of providing trained personnel, novel techniques and a history of mistakes to avoid. The resilience and flexibility of agricultural systems was well demonstrated, the chemists believed, because petroleum based synthetic rubber technologies owned by Standard and the German chemical company I.G. Farben had faltered at the critical moment. Without the previous experience in alcohol fuels production in the 1930s, the war effort might have been considerably delayed.

The Agrol experiences and the mass production of alcohol for war industries were also recalled in the 1970s, when the conventional wisdom recognized only coal and nuclear power as alternatives to embargoed Middle Eastern oil. In contrast, it was clear at the end of World War II that eventually U.S. oil reserves would be depleted. According to the U.S. Tariff Commission in 1944:

When a certain point in costs has been reached, several methods of meeting the situation will be available: These include: increased importation of petroleum; more complete recovery of domestic petroleum from the ground by various so-called secondary methods; conversion of natural gas into gasoline; extraction of oil from shale; synthesis of oil from coal; domestic production of alcohol from vegetable materials; and foreign production of such alcohol.

Oil Industry Opposition to Ethyl Alcohol Fuel

The onset of interest in alcohol fuel in 1933 caught the oil industry off guard, but once alarmed, it reacted swiftly. The American Petroleum Institute urged formation of state level "emergency committees" in the spring of 1933 to oppose proposals for tax incentives. In a set of memos sent under a red cover marked "IMPORTANT," API introduced a "coordinated program to be connected throughout the industry" to combat alcohol gasoline blending. The memo explained the threat: compulsory blend of alcohol and gasoline, as was used in France, Italy and Germany in the 1920s and early 30s, "will harm the petroleum industry and the automobile industry as well as state and national treasuries by reducing [oil] consumption," the memo said. The only ones to benefit would be distillers, railroads (which would transport the alcohol) and bootleggers "to whom would be opened brand new fields of fraud."

API's campaign was waged across many states, especially the Midwest, in the spring of 1933, and at the federal level for most of the 1930s. Technical experts in the oil industry claimed that alcohol fuel blends "are definitely inferior to gasoline alone from every angle of motor performance." Editorials by Lowell Thomas and other radio announcers paid for by oil industry sponsors claimed that alcohol fuel would make "speakeasies" out of gasoline stations because bootleggers could easily separate out the gasoline and sell the alcohol. Thomas said: "The automobile manufacturer resents it [alcohol] because it interferes with the horsepower of the motorists car, requires extensive carburetor changes and presents other difficulties..." (In fact, this might be true of pure alcohol but not alcohol blends with gasoline). Thomas' radio address was recorded in a cable sent from Sun Oil Co.'s J. Howard Pew to H.D. Collier, president of Standard Oil Co. of California, on April 26, 1933. "Confirming telephone conversation reference alcohol blend our radio announcement was as follows quote..." When an apparently large number of critical telegrams poured in, Sun took pains to distance Thomas from "our radio announcement," even writing a "suggested reply to Congressman Dirksen" in which Thomas was to say "This is news and not propaganda, which I myself nor my sponsors would for a moment tolerate over the air." The suggested reply was unsigned but written on stationary clearly showing the Sunoco watermark. It was not clear whether Thomas actually sent the suggested reply.

Other tactics involved private investigations of politicians and businessmen who supported alcohol blends. Sun Oil Co. investigated the private lives of the directors of Keystone Steel and Wire Co. and others.¹⁵³ Then-Congressman Everett Dirksen, who supported Keystone, wrote constituents that he was being investigated by unknown people. "Here you have the proof of how the insidious oil lobby works in order to defeat any measure or any individual who opposes their interests," Dirksen said.

Officials from Standard Oil of Indiana and the Ethyl Corp. exchanged worried letters about the outbreak of interest in alcohol blends in the winter of 1933. Standard's chief lawyer wrote Ethyl president Earle Webb: "Much publicity has gone through the state to the effect that alcohol mixed with gasoline makes a motor fuel high in anti-knock rating and the move has been to require gasoline to contain a high percentage of alcohol (manufactured locally, of course) or pay a high state tax. Manifestly this would materially interfere with the use of Ethyl in Iowa... Let me know what you are doing or intend to do, and to what extent we can cooperate." Webb wrote back: "I entirely agree that proposed legislation of this character is apt to have a serious termination and that almost anything may happen where there is so much discontent. We would very much appreciate being kept informed as to developments." By April, 1933, Standard was apparently worried about anti-trust laws, and wired Ethyl: "Believe absolutely necessary Ethyl Gasoline Corp. avoid any public opposition or any such direct action."

Also in the 1930s, as Ethyl's marketing power grew, the company began to enforce what it considered to be "business ethics" on the market. Ethyl refused to grant dealer contracts to certain gasoline wholesalers, and often provided no formal explanation for their actions. The exclusion of "unethical" businessmen was especially aimed at those who cut prices, but it was a means of excluding from the entire fuel market any wholesaler who adopted practices which the oil industry disliked. Since wholesalers had to carry a wide range of products to survive, and since advertising had created enormous consumer demand for Ethyl, to be denied an Ethyl contract was in effect to be forced out of business. Most wholesalers could not or would not tell the Federal Bureau of Investigation why Ethyl would consider them unethical, but at least one wholesaler, the Earl Coryell company of Lincoln, Nebraska, blended ethyl alcohol about the same time that it could not get an Ethyl license. Pressure to stick with Ethyl led gasoline exclusively rather than try alcohol fuel blends would have been quite strong with this enforcement mechanism at the oil industry's disposal, but it is difficult to estimate how many gasoline dealers wanted to use alcohol instead of lead. In 1940 the U.S. Supreme Court upheld an anti-trust verdict against Ethyl, but by then, the Midwestern alcohol fuel movement had disintegrated.

Clearly, the tactics used by the oil industry involved more than simple marketplace competition and public relations in response to the prospect of legislative controls. Yet economic issues and assumptions are at the heart of the dispute and deserve careful consideration.

Economics of Alcohol Fuel

Alcohol fuel has never been economically attractive as a straight gallon for gallon substitute for gasoline. When alcohol fuel returned to the American market in 1907 at a retail price of 32 cents per gallon, it was competing with gasoline at 18 to 22 cents per gallon. This roughly one-third advantage has been the rule for most of the 20th century in the U.S. In 1933, grain alcohol cost 25 cents per gallon wholesale as opposed to gasoline at 10 to 13 cents per gallon wholesale. Despite attempts to make alcohol from cheaper materials (such as wood waste and cellulose), the cost differential has been the most serious obstacle to the widespread use of alcohol fuel and, according to some historians, the primary focus of most oil industry resistance to its use.

Modern researchers have noted that the value of alcohol as a fuel depends on whether it is considered a gasoline substitute or an octane enhancer. "If refiners turn to using alcohols as octane enhancers as lead phase down occurs, there may be sufficient demand to warrant the capital outlay required for production facilities, in which case the market value of alcohol fuels would become much greater," according to the Canadian Energy Research Institute.

Although T.A. Boyd and Thomas Midgley of Ethyl found ethyl alcohol to be a good anti-knock additive in 1922, it was not until 1933 that studies at Iowa State University publicly quantified the quality and economic comparisons between ethyl alcohol and Ethyl lead. Hixon and others concluded that it took 15 percent alcohol to create the octane boost of 3 grams of lead, as seen in the table below. Since Ethyl lead sold at a 3 cent premium over regular gasoline, the question was whether ethyl alcohol blends, with the same anti-knock / octane advantage, should not be sold at the same premium price. Proponents of alcohol blended fuels insisted that this — and not the "extender" use of alcohol — was the proper basis of comparison.

Table I: How Agriculture Compared Ethyl Leaded Gasoline and Ethyl Alcohol

Fuel	Octane Number	Increase	Wholesale Price*
Base fuel	56	—	10
Base fuel plus 3 grams lead	68	12	13
Base fuel plus 10 % ethyl alcohol	65	9	11.5
Base fuel plus 20 % ethyl alcohol	80	24	13

*Wholesale price; assumes 25 cents per gallon for ethyl alcohol and 10 cents per gallon for gasoline purchased from jobber in Midwest.

Note substitution of base fuel with 10 percent ethyl alcohol means 9 cents worth of gasoline added to 2.5 cents worth of alcohol. Substitution of 20 percent ethyl alcohol is 8 cents gasoline + 5 cents alcohol = 13.

Also note: Iowa State included a half-cent per gallon blending charge for the two alcohol blended fuels. Data from: Iowa State College, The Use of Alcohol In Motor Fuels, Progress Report Number III, Divs. of Industrial Science, Engineering, Agriculture; Jan. 20, 1933. Also: Rayburn D. Tousley, "The Economics of Industrial Alcohol," Washington State Univ., 1945.

The oil industry did not use the same economic yardsticks in comparing the costs of alcohol fuel blends, although they did incorporate the same half cent per gallon blending charge used by the Iowa State researchers. According to one pamphlet, alcohol cost five to ten times more than gasoline, depending on the price of corn, and had technical problems. "Seeing that alcohol fuels cannot compete with gasoline on a price or quality basis ... huge sums of money [are] now being spent on a nationwide propaganda campaign to convince the American people that alcohol gasoline would bring permanent prosperity to farmers." The "Alky-Gas" scheme "robs Peter to pay Paul," that is, it takes money from motorists to pay for farm relief. It would be cheaper just to pay farmers to burn their corn.

Table II: How the Oil Industry Saw Alcohol Fuel Economics

Fuel	Cost
Total cost gasoline one gallon	13.5 cents
Compared with:
Base gasoline 9/10 gal.	12.1 cents
Ethyl alcohol 1/10 gal (at 39.3 cents/gallon)	3.9 cents
Total cost 10 % alcohol-gasoline blend	16 cents

Notes: All prices before taxes. Source "Who would Pay for Corn Alcohol?" Iowa Petroleum Commission pamphlet, 1935, American Petroleum Institute library, Washington, D.C.

Perhaps the most extreme example of the oil industry's argument is illustrated by a letter from Joseph Pew of Sun Oil Co. to an alcohol fuels proponent. Pew said that alcohol had 60 percent the BTU value of gasoline, and it would only be worth 60 percent of the value of gasoline. To a refinery, gasoline was worth only 6 cents per gallon. Thus, alcohol would have to cost only 3.6 cents per gallon to compete with gasoline, and even then there would still be the expense of having it transported to the refinery. "I figure it isn't worth more than a cent" per gallon, Pew said.

The differences in these economic assumptions demonstrate that the debate over alcohol fuel that broke out in the Midwest in the 1930s depended greatly on the viewpoint of the company or individual. In essence, political conditions shaped the marketplace and the new competition faced a difficult economic playing field heavily tilted toward established industries.

Conclusion

Alcohol fuels as anti-knock blending agents were well known long before tetraethyl lead was discovered in 1921, and their technical qualities had been well characterized by scientists in the U.S. and in Europe by 1925. The experience in other nations with alcohol blended fuels was usually (although not universally) quite positive. Practical techniques were well known to overcome most problems with alcohol as a pure fuel or in blends with gasoline. Fuel blends were economically successful in countries where oil was more expensive or where independence in fuel supply was seen as a political or strategic problem.

Alcohol fuels advocacy among American farmers was present in the 1906 - 1908 period and again in the 1930s. Scientists and engineers in the U.S. and Europe ranged from neutral to enthusiastic about the clean burning, high compression characteristics of alcohol fuel, yet the U.S. oil industry claimed it was technically inferior. Charles Kettering and his General Motors researchers were particularly interested in alcohol from cellulose in the 1919 - 1925 time frame, and saw Ethyl leaded gasoline as paving the way for the "fuel of the future" by providing a temporary octane boost and allowing engine compression ratios to increase. In 1924, however, G.M. allied itself with Standard Oil, creating the Ethyl Corp. Shortly afterwards, G.M. researchers contradicted years of their own research and hundreds of other studies by claiming that only tetra ethyl lead could produce anti-knock results.

If there is an historical lesson to learn from the "fuel of the future," it is that technology is often political. In this case, fuel technology developed in a direction that was a matter of policy choice and not predetermined by any clear advantage of one technology over another. For different reasons, Henry Ford and Charles Kettering both saw the fuel of the future as a blend of ethyl alcohol and gasoline leading to pure alcohol from cellulose. A dedicated agrarian, Ford thought new markets for fuel feedstocks would help create a rural renaissance. On the other hand, Kettering, as a scientist, was worried about the long term problem of the automotive industry's need for oil, a resource with rapidly declining domestic reserves. Clearly, the shortage of domestic oil that was feared in the 1920s has occurred in the late 20th century, although it has hardly been noticed because of the abundance of foreign oil. Whether the oil substitute envisioned by the scientists and agrarians of the first half of the century would be appropriate in the latter half remains an open question.

"Many years may be necessary before the actual development of such a [fuel] substitute," Kettering concluded. There was always the possibility, according to Kettering's friend Charles Stewart Mott, "that if a time ever came when the sources of [fossil] heat and energy were ever used up... that there would always be available the capturing of... energy from the sun... through agricultural products..."

20110426-02	11:56	Ben	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
-------------	-------	-----	---

Dear SteveB,

I don't do "Mail this to twenty of your friends" stuff. It's usually cr*p. But I agree this time that having this stuff in one's head is a first step to achieving it, unlikely as it ever may be.

My brother Mike sent me this. I have sanitized the headers by copying and pasting the message into a new mail, and submit it as a pretty sane set of ideas—none new, but a nice collection.

I cannot help but add comments, though.

In answer to his question—"Is this possible?"—sure, it's possible. I give it about a 3% chance. Maybe less. Like it or not, a majority of both houses would have to PASS it before it could become law.

I'd add:

9. Law degree exempts those seeking office from eligibility to server in the Congress of the United States of America but that's probably wishing for too much. I grant that someone who has studied law might have lots to contribute in writing it, but the concentration of lawyers in Congress also institutes a powerful and non-representative lobby, inherently. No occupation or philosophy should dominate Congress intrinsically.

Personally, I'd also be happy to change 6 to read:

6. The congressional health care system shall be made available to all citizens.

or

6. The congressional health care system shall be Medicare, with the same benefits afforded current Medicare-eligible citizens. Medicare will be made available at cost to U.S. citizens as an alternative to private for-profit carriers. Children (under 21) whose citizen parents do not have insurance are covered by Medicare until they reach majority.

Still wishing for too much. (I'd LOVE to see those congresspersons trying to figure out their prescription drug benefits...) (There is no need to comment on my comments; I leave Mike's list, below, unchanged.)

So we will leave it as it is. If we were to get what's already on the list, it would be huge.

from MikeT, Apr. 26, 2011:

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Please consider forwarding, if you agree. I have cleaned this e-mail of all other names, sending it to you in hopes that you will keep it going and keep it clean. This is something I believe in and I hope you all read it all the way through.

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified! Why? Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971...before computers, before e-mail, before cell phones, etc. Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven (7) took 1 year or less to become the law of the land...all because of public pressure

I'm asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise. In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. Term Limits. 12 years only. One of the following:

- A. Two six-year Senate terms.
- B. Six two-year House terms.
- C. One six-year Senate term and three Two-Year House terms.

[I believe this should apply to the President also. It's only fair. So a President could serve three four-year terms. —SteveB]

2. No Tenure / No Pension. A Congressman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.

3. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, and Congress participates with the American people.

4. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.

5. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.

6. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.

7. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.

8. All contracts with past and present Congressmen are void effective 1/1/11. The American people did not make these contracts with Congressmen. Congressmen made all these contracts for themselves.

[I guess I have to admit to not knowing [what contracts they're so worried about here that they want to etch them into the bleeding Constitution. Lobbying contracts? Contracts for crony companies? Contracts with the U.S. government? What about Fred Thompson's laxative or whatever-they-are commercials—Scooters? Penn Life? Life Alert? Are they saying he couldn't do that anymore? Why not? —SteveB]

Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

If each person contacts a minimum of twenty people then it will only take three days for most people (in the U.S.) to receive the message. Maybe it is time. LET'S FIX CONGRESS!!!! If you agree, pass it on. If not, just delete. You are one of my 20+. Please keep it going.

20110426-03	15:28	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Ben,

Well...I'm not against term limits. If it's fair for the President, it should be fair for the legislature, though there is a fairly long learning curve to becoming a good legislator. But, since you're going to have to amend the Constitution, why not get creative?

Maybe the President and all legislators should simply be elected to one and only one seven year term (staggered for Congress). Then no time would be wasted trying to get reelected. There would be less opportunity for "big money" to corrupt the process with huge campaign contributions requiring pay-back.

But, while we're at it, I think there are several more Constitutional amendments that would make me more comfortable and the country better and safer (in no particular order):

1. The Right to Privacy should be spelled out so that it can never be taken away by some future Supreme Court. But there should be a rock-solid national identification card for all citizens and rock-solid green cards for legal immigrants for people to be able to access government services of all kinds, including education, welfare, healthcare, and voting.
2. The separation of church and state should be embedded in an amendment.
3. The right of being "innocent until proven guilty" should be in there.
4. Any and all campaign contributions, given in any way, greater than $100 (adjusted for inflation) should be illegal.
5. No CEO, chairman, or officer should be able to make more than 100 times what is paid to the lowest-paid employee of the company.
6. Unions need a guarantee of the right to exist, organize and negotiate. Any alternative is a form of slavery. If corporations are people, so are unions, and cannot be aborted.
7. No employer can hire illegal immigrants or they face stiff penalties. And no illegal immigrants or tourists have the right to any government benefits, nor do they have the right to give birth to American citizens.
8. Mary Jane should be decriminalized, regulated, and taxed.
9. Except in the direst of emergencies, (probably only in the cases of declared war or severe, years-long recession or depression) federal budgets must be balanced. The printing press must be shut-down. This would be phased-in over a few years.
10. Free trade must be a thing of the past. All foreign goods produced for a lower labor cost and lower environmental protection cost than American-produced goods must have a sales or value added tax imposed upon them at their Point of Sale equal to the difference in these costs. This will create a level playing field and allow American manufacturing to recover. If they want to do the same thing to our exported goods, so be it.
11. Lobbying and the swinging doors between government regulatory agencies and company work must be made illegal.

12. Spell-out the rights of corporations and how they are different than people. (The wording must be designed to give lower status to corporate entities.)

And, though not possible as a Constitutional amendment, we have to do something NOW about the energy and health care crises.

20110426-04 17:23 Ben Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear SteveB,

I like all your stuff. However, the list is far less likely even than the one I forwarded to you ever to be passed by Congress. What I forwarded probably has a better chance. Very marginally better, but—better.

You are an idealistic old dog. We bark much alike. By the way... shouldn't that be "most dire"???

20110426-05 17:30 SteveB How to Stop Oil Market Speculation

Another action needed, though not a Constitutional amendment:

To prevent speculators from driving up the cost of oil, food, and other commodities: Anyone who buys a commodity future contract must actually take delivery of that commodity or pay a stiff fine. This way, only legitimate buyers can realistically make purchases. This rule would need to be implemented in all American, then all foreign commodity futures markets.

All legitimate buyers would be 100% for this measure. Sellers will have to take what they can get. Buyers vastly outnumber sellers.

20110426-06 17:41 Ben Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

from SteveB:

Term limits won't solve our problems. Only campaign finance reform has any chance at all.

Dear SteveB,

I think both have a role to play, if either ever gets a chance...

20110427-01 07:49 SteveB Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear Ben,

We and many countries have had good government without term limits. No good government can exist anywhere when it can be bought and sold! Term limits or not.

The difference in the helpfulness of the two is night and day. Why waste time with an amendment that doesn't solve the problem? Our problem is corruption. Nothing else.

When are people going to get it? Why else would the Dems and Repubs be so similar in policies actually implemented? They both are owned by the rich!

20110427-02 09:54 SteveB Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear Ben,

The subject of term limits is a diversionary tactic to sap energy and keep people from demanding the right actions!

You know, I thought Donald Trump was an idiot...talking about Obama not being born in Hawaii, etc. But, this morning, he gave a press conference espousing almost all of my ideas. At least somebody is finally listening. Maybe he can affect the subjects of the dialogue.

20110427-03 18:01 Paula Re: Photos of Trees

Dear SteveB,

Yes, this is all too sad to see the large trees being cut down. We are trying to do our part, at least. When Brent lived in California, we visited Muir Woods frequently. In their gift shop we purchased two baby sequoias that were said to be able to grow back here in Ohio. So we have them, a year later, still surviving and in fact they have doubled in size. In a few years, they are supposed to grow a foot a year. Perhaps our grandchildren will sit under their shade. Being part of Arbor Day Foundation, I receive trees each year. I have been pretty lucky with their growth and have 8 dogwood (one is now 15 feet tall), two redbud probably almost 20 feet tall, two pear trees, and a chestnut all getting quite big. As part of earth day in 1990, two of our kids planted Douglas fir saplings. These trees are now two stories tall. We have planted trees at church, in local parks, and at a community college near us. (since the twins birthday is also Earth Day, they are extra fond of this) We still have the four pin oaks which were here when we moved in. they are over 200 feet tall, we have them deep root fertilized and trimmed regularly (the last time an Amish family did it and it was quite a sight as they used many ropes) I have 30 saplings in the ground now ready to be transplanted. We gave my sister a beautiful magnolia in memory of her son... Trees have always been very dear to me. As a child we had a great tree fort in our cherry tree, and spent hours in it. Also I once thought there were more people than trees.... hopefully that will not be a reality.

Thanks for reminding us about trees, and we should all respect them. Only using what we really need whenever possible.

20110428-01 19:49 Dick Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says the 3rd paragraph is false.
(<http://www.snopes.com/politics/business/studentloans.asp>) —SteveB]

No one has been able to explain to me why young men and women serve in the U.S. Military for 20 years, risking their lives protecting freedom, and only get 50% of their pay. While Politicians hold their political positions in the safe confines of the capital, protected by these same men and women, and receive full pay retirement after serving one term.

It just does not make any sense.

Monday on Fox News, we learned that the staffers of Congress family members are exempt from having to pay back student loans. This will get national attention if other news networks will broadcast it. When you add this to the below, just where will all of it stop? 35 States file lawsuit against the Federal Government Governors of 35 states have filed suit against the Federal Government for imposing unlawful burdens upon them.

It only takes 38 (of the 50) States to convene a Constitutional Convention. [But, below, it's a bill that seems to be proposed and maybe a simple bill would work, at least for most of this. It's just that it could be repealed in the future. — SBaker]

This will take less than thirty seconds to read. If you agree, please pass it on. This is an idea that we should address.

For too long we have been too complacent about the workings of Congress. Many citizens had no idea that members of Congress could retire with the same pay after only one term, that they specifically exempted themselves from many of the laws they have passed (such as being exempt from any fear of prosecution for sexual harassment) while ordinary citizens must live under those laws. The latest is to exempt themselves from the Health care Reform... in all of its forms. Somehow, that doesn't seem logical. We do not have an elite that is above the law.. I truly don't care if they are Democrat, Republican, Independent or whatever. The self-serving must stop.

If each person that receives this will forward it on to 20 people, in three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message.. This is one proposal that really should be passed around.

Proposed 28th Amendment to the United States Constitution: "Congress shall make no law that applies to the citizens of the United States that does not apply equally to the Senators and/or Representatives; and, Congress shall make no law that applies to the Senators and/or Representatives that does not apply equally to the citizens of the United States."

You are one of my 20+

20110430-01 11:18 SteveB Re: Photos of Trees

Dear Paula,

So happy to hear you guys still love trees! Bolivia still has many giants, though not as many as it should. There are also so many trees that flower. There are incredible, gaudy flowering trees all year round. Here in Florida, I love the huge southern/live oaks and the odiferous magnolias, now blooming.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110503-01 10:45 B. Miller Friends of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Blog

Dear SteveB:

Looking for an easy way to make sense of what's coming out of Washington and what it means to you? Since the launch of the new Friends of the U.S. Chamber site, we've been providing daily updates on all of the pressing issues on Capitol Hill and how they relate to one central theme: JOBS.

As part of this effort, we are now rolling out the 'What We're Watching Blog'—with expanded information on top news from Washington, what members of Congress are saying behind closed doors, and how you can be a part of the debate.

<http://www.friendsoftheuschamber.com/blog/>

We know that you're busy in your own community—which is why we're working to deliver the news that you want, when you want it—online. Make the What We're Watching Blog part of your daily routine by adding us to your RSS reader below or stopping by the Friends homepage. If you like what you see—share the news online on Facebook and Twitter.

Thanks for continuing to tune in. We'd love to hear your thoughts on the new features. Submit your comments online or feel free to email us at friends@uschamber.com.

Sincerely, Bill Miller, Sr. VP and National Political Director U.S. Chamber of Commerce

© 2007-2011 U.S. Chamber of Commerce 1615 H St NW Washington DC 20062-2000

20110506-01 06:13 SteveB "U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958"

Taxes vs. jobs...

Gee, see the headline today from USA Today (below). No one can legitimately complain that tax rates in the U.S. are too high. No one!

Yet, though some jobs continue to be created, "official" unemployment ("real" or "effective" unemployment is much higher) has risen to 9%, after some modest declines.

Where is the job-creating investment in America that low taxes, especially on big corporations and the rich, was supposed to generate?

It may well be the Republican mantra that low taxes create investment and jobs, but that dogma has been disproven completely in the span of time since the Bush tax cuts.

No one likes paying taxes. America has many serious problems.

But excessive taxes is certainly not one of them!

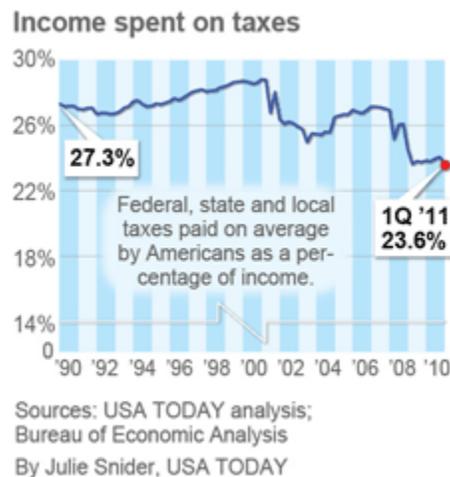

Instead, the current tax structure, combined with free trade (as even the idiot, Donald Trump, knows), and politicians who have sold our great country and its people down the river for huge campaign contributions from the rich and powerful...these are things that are killing us. This should be crystal clear to anyone.

If low taxes created prosperity, then we would be in China's shoes right now, enjoying too much growth...too many jobs. Clearly, we are not!

"U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958" by Dennis Cauchon, USA TODAY

May 6, 2011, (http://www.usatoday.com/money/perfi/taxes/2011-05-05-tax-cut-record-low_n.htm)

Americans are paying the smallest share of their income for taxes since 1958, a reflection of tax cuts and a weak economy, a USA TODAY analysis finds.

The total tax burden—for all federal, state and local taxes—dropped to 23.6% of income in the first quarter, according to Bureau of Economic Analysis data.

By contrast, individuals spent roughly 27% of income on taxes in the 1970s, 1980s and the 1990s—a rate that would mean $500 billion of extra taxes annually today, one-third of the estimated $1.5 trillion federal deficit this year.

The analysis comes as President Obama and Congress debate whether to cut federal spending, raise taxes or both.

The latest dip in the tax burden came from a Social Security tax cut included in a December budget deal between Democrats and Republicans. It will reduce taxes $100 billion this year.

"We have a 1950's level of taxation and a 21st-century-sized government," says Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a deficit-reduction advocacy group.

The fall in taxes is almost entirely caused by a weak economy rather than lower rates, says Curtis Dubay of the conservative Heritage Foundation. "It's easy to draw the wrong conclusion," he says.

Federal, state and local government spending hit a $5.6 trillion annual rate in the first quarter. That's the highest ever but, as a share of the economy, slightly below last year.

USA TODAY examined the full range of taxes that individuals pay to all levels of government. That includes income taxes for Medicare, property taxes for schools and gas taxes for roads.

At the national average, a person with an income of $100,000 would pay $23,600 in taxes today vs. $28,700 in 2000 and $27,300 in 1990.

The recession of 2001 and tax cuts championed by President Bush started a decade-long trend of taxing less income. The 2007-09 recession and new tax cuts in Obama's stimulus effort accelerated the change.

The one-year Social Security tax cut reduces the worker's rate from 6.2% to 4.2%—or $2,000 a year on a $100,000 income.

That has boosted the economy short-term, says Chris Christopher, an economist at the IHS consulting firm. "It's helping absorb the cost of higher gas and food prices," he says.

Other findings:

- Taxes per person: Individuals paid taxes at an annual rate of $10,549 per person in the first quarter—about the same as individuals have paid since 1990 when adjusted for inflation. Incomes have grown; tax payments haven't.
- Spending per person: Government spent at an annual rate of $18,086 per person in the first quarter. That's up from $13,552 in 2001, adjusted for inflation. The difference between individual taxes and spending comes from corporate taxes, user fees and borrowing.

20110506-02 14:10 SteveG Re: "U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958"

Dear SteveB,

I believe that if you compare the size of government, particularly the number of federal employees, versus the national population, the current federal government is smaller than the government of the 1950's.

20110506-03 17:37 SteveB Re: "U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958"

Dear SteveG,

I believe you are right!

And, despite a smaller, more efficient government, war and low taxes are what is bankrupting us, not "entitlements"! And people are out of work not because they don't want to work, but because of illegal immigration, free trade, union busting, lack of investment, and, demonstrably, because the jobs simply do not exist anymore.

20110506-04 19:17 SteveB "CEOs See Pay Rise 24% on Average"

CEO pas vs. jobs...

GREED IN THE DRIVER'S SEAT!

These are the guys creating all those great American jobs...er, I mean...non-existent American jobs:

"CEOs See Pay Rise 24% on Average" by Kim Peterson, MSN Money

May 6, 2011, (<http://money.msn.com/investment-advice/article.aspx?post=fa7d41ef-e781-4192-8769-5575e25f09a6>)

(The top bosses at the nation's largest companies are getting paid more than they were in 2007. Cash bonuses are also increasing.)

The chief executive of CBS (CBS) was paid nearly $57 million last year. The head of Occidental Petroleum (OXY) made $76 million. And the top boss at Comcast (CMCSA) took home $31 million. The recession has clearly faded into ancient history for executives at the largest public companies, who are getting paid more now than in 2007, The Associated Press reports. Using data from a compensation research firm, AP has gathered a list of last year's 50 highest-paid CEOs.

Seven chief executives took home more than $30 million, including salary, perks, bonuses, stock options and other factors. Viacom (VIA) head Philippe Dauman topped the list, with $84.5 million in compensation—a 149% gain from the year before. Viacom's stock did well last year, rising 46% to end December at an adjusted close of $45.72. Viacom owns MTV, Nickelodeon and Paramount Pictures. Not every boss saw that kind of success, however. At Time Warner (TWX), chief executive Jeff Bewkes took home $26.1 million, a 35% increase, even though the stock price rose only 13% to $32.03.

A CEO in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index received a $9 million pay package, on average, last year, AP reported. That's 24% more than in 2009, and much of the gain came in the form of larger cash bonuses.

Executive compensation is tied to a number of factors, such as financial performance. Part of the reason we're seeing CEO pay jump is that profits did as well. In the AP analysis of the companies, profit rose 41% last year.

Another reason pay rose is that the stock market did, too, and CEOs made big money, at least on paper, on the stocks and options they received over the past few years.

These pay levels are almost always set with zero input from many shareholders. That's because some of the biggest shareholders are institutional investors and they generally don't put up much fuss about CEO pay.

New government regulations now require that shareholders vote at least once every three years on CEO pay. The votes aren't binding and don't mean much, but at least pay levels will be a bigger part of the discussion.

Here are the 15 highest-paid CEOs, according to AP:

Philippe Dauman of Viacom	$84.5 million	up 149%.
Ray Irani of Occidental Petroleum	$76.1 million	up 142%.
Leslie Moonves of CBS	$56.9 million	up 32%.
David Zaslav of Discovery Communications (DISCA)	$42.6 million	up 265%.
Richard Adkerson of Freeport McMoran Copper Gold(FCX)	$35.3 million	up 76%.
John Lundgren of Stanley Black & Decker (SWK)	$132.6 million	up 253%.
Brian Roberts of Comcast	$31 million	up 14%.
Robert Iger of Walt Disney (DIS)	$28 million	up 30%.
Alan Mulally of Ford Motor (F)	$26.5 million	up 48%.
Jeff Bewkes of Time Warner	$26.1 million	up 35%.

20110506-05 22:33 Jim "Too Many Federal Workers?"

There is another factor. Look at the per cent of the total population that is working for the federal government. This adds a column with the U.S. population then your worker figure and then the percent of population working for federal government. It did about double from 1940 to 1970 but has been declining since. This is not the same as percent of total employment, but for many government services the number of clients served per worker appears to be going up in that fewer workers served more people.

"Too Many Federal Workers?" by Allan Holmes, NextGov

Sept. 7, 2010, (http://wiredworkplace.nextgov.com/2010/09/too_many_federal_workers.php)

Over the weekend, Amity Shlaes, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, wrote in The Wall Street Journal about the differences between private and public sector workers. She sketches out the history of unions in the federal government and what she concludes as a rather obvious point: If we just had fewer government workers, we would spend less on paying them.

She writes:

Another factor leading to the rise of the public unions is the decade-over-decade increase in the size of government. Not only through the New Deal, but also through the 1950s and onward the number of workers in the public sector grew. By 1962 they represented an eighth of the national work force. If we did not have so many government employees today, the cost of sustaining them would not be so high.

Here is the number of federal employees by decade (in millions and excluding U.S. Postal workers), as listed by the Office of Personnel Management:

Year	U.S. Population	#Fed. Employees	Employees/Population
1940	132 million	0.70 million	0.530%
1950	152 million	1.44 million	0.946%
1960	181 million	1.81 million	1.002%
1970	205 million	2.20 million	1.073%
1980	227 million	2.16 million	0.951%
1990	249 million	2.25 million	0.902%
2000	281 million	1.78 million	0.633%
2010	309 million	2.10 million	0.680%

There were fewer federal workers in 2009 than in 1990, 1980 and 1970. Now take a closer look at the OPM table. Much of the growth, understandably, occurred in Homeland Security agencies, increasing from 70,000 to 180,000—a jump of 110,000. Justice Department jobs went from 98,000 to 113,000—more than 15,000 new jobs added. (Again, crime and more Homeland Security related.) Jobs at the Veterans Department increased from 220,000 to 297,000—that's 77,000 more federal workers. Again, a result of Homeland Security, or rather staffing up to take care of thousands of veterans coming home from two wars. And there's a lot of information technology jobs in there.

So, taking those three areas, the number of new jobs created in the last 10 years, which can be traced back to 9/11, was 202,000. That by itself accounts for nearly two-thirds of the total federal workforce growth from 2000 to 2009, which was 316,000 jobs. Hold those steady since 2002 (or even allow for some growth), and you would have less than 1.9 million workers in 2009, or slightly more. That's about the same number of federal workers in 1962, the year Shlaes chooses as her benchmark to compare the number of government jobs to the number in the private sector (with public sector jobs accounting for an eighth of all jobs). Remember, that was before the Great Society programs geared up, popular programs that needed a slew of federal managers and clerks to oversee.

By the way, the number of jobs at the Interior, Transportation and Treasury departments fell from 2000 to 2009. And those at Health and Human Services, Education and the Social Security Administration grew from 1.26 million to 1.39 million—130,000 jobs over 10 years, or about 13,000 new positions a year as the health industry expanded at a torrid pace.

It helps to understand what tax dollars are paying for so that people have some perspective of what they are buying—as in this case homeland security and wars. After 9/11, the public was demanding the federal government do something. It did—and it took people to manage it. That puts much of the criticism leveled at the federal government into perspective.

20110507-01	03:16	Charis	"We Did Something Wrong"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Speaking of envy and guilt trips...

These folks are just soooooo illuminating. Even when, maybe especially when, I think I understand some event, I read their analysis and realize that I hadn't really got it, at all... things are so seldom as simple as they appear in the news...

"We Did Something Wrong" by Óscar Arias, President of Costa Rica

Apr. 18, 2009, Speech at the Summit of the Americas, Trinidad and Tobago, (<http://www.boliviabella.com/we-did-something-wrong-speech-by-oscar-arias-president-of-costa-rica.html>)

I'm under the impression that every time Caribbean and Latin American countries meet with the President of the United States of America it's to ask for something or complain about things. Almost always it's to blame the United States for our past, present and future problems. I don't think that's completely fair.

We mustn't forget that Latin America had universities before the United States created Harvard or William & Mary, which were the first universities in that country. We can't forget that on this continent, as well as the world over, at least until 1750 all Americans were more or less equal: all were poor.

When the Industrial Revolution began in England other countries jumped on the bandwagon: Germany, France, the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand. And the Industrial Revolution passed over Latin America like a comet and we didn't even realize it. We certainly lost our opportunity.

There is a very great difference. If one reads the history of Latin America and compares it to the history of the United States, one understands that Latin America did not have a Spanish or Portuguese John Winthrop who, with Bible in hand, was willing to build "a city on a hill", a city that would shine, as was the objective of the pilgrims who arrived in the United States.

50 years ago Mexico was richer than Portugal. In 1950 a country like Brazil had a higher income per capita than South Korea. 60 years ago Honduras had more wealth per capital than Singapore and today Singapore, over a period of about 35-40 years, has increased its annual income per capita to $40,000 per inhabitant. Well, Latin Americans did something wrong.

What did we do wrong? I can't count the things we've done wrong. To begin with, we have an average of 7 years of education. That's the average education level in Latin America and that is not the case with most Asian countries. Certainly that is not the case with the United States and Canada, which have the best education in the world, similar to that of Europeans. Of every 10 students who enter high school in Latin America, in some countries only 1 completes high school. There are countries that have an infant mortality rate of 50 per 1000, when the average in more advanced Asian countries is 8, 9, or 10.

In our countries taxes cover about 12% of the gross national product and it isn't anyone's responsibility other than ours that we don't charge more to the wealthiest people in our countries. No one is at fault for that except us.

In 1950 every North American citizen was four times wealthier than a Latin American citizen. Today a North American citizen is 10, 15 or 20 times wealthier than a Latin American. That is not the United States' fault. That is our fault.

During my speech this morning I mentioned something that I find grotesque and that only goes to show that the 20th Century value system, which seems to be the one we are putting into practice in the 21st Century too, is a mistaken value system. Because it can't be possible that the wealthy countries of the world dedicate 100 billion dollars to fight poverty throughout 80% of the world's population on a planet that has 2.5 billion human being who earn $2 a day, and they spend 13 times that (1 quadrillion, 300 million) on weapons and soldiers.

As I said this morning, it cannot be that Latin America spends 50 billion dollars on weapons and soldiers. I ask myself: who is our enemy? Our enemy, President Correa, is the inequality which you so correctly mention. It is lack of education. It is illiteracy. It is that we don't spend on our population's health. We don't create the necessary infrastructure: roads, highways, ports and airports. It is that we are not dedicating the necessary resources to stop the environmental degradation. It is the inequality we have that is really shameful. It is a product, among other things of course, of the fact that we are not educating our sons and daughters.

One goes to a Latin American university and it seems we are still in the sixties, seventies or eighties. It seems we've forgotten that on 9 November 1989 something very important happened: the Berlin Wall fell and the world changed. We have to accept that this is a different world and as to that, frankly, I think academics and all people of reason, all economists, all historians, almost all will agree that the 21st century belongs to the Asians, not to Latin Americans. And I, unfortunately, agree with them.

Because while we continue arguing about ideologies, while we continue arguing about "isms" (which is better, capitalism, socialism, communism, liberalism, neoliberalism, sociochristianism...) the Asians found a very realistic "ism" for the 21st Century and the end of the 20th Century and it's called pragmatism.

To give you an example, let's recall when Deng Xiaoping visited Singapore and South Korea. After realizing that his own neighbors were becoming wealthy rapidly, he returned to Peking and said to his old Maoist comrades that they had accompanied him along his long march "Well, truthfully dear comrades, I don't really care if the cat is black or white. The only thing that interests me is that it hunts mice". And if Mao had been alive he would have died again when Xiaoping said, "The truth is that getting rich is glorious". And while the Chinese are doing this, and since 1979 they've grown by 11%, 12%, or 13% and have taken 300 million of their inhabitants out of poverty, we continue arguing about ideologies that we should have buried long ago.

The good news is that Deng Xiaoping achieved this when he was 74 years old. Looking around me, dear Presidents, I don't see anyone who is anywhere near 74 years old. So all I ask you is that we don't wait until we're that age to make the changes we need to make.

Thank you.

20110507-02 07:28 SteveB Re: "We Did Something Wrong"

Dear Charis,

I loved it! Thank you.

It is so interesting to me the way that (I don't know exactly how to say it) Latin American often finds itself stuck in the past. As Arias pointed out, this is not the case so much in Europe, North America, or Asia.

Latin America missed the Industrial Revolution. They largely missed the Democratic Revolution, and still don't seem to have a real commitment to true democracy. They missed the end of the Cold War. How many centuries will they sit on their patios, drinking beer, eating burnt meat, watching the world leave them behind? Brazil, at least, seems to be waking up a little, but we've seen that there before and it didn't last.

Yet...maybe they have the right idea after all. Excuse me, I'm going to go take my siesta.

20110507-03 10:46 SteveB Re: "Too Many Federal Workers?"

Dear Jim,

Excellent points indeed. Thank you!

Still stuck in Florida (things could be worse :-)

20110508-01 07:45 SteveB Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

A little simpler version without the possibly stupid term limits...

Ref: Please read

[Source of original email unknown. See Snopes.com. —SteveB]

No one has been able to explain to me why young men and women serve in the U.S. Military for 20 years, risking their lives protecting freedom, and only get 50% of their pay, while Politicians hold their political positions in the safe confines of the capital, protected by these same men and women, and receive full pay retirement after serving one term. It just does not make any sense.

Monday on Fox news they learned that the staffers of Congress family members are exempt from having to pay back student loans. This will get national attention if other news networks will broadcast it. When you add this to the below, just where will all of it stop?

[The other news networks didn't broadcast it because it wasn't true. —SteveB]

35 States file lawsuit against the Federal Government

Governors of 35 states have filed suit against the Federal Government for imposing unlawful burdens upon them. It only takes 38 (of the 50) States to convene a Constitutional Convention.

This will take less than thirty seconds to read. If you agree, please pass it on.

This is an idea that we should address. For too long we have been too complacent about the workings of Congress. Many citizens had no idea that members of Congress could retire with the same pay after only one term, that they specifically exempted themselves from many of the laws they have passed (such as being exempt from any fear of prosecution for sexual harassment) while ordinary citizens must live under those laws.

The latest is to exempt themselves from the Healthcare Reform... in all of its forms. Somehow, that doesn't seem logical. We do not have an elite that is above the law. I truly don't care if they are Democrat, Republican, Independent or whatever. The self-serving must stop.

If each person that receives this will forward it on to 20 people, in three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one proposal that really should be passed around.

Proposed 28th Amendment to the United States Constitution:

Congress shall make no law that applies to the citizens of the United States that does not apply equally to the Senators and/or Representatives; and, Congress shall make no law that applies to the Senators and/or Representatives that does not apply equally to the citizens of the United States.

20110508-02	09:31	SteveB	America is #31, but Happy Day, Moms!
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------------

Happy Mothers' Day to all!

Unfortunately, because of our antiquated health care system and laws, the U.S. ranks #31 on the list of Best of the Developed Countries for Mothers. Thank you so much Democrats and Republicans for fixing our problems and keeping us great! I am on my knees thanking you for not selling your people down the river to please your biggest campaign contributors! Your concern for the family, children, mothers, education, and the future of our great nation is just astounding!

http://www.savethechildren.org/atf/cf/%7B9def2ebe-10ae-432c-9bd0-df91d2eba74a%7D/SOWM2011_INDEX.PDF

<http://www.savethechildren.org>

20110509-01	10:17	Ben	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---

Dear SteveB,

I couldn't agree more about the military being inadequately compensated for duty and retirement benefits.

Nor could I agree more that Congress gets a deal that isn't fair. (It SHOULD be a service, not a career.)

Nevertheless, this material is inaccurate:

<http://www.snopes.com/politics/business/studentloans.asp>

<http://www.snopes.com/politics/medical/28thamendment.asp>

(Not trying to stir debate here: just surprised to see you falling into this particular hole. This stuff was reverberating through the Web a year or two ago.)

Yep: one set of laws. Give Congress Medicare, and THEN let's see if they want to cut it!

20110509-02 14:26 SteveB Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear Dick,

I couldn't agree more about the military being inadequately compensated for duty and retirement benefits.

Nor could I agree more that Congress gets a deal that isn't fair. (It SHOULD be a service, not a career.)

Nevertheless, some of this material appears to be inaccurate:

<http://www.snopes.com/politics/business/studentloans.asp>

<http://www.snopes.com/politics/medical/28thamendment.asp>

20110509-03 14:32 SteveB Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear Ben,

Forwarded it to you only for the amendment wording, a subject we had been talking about. That's what I meant by my intro. As for the rest, never thought about it as true or false. It seemed irrelevant to our discussion. I guess I should have deleted it, but my time is limited...

20110510-01 08:54 SteveB Fw: 'Entitlement' My A*s!

This guy (below) is a little "ticked-off", but if the Republicans keep going their dogmatic way, they are going to have so many people ticked-off that they will be crushed in the next election. Are they really too stupid to realize that?

IT'S TIME TO STOP THE WARS, CUT THE MILITARY, STOP ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION, END "FREE" TRADE, AND TAX THE RICH!

[Source of original email unknown. Also received this same email from Marci on Aug. 14, 2011, 12:11 pm. —SteveB]

'Entitlement' my a*s, I paid cash for my social security insurance!!!! Just because they borrowed the money, doesn't make my benefits some kind of charity or handout!!

Congressional benefits , aka. free healthcare, outrageous retirement packages, 67 paid holidays, three weeks paid vacation, unlimited paid sick days, now that's welfare, and they have the nerve to call my retirement, an 'entitlement'!!!!!!

What the HELL's wrong with us???

WAKE UP AMERICA !!!!

Tuesday's Daily Bulletin paper, ran two articles on the front page side by side:

1. Calif. 's 20 Billion Dollar Budget Deficit.
2. The Calif. Supreme Court ruling that ILLEGALS can attend college and get benefits.

Why don't they just deport them when they arrive to register?

Last year they ran an article on the yearly costs to Calif. Taxpayers from Illegals using Hospital Emergency Rooms for their general health care—At just one hospital the cost to tax payers totaled over $25 million a year!

Someone please tell me what the HELL's wrong with all the people that run this country!!!!!!

We're "broke" & can't help our own Seniors, Veterans, Orphans, Homeless etc.!!!!!!

In the last months we have provided aid to Haiti, Chile, and Turkey. And now Pakistanhome of bin Laden. Literally, BILLIONS of DOLLARS!!!

Our retired seniors living on a 'fixed income' receive no aid nor do they get any breaks while our government and religious organizations pour Hundreds of Billions of $$$$$$'s and Tons of Food to Foreign Countries!

They call Social Security and Medicare an entitlement even though most of us have been paying for it all our working lives and now when it's time for us to collect, the government is running out of money.

Why did the government borrow from it in the first place?

We have hundreds of adoptable children who are shoved aside to make room for the adoption of foreign orphans.

AMERICA: a country where we have homeless without shelter, children going to bed hungry, elderly going without 'needed' meds, and mentally ill without treatment—etc, etc.

YET..... They have a 'Benefit' for the people of Haiti on 12 TV stations, ships and planes lining up with food, water, tents, clothes, bedding, doctors, and medical supplies.

Imagine if the GOVERNMENT gave 'U.S.' the same support they give to other countries. Sad isn't it?

99% of people won't have the guts to forward this. I'm one of the 1%—I Just did.

20110510-02 9:00 SteveB Fw: Memorial Day
--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Keep it moving, please, even if you've seen it before.

MEMORIAL DAY

We all have either been vets, have vets in our families, or know vets.....Let us remember and respect them, not only this month, but always!!

It is the VETERAN, not the preacher, who has given us freedom of religion.

It is the VETERAN, not the reporter, who has given us freedom of the press.

It is the VETERAN, not the poet, who has given us freedom of speech.

It is the VETERAN, not the campus organizer, who has given us freedom to assemble.

It is the VETERAN, not the lawyer, who has given us the right to a fair trial.

It is the VETERAN, not the politician, who has given us the right to vote.

It is the VETERAN who salutes the Flag, It is the VETERAN who serves under the Flag, ETERNAL REST GRANT THEM, O LORD, AND LET PERPETUAL LIGHT SHINE UPON THEM.

I'd be EXTREMELY proud if this email reached as many as possible. We can be very proud of our young men and women in the service no matter where they serve. God Bless them all!!! Makes you proud to be an AMERICAN!!!!

20110510-03 11:34 Charis Path to Citizenship

Dear SteveB,

Is it true Obama is suggesting another round of amnesties for millions of illegals?

20110510-04 18:19 SteveB Re: Path to Citizenship

Dear Charis,

I'm afraid he sort of is. But now they call it a "path to citizenship". There are 11 million illegals now in the country. That's probably a conservative estimate. All they have to do is ensure that you have to be legal to work or go to school. A one-page bill would do it. It's discouraging for people like my wife and I. We had to do everything the hard, expensive way. She will be sworn-in on May 25, then we'll head home about the middle of June. But the life of an illegal is not easy, but why should it be? I guess whole towns in Mexico and Central America are decimated...they're all here.

Sometimes I think the U.S. and Bolivia are the only countries in the world who don't enforce their laws.

20110510-05 18:23 SteveB Great Time for a Water Diversion

Now would be a great time to divert Mississippi River flow to Texas via a big-ass pipeline or two. [this one is serious]

But, no, the U.S. wouldn't want to do anything that might actually solve problems!

Instead of ensuring that people have legal papers before they can get a job or go to school here (a 1-page bill), let's give 11 million illegals a "path to citizenship". Maybe we could put them to work on the pipelines?

20110511-01 18:41 SteveB Fw: CredoAction Petition: Tell John Boehner to Keep His Hands Off Medicare

Dear SteveB:

Thanks for taking action.

Here are some ways you can spread the word to make sure Speaker John Boehner gets the message loud and clear.

Tell John Boehner: Hands off Medicare! — <http://bit.ly/kizYh4>

Republican House Speaker John Boehner is trying to destroy Medicare.

At a recent speech, he threatened to force the government to default on its debt, which would drive us back into a deep recession, unless Congress passed something like Rep. Paul Ryan's extremist and irresponsible budget.

The Ryan budget proposal would destroy Medicare and replace it with a voucher program for seniors who'd be dumped into the private insurance market. And if the vouchers didn't cover the cost of insurance, too bad.

Dear Mr. President:

I received this irritating email from you (below) and saw your speech in Texas. I think you need to simply enforce the law as you are duty-bound by the Constitution. No illegal immigrants. No illegal immigrants should be allowed to work or go to school here, or get government benefits. No amnesty. No "path to citizenship". ENFORCE THE LAW OF THE LAND!

My wife is from Bolivia and is almost finished with her LEGAL immigration and citizenship process. It has been long and expensive and that is OK. But it is not fair to us or to any American if illegals get a shortcut.

If you want to let your heart bleed for someone, let it bleed for Americans who can't find jobs and Mexican and Central American towns decimated by illegal immigration to our country.

If you do the wrong thing with this, we will never vote for you again! Thank you.

from "President Obama":

Dear SteveB:

I went to El Paso, Texas, today to lay out a plan to do something big: fix America's broken immigration system.

It's an issue that affects you, whether you live in a border town like El Paso or not. Our immigration system reflects how we define ourselves as Americans—who we are, who we will be—and continued inaction poses serious costs for everyone.

Those costs are human, felt by millions of people here and abroad who endure years of separation or deferred dreams—and millions more hardworking families whose wages are depressed when employers wrongly exploit a cheap source of labor. That's why immigration reform is also an economic imperative—an essential step needed to strengthen our middle class, create new industries and new jobs, and make sure America remains competitive in the global economy.

Because this is such a tough problem—one that politicians in Washington have been either exploiting or dodging, depending on the politics—this change has to be driven by people like you.

Washington won't act unless you lead. [Maybe you should lead, Mr. President. I guess you thought sending out an email was leadership.]

So if you're willing to do something about this critical issue, join our call for immigration reform now. Those who do will be part of our campaign to educate people on this issue and build the critical mass needed to make Washington act:

<http://my.barackobama.com/Immigration-Reform>

In recent years, concerns about whether border security and enforcement were tough enough were among the greatest impediments to comprehensive reform. They are legitimate issues that needed to be addressed—and over the past two years, we have made great strides in enhancing security and enforcement.

We have more boots on the ground working to secure our southwest border than at any time in our history. We're going after employers who knowingly break the law. And we are deporting those who are here illegally. I know the increase in deportations has been a source of controversy, but I want to emphasize that we are focusing our limited resources on violent offenders and people convicted of crimes—not families or people looking to scrape together an income.

So we've addressed the concerns raised by those who have stood in the way of progress in the past. And now that we have, it's time to build an immigration system that meets our 21st-century economic needs and reflects our values both as a nation of laws and a nation of immigrants.

Today, we provide students from around the world with visas to get engineering and computer science degrees at our top universities. But then our laws discourage them from using those skills to start a business or a new industry here in the United States. That just doesn't make sense.

We also need to stop punishing innocent young people for the actions of their parents—and pass the DREAM Act so they can pursue higher education or become military service members in the country they know as home. We already know enormous economic benefits from the steady stream of talented and hardworking people coming to America.

More than a century and a half ago, U.S. Steel's Andrew Carnegie was a 13-year-old brought here from Scotland by his family in search of a better life. And in 1979, a Russian family seeking freedom from Communism brought a young Sergey Brin to America—where he would become a co-founder of Google.

Through immigration, we've become an engine of the global economy and a beacon of hope, ingenuity and entrepreneurship. We should make it easier for the best and brightest not only to study here, but also to start businesses and create jobs here. That's how we'll win the future.

Immigration is a complex issue that raises strong feelings. And as we push for long overdue action, we're going to hear the same sort of ugly rhetoric that has delayed reform for years—despite long and widespread recognition that our current system fails us all and hurts our economy.

So you and I need to be the ones talking about this issue in the language of hope, not fear—in terms of how we are made stronger by our differences, and can be made stronger still.

Thank you, Barack

20110511-03 10:43 Charis Re: To: President Obama; El Paso Speech on Immigration

Dear SteveB,

You forgot to tell him how full of cr*p he is.

20110512-01 09:02 SteveB Re: To: President Obama; El Paso Speech on Immigration

Dear Charis,

LOL. I thought I did? But he is so much less full of cr*p than the Republicans...look at their alleged Presidential candidates. What a joke they all are. Newt? The Donald? Palin? Huckabee? Ron Paul? etc., etc. Scary! And their dogmatic philosophy got us to where we are now...at a dead end.

20110513-01 18:55 SteveB To: Ron Paul: Impeachable, Imschmeechable! Part 2 [defense]

Dear Mr. Paul:

Why don't you whine a little more about the President's indirect killing of Osama bin Laden? It seems to me that you have an uncanny ability to take positions in opposition to the majority of Americans. Do you really think that is ever going to get you elected President? Haven't you ever noticed that the more you whine in public, the lower your ratings go? If you're a man of your word, why haven't you followed through with impeaching the President because of his "unconstitutional" actions in Libya? You seem to think the Commander-in-Chief of, possibly, the most powerful nation on Earth should sit in the White House blindfolded, with his hands tied. If that's how you would run the country, Mr. Whiner, no thanks!

20110515-01 18:06 SteveB To: Fareed Zakaria, CNN; U.S. Corruption

Dear Mr. Zakaria:

I greatly enjoy your GPS program on CNN. You are doing a fine job. Today, I watched your segment about corruption in the world, the harm it does, and how it serves to perpetuate the rich/poor class structure. These are points well taken.

However, though you were mainly focused on the bribery form of corruption, I felt that you were remiss in not spending equal time on the more insidious and important form of corruption—political!

I find the United States to be, unfortunately, among the most corrupt countries on Earth—much more corrupt than any South American country, most of which I know well from having lived and bribed there.

We have permitted our politicians to be bought by big money and big corporations with their unfettered campaign contributions. As a result, the American people, their means of making a living, and their future have been sold down the river.

No one talks about it, but I believe that none of our country's many huge problems will ever be fixed until campaign finance reform fixes the corruption problem. Too bad the fixing would have to be done by the very scoundrels who always have their hands out.

20110515-02 20:34 Jim Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?)

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

AIR POWERED CAR. NEAT!!!!

Tata Motors in India is ready to introduce Air Car—Will it be the next big thing? Tata Motors is taking giant strides and making history for itself. First the Land Rover/Jaguar deal, then the world's cheapest car, and now it is also set to introduce the car that runs on compressed air.

With spiraling fuel prices it is about time we heard some breakthrough! India's largest automaker, Tata Motors, is set to start producing the world's first commercial air-powered vehicle.

The Air Car, developed by ex-Formula One engineer Guy N. For Luxembourg-based MDI, uses compressed air, as opposed to the gas and oxygen explosions of internal-combustion models, to push its engine's pistons. Some 6000 zero-emissions Air Cars are scheduled to hit Indian streets by Aug., 2011.

The Air Car, called the "MiniCAT" could cost around Rs. 3,475,225 (U.S. $8,177.00) in India and would have a range of around 300 km between refuels.

The cost of a refill would be about Rs. 85 ($2.00).

The MiniCAT which is a simple, light urban car, with a tubular chassis that is glued, not welded, and a body of fiberglass powered by compressed air. Microcontrollers are used in every device in the car, so one tiny radio transmitter sends instructions to the lights, indicators, etc.

There are no keys—just an access card which can be read by the car from your pocket. According to the designers, it costs less than 50 rupees per 100 Km (about a tenth that of a petrol car). Its mileage is about double that of the most advanced electric car (200 to 300 km or 10 hours of driving), a factor which makes a perfect choice in cities where 80% of motorists drive at less than 60 Km. The car has a top speed of 105 Kmph.

Refilling the car will, once the market develops, take place at adapted petrol stations to administer compressed air. In two or three minutes, and at a cost of approximately 100 rupees, the car will be ready to go another 200-300 kilometers.

As a viable alternative, the car carries a small compressor which can be connected to the mains (220V or 380V) and refill the tank in 3-4 hours. Due to the absence of combustion and, consequently, of residues, changing the oil (1 litre of vegetable oil) is necessary only every 50,000 Km).

The temperature of the clean air expelled by the exhaust pipe is between 0-15 degrees below zero, which makes it suitable for use by the internal air conditioning system with no need for gases or loss of power.

20110516-01 15:24 SteveB Re: Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?)
--

Dear Jim,

Although it would be great if a car like this actually existed...but I doubt it exists. The energy density of gasoline is about 45MJ/kg. The energy density of compressed air is only about 180-190 kJ/kg., so the stated range and practicality seem impossible. Practical tanks, heat exchangers, and even engines do not really exist at this time. I wish the rumor were true...

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Compressed_air_energy_storage

<http://www.tribology-abc.com/abc/thermodynamics.htm>

20110516-02	15:33	GaryC	Re: Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?); President Obama
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

Dear SteveB,

I think Obama has enough compressed gas to power a bus for a week.

20110516-03	15:49	SteveB	Re: Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?); 2012 Primaries
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear GaryC,

Apparently, Huckabee and The Donald don't have enough compressed gas to even get off the ground. I don't think Palin is going to run either. Newt made the wrong decision and isn't going to last long. Romney will have to use his own money, though the Massachusetts health care system works pretty well. That leaves maybe Pawlenty who?

Whatever, the Republicans are scared to death of Mr. Obama.

20110516-04	15:53	GaryC	Re: Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?) Mitch Daniels Not a Socialist
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---

Dear SteveB,

Actually, my friend Mitch Daniels may be getting in soon and I think he could be a great candidate and even better President. If he gets in, I am going to be busy helping him raise money and assist in other ways. Could be fun. The good thing about Mitch is that he is not a social conservative. I think you would actually like his stance on many topics.

However, he is not a socialist.

20110516-05	16:01	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 22 (One Chapter Too Many): "Vatican Tells Bishops to Root Out Sexual Abuse"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

The telling part of this news, to me, is the word "even" in the last paragraph...as if the "protection of minors" is something the Church really feels is reaching very, very far (maybe even too far), rather than seeing the protection of minors as an integral part of their calling. Amazing! They never seem to learn.

"Vatican Tells Bishops to Root Out Sexual Abuse" by Philip Pullella, Reuters

May 16, 2011, (<http://www.theglobeandmail.com/news/world/vatican-tell-bishops-to-root-out-sex-abuse/article2023460/>)

[Emphasis mine. —SteveB]

(VATICAN CITY) The Vatican told bishops around the world on Monday that they must make it a global priority to root out sexual abuse of children by priests.

The headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church told bishops in a letter that they should cooperate with civil authorities to end the abuse that has tarnished its image around the world.

"This is telling the world that we mean business. We want to be an example of prevention and care," said one Vatican official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The letter is intended to help every diocese draw up its own tough guidelines, based on a global approach but in line with local criminal law. These must be sent to the Vatican for review within a year.

"The responsibility for dealing with delicts (crimes) of sexual abuse of minors by clerics belongs in the first place to the diocesan bishop," the letter says.

It incorporates sweeping revisions made last year to the Church's laws on sexual abuse, which doubled a statute of limitations for disciplinary action against priests and extended the use of fast-track procedures to defrock them.

The Vatican has for years been struggling to control the damage that sexual abuse scandals in the United States and several European countries, including Pope Benedict's native Germany, have done to the Church's image.

"This goes beyond what was done before," the Vatican official said. "It is setting up a standard of best principles, best policy to be followed globally. It makes protection of minors a paramount principle and takes a long-term view because it talks about the formation of future priests."

The scandal has led to the resignation of bishops in several countries. Last year, Benedict begged forgiveness from God and from abuse victims, and said the Church would do everything in its power to ensure that it never happened again.

The Vatican official said that if local criminal legislation requires that bishops report sex offenders directly to civil authorities, they are obliged to do so and the guidelines will include this.

Victims groups said they were not satisfied.

"There's no "zero tolerance" or "mandatory reporting" requirement. There's no insistence that bishops warn their flock about child molesting clerics. There's nothing that will make a child safer today or tomorrow or next month or next year," said SNAP, the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests.

In an exclusive interview with Reuters Television, the Vatican's "Justice Promoter," Monsignor Charles Scicluna, responded to the accusation.

"This is a long-term planning procedure. It has taken some time for the Church to recognize that there have to be clear guidelines. It is a good day for people who expect that the Church gives the good example, even when it comes to the protection of minors," Scicluna said.

The letter tells bishops they must be prepared to listen to the victims and their families and be committed to their spiritual and psychological assistance. Bishops must be more careful in choosing candidates for the priesthood in order to weed out early those who are or could become sex abusers.

It says that while those accused of being sexual abusers have to be treated fairly and with due process, those who are known to be abusers must be excluded from the public ministry.

In many of the cases of sexual abuse around the world, local bishops allowed known abusers to be moved from parish to parish instead of being defrocked.

20110516-06	16:21	SteveB	Re: 2012 Primaries/Election; Mitch Daniels Not Running
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear GaryC,

Not a socialist? Then what's he good for? :-)

Actually, I've read lately that it looks rather doubtful he will run. Maybe better to wait until 2016 rather than beat your head against a Democrat landslide. That's what all the smart ones seem to be thinking (and even some of the dumb ones!). But, then, by 2016, there may not even be a Republican party any more. I believe that what will transpire between now and then will further discredit their ancient elitist dogma.

20110518-01 09:16 SteveB Fw: CredoAction Petition: End Big Oil Tax Subsidies

Dear SteveB:

Hold Sen. Marco Rubio accountable for the vote against ending oil subsidies.

Last night, 48 Senators, including Sen. Marco Rubio, put Big Oil before the American people and helped defeat a bill that would have ended tax breaks for the five biggest oil companies. How could anyone vote against a bill that would have kept $21 billion of American taxpayers' money out of the pockets of cash-rich oil companies?

One big reason is oil money in our political process. A lot of it. Oil and gas companies spent $39.5 million lobbying congress in just the first quarter of this year, and have donated tens of millions of dollars directly to the political campaigns of current Senators, including $196,600 to Sen. Marco Rubio.

Tell Sen. Marco Rubio: Stop putting oil company profits and campaign contributions ahead of the American people.

http://act.credoaction.com/campaign/oil_subsidy_vote/?r=7861&id=21121-4050539-yL0NiZx

In all, three Democrats joined all but two Senate Republicans to protect Big Oil tax breaks that even a former Shell CEO said weren't needed. But make no mistake. Even though we didn't get the 60 votes required for passage, our pressure to end oil subsidies is already working. More and more legislators are acting defensive about their support of Big Oil over the American people.

In February, similar legislation to repeal some oil subsidies got only 44 votes. Yesterday, we got 52 votes. That comes after Sen. Marco Rubio took lots of oil money. And then voted to let Big Oil keep taking our money. We say to him:

You should be ashamed of your vote to protect Big Oil's tax breaks at the expense of American taxpayers. You've accepted an astonishing amount of campaign money from oil companies. I urge you to stop putting oil profits and campaign contributions ahead of the American people.

Senate Majority leader Harry Reid said yesterday that despite this defeat, he will continue to push for ending oil subsidies as part of negotiations on the budget and to raise the debt ceiling.

We need to keep the pressure on. And one key to breaking Big Oil's grasp on our legislators is letting Congress know that we know about the millions of dollars that Big Oil has given them—including the $196,600 to Sen. Marco Rubio.

Let's make sure that voting to protect oil company profits doesn't go unanswered by those of us who actually pay the price. Thank you for taking action.

Elijah Zarlin, Campaign Manager

20110518-02 19:32 SteveB "Horrifying: Newt Gingrich Wants to Make America 'Like Texas'"

I think it is instructive to look at what future the conservative dogma would deliver for America. Cutting spending does not accomplish what most of us wish for our cities, states, country, or lives. Simply cutting spending does not even accomplish the conservative agenda. Texas is the proof.

Without lower and middle class jobs, without fair taxes being paid by employed workers, their bosses, and companies, the whole system goes to sh*t...as it has in Texas.

Funny how Mitt's liberal bastion of Massachusetts is doing so much better in terms of quality of life for its citizens.

And lastly, Newt has proven himself to be another Republican idiot. If the conservative Republican dogma is so smart, why are so many of its proponents so d*mned dumb?

"Horrifying: Newt Gingrich Wants to Make America 'Like Texas'" by Peter Montgomery, Right Wing Watch

May 17, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/150977/>)

In his presidential campaign announcement on Sean Hannity's Fox News Channel show last week, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich praised job creation in Texas and said he'd been talking to Texas Gov. Rick Perry. "I know how to get the whole country to resemble Texas," Gingrich told Hannity. That could go down as the worst campaign promise ever.

"I dearly love the state of Texas," the late Texan and progressive icon Molly Ivins wrote, "but I consider that a harmless perversion on my part, and discuss it only with consenting adults." Noting that Texas was a state that provided relatively few services to its residents, she once wrote, "The only depressing part is that, unlike Mississippi, we can afford to do better. We just don't." Maybe that should be the motto for Newt Gingrich and his fellow anti-government demagogues.

The impact of that governing philosophy is spreading a lot of pain in Texas right now. Nobel Prize-winning economist and New York Times columnist Paul Krugman wrote earlier this year:

Texas is where the modern conservative theory of budgeting—the belief that you should never raise taxes under any circumstances, that you can always balance the budget by cutting wasteful spending—has been implemented most completely. If the theory can't make it there, it can't make it anywhere.

In fact, Texas lawmakers have been struggling all year to figure out how to deal with a massive budget deficit. An AP story from March, headlined "Texas' economic miracle beginning to tarnish," noted that the state's budget shortfall was "among the worst in the nation." A temporary budget deal in March involving more than $1 billion in spending cuts still left the state $23 billion short over the next two years by one estimate. Proposed cuts could result in layoffs for 100,000 school employees and 60,000 nursing home workers and eliminate 9,600 state jobs this year. Just this week lawmakers struggled to reach agreement on a deal to close a $4 billion deficit in the current year, which ends in August.

It is possible that entire crisis may have been manufactured by Perry and other antigovernment Republicans to give lawmakers a justification for further slashing government and basic human services.

Does Newt think we really want the whole country to look like Texas, which ranks:

- 50th in percentage of population with health insurance (2010)
- 50th in percentage of children insured (2009)
- 50th in percentage of women receiving early prenatal care (2010)
- 45th in rate of infectious diseases (2010)
- 44th in percentage of children in poverty (2010)

42nd in per capita health care funding (2010)
40th in overall health (2010)
36th in high school graduation rate (2010)
35th in percentage of children immunized (2010)
34th in rate of occupational fatalities (2010)
30th in percentage of people with college degree (2008)

Texas also ranks:

1st in amount of recognized carcinogens released into the air (2002)
4th highest in release of toxic chemicals into the environment (2002)
8th highest in percentage of people below poverty level (2008)
13th highest in obesity (2010)
35th in crime (2010) [Law and order. Not a bad statistic to have. —SteveB]

"I know how to get the whole country to resemble Texas." Uh, thanks, Newt, but no thanks.

20110518-03	19:45	SteveB	Thorium Reactor
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------

Very interesting stuff. But I still think simple natural gas or 20%/80% hydrogen/nitrogen powered cars, using slightly modified existing internal combustion engines, would solve a lot of energy problems, with little or no pollution.

<http://energyfromthorium.com/essay3rs/>

20110518-04	20:06	Ben	Frakking
-----------------------------	-------	-----	----------

Dear SteveB,

Been reading about how natural gas is mined? Seems like it may be dirtier than coal.

"Frakking" has serious consequences...

20110518-05	20:09	SteveB	"How Political Corruption Works in the U.S. of A."
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

"How Political Corruption Works in the U.S. of A." CredoAction

May 18, 2011, (<http://womensphilanthropy.typepad.com/stephaniedoty/2011/05/your-senator-voted-against-ending-big-oil-subsidies.html>)

Last night, 48 Senators, including Sen. Marco Rubio, put Big Oil before the American people and helped defeat a bill that would have ended tax breaks for the five biggest oil companies.¹ How could anyone vote against a bill that would have kept $21 billion of American taxpayers' money out of the pockets of cash-rich oil companies?

One big reason is oil money in our political process. A lot of it. Oil and gas companies spent $39.5 million lobbying congress in just the first quarter of this year,² and have donated tens of millions of dollars directly to the political campaigns of current Senators, including $196,600 to Sen. Marco Rubio.³ In all, three Democrats joined all but two Senate Republicans to protect Big Oil tax breaks that even a former Shell CEO said weren't needed.⁴

¹"Senate GOP Votes Down Bill To End Big Oil Subsidies," Huffington Post, May 17, 2011.

²"Senators Opposing End of Oil Subsidies Received Five Times More in Big Oil Campaign Cash," Oil Change International, May 17, 2011.

³Dirty Energy Money campaign data.

⁴"Ex-Shell CEO Says Big Oil Can Live Without Subsidies," National Journal, Feb. 11, 2011.

20110518-06 21:15 SteveB Re: Frakking

Dear Ben,

Most natural gas, and abundant supplies, comes from drilled wells. Much of it is a waste product from oil wells or trash dumps. That's why you often see the flames to the tops of each.

Bolivia drills for a lot of gas. So much that almost all of the taxis in Santa Cruz use gas. Very cheap and efficient.

The "mined" gas is a new development and is rapidly becoming cleaner, from what I can gather.

20110519-01 01:57 SteveG Boyhood Adventures

Dear SteveB,

Oh yeah, I remember when you and I went into Moore's and ordered a glass of milk each. We were ID'd, served, and asked to move to the family room.

20110519-02 18:42 Pam Re: End Big Oil Tax Subsidies

Dear SteveB,

These subsidies to oil companies are obscene. It looks more and more as if oil owns the world.

20110519-03 21:38 Ben Re: Frakking

Yeah, I know it's clean, easily purified to nearly perfect single-compound fuel, and burns with the completeness that only smaller molecules can achieve. Yes, indeed, a great fuel. (Of course they're drilled: nobody envisions sticking a dome over gas bubbling out of a swamp!) But as I understand it, and increasing proportion of those drilled wells are being frakked. This means that huge slurries of proprietary chemicals are flushed down into the shale and explosives are applied. This literally cracks the shale bed so hugely that gases (and sometimes oil) can flow freely enough to make the well practical. There is very rapidly growing concern about the undisclosed nature of these chemicals — and aquifers.

Kind of like using a giant Mixmaster on the ocean floor, only different. But frakking, as a part of this operation, is very scary. Do they do this in Bolivia...?

20110520-01 13:27 Dennis "South Africa's New 'New World'"

Dear Steve,

I think you'll find this of interest. Byron King is one of the best investment gurus, in my opinion, as he has a good grasp of world economic developments and knows where to put your money. (Buy oil, Buy gold!)

"South Africa's New 'New World'", by Byron King, Agora Financial

May 20, 2011 (<http://outstandinginvestments.agorafinancial.com/2011/05/20/south-africa%E2%80%99s-new-%E2%80%9Cnew-world%E2%80%9D/>)

I've spent the week in South Africa, taking the pulse of the political and business climate and looking for investment opportunities large and small. I have a thick notebook, filled with investment ideas, comments by business leaders, money managers and others. It's all grist for the editorial mill, and I'll get into details in future email alerts and OI issues.

Chinese Trimming

Meanwhile, "China Trims Pile of U.S. Debt," screamed the mid-week headline of the South Africa Business Report. I was reading this particular newspaper during a flight from Johannesburg to Cape Town the other night.

"Biggest holder of treasuries fears deficits pose default risk," added the Business Report in another headline, referring of course to the government of China. The Chinese may be holding U.S. paper based on past purchases, but they're no fools. The Chinese are trimming down. They'll limit future purchases of U.S. debt, and look for other options.

What Will China Buy?

The South African news article quoted a U.S. government official as asking the (rather snide—and very dumb) question of what the Chinese would buy, if not U.S. treasuries? I believe I can answer that question.

The Chinese will buy Africa.

In fact, the new "Great Game" has already started in this arena. Think it through. China has far more dollars than it wants. Yet China has far fewer resources than it requires. Meanwhile, Africa is resource-rich. And most African governments, industries and people are willing to deal, not the least of them being South Africa.

Not Your Father's World Anymore

So Africa is on sale, with many of its resources headed to China. Already, China imports half its overseas oil from Africa. That number is destined to increase, too. If you're a Westerner—and particularly if you dwell in the U.S.—the good old days are over. We don't live in your father's world anymore. We don't even live in the world of the early 2000s. The future is now, and it has arrived in a hurry. The western-oriented, U.S.-centric, post-World War II era is in its death throes.

First and foremost, the dollar is dying—slowly strangled by American politicians, and their monetary advisers over the past half century or so. The dollar-based gravy train is ending. We had better figure out what to do, because we're coming to the end of this line.

How the West Was Lost

Zambian writer Dambisa Moyo does a creditable job of laying the story out in her recent book, How the West Was Lost—Fifty years of Economic Folly and the Stark Choices Ahead. I picked up my copy—prominently displayed—in the Johannesburg airport. This is what the world is reading, by the way.

Ms. Moyo has a straightforward, hard-hitting thesis. Once upon a time, the U.S. was in the world's vanguard. But (short version) the U.S. squandered important relationships and alienated many emerging countries with which the U.S. now competes. Sure, the developing world still trades with the U.S. and other Western nations, but often as not, it's through clenched teeth.

Meanwhile, Western technology has eliminated many traditional barriers to development. It's now easy for almost any competitor to obtain world class technology and "best-practice" levels of operating standards. Thus the foundations for basic wealth creation in the U.S., and across the West, are under assault from all corners of the trading compass.

Finally, the root of the U.S. and Western downfall is the worst form of self-inflicted wound. It's the growth of the modern, Western financialized state. This modern state is possessed by a chronic, hubristic tendency always to opt for a political solution to fight economic and historic trends.

Bottom line is that there's a bipartisan political mind-set in the U.S. that leads to endless inflation and other fundamentally flawed, wealth-destroying economic policies. There are politicians who really believe that issuing government checks is just another way of creating wealth!

As the Mogambo Guru likes to say, "We're screwed."

Looming Financial Disaster

I won't dwell on explaining the details of Ms. Moyo's fascinating, scary book. Suffice to say that we in the U.S. and West face looming financial disaster, and let's not waste time arguing about it. Well, OK. Deny it if you want.

Just understand and accept that the rest of the world sees a particularly unhappy future for the U.S., even if the U.S. collectively happens not to notice or care. (Of course, if you're an Agora Financial reader, you're used to getting this kind of gloomy thinking on a routine basis, and with both barrels.)

Point is, the rest of the world sees an American future of more and more unpayable, unsustainable debt. The rest of the world sees the U.S. government, and its monetary authorities, fighting long-term insolvency with endless tranches of short-term liquidity.

It's undeniable that more and more dollars are regularly entering the global financial system. On the flip side, more and more of the world's people, institutions and foreign nations are working to get away from the sinking Western ship of state, with that crazy captain Uncle Sam up in the wheelhouse.

The New "New World"

Thus it's not just a new world out there. It's a new "New World," a phrase with an interesting origin.

Have you heard of something called IBSAMAR? It's an acronym for a diplomatic and military initiative between the governments of India, Brazil and South Africa, hence the IBSA part of the term.

The effort deals with maritime affairs—hence the MAR—namely sea control in the South Atlantic and Indian Oceans. The naval alliance makes strategic sense, in that South Africa is located between these two of the world's great bodies of water.

Additionally, the geology of three continents dictates that the offshore regions of Brazil, India and South Africa hold immense volumes of hydrocarbons—much of which is yet to be discovered, let alone lifted to the surface.

So what of IBSAMAR? "We are three navies on the rise," said recently-retired South African Navy Admiral "Rusty" Higgs, whom I first interviewed during a trip to Cape Town in 2008. Adm. Higgs is referring to India, Brazil, and South Africa and their brand-new fleets of powerful warships.

In late 2010, ships from India, Brazil and South Africa staged a major international sea exercise, working in combination to perform antisubmarine and air-defense drills. You'd never have seen anything like this, as recently as five years ago. But now, with new ships and new visions of a changing world, this naval combination of three emerging nations is a military reality.

"This is the new, 'New World,'" added Adm. Higgs, incidentally a graduate of the U.S. Naval War College.

Fighting for Africa's Place

In a recent address to a major international conference at the University of Cape Town, Adm. Higgs stated that Africa is "beset with issues of security, and we are fighting for a place in this new 'New World' for South Africa and the rest of the continent." In other words, South Africa must—for its own good and on behalf of the rest of Africa—assert itself as a force not just locally or regionally, but internationally.

In one major effort to assert leadership on behalf of Africa, back when Adm. Higgs was the Flag of the Fleet—operational commander of the South African Navy—he sent one of his nation's newest frigates on a "friendship" visit to China. It was the first-ever visit of a navy warship of any African nation to China.

Establishing Credibility

The South African Navy ship visit to China began as a modest curiosity, and ended with powerful political and strategic overtones.

"I wanted to let the Chinese know," Adm. Higgs told me, "that we in Africa have the capability to navigate to China, just as they can sail to our continent." He continued, "What (our) new frigates and submarines have done is make the South African Navy a credible force."

Credibility is critical, especially in a world where large nations want large volumes of important things from smaller countries.

Following this line of thinking, Adm. Higgs said, "We sent the frigate SAS Spioenkop to Shanghai (in 2008), and she had a big impact in China, as a modern ship with a full rainbow nation crew, receiving national TV coverage. Senior Chinese military and naval commanders confessed that they had not believed that an African country could operate such a ship. Now, leaders from other African navies are coming to us for advice."

My view is to expect more of this kind of thing, in many variants. Expect to see more evidence of more countries of this world acting more independently.

Expect the U.S. to have less influence, and this in a world where important things — energy and minerals, in particular— become more expensive and dollars decline in purchasing power.

On the Oil Front

Along those lines, geopolitical and economic factors should keep the price of oil near $100 for the foreseeable future. The only break from the $100 monotony will be occasional, dramatic upward spikes.

According to a recent talk by University of Houston professor Michael Economides, "$100 oil is here to stay. ... If Algeria goes the way of Libya, it will be $140. If Saudi Arabia does, $200. If Israel attacks Iran, it will go to $300." Prof. Economides pulled no punches as he laid out several key bases for understanding the global energy industry.

First, the world will continue to rely on hydrocarbons far into the future, certainly into the 2050 time frame. Alternative energy sources, such as solar and wind power, are simply not economic, and exist mostly due to massive tax and regulatory subsidies. Second, China's increasing demand for energy will create a "choke point." China has already overtaken the U.S. in fossil fuel use. Chinese demand will define and control the efforts energy industry for many decades to come.

Third, there's an "axis of energy militancy" that includes Russia, Venezuela and Iran. This axis will take advantage of Western policy mistakes, such as we see with current U.S. energy policy offshore, onshore the lower 48 states, and in Alaska.

Expect Venezuela, Iran, and Russia to hold non-producing or low-producing nations hostage. According to Prof. Economides, Venezuelan president Hugo Chavez is a "basket case (and) a Castro wannabe without the charisma," while Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin "has Sovietized the Russian energy industry."

Fourth, in the "good news" department, U.S. shale gas and oil production will transform the domestic energy industry, as long as the politicians and regulators don't muck it up too much. Indeed, there's a "shale gale" blowing, based on new technology. If shale gas development continues apace, it'll mark a "full paradigm shift in domestic energy."

20110520-02	17:46	SteveB	Re: "South Africa's New 'New World'"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------------

Dear Dennis,

Ya, we're sinking fast, but I'm pretty sure Newt, Sarah, Mitt, or Barack will save us and everything will be all better!

20110520-03	18:03	GaryF	Video: "The Scariest Path In The World"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---

Video: "The Scariest Path In The World" — <http://zanylol.com/path.html>.

Next time you're in Spain and fancy a bit of exercise...

The entrances for this trail are closed but not policed. It was built in the 1920's for hydro workers. There are no railings. There is a chain to hold onto, but it doesn't hold much weight and several people have fallen to their deaths. This is an amazing walk and should have you on the edge of your seat possibly feeling slightly dizzy. It's 6 minutes long and should be watched till the very end.

To intensify the experience, click on the full screen button (button that looks like four arrows on the lower right hand side of the screen when the player comes up). It's enough to make you nauseous, especially when you consider that it was filmed by someone who made the hike carrying a video camera.

This walkway now serves as an approach to Makinodromo, the famous climbing sector of El Chorro in Spain's Andalucia. And it is the hairiest path. The area of El Chorro situated in the south of Spain is renowned amongst travelers and mountain hikers for its stunning scenery and climbs, yet this is not the main attraction on offer, El Chorro is host to one of the most dangerous walkways in the world, built by workers to transport materials between the Chorro and Gaitanejo Falls.

20110521-01 06:36 SteveB Re: Boyhood Adventures

Dear SteveG,

Jeez! I do not remember that...and I hate it when that happens! I have a notebook where I've written down the names and what I can remember of everyone I've ever known. I find it to be a valuable exercise. When I remember someone but their name escapes me, it bothers me. Then, sometimes, weeks later, it will come to me...sometimes not yet... About like my memory has always been...

20110521-02 09:08 SteveB "Coca-Crazed Concept"

Dear Ben,

Bolivia...no mucho fricking frakking...instead...

"Coca-Crazed Concept" posted by Carl, National Review

Apr. 19, 2011, (<http://www.nationalreview.com/planet-gore/264395/bolivia-recognizes-natural-rights-nature-chris-horner>) (<http://nooilforpacifists.blogspot.com/2011/04/coca-crazed-concept.html>)

(First Switzerland, then Ecuador—now, Bolivia's about to become the third country to grant plants "human rights".)

Bolivia is set to pass the world's first [sic] laws granting all nature equal rights to humans. The Law of Mother Earth, now agreed by politicians and grassroots social groups, redefines the country's rich mineral deposits as "blessings" and is expected to lead to radical new conservation and social measures to reduce pollution and control industry.

The country, which has been pilloried by the U.S. and Britain in the UN climate talks for demanding steep carbon emission cuts, will establish 11 new rights for nature. They include: the right to life and to exist; the right to continue vital cycles and processes free from human alteration; the right to pure water and clean air; the right to balance; the right not to be polluted; and the right to not have cellular structure modified or genetically altered.

Controversially, it will also enshrine the right of nature "to not be affected by mega-infrastructure and development projects that affect the balance of ecosystems and the local inhabitant communities".

"It makes world history. Earth is the mother of all", said Vice-President Alvaro García Linera. "It establishes a new relationship between man and nature, the harmony of which must be preserved as a guarantee of its regeneration." Imagine legislating starvation. But wait, there's more. What's created in Bolivia might become compelled worldwide,

Bolivia is drawing up a draft UN treaty which would give Mother Earth the same rights as humans, including the right to life, to pure water and clean air.

The South American country wants the UN to recognize the Earth as a living entity that humans have sought to 'dominate and exploit'

Bolivia's ambassador to the UN, Pablo Salo, says his country seeks to achieve harmony with nature, and hinted that mining and other companies would come under greater scrutiny.

Crazy or addled, right? Yes—but consistent with the radical environmental agenda says lawyer/blogger Wesley Smith:

I can think of fewer ways to subvert human exceptionalism and destroy human prosperity than to give "nature" co-equal "rights" with humans. And remember, possessing rights implies personhood. So as the story said, this is about personalizing nature and the earth.

It's all part of progressives' plan to return civilization to the stone age—which doomsayers imagine as paradise lost.

20110521-03 09:30 SteveB Re: End Big Oil Tax Subsidies

Dear Pam,

Yes...the world is a rather nice mess. But, what the hey? The world as we know it is ending at 6:00 pm EST today, so I guess it's all OK. The expensive full-page ads all week in USA Today say so. I took all my money out of the bank in small bills, lugged it to the highest point at Disney World, and cast it to the winds. I almost got arrested because of the ensuing riot, but since they knew the end was near, they understood and let me go. Jeez, I sure hope all that gets me in the right door!

Meanwhile, Marci gets sworn-in on Wednesday, I sold my new Civic in one day with an ad on Craigslist, and turned my frequent flyer miles into first class tickets to Santa Cruz on June 14. It will be good to get back home to a somewhat normal life again. (I have come to realize that my life never gets exactly "normal".) After a mere seven years, Marci and I are getting along great. It can be kinda hard when two doms get together. :-)

The weather is mighty hot, but we're in a good place for walking to nearby restaurants, etc.

Hope your spring, family, and grandpunks are all great. Mine are!

20110521-04 10:10 Bill Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"

Dear GaryF and SteveB,

Thanks. Loved it. Some trail maintenance needed. Can't imagine the back-breaking toil involved in building this mountain camino. Have been on some trails like this one, clinging to the vertical face and tip-toeing along the footing. It's a rush, but you have to stop and think from time to time to keep yourself safe.

20110521-05 11:00 SteveB Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"

Dear Bill,

I agree...really love this kind of stuff and hope I can do this Spanish trail someday. I guess they're never going to do that maintenance, so it had better be soon.

I have been across a couple of old "Inca" bridges in Bolivia/Peru that scared my pants off. One of the two ladies I was with peed her pants!

Another great trail, after a lot of effort, is the "Knife Edge" along the top of Mt. Katahdin in Maine's Baxter State Park. It's a narrow little natural ledge, up and down, up and down, nothing really to hold on to, with about a 2000' drop, sometimes down both sides of you, other times just one side. Talk about feeling on top of the world! I've done it about six times, I believe, but probably never again. It's a very hard climb just to get there and the entire day, up and down, is 12-14 hours the way I've usually done it, up Roaring Brook Trail. The best was once when I got to stay/camp on top of the mountain overnight and see every star in the universe, but it's tricky because it can snow any time of year up there. Ah, those were the days! That is being alive!

20110521-06 11:32 Bill Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"

Dear SteveB,

Our best climbing and exploring days may be in the past, but we can be comforted by the fact that we can all still pee in our pants.

20110521-07 12:10 SteveB Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"

Dear Bill,

Damn! I wish I could find that comforting! I'll let you know how comforting it is the first time I do it...in about 30 years, I hope. (Well...I hope it's a long time, not that I do it.) :-)

20110521-08 14:05 SteveG Re: Boyhood Adventures

Dear SteveB,

I also remember you and I going to Big Walnut and playing adventurer along the creek bank. Some of the time we got together while you were at Purdue I do not remember.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110521-09 15:08 SteveB Re: Boyhood Adventures

Dear SteveG,

Ah...the Big Walnut. We had so many good times there...with you and Bastin and Clark (both now gone). As small as it was and strange as it seems, that was the "body of water" that is most responsible for my love of sailing and all things on the water. We always wanted to raft down to New Orleans, remember?

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110521-10 15:58 SteveB To: President Obama about Israel

Dear Mr. President,

I was astounded by your speech the other day about beginning negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians by returning to the pre-1967 borders. I voted for you and I am not even Jewish, but excuse me, this is ludicrous! Are you trying to "stoke" the Arab world? Why do that without first getting concessions, like getting a lowering of the price of oil? Maybe you've noticed it's rather high?

I was expecting you to talk about how you plan to end the Libyan "problem", or to get tough with Syria, or tell us your plan for Egypt...something other than borrowing $2 billion more from China to give away at the expense of the American taxpayers. I was expecting something intelligent and creative. I was not expecting you to simply try to suck-up to the Arabs!

You seem to be on the wrong side of this important issue. I'm very disappointed in you again!

--SteveB

20110521-11 15:58 B. Obama Re: Israel

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for your message. On behalf of President Obama, we appreciate hearing from you. The President has promised the most transparent administration in history, and we are committed to listening to and responding to you.

In order to better handle the millions of electronic messages we are receiving and respond more quickly, we have implemented a new contact form on our website:

<http://www.whitehouse.gov/contact/>

Please note that this web form has replaced comments@whitehouse.gov. That email address is no longer monitored, so we encourage you to resubmit your message through the link above. Thank you for using the web form and helping us improve communications with you.

Sincerely, The Presidential Correspondence Team (president@whitehouse.gov)

20110521-12	16:21	GaryF	Re: Israel
-----------------------------	-------	-------	------------

Dear SteveB,

I don't (too) often disagree with you, but, what's wrong with the pre' 1967 borders being a starting point with "Land Swaps" to be considered. For instance, Israel could possibly get the Golan Heights with Palestine getting a corridor to Gaza. Another thing to address is the fact that Israel is controlling 80% of the water in this area, and without water Palestine will remain a dry barren land only being able to grow militants. The other thing is the Arabs don't control the price of oil, thanks to Bush/Cheney and their energy summit, remember that, when Cheney and the heads of the oil companies got together behind closed doors in DC and came out with the plan of allowing oil to trade as a commodity, and then going all the way to the supreme court to fight against making their deliberations public. I also would have like to hear more about Libya and Syria, or how about Saudi Arabia. But let's be realistic, an American president finally had the balls to stand up against Israel and the Jewish lobby (they donate lots of money too) and say what virtually the rest of the world is in favor of. Without a secure Palestine, there will never be a secure Israel.

20110521-13	18:00	SteveG	Re: Boyhood Adventures
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------

Dear SteveB,

The big walnut was our only connection to water and the outside world. I remember playing there when it was flooding too - really rapid. Bastin and Clark were good ones. It was a good thing Cooper was older so he could buy us beer. Also remember some trips to Indiana Reach. Used your draft card one night to get into the bar - they made me sign a piece of paper and compared signatures. And then there was the night you got us run out of Terre Haute.

20110521-14	18:08	SteveB	Re: Boyhood Adventures
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------

Dear SteveG,

Haha! Yes...I remember. Two other guys I played on the Big Walnut with a lot were Elmore and Finkbinder. It's funny...all four of those guys are gone now. Really a shame. Also Templeman and Stauch. All great, exceptional people and friends.

I guess I'm getting into a somber mood since the world only has a couple of hours left...

Good luck in the next phase.

20110522-01	09:53	SteveB	Re: Israel
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------

Dear GaryF,

Good points, but I think as long as Hamas, etc. keep attacking Israel and refuse to even acknowledge Israel's right to exist, you have to play hardball with them. Unfortunately, that's the only thing they seem to understand. Weakness is death with these kind, gentle folks. Obama is a c*ck sucker, just like all these other American politicians. Why has no one been arrested for the Great Recession banking debacle? The only thing he is a little better than are the Republicans.

20110523-01	08:38	SteveB	2012 Republican Candidates
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------------------------

Mmmm...it seems like, as I've said, any Republicans with any brains (and they are few and far between) are avoiding a 2012 Presidential run like the plague! Let me see...that leaves...LOL!

20110523-02	09:06	SteveB	"AP Exclusive: Former Palin Aide Pens Tell-All"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

I know...she's not worth the trouble...but maybe she's just dumb enough to run (though I think she'd rather just continue trying to get rich). And maybe after this book and the next one (by Joe McGinniss), she will decide it isn't worth the embarrassment.

Again, I particularly love the comments (a few of which are presented, below).

"AP Exclusive: Former Palin Aide Pens Tell-All" by Becky Bohrer, AP

May 23, 2011, (<http://abcnews.go.com/US/wireStory?id=13662873#.TxcGOG9SQhI>)

(JUNEAU, Alaska) A former member of Sarah Palin's inner circle has written a scathing tell-all, saying Palin was ready to quit as governor months before she actually resigned and was eager to leave office when more lucrative opportunities came around.

"In 2009 I had the sense if she made it to the White House and I had stayed silent, I could never forgive myself," Frank Bailey told The Associated Press.

Palin's attorney did not respond to multiple requests for comment for this story.

Blind Allegiance to Sarah Palin: A Memoir of Our Tumultuous Years is due out Tuesday and based on tens of thousands of emails that Bailey said he kept during his time with Palin. It began with working on her 2006 gubernatorial campaign and continued through her failed run for vice president in 2008 and her brief stint as governor.

The Alaska attorney general's office has said it's investigating Bailey's use of the emails. Executive ethics laws bar former public officials from using information acquired during their work for personal gain if the information hasn't been publicly disseminated.

The state has yet to release thousands of emails that Palin sent and received during her 2 1/2 years as governor. Bailey's attorney has said Bailey took "great care" to ensure his writings were consistent with legal requirements.

Billed as the first Palin book by a former aide, "Blind Allegiance" bolsters the perception of Palin as self-serving, while casting Bailey as her enforcer—willing to do the dirty work, no questions asked.

Bailey became a footnote in Alaska political history by getting embroiled in an investigation of Palin's firing of her police commissioner over allegations the commissioner wouldn't fire trooper Mike Wooten, who'd had a bitter divorce with Palin's sister. Bailey was caught on tape questioning a state trooper official about why Wooten was still employed.

Bailey, who was Palin's director of boards and commissions, was put on leave after news of the recording broke, though he claims his actions were with the prodding of Palin's husband, Todd. In spite of this, and what he describes as campaigns by Sarah Palin over the years to tear down others who have crossed or confronted her, he stuck around.

To speak up when he saw things he didn't agree with "went against all that investment of time and energy that I put into her," said Bailey. He said he "shed his family," his wife and two kids, to singularly focus on Palin during her rise to the governor's office and beyond.

When Palin burst onto the statewide political scene, she was seen as a "breath of fresh air" amid the corruption that had seeped into Alaska politics. "We looked at her as ... that queen on a horse that could come in and save the state," he said. "As we started to see that that was not the case, I kept silent and I just kept on working."

Among the claims made in the book: that Palin's 2006 gubernatorial campaign coordinated with the Republican Governors Association, or RGA, in violation of campaign rules. The book describes cameras rolling as Palin strode through the door at an Anchorage hotel "over and over and over," for an RGA ad. At that time, there was a one-year statute of limitations on complaints, and the Alaska Public Offices Commission did not receive any complaints related to Palin and the association during that period. However, the RGA was fined—unrelated to Palin—for late reporting, according to the commission's executive director, Paul Dauphinais.

Bailey said the final straw for him came in the summer of 2009, when Palin didn't attend a rally he believed she'd repeatedly agreed to attend, for supporters of a voter initiative to require minors get parental consent for an abortion. This came after a string of cancellations, including one before a Republican women's group at the Ronald Reagan Library in California. Her aides claimed no one had committed to this well-publicized event..

"Getting Sarah to meetings and events was like nailing Jell-O to a tree," Bailey wrote. On the campaign trail and as governor, Sarah went through at least ten schedulers, with few lasting more than months. Nobody wanted the job because Sarah might fail to honor, at the last minute, the smallest commitments, and making excuses for her became a painful burden."

By the time she cancelled on the parental notification event in Anchorage, Palin had resigned as Alaska's governor and embarked on a new path, one in which she'd become a best-selling author, highly sought-after speaker, political phenom and prospective presidential candidate.

Bailey claims her heart wasn't in governing after she returned to Alaska from her failed run for vice president. At home, she faced a barrage of ethics complaints—nearly all of which were ultimately dismissed—and Bailey said she told him as early as Feb., 2009 that if she could find the right message to tell Alaskans, she'd "quit tomorrow."

She resigned in July 2009.

Bailey confesses to "a ton of mistakes" and speaks of a return to God; he said his church has become a sanctuary and that he's reconnected with his family. He said writing the book—which itself has generated controversy—was cathartic.

In February, the book project also made headlines when a draft manuscript was leaked. An attorney for Bailey and his co-writers accused author Joe McGinniss, who has his own Palin book coming out this year. McGinniss' attorney acknowledged McGinniss selectively shared the manuscript, but said the manuscript included no request for confidentiality.

Bailey dismisses any suggestion he's disgruntled or bitter; he said he got a front-row seat to state and national politics and was able to recommend judges and set up "hundreds" of board positions. "Yeah, there were some tough, tough times but hopefully I've learned from some of that," he said. "Time will tell."

He said he has no ill feelings toward Palin, with whom he says he hasn't spoken since the fall of 2009. If anything, he said, he feels sad for her.

"I'm sad at a lot of wasted potential," said Bailey, who believed she could accomplish more than she did as governor. "I certainly don't hate her but I look at a lot of wasted opportunities on her part."

Comments:

"All of 'em, any of 'em that have been in front of me over all these years." —Sarah Palin, unable to name a single newspaper or magazine she reads, interview with Katie Couric, CBS News, Oct. 1, 2008

"Sarah Palin = the Paris Hilton of politics.

"I think on a national level your Department of Law there in the White House would look at some of the things that we've been charged with and automatically throw them out."—Sarah Palin, referring to a department that does not exist while attempting to explain why as president she wouldn't be subjected to the same ethics investigations that compelled her to resign as governor of Alaska, ABC News interview, July 7, 2009

I wonder if she knows what "separation of church and state" means. But the people best qualified to be our nation's leaders (rather than more useless managers) aren't brain-dead or altruistic enough to run. So we're stuck with Republicans, Democrats, and Palinites pretending to be what our country needs.

This woman is getting far too much attention for someone with so little content.

Should be titled "How I quit my government job and made millions off of mindless fools by selling them books and telling them all how great I am". A little long witted but then isn't she.

As a lifelong Republican, I ask only one thing of Sarah Palin: Go away now!

"They're in charge of the U.S. Senate so if they want to they can really get in there with the senators and make a lot of good policy changes that will make life better for Brandon and his family and his classroom."—Sarah Palin, getting the vice president's constitutional role wrong after being asked by a third grader what the vice president does, interview with NBC affiliate KUSA in Colorado, Oct. 21, 2008

If only I could say I had worked for Sarah—maybe I could make some money from the idiotic Palin feeding frenzy that the media keeps going, and going, and going. Give me a thumbs-up if you can agree with me to stop following dopey Palin gossip coverage!! Then maybe something worth reading will appear? (Don't hold your breath...)

20110524-01	13:04	SteveB	2012 Election & Fw: Alan Grayson
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

Here's the way the 2012 election shapes-up: 48% of the vote automatically goes to Obama, because it is black and Hispanic minorities. Add to that many of the other Democrats and Independents. Now, with Paul Ryan's Medicare "plan", the seniors will swing to Obama en masse. Add to that most of the teachers in the country, since Republicans are hell-bent on eliminating a living wage and destroying our schools. And on Obama's landslide coattails will ride a Congressional majority of Democrats. It's a done deal. The Republicans have committed suicide.

This is why no honorable, intelligent Republican candidates want to run for President in 2012.

Now, if we could just convince these Democrats to do the right things to pull the country out of its current quagmire. If we could just end the corruption!

below thanks to Dennis:

Alan Grayson was on national TV on Friday night, attacking the Ryan Plan to end Medicare. The MSNBC host, Cenk Uygur, asked Grayson to explain why every Republican Presidential candidate has lined up in favor of the Ryan Plan. Still telling it like it is, this is what Grayson said:

AG: Listen, only 4 percent of all Americans ever vote in a Republican primary. That's 4 percent. The other 96 percent are the normal Americans. The 4 percent are people who must never get sick, because they don't want to have Medicare. Now think about that. Every other industrialized country in the entire world not only provides health care for its seniors, but health care for everyone. And the Republican right wing is trying to tell us that somehow we can't afford health care for our seniors. We've got 40,000 Americans under the age of 65 who die every year, because they can't afford to see a doctor when they're sick. And now they want to extend that [tragedy] to the most infirmed, most victimized, sickest part of the population, our senior citizens, so that more will die. I honestly believe that if Rush Limbaugh and Glenn Beck announced one day that they were in favor of the Black Death, you'd see every Republican primary candidate for President go along with it.

CU: (Laughter). You know, it depends. If Obama said, "Hey, I'd like to cure the Black Death," they'd be like, "Oh, I don't know, the Black Death sounds pretty good." So, now look, I think they've done tremendous damage to themselves. The polls are 70 percent and higher. They're on your side, Congressman Grayson. They say, "We don't want you to touch our Medicare." So what are they doing here? Do they have a plan? You know, is Rush Limbaugh or Fox News, are they doing some sort of strategy that we can't understand? Or are they just plain stupid?

AG: They are tools. It's that simple. They are tools. You know, George Carlin said it back in 2005, they have made us ignorant, these people who own the country. They have made us ignorant and they have made us poor. And now the next thing they want to do is to take away our Medicare and our Social Security. He said that in 2005, and it's taken six year to make it obvious that that's true. And God bless them, these Republicans like Ryan, you know, they may be cruel, they may be heartless, but at least they're honest. They've told us exactly what they want to do with the power that they have accumulated. They want to take away Social Security and Medicare from our senior citizens.

CU: You know, I think you nailed it. I think what it is, is corporations that have, you know, run amuck. It's out-of-control greed. Whether it's the banks with all the risks that they're taking, it's gonna crash our economy again. Whether it's the oil companies at the height of being the most profitable companies in the world, they still want to take billions in subsidies from the American taxpayers. And whether it's these guys trying to cut your Medicare so they can cut taxes for the rich. I think they got the note from the, you know, the richest people in the country, from the corporations who said: "Hit the gas pedal. We don't give a damn. We're going to out-raise these guys. We're gonna get more money, and this is the time to put 'em away. Just tell 'em what you're going to do. It doesn't matter; we're just going to outspend them during the elections." I think that's what's happening. Now the problem is they are going to outspend the Democrats in elections, so how do you deal with that problem?

AG: Well, it's apparent now that what these owners want is nothing from the rest of us except for cheap labor. And that makes the senior citizens particularly vulnerable to their plans, because the senior citizens don't work. So from the perspective of the owners of this country, they're useless. Their time in the economy is over and therefore they serve no purpose. But senior citizens still do vote and they voted in huge numbers in the last election, because the Republicans lied to them, and they told them that the Democrats wanted to take away their Medicare. Now they see that the Democrats are the only ones protecting their Medicare, and Republicans are out to destroy it. There's a reason why we call Medicare "an entitlement." It's because you're entitled to it. It's not Medicare any more if you are not entitled to it any more. They want to take away the privilege of Medicare. They want to take away the right to Medicare, and replace it with a piece of paper they know will not be enough to cover the costs of care. And that's how malevolent they really are. So I will say to senior citizens of this country: "Now you see the truth. You see their true colors. And the only thing you can do about it is turn out and vote for the only people in this country who are actually trying to protect you and your interests: the Democratic Party."

CU: Alrighty. Former Democratic Congressman from Florida, Alan Grayson, very clear as always. Thank you so much.

AG: Thank you, Cenk.

20110524-02	19:23	SteveB	"FSC Republicans Vote to Prohibit Implementation of Derivatives Rules Until Late 2012"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

These Republican are devoted, boot-licking slaves to big money! They must and will be stopped before they completely destroy us!

The bill they want to kill doesn't even go nearly far enough. It doesn't, for example, do anything to curb the speculation in the commodity markets which have driven the price of oil sky-high.

"FSC Republicans Vote to Prohibit Implementation of Derivatives Rules Until Late 2012", House Press Release

May 24, 2011, (<http://democrats.financialservices.house.gov/press/PRArticle.aspx?NewsID=1424>)

(WASHINGTON) The House Financial Services Committee today, over the unanimous objection of committee Democrats, passed legislation to prohibit, for more than two years the enactment of the Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, the implementation of provisions in the law having to do with the regulation of derivatives. The reckless use of derivatives contributed to the downfall of AIG and fueled the liquidity crisis which imperiled many of the nation's largest financial institutions. Today's action represents a third wave of attack on the financial reform law by House Republicans.

The Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act gives the SEC and CFTC authority to regulate the use derivatives. It also creates transparency in markets for derivatives by requiring that most are traded on exchanges, and that details of these transactions, including price, are reported. In addition, the law is designed to minimize the risk of financial contagion of the sort caused by AIG, by requiring that participants in derivatives markets have sufficient capital to support their trades.

The Republican bill, H.R. 1573, was originally written to prohibit implementation of the derivatives rules until Dec. 31, 2012—after the 2012 elections. After coming under criticism from committee Democrats, Republicans offered and passed an amendment which would push the date up until Sept. 30, 2012, only thirty-seven days before the November election.

The markup process revealed a rift in the Republican caucus when Committee Chairman Spencer Bachus supported an amendment by Massachusetts Congressman Stephen Lynch; the amendment was opposed by other Republican committee Members. The Lynch amendment would restore the ability of the SEC and the CFTC to address issues related to speculative trading, including the establishment of position limits on swaps for commodities like crude oil. Speculation in crude oil markets is thought by many to be responsible for up to 20% of the recent increase in the cost of gasoline. The Lynch amendment passed on a voice vote.

The vote on final passage of the bill fell completely along party lines. The passage of the Republican bill to prohibit implementation of derivatives provisions until late 2012 is a third wave of attack on the Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, which Congress passed into law in July 2010 over the almost unanimous opposition of House and Senate Republicans. Earlier this year, House Republicans passed a budget for FY 2012 which includes large cuts in the budgets of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, agencies charged with overseeing key aspects of the financial reform law. If the House budget becomes law, it is likely that both agencies will have difficulty carrying out the increased oversight of the financial services industry mandated by the law. Earlier this month, Republican Members of the House Financial Services Committee also mounted an attack on the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, passing legislation which would create a five-person committee to oversee the Bureau instead of the single Director as designated in the financial reform law. During the same week, Senate Republicans announced that they would not vote to confirm anyone to head the CFPB unless the plans for the Bureau were completely overhauled.

20110525-01	18:36	Dennis	"Ways to Stand Up to Bullying and Corruption"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

"Ways to Stand Up to Bullying and Corruption" from Coffee Party USA email

The Elizabeth Warren/Patrick McHenry confrontation on Capitol Hill yesterday was one of those rare moments in history when a single event symbolizes an enduring struggle. Rep. McHenry's behavior not only brought into focus the sort of hyper-partisan incivility that inspired the birth of the Coffee Party, it connected the tactic of bullying to the corrupting influence of money in politics.

McHenry's known top campaign sponsors include Bank of America, Wells Fargo, the American Bankers Association, JP Morgan & Chase, Goldman Sachs and Mortgage Bankers Association. Unfortunately for America, he is currently serving as the Chairman of the House Subcommittee on TARP, Financial Services and Bailouts of Public and Private Programs.

This is the crux of the problem in Washington. There is an inherent conflict of interest that is structural in nature, not just behavioral. This incident, captured on video and seen by millions in America, provides us with a real opportunity to change our country for the better. Here are four things you can do:

1. Write to President Obama, and demand that he not be bullied. He must nominate Elizabeth Warren to the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. He knows that she is the most qualified for the job. In two days, we have already sent over 1,000 letters.

2. Write to Congress, and let them know that we want strong consumer protection. An independent agency with Elizabeth Warren as the director can be the start of a firewall protecting us from abusive banking practices that led to the financial crisis of 2008. In two weeks, we've already sent 14,000 letters.
3. Join the thousands of Americans who have commented on Patrick McHenry's Facebook page to let him know how we feel about bullying and corruption.
4. Register for our RAPID RESPONSE CALL TONIGHT at 6:30 pm PT/9:30 pm ET, join our Elizabeth Warren Facebook page, or, volunteer for this initiative.

Friends, Big Money is winning in Washington. But, the game is not over.

The fact that there are people like Elizabeth Warren still in the fight should tell us something. It's imperative that we support her and the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. We want and need this agency to become the start of a firewall to protect us from unregulated, risky, criminal behavior of big banks that led the 2008 financial crisis.

This is not about politics. This is about our families and our future. Please take action today. They have money, but we are many.

—Annabel, Eric, Billy, and the Coffee Party team

P.S.—To help grow the movement, please join the Coffee Party as an official member or donate to our actions. Visit us: <http://coffeepartyusa.com>.

20110526-01	18:29	Dennis	Insider Trading by Corrupt Congressmen
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

And you thought they were public servants who only got free health care.....

In a new academic study, four university professors examined investment results on more than 16,000 stock transactions made by 300 House delegates from 1985 to 2001. The result was clear: They beat the market by an average of 0.55% per month, around 6.6% a year. The professors note a previous study showed members of the U.S. Senate did so well they outperformed hedge funds.

In fact, if members of Congress didn't beat the market, they'd be bigger morons than you already think they are. Why? Because insider trading laws don't apply to members of Congress... You heard that correctly. The Securities and Exchange Act does not apply to members of the U.S. Senate or House of Representatives. Congressional ethics rules say Congressional members aren't allowed to use privileged information for personal gain. But it's just a rule, not a law. It's not legally enforceable. And it's obvious they're taking excess profits out of the stock market...

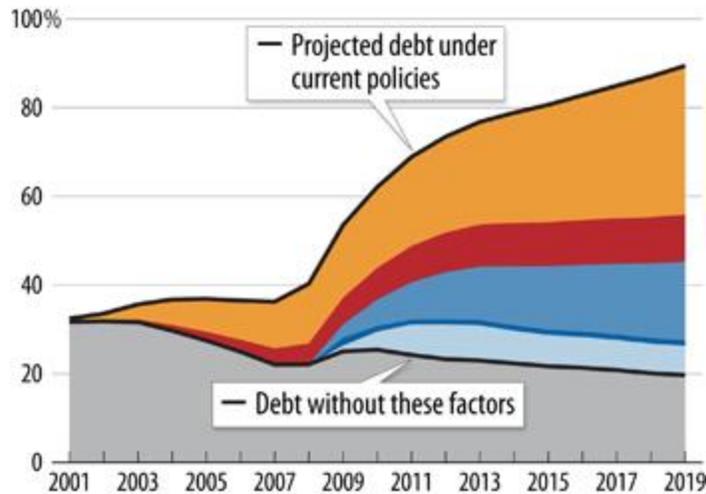

This must be one of the most underreported financial stories of the century. Take one example: The Senate Armed Services Committee forbids staff and presidential appointees requiring Senate confirmation from owning securities in more than 48,000 companies that contract with the Defense Department. But 19 of the 28 senators on that same committee held assets worth between $3.8 million to $10.2 million in companies on the prohibited list between 2004 and 2009.

20110527-01	15:34	SteveB	"Tax Cuts, Wars Account for Nearly Half of Public Debt by 2019"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

This chart from MoveOn.org illustrates the side of the problem all Republicans and many Democrats don't seem to want to talk about. The real problem is not education and "entitlements", which really pay for themselves and are necessary. The real problem that imperils our nation is the ridiculous Bush tax cuts and the even more ridiculous wars.

Tax Cuts, Wars Account For Nearly Half Of Public Debt By 2019

Debt held by the public as a share of GDP

Source: CBPP analysis based on Congressional Budget Office estimates.
Center on Budget and Policy Priorities | cbpp.org

Folks in D.C. say that if we want to get serious about our nation's debt, we need to slash essential programs like Medicare, Social Security, and our children's education.

But as we all know, it's just not true. Yes, our public debt has ballooned in the past decade, but no, it's not for the reasons people talk about.

20110527-02 17:25 Ben Let's Just Call Them 'Fascists'

Dear SteveB,

... Let's just call them "the Fascists". There is nothing "conservative" about them.

Maybe it'll stick.

20110527-03 18:36 SteveB Re: Let's Just Call Them 'Fascists'

Dear Ben,

Why not? The Republicans keep calling the rest of us socialists and even communists!

20110528-01 09:00 SteveG Re: "Tax Cuts, Wars Account for Nearly Half of Public Debt by 2019"

The graphs I have looked at indicated that we came through WW II, Korean War, Cold War, Vietnam virtually debt free. The real rise in debt started with Gulf War 1, was controlled and started down under Clinton, and then skyrocketed under George W. Bush. Some of the previous tax rates were 70-90% of what was made over $500,000—we paid for wars, etc. as we went. We had money for Medicaid, Medicare, SSN. Since we have paid specific taxes for Medicaid, Medicare, and SSN, are they entitlements?

Here, they are going to provide 1/2 day kindergarten—if you want full day that will cost you $350- 500 per month. Conversely—there is a good community college system and certain high school students could attend at no additional fees receiving their associates degree at the same time as their high school diploma at no additional costs—now they will have to pay 10% of the tuition costs at the community college—not a bad deal. Teachers in public schools are taking a 2% CUT, community colleges a 3% CUT. Education and health care are not the places to cut—$690 billion defense budget???

20110528-02 14:42 SteveB Fw: Social Security Is Insurance, Not an 'Entitlement'

I couldn't agree more and neither could the American people—overwhelmingly! "Entitlement" is just another dirty Republican lie. This subject is suicide for the Republicans! Whoopie!

[Source of original email unknown. Not found anywhere online. —SteveB]

Social Security used to be called SSI on paychecks. That was for Social Security INSURANCE. Just like with any other kind of insurance you may need it and you may not. The idea of getting all you put in back is silly, and was never the intention of the program. Some will withdraw more than they put in, some will die immediately on retirement and withdraw almost nothing. No one wins or loses in either of those scenarios, it was simply insurance, and overall ALL the American people benefit from not having poor rickety seniors having to live under bridges just because they've outlived their savings.

Anyone who calls Social Security an "entitlement" is misrepresenting the facts and trying to re-write history for their own benefit—to steal seniors' benefits. It's a self-financing insurance program. Raising the payroll deduction by one percent would keep it solvent until the current wave of retiring baby boomers has subsided and things are in balance. Then reduce that one percent increase and everyone and everything is fine. But DON'T let those politicians tell you that YOU have to give up what you've been paying for all these years. And DON'T let them turn the program over to those Wall Street bankers, unless you really want to live under a bridge when you retire, because giving them all your retirement benefits will ensure you never see a penny.

20110529-01 09:36 Pam Re: Social Security Is Insurance, Not an 'Entitlement'

Dear SteveB,

You should put this on your Facebook page so more people will see it.

20110529-02 16:29 SteveB Re: Social Security Is Insurance, Not an 'Entitlement'

Dear Pam,

My instincts tell me, maybe wrongly, to keep serious stuff away from Facebook. I'm going to start a blog, like my hero, Pam, when it gets closer to the election.

I sure hope Sarah and Michele get in, so I have more to poke fun of. Newt is great material, though. Mitt might be (was he named after a baseball mitt?). The Donald would have been entertaining. Ron Paul is so radical that, sometimes, we rotates completely around an issue and comes out the other side, right. But more often cockeyed often wrong.

Doing a flurry of seeing friends and family as a preface to finally leaving Florida, or Flor-ee'-dah, as we say in Spanish. The weather's hot. Walked two hours today to try to take off some of these American pounds.

20110601-01 20:30 SteveB U.S. Economic Status — June, 1, 2011

1. Where are the jobs?

Not here, other countries, why would we need jobs in America of all places?

2. Where is the value we put into our homes, into the American Dream?

Down the tubes.

3. Why the war on unions, taxes, and education?

Well, fighting these evils was also the first priority of the Nazis.

4. When are the real wars, that have now killed 6000 fine, brave Americans, going to end?

You have to be kidding.

5. When will anyone be punished for the excesses of Wall Street that caused the Great Recession?

You have to be kidding.

6. When will we tackle illegal immigration?

You have to be kidding.

7. When will we end our political corruption funded by huge campaign contributions from the rich and powerful?

You have to be kidding.

8. When will our public servants in Congress wake up and stop their efforts to destroy Social Security, Medicare, and every other part of government dedicated to helping American tax payers?

As soon as Newt, Sarah, Ron, Mitt, Michele, or one of the other idiots gets elected...hahahahahaha!

What sad days our glory at its end...
Evil men seek to steal our dreams
And leave us with their nightmares.

©2011 Steven W. Baker

20110602-01 09:59 Ben Re: U.S. Economic Status — June, 1, 2011

Dear SteveB,

Why doesn't anyone ever mention the "collateral" costs of the war? Sure, my biggest concern is the loss of life and many a limb by our brave young soldiers, but—at least as many innocent human lives are lost. Not to mention the short-term and long-term economic impact of carpet-bombing entire nations. It's all from the same source, serving the same minorities only...

20110602-02 11:27 SteveB Re: U.S. Economic Status — June, 1, 2011

Dear Ben,

I guess the other casualties don't count because they're "furiners". And more of them are killed by their own people than by us, not that we're exactly blameless. But don't all the recent events in the Middle East and all the suicide bombings, etc. in Iraq and Afghanistan show us that we are dealing with truly evil m*ther f*ckers who are in power or want to take power in these countries? At least we have some concern for innocents. They don't. Not even for women, children, or fellow countrymen. If they could get to us, we would all be dead by horrible deaths. Don't doubt it for a minute.

Not that that makes continuing the wars any less stupid.

P.S. I don't think you'll find any incidents of carpet bombing in these wars.

20110604-01 08:08 SteveB "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

The idiocy begins...

I "love" the way her "mind" just riffs, even though it is so darned empty.

"Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride" by Amanda Carey, The Daily Caller

June 3, 2011, (<http://dailycaller.com/2011/06/03/sarah-palin-revises-history-of-paul-reveres-ride/>)

Sarah Palin's bus tour took her to Boston, Massachusetts on Thursday. While visiting Paul Revere's home, the potential presidential candidate botched the history of the famous midnight ride.

Of Paul Revere, Palin said, "He who warned the British that they weren't going to be taking away our arms by ringing those bells and making sure as he's riding his horse through town to send those warning shots and bells that we were going to be secure and we were going to be free."

Revere, of course, warned the colonists of Charlestown that the British were approaching on the night of Apr. 18, 1775 using lanterns ("one if by land, two if by sea")—not bells.

20110605-01 18:08 Lianne Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear SteveB,

I know. Can you believe it!

I hate that these Republican women are failing to represent my gender with grace, smarts and effectiveness. Gotta say, Hillary is doing a good job.

[Think about how President Obama must feel about Herman Cain! LOL! —SteveB]

20110605-02 19:53 SteveB Fw: Corporate Sponsors

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I think Congressmen should wear uniforms like NASCAR drivers so we could identify their corporate sponsors.

20110605-03 20:16 SteveB "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

More proof of the decline and fall of the greatest nation on Earth (formerly)...

The U.S. doesn't make the cut for Happiest Nations List. But, hey, we wouldn't want to actually DO anything about it, right? I guess we won't care if our people are prosperous and happy until they take to the streets and have to be shot in the name of "law and order", like in the extremely happy country of Syria!

"U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List" by Michael B. Sauter, Charles B. Stockdale, and Douglas A. McIntyre, 24/7 Wall St.

June 5, 2011, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/43287918/ns/businessworld_business/t/us-doesnt-make-cut-happiest-nations-list/?qt1=43001#)

(Feel good about yourself and your Life? there's a chance you might be Danish. Danish residents have consistently rated themselves as the happiest in the world for years in several different studies.)

What makes people happy? The question, which has been debated by philosophers for centuries, now is being tackled by international bureaucrats and the results are interesting, to say the least.

24/7 Wall St. analyzed the new Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Better Life Index to objectively determine the happiest countries in the world. The Index is based on 11 measurements of quality of life including housing, income, jobs, community, education, the environment, health, work-life balance, and life satisfaction. We made "life satisfaction" the cornerstone of our index because it is as good a proxy for "happiness" as the survey provides. We then compared "life satisfaction" scores to the other measurements to find those economic and sociopolitical realities that had the highest and lowest correlation to happiness.

The happiest people in the developed world get loads of social services without having to work too hard. Having abundant natural resources, a thriving services sector and a fairly homogeneous population helps as well. The OECD study no doubt would have had different results had it included politically unstable countries in the Middle East or large emerging economies where political unrest threatens to bubble over such as China.

24/7 Wall St. also looked at one critical factor that the OECD study overlooked—economic stability. Our measure of this was total national debt as a percent of GDP. The figure helps determine a country's ability to maintain present tax levels and social services. Odds are that countries with high debt-to-GDP ratios are more likely to need austerity policies to reign-in their government spending. Otherwise, their debt costs will soar.

Nations with long-term economic strength can also afford to support employment, education, and make health care widely available. Happiness viewed in this way means that people are more likely to feel better about themselves in Norway, which has almost no debt and great social services, than in Greece, which must slash entitlement spending or risk defaulting on its debt.

Old, stable nations of northern Europe took five of the top 10 spots on our list. These include Finland, Sweden, the Netherlands, Norway, and Denmark. Switzerland is also on the list and has many characteristics in common with the Scandinavian countries. The resource-rich, English-speaking countries of Australia and Canada made the cut as well.

Noticeably absent from the list are any OECD nations in Latin America, southern and eastern Europe and Asia. Many of the southern European nations like Greece, Portugal, and Spain are in economic trouble and have high unemployment. The employment and education opportunities are not as good in Mexico as in Canada, nor is the access to high-quality health care. Japan and South Korea each have stable societies, but the people in both countries tend to work long hours and have limited leisure time.

The happiest countries seem to be places where there is a good balance of work and leisure time. Not all nations can afford to keep unemployment low through government subsidies. Not all countries can afford to provide universal medical coverage. Not all countries can afford to educate almost all of their children, which in turn supports extremely high literacy rates and builds a population of skilled workers.

The ten nations on this list are rich in natural resources or highly developed service sectors. These are assets which are in short supply worldwide, and that bolsters the foundations of the economies in these countries. Money alone doesn't buy happiness, but it sure helps.

This is the 24/7 Wall St list of the Ten Countries With The Happiest People, most of which have bought and paid for prosperity because their economies have allowed them to do so.

10. Austria

Life satisfaction score:	8.39
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	65.7 percent (23rd lowest highest)
Employment Rate:	7.87 (9th best)
Self-reported health:	6.57 (19th best)
Employees working long hours:	8.01 (24th best)
Disposable income:	5.34 (3rd best)
Educational attainment:	8.43 (13th best)

Life expectancy: 7.58 (13th best)

Austria has the one of the highest levels of scores for disposable income (the amount of money the household earns after taxes) in the OECD. Roughly 72 percent of Austrians between the ages of 15 and 64 are working, compared to the OECD average of 65 percent. Only 1.13 percent of working-age Austrians have been unemployed for more than a year, compared to an average of 2.7 percent across the 34 OECD nations, which contributes to the country's long-term employment.

According to the OECD's latest economic outlook report, Austrian businesses have largely avoided having to implement layoffs to offset the effect of the recession, employing practices like "labor hoarding" which reduces working hours and requires workers to work part-time and share job shifts.

9. Israel

Life satisfaction score: 8.71
Debt as a percentage of GDP: 74.7 percent (26th lowest)
Employment Rate: 4.23 (25th best)
Self-reported health: 8.29 (10th best)
Employees working long hours: 5.05 (29th best)
Disposable income: n/a
Educational attainment: 8.46 (12th best)
Life expectancy: 8.24 (8th best)

Israel is an outlier among OECD nations because it has a relatively high life satisfaction score, but performs poorly for many of the 19 quality of life measurements. For example, Israel has the sixth worst scores for student reading and the fourth worst scores for long hours worked, with 0.23 percent of workers maintaining extremely long hours compared to a OECD average of less than .1 percent. However, Israel's score for household wealth (which measures the total worth of a family's income and property after liabilities) is the fifth-highest across all nations on this list. Each household has an average estimated wealth of more than $62,000, compared to an average of less than $37,000. Part of the reason is low taxes—the country has an income tax rate of 6.3 percent of GDP, the sixth-lowest in the OECD.

8. Finland

Life satisfaction score: 8.71
Debt as a percentage of GDP: 41.6 percent (15th lowest)
Employment score: 6.77 (14th best)
Self-reported health: 6.25 (21st best)
Employees working long hours: 9.32 (9th best)
Disposable income: 4.38 (15th best)
Educational attainment: 8.43 (13th best)
Life expectancy: 6.92 (18th best)

For many of the metrics considered by the OECD for its "Better Life Initiative," Finland ranks about average. The country stands out in a few categories, however, causing it to rank eighth best for "life satisfaction." The category in which Finland does the best is education. Finnish students have the second best reading skills among students in all OECD countries, behind only South Korea. According to OECD's Programme for International Student Assessment, literacy is one of the most reliable predictors of economic and social well-being. In 2009, the average student in Finland scored 536 out of 600 in literacy. The OECD average is 493. The quality of Finland's educational system can be attributed to the high respect the country shows its teachers. Teaching is "one of the most sought-after professions in the country," according to the OECD. Finland also scores very well regarding the work-life balance.

Citizens work almost 100 fewer hours per year than the OECD average. Also, 76 percent of mothers are employed once their children begin school—the fifth highest rate. This implies that mothers in Finland are largely able to balance family life and work.

7. Switzerland

Life satisfaction score: 9.03
Debt as a percentage of GDP: 20.2 percent (5th lowest)

Employment score:	10 (best)
Self-reported health:	8.51 (6th best)
Employees working long hours:	8.83 (17th best)
Disposable income:	5.3 (5th best)
Educational attainment:	9.35 (8th best)
Life expectancy:	9.45 (2nd best)

Switzerland has roughly the same level of life satisfaction as Israel, but unlike the Middle Eastern country, it scores near the top in most of these quality-of-life indices. The small, wealthy country bordering France and Germany scores in the top ten for nine out of the 20 OECD measurements, and in the top 20 for all but three. Swiss residents have the second-highest life expectancy in the OECD (82.2 years) and the highest rate of employment (79 percent of working-age residents). Switzerland also has a high rate of mothers who are employed after their children begin school—79 percent compared to an OECD average of 65 percent. The Swiss government subsidizes maternity leave for pregnancy and for up to 16 weeks following birth, which may provide an incentive for businesses to employ pregnant women.

6. Sweden

Life satisfaction score:	9.03
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	33.7 percent (9th lowest)
Employment score:	8.18 (6th best)
Self-reported health:	8.19 (11th best)
Employees working long hours:	9.86 2nd best)
Disposable income:	5.02 (10th best)
Educational attainment:	9.06 (10th best)
Life expectancy:	8.35 (7th best)

Sweden excels in a number of categories which make the lives of its citizens easier. The most striking of these is outdoor air quality, for which Sweden has the best out of all OECD countries. According to the Swedish government, its goal is that “the air should be so clean that no damage is inflicted on people's health, and animals, plants and cultural values.” Swedes have an above-average trust in their political institutions and above-average voter turnout for elections. The country also has the second highest level of “governmental transparency when drafting regulations,” further evidence of trust in the government. People in Sweden generally have a good balance between work and personal life. They certainly are not overworked, as only 0.01 percent of the population put in more than 50 hours a week on average, the second lowest amount among these countries.

5. The Netherlands

Life satisfaction score:	9.03
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	51.8 percent (20th lowest)
Employment score:	8.79 (4th best)
Self-reported health:	8.45 (7th best)
Employees working long hours:	10.0 (the best)
Disposable income:	4.86 (12th best)
Educational attainment:	7.19 (19th best)
Life expectancy:	7.25 (16th best)

Ninety-one percent of Dutch residents report being satisfied with their lives, more than any other country in the OECD. This is likely due in part to high scores for personal life and a good balance between work and leisure. In some countries, such as Turkey and Estonia, that figure is more than 10 percent. Dutch citizens also spend 70 percent of their day on personal care, leisure, eating and sleeping, the third-most of any country. This amount of leisure time reflects the national policy of work equality that comes from sharing of labor. In the 1980's, less than 40 percent of the country's working-age women were employed. That number is now more than 70 percent as a result of aggressive gender equality laws called the “emancipation plan.”

4. Australia

Life satisfaction score:	9.03
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	10.9 percent (3rd lowest)
Employment score:	8.05 (8th best)

Self-reported health:	9.18 (4th best)
Employees working long hours:	6.96 (28th best)
Disposable income:	5.16 (8th best)
Educational attainment:	6.62 (22nd best)
Life expectancy:	8.68 (3rd best)

Australia's performance varies when it comes to quality of life measurements. Seventy one percent of Australians reportedly trust their political institutions, compared to the OECD average of 56 percent. Australia also had the highest voter turnout among registered voters for the most recent election on record—96 percent. Australians are also generally in good health. The country's average life expectancy is two years longer than the OECD average. Tobacco consumption has also decreased by 50 percent since 1983, giving the country one of the lowest rates in the world and greatly reducing the risks of many chronic diseases. The country fares worse in other categories, however. Fourteen percent of employed people in the country work more than 50 hours a week on average, one of the highest percentages in the OECD. Joblessness for single-parent families is also a major problem in Australia, affecting more than 50 percent of such families in 2009.

According to the OECD, if the problem is not addressed, that number will increase 20 percent over the next 25 years. According to the Australian Bureau of Statistics, however, overall unemployment, which was 4.9 percent as of Apr., 2011, is the best it has been since Jan., 2009.

3. Norway

Life satisfaction score:	9.35
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	26 percent (third lowest)
Employment score:	8.98 (3rd best)
Self-reported health:	8.34 (9th best)
Employees working long hours:	9.47 (5th best)
Disposable income:	5.82 (2nd best)
Educational attainment:	8.37 (15th best)
Life expectancy:	7.69 (12th best)

Eighty-four percent of Norway's population is currently satisfied with their lives, compared to an average OECD rate of 54 percent. There are likely several reasons for this, as the Scandinavian country scored very well for housing, disposable income, and employment. Seventy-five percent of Norway's working-age population is employed, and only 0.34 percent of the population has been unemployed for more than a year. This is the one of the best rates in the OECD. Norway has the second highest disposable income among all countries on this list, behind only the United States. The average person across all 34 OECD nations works an average of 1,739 hours per year. The average Norwegian works just over 1,400 hours per year as the result of aggressive labor laws. For example, the country recently imposed sanctioned paternity leave, according to the International Labor Organization.

2. Canada

Life satisfaction score:	9.68
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	36 percent (11th lowest)
Employment score:	7.86 (10th best)
Self-reported health:	9.73 (2nd best)
Employees working long hours:	9.28 (10th best)
Disposable income:	5.16 (8th best)
Educational attainment:	9.39 (6th best)
Life expectancy:	7.8 (10th best)

Canada scores extremely well in the majority of metrics used to calculate "wellbeing." The country has the tenth greatest life expectancy of all OECD countries. Furthermore, 88 percent of people in Canada report being in "good health," compared to the OECD average of 69 percent. Although this is a subjective measure, it is "a good predictor of people's future health care use," according to the OECD. Education is also exceptional in the country. Eighty-seven percent of the population have received a high school degree or more, compared to the OECD average of 73 percent. In addition to this, the country has one of the highest literacy rates in the world. Canada is also relatively safe, with the lowest rate of reported assaults. The country's homicide rate, while higher than many other OECD countries, is still lower than the OECD average.

1. Denmark

Life satisfaction score:	10
Debt as a percentage of GDP:	39.5 percent (14th lowest)
Employment score:	8.4 (5th best)
Self-reported health:	7.37 (15th best)
Employees working long hours:	9.72 (3rd best)
Disposable income:	4.0 (18th best)
Educational attainment:	7.39 (18th best)
Life expectancy:	5.71 (25th best)

Danish residents have consistently rated themselves as the happiest in the world for years in several different studies. This is in some ways surprising, considering the Scandinavian country received only average scores for several metrics that other highly satisfied countries consistently perform well in. For example, Denmark's 26 percent income tax as a percent of GDP (the highest in the OECD) has resulted in an average disposable income of $27,080 compared to the OECD average of $36,800. This places Denmark among the bottom half of developed countries for disposable income. The country also ranks in the bottom third life expectancy and just average in self-reported health. However, Danes have one of the strongest senses of friendship and community, with 97 percent reporting they had someone other than a family member that they could rely on. Danish culture and government policy is one of the most leisure-friendly. Denmark's citizens spend more than 16 hours each week on leisure time, the second-highest rate in the OECD. The government also subsidizes a full year of maternity leave.

20110605-04 20:23 SteveB Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear Lianne,

I hope Hilary is doing a good job...but the wars continue..."free" trade continues...we continue to get raped and downgraded as a world power...Funny too how she thought she wanted to be President, but now she seems to be completely burned-out (as I'm sure I would be, in her shoes). She doesn't even want to be Secretary of State four more years or President any longer.

I don't know why Michelle and Sarah don't study her and realize that they don't really want to take on the job either. Obama wants the job, but has not proven to be the leader I hoped he would be.

When the election draws a little nearer, I'm going to turn my email rantings into a blog, this time around. I'll send you the link.

20110606-01 07:29 Lianne Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear SteveB,

Parlaying into a blog should be interesting. Right now my energy is the way of kado. Found a teacher and enjoying my study and practice of ikebana. Also, looking forward to days reading at the beach. Just sent away for an inflatable kayak that can be stowed in the car and easily carried to some rivers nearby.

20110606-02 08:53 SteveB Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear Lianne,

It's great to hear the latest news from you.

Had to give my red kayak to my daughter, Marissa, who just graduated from college. Have been in Florida for almost six months now, visiting daughters, grandkids, and friends (many now in Florida), and working on my woman's American citizenship. She was finally sworn-in May 25.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110606-03 09:18 Ben Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear SteveB,

Revere, of course, did not HANG the lamps—he was on the receiving end of that signal. [The article said "using". —SteveB]

And, to be fair to the idiot, he DID warn 'the British'. Technically. After all, those colonists were still British citizens, if unhappy ones. [That's bending very far. Normally, we call these people the "Colonists" (later, "Militiamen", then "Minutemen", then "Revolutionaries") to distinguish them from the British. —SteveB]

20110606-04 10:03 Bill Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

Dear SteveB,

These people don't understand the necessity of prosecuting unending and horrendously expensive war in far corners of the world.

20110606-05 10:04 DaveY Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

Dear SteveB,

In my opinion, the main reason for the U.S. decline is the low priority the nation puts on education. States throughout the country are slashing funds for education, closing schools, and laying off teachers. It seems to be the only part of the budget they are willing to cut, except for healthcare for seniors.

20110606-06 11:10 SteveB Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

DaveY,

Happy to have you join the discussion! I'm going to turn it into a blog when we get closer to the election.

Yes, the Republican agenda seems destined to let the rich get richer and keep the rest of us poor, uneducated, and without jobs. And, unfortunately, the Democrats don't seem to be much better. All the politicians are bought and sold by large campaign contributions and are ready to keep selling the rest of us down the river.

Take care and thanks for your thoughts, no matter if they agree or disagree...my only aim is to get at the truth and to try to help make things better.

20110606-07 11:19 SteveB "Palin Defends Her Grasp of History"

"Palin Defends Her Grasp of History" by Laurie Kellman, AP

June 6, 2011, (http://www.northjersey.com/news/123209618 Palin defends her grasp of history.html)

(WASHINGTON) Sarah Palin insisted Sunday that history was on her side when she claimed that Paul Revere's famous ride was intended to warn both British soldiers and his fellow colonists.

"You realize that you messed up about Paul Revere, don't you?" "Fox News Sunday" anchor Chris Wallace asked the potential 2012 presidential candidate.

"I didn't mess up about Paul Revere," replied Palin, a paid contributor to the network. "Part of his ride was to warn the British that were already there. That, hey, you're not going to succeed. You're not going to take American arms. You are not going to beat our own well-armed persons, individual, private militia that we have," she added. "He did warn the British."

Palin, who again said she has not decided whether to run for president, was asked about the Revolutionary War hero during a stop Thursday in Boston on her East Coast bus tour. "He who warned the British that they weren't gonna be takin' away our arms by ringing those bells, and makin' sure as he's riding his horse through town to send those warning shots and bells that we were going to be sure and we were going to be free, and we were going to be armed."

Palin's brush with the nation's history came toward the end of her "One Nation" bus tour that generated intense interest as she traveled from Washington to New England. Along the way, she steadfastly refused "a million times" to say whether she was running for president. "I'm publicizing Americana and our foundation and how important it is that we learn about our past and our challenges and victories throughout American history, so that we can successfully proceed forward," Palin said in the broadcast interview. "It's not a campaign tour." And was she leaning toward or against running, Palin was asked?

"Still right there in the middle," she said.

20110606-08 12:06 SteveG Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

Dear SteveB,

In Washington they are charging $500 A MONTH FOR ALL DAY KINDERGARTEN. IF YOU WANT ½ DAY THAT IS COVERED IN YOUR TAXES. Academic scholarships to 4 year colleges are being rescinded—not guaranteeing there will be money attached. Teachers are taking 3% cut and having their insurance raised 20110606-09 14:05 Dennis Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

from SteveB:

The ten nations on this list are rich in natural resources or highly developed service sectors. These are assets which are in short supply worldwide, and that bolsters the foundations of the economies in these countries. Money alone doesn't buy happiness, but it sure helps.

Dear SteveB,

Don't all of these countries have high taxes? We should send them some Republicans who would then b*tch and make everyone unhappy thus raising the relative position of America in this survey.

20110606-10 15:44 Dick Fw: President Obama's Visit to London

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Mama Mia.....

What a display of arrogance! These two, Michelle and Barry, act like kids in a candy store—and it's our candy that they are squandering by taking 500 of their closest friends to London . Just think, we are nearly bankrupt and Obama takes 500 staffers for a 3-day "official visit" to the U.K.

If you're not sure what "big government" is, take a look at this.

But you have already read about this in your local newspaper.

You didn't? Okay then, you saw it on CNN? No? Gee, I wonder why our media is failing to report these facts to the American people?

You and I may never see health care again the way it used to be, but "Emperor Obama" took six (6) doctors with him for a 3-day visit to London—along with 494 other essential staff.

20110606-11 18:05 SteveB Re: President Obama's Expensive Visit to London

Dear Dick,

Where were you when Bush was traveling (for example, in 2003 and 2007, as he and the other Republicans were destroying our economy)? It seems like Mr. Obama (in 2009) was being rather conservative:

<http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2003/nov/19/uk.iraq>

<http://www.talkleft.com/story/2003/11/19/832/96440>

<http://boingboing.net/2007/11/29/president-bushs-trav.html>

http://www.airliners.net/aviation-forums/non_aviation/print.main?id=454954

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1389825/Obamas-Beast-Cadillac-flown-US-London-drive-Mall.html>

20110606-12 18:11 SteveB Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"

Dear Dennis,

These countries do have high overall taxes. Much higher effective tax rates than the U.S. What's the effective tax rate, for example, on GE?

Your idea of sending them some Republicans (to keep?) is a policy I could get on board with! :-)

20110606-13 18:59 GaryC Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear SteveB,

I am sure if Obama said this, you would wage an enlightened defense of his intellectual prowess in contorting words to make his point. BTW, have you looked at some of the inane statements he has made in the past 2 years? Palin does not have an exclusive license for being an idiot.

20110606-14 19:02 GaryC Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List" Taxes

Dear SteveB,

You are mixing apples and oranges again. it's not the tax rate that is important but what is taxed. Who cares if the tax rate is 50% but they exclude all income made outside of their own country. This is far bigger than just the rate.

20110606-15 19:08 SteveB Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List" Taxes

Dear GaryC,

The key word is "effective", isn't it?

20110606-16 19:23 SteveB "New York Congressman: 'The Picture Was of Me, I Sent It.'"

In the interest of fairness, when an idiot appears, I will call him out...no matter his/her party affiliation. This guy is a liar and, worse, an idiot. He should resign immediately. What a wiener! What a whiner! He sounds almost as bad as Ron Paul.

As I always say, both parties are equally bad (well, almost). Neither of them can be trusted. Both of them are corrupt. Anyone who believes party dogma from one or the other is going to save us is sadly mistaken. The system (campaign financing, lobbying, etc.) must be changed or there will be no real change. Blind loyalty to either party is ludicrous.

"New York Congressman: 'The Picture Was of Me, I Sent It.'" MSNBC

June 6, 2011, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/43299964/ns/politics-capitol_hill/t/new-york-congressman-picture-was-me-i-sent-it/)

(Weiner also admits to online relations with 'about six women over the past three years.')

(WASHINGTON) After days of denials, a choked-up New York Democratic Rep. Anthony Weiner confessed Monday that he tweeted a bulging-underpants photo of himself to a young woman. "The picture was of me, I sent it," he told a room full of reporters in Manhattan. Though Weiner says he does not believe he did anything that "violates any law or violates my oath to my constituents," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi announced Monday that she's calling for an Ethics Committee investigation to "determine whether any official resources were used or any other violation of House rules occurred."

For his part, Weiner said, "I welcome and will fully cooperate with an investigation." Weiner said he intended to send the picture as a joke, but "I panicked, I took it down and said that I had been hacked."

Earlier Monday, the conservative website that started the furor over that lewd image, posted new photos from a second woman who said she received shirtless shots of the congressman.

Weiner, who said he has no intentions of resigning, admitted to further questionable online behavior at the news conference.

Weiner said he has had "several inappropriate conversations with women I have met online," he estimated that there had been "about six women over the past three years." He said many of the exchanges took place before his marriage, but others happened more recently.

Weiner insisted the relationships never moved beyond online interactions. "I have never met any of these women ... I've never had sex outside of my marriage."

He said he did not know the ages of all the women, but believes "they're all adults, at least to the best of my knowledge."

Earlier Monday, BigGovernment.com, a website run by conservative activist Andrew Breitbart, posted a new photo from a second woman allegedly in contact with Weiner. Breitbart said the new photo was in a cache of intimate online photographs, chats, and email exchanges the woman claimed to have.

Breitbart appeared unexpectedly at Weiner's news conference, approached the microphone and began taking reporters' questions before the congressman entered the room.

He said, "This is a continuing attempt to blame the messenger ... I'm being accused of being a hacker." Added Breitbart, "I'm here for some vindication." Breitbart's site published photos of shirtless man it claimed was Weiner Later pressed by reporters at the Monday afternoon event, Weiner apologized to Breitbart.

Weiner said he did not feel the scandal affected his work as a lawmaker but would understand if his constituents decided not to re-elect him. "I'm going to work very hard to win back their trust," he said.

Weiner said he used his home computer and personal Blackberry, not government computers, in his exchanges with the women. But that may not protect him from House rules that say a member "shall conduct himself at all times in a manner that shall reflect creditably on the House."

On numerous occasions, the House ethics committee has cited that general rule in finding a representative in violation of conduct standards.

Meanwhile, the celebrity website RadarOnline.com said a woman claimed to have 200 sexually explicit messages from Weiner through a Facebook account that Weiner no longer uses.

Weiner had said his Twitter account was hacked and that he'd hired a lawyer and a private security firm to get to investigate the incident involving the underwear shot. But he could not say for sure if the underwear photo was of him.

The photo purportedly showing Weiner shirtless was reminiscent of a photo of former Rep. Chris Lee, a New York Republican who resigned from office earlier this year after a shirtless photo he sent a woman on Craig's List became public.

"I was embarrassed and I didn't want it to lead to other embarrassing things," said Weiner of his initial denial of the story. "It was a dumb thing to do, to try to tell lies about it because it just led to more lies."

Weiner, 46, married Hillary Clinton aide Huma Abedin last July, with former President Bill Clinton officiating. He said Abedin, who wasn't present Monday, was aware of his online behavior prior to their wedding.

"I love my wife very much, and we have no intention of splitting up over this," insisted the New York congressman.

(Msnbc.com's Kara Kearns and Carrie Dann contributed to this report.)

© 2011 msnbc.com

20110606-17 19:37 SteveB Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride" President Obama

Dear GaryC,

You misjudge me. I have no intrinsic loyalty to Obama. This is what I wrote to an old friend yesterday who had responded to the same email:

I hope Hilary is doing a good job...but the wars continue..."free" trade continues...we continue to get raped and downgraded as a world power... Funny too how she thought she wanted to be President, but now she seems to be completely burned-out (as I'm sure I would be, in her shoes). She doesn't even want to be Secretary of State four more years or President any longer.

I don't know why Michelle and Sarah don't study her and realize that they don't really want to take on the job either. Obama wants the job, but has not proven to be the leader I hoped he would be.

When the election draws a little nearer, I'm going to turn my email rantings into a blog, this time around. I'll send you the link."

If you think Obama has said such "inane" things, send one to me and I'd be happy to discuss it, but I suspect you are referring more to philosophical issues than to issues of brute stupidity.

I think it's extremely obvious that the tired, old, discredited ideas the Republican and Tea Baggers are brandishing around are not the solutions to our problems. The causes of our problems are corruption, boot-licking the rich and powerful, failure to innovate, the wars, and insufficient taxation.

The Republican solution seems to be to crush the old and weak, destroy education and unions, and refrain from talking about the real problems. They feel that if they tell the "big lie" often enough, people will believe it. I intend to fight them on that one tooth and nail.

20110606-18 19:44 GaryC Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear SteveB,

I apologize but I don't have time to track all of the idiot pronouncements of the great community organizer. The next time one pops up, I will send it along. It is nice to see you are SOMEWHAT of an equal opportunity basher but your emails tend to bash Republicans and then say that they all do it. Be fair and balanced and report the idiocy of the Democrats also. Your standing will be much enhanced as you will be seen to be fair and not just ideologically fixated.

20110606-19 19:53 SteveB Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"

Dear GaryC,

Please read the last two paragraphs...

Only a few more days in Florida...heading back to Santa Cruz on the 14th with my, now, American wife, just in time for "winter".

20110607-01 09:05 SteveG Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Level the playing field

(I have totally cleaned this e-mail from all other names, sending it to you in hopes you will keep it going and keep it clean. This is something I will fight for and I hope you all read it all the way through. You will be glad you did.)

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified! Why? Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971... before computers, before e-mail, before cell phones, etc.

Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven (7) took 1 year or less to become the law of the land... all because of public pressure.

I'm asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise.

In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. Term Limits. 12 years only, one of the possible options below:

- A. Two Six-year Senate terms.
- B. Six Two-year House terms.
- C. One Six-year Senate term and three Two-Year House terms.

2. No Tenure / No Pension. A Congressman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.

3. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, and Congress participates with the American people.

4. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.

5. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.

6. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.

7. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.

8. All contracts with past and present Congressmen are void effective 1/1/12. The American people did not make these current contracts with Congressmen. Congressmen made all these contracts for themselves.

Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

If each person contacts a minimum of twenty people, then it will only take three days for most people (in the U.S.) to receive the message. Maybe it is time. THIS IS HOW YOU FIX CONGRESS!!!! If you agree with the above, pass it on. If not, just delete. You are one of my 20+. Please keep it going.

20110607-02	09:31	SteveB	Fw: CredoAction Petition: Tell Congress to Tax the Rich
-------------	-------	--------	---

from CredoAction:

Tell Congress: It's time to raise taxes on millionaires and billionaires. Click here to sign our petition:

http://act.credoaction.com/campaign/tax_millionaires/index2.html?r=7425&id=22146-4050539-FyNvKAx.

Today marks the tenth anniversary of the Bush tax cuts for the richest Americans—one of the biggest economic injustices of the Bush administration and one of the biggest drivers of our federal deficit.

These massive tax giveaways to the wealthy were supposed to expire at the beginning of the year, but Republicans went to the mat to extend them, and Democrats caved when it was most important that they stand up and show courage.

And now these same politicians who pushed for the tax cuts are saying we cannot afford our social safety net because "we're broke."

There is something deeply wrong with our priorities as a country if we're cutting back on services for children and the elderly, the sick and the destitute, and anything that helps the middle class stay afloat while simultaneously cutting taxes for the likes of Paris Hilton and the Koch brothers.

Fortunately, it doesn't have to be this way.

There's an epidemic of home foreclosures. Unemployment is rampant. The cost of food, gas and health care is going up. Families across the country are falling into poverty, while many more are struggling just to get by.

Yet Republicans who support all the policies that created the deficit are holding Americans hostage in ongoing negotiations over raising the debt ceiling and the 2012 budget. And what are they demanding? Cuts, cuts and more cuts.

Anyone who is making more than a million dollars a year can afford to pay more to prevent brutal budget cuts. Rather than shred the social safety net when we need it most, tax millionaires and billionaires. It's long past time for the super wealthy to pay their fair share.

Progressives need to offer an alternative to the morally bankrupt and economically baseless dogma of "tax cuts for the rich, massive spending cuts for everyone else." And the alternative cannot be simply to propose slightly less brutal spending cuts. We need to put tax increases back on the table.

While some members of the Democratic leadership have fallen into this trap of accepting the rightwing framing of the debate, progressive champions Rep. Jan Schakowsky and Sen. Bernie Sanders are leading the fight for a real solution to our budget crisis. They have each introduced a bill to raise the income tax rates on people who make more than one million dollars a year. And they need our help to start changing the narrative around the budget.

We won't be able to repeal the Bush tax cuts anytime soon, but on their anniversary we need to speak out for the principle that the rich need to pay their fair share. Increasing taxes on millionaires and billionaires won't be a silver bullet, but it would bring in tens of billions of dollars that would allow us to avoid some of the most brutal budget cuts we're now facing. And it would be a step toward making our tax system more fair.

The disparity between the rich and the poor is growing in a way that is deeply unhealthy to our society. The richest 1% of Americans are making 24% of the country's income, which is the highest share it has been since the 1930s. The 1930s were also the last time the richest 1% have so consistently paid such a low income tax rate. And as Michael Moore has pointed out, the top 400 Americans own more wealth than the bottom 50% of Americans put together.

This wide gulf between the haves and the have-nots not only affects our economy, it distorts our democracy. We have to take action before it's too late.

Our country isn't broke. But if the Republican's intellectually dishonest claim that we are is met with silence, our country's moral compass may become broken.

We cannot shred the social safety net when it's most needed. We cannot allow the budget to be balanced on the backs of the very people who've taken it on the chin during this economic crisis. It's long past time to require the super wealthy pay their fair share. Now, more than ever, we need you to speak out.

Matt Lockshin, Campaign Manager, CREDO Action from Working Assets

20110607-03 19:51 SteveB Fw: Buy Americ-CAN!

I have been doing this as much as possible for about the last six months. I agree with everything said below, except that I think it should be done from this day forward, not just for one lousy month. Please pass it on. If you do this, the jobs will return eventually. After all, it's us against them, and we're in the fight of our lives. The very future is at stake. BUY AMERICAN! (or anything but Chinese!)

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Another potential solution: Check the can!

Did you all see that Diane Sawyer has done a special report on this very subject. They removed ALL items from a typical, middle-class family's home, that were not made in the U.S. There was hardly anything left besides the kitchen sink. Literally. During the special they are going to show truckloads of items—U.S. made—being brought in to replace everything. And will be talking about how to find these items and the difference in price etc.

It was interesting that Diane said that if every American/Canadian spent just $64 (more than normal) on U.S./Canada made items this year, it would create something like 200,000 new jobs.

I WAS BUYING FOOD THE OTHER DAY AT WALMART. FOR EXAMPLE THE "OUR FAMILY" BRAND OF THE MANDARIN ORANGES SAYS RIGHT ON THE CAN 'FROM CHINA'.

I WAS SHOCKED!! SO FOR A FEW MORE CENTS I BOUGHT THE LIBERTY GOLD BRAND OR THE DOLE SINCE IT'S FROM CALIF.

Are we Americans/Canadians as dumb as we appear— or— is it that we just do not think? While the Chinese, knowingly and intentionally, export inferior and even toxic products and dangerous toys and goods to be sold in American/Canadian markets.

Yet 70% of Americans/Canadians believe that the trading privileges afforded to the Chinese should be suspended.

Well, duh..why do you need the government to suspend trading privileges?

SIMPLY DO IT YOURSELF, AMERICA/CANADA!!

Simply look on the bottom of every product you buy, and if it says 'Made in China ' or 'PRC' (and that now includes Hong Kong), simply choose another product, or none at all. You will be amazed at how dependent you are on Chinese products, and you will be equally amazed at what you can do without.

THINK ABOUT THIS: If 200 million Americans/Canadians refuse to buy just $20 each of Chinese goods, that's a billion dollar trade imbalance resolved in our favor...fast!!

The downside? Some American/Canadian businesses will feel a temporary pinch from having foreign stockpiles of inventory. Wahhhhhhhhhhh!!

The solution? Let's give them fair warning and send our own message. Most of the people who have been reading about this matter are planning on implementing this on June 4th and continue it until July 4th. That is only one month of trading losses, but it will hit the Chinese for 1/12th of the total, or 8%, of their American/Canadian exports. Then they will at least have to ask themselves if the benefits of their arrogance and lawlessness were worth it.

Remember, June 4th to July 4th—START NOW! [Why not from now on? —SteveB]

Send this to everybody you know. Let's show them that we are Americans and Canadians and NOBODY can take us for granted.

If we can't live without cheap Chinese goods for one month out of our lives, WE DESERVE WHAT WE GET!

Pass it on, America/Canada.

20110608-01	11:13	SteveB	"New Battery Design Could Give Electric Vehicles a Jolt"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Just as with railroads in days of yore, good schools, well-educated students, and government help will be necessary to build the future. Hopefully, we won't kill the goose that laid the golden egg in servitude to some dogma.

"New Battery Design Could Give Electric Vehicles a Jolt" by David L. Chandler, MIT News

June 6, 2011, (<http://web.mit.edu/newsoffice/2011/flow-batteries-0606.html>)

(Significant advance in battery architecture could be breakthrough for electric vehicles and grid storage.)

A radically new approach to the design of batteries, developed by researchers at MIT, could provide a lightweight and inexpensive alternative to existing batteries for electric vehicles and the power grid. The technology could even make "refueling" such batteries as quick and easy as pumping gas into a conventional car.

The new battery relies on an innovative architecture called a semi-solid flow cell, in which solid particles are suspended in a carrier liquid and pumped through the system. In this design, the battery's active components — the positive and negative electrodes, or cathodes and anodes — are composed of particles suspended in a liquid electrolyte. These two different suspensions are pumped through systems separated by a filter, such as a thin porous membrane.

The work was carried out by Mihai Duduta '10 and graduate student Bryan Ho, under the leadership of professors of materials science W. Craig Carter and Yet-Ming Chiang. It is described in a paper published May 20 in the journal Advanced Energy Materials. The paper was co-authored by visiting research scientist Pimpa Limthongkul '02, postdoc Vanessa Wood '10 and graduate student Victor Brunini '08.

One important characteristic of the new design is that it separates the two functions of the battery — storing energy until it is needed, and discharging that energy when it needs to be used — into separate physical structures. (In conventional batteries, the storage and discharge both take place in the same structure.) Separating these functions means that batteries can be designed more efficiently, Chiang says.

The new design should make it possible to reduce the size and the cost of a complete battery system, including all of its structural support and connectors, to about half the current levels. That dramatic reduction could be the key to making electric vehicles fully competitive with conventional gas- or diesel-powered vehicles, the researchers say.

Another potential advantage is that in vehicle applications, such a system would permit the possibility of simply "refueling" the battery by pumping out the liquid slurry and pumping in a fresh, fully charged replacement, or by swapping out the tanks like tires at a pit stop, while still preserving the option of simply recharging the existing material when time permits.

Flow batteries have existed for some time, but have used liquids with very low energy density (the amount of energy that can be stored in a given volume). Because of this, existing flow batteries take up much more space than fuel cells and require rapid pumping of their fluid, further reducing their efficiency.

The new semi-solid flow batteries pioneered by Chiang and colleagues overcome this limitation, providing a 10-fold improvement in energy density over present liquid flow-batteries, and lower-cost manufacturing than conventional lithium-ion batteries. Because the material has such a high energy density, it does not need to be pumped rapidly to deliver its power. "It kind of oozes," Chiang says. Because the suspensions look and flow like black goo and could end up used in place of petroleum for transportation, Carter says, "We call it 'Cambridge crude.'"

The key insight by Chiang's team was that it would be possible to combine the basic structure of aqueous-flow batteries with the proven chemistry of lithium-ion batteries by reducing the batteries' solid materials to tiny particles that could be carried in a liquid suspension — similar to the way quicksand can flow like a liquid even though it consists mostly of solid particles. "We're using two proven technologies, and putting them together," Carter says.

In addition to potential applications in vehicles, the new battery system could be scaled up to very large sizes at low cost. This would make it particularly well-suited for large-scale electricity storage for utilities, potentially making intermittent, unpredictable sources such as wind and solar energy practical for powering the electric grid.

The team set out to "reinvent the rechargeable battery," Chiang says. But the device they came up with is potentially a whole family of new battery systems, because it's a design architecture that "is not linked to any particular chemistry." Chiang and his colleagues are now exploring different chemical combinations that could be used within the semi-solid flow system. "We'll figure out what can be practically developed today," Chiang says, "but as better materials come along, we can adapt them to this architecture."

Yury Gogotsi, Distinguished University Professor at Drexel University and director of Drexel's Nanotechnology Institute, says, "The demonstration of a semi-solid lithium-ion battery is a major breakthrough that shows that slurry-type active materials can be used for storing electrical energy." This advance, he says, "has tremendous importance for the future of energy production and storage."

Gogotsi cautions that making a practical, commercial version of such a battery will require research to find better cathode and anode materials and electrolytes, but adds, "I don't see fundamental problems that cannot be addressed — those are primarily engineering issues. Of course, developing working systems that can compete with currently available batteries in terms of cost and performance may take years."

Chiang, whose earlier insights on lithium-ion battery chemistries led to the 2001 founding of MIT spinoff A123 Systems, says the two technologies are complementary, and address different potential applications. For example, the new semi-solid flow batteries will probably never be suitable for smaller applications such as tools, or where short bursts of very high power are required — areas where A123's batteries excel.

The new technology is being licensed to a company called 24M Technologies, founded last summer by Chiang and Carter along with entrepreneur Throop Wilder, who is the company's president. The company has already raised more than $16 million in venture capital and federal research financing.

The development of the technology was partly funded by grants from the U.S. Department of Defense's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency and Advanced Research Projects Agency — Energy (ARPA-E). Continuing research on the technology is taking place partly at 24M, where some recent MIT graduates who worked on the project are part of the team; at MIT, where professors Angela Belcher and Paula Hammond are co-investigators; and at Rutgers, with Professor Glenn Amatucci.

The target of the team's ongoing work, under a three-year ARPA-E grant awarded in September 2010, is to have, by the end of the grant period, "a fully-functioning, reduced-scale prototype system," Chiang says, ready to be engineered for production as a replacement for existing electric-car batteries.

Dear SteveB,

WOW, so very true never looked at it like that before! I will be sure to do this from now on and not just one month. My dad was a firm believer in buying American so he would not be happy with this report and I try and please them even though they are not with me anymore. I just never realized. Thanks for sharing!

20110610-01	09:29	SteveB	"Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Another dummy bites the dust (I hope)...

An incredibly unprecedented happening in the campaign of a man way below the level of Presidential material. Good riddance to bad garbage!

"Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse" by MSNBC Staff

June 10, 2011, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/43343808/ns/politics-decision_2012/t/senior-gingrich-aides-resign-campaign-en-masse/)

WASHINGTON—The entire top echelon of Newt Gingrich's presidential campaign resigned on Thursday, a stunning mass exodus that left his bid for the Republican nomination in tatters. But the former House speaker vowed defiantly to remain a candidate.

"I am committed to running the substantive, solutions-oriented campaign I set out to run earlier this spring," Gingrich said in a posting to his Facebook page. "The campaign begins anew Sunday in Los Angeles."

NBC News confirmed the departures to Gingrich's team, including spokesman Rick Tyler, campaign manager Rob Johnson, and strategists Dave Carney and Sam Dawson.

Tyler told NBC, "There is a path to victory ... But there was a dispute on what that path to victory was." Tyler was with the former House speaker for nearly 12 years. "I have no regrets. I admire him deeply. I hope he does become president."

'A different vision'

Other officials said Gingrich was informed that his entire high command was quitting in a meeting at his headquarters in Washington. They cited differences over the direction of the campaign.

"We had a different vision for victory," Tyler told The Associated Press. "And since we couldn't resolve that difference, I didn't feel I could be useful in serving him." He said Gingrich was not allowing enough time to campaign in key states.

Carney also spoke to NBC saying, "The professional team came to the realization that the direction of the campaign they sought and Newt's vision for the campaign were incompatible."

Carney, who was heading up Gingrich's efforts in New Hampshire, is former aide to Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who may be mulling his own White House run. And Johnson, Gingrich's (now former) campaign manager, ran Perry's election bid last year.

"Nothing has changed," Perry's spokesman, Mark Miner, said in an interview on Thursday. "The governor is focused on the legislative session."

Longtime Gingrich ally and attorney, Randy Evans, told NBC News while most senior aides have left the campaign, he is still on board with the candidate's presidential run.

NBC also confirmed that South Carolina consultant Katon Dawson and Iowa operative Craig Schoenfeld quit Team Gingrich. The entire full-time staff in Iowa, six aides, also quit.

"You have to be able to raise money to run a campaign and you have to invest time in fundraising and to campaign here in the state and I did not have the confidence that was going to be happening," Schoenfeld told The Des Moines Register.

Also reported by NBC: former Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue—who was serving as Gingrich's national campaign co-chair—will now be endorsing Tim Pawlenty.

Scott Rials, a longtime aide who joined the departure, said, "I think the world of him, but at the end of the day we just could not see a clear path to win, and there was a question of commitment."

The upheaval in the campaign was likely to lead to a shakeup in the race for the party's presidential nomination, as well, as rivals reach out for disaffected staff, and possibly for donors who have been aligned with the former Georgia congressman. Gingrich has long been viewed, by even his closest allies, as a fountain of policy ideas but a man who is unable to avoid speaking in ways that spark unwelcome controversy.

Even before the sudden departures of his top aides, Gingrich's campaign was off to a notably rocky start. Within days of formally announcing he would run, he was assailed by conservatives for criticizing a plan to remake Medicare that Republicans pushed through the House.

He telephoned the author of the plan, Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, to apologize but did not back off his objections.

Within days, he had dropped from sight, embarking on a cruise to the Greek Isles with his wife, Callista, while rivals for the Republican nomination kept up their campaign appearances.

"I don't know how other people work," Gingrich said of his vacation in The New York Times. "To have a major breakthrough in policy, you have to be able to stop and think."

He returned to the United States earlier in the week to confront a rebellion that had been brewing for some time among the senior echelon of his campaign.

While Gingrich told his now-departed aides he would remain in the race, he faces formidable obstacles in assembling a new team in time to compete in a campaign that's well under way. He has the allegiance of several former aides who served him when he was in Congress, but most if not all of them have moved into other fields.

Most immediately, he is scheduled to participate in a debate next Monday in New Hampshire.

Gingrich, 67, last served in public office more than a decade ago. He resigned as speaker of the House after two terms following an unexpectedly close mid-term election in 1998 in which Republicans gained far fewer seats than he had predicted.

20110610-02 09:32 GaryC Re: "Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse"

Dear SteveB,

Agreed. Now if Obama would do the same thing and about 70% of the House and Senate.

20110610-03 09:56 SteveB Re: "Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse" Sarah Palin

Dear GaryC,

I'd say get rid of 100% of the House and Senate (well...only 33% is possible next year). If I saw someone worthy to replace Obama, I'd say go for it, but these dogmatic Republicans running and not running are all dogs!

I think the Palin emails being released today will finish her "campaign". Mitt (What kind of name is that? Is he named after a piece of sports equipment? Mittens, huh?) is doomed because of his refusal or inability to compete in Iowa. He's also doomed with conservatives because of his very successful health care plan in Mass. The best piece of work he ever had little to do with! He's just another arrogant elitist and nobody knows how many wives he really has, but he could still be the nominee.

from (<http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/06/10/6827716-first-thoughts-palin-vs-the-gop-establishment>):

NBC's Michael Isikoff reported on "TODAY" this morning that the state of Alaska today will release more than 24,000 Palin emails from her two years as governor, many of them business she conducted from her personal email accounts. The Anchorage Daily News has more: "The emails were first requested during the 2008 White House race by citizens and news organizations as they vetted a vice presidential nominee whose political experience included less than one term as governor of Alaska and a term as mayor of the small town of Wasilla. The nearly three-year delay has been attributed largely to the sheer volume of the release and the flood of requests."

20110610-04	10:02	SteveB	The Beginning of the End for Sarah Palin
-------------	-------	--------	--

I predict poor picked-on Sarah's "campaign" won't survive the release of all this evidence of ignorance and stupidity (then there's her promo movie):

http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/43281157/ns/politics-more_politics/.

Complete Palin emails (and more): <http://palinemail.msnbc.msn.com/>.

20110610-05	10:10	SteveB	Fw: Republican Attacks on Medicare
-------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

from CredoAction:

Dear SteveB:

Democrats have been vocal in their opposition to the Republican attacks on Medicare. But even as recently as this week, major media outlets were speculating about whether Democrats would agree to severe cuts to Medicaid as part of a compromise with Republicans on raising the debt ceiling. Fortunately, Democratic senators are working to put that fear to rest.

Yesterday, Democratic Senator Jay Rockefeller, a leading defender of Medicaid, announced that 36 other senators, including Sen. Nelson of Florida, joined him in sending a letter to President Obama vowing to oppose the Republican attacks on Medicaid.

Republican extremists in the House and the Senate have consistently pursued a strategy of hostage taking around "must-past" bills. When it came to the continuing resolution to avoid a government shutdown, the Democrats caved and gave up. Thank Sen. Nelson for defending Medicaid "Thank you for co-signing Sen. Rockefeller's letter to President Obama opposing the Republican attacks on Medicaid. I commend you for drawing a line in the sand. I will stand with you as you continue to fight to preserve Medicaid. When senators step up for important programs like Medicaid, they deserve our thanks. Thank Sen. Nelson for co-signing the Rockefeller letter.

And now, the Republicans are trying the same strategy around raising raise the debt ceiling, which is necessary to avoid the U.S. Treasury defaulting on our debts.

The stakes in this fight are much higher than the fight over the continuing resolution. And predictably the Republicans are making extreme and irresponsible demands. Democrats cannot continue to cave, and the first step is drawing a line in the sand and declaring some things off limits.

The Rockefeller letter has the effect of declaring off limits the Republican proposals to turn Medicaid into block grants or to arbitrarily limit federal spending on Medicaid. The 37 Democrats who signed the letter to President Obama were forceful in their defense of the program, writing (emphasis added):

Since 1965, the federal government has helped states pay for the basic health care and long-term services low-income Americans need. A cap on federal funding or block grant would undermine this federal commitment. We are unwilling to allow the federal government to walk away from Medicaid's 68 million beneficiaries, the providers that serve them and the urban and rural communities in which they live.

Medicaid, which covers 68 million beneficiaries, is a cornerstone of our health care system. Besides covering poor children and their parents, pregnant woman, and the disabled, Medicaid is also a major source of health care funding for seniors—paying, for example, for the nursing care of two-thirds of nursing home residents.

To be sure, this fight is not over. But, this is a promising start.

Ever since New York Democrat Kathy Hochul improbably won a recent special election in a conservative district by running a campaign centered on defending Medicare, we have seen Democrats increasingly willing to take cuts to Medicare off the table. But Medicaid has always been more politically vulnerable than Medicare.

This letter is a meaningful signal that Democrats are strengthening their resolve to defend Medicaid. And we should make sure they know their constituents support them picking this fight.

Thank you for defending our social safety net.

Matt Lockshin, Campaign Manager

20110612-01	15:50	Dale	"Palin Emails Show Engaged Leader Who Sought VP Nod"
-----------------------------	-------	------	--

Her emails a big disappointment for left and media (same thing)...

"Palin Emails Show Engaged Leader Who Sought VP Nod" by Becky Bohrer, Huffington Post

June 11, 2009, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/06/11/palin-emails-show-engaged_n_875475.html)

JUNEAU, Alaska—There are no bombshells, no "gotcha" moments.

The emails of Sarah Palin—more than 24,000 pages of them released Friday by the state of Alaska from her first two years as governor—paint a picture of an image-conscious, driven leader, closely involved with the day-to-day duties of running the state and riding herd on the signature issues of her administration.

She angled for a vice presidential nomination months before John McCain picked her, but hesitated to endorse him until she got an explanation about "pro-environmental stands he's taking that could hurt Alaska."

The messages give a behind-the-scenes look at a politician who burst onto the national stage after serving as Wasilla mayor and less than two years as Alaska governor. They show a woman striving to balance work and home, fiercely protective of her family and highly sensitive to media coverage. She expressed a sometimes mothering side with aides but was quick to demand answers or accountability.

They seem to depict a more moderate Palin who worked to find a state response to global warming—she has since dismissed studies supporting climate change—and gave props to then-Sen. Barack Obama for his support of a natural gas pipeline in Alaska.

The records, comprising more than 13,400 emails, shed new light on Palin's rise from little-known governor to national political sensation. The emails end in Sept., 2008, shortly after her selection to be McCain's running mate. It was then that citizens and news organizations first requested the records.

Three years later, Palin is a best-selling author, reality TV star, sought-after speaker and kingmaker, successfully supporting dozens of candidates in last year's elections.

Her recent bus tour of the Northeast as well as an authorized documentary about her time as governor, have fueled speculation that Palin will run for president, but the Republican says she hasn't yet decided.

In Anchorage, people watched the release of the emails with interest, some blaming the media for paying too much attention to the out-dated records.

"I personally think they're afraid of her," said Richard Giese, who sold flowers at the Anchorage Farmer's Market on Saturday. "They're digging up a lot of stuff, some of it true. I won't deny that. But I think they are afraid of her for the election."

20110612-02 16:05 SteveB Re: "Palin Emails Show Engaged Leader Who Sought VP Nod"

Dear Dale,

Yes, disappointing so far. But I think there will still be plenty of good, funny, stupid stuff, though I'm beginning to wonder if she will really run. Hard to believe she actually wants to work that hard...that she actually wants the job...even if she doesn't understand all it involves.

But do you really want a President who can't even get Paul Revere right on a visit to his museum (her aides and daughter, at least, must have known she'd be asked something about him)? Before, she couldn't even name a single magazine or book she'd read lately. You want her just because of her dogma? Her looks? (I think Michelle is better looking, though Sarah is better looking than Ann Coulter.)

20110613-01 09:54 SteveB Fw: We Want Elizabeth Warren

from CredoAction:

Dear SteveB:

It's amazing! You and over 330,000 other members of CREDO Action and the Progressive Change Campaign Committee have joined members of Congress, top academics, and progressive organizations in calling on President Obama to nominate Elizabeth Warren to lead the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau.

The media has taken notice of what we're doing. Recently, stories about our effort appeared in Reuters, Bloomberg News, CNN and Talking Points Memo. And the media aren't the only ones taking note about the momentum behind Professor Warren. Senate Republicans are so scared of her, they prevented the Senate from officially recessing last week.

Although this pushed back the next opportunity for President Obama to make a recess appointment, President Obama still faces a legal mandate to have a director of the CFPB in place by July 21st. He needs to make a choice soon, and we need to speak out to make sure he picks Elizabeth Warren.

Last month, 44 Republican Senators pledged to filibuster the nomination of anyone to head the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau unless the agency itself is significantly weakened. This threat makes it much more likely that President Obama will have to use his constitutional authority to make a recess appointment to fill the top slot at the agency.

And if President Obama uses a recess appointment, he has no reason not to pick Warren—a respected Harvard professor who is currently doing an excellent job working to get the CFPB off the ground. Professor Warren has proven that she is willing to stand up to Wall Street on behalf of consumers, which is why Washington and Wall Street insiders are trying to block her appointment.

But the buck stops at President Obama. He can and should choose the very best person to run the CFPB. And there's nobody better for that position than Elizabeth Warren.

Thank you for speaking out.

Matt Lockshin, Campaign Manager, CREDO Action from Working Assets

20110615-01 09:31 Dale Fw: What Charles Krauthammer Didn't Say

Dear SteveB,

Another view...

I know you must be aware there are "right leaning" blogs and e-mails, similar to the "left leaning" materials you circulate. I am sending this example to you...not all the other rabid "followers" on your list—it would drive them over the wall, if they bothered to read much of it—just for your entertainment. Actually, you may agree with almost all he says, now that I think about it.

<http://www.mahalo.com/> [A wonderful website! Learn anything! One of my favorites. —SteveB]

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says that Krauthammer says that he didn't say these things. How am I supposed to be open-minded (as it says below) about a lie? (<http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/krauthammer.asp>) —SteveB]

Dr. Krauthammer (<http://www.mahalo.com/charles-krauthammer/>) is an M.D., a lawyer and is paralyzed from the neck down. A friend went to hear Charles Krauthammer . He listened with 25 others in a closed room. What he says here, is NOT 2nd-hand but 1st. The ramifications are staggering for us, our children and their children.

Last Monday was a profound evening, Dr. Charles Krauthammer spoke to the Center for the American Experiment.. He is a brilliant intellectual, seasoned & articulate. He is forthright and careful in his analysis, and never resorts to emotions or personal insults. He is NOT a fear monger nor an extremist in his comments and views . He is a fiscal conservative, and has received a Pulitzer Prize for writing. He writes weekly for the Washington Post.

The entire room was held spellbound during his talk. I have summarized his comments, as we are living in uncharted waters economically and internationally.

Even 2 Dems at my table agreed with everything he said! If you feel like forwarding this to those who are open minded and have not drunk the Kool-Aid, feel free.

Summary of his comments:

1. Mr. Obama is a very intellectual, charming individual. He is not to be underestimated. He is a cool customer who doesn't show his emotions. It's very hard to know what's behind the mask. The taking down of the Clinton dynasty was an amazing accomplishment. The Clintons still do not understand what hit them. Obama was in the perfect place at the perfect time.
2. Obama has political skills comparable to Reagan and Clinton . He has a way of making you think he's on your side, agreeing with your position, while doing the opposite. Pay no attention to what he SAYS; rather, watch what he DOES!
3. Obama has a ruthless quest for power. He did not come to Washington to make something out of himself, but rather to change everything, including dismantling capitalism. He can't be straightforward on his ambitions, as the public would not go along. He has a heavy hand, and wants to level the playing field with income redistribution and punishment to the achievers of society. He would like to model the U.S. to Great Britain or Canada.
4. His three main goals are to control ENERGY, PUBLIC EDUCATION, and NATIONAL HEALTHCARE by the Federal government. He doesn't care about the auto or financial services industries, but got them as an early bonus. The cap and trade will add costs to everything and stifle growth. Paying for FREE college education is his goal. Most scary is his healthcare program, because if you make it FREE and add 46,000,000 people to a Medicare-type single-payer system, the costs will go through the roof. The only way to control costs is with massive RATIONING of services, like in Canada. God forbid!
5. He has surrounded himself with mostly far-left academic types. No one around him has ever even run a candy store. But they are going to try and run the auto, financial, banking and other industries. This obviously can't work in the long run. Obama is not a socialist; rather he's a far-left secular progressive bent on nothing short of revolution. He ran as a moderate, but will govern from the hard left. Again, watch what he does, not what he says.
6. Obama doesn't really see himself as President of the United States , but more as a ruler over the world. He sees himself above it all, trying to orchestrate and coordinate various countries and their agendas. He sees moral equivalency in all cultures. His apology tour in Germany and England was a prime example of how he sees America, as an imperialist nation that has been arrogant, rather than a great noble nation that has at times made errors. This is the first President ever who has chastised our allies and appeased our enemies!

7. He is now handing out goodies. He hopes that the bill (and pain) will not come due until after he is reelected in 2012. He would like to blame all problems on Bush from the past, and hopefully his successor in the future. He has a huge ego, and Dr. Krauthammer believes he is a narcissist.

8. Republicans are in the wilderness for a while, but will emerge strong. Republicans are pining for another Reagan, but there will never be another like him. Krauthammer believes Mitt Romney, Tim Pawlenty and Bobby Jindahl (except for his terrible speech in February) are the future of the party. Newt Gingrich is brilliant, but has baggage. Sarah Palin is sincere and intelligent, but needs to really be seriously boning up on facts and info if she is to be a serious candidate in the future. We need to return to the party of lower taxes, smaller government, personal responsibility, strong national defense, and state's rights.

9. The current level of spending is irresponsible and outrageous. We are spending trillions that we don't have. This could lead to hyperinflation, depression or worse. No country has ever spent themselves into prosperity. The media is giving Obama, Reid and Pelosi a pass because they love their agenda. But eventually the bill will come due and people will realize the huge bailouts didn't work, nor will the stimulus package. These were trillion-dollar payoffs to Obama's allies, unions and the Congress to placate the left, so he can get support for #4 above.

10. The election was over in mid-September when Lehman brothers failed, fear and panic swept in, we had an unpopular President, and the war was grinding on indefinitely without a clear outcome. The people are in pain, and the mantra of change caused people to act emotionally. Any Dem would have won this election; it was surprising it was as close as it was.

11. In 2012, if the unemployment rate is over 10%, Republicans will be swept back into power. If it's under 8%, the Dems continue to roll. If it's between 8-10%, it will be a dogfight. It will all be about the economy. I hope this gets you really thinking about what's happening in Washington and Congress. There is a left-wing revolution going on, according to Krauthammer, and he encourages us to keep the faith and join the loyal resistance. The work will be hard, but we're right on most issues and can reclaim our country, before it's far too late.

20110618-01	06:16	SteveB	Re: What Charles Krauthammer Didn't Say
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dale,

Thank you for this. I find it fraught with errors.

1. Obama seems like a very weak President to me. He couldn't even get much done with a majority. I'm disappointed in him, but he is not some clever devil. That's laughable given his actions. He even appeased the Republicans by keeping the idiotic Bush tax cuts.
2. Sarah Palin "intelligent"? A huge haha!
3. Reagan was not an American hero. He put us deep into debt. The rest of the current debt comes from Bush, not from Obama. Face it!
4. We should be so lucky as to be like Canada! Look at the numbers.
5. I find this bit of dogma to be so totally false: "We need to return to the party of lower taxes, smaller government, personal responsibility, strong national defense, and state's rights." Ya, just what we need...even lower taxes and more money for wars. No, thank you! That's the sure path to national bankruptcy.

This guy is full of the traditional Republican fear tactics that thinking people are so tired of.

20110618-02	16:41	Dennis	"9 Countries That Do It Better: Why Does Europe Take Better Care of Its People Than America?"
-------------	-------	--------	---

"9 Countries That Do It Better: Why Does Europe Take Better Care of Its People Than America?" by Joshua Holland, AlterNet

June 18, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/151312/>)

An abiding belief in American exceptionalism is more or less ubiquitous across the political spectrum. But in many ways, what makes America different from other advanced democracies are relatively modest differences in priorities. While all wealthy democracies share the same basic model—they derive the bulk of their economic activity from the private sector while offering some form of social safety net for those who fall through the cracks—even slight differences in priorities can have a huge impact on the lives of their people.

Here are 9 important areas where other countries that do a better job providing for their citizens than we do:

1. Taking Care of the Ill: France

If you have access to the best health care in the United States, then you have some of the best care in the world. But that comes with an extremely steep price, and not everyone has that kind of access.

In 2008, the U.S. spent 16 percent of its economic output on health-care and covered 85 percent of its citizens. It was the only OECD country other than Mexico and Turkey to cover less than 90 percent of its people. We have the 37th longest average life expectancy, and a recent study found that American "life expectancy has been stagnant for much of the country and is actually decreasing over much of the Southern portion of the United States."

France, which has a health-care system ranked number one in the world by the WHO, spent 11.2 percent of its economy to cover everyone.

There are a number of drivers of health-care costs, but one statistic stands out: in the European (and European-style) economies, upwards of 70 percent of the total health-care bill is picked up by the government, meaning that people are insured in large pools with lots of bargaining clout to hold down providers' costs. In the U.S., less than half of our health care is in the public sector, resulting in a patchwork system of private insurers with much higher administrative costs. When you plug what France pays per person for health care into our own government's fiscal projections, you get balanced budgets by around 2014, which then turn into surpluses after 2040.

2. Collective Bargaining: France

At around 12 percent (in 2008), the United States doesn't have the lowest unionization rate among the wealthy countries. That distinction goes to France, where under 8 percent of the workforce belongs to a union. But union membership isn't important, collective bargaining is; and around 90 percent of non-managerial French workers—union members or not—are covered under collective bargaining agreements.

Honorable mention goes to the Scandinavian countries—with 53 percent of its workforce in a union, Norway comes in dead last among them; 68 percent of Swedes belong to a union, topping the list.

3. Inequality: Denmark

A large body of research shows that higher union density correlates with less inequality. The U.S. is the most unequal society among the wealthy countries—in the OECD, only three middle-income countries (Turkey, Mexico and Chile) have a more lopsided distribution of wealth. Denmark leads the way, with the flattest distribution among the high-income countries in the OECD.

4. Poverty: Denmark

Inequality is a measure of how much income those at the top of the pile take in compared to what those at the bottom grab. So, in countries with equal wealth, more inequality means more poverty—the piece of the economic pie shared by those at the bottom end of the scale will be smaller by definition. Not surprisingly, Denmark, at 5.4 percent, has the lowest poverty rate among the European-style countries.

The OECD uses a different standard of poverty than does the U.S. government. It counts anyone making less than half of the median income as living in poverty. By that standard, we are plagued with a poverty rate of over 17 percent, higher than all the OECD countries other than Mexico, Israel and Chile. (The average among OECD countries in general is 11.1 percent.)

5. Child Poverty: Denmark

One of the most tragic comparisons for America, among the richest countries in the world, is that more than one in five children live in poverty, as measured by the OECD. The OECD average is under 13 percent, and Denmark again comes in last, with childhood poverty at around 4 percent. (Following it are Finland, Norway, Austria and Sweden.) (<http://www.oecd.org/dataoecd/52/43/41929552.pdf>)

6. Gender Gap: Italy

Because women are disproportionately represented in lower paying jobs, and people at the bottom of the wage ladder get the most benefits of union membership, high unionization rates are also correlated with lower gender pay-gaps—it's one of several factors, but it's a key one.

Italy has the second highest union rate outside of Scandinavia, and also boasts the smallest gender gap. A female worker in the middle of the pack makes just 1.3 percent less than her male counterpart in Italy. Compare that with American women, who earn more than 20 percent less than American men. (The OECD average is 16 percent, and we're not the worst—that distinction goes to Japan among the European-style economies.)

7. Taking Care of the Young

At 6.7 deaths per 1,000 live births, the U.S. had the highest infant mortality rate among the high-income nations in 2006. Iceland, with 1.4 deaths/ 1,000 live births, had the lowest.

Among high-income countries, only Canada spent a lower share of its economic output on family benefits, services and tax breaks than the U.S., which devoted about 1.25 percent of GDP. France, which has battled low fertility rates for years, spends almost 4 percent. The U.S. is the only advanced country that doesn't offer paid maternity and/or paternity leave. Sweden offers the longest paid leave—16 months—at about 80 percent of one's income. Denmark allows the parents to divide a year off, with full pay.

Early childhood care and preschool programs confer long-lasting benefits on children who participate in them. About a third of American kids aged 3-5 were enrolled in such programs in 2008, compared with about two-thirds of kids in Denmark.

8. Taking Care of the Old: Luxembourg

Conservatives paint more progressive countries as being mired with chronically high unemployment. But there's a bit of sleight-of-hand at work: looking only at workers in their prime years, the U.S. has a low employment rate relative to most European countries. Ten of them—as well as Australia, Canada and Japan—had higher employment rates for people in their prime working years.

But we work our elderly a lot harder than they do in other countries. Among those aged 55-64, over 60 percent of Americans work, compared with just 35.3 percent in Belgium.

The Social Security system in the U.S. replaces 42 percent of the median salary — only the U.K. is stingier among the wealthy countries (but it pays a bigger share of the wages of lower-income workers). Iceland replaces 109 percent of the earnings of someone in the middle of the economic pack; Luxembourg and the Netherlands replace about 90 percent. The OECD average is 60 percent.

Among the wealthy countries, only Norway and Iceland have a higher retirement age (67) than we do in the U.S. (66). People in Luxembourg can retire with full benefits at 57, and the Italians join them just three months later.

9. Taxing Corporations Versus Individuals: Luxembourg

The U.S. government collects less in taxes than the other rich countries, on average, but that doesn't tell us who pays what. It's worth noting that the U.S. is tied for the OECD country that collects the lowest share of the economy in corporate taxes, at 1.8 percent of GDP (in 2008), or about half the group's average. That means that more of the burden falls on individuals and households. Americans fork over more in personal income taxes than the OECD average as a result—we pay 9.9 percent while the OECD as a whole pays 9 percent.

Denmark leads the world in corporate taxes, and the Slovak Republic has the lowest personal income taxes, but the most “balanced” system (an admittedly arbitrary standard) is arguably Luxembourg's, where corporations were taxed at 5.1 percent and individuals and families at 7.7 percent in 2008.

Aren't They Taxed to Death in General?

What about the “economy-killing” taxes under which those crazy European socialists suffer? Well, in 2007, we paid 7.5 percent of our economic output less in taxes than the average of OECD countries, but citizens of the other wealthy countries got a lot more for their tax dollars than we did—free or very low-cost health care, college educations, better unemployment benefits, job training and the list goes on.

In the United States, we paid the equivalent of 8.2 percent of our economy more in social spending out of our own pockets than the people in other rich countries did that year. So the savings we enjoyed on our tax bills were more than offset by what we paid for those things our counterparts bought with their taxes. When private and public spending on our social welfare are added together, Americans pay just a little bit more than the other citizens of the world's leading economic powers.

But What About the Debt?

Perhaps these countries just ran up piles of debt in the course of taking better care of their people?

That's not the case; among the world's wealthy democracies only six—Japan, Greece, Ireland, Iceland, Belgium and Italy—had a higher ratio of debt to GDP than the United States last year. Denmark's debt level was less than half of our own.

Much has also been made of the Europeans' supposedly slower growth and lower average incomes. It is true that over the last decade, gross domestic product grew by about 1 percentage point more annually in the United States than in the core countries of the EU-15. But when we talk about “growth,” we mean a growing population as well as increasing productivity: more people making stuff means more total stuff.

The differences in population growth between the United States and the EU are stark. Since 1980, the population of the United States has increased by more than a third, compared with 7 percent in the EU (as a whole). Adding people, however, doesn't necessarily make countries more affluent. A better standard is the growth of GDP per person. As Paul Krugman pointed out, “Since 1980, per capita real G.D.P.—which is what matters for living standards—has risen at about the same rate in America and in the E.U. 15: 1.95 percent a year here; 1.83 percent there.” That's essentially a rounding error.

The Wall Street Journal's editorial board got terribly excited a few years back when a study by a right-wing think tank in Sweden “found that if Europe were part of the U.S., only tiny Luxembourg could rival the richest of the 50 American states in gross domestic product per capita.” A “rising tide still lifts all boats,” the Journal reminded us, “and U.S. GDP per capita was a whopping 32% higher than the EU average in 2000, and the gap hasn't closed since.”

As far as the raw data go, that's true. (But several individual European states have GDP per capita that are either higher than, or comparable to, that enjoyed in the United States.) The thing is, those data tell only part of the story about a country's economic health. We do have different priorities, and European workers expect six to eight weeks of vacation, paid sick days, and fewer hours of overtime—Europeans simply don't work themselves to the bone as we do. American men and women worked an average of 41 hours per week in 2005, while European men averaged 38 hours and European women only 30. As the OECD noted, “As for holiday and paid leave entitlements, the striking differences between Europe and the United States (including sickness and maternity) obviously explain some of the transatlantic gap in annual working hours.”

When you factor in the difference in time spent on the job, the income gap essentially disappears. Now, is this simply a matter of Americans' having a superior work ethic, unblunted by the perfidy of the nanny state? Well, no. Overworked Americans are miserable. According to research cited by Boston College's Sloan Work and Family Research Network, four in 10 workers who work a lot of extra hours say they "feel very angry toward their employers," versus 1 percent who work only a few extra hours. Just 3 percent of two-income couples who work long hours said they were content with the effort, and nine out of 10 U.S. workers said either, "My job requires that I work very hard," or "I never seem to have enough time to get everything done on my job."

So, again, what we see is merely a difference in priorities.

Note: Unless linked above, all data are from the OECD's downloadable Excel files found here: A correction was made to this article after publication.

(http://www.oecd.org/document/0,3746,en_2649_201185_46462759_1_1_1_1,00.html.)

(Joshua Holland is an editor and senior writer at AlterNet. He is the author of The 15 Biggest Lies About the Economy: And Everything else the Right Doesn't Want You to Know About Taxes, Jobs and Corporate America.)

20110628-01 22:05 Pam Re: Aging Stars; The Economy, President Obama

Dear SteveB [in reply to young/old pics of the stars],

Good Lord! What are you trying to do? Depress the hell out of us? A couple of these don't look too bad, but what on earth happened to Grace Slick? I recently came across a photo of me when I was about 16. It was shocking how young I looked. Somehow I carry around that same image of myself in my head to this day; it's only when I look in the mirror that the shock sets in. Lots of people can't believe my age (the last time I got carded I was 48), but I know the truth! I think the thing is not to look forever young, but to look nice (at least not disgusting) in whatever moment you're in. (Does that make sense?)

I've just been reading about the greedy bank execs. who dragged us to the bottom of the sea. They've been doing this every 10 yrs. or so since Reagan adopted Milton Friedman. Different cast, same script. And the play's not over. No lessons learned, greed still abounding, innocents having to pay the price, and the continuation of society based almost entirely on consumption. Buy or die! I'm so angry. I'm not an angry sort of person, but I am continually outraged by the corruption and stupidity, the obtuseness and obliviousness everywhere I look that I want to shake something—like a CEO's scruff of the neck for instance.

Also read about how Obama has weaseled out on every campaign promise he made (just about). This article (in the NYRB) pointed out that Obama is great at giving the big speech that sounds momentous and inspiring but that leads to little or no actual action. I hate to say I agree. He's let his enemies set the agenda—over and over again. Appearing above the fray might seem like intelligent thoughtfulness to him, but while he's being cerebral on the mountaintop, the flood sweeps everything away. (Don't you just love my heated rhetoric?! I keep thinking if I can find the right words I'll discover an answer. Hasn't worked so far.) Now he's playing golf with John Boehner. Does Obama really believe that snake can be charmed so easily? (If there's a metaphor, I'll find it.)

20110629-01 07:39 SteveB "The Cost of War at Least $3.7 trillion and Counting"

Republican entitlement programs...

Where was all the talk about cutting the deficit when the Republicans wanted to go to war?

(Democrats wanted to go to war too, but they aren't such big hypocrites about it.) Just as in the case of the economy, the Republicans think their "Big Lies", repeated over and over, can make the American people think the wars are all Obama's fault. Pretty soon, we'll have not only the word "Obamacare", but also "Obamawar" and "Obamaconomy". Total myth!

Don't believe the "Big Lie"! It's all simply about priorities. Who should get that priority treatment? The rich and powerful or the rest of us? Cost of U.S. wars since 9/11? See below.

"The Cost of War at Least $3.7 trillion and Counting" by Reuters

June 29, 2011 (<http://www.reuters.com/article/2011/06/29/us-usa-war-idUSTRE75S25320110629>)

(Study finds 224,000 people have died directly from warfare and 7.8 million people have been displaced.)

(NEW YORK) When President Barack Obama cited cost as a reason to bring troops home from Afghanistan, he referred to a $1 trillion price tag for America's wars.

Staggering as it is, that figure grossly underestimates the total cost of wars in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan to the U.S. Treasury and ignores more imposing costs yet to come, according to a study released Wednesday.

The final bill will reach at least $3.7 trillion and could be as high as $4.4 trillion, according to the research project "Costs of War" by Brown University's Watson Institute for International Studies.

In the 10 years since U.S. troops went into Afghanistan to root out the al-Qaida leaders behind the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, spending on the conflicts totaled $2.3 trillion to $2.7 trillion.

Those numbers will continue to soar when considering often overlooked costs such as long-term obligations to wounded veterans and projected war spending from 2012 through 2020.

The estimates do not include at least $1 trillion more in interest payments coming due and many billions more in expenses that cannot be counted, according to the study.

20110629-02 09:50 SteveB Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act; Term Limits

I've been thinking about this term-limit thing...

And read this in a forum after this article: (<http://news.yahoo.com/greek-deputies-set-back-key-austerity-bill-072341947.html>)

posted by Engineer:

The problem with one term [or term limits, to whatever extent] is they have absolutely no incentive to do anything but steal, they aren't coming back, they don't give a cr*p about getting anything done, don't have to worry about reelection...so they fill their pockets and scoot or don't do anything at all." And given the complexities of the law, no matter how much everyone might want it made simple, simplicity seems always to be beyond our grasp, therefore, you need smart, motivated, well-educated, experienced people to do the job. Without becoming corrupt, which does not happen in every country—Google it—but does happen in the U.S., because we allow it.

Though I am very much in favor of other parts of this proposed amendment, such as members of Congress being treated just like every other ordinary, legal citizen, I've never even been sure existing term limits are good for the Presidency or the nation.

Our problem is corruption. We have to face that ugly word head-on. Our politicians are bought and sold by the rich and powerful individuals and companies who pay for their incredibly expensive campaigns for election and reelection. How could it be more obvious? Who pays the biggest burden of taxes now? The rich? Haha...no, the rapidly shrinking, former middle class. More proof? Where are our jobs, especially our good manufacturing jobs, the ones we used to have in abundance, the very wealth of our great nation, the ones that created wealth and brought riches to our shores, where are they? Permitted to go to China/Mexico/Canada/India by the people we elected to make our collective lives (rich or poor) better, not worse. How can we keep letting the rascals get away with selling us all down the river?

20110629-03 20:38 SteveB Fw: Balancing the Budget at the Expense of American Jobs

from U.S. Chamber of Commerce:

Trying to "solve" America's deficit crisis on the backs of America's job creators isn't a real solution at all. On the contrary, it's a real threat to businesses, large and small, that are already struggling to recover from the economic downturn.

Unfortunately, some of the politicians involved in deficit negotiations have put a number of dangerous business tax hikes on the table—tax hikes that would cost jobs by forcing American employers to shut their doors. Call the White House. Send a letter to Congress.

One of these proposed tax hikes is repeal of the "Last In, First Out" (LIFO) accounting method that would raise taxes on 36% of all American businesses. Our employers, employees and economy can't afford this: please email your members of Congress today to urge them to oppose tax hikes on American employers.

LIFO isn't a so-called "loophole," as some politicians would have you believe. It is an established accounting method of calculating inventory that has been part of the U.S. tax code for more than 80 years.

It's used by American businesses, large and small—from manufacturers in the Midwest to small retailers in Tacoma; from the corner grocery store in Brooklyn to a distributor in New Mexico. Raising taxes on these employers could force many of them out of business.

At a time when the country is dependent on the private sector for recovery, penalizing businesses and forcing them to redo their business model is the direct opposite of what our economy needs.

Repeal is being pushed by the White House and a number of members of Congress as part of the debt ceiling debate and must be dropped from negotiations now. Call the White House Hotline and send a letter to your members of Congress now.

Retroactively taxing businesses for following the law is both a fundamentally flawed solution to offsetting our deficit crisis and one of the most egregious attacks on business to date.

Thank you for taking action today.

Sincerely, Bill Miller, Sr. VP and National Political Director, U.S. Chamber of Commerce

© 2007-2011 U.S. Chamber of Commerce 1615 H St NW Washington DC 20062-2000

20110701-01	06:26	SteveB	U.S. Citizenship Test
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

Here's a cool sample U.S. citizenship test like Marci just had to take (and pass!):

<http://www.womansday.com/Articles/Life/Could-You-Pass-the-U.S.-Citizenship-Test.html?cid=glo>

How did you do? I got 10 for 10, but probably only because I helped Marci study for a few months. The test itself is only six questions, from a known list of 100. But, notice the test is in English and a minimal English reading/writing test is also administered.

We took part in the monthly swearing-in held in Tampa—about 1000 people from more than 83 countries. It was very inspiring, really. The legal process is there.

Nobody loves immigrants more than I do, but why do we not enforce our laws? Is it wrong for a country to have laws to protect its borders? What is the meaning of the law when it is ignored by the law-givers and law-enforcers?

20110701-02	12:39	Dennis	"If Ayn Rand & the Free Market Fetishists Were Right, We'd Be Living in a Golden Age—Does This Look Like a Golden Age to You?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Where the gold went....

"If Ayn Rand and the Free Market Fetishists Were Right, We'd Be Living in a Golden Age—Does This Look Like a Golden Age to You?" by Robert Parry, Consortium News

June 28, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/151463/>)

If the "free-market" theories of Ayn Rand and Milton Friedman were correct, the United States of the last three decades should have experienced a golden age in which the lavish rewards flowing to the titans of industry would have transformed the society into a vibrant force for beneficial progress.

After all, it has been faith in "free-market economics" as a kind of secular religion that has driven U.S. government policies—from the emergence of Ronald Reagan through the neo-liberalism of Bill Clinton into the brave new world of House Republican budget chairman Paul Ryan.

By slashing income tax rates to historically low levels—and only slightly boosting them under President Clinton before dropping them again under George W. Bush—the U.S. government essentially incentivized greed or what Ayn Rand liked to call "the virtue of selfishness."

Further, by encouraging global "free trade" and removing regulations like the New Deal's Glass-Steagall separation of commercial and investment banks, the government also got out of the way of "progress," even if that "progress" has had crushing results for many middle-class Americans.

True, not all the extreme concepts of author/philosopher Ayn Rand and economist Milton Friedman have been implemented—there are still programs like Social Security and Medicare to get rid of—but their "magic of the market" should be glowing by now.

We should be able to assess whether laissez-faire capitalism is superior to the mixed public-private economy that dominated much of the 20th Century.

The old notion was that a relatively affluent middle class would contribute to the creation of profitable businesses because average people could afford to buy consumer goods, own their own homes and take an annual vacation with the kids. That "middle-class system," however, required intervention by the government as the representative of the everyman.

Beyond building a strong infrastructure for growth—highways, airports, schools, research programs, a safe banking system, a common defense, etc.—the government imposed a progressive tax structure that helped pay for these priorities and also discouraged the accumulation of massive wealth.

After all, the threat to a healthy democracy from concentrated wealth had been known to American leaders for generations.

A century ago, it was Republican President Theodore Roosevelt who advocated for a progressive income tax and an estate tax. In the 1930s, it was Democratic President Franklin Roosevelt, who dealt with the economic and societal carnage that under-regulated financial markets inflicted on the nation during the Great Depression.

With those hard lessons learned, the federal government acted on behalf of the common citizen to limit Wall Street's freewheeling ways and to impose high tax rates on excessive wealth.

So, during Dwight Eisenhower's presidency of the 1950s, the marginal tax rate on the top tranche of earnings for the richest Americans was about 90 percent. When Ronald Reagan took office in 1981, the top rate was still around 70 percent.

Discouraging Greed

Greed was not simply frowned upon; it was discouraged.

Put differently, government policy was to maintain some degree of egalitarianism within the U.S. political-economic system. And to a remarkable degree, the strategy worked.

The American middle class became the envy of the world, with otherwise average folk earning enough money to support their families comfortably and enjoy some pleasures of life that historically had been reserved only for the rich.

Without doubt, there were serious flaws in the U.S. system, especially due to the legacies of racism and sexism. And it was when the federal government responded to powerful social movements that demanded those injustices be addressed in the 1960s and 1970s, that an opening was created for right-wing politicians to exploit resentments among white men, particularly in the South.

By posing as populists hostile to “government social engineering,” the Right succeeded in duping large numbers of middle-class Americans into seeing their own interests—and their “freedom”—as in line with corporate titans who also decried federal regulations, including those meant to protect average citizens, like requiring seat belts in cars and discouraging cigarette smoking.

Amid the sluggish economy of the 1970s, the door swung open wider for the transformation of American society that had been favored by the likes of Ayn Rand and Milton Friedman, putting the supermen of industry over the everyman of democracy.

Friedman tested out his “free-market” theories in the socio-economic laboratories of brutal military dictatorships in Latin America, most famously collaborating with Chile’s Gen. Augusto Pinochet who crushed political opponents with torture and assassinations.

Ayn Rand became the darling of the American Right with her books, such as Atlas Shrugged, promoting the elitist notion that brilliant individuals represented the engine of society and that government efforts to lessen social inequality or help the average citizen were unjust and unwise.

The Pied Piper

Yet, while Rand and Friedman gave some intellectual heft to “free-market” theories, Ronald Reagan proved to be the perfect pied piper for guiding millions of working Americans in a happy dance toward their own serfdom.

In his first inaugural address, Reagan declared that “government is the problem”—and many middle-class whites cheered.

However, what Reagan’s policies meant in practice was a sustained assault on the middle class: the busting of unions, the export of millions of decent-paying jobs, and the transfer of enormous wealth to the already rich. The tax rates for the wealthiest were slashed about in half. Greed was incentivized.

Ironically, the Reagan era came just as technology—much of it created by government-funded research—was on the cusp of creating extraordinary wealth that could have been shared with average Americans. Those benefits instead accrued to the top one or two percent.

The rich also benefited from the off-shoring of jobs, exploiting cheap foreign labor and maximizing profits. The only viable way for the super-profits of “free trade” to be shared with the broader U.S. population was through taxes on the rich. However, Reagan and his anti-government true-believers made sure that those taxes were kept at historically low levels.

The Ayn Rand/Milton Friedman theories may have purported to believe that the “free market” would somehow generate benefits for the society as a whole, but their ideas really represented a moralistic frame which held that it was somehow right that the wealth of the society should go to its “most productive” members and that the rest of us were essentially “parasites.”

Apparently, special people like Rand also didn’t need to be encumbered by philosophical consistency. Though a fierce opponent of the welfare state, Rand secretly accepted the benefits of Medicare after she was diagnosed with lung cancer, according to one of her assistants.

She connived to have Evva Pryor, an employee of Rand’s law firm, arrange Social Security and Medicare benefits for Ann O’Connor, Ayn Rand using an altered spelling of her first name and her husband’s last name.

In 100 Voices: An Oral History of Ayn Rand, Scott McConnell, founder of the Ayn Rand Institute’s media department, quoted Pryor as justifying Rand’s move by saying: “Doctors cost a lot more money than books earn and she could be totally wiped out.” Yet, it didn’t seem to matter much if “average” Americans were wiped out.

Essentially, the Right was promoting the Social Darwinism of the 19th Century, albeit in chic new clothes. The Gilded Age from a century ago was being recreated behind Reagan's crooked smile, Clinton's good-ole-boy charm and George W. Bush's Texas twang.

Whenever the political descendants of Theodore and Franklin Roosevelt tried to steer the nation back toward programs that would benefit the middle class and demand greater sacrifice from the super-rich, the wheel was grabbed again by politicians and pundits shouting the epithet, "tax-and-spend."

Many average Americans were pacified by reminders of how Reagan made them feel good with his rhetoric about "the shining city on the hill."

The Rand/Friedman elitism also remains alive with today's arguments from Republicans who protest the idea of raising taxes on businessmen and entrepreneurs because they are the ones who "create the jobs," even if there is little evidence that they are actually creating American jobs.

Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wisconsin, who is leading the fight to replace Medicare with a voucher system that envisions senior citizens buying health insurance from profit-making companies, cites Ayn Rand as his political inspiration.

A Land for Billionaires

The consequences of several decades of Reaganism and its related ideas are now apparent. Wealth has been concentrated at the top with billionaires living extravagant lives that not even monarchs could have envisioned, while the middle class shrinks and struggles, with one everyman after another being shoved down into the lower classes and into poverty.

Millions of Americans forego needed medical care because they can't afford health insurance; millions of young people, burdened by college loans, crowd back in with their parents; millions of trained workers settle for low-paying jobs; millions of families skip vacations and other simple pleasures of life.

Beyond the unfairness, there is the macro-economic problem which comes from massive income disparity. A healthy economy is one where the vast majority people can buy products, which can then be manufactured more cheaply, creating a positive cycle of profits and prosperity.

With Americans unable to afford the new car or the new refrigerator, American corporations see their domestic profit margins squeezed. So they are compensating for the struggling U.S. economy by expanding their businesses abroad in developing markets, but they also keep their profits there.

There are now economic studies that confirm what Americans have been sensing in their own lives, though the mainstream U.S. news media tends to attribute these trends to cultural changes, rather than political choices.

For instance, the Washington Post published a lengthy front-page article on June 19, describing the findings of researchers who gained access to economic data from the Internal Revenue Service which revealed which categories of taxpayers were making the high incomes.

To the surprise of some observers, the big bucks were not flowing primarily to athletes or actors or even stock market speculators. America's new super-rich were mostly corporate chieftains.

As the Post's Peter Whoriskey framed the story, U.S. business underwent a cultural transformation from the 1970's when chief executives believed more in sharing the wealth than they do today.

The article cites a U.S. dairy company CEO from the 1970's, Kenneth J. Douglas, who earned the equivalent of about $1 million a year. He lived comfortably but not ostentatiously. Douglas had an office on the second floor of a milk distribution center, and he turned down raises because he felt it would hurt morale at the plant, Whoriskey reported.

However, just a few decades later, Gregg L. Engles, the current CEO of the same company, Dean Foods, averages about 10 times what Douglas made. Engles works in a glittering high-rise office building in Dallas; owns a vacation estate in Vail, Colorado; belongs to four golf clubs; and travels in a $10 million corporate jet. He apparently has little concern about what his workers think.

"The evolution of executive grandeur—from very comfortable to jet-setting—reflects one of the primary reasons that the gap between those with the highest incomes and everyone else is widening," Whoriskey reported.

"For years, statistics have depicted growing income disparity in the United States, and it has reached levels not seen since the Great Depression. In 2008, the last year for which data are available, for example, the top 0.1 percent of earners took in more than 10 percent of the personal income in the United States, including capital gains, and the top 1 percent took in more than 20 percent.

"But economists had little idea who these people were. How many were Wall Street financiers? Sports stars? Entrepreneurs? Economists could only speculate, and debates over what is fair stalled. Now a mounting body of economic research indicates that the rise in pay for company executives is a critical feature in the widening income gap."

Jet-Setting Execs

The Post article continued: "The largest single chunk of the highest-income earners, it turns out, are executives and other managers in firms, according to a landmark analysis of tax returns by economists Jon Bakija, Adam Cole and Bradley T. Heim. These are not just executives from Wall Street, either, but from companies in even relatively mundane fields such as the milk business.

"The top 0.1 percent of earners make about $1.7 million or more, including capital gains. Of those, 41 percent were executives, managers and supervisors at non-financial companies, according to the analysis, with nearly half of them deriving most of their income from their ownership in privately-held firms.

"An additional 18 percent were managers at financial firms or financial professionals at any sort of firm. In all, nearly 60 percent fell into one of those two categories. Other recent research, moreover, indicates that executive compensation at the nation's largest firms has roughly quadrupled in real terms since the 1970s, even as pay for 90 percent of America has stalled."

While these new statistics are striking—suggesting a broader problem with high-level greed than might have been believed—the Post ducked any political analysis that would have laid blame on Ronald Reagan and various right-wing economic theories.

In a follow-up editorial on June 26, the Post lamented the nation's growing income inequality but shied away from proposing higher marginal tax rates on the rich or faulting the past several decades of low tax rates. Instead, the Post suggested perhaps going after deductions on employer-provided health insurance and mortgage interest, tax breaks that also help middle-class families.

It appears that in Official Washington and inside the major U.S. news media the idea of learning from past presidents, including the Roosevelts and Dwight Eisenhower, is a non-starter. Instead there's an unapologetic embrace of the theories of Ayn Rand and Milton Friedman, an affection that can pop out at unusual moments.

Addressing a CNBC "Fast Money" panel last year, movie director Oliver Stone was taken aback when one CNBC talking head gushed how Stone's "Wall Street" character Gordon Gecko had been an inspiration, known for his famous comment, "Greed is good." A perplexed Stone responded that Gecko, who made money by breaking up companies and eliminating jobs, was meant to be a villain.

However, the smug attitude of the CNBC stock picker represented a typical tribute to Ronald Reagan's legacy. After all, greed did not simply evolve from some vague shift in societal attitudes, as the Post suggests. Rather, it was stimulated—and rewarded—by Reagan's tax policies.

Reagan's continued popularity also makes it easier for today's "no-tax-increase" crowd to demand only spending cuts as a route to reducing the federal debt, an ocean of red ink largely created by the tax cuts of Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush.

Tea Partiers, in demanding even more cuts in government help for average citizens and even more tax cuts for the rich, represent only the most deluded part of middle-class America. A recent poll of Americans rated Reagan the greatest U.S. president ever, further enshrining his anti-government message in the minds of many Americans, even those in the battered middle class.

When a majority of Americans voted for Republicans in Election 2010—and with early polls pointing toward a likely GOP victory in the presidential race of 2012—it's obvious that large swaths of the population have no sense of what's in store for them as they position their own necks under the boots of corporate masters.

The only answer to this American crisis would seem to be a reenergized and democratized federal government fighting for average citizens and against the greedy elites. But—after several decades of Reaganism, with the “free market” religion the new gospel of the political/media classes—that seems a difficult outcome to achieve.

(Robert Parry's new book is Secrecy & Privilege: Rise of the Bush Dynasty from Watergate to Iraq.)

© 2011 Consortium News

20110701-03	17:55	SteveBA	Fw: A Short Quiz
-------------	-------	---------	------------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I AM SURE YOU WILL GET 100% RIGHT

Who Said It? Ten short questions:

This is a fun quiz. Listed below are 10 direct quotes. You have to guess which American politician said it.

Ready? Here we go! Which politician is responsible for each quote?

- A. Barack Obama
- B. Dan Quayle
- C. Sarah Palin
- D. George W. Bush

1. "Let me be absolutely clear. Israel is a strong friend of Israel's."
2. "I've now been in 57 states I think one left to go."
3. "On this Memorial Day, as our nation honors its unbroken line of fallen heroes, and I see many of them in the audience here today."
4. "What they'll say is, 'Well it costs too much money,' but you know what? It would cost about the same as what we would spend. It. Over the course of 10 years it would cost what it would costs us. (nervous laugh) All right. Okay.. We're going to. It. It would cost us about the same as it would cost for about hold on one second. I can't hear myself. But I'm glad you're fired up, though. I'm glad."
5. "The reforms we seek would bring greater competition, choice, savings and inefficiencies to our health care system."
6. "I bowled a 129. It's like—it was like the Special Olympics, or something."
7. "Of the many responsibilities granted to a president by our Constitution, few are more serious or more consequential than selecting a Supreme Court justice. The members of our highest court are granted life tenure, often serving long after the presidents who appointed them. And they are charged with the vital task of applying principles put to paper more than 20 centuries ago to some of the most difficult questions of our time."
- 8 "Everybody knows that it makes no sense that you send a kid to the emergency room for a treatable illness like asthma, they end up taking up a hospital bed, it costs, when, if you, they just gave, you gave them treatment early and they got some treatment, and a, a breathalyzer, or inhalator, not a breathalyzer. I haven't had much sleep in the last 48 hours."
9. "It was interesting to see that political interaction in Europe is not that different from the United States Senate. There's a lot of I don't know what the term is in Austrian, wheeling and dealing."

10. "I have made good judgments in the past. I have made good judgments in the future."

Sorry. This was a trick quiz. All of the correct answers are the same person. Each of these quotes are directly from President Barack Obama. And now you know why he brings his teleprompter with him everywhere he goes ...even when talking to a 6th grade class. And some members of the media continue to insist he is "The smartest man ever elected to the Presidency."

20110701-04 22:32 PamB Re: U.S. Citizenship Test

Dear SteveB,

As a citizen of the U.S., I'm not able to answer all of the questions correctly. But, I didn't study for a few months!! I live in the U.S., more concerned about the economy, political and financial corruption, living green to save our planet. How can you judge the U.S. when you are in Bolivia?"

20110702-01 06:00 SteveB Re: U.S. Citizenship Test

Dear PamB,

The answer to your question is very easy...I grew up and lived in the U.S. most of my life. I just spent 6 months in Florida, am here in Orlando right now. I still live in the U.S. part of the time. I have family and business interests there. When I'm in Bolivia I use the internet to stay caught up. I vote via absentee ballot. Why would I not be able to judge the U.S.? Besides, many foreigners who have never been to the U.S. do a very good job of judging us, better often than many Americans do, with more insight and with less blind loyalty.

20110702-02 13:00 Dennis "New American Socialism" & "An American Tragedy Brewing" & "One of the Most Obvious Frauds Ever Foisted on the American People"

The following essay is by an investment advisor with a decidedly libertarian conservative perspective. I think you'll find it interesting in its analysis as a political observer and concerned investor. While Stansberry chooses to call the current American political and economic system a variant of state socialism, "New American Socialism," it seems to me to be a variant of old fashioned corporate fascism or nationalist socialism. But whatever he wants to call it, I won't quibble with his conclusion about who's getting all the profits and benefits and who's getting the short end of the stick from the gaming of the system.

"New American Socialism" by Porter Stansberry, DailyWealth

June 29, 2011, (<http://www.dailywealth.com/1773/New-American-Socialism>)

No one knows what to call it...

That's part of the problem. It's difficult to criticize something that doesn't yet have a proper name.

You can't just call our economic system "socialism." It's not. There's a profit motive and private ownership of nearly all assets. Socialism has neither of these. Besides, far too many people have become far too rich in our system to simply label it "socialism."

If you have ever traveled to an actual socialist country—with a power grid that never works, little public sanitation, petty graft at every turn, and endemic, horrifying poverty—you realize our system and real socialism aren't the same at all.

But our system isn't truly capitalism, either. The State intervenes in almost every industry, often in a big and expensive way. With government at all levels making up more than 40% of GDP, it's fair to say we live in a State dominated society.

And as with all socialist experiments, it is the poor who suffer the worst economic outcomes. It is their cash savings that get wiped out by inflation. It is their jobs that disappear when regulations reduce capital investment or government debt crowds out private capital in the markets.

If the poor knew the first thing about economics, they wouldn't keep voting for socialist politicians and their programs. Alas, they don't even know the basics.

The poor in America, like the poor everywhere, still believe you can rob Peter to pay Paul. They still believe their "leaders" are trying to serve their best interests. It is a sad hoax. What has really happened is clear: Bamboozling the poor has become a way of life for American politicians. And the poor's willingness—even eagerness—to embrace the resulting economic slavery is the linchpin of our system.

But it's not only the poor who have become addicted to the system. Businessmen like Warren Buffett embrace it, too—despite its limitations and taxes. Buffett calls it the "American System." He says it's the greatest system for creating wealth the world has ever seen.

We're not so sure.

Yes, it certainly makes it easy for big businessmen like Buffett to become wealthy. But those same benefits don't accrue to the society at large. For example... even though the value of America's production has soared over the last 40 years and asset prices have risen considerably, our debts have grown even more.

When you adjust for debt and inflation, you discover America hasn't gotten richer at all. Yes, we have become more affluent. And yes, some individuals have gotten vastly richer. But as a whole, when you add back the debts we've racked up, the country hasn't gotten richer at all.

Since the end of the gold standard in 1971, real after-tax wages, per capita, stagnated. On average, we haven't gotten any richer at all in 40 years. What happened over the last 40 years?

Why did so many people rush so eagerly into debt? Why did they borrow more and more to buy the same things at ever-higher prices—again and again and again? And why do people in America continue to work, day after day, for jobs that offer no opportunity and declining real wages? Most important, how did a few people end up getting so rich from this merry-go-round economic system that never takes us anywhere?

To answer this question, we need only answer one core question: Who benefits?

Whose wealth and power increases with inflation? Whose stature in society grows alongside the government? Who profits from increased spending on wars, prisons, and social programs that are doomed to fail? And most of all... who profits from an explosion in debt?

A certain class of people has the power to not only protect itself from these policies but to profit as well. These people have used the last 40 years to produce massive amounts of paper wealth. And they are now desperately trying to convert those paper accounts into real wealth, which explains the exploding price of farmland and precious metals.

This explosion of wealth at the top of the "food chain" is the main feature of what I call New American Socialism. It's a system fueled by paper money, the constant expansion of debt, and a kind of corruption that's hard to police because it occurs within the boundaries of the law.

Like the European and totalitarian socialism of the last 100 years, New American Socialism harnesses the power of the State to grow and maintain production. Like in traditional socialism, the poor pay the costs of New American Socialism. But unlike socialist systems of the past, this new American version has one critical improvement...

In the New American Socialism, the power of the system produces private profits.

In this way, it provides a huge incentive to entrepreneurs and politicians to work together on behalf of the system. This is what keeps the system going. This is what keeps it from collapsing upon itself. And this, unfortunately, is why the imbalances in the world economy will continue to grow until the entire global monetary system itself implodes.

"An American Tragedy Brewing" by Porter Stansberry

As I explained, in "New American Socialism", the power of the system produces private profits. It began when Nixon took us off the gold standard. Without the tie to gold, the amount of economic mischief our government could engineer became practically limitless.

Today, I'll show you an example of how New American Socialism works and how thoroughly corrupted the system has become, and I'll begin to set up our challenge as investors today...

While you're reading today's essay, I want you to think about whether you're willing to make a profit on a business that couldn't survive without government protection... whose products aren't saleable in a real market. In other words: How mercenary are you?

To answer that question, we're going to take a look at a tragedy that's brewing right now...

For many decades, the government has supported higher education in America. Does the government give money to actual students based on their achievement? Yes... but that's a small part of the program. Most of the government money spent comes via access to student loans—so-called Title IV funding.

A host of rules apply to these loans, but knowing just a few of them is instructive. The most important rule relates to a college's total revenue mix.

To access Title IV funding, a college cannot receive more than 90% of its revenue from government-related sources. The government is allowing the market to determine whether or not a college is useful and legitimate by requiring it to earn only 10% of its revenues from private sources. (Does this sound smart to you? It's tantamount to requiring only a tiny down payment to buy a house. It's dangerous because the student—and the college—doesn't have much skin in the game.)

There's another important rule. Colleges can lose access to government backed funds if loans made to previous students experience default rates in excess of 25% for three consecutive years. (Naturally, the rule has a key loophole, which I'll discuss in a moment.)

These two key rules, which leave the government on the hook for 90% of the risk of the student loans, led to the creation and massive growth of the for-profit education industry.

Clever entrepreneurs realized a traditional college education wasn't practical for many students who lacked either the cognitive ability to succeed at a traditional college or the desire to acquire a liberal arts education. What many students wanted, could master, and could afford were essentially trade schools that taught skills in demand from local employers. For-profit education grew up competing with poorly funded community colleges. And they had a major advantage: huge marketing budgets.

Let me show you what this means in terms of how these for-profit schools spend the Title IV money they receive.

Apollo is the largest company in the for-profit education space. In 2009, Apollo grew its total revenues by $833 million. Yes, you read that correctly—$833 million in revenue growth during a severe recession. Its Title IV funding rose by $1.1 billion. That is, the amount of government-related loans and grants it received increased by more than its total revenue growth. The company became even more dependent on the government. Where did the money go? Not toward education. In 2009, Apollo increased its spending on faculty and other instructional costs by $99 million. That is, out of every $1 it got extra from the government, it spent roughly $0.09 on actual education.

Instead, a lot of money went to shareholders. Since 2008, Apollo has spent more than $1 billion buying back its own stock. But most of the money went to its executives. Apollo currently spends almost $1.5 billion annually on compensation for its administrators and salesmen.

In one way, you can argue for-profit education executives have earned their paychecks. Enrollment is booming, with the public showing a clear preference for the curriculum offered by the for-profit schools. Since 1986, enrollment in the sector has grown six fold. The U.S. now has 2,800 for-profit institutions of higher learning. About 10% of all college students are now enrolled in for-profit schools.

And you can make a good case these firms are providing a valuable service at a reasonable price. Supporters of the industry note that average revenue per student is the lowest at for-profit colleges: $11,130, while public universities average $18,922 per student and private not-for-profit colleges received $37,869 per student.

So are these students (and our society) getting a bargain? Does foisting 90% of the risk on government lead to positive outcomes? No, not really. Instead, much like Fannie Mae did to housing, these government guarantees create huge incentives for selling college to students who can't afford it. It also makes college more expensive and less affordable.

The most recent examination of student-loan repayment shows for-profit education students have much higher default rates. In 2008, the national default rate on student loans was 7%. The default rate for private not-for-profit schools (the most expensive) was 4%. The default rate for public not-for-profit school loans was 6%. The default rate for private for-profit schools was 11.6%. U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan said of the numbers:

The data tells us that students attending for-profit schools are the most likely to default... Far too many for-profit schools are saddling students with debt that they cannot afford in exchange for degrees and certificates they cannot use.

When you look at the default figures in aggregate, the problem jumps out at you. Students at for-profit schools represent 26% of the borrower population. They make up 43% of all defaults.

When I saw that number, the first thing that occurred to me was... "Wait a minute... I thought schools get kicked out of the program if default rates reach 25% for three consecutive years? How can for-profit schools represent so much of the default rate when they make up so few of the students borrowing?"

The answer is—borrowers who default after the first two years of repayment aren't counted.

What?!

That's right. To count as a default, you have to stop repaying your student loans in the first two years after graduation. The repayments required during this time are extremely low—much like the teaser rate on a subprime mortgage. The real extent of the problem can't be understood until you see the actual default rate on all loans. After all, the real default rate isn't the percentage of students who default in the first two years. It's the percentage of borrowers who never repay their debts. What is the real number? Well, we don't know. The Department of Education won't make that data public.

What we do know is the companies themselves write off between 50% and 60% of the private loans they make to their students.

The companies use these private loans to make sure they stay within the 90% rule that governs access to the government's backing. That's tantamount to the many second mortgages that were made on the side to home buyers, so they could afford their down payments. And not surprisingly, when folks buy a home using 100% borrowed money or when they get a college degree using 100% borrowed money, they frequently won't (or can't) pay the loan back.

I have no objection to a private lender who decides to lend to poor credit risks—even for things like an expensive home or degree. But let that lender bear the risk. Don't pass those risks to me via government protection.

Obviously, with 50% to 60% of these loans defaulting, the only real profit in the system comes from the government's protection. And the scary part is the amount of government money flooding into these schools is soaring. Historically, little government money was available to these schools—only $2 billion to $4 billion a year. But then... with the right kind of legal corruption... the floodgates opened.

Sally Stroup was the head lobbyist for Apollo. In 2002, she became the assistant secretary of the Department of Education under President Bush. Guess what happened next?

Stroup gutted the rules that governed which students these schools could recruit. Government funding for for-profit college education is now more than $20 billion a year. And at current growth rates, within 10 years, 40% of all government-backed college funding will go to for-profit education.

Call it socialism. Call it New American Socialism. Call it compassionate conservatism. It doesn't matter what you call it, the rules of the game are clear: The government takes all of the risk while investors and executives keep all of the profits.

This brings me back to the challenge I outlined above. After reading today's essay, would you buy shares of Apollo? They're cheap, trading at about 3.5 times cash earnings, and the U.S. Treasury has essentially guaranteed its future revenues.

That's certainly attractive. But knowing what you now know about the for-profit education business, do you want to own this company?

"One of the Most Obvious Frauds Ever Foisted on the American People" by Porter Stansberry, DailyWealth

July 2, 2011, (<http://www.dailywealth.com/1776/One-of-the-Most-Obvious-Frauds-Ever-Foisted-on-the-American-People>)

Yesterday, I left you with a question...

Over the past few days, I've described what I call New American Socialism. As I've shown you, it's a kind of legal corruption whereby the risks of doing business are assumed by the taxpayers... but the profits still accrue to private enterprise.

The corruption has infected one industry after another. And it's weighing down our economy... But I've actually preferred having it in many of the stocks I've recommended over the years. It tends to be good for investors. So the question now is, am I still interested in buying into New American Socialism? It's a difficult question... and the answer is complicated. So bear with me...

In yesterday's essay, I described a tragedy unfolding in the education sector. If you missed the essay, I suggest you go back and give it a read. You'll find the numbers disturbing.

Essentially, the for-profit education industry is selling a product its customers cannot afford.

This industry games the rules of the government and spends a fortune on lobbying—more than $12 million in the last year. This industry would literally not exist without government-guarantees standing behind 90% of its revenues.

And Wall Street experts estimate this industry will rack up around $250 billion in credit losses over the next decade—an amount of money that exceeds the losses from Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac so far.

All these risks will eventually cost the U.S. Treasury billions of dollars. You see, this industry overwhelmingly targets women and minorities—people who are often up against a wall financially. These students will never be able to repay these debts.

While these students have no financial skin in the game (many borrow 100% of their tuition), they face enormous consequences down the road from this scheme... Student loans are notoriously difficult to discharge, and many borrowers will be crippled financially by the obligations they cannot afford. The facts of this situation are incontrovertible and well known—even inside the current president's administration. And yet... even when all of these facts were studied and reviewed... what did the president do?

Critics had demanded so-called "gainful employment" regulations that would limit how much a student could borrow to an amount of money he would likely be able to repay based on the current employment and income track record of other alumni. Obviously, such sensible regulation was never likely to be implemented by Washington... especially not by a minority president when the funding in question goes overwhelmingly to poor, minority students.

Instead, in early June, Obama's administration promulgated a new set of rules that were supposed to address the abuses and the risks of the government's generous funding rules for for-profit education.

The new rules actually loosen the funding requirements—substantially. Colleges will be eligible for federal support as long as at least 35% of their students are repaying their loans over the first three years. Now, up to 65% of the students can default. And what about limiting loan amounts to ability to repay? Loan amounts may not exceed 30% of anticipated discretionary income.

How will students pay for food, housing, transportation, insurance, etc. if they're spending 30% of their incomes on student loans?

Rather than tightening the standards, the new rules actually loosen the standards. They also go further in guaranteeing continued federal support. Under the new rules, no schools will lose funding until 2015 at the soonest, to give them time to adapt to the new "standards," which were trumpeted as a major reform.

Only in Washington D.C.

The for-profit education "business" is one of the most obvious frauds ever foisted on the American people. The industry has been structured to take advantage of the least sophisticated members of society. It promises benefits the average student is unlikely to achieve: a better job and a better life. Instead, these students are saddled with unpayable debts and enjoy no corresponding increase in wages.

Assuming the government should not do anything to protect the students from this fraud, shouldn't the risks of perpetrating this fraud be left with the companies themselves? Let for-profit education companies guarantee these loans. Let them take the risk that these debts will never be repaid.

But that's not how New American Socialism works. What happens is, all the profits of this scam go to the executives and the shareholders. The risk goes to the government. Our leaders are now so corrupted by New American Socialism they can't even stop the for-profit education scheme I describe above.

The facts, by the way, aren't even in dispute. This is the obvious stuff—the stuff no one can really dispute. If our leaders let this industry rack up $250 billion in bad debts over the next decade, how can we expect them to do anything to stop our massive annual deficits and our runaway federal debt?

If the administration can't stop the for-profit education industry from getting its hands into the U.S. Treasury, whom will it stop? Nobody.

So the only real question is: Do I want to be buying stocks—any stocks—right now?

When I consider the unsustainable debts and unfunded liabilities the government has taken on... and the upcoming credit crisis New American Socialism has created... I arrive at the answer: "No."

20110702-03	15:26	Dennis	"14 Propaganda Techniques Fox 'News' Uses to Brainwash Americans"
-------------	-------	--------	---

In case you need to unwash your brain...

"14 Propaganda Techniques Fox 'News' Uses to Brainwash Americans" by Dr. Cynthia Boaz, Truthout

July 2, 2011, (<http://www.truth-out.org/14-propaganda-techniques-fox-news-uses-brainwash-americans/1309612678>)

There is nothing more sacred to the maintenance of democracy than a free press.

Access to comprehensive, accurate and quality information is essential to the manifestation of Socratic citizenship—the society characterized by a civically engaged, well-informed and socially invested populace. Thus, to the degree that access to quality information is willfully or unintentionally obstructed, democracy itself is degraded.

It is ironic that in the era of 24-hour cable news networks and "reality" programming, the news-to-fluff ratio and overall veracity of information has declined precipitously. Take the fact Americans now spend on average about 50 hours a week using various forms of media, while at the same time cultural literacy levels hover just above the gutter. Not only does mainstream media now tolerate gross misrepresentations of fact and history by public figures (highlighted most recently by Sarah Palin's ludicrous depiction of Paul Revere's ride), but many media actually legitimize these displays. Pause for a moment and ask yourself what it means that the world's largest, most profitable and most popular news channel passes off as fact every whim, impulse and outrageously incompetent analysis of its so-called reporters. How did we get here? Take the enormous amount of misinformation that is taken for truth by Fox audiences: the belief that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and that he was in on 9/11, the belief that climate change isn't real and/or man-made, the belief that Barack Obama is Muslim and wasn't born in the United States, the insistence that all Arabs are Muslim and all Muslims are terrorists, the inexplicable perceptions that immigrants are both too lazy to work and are about to steal your job. All of these claims are demonstrably false, yet Fox News viewers will maintain their veracity with incredible zeal.

Why? Is it simply that we have lost our respect for knowledge?

My curiosity about this question compelled me to sit down and document the most oft-used methods by which willful ignorance has been turned into dogma by Fox News and other propagandists disguised as media. The techniques I identify here also help to explain the simultaneously powerful identification the Fox media audience has with the network, as well as their ardent, reflexive defenses of it. The good news is that the more conscious you are of these techniques, the less likely they are to work on you. The bad news is that those reading this article are probably the least in need of it.

1. Panic Mongering.

This goes one step beyond simple fear mongering. With panic mongering, there is never a break from the fear. The idea is to terrify and terrorize the audience during every waking moment. From Muslims to swine flu to recession to homosexuals to immigrants to the rapture itself, the belief over at Fox seems to be that if your fight-or-flight reflexes aren't activated, you aren't alive. This of course raises the question: why terrorize your own audience? Because it is the fastest way to bypasses the rational brain. In other words, when people are afraid, they don't think rationally. And when they can't think rationally, they'll believe anything.

2. Character Assassination/Ad Hominem.

Fox does not like to waste time debating the idea. Instead, they prefer a quicker route to dispensing with their opponents: go after the person's credibility, motives, intelligence, character, or, if necessary, sanity. No category of character assassination is off the table and no offense is beneath them. Fox and like-minded media figures also use ad hominem attacks not just against individuals, but entire categories of people in an effort to discredit the ideas of every person who is seen to fall into that category, e.g. "liberals," "hippies," "progressives" etc. This form of argument—if it can be called that—leaves no room for genuine debate over ideas, so by definition, it is undemocratic. Not to mention just plain crass.

3. Projection/Flipping.

This one is frustrating for the viewer who is trying to actually follow the argument. It involves taking whatever underhanded tactic you're using and then accusing your opponent of doing it to you first. We see this frequently in the immigration discussion, where anti-racists are accused of racism, or in the climate change debate, where those who argue for human causes of the phenomenon are accused of not having science or facts on their side. It's often called upon when the media host finds themselves on the ropes in the debate.

4. Rewriting History.

This is another way of saying that propagandists make the facts fit their worldview. The Downing Street Memos on the Iraq war were a classic example of this on a massive scale, but it happens daily and over smaller issues as well. A recent case in point is Palin's mangling of the Paul Revere ride, which Fox reporters have bent over backward to validate. Why lie about the historical facts, even when they can be demonstrated to be false? Well, because dogmatic minds actually find it easier to reject reality than to update their viewpoints. They will literally rewrite history if it serves their interests. And they'll often speak with such authority that the casual viewer will be tempted to question what they knew as fact.

5. Scapegoating/Othering.

This works best when people feel insecure or scared. It's technically a form of both fear mongering and diversion, but it is so pervasive that it deserves its own category. The simple idea is that if you can find a group to blame for social or economic problems, you can then go on to a) justify violence/dehumanization of them, and b) subvert responsibility for any harm that may befall them as a result.

6. Conflating Violence with Power and Opposition to Violence with Weakness.

This is more of what I'd call a "meta-frame" (a deeply held belief) than a media technique, but it is manifested in the ways news is reported constantly. For example, terms like "show of strength" are often used to describe acts of repression, such as those by the Iranian regime against the protesters in the summer of 2009. There are several concerning consequences of this form of conflation. First, it has the potential to make people feel falsely emboldened by shows of force—it can turn wars into sporting events. Secondly, especially in the context of American politics, displays of violence—whether manifested in war or debates about the Second Amendment—are seen as noble and (in an especially surreal irony) moral. Violence become synonymous with power, patriotism and piety.

7. Bullying.

This is a favorite technique of several Fox commentators. That it continues to be employed demonstrates that it seems to have some efficacy. Bullying and yelling works best on people who come to the conversation with a lack of confidence, either in themselves or their grasp of the subject being discussed. The bully exploits this lack of confidence by berating the guest into submission or compliance. Often, less self-possessed people will feel shame and anxiety when being berated and the quickest way to end the immediate discomfort is to cede authority to the bully. The bully is then able to interpret that as a "win."

8. Confusion.

As with the preceding technique, this one works best on an audience that is less confident and self-possessed. The idea is to deliberately confuse the argument, but insist that the logic is airtight and imply that anyone who disagrees is either too dumb or too fanatical to follow along. Less independent minds will interpret the confusion technique as a form of sophisticated thinking, thereby giving the user's claims veracity in the viewer's mind.

9. Populism.

This is especially popular in election years. The speakers identifies themselves as one of "the people" and the target of their ire as an enemy of the people. The opponent is always "elitist" or a "bureaucrat" or a "government insider" or some other category that is not the people. The idea is to make the opponent harder to relate to and harder to empathize with. It often goes hand in hand with scapegoating. A common logical fallacy with populism bias when used by the right is that accused "elitists" are almost always liberals—a category of political actors who, by definition, advocate for non-elite groups.

10. Invoking the Christian God.

This is similar to othering and populism. With morality politics, the idea is to declare yourself and your allies as patriots, Christians and "real Americans" (those are inseparable categories in this line of thinking) and anyone who challenges them is not. Basically, God loves Fox and Republicans and America. And hates taxes and anyone who doesn't love those other three things. Because the speaker has been benedicted by God to speak on behalf of all Americans, any challenge is perceived as immoral. It's a cheap and easy technique used by all totalitarian entities from states to cults.

11. Saturation.

There are three components to effective saturation: being repetitive, being ubiquitous and being consistent. The message must be repeated over and over, it must be everywhere and it must be shared across commentators: e.g. "Saddam has WMD." Veracity and hard data have no relationship to the efficacy of saturation. There is a psychological effect of being exposed to the same message over and over, regardless of whether it's true or if it even makes sense, e.g., "Barack Obama wasn't born in the United States." If something is said enough times, by enough people, many will come to accept it as truth. Another example is Fox's own slogan of "Fair and Balanced."

12. Disparaging Education.

There is an emerging and disturbing lack of reverence for education and intellectualism in many mainstream media discourses. In fact, in some circles (e.g. Fox), higher education is often disparaged as elitist. Having a university credential is perceived by these folks as not a sign of credibility, but of a lack of it. In fact, among some commentators, evidence of intellectual prowess is treated snidely and as anti-American. The disdain for education and other evidence of being trained in critical thinking are direct threats to a hive-mind mentality, which is why they are so viscerally demeaned.

13. Guilt by Association.

This is a favorite of Glenn Beck and Andrew Breitbart, both of whom have used it to decimate the careers and lives of many good people. Here's how it works: if your cousin's college roommate's uncle's ex-wife attended a dinner party back in 1984 with Gorbachev's niece's ex-boyfriend's sister, then you, by extension are a communist set on destroying America. Period.

14. Diversion.

This is where, when on the ropes, the media commentator suddenly takes the debate in a weird but predictable direction to avoid accountability. This is the point in the discussion where most Fox anchors start comparing the opponent to Saul Alinsky or invoking ACORN or Media Matters, in a desperate attempt to win through guilt by association. Or they'll talk about wanting to focus on "moving forward," as though by analyzing the current state of things or God forbid, how we got to this state of things, you have no regard for the future. Any attempt to bring the discussion back to the issue at hand will likely be called deflection, an ironic use of the technique of projection/flipping.

In debating some of these tactics with colleagues and friends, I have also noticed that the Fox viewership seems to be marked by a sort of collective personality disorder whereby the viewer feels almost as though they've been let into a secret society. Something about their affiliation with the network makes them feel privileged and this affinity is likely what drives the viewers to defend the network so vehemently. They seem to identify with it at a core level, because it tells them they are special and privy to something the rest of us don't have. It's akin to the loyalty one feels by being let into a private club or a gang. That effect is also likely to make the propaganda more powerful, because it goes mostly unquestioned.

In considering these tactics and their possible effects on American public discourse, it is important to note that historically, those who've genuinely accessed truth have never berated those who did not. You don't get honored by history when you beat up your opponent: look at Martin Luther King Jr., Robert Kennedy, Abraham Lincoln. These men did not find the need to engage in othering, ad hominem attacks, guilt by association or bullying. This is because when a person has accessed a truth, they are not threatened by the opposing views of others. This reality reveals the righteous indignation of people like Glenn Beck, Bill O'Reilly and Sean Hannity as a symptom of untruth. These individuals are hostile and angry precisely because they don't feel confident in their own veracity. And in general, the more someone is losing their temper in a debate and the more intolerant they are of listening to others, the more you can be certain they do not know what they're talking about.

One final observation. Fox audiences, birthers and Tea Partiers often defend their arguments by pointing to the fact that a lot of people share the same perceptions. This is a reasonable point to the extent that Murdoch's News Corporation reaches a far larger audience than any other single media outlet. But, the fact that a lot of people believe something is not necessarily a sign that it's true; it's just a sign that it's been effectively marketed.

As honest, fair and truly intellectual debate degrades before the eyes of the global media audience, the quality of American democracy degrades along with it.

20110704-01 08:02 GaryC Re: "14 Propaganda Techniques..."

Dear Dennis,

While some of what you say is true about commentators on Fox, they are equally true on MSNBC and CNN. In the latter case, the topics may be changed but both the left and the right have their loons. It has bothered me for a long time that the popular magazines are U.S. and People, that the popular TV shows are American Idol and Survivor, that the popular books are written (spoken) by pop figures. The intellectual level of the U.S. population is worse than ever given the amount of money we waste on education.

I have employees who could not find Afghanistan on a map. I have employees who have no idea why the debt ceiling debate is critical. They are focused on Casey Anthony and other pulp cr*p. Of course, it is politically unacceptable to require kids to learn history, understand basic economics or understand how their government works.

Whether you are on the left, the right, or in the middle, the state of our citizenry sucks. Fox, MSNBC and CNN are just pandering to their audiences and are trying to sell product. Personally, Fox and the others would not exist if the major networks had not become so biased during the past 20 years. Plus, they only have 30 minutes to present their picture while the news channels have 24 hours.

20110707-01	07:29	GaryC	Illegal Immigration Produces "Two Californias"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

This is an article from Victor Davis Hansen, a Senior Fellow at the Hoover Institute at Stanford University...

"Two Californias" by Victor Davis Hanson, National Review

Dec. 15, 2010, (<http://www.nationalreview.com/articles/255320/two-californias-victor-davis-hanson?page=1>)

The last three weeks I have traveled about, taking the pulse of the more forgotten areas of central California. I wanted to witness, even if superficially, what is happening to a state that has the highest sales and income taxes, the most lavish entitlements, the near-worst public schools (based on federal test scores), and the largest number of illegal aliens in the nation, along with an overregulated private sector, a stagnant and shrinking manufacturing base, and an elite environmental ethos that restricts commerce and productivity without curbing consumption.

During this unscientific experiment, three times a week I rode a bike on a 20-mile trip over various rural roads in southwestern Fresno County . I also drove my car over to the coast to work, on various routes through towns like San Joaquin, Mendota, and Firebaugh. And near my home I have been driving, shopping, and touring by intent the rather segregated and impoverished areas of Caruthers, Fowler, Laton, Orange Cove, Parlier, and Selma . My own farmhouse is now in an area of abject poverty and almost no ethnic diversity; the closest elementary school (my alma mater, two miles away) is 94 percent Hispanic and 1 percent white, and well below federal testing norms in math and English.

Here are some general observations about what I saw (other than that the rural roads of California are fast turning into rubble, poorly maintained and reverting to what I remember seeing long ago in the rural South). First, remember that these areas are the ground zero, so to speak, of 20 years of illegal immigration. There has been a general depression in farming— to such an extent that the 20- to-100-acre tree and vine farmer, the erstwhile backbone of the old rural California , for all practical purposes has ceased to exist.

On the western side of the Central Valley , the effects of arbitrary cutoffs in federal irrigation water have idled tens of thousands of acres of prime agricultural land, leaving thousands unemployed. Manufacturing plants in the towns in these areas—which used to make harvesters, hydraulic lifts, trailers, food processing equipment—have largely shut down; their production has been shipped off overseas or south of the border.

Agriculture itself—from almonds to raisins—has increasingly become corporatized and mechanized, cutting by half the number of farm workers needed. So unemployment runs somewhere between 15 and 20 percent.

Many of the rural trailer-house compounds I saw appear to the naked eye no different from what I have seen in the Third World . There is a Caribbean look to the junked cars, electric wires crisscrossing between various outbuildings, plastic tarps substituting for replacement shingles, lean-tos cobbled together as auxiliary housing, pit bulls unleashed, and geese, goats, and chickens roaming around the yards. The public hears about all sorts of tough California regulations that stymie business—rigid zoning laws, strict building codes, constant inspections—but apparently none of that applies out here.

It is almost as if the more California regulates, the more it does not regulate. Its public employees prefer to go after misdemeanors in the upscale areas to justify our expensive oversight industry, while ignoring the felonies in the downtrodden areas, which are becoming feral and beyond the ability of any inspector to do anything but feel irrelevant. But in the regulators' defense, where would one get the money to redo an ad hoc trailer park with a spider web of illegal bare wires?

Many of the rented-out rural shacks and stationary Winnebagos are on former small farms—the vineyards overgrown with weeds, or torn out with the ground lying fallow. I pass on the cultural consequences to communities from the loss of thousands of small farming families. I don't think I can remember another time when so many acres in the eastern part of the valley have gone out of production, even though farm prices have recently rebounded. Apparently it is simply not worth the gamble of investing $7,000 to $10,000 an acre in a new orchard or vineyard. What an anomaly—with suddenly soaring farm prices, still we have thousands of acres in the world's richest agricultural belt, with available water on the east side of the valley and plentiful labor, gone idle or in disuse. Is credit frozen? Are there simply no more farmers? Are the schools so bad as to scare away potential agricultural entrepreneurs? Or are we all terrified by the national debt and uncertain future?

California coastal elites may worry about the oxygen content of water available to a three-inch smelt in the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta, but they seem to have no interest in the epidemic dumping of trash, furniture, and often toxic substances throughout California's rural hinterland. Yesterday, for example, I rode my bike by a stopped van just as the occupants tossed seven plastic bags of raw refuse onto the side of the road. I rode up near their bumper and said in my broken Spanish not to throw garbage onto the public road. But there were three of them, and one of me. So I was lucky to be sworn at only. I note in passing that I would not drive into Mexico and, as a guest, dare to pull over and throw seven bags of trash into the environment of my host.

In fact, trash piles are commonplace out here—composed of everything from half-empty paint cans and children's plastic toys to diapers and moldy food. I have never seen a rural sheriff cite a litterer, or witnessed state EPA workers cleaning up these unauthorized wastelands. So I would suggest to Bay Area scientists that the environment is taking a much harder beating down here in central California than it is in the Delta. Perhaps before we cut off more irrigation water to the west side of the valley, we might invest some green dollars into cleaning up the unsightly and sometimes dangerous garbage that now litters the outskirts of our rural communities.

We hear about the tough small-business regulations that have driven residents out of the state, at the rate of 2,000 to 3,000 a week. But from my unscientific observations these past weeks, it seems rather easy to open a small business in California without any oversight at all, or at least what I might call a "counter business." I counted eleven mobile hot-kitchen trucks that simply park by the side of the road, spread about some plastic chairs, pull down a tarp canopy, and, presto, become mini-restaurants. There are no "facilities" such as toilets or washrooms. But I do frequently see lard trails on the isolated roads I bike on, where trucks apparently have simply opened their draining tanks and sped on, leaving a slick of cooking fats and oils. Crows and ground squirrels love them; they can be seen from a distance mysteriously occupied in the middle of the road.

At crossroads, peddlers in a counter-California economy sell almost anything. Here is what I noticed at an intersection on the west side last week: shovels, rakes, hoes, gas pumps, lawnmowers, edgers, blowers, jackets, gloves, and caps. The merchandise was all new. I doubt whether in high-tax California sales taxes or income taxes were paid on any of these stop-and-go transactions.

In two supermarkets 50 miles apart, I was the only one in line who did not pay with a social-service plastic card (gone are the days when "food stamps" were embarrassing bulky coupons). But I did not see any relationship between the use of the card and poverty as we once knew it: The electrical appurtenances owned by the user and the car into which the groceries were loaded were indistinguishable from those of the upper middle class.

By that I mean that most consumers drove late-model Camrys, Accords, or Tauruses, had iPhones, Bluetooths, or BlackBerries, and bought everything in the store with public assistance credit. This seemed a world apart from the trailers I had just ridden by the day before. I don't editorialize here on the logic or morality of any of this, but I note only that there are vast numbers of people who apparently are not working, are on public food assistance, and enjoy the technological veneer of the middle class. California has a consumer market surely, but often no apparent source of income. Does the $40 million a day supplement to unemployment benefits from Washington explain some of this?

Do diversity concerns, as in lack of diversity, work both ways? Over a hundred-mile stretch, when I stopped in San Joaquin for a bottled water, or drove through Orange Cove, or got gas in Parlier, or went to a corner market in southwestern Selma, my home town, I was the only non-Hispanic—there were no Asians, no blacks, no other whites. We may speak of the richness of "diversity," but those who cherish that ideal simply have no idea that there are now countless inland communities that have become near-apartheid societies, where Spanish is the first language, the schools are not at all diverse, and the federal and state governments are either the main employers or at least the chief sources of income—whether through emergency rooms, rural health clinics, public schools, or social service offices. An observer from Mars might conclude that our elites and masses have given up on the ideal of integration and assimilation, perhaps in the wake of the arrival of 11 to 15 million illegal aliens.

Again, I do not editorialize, but I note these vast transformations over the last 20 years that are the paradoxical wages of unchecked illegal immigration from Mexico, a vast expansion of California's entitlements and taxes, the flight of the upper middle class out of state, the deliberate effort not to tap natural resources, the downsizing in manufacturing and agriculture, and the departure of whites, blacks, and Asians from many of these small towns to more racially diverse and upscale areas of California.

Fresno's California State University campus is embroiled in controversy over the student body president's announcing that he is an illegal alien, with all the requisite protests in favor of the DREAM Act. I won't comment on the legislation per se, but again only note the anomaly. I taught at CSUF for 21 years. I think it fair to say that the predominant theme of the Chicano and Latin American Studies program's sizable curriculum was a fuzzy American culpability. By that I mean that students in those classes heard of the sins of America more often than its attractions. In my home town, Mexican flag decals on car windows are far more common than their American counterparts.

I note this because hundreds of students here illegally are now terrified of being deported to Mexico . I can understand that, given the chaos in Mexico and their own long residency in the United States . But here is what still confuses me: If one were to consider the classes that deal with Mexico at the university, or the visible displays of national chauvinism, then one might conclude that Mexico is a far more attractive and moral place than the United States.

So there is a surreal nature to these protests: something like, "Please do not send me back to the culture I nostalgically praise; please let me stay in the culture that I ignore or deprecate." I think the DREAM Act protestors might have been far more successful in winning public opinion had they stopped blaming the U.S. for suggesting that they might have to leave at some point, and instead explained why, in fact, they want to stay. What it is about America that makes a youth of 21 go on a hunger strike or demonstrate to be allowed to remain in this country rather than return to the place of his birth?

I think I know the answer to this paradox. Missing entirely in the above description is the attitude of the host, which by any historical standard can only be termed "indifferent." California does not care whether one broke the law to arrive here or continues to break it by staying. It asks nothing of the illegal immigrant—no proficiency in English, no acquaintance with American history and values, no proof of income, no record of education or skills. It does provide all the public assistance that it can afford (and more that it borrows for), and apparently waives enforcement of most of California's burdensome regulations and civic statutes that increasingly have plagued productive citizens to the point of driving them out.

How odd that we over-regulate those who are citizens and have capital to the point of banishing them from the state, but do not regulate those who are aliens and without capital to the point of encouraging millions more to follow in their footsteps.

How odd—to paraphrase what Critias once said of ancient Sparta—that California is at once both the nation's most un-free and most free state, the most repressed and the wildest.

Hundreds of thousands sense all that and vote accordingly with their feet, both into and out of California—and the result is a sort of social, cultural, economic, and political time-bomb, whose ticks are getting louder.

(Victor Davis Hanson is a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, the editor of Makers of Ancient Strategy: From the Persian Wars to the Fall of Rome, and the author of The Father of Us All: War and History, Ancient and Modern.)

20110711-01	13:49	Dennis	"The 'Fracking' Issue & a Question About Morocco"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

Weren't you concerned about hydrofracking? If so, this could be of interest.

"The 'Fracking' Issue and a Question About Morocco" by Kent Moors, Oil and Energy Investor

July 11, 2011, (<http://oilandenergyinvestor.com/2011/07/the-fracking-issue-and-a-question-about-morocco/>)

As I await my next flight to London, now seems a good time to answer a couple of recent emails from your fellow Oil & Energy Investor subscribers. Let's get right to it.

Q: Kent, can you address the "fracking" issue one more time?

The 2010 documentary Gasland showed how bad things can get when 600+ chemicals are used to get the oil out of the ground, especially in close proximity to water resources. What companies employ this technique?

Also, the French recently revoked the licenses of one company — Toreador Resources in Paris — because fracking would have been their preferred method of oil extraction. The stock plummeted on the news. Will other companies (and countries) that use fracking find it difficult to lease land where the water table may be affected? ~ R. J.

A: Actually, several of you have written in with similar questions surrounding the French decision on fracking. But R.J. asks several questions here, so let me address them in order.

First, all companies that utilize horizontal drilling for shale gas extraction use hydrofracking. Second, the French decision results from where the drilling would be located.

To date, significant shale gas deposits have been determined at Bassin d'Ales, Plaine d'Ales, Montélimar, and Moselle (where there is also coal bed methane). The first three are most advanced in terms of exploration; unfortunately, they are also in the Paris region and have population density concerns.

This has become a political issue in the days before an election... and that is rarely a good time to get an objective appraisal.

Still, the environmentalists do have it right — if a company cannot provide sufficient guarantees that drilling poses no danger to water tables, it should not receive a license.

And these French companies will have a hard time providing the required guarantee. France has no history of combining hydrofracking and horizontal drilling. There have been no environmental baseline studies completed and no previous unconventional drilling as a basis.

Third, there is shale drilling under development in other European countries: Lower Saxony (Germany), Alum (Sweden), the Makó Trough/Szolnok Formation (Hungary), the Vienna Basin (Austria/Slovakia), as well as four very promising basins in Poland.

The French have a valid concern about heavy populations in proximity to drilling. True, the Barnett in Texas was initially an urban-based play (Fort Worth to Denton)... but France's density distribution is different.

Now let's return to the documentary...

The episodes portrayed in Gasland were the results of early drilling in Colorado, where, in my judgment, the companies were clearly at fault. There have been some questions raised about more recent drilling in the Marcellus on the East Coast, but these are quite infrequent.

Shale gas wells are at least 5,500 to 7,000 feet below the surface. Some — such as the Eagle Ford in Texas and the deep Utica, currently under evaluation below the Marcellus — are more than 12,000 feet down. These are well below any water resources.

The problems arise in two other ways:

1. Gas contamination on its way up to the surface.
2. The use of fracking fluid.

Gas contamination is a standard problem for both traditional — vertical — drilling and the newer unconventional drilling. It is not, therefore, something that has emerged only with the advent of shale gas development.

In passing, gas contamination is what caused the igniting water shown in Gasland.

Yet the problem can be resolved with the use of concentric pipe strings. Range Resources Corp. (NYSE:RRC) has an excellent system used in the Marcellus.

Regulators need to require the usage of the better pipe strings. Most of them do already.

The other matter, fracking fluid, is more contentious.

Of the hundreds of chemicals used for fracking, most are of no consequence to health or environment.

The problems emerge with the danger of leakage from the use of ethylene glycol (to inhibit the formation of scaling; also used in antifreeze), petroleum distillates (to reduce friction), and especially glutaraldehyde (as an antibacterial agent).

Once again, a secure system of returning the fluids (along with the flow back water) to the surface, and safe disposal of that water, is essential. Today this is accomplished by injecting it into deep disposal wells after processing.

However, new developments are already in field use in the Fayetteville in Arkansas and the Woodford in Oklahoma that eliminate the use of chemicals altogether... and even reduce overall operational costs per well at the same time.

Next, here's a direct question related to my recent travels.

Q: If Morocco is any good, why is TransAtlantic Petroleum pulling out? ~ Norman C.

A: The Canadian TransAtlantic Petroleum Ltd. (AMEX:TAT) stated in a June 28 SEC filing that it was likely to cap an exploration well and move associated equipment to its Turkish operations. The well in question, GRB-1, is on the Asilah exploration permit in Morocco.

The company further said that the well would probably be abandoned as noncommercial. However, the company provided no information in the filing about why it has decided to move equipment to Turkey.

The move comes only some three weeks after TAT acquired the production and oilfield assets of Thrace Basin Natural Gas in Turkey. The company may simply consider this one a better overall development opportunity.

20110712-01	18:12	Dennis	"Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Hey, Obama, cut this...this is where all the waste is...

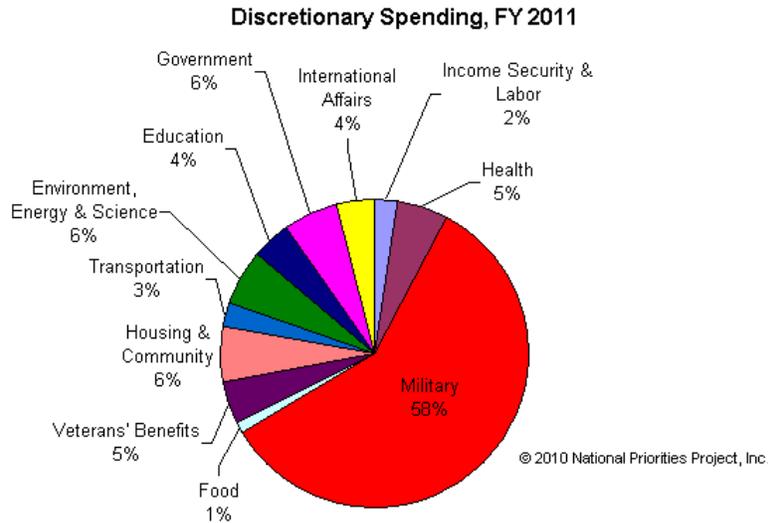

"Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?" by David Morris, CommonDreams

July 12, 2011 by On the Commons (<http://www.commondreams.org/view/2011/07/12>)

(Republicans ignore incompetence, bloat and corruption at the Pentagon.)

In all the talk about the federal deficit, why is the single largest culprit left out of the conversation? Why is the one part of government that best epitomizes everything conservatives say they hate about government— waste, incompetence, and corruption—all but exempt from conservative criticism?

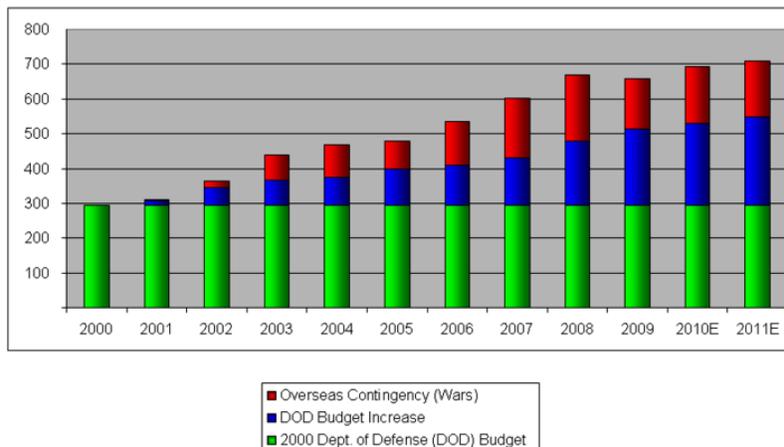

Of course, I'm talking about the Pentagon. Any serious battle plan to reduce the deficit must take on the Pentagon. In 2011 military spending accounted for more than 58 percent of all federal discretionary spending and even more if the interest on the federal debt that is related to military spending were added. In the last ten years we have spent more than $7.6 trillion on military and homeland security according to the National Priorities Project:

<http://nationalpriorities.org/>

In the last decade military spending has soared from $300 billion to $700 billion (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:U.S. Defense Spending Trends.png):

U.S. Defense Spending Trends 2000-2011 ($ Billion)

When debt ceilings and deficits seem to be the only two items on Washington's agenda, it is both revealing and tragic that both parties give a free pass to military spending. Representative Paul Ryan's much discussed Tea Party budget accepted Obama's proposal for a pathetic $78 billion reduction in military spending over 5 years, a recommendation that would only modestly slow the rate of growth of military spending.

Indeed, the Republican government battering ram appears to have stopped at the Pentagon door. This was evident early on. As soon as they took over the House of Representatives, Republicans changed the rules so that military spending does not have to be offset by reduced spending somewhere else, unlike any other kind of government spending. It is the only activity of government they believe does not have to be paid for. Which brings to mind a bit of wisdom from one of their heroes, Adam Smith. "Were the expense of war to be defrayed always by revenue raised within the year ... wars would in general be more speedily concluded, and less wantonly undertaken."

The Tea Party revolution has only strengthened the Republican Party's resolve that the Pentagon's budget is untouchable. An analysis by the Heritage Foundation of Republican votes on defense spending found that Tea Party freshmen were even more likely than their Republican elders to vote against cutting any part of the military budget.

What makes the hypocrisy even more revealing is that the Pentagon turns out to be the poster child for government waste and incompetence.

In 2009 the Government Accountability Office (GAO) found “staggering” cost overruns of almost $300 billion in nearly 70 percent of the Pentagon’s 96 major weapons. What’s more, the programs were running, on average, 21 months behind schedule. And when they were completed, they provided less than they promised.

The Defense Logistics Agency had no use for parts worth more than half of the $13.7 billion in equipment stacked up in DOD warehouses in 2006 to 2008.

And these are only the tips of the military’s mispending iceberg. We really don’t know how much the Pentagon wastes because, believe it or not, there hasn’t been a complete audit of the Pentagon in more than 15 years.

In 1994, the Government Management Reform Act required the Inspector General of each federal agency to audit and publish the financial statements of their agency. The Department of Defense was the only agency that has been unable to comply. In fiscal 1998 the Department of Defense used $1.7 trillion of undocumented adjustments to balance the books. In 2002 the situation was even worse. CBS News reported that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld admitted, “we cannot track $2.3 trillion in transactions.”

Imagine that a school district were to reveal that it didn’t know where it spent its money. Now imagine the Republican response. Perhaps, “Off with their desktops!”

How did Congress’ respond to DOD’s delinquency? It gave it absolution and allowed it to opt out of its legal requirement. But as a sop to outraged public opinion Congress required DOD to set a date when it would have its book sufficiently in order to be audited. Which the Pentagon dutifully did, and missed every one of the target dates. The latest is 2017 and DOD has already announced it will be unable to meet that deadline.

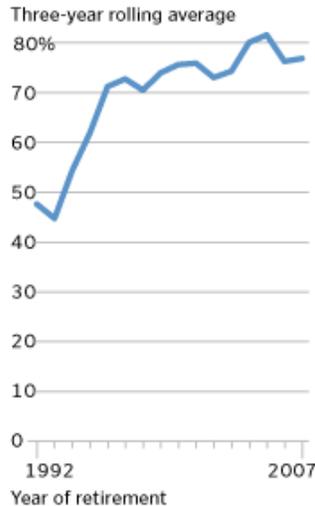

Adding insult to injury, last September, the GAO found that the new computer systems intended to improve the Pentagon’s financial oversight are themselves nearly 100 percent or $7 billion over budget and as much as 12 years behind schedule!

The Pentagon is not just incompetent. It is corrupt. In Nov., 2009 the Pentagon’s Defense Contract Audit Agency (DCAA), the federal watchdog responsible for auditing oversight of military contractors, raised the question of criminal wrongdoing when it found that the audits that did occur were riddled with serious breaches of auditor independence. One Pentagon auditor admitted he did not perform detailed tests because, “The contractor would not appreciate it.”

Why would the Pentagon allow its contractors to get away with fraud? To answer that question we need to understand the incestuous relationship between the Pentagon and its contractors that has been going on for years, and is getting worse. From 2004 to 2008, 80 percent of retiring three and four star officers went to work as consultants or defense industry executives. Thirty-four out of 39 three- and four-star generals and admirals who retired in 2007 are now working in defense industry roles — nearly 90 percent.

RETIRED GENERALS WORKING FOR DEFENSE

Percent of retired three-, and four-star generals, and equivalent high-level admirals, who now work for defense consulting firms or defense contractors.

NOTE: A three-year rolling average, the average of each year and the previous two, is used to smooth out annual variation and reveal an underlying trend.

SOURCE: Globe reporting

DAVID BUTLER/GLOBE STAFF

(<http://defendingthepublicgood.org/wp-content/uploads/2011/07/retired-general-working-for-defense.png>)

Generals are recruited for private sector jobs well before they retire. Once employed by the military contractor the general maintains a Pentagon advisory role.

"In almost any other realm it would seem a clear conflict of interest. But this is the Pentagon where...such apparent conflicts are a routine fact of life", an in-depth investigation by the Boston Globe concluded.

U.S. military spending now exceeds the spending of all other countries combined. Knowledge military experts argue that we can cut at least $1 trillion from the Pentagon budget without changing its currently expressed mission. But a growing number believe that the mission itself is suspect. Economic competitors like India and China certainly approve of our willingness to undermine our economic competitiveness by diverting trillions of dollars into war and weapons production. Some argue that all this spending has made us more secure but all the evidence points in the opposite direction. Certainly our $2 trillion and counting military adventures in the Middle East and Afghanistan and Pakistan have won us few friends and multiplied our enemies.

Defense experts Gordon Adams and Matthew Leatherman, writing in the Washington Post offer another argument against unrestrained military spending.

"Countries feel threatened when rivals ramp up their defenses; this was true in the Cold War, and now it may happen with China. It's how arms races are born. We spend more, inspiring competitors to do the same — thus inflating defense budgets without making anyone safer. For example, Gates observed in May that no other country has a single ship comparable to our 11 aircraft carriers. Based on the perceived threat that this fleet poses, the Chinese are pursuing an anti-ship ballistic missile program. U.S. military officials have decried this "carrier-killer" effort, and in response we are diversifying our capabilities to strike China, including a new long-range bomber program, and modernizing our carrier fleet at a cost of about $10 billion per ship."

For tens of millions of Americans real security comes not from fighting wars on foreign soil but from not having to worry losing their house or their job or their medical care. As Joshua Holland, columnist for Alternet points out 46 states faced combined budget shortfalls this year of $130 billion, leading them to fire tens of thousands of workers and cut off assistance to millions of families. Just the supplemental requests for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan this year were $170 billion.

What is perhaps most astonishing of all is that cutting the military budget is wildly popular. Even back in 1995, when military spending was only a fraction of its present size, a poll by the Program on International Policy Attitudes reported that 42 percent of the U.S. public feeling that defense spending is too high and a majority of Americans were convinced that defense spending "has weakened the U.S. economy and given some allies an economic edge."

This March, Reuters released a new poll that found the majority of Americans support reducing defense spending.

The next time you hear Republicans insist they want to ferret out government waste and reduce spending and stamp out incompetence ask them why the one part of government that exemplifies everything they say is wrong with government is the one part of government they embrace most heartily.

20110723-01	14:47	SteveB	"China vs. U.S.: Who Will Win the 21st Century?" & "China's New Parochialism"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Republicans say to America, "Screw you!" and take the weekend off...

The GOP is looking more like a party of the past than the party of the future: they seem to have opted for self-destruction (like I told ya). Come on, Republicans, even the American people are not this stupid. John Boehner has proven himself to be a snake-tongued liar! After digging the pit we are in during the Bush "era", now Republicans tell the nation to go to hell! Well...that looks like where we're headed with their pig-headed dogma, but, believe me, there will be hell to pay first, my Republican friends.

Bye, bye, GOP! Too bad...they had a couple of good ideas.

"China vs. U.S.: Who Will Win the 21st Century?" by Fareed Zakaria, CNN

July 14, 2011, (<http://globalpublicsquare.blogs.cnn.com/2011/07/14/china-vs-the-u-s-who-will-win-the-21st-century/>)

(Editor's Note: The following is an edited excerpt from a transcript of Fareed Zakaria answering viewer questions online.)

We're clearly moving to a Post-American world. This is a world that is not dominated by the United States but not dominated by anyone else yet either.

The 21st Century is up for grabs and how the United States does depends on how well it can marshal the key ingredients of economic and societal success.

In the 20th Century, the key ingredients were labor and capital.

In the 21st Century, the key ingredients will be ideas and energy.

Ideas will be critical because manufacturing has been commoditized. That means that anyone can make anything. The only thing that distinguishes someone today is if that person or organization has new ideas and innovations. We need to create a better mousetrap every week. We need to do something different and unique.

Energy will be critical simply because everybody is growing quickly and everyone needs a supply of energy. Countries that have figured out the energy puzzle are going to do better and better.

So who's better suited for this new world?

In an odd way, China is best suited for the 20th Century. They have cheap labor and huge amounts of capital coming in. They can make whatever you want them to make. But they haven't yet been able to move up the value chain. They haven't been able to generate the big, new ideas.

Like the U.S., China also struggles with the issue of energy. China is a consumer, not a producer of energy.

But they are quickly getting very smart on the energy front. They are becoming the global leaders of clean tech—whether it is solar or wind.

They are also aggressively trying to move up the value chain. They are laying the foundations to compete in the 21st Century. They are building a great university system and they are working to get research labs in place.

In America's case, we have all the ingredients to succeed in the 21st Century. We have the most innovative companies in the world such as Facebook, Apple, and Google. We have the best universities in the world. We have a nexus between universities and research-oriented companies. We have the most dynamic capital markets in the world. We have an incredibly flexible, diverse society, which is also very much a part of our inherent societal innovation and dynamism.

But what we don't have is a political system that can harness all of this and execute. You see this with regard to energy policy. America has no energy policy and hasn't had one for thirty years. It's not just that. We also don't have an immigration policy. We don't have a policy toward jobs and growth. We don't have a policy toward the budget deficit.

Instead, we have an absurd political paralysis in Washington where everyone is more concerned with scoring points and maintaining their viability with their most extreme members rather than just coming together and solving problems.

There used to be a model in which you became famous as a lawmaker by making deals—by reaching out to the other side and doing some compromising, which you have to do because not everyone agrees with you, and moving the issue forward.

Now the way you get famous and powerful in Congress is by not making a deal, by being a deal breaker rather than a deal maker.

You can see this in the Republican Party right now where the energy is all in saying "No, there's no deal we could possibly accept."

If "No" is where we end up as a country, we could have all the innovation and ideas and dynamism in the world and we'd still will have a society that is crumbling. Look at California as an example. California has Silicon Valley and Hollywood. It has incredible private sector talent and creativity.

But after a while if every road is crumbling, every state university collapsing and every educational institution underfunded, people will no longer want to come there. They will no longer think that it is the place where they can make their American dream come true. In this case, having Steve Jobs and Mark Zuckerberg there will probably not be enough.

"China's New Parochialism" by Fareed Zakaria, TIME

July 14, 2011, (<http://www.time.com/time/world/article/0,8599,2082959,00.html>)

On any particularly hot day this month, people around the world will do what they have done for decades: go to an air-conditioned movie theater and watch a summertime blockbuster. The latest, biggest movie is Transformers: Dark of the Moon, which has broken box-office records in the U.S. and in many of the 110 other countries in which it has been released. Except in the world's fastest-growing economy and movie market — China. The Chinese people will not get to see Transformers, nor the eagerly awaited new Harry Potter movie, nor any other Hollywood production. At least not yet. Gao Jun, the deputy general manager of Beijing's New Film Association, explained that no foreign movie would be allowed into China until the Chinese film Beginning of the Great Revival made 800 million Yuan, or $124 million, which would be an all-time record for a Chinese movie.

Beginning of the Great Revival is a two-hour tale of the rise of China's Communist Party — released on the occasion of its 90th anniversary — and its heroic leader, Mao Zedong, who is played by a young Chinese heartthrob. The movie features a cast of hundreds of major Chinese actors, including Chow Yun Fat, with impressive sets and design, all at record cost. It has been released in 6,000 theaters across the country. But it doesn't seem to be winning hearts and minds. Despite many mass ticket giveaways, cinema houses are reported to be empty. A barrage of negative reviews on the Internet have been censored. On VeryCD, a pirated-film website, more than 90% of users described the film as "trash."

On one level, this is just a crude propaganda effort by a Chinese regime seeking legitimacy. But there is another aspect to this story. China is going through an internal struggle over whether it needs to borrow more ideas from the West or follow its own particular course. The question of how to handle Western films is becoming part of a much larger debate.

China is on course to become the largest movie market in the world. It has more than 6,200 movie theaters and is adding to them at the astonishing pace of three new theaters a day. But the government seems determined to keep Western movies at bay. There is a strict quota of 20 foreign movies imported every year. Those movies are censored and tightly restricted to a limited number of theaters. Hollywood studios receive only 13% of the ticket price, about half what they get everywhere else in the world. The DVDs are pirated within days, and the government makes no effort to stem this criminal activity. The result is that Hollywood, America's largest export industry, makes very little money in China. (See China stamping out democracy protests.)

And Hollywood isn't alone. The CEO of General Electric, Jeff Immelt, told the Financial Times earlier this year that it appeared that China did not want Western companies to succeed in that country anymore; he was voicing the feelings of many foreign CEOs. There is growing evidence in many areas that Beijing is favoring locals over Western companies, even violating the rules of market access and trade. The World Trade Organization ruled recently that China's regulations on foreign movies were a form of illegal protectionism and had to end. So far, Beijing has done nothing to abide by that ruling, though it is likely to expand its quotas to mollify the WTO.

Countries play trade games all the time, but this is different. Over the past few years, a new Chinese parochialism has been gaining strength in the Communist Party. Best symbolized by the senior party leader, Bo Xilai, it includes a romantic revival of Maoism, harking back to a time when the Chinese were more unified and more isolated from the rest of the world. It is a reaction to the rampant marketization and Westernization of China over the past 10 years. Bo, who has organized mass rallies to sing old Maoist songs and routinely quotes Mao aphorisms, might well ascend to the Standing Committee of China's Politburo next year on the strength of this new populism.

After centuries of isolation, China has grown in power and strength because it opened itself to the world, learned from the West and allowed its industries and society to borrow from and compete against the world's best. It allowed for an ongoing modernization of its economic structures and possibly its political institutions as well. Its leaders Deng Xiaoping and Jiang Zemin understood that this openness was key to China's success. A new generation of Chinese leaders might decide they have learned enough and that it is time to turn inward and celebrate China's unique ways. If that happens, the world will confront a very different China over the next few decades.

20110723-02	15:59	SteveB	Re: "Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Dennis,

Amen! Very good, helpful graphics. (What does Obama have against graphics? They won't fit his cue-card machine?)

The Republican lies are such an obvious sham! Amazing to me that they are believed by anyone about anything.

The budget is not the problem, debt "ceilings" are not the problem. The Republicans (and their failed Bush-era policies that got us to here) are the problem. Isn't it now obvious? (The Democrats also have their share of "debts" to "them that brung 'em" that have also resulted in failures, but that's not really the problem, right now, is it?)

20110723-03	15:30	Charis	Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Unfortunately the Democrats aren't doing one bit better. so where does that leave America?

20110723-04	15:46	SteveB	Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Charis,

Except that Obama has caved-in to every demand.

Where are taxes on the rich? Where is saving education? Where is cutting Pentagon spending? Where is sacrosanct Medicare or Social Security?

What more can the Democrats possible do in their single-handed effort to try to save the country? Those are not too stark of terms. It is black and white...the truth tellers and the liars. I have never seen it so clearly out in the open in 50 years of American politics.

Where does that leave us? We shall soon see...

20110723-05 16:05 SteveB A Thought on the National Debt

In the long run, isn't it perhaps better to run deficits, borrow money from the rest of the world, and pay interest, than to have the rest of the world buy everything productive in America and give us nothing? (Don't you think $14 trillion would buy a lot of companies? Do you imagine those profits would stay here? Or stay here now, in the case of the multinationals, for that matter.)

And what politician of either party has or would stop such a process?

20110723-06 16:12 GaryC Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats

Dear SteveB,

Like emancipating the slaves. Oh, yeah, another dumb Republican idea.

Shall I give you a few more? Doubt it, your head is in the sand.

Neither Republicans or Democrats have all the good or bad answers. It's the system that creates abuses by both parties. Unfortunately, we get what we pay for—Republicans for wall street, Democrats for unions.

They are the same Steve, just different clothes.

20110723-07 15:22 RickF Re: Re: "Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?"

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I don't have time to debate you here, but I can't just not respond to your-comments. Listen, the whole thing is broke and now our country as is in serious financial trouble. I-don't have the answers, but raising the debt limit without at least an equal amount of cuts seems-in the best interest of the country, for now. There is more work to be done for sure. Again, I don't-have time to debate you longer and I'm not going to blame Obama or blame Bush, Democrats of-Republicans, there is enough blame to go around for all, but we are at a crossroads. I just have to-hope and pray they get their act together in the country's interest. Regardless of how it shakes-out, both parties will get some of the credit and both will get most of the blame.

20110723-08 17:00 Dennis Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats

from GaryC:

Like emancipating the slaves. Oh, yeah, another dumb Republican idea.

Dear GaryC,

If you think the Republicans of today have anything in common with the Republicanism of Lincoln, you need a remedial history course. Nixon's "Southern strategy" was based on the exploitation of anti-African American racism among Southern white voters, the descendants of the slave holders. I think that is really the Republican's dumb idea.

As for Democrats representing unions, they've done a p*ss poor job of it in comparison to the Republican fealty to Wall Street. In fact, a case can be made that Wall Street has both parties in their back pocket. Americans really need a new party that is "of the people, by the people, for the people" to quote your iconic Lincoln.

20110723-09	17:23	SteveB	"Health Care Debate: It's Time to Get Outraged"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Why Miss Colorado is not in the Tea Party...

Ordinary people need ordinary insurance, medical too, just like anyone can get on their house, or car, or life. We all end up paying anyway, in huge uninsured emergency room visit costs, for example. Even Bolivia solves the health care problem better than the U.S.. These j*ck-offs in Washington need to get their act together. There are very real problems to be solved, though I think Obamacare is a step in the right direction. It seems to work for Mitt's Massachusetts and, in more "extreme" or "socialist" versions, in the rest of the free world.

"Health Care Debate: It's Time to Get Outraged" by Wendell Potter, CommonDreams

July 5, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/view/2011/07/05-5>)

One of my favorite bumper stickers reads, "If you're not outraged, you're not paying attention."

That's sort of how I feel about the health care debate. If more Americans paid attention to the fate of neighbors and loved ones who have fallen victim to the cruel dysfunction of our health care system, they would see through the onslaught of lies and propaganda perpetrated by special interests profiting from the status quo. Since I started speaking out against the abuses of the insurance industry, I have heard from hundreds of people with maddening and heartbreaking stories about being mistreated and victimized by the greed that characterizes so much of the profit driven American health care system.

Many other people send me links to articles or broadcasts they have seen. When I worked in the insurance industry, we called them "horror stories," and for good reason. The circumstances people often found themselves in were nightmarishly horrible. As an industry PR guy, my mission was to keep as many of those horror stories out of the media as possible. We didn't want the public to know.

It occurred to me recently that Americans are not sufficiently outraged because they either don't hear these stories or, if they do, don't believe how commonplace they are or that anyone they know could experience the same misfortune. Or they might hear that more than 50 million Americans don't have insurance because they can't afford it or, in many cases, can't buy it even if they can afford it, but they don't stop to think that real human beings make up that abstract 50 million figure.

The reality is that these stories are indeed commonplace. Almost all of us—regardless of our age, income, job or political affiliation—are just a layoff or plant closure away from being uninsured, or a business decision beyond our control from being underinsured, or an illness away from being forced into bankruptcy and homelessness.

My life changed when I really started paying attention a few years ago. I now have a new mission—to help people become aware of and understand what is going on around them. So, starting today, I will be sharing on an occasional basis some of the horror stories like the ones I used to work so hard to keep out of the press. My hope is that people will begin to remember why reform is so necessary and why repealing "Obamacare," despite its shortcomings, is not a real option.

You might have heard about this first one. Even if you have it bears retelling. A few weeks ago, a man in North Carolina was arrested for robbing a bank for $1 so he could get government-provided health care in prison.

Fifty-nine-year-old Richard James Verone has a tumor in his chest and two ruptured disks, but no job or health insurance. He is one of those 50 million Americans I mentioned earlier. Verone told reporters he asked for only a dollar to show that his motives were medical, not monetary. Because of his "preexisting" medical conditions, no private insurer will have anything to do with him. He wasn't destitute enough to qualify for Medicaid, the government program for low-income Americans, or old enough to qualify for Medicare, the government program for people 65 and older.

Verone and millions of other Americans who have a history of illness are considered by private insurers to be "uninsurable." Insurance company underwriters consider them an excessive risk to profits. Even insurers that operate as nonprofits, like many Blue Cross plans, refuse to sell coverage to a third or more of Americans who apply because they've been sick in the past. Many of the people they turn down are children who were born with birth defects.

Shortly after Verone staged his robbery, one of the contestants in the Miss USA pageant revealed during a nationally broadcast interview that she is homeless. Why? Her sick mother could not pay both the rent and her mounting medical bills. Twenty-three-year-old Blair Griffith was evicted along with her mother and brother just weeks after she won the title of Miss Colorado.

"I didn't know what to think" when sheriff's deputies starting putting the family's belongings in garbage bags, she said. "It was shocking. And then I saw my mom on her knees crying and begging them, 'Please don't do this to me' and then looking up at me and saying, 'I'm so sorry.'"

Blair's mother, a widow, lost her health insurance soon after suffering a severe heart attack. She was unable to get another policy. She and her children eventually had no choice but to join an untold number of other Americans who are homeless because they can't pay their medical bills. Many are bankrupt as well as homeless. Medical debt is the leading cause of bankruptcy in the United States.

The third story I want to share with you hasn't made headlines. Most such stories never do. A few days ago a young woman who said she'd been raped sent me an email to ask if I might be able to help her find insurance.

"I am in the process of hiring a broker to help me find insurance, but it is just very overwhelming and sad," she wrote. "I have been denied by three major companies or had riders attached that will not cover anything related to HPV, cervical cancer, medications, or treatments. Basically, they will do nothing for me."

She wrote, essentially, to beg for help.

"I have never talked about what happened (to me), but I am learning that this is too big to handle on my own. There are so many barriers, and while I consider myself an intelligent person, I am by no means an expert when it comes to dealing with insurance agencies. I will take and am grateful for all the help that I can get."

I hope I can help her, but there is no assurance that either I or a broker or anyone else for that matter can help her get the coverage and access to care she needs. She is an apparent victim not just of rape but also of an unjust system that has devolved into seemingly intractable dysfunction while we were not paying close enough attention.

These are just three people whose lives have taken a tragic turn because of America's profit-driven private health care system. There are literally millions of other stories, many of which are even more maddening and heartbreaking.

When the Affordable Care Act (Obamacare) is fully implemented in 2014, the number of uninsured Americans will be reduced by 30 million, and many of the insurance industry's most egregious practices—including refusing to sell coverage to people with preexisting conditions—will be outlawed.

Let's hope that there will be far fewer horror stories after 2014. But the new law is just the beginning. We still will have a long way to go before we have universal coverage, like every other developed country in the world.

Universal coverage, in my view, is the ultimate goal we all should share. Remember this if nothing else: Until we achieve it, you and your loved ones could easily be facing your own horror stories.

Wendell Potter is former Vice President of corporate communications at CIGNA, one of the United States' largest health insurance companies. In June 2009, he testified against the HMO industry in the U.S. Senate as a whistleblower. He is now the Senior Fellow on Health Care for the Center for Media and Democracy in Madison, Wisconsin.

"What Our Declaration Really Said" by E.J. Dionne Jr., The Washington Post

July 3, 2011, (http://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/what-our-declaration-really-said/2011/07/02/AGugyvvh_story.html)

Our nation confronts a challenge this Fourth of July that we face but rarely: We are at odds over the meaning of our history and why, to quote our Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted."

Only divisions this deep can explain why we are taking risks with our country's future that we're usually wise enough to avoid. Arguments over how much government should tax and spend are the very stuff of democracy's give-and-take. Now, the debate is shadowed by worries that if a willful faction does not get what it wants, it might bring the nation to default.

This is, well, crazy. It makes sense only if politicians believe—or have convinced themselves—that they are fighting over matters of principle so profound that any means to defeat their opponents is defensible.

We are closer to that point than we think, and our friends in the Tea Party have offered a helpful clue by naming their movement in honor of the 1773 revolt against tea taxes on that momentous night in Boston Harbor.

Whether they intend it or not, their name suggests they believe that the current elected government in Washington is as illegitimate as was a distant, unelected monarchy. It implies something fundamentally wrong with taxes themselves or, at the least, that current levels of taxation (the lowest in decades) are dangerously oppressive. And it hints that methods outside the normal political channels are justified in confronting such oppression.

We need to recognize the deep flaws in this vision of our present and our past. A reading of the Declaration of Independence makes clear that our forebears were not revolting against taxes as such—and most certainly not against government as such.

In the long list of "abuses and usurpations" the Declaration documents, taxes don't come up until the 17th item, and that item is neither a complaint about tax rates nor an objection to the idea of taxation. Our Founders remonstrated against the British crown "for imposing taxes on us without our consent." They were concerned about "consent," i.e. popular rule, not taxes.

The very first item on their list condemned the king because he "refused his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good." Note that the signers wanted to pass laws, not repeal them, and they began by speaking of "the public good," not about individuals or "the private sector." They knew that it takes public action—including effective and responsive government—to secure "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Their second grievance reinforced the first, accusing the king of having "forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance." Again, our forebears wanted to enact laws; they were not anti-government zealots.

Abuses three through nine also referred in some way to how laws were passed or justice was administered. The document doesn't really get to anything that looks like Big Government oppression ("He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance") until grievance No. 10.

This misunderstanding of our founding document is paralleled by a misunderstanding of our Constitution. "The federal government was created by the states to be an agent for the states, not the other way around," Gov. Rick Perry of Texas said recently.

No, our Constitution begins with the words "We the People" not "We the States." The Constitution's Preamble speaks of promoting "a more perfect Union," "Justice," "the common defense," "the general Welfare" and "the Blessings of Liberty." These were national goals.

I know states' rights advocates revere the 10th Amendment. But when the word "states" appears in the Constitution, it typically is part of a compound word, "United States," or refers to how the states and their people will be represented in the national government. We learned it in elementary school: The Constitution replaced the Articles of Confederation to create a stronger federal government, not a weak confederate government. Perry's view was rejected in 1787 and again in 1865.

We praise our Founders annually for revolting against royal rule and for creating an exceptionally durable system of self-government. We can wreck that system if we forget our Founders' purpose of creating a representative form of national authority robust enough to secure the public good. It is still perfectly capable of doing that. But if we pretend we are living in Boston in 1773, we will draw all the wrong conclusions and make some remarkably foolish choices.

20110723-11 18:47 SteveB Re: "What Our Declaration Really Said"

Dear Dennis,

I love this article! Thanks.

I had just been marveling that this big lie of the Republican / Tea Party, that the founding fathers were rebelling against socialist-like, big government oppression, seems so much like Sarah Palin's retelling of the Paul Revere story, turning it from history to myth in one fell swoop. Are there others like her in the movement? Lord, help us!

Other times, I think our socialist, left-wing, brainiac, educated, media-controlling, college-professor elite (think NPR), that the Republicans talk about, would be up to shooting down some of these Brave New World-type myths these Republicans fabricate out of nothing but their ambition.

20110724-01 23:04 Ben Re: "What Our Declaration Really Said"

Dear SteveB,

You're right. This really is clear and succinct, the best and most briefly I've seen it stated. Revisionism is deadly, and it's shocking how many intelligent people have drunk this batch of pernicious Kool-Aid.

20110725-01 07:47 SteveB "Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation"

When we're being told so many lies from the Right about our Declaration of Independence, Constitution, and what America is and is not, it's good to go back and see what history really tells us. THESE DOGMATIST REPUBLICANS HAVE GOTTEN IT WRONG! The Tea Party would do well to actually read the documents they profess such fervid loyalty to.

"Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation" by Kenneth C. Davis, CNN

July 4, 2011, (<http://edition.cnn.com/2011/OPINION/07/04/davis.jefferson.other.words/index.html?iref=obnetwork>)

(Editor's note: Kenneth C. Davis is the author of "Don't Know Much About History: Anniversary Edition" (Harper Collins). He posts regularly at his blog at <http://www.dontknowmuch.com/>.)

As America celebrates its birthday on July 4, the timeless words of Thomas Jefferson will surely be invoked to remind us of our founding ideals—that "All men are created equal" and are "endowed by their Creator" with the right to "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness." These phrases, a cherished part of our history, have rightly been called "American Scripture."

But Jefferson penned another phrase, arguably his most famous after those from the Declaration of Independence. These far more contentious words—"a wall of separation between church and state"—lie at the heart of the ongoing debate between those who see America as a "Christian Nation" and those who see it as a secular republic, a debate that is hotter than a Washington Fourth of July.

It is true these words do not appear in any early national document. What may be Jefferson's second most-quoted phrase is found instead in a letter he sent to a Baptist association in Danbury, Connecticut.

While president in 1802, Jefferson wrote: "Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between Man and his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legitimate powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should 'make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,' thus building a wall of separation between Church and State ... "

The idea was not Jefferson's. Other 17th- and 18th-century Enlightenment writers had used a variant of it. Earlier still, religious dissident Roger Williams had written in a 1644 letter of a "hedge or wall of separation between the garden of the church and the wilderness of the world."

Williams, who founded Rhode Island with a colonial charter that included religious freedom, knew intolerance firsthand. He and other religious dissenters, including Anne Hutchinson, had been banished from neighboring Massachusetts, the "shining city on a hill" where Catholics, Quakers and Baptists were banned under penalty of death.

As president, Jefferson was voicing an idea that was fundamental to his view of religion and government, expressed most significantly in the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, which he drafted in 1777.

Revised by James Madison and passed by Virginia's legislature in Jan., 1786, the bill stated: "No man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened (sic) in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief."

It was this simple—government could not dictate how to pray, or that you cannot pray, or that you must pray.

Jefferson regarded this law so highly that he had his authorship of the statute made part of his epitaph, along with writing the Declaration and founding the University of Virginia. (Being president wasn't worth a mention.)

Why do Jefferson's "other words" matter today?

First, because knowing history matters—it can safeguard us from repeating our mistakes and help us value our rights, won at great cost. Yet we are sorely lacking in knowledge about our past, as shown by a recent National Assessment of Educational Progress.

But more to the point, we are witnessing an aggressively promoted version of our history and heritage in which America is called a "Christian Nation."

This "Sunday School" version of our past has gained currency among conservative television commentators, school boards that have rewritten state textbooks and several GOP presidential candidates, some of whom trekked to Ralph Reed's Faith and Freedom Coalition conference in early June 2011.

No one can argue, as "Christian Nation" proponents correctly state, that the Founding Fathers were not Christian, although some notably doubted Christ's divinity.

More precisely, the founders were, with very few exceptions, mainstream Protestants. Many of them were Episcopalians, the American offshoot of the official Church of England. The status of America's Catholics, both legally and socially, in the colonies and early Republic, was clearly second-class. Other Christian sects, including Baptists, Quakers and Mormons, faced official resistance, discrimination and worse for decades.

But the founders, and more specifically the framers of the Constitution, included men who had fought a war for independence—the very war celebrated on the "Glorious Fourth"—against a country in which church and state were essentially one.

They understood the long history of sectarian bloodshed in Europe that brought many pilgrims to America. They knew the dangers of merging government, which was designed to protect individual rights, with religion, which as Jefferson argued, was a matter of individual conscience. And that is why the U.S. Constitution reads as it does.

The supreme law of the land, written in the summer of 1787, includes no references to religion—including in the presidential oath of office—until the conclusion of Article VI, after all that dull stuff about debts and treaties: "No religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States." (There is a pro forma "Year of the Lord" reference in the date at the Constitution's conclusion.) Original intent? "No religious Test" seems pretty clear cut.

The primacy of a secular state was solidified when the First Amendment was included in the Bill of Rights. According to Purdue history professor Frank Lambert, that "introduced the radical notion that the state had no voice concerning matters of conscience."

Beyond that, the first House of Representatives, while debating the First Amendment, specifically rejected a Senate proposal calling for the establishment of Christianity as an official religion. As Lambert concludes, "There would be no Church of the United States. Nor would America represent itself as a Christian Republic."

The actions of the first presidents, founders of the first rank, confirmed this "original intent:"

- In 1790, President George Washington wrote to America's first synagogue, in Rhode Island, that "all possess alike liberty of conscience" and that "toleration" was an "inherent national gift," not the government's to dole out or take away.
- In 1797, with President John Adams in office, the Senate unanimously approved one of America's earliest foreign treaties, which emphatically stated (Article 11): "As the government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian Religion,—as it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion or tranquility of Musselmen (Muslims)..."
- In 1802, Jefferson added his famous "wall of separation," implicit in the Constitution until he so described it (and cited in several Supreme Court decisions since).

These are, to borrow an admittedly loaded phrase, "inconvenient truths" to those who proclaim that America is a "Christian Nation."

The Constitution and the views of these Founding Fathers trump all arguments about references to God in presidential speeches (permitted under the First Amendment), on money (not introduced until the Civil War), the Pledge of Allegiance ("under God" added in 1954) and in the national motto "In God We Trust" (adopted by law in 1956).

And those contentious monuments to the Ten Commandments found around the country and occasionally challenged in court? Many of them were installed as a publicity stunt for Cecile B. DeMille's 1956 Hollywood spectacle, "The Ten Commandments."

So who are you going to believe? Thomas Jefferson or Hollywood? On second thought: Don't answer.

20110725-02	10:09	SteveG	"Little-Known U.S. Document Signed by President Adams Proclaims America's Government Is Secular"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

"Little-Known U.S. Document Signed by President Adams Proclaims America's Government Is Secular" by Jim Walker, Early America Review

Summer, 1997, (<http://www.earlyamerica.com/review/summer97/secular.html>)

A few Christian fundamentalists attempt to convince us to return to the Christianity of early America, yet according to the historian, Robert T. Handy, "No more than 10 percent—probably less—of Americans in 1800 were members of congregations." The Founding Fathers, also, rarely practiced Christian orthodoxy. Although they supported the free exercise of any religion, they understood the dangers of religion. Most of them believed in deism and attended Freemasonry lodges. According to John J. Robinson, "Freemasonry had been a powerful force for religious freedom." Freemasons took seriously the principle that men should worship according to their own conscience. Masonry welcomed anyone from any religion or non-religion, as long as they believed in a Supreme Being. Washington, Franklin, Hancock, Hamilton, Lafayette, and many others accepted Freemasonry.

Treaty of Tripoli

The Constitution reflects our founders views of a secular government, protecting the freedom of any belief or unbelief. The historian, Robert Middlekauff, observed, "the idea that the Constitution expressed a moral view seems absurd. There were no genuine evangelicals in the Convention, and there were no heated declarations of Christian piety."

George Washington

Much of the myth of Washington's alleged Christianity came from Mason Weems influential book, "Life of Washington." The story of the cherry tree comes from this book and it has no historical basis. Weems, a Christian minister portrayed Washington as a devout Christian, yet Washington's own diaries show that he rarely attended Church.

Washington revealed almost nothing to indicate his spiritual frame of mind, hardly a mark of a devout Christian. In his thousands of letters, the name of Jesus Christ never appears. He rarely spoke about his religion, but his Freemasonry experience points to a belief in deism. Washington's initiation occurred at the Fredericksburg Lodge on Nov. 4, 1752, later becoming a Master mason in 1799, and remained a freemason until he died.

To the United Baptist Churches in Virginia in May, 1789, Washington said that every man "ought to be protected in worshipping the Deity according to the dictates of his own conscience."

After Washington's death, Dr. Abercrombie, a friend of his, replied to a Dr. Wilson, who had interrogated him about Washington's religion replied, "Sir, Washington was a Deist."

Thomas Jefferson

Even most Christians do not consider Jefferson a Christian. In many of his letters, he denounced the superstitions of Christianity. He did not believe in spiritual souls, angels or godly miracles. Although Jefferson did admire the morality of Jesus, Jefferson did not think him divine, nor did he believe in the Trinity or the miracles of Jesus. In a letter to Peter Carr, Aug. 10, 1787, he wrote, "Question with boldness even the existence of a god."

Jefferson believed in materialism, reason, and science. He never admitted to any religion but his own. In a letter to Ezra Stiles Ely, 25 June 1819, he wrote, "You say you are a Calvinist. I am not. I am of a sect by myself, as far as I know."

John Adams, a Unitarian, flatly denied the doctrine of eternal damnation. In a letter to Thomas Jefferson, he wrote:

I almost shudder at the thought of alluding to the most fatal example of the abuses of grief which the history of mankind has preserved—the Cross. Consider what calamities that engine of grief has produced!

In his letter to Samuel Miller, 8 July 1820, Adams admitted his unbelief of Protestant Calvinism: "I must acknowledge that I cannot class myself under that denomination." In his, "A Defence of the Constitutions of Government of the United States of America" [1787-1788], John Adams wrote:

The United States of America have exhibited, perhaps, the first example of governments erected on the simple principles of nature; and if men are now sufficiently enlightened to disabuse themselves of artifice, imposture, hypocrisy, and superstition, they will consider this event as an era in their history. Although the detail of the formation of the American governments is at present little known or regarded either in Europe or in America, it may hereafter become an object of curiosity. It will never be pretended that any persons employed in that service had interviews with the gods, or were in any degree under the influence of Heaven, more than those at work upon ships or houses, or laboring in merchandise or agriculture; it will forever be acknowledged that these governments were contrived merely by the use of reason and the senses.

Thirteen governments [of the original states] thus founded on the natural authority of the people alone, without a pretence of miracle or mystery, and which are destined to spread over the northern part of that whole quarter of the globe, are a great point gained in favor of the rights of mankind.

James Madison

Called the father of the Constitution, Madison had no conventional sense of Christianity. In 1785, Madison wrote in his Memorial and Remonstrance against Religious Assessments: "During almost fifteen centuries has the legal establishment of Christianity been on trial. What have been its fruits? More or less in all places, pride and indolence in the Clergy, ignorance and servility in the laity; in both, superstition, bigotry and persecution." "What influence, in fact, have ecclesiastical establishments had on society? In some instances they have been seen to erect a spiritual tyranny on the ruins of the civil authority; on many instances they have been seen upholding the thrones of political tyranny; in no instance have they been the guardians of the liberties of the people. Rulers who wish to subvert the public liberty may have found an established clergy convenient auxiliaries. A just government, instituted to secure and perpetuate it, needs them not."

Benjamin Franklin

Although Franklin received religious training, his nature forced him to rebel against the irrational tenets of his parents' Christianity. His Autobiography reveals his skepticism, "My parents had given me betimes religious impressions, and I received from my infancy a pious education in the principles of Calvinism. But scarcely was I arrived at fifteen years of age, when, after having doubted in turn of different tenets, according as I found them combated in the different books that I read, I began to doubt of Revelation itself. "Some books against Deism fell into my hands. . . It happened that they wrought an effect on my quite contrary to what was intended by them; for the arguments of the Deists, which were quoted to be refuted, appeared to me much stronger than the refutations; in short, I soon became a thorough Deist."

In an essay on "Toleration," Franklin wrote:

If we look back into history for the character of the present sects in Christianity, we shall find few that have not in their turns been persecutors, and complainers of persecution. The primitive Christians thought persecution extremely wrong in the Pagans, but practiced it on one another. The first Protestants of the Church of England blamed persecution in the Romish church, but practiced it upon the Puritans. These found it wrong in the Bishops, but fell into the same practice themselves both here [England] and in New England.

Dr. Priestley, an intimate friend of Franklin, wrote of him:

It is much to be lamented that a man of Franklin's general good character and great influence should have been an unbeliever in Christianity, and also have done as much as he did to make others unbelievers (Priestley's Autobiography)

Thomas Paine

This freethinker and author of several books, influenced more early Americans than any other writer. Although he held Deist beliefs, he wrote in his famous The Age of Reason: "I do not believe in the creed professed by the Jewish church, by the Roman church, by the Greek church, by the Protestant church, nor by any church that I know of. My own mind is my church."

"Of all the systems of religion that ever were invented, there is no more derogatory to the Almighty, more unedifying to man, more repugnant to reason, and more contradictory to itself than this thing called Christianity."

The U.S. Constitution

The most convincing evidence that our government did not ground itself upon Christianity comes from the very document that defines it—the United States Constitution. If indeed our Framers had aimed to found a Christian republic, it would seem highly unlikely that they would have forgotten to leave out their Christian intentions in the Supreme law of the land. In fact, nowhere in the Constitution do we have a single mention of Christianity, God, Jesus, or any Supreme Being. There occurs only two references to religion and they both use exclusionary wording. The 1st Amendment's says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." and in Article VI, Section 3, "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

Thomas Jefferson interpreted the 1st Amendment in his famous letter to the Danbury Baptist Association in Jan. 1, 1802:

I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should 'make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,' thus building a wall of separation between church and State.

Some Religious activists try to extricate the concept of separation between church and State by claiming that those words do not occur in the Constitution. Indeed they do not, but neither does it exactly say "freedom of religion," yet the First Amendment implies both.

As Thomas Jefferson wrote in his Autobiography, in reference to the Virginia Act for Religious Freedom:

Where the preamble declares, that coercion is a departure from the plan of the holy author of our religion, an amendment was proposed by inserting "Jesus Christ," so that it would read "A departure from the plan of Jesus Christ, the holy author of our religion;" the insertion was rejected by the great majority, in proof that they meant to comprehend, within the mantle of its protection, the Jew and the Gentile, the Christian and Mohammedan, the Hindoo and Infidel of every denomination.

James Madison, perhaps the greatest supporter for separation of church and State, and whom many refer to as the father of the Constitution, also held similar views which he expressed in his letter to Edward Livingston, 10 July 1822:

"And I have no doubt that every new example will succeed, as every past one has done, in shewing that religion & Govt will both exist in greater purity, the less they are mixed together."

Today, if ever our government needed proof that the separation of church and State works to ensure the freedom of religion, one only need to look at the plethora of Churches, temples, and shrines that exist in the cities and towns throughout the United States. Only a secular government, divorced from religion could possibly allow such tolerant diversity.

The Declaration of Independence

Many Christians who think of America as founded upon Christianity usually present the Declaration as "proof." The reason appears obvious: the document mentions God. However, the God in the Declaration does not describe Christianity's God. It describes "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God." This nature's view of God agrees with deist philosophy but any attempt to use the Declaration as a support for Christianity will fail for this reason alone.

More significantly, the Declaration does not represent the law of the land as it came before the Constitution. The Declaration aimed at announcing their separation from Great Britain and listed the various grievances with the "thirteen united States of America." The grievances against Great Britain no longer hold, and we have more than thirteen states.

Today, the Declaration represents an important historical document about rebellious intentions against Great Britain at a time before the formation of our independent government. Although the Declaration may have influential power, it may inspire the lofty thoughts of poets, and judges may mention it in their summations, it holds no legal power today. Our presidents, judges and policemen must take an oath to uphold the Constitution, but never to the Declaration of Independence.

Of course the Declaration depicts a great political document, as it aimed at a future government upheld by citizens instead of a religious monarchy. It observed that all men "are created equal" meaning that we all come inborn with the abilities of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That "to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men." The Declaration says nothing about our rights secured by Christianity, nor does it imply anything about a Christian foundation.

Treaty of Tripoli

Unlike governments of the past, the American Fathers set up a government divorced from religion. The establishment of a secular government did not require a reflection to themselves about its origin; they knew this as an unspoken given. However, as the U.S. delved into international affairs, few foreign nations knew about the intentions of America. For this reason, an insight from a little known but legal document written in the late 1700s explicitly reveals the secular nature of the United States to a foreign nation. Officially called the "Treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and Subjects of Tripoli, of Barbary," most refer to it as simply the Treaty of Tripoli. In Article 11, it states:

As the Government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion; as it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity, of Musselmen; and as the said States never have entered into any war or act of hostility against any Mehomitan nation, it is declared by the parties that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries.

The preliminary treaty began with a signing on Nov. 4, 1796 (the end of George Washington's last term as president). Joel Barlow, the American diplomat served as counsel to Algiers and held responsibility for the treaty negotiations. Barlow had once served under Washington as a chaplain in the revolutionary army. He became good friends with Paine, Jefferson, and read Enlightenment literature. Later he abandoned Christian orthodoxy for rationalism and became an advocate of secular government. Barlow, along with his associate, Captain Richard O'Brien, et al, translated and modified the Arabic version of the treaty into English. From this came the added Amendment 11. Barlow forwarded the treaty to U.S. legislators for approval in 1797. Timothy Pickering, the secretary of state, endorsed it and John Adams concurred (now during his presidency), sending the document on to the Senate. The Senate approved the treaty on June 7, 1797, and officially ratified by the Senate with John Adams signature on 10 June, 1797. All during this multi-review process, the wording of Article 11 never raised the slightest concern. The treaty even became public through its publication in The Philadelphia Gazette on 17 June 1797.

So here we have a clear admission by the United States that our government did not found itself upon Christianity. Unlike the Declaration of Independence, this treaty represented U.S. law as all treaties do according to the Constitution (see Article VI, Sect. 2).

Although the Christian exclusionary wording in the Treaty of Tripoli only lasted for eight years and no longer has legal status, it clearly represented the feelings of our Founding Fathers at the beginning of the U.S. government.

Common Law

According to the Constitution's 7th Amendment: "In suits at common law, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact, tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

Here, many Christians believe that common law came from Christian foundations and therefore the Constitution derives from it. They use various quotes from Supreme Court Justices proclaiming that Christianity came as part of the laws of England, and therefore from its common law heritage.

But one of our principle Founding Fathers, Thomas Jefferson, elaborated about the history of common law in his letter to Thomas Cooper on Feb. 10, 1814:

For we know that the common law is that system of law which was introduced by the Saxons on their settlement in England, and altered from time to time by proper legislative authority from that time to the date of Magna Charta, which terminates the period of the common law. This settlement took place about the middle of the fifth century. But Christianity was not introduced till the seventh century; the conversion of the first christian king of the Heptarchy having taken place about the year 598, and that of the last about 686. Here then, was a space of two hundred years, during which the common law was in existence, and Christianity no part of it.

If any one chooses to build a doctrine on any law of that period, supposed to have been lost, it is incumbent on him to prove it to have existed, and what were its contents. These were so far alterations of the common law, and became themselves a part of it. But none of these adopt Christianity as a part of the common law. If, therefore, from the settlement of the Saxons to the introduction of Christianity among them, that system of religion could not be a part of the common law, because they were not yet Christians, and if, having their laws from that period to the close of the common law, we are all able to find among them no such act of adoption, we may safely affirm (though contradicted by all the judges and writers on earth) that Christianity neither is, nor ever was a part of the common law.

In the same letter, Jefferson examined how the error spread about Christianity and common law. Jefferson realized that a misinterpretation had occurred with a Latin term by Priscot, "ancien scripture," in reference to common law history. The term meant "ancient scripture" but people had incorrectly interpreted it to mean "Holy Scripture," thus spreading the myth that common law came from the Bible. Jefferson writes:

And Blackstone repeats, in the words of Sir Matthew Hale, that 'Christianity is part of the laws of England,' citing Ventris and Strange ubi surpa. 4. Blackst. 59. Lord Mansfield qualifies it a little by saying that 'The essential principles of revealed religion are part of the common law.' In the case of the Chamberlain of London v. Evans, 1767. But he cites no authority, and leaves us at our peril to find out what, in the opinion of the judge, and according to the measure of his foot or his faith, are those essential principles of revealed religion obligatory on us as a part of the common law.

Thus we find this string of authorities, when examined to the beginning, all hanging on the same hook, a perverted expression of Priscot's, or on one another, or nobody." The Encyclopedia Britannica, also describes the Saxon origin and adds: "The nature of the new common law was at first much influenced by the principles of Roman law, but later it developed more and more along independent lines." Also prominent among the characteristics that derived out of common law include the institution of the jury, and the right to speedy trial.

Christian Sources

Virtually all the evidence that attempts to connect a foundation of Christianity upon the government rests mainly on quotes and opinions from a few of the colonial statesmen who had professed a belief in Christianity. Sometimes the quotes come from their youth before their introduction to Enlightenment ideas or simply from personal beliefs. But statements of beliefs, by themselves, say nothing about Christianity as the source of the U.S. government.

There did occur, however, some who wished a connection between church and State. Patrick Henry, for example, proposed a tax to help sustain "some form of Christian worship" for the state of Virginia. But Jefferson and other statesmen did not agree. In 1779, Jefferson introduced a bill for the Statute for Religious Freedom which became Virginia law. Jefferson designed this law to completely separate religion from government. None of Henry's Christian views ever got introduced into Virginia's or U.S. Government law.

Unfortunately, later developments in our government have clouded early history. The original Pledge of Allegiance, authored by Francis Bellamy in 1892 did not contain the words "under God." Not until June 1954 did those words appear in the Allegiance. The United States currency never had "In God We Trust" printed on money until after the Civil War. Many Christians who visit historical monuments and see the word "God" inscribed in stone, automatically impart their own personal God of Christianity, without understanding the Framers Deist context.

In the Supreme Court's 1892 Holy Trinity Church vs. United States, Justice David Brewer wrote that "this is a Christian nation." Many Christians use this as evidence. However, Brewer wrote this in dicta, as a personal opinion only and does not serve as a legal pronouncement. Later Brewer felt obliged to explain himself: "But in what sense can [the United States] be called a Christian nation? Not in the sense that Christianity is the established religion or the people are compelled in any manner to support it. On the contrary, the Constitution specifically provides that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.' Neither is it Christian in the sense that all its citizens are either in fact or in name Christians. On the contrary, all religions have free scope within its borders. Numbers of our people profess other religions, and many reject all."

Conclusion

The Framers derived an independent government out of Enlightenment thinking against the grievances caused by Great Britain. Our Founders paid little heed to political beliefs about Christianity. The 1st Amendment stands as the bulkhead against an establishment of religion and at the same time insures the free expression of any belief. The Treaty of Tripoli, an instrument of the Constitution, clearly stated our non-Christian foundation. We inherited common law from Great Britain which derived from pre-Christian Saxons rather than from Biblical scripture.

Today we have powerful Christian organizations who work to spread historical myths about early America and attempt to bring a Christian theocracy to the government. If this ever happens, then indeed, we will have ignored the lessons from history. Fortunately, most liberal Christians today agree with the principles of separation of church and State, just as they did in early America.

They all attributed the peaceful dominion of religion in their country mainly to the separation of church and state. I do not hesitate to affirm that during my stay in America I did not meet a single individual, of the clergy or the laity, who was not of the same opinion on this point.—Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, 1835

Bibliography

Borden, Morton, "Jews, Turks, and Infidels," The University of North Carolina Press, 1984

Boston, Robert, "Why the Religious Right is Wrong About Separation of Church & State," Prometheus Books, 1993

Boston, F. Andrews, et al, "The Writings of George Washington," (12 Vols.), Charleston, S.C., 1833-37

Fitzpatrick, John C., ed., "The Diaries of George Washington, 1748-1799," Houghton Mifflin Company: Published for the Mount Vernon Ladies Association of the Union, 1925

Gay, Kathlyn, "Church and State," The Millbrook Press, 1992

Handy, Robert, T., "A History of the Churches in U.S. and Canada," New York: Oxford University Press, 1977

Hayes, Judith, "All those Christian Presidents," [The American Rationalist, Mar./Apr., 1997]

Kock, Adrienne, ed., "The American Enlightenment: The Shaping of the American Experiment and a Free Society," New York: George Braziller, 1965

Mapp, Jr., Alf J., "Thomas Jefferson," Madison Books, 1987

Middlekauff, Robert, "The Glorious Cause," Oxford University Press, 1982

Miller, Hunter, ed., "Treaties and other International Acts of the United States of America," Vol. 2, Documents 1-40: 1776-1818, United States Government Printing Office, Washington: 1931

Peterson, Merrill D., "Thomas Jefferson Writings," The Library of America, 1984

Remsburg, John E., "Six Historic Americans," The Truth Seeker Company, New York

Robinson, John J., "Born in Blood," M. Evans & Company, New York, 1989

Roche, O.I.A., ed., "The Jefferson Bible: with the Annotated Commentaries on Religion of Thomas Jefferson," Clarkson N. Potter, Inc., 1964

Seldes, George, ed., "The Great Quotations," Pocket Books, New York, 1967

Sweet, William W., "Revivalism in America, its origin, growth and decline," C. Scribner's Sons, New York, 1944

Woodress, James, "A Yankee's Odyssey, the Life of Joel Barlow," J. P. Lippincott Co., 1958

Encyclopedia sources:

Common law: Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 6, "William Benton, Publisher, 1969

Declaration of Independence: Microsoft Encarta 1996 Encyclopedia, Microsoft Corp., Funk & Wagnall's Corporation.

In God We Trust: Microsoft Encarta 1996 Encyclopedia, Microsoft Corp., Funk & Wagnall's Corporation.

Pledge of Allegiance: Academic American Encyclopedia, Vol. 15, Grolier Incorporated, Danbury, Conn., 1988

Special thanks to Ed Buckner, Robert Boston, Selena Brewington and Lion G. Miles, for help in providing me with source materials.

20110725-03	10:52	GaryC	Re: "Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

Dear SteveB,

I agree with this article and its content and message. But, as you often forget or fail to acknowledge, not ALL Republicans are DOGMATISTS and many Democrats are also Dogmatists in their beliefs and opinions. Be an equal opportunity opinionater.

20110725-04	16:24	SteveB	Re: "Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear GaryC,

Across a fair sampling of time, you are completely right, my friend. History shows all kinds of contrary situations and I find those interesting and instructive.

BUT, my commentaries deal with this crucial present moment in history only. I'm not really interested in hypothetical or historical situations except as they pertain directly to the matter at hand. One such recent instance has been my pointing out the errors of Palin/Tea Party history, especially as it pertains to the Constitution.

The fact that liberals may have been stupid, dogmatic, and wrong at times in the past does not seem to me to be relevant. They seem to be acting responsibly now.

Unfortunately our current real crisis is not hypothetical. It is that the Republican party is, at this moment in history, tragically stupid, dogmatic, and wrong.

To me, that is what's important. not some measure of what might or might not be fair to the supposedly big, grown-up boys of the Republican party.

20110725-05	14:02	SteveG	Fw: "Why Boehner Cries"
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------

from Alan Grayson:

I know why House Speaker John Boehner walked out of debt ceiling talks with President Obama on Friday.

It's because Boehner can't deliver.

It doesn't matter what terms the President offers. It's that simple. Boehner can't deliver the votes. The President might as well be negotiating with Tiger Woods; Tiger can't deliver the votes, either. But at least Tiger has a better swing. On Friday, the President said, "I think that one of the questions that the Republican Party is going to have to ask itself is, can they say yes to anything? Can they say yes to anything?"

The answer to your question, Mr. President, is no. The national Republican Party can't even says yes to yes. And Boehner can't do anything about that.

In May 1935, Pierre Laval, then the Foreign Minister of France, and also the once and future Prime Minister of France, met with Josef Stalin, the Soviet dictator. Laval, a Catholic, urged Stalin to stop persecuting Catholics in the Soviet Union. Stalin asked Laval why it mattered. Laval replied that continued persecution could provoke a quarrel between Stalin and the Pope.

Stalin replied, "The Pope? How many divisions does he have?"

I don't think that anyone could confuse John Boehner with the Pope, but nevertheless, at this point, President Obama might ask the same question about Boehner. How many divisions does John Boehner have?

Fifty-nine House Republicans abandoned Boehner on the "compromise" appropriations bill. Even though Boehner depicted it to them as a Republican victory on par with, say, the Battle of Stalingrad.

And now, Fox News has reported that between 80 and 120 Republican members of the House will vote against any bill to increase the debt ceiling, no matter what else is in it. You can be sure that Fox News knows what Republicans in Washington are thinking—because Fox News tells them what to think.

So somewhere between a third and a half of all of the Republicans in the House of Representatives are going to vote against increasing the debt ceiling, no matter what Boehner puts in front of them. Boehner is a general with no troops. The coach has no players. The teacher has no students. The chief has no Indians. The bride has no bridesmaids. That's why Boehner is always crying.

It seems as though all those rounds of golf lately between Boehner and the President aren't likely to accomplish much, except maybe lowering the President's handicap. According to Fox, Boehner can't deliver enough Republican votes to increase the debt limit. So where does that leave us?

Congress has over 200 caucuses. The largest is the Congressional Progressive Caucus. I think that what Congress needs is a new caucus, Democrats and Republicans, who are willing to raise the debt ceiling without cutting Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid benefits.

I'd call it the Sane Caucus.

Courage, Alan Grayson

P.S. Please sign our petition at: <http://www.No-Cuts.com>. And pass it on to every friend you have. Because the Sane Caucus needs to know you're with them.

Paid for and Authorized by the Committee to Elect Alan Grayson 8419 Oak Road, Orlando, FL 32819

20110725-06	15:27	Mark	Americans Deserve Better
-----------------------------	-------	------	--------------------------

"The fact that we are here today to debate raising America 's debt limit is a sign of leadership failure. It is a sign that the U.S. government cannot pay its own bills. It is a sign that we now depend on ongoing financial assistance from foreign countries to finance our Government's reckless fiscal policies. Increasing America 's debt weakens us domestically and internationally. Leadership means that 'the buck stops here.'

Instead, Washington is shifting the burden of bad choices today onto the backs of our children and grandchildren. America has a debt problem and a failure of leadership.

Americans deserve better."

—Senator Barack H. Obama, Mar., 2006

20110725-07	16:04	SteveB	"Obama's 5 Big Mistakes"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

Ya, the President may not be a big liar like the Republicans, but he doesn't seem to be able to lead either, even when he had a Congressional majority in both Houses for two years. I'm afraid it's going to turn-out that he wasn't Presidential material after all, despite all his good intentions. I think we're in big trouble. Read on...

"Obama's 5 Big Mistakes" by David Frum, CNN

July 25, 2011, (http://us.cnn.com/2011/OPINION/07/25/frum.obama.mistakes/index.html?hpt=po_t2)

(Editor's note: David Frum writes a weekly column for CNN.com. A special assistant to President George W. Bush from 2001 to 2002, he is the author of six books, including Comeback: Conservatism That Can Win Again, and is the editor of FrumForum.)

Washington (CNN)—If the debt ceiling crisis were a movie, President Barack Obama would deserve an Oscar for his performance in the role of "the last reasonable man."

But of course the crisis is not a movie. The crisis is a deadly serious clash of ideas and interests. And there, the president has lost his way. Obama has lost his way so badly that even his core liberal supporters should be questioning whether they have got the right man in the job. The indictment has five headings:

1. Obama has ceased to lead on the economy.

The management guru Franklin Covey famously said: "The main thing is to keep the main thing the main thing." Economic recovery is—or should be—the main thing. In 2009, Obama advanced a series of bold proposals to accelerate recovery: his big fiscal stimulus, the auto bailout and so on.

The president's proposals did not fail, exactly. But they did not work as advertised. The American economy limps weakly forward, leaving millions out of work. During the Great Depression, President Franklin Roosevelt demanded from his administration "bold, persistent experimentation." By contrast, Obama put measures in place at the beginning and waited for them to yield results. And waited. And waited. And waited.

Finally, at the end of 2010, he added one more measure to the mix: a partial cut to the payroll tax, included as part of the deal that renewed the Bush tax cuts. The payroll tax holiday is welcome if late. But it was small (2 percentage points out of the 12.6% paid by workers and employers) and was almost immediately offset by the surge in oil prices after the so-called Arab Spring. That surge took back from workers every dollar of the $110 billion in tax relief delivered by the payroll holiday. And since December, Obama has surrendered entirely to the claim that we can somehow fix the economy by fixing the debt problem. The truth is the opposite: Fix the economy, and the debt problem will shrink to much more manageable proportions.

2. Obama does not effectively use the domestic powers of the presidency.

Talk radio shows accuse Obama of acting like a Third World dictator heading a thug government. That's a devilishly ingenious line of attack on a president who actually makes weaker use of his domestic power than any since Jimmy Carter.

Example: The U.S. recovery that commenced in the summer of 2009, stalled in the spring and summer of 2010. Many economists blame the stall on the Federal Reserve's Apr., 2010 decision to stop providing additional monetary stimulus for fear of igniting inflation. Those inflation fears proved utterly misplaced, and in late 2010 the Federal Reserve resumed its monetary stimulus. Where was the president during this crucial debate? AWOL.

Yes, yes, the Federal Reserve is independent and all that. But other presidents have succeeded in making their views known and respected on monetary policy. Obama had a unique chance to influence the debate, because through the summer of 2010 two of the seven seats on the Fed's Board of Governors stood vacant. The president nominated expansion-minded governors to fill the seats. The nominations were put on hold by Republican senators. And what did the president do? Did he take to the airways to demand action on his nominees? Did he punish the senators by stopping federal projects in their states? Did he fill the seats with recess appointments?

To borrow the answer from Fred Armisen's imitation of Obama on "Saturday Night Live": "I'm seeing two big accomplishments: jack and squat."

3. Obama cannot communicate empathy for Americans in economic distress.

Remember that video of the Obama supporter expressing her exhaustion and disappointment with the president's record of help to the middle class? Watch it again, and pay careful attention to what the president does. He first makes a perfunctory effort to connect with the woman in front of him as a fellow-parent. Then he rattles off a list of small programmatic changes: in the student loan program, in credit card regulation, none of them especially relevant to the woman in question. He finishes with a "stay the course" message that must ring hollow in the ears of all those for whom the "course" means unemployment of 38 weeks or longer. Notice what the president does not do. He does not thank his questioner for defending him. He does not ask her questions of his own. He is so determined to sell his narrative, that he cannot hear or honor her fears. And indeed the questioner did lose her job a few weeks after the town hall meeting.

For two years, Obama's economic message has been "recovery is around the corner." He has delivered this message from factory floors and restaurant tables. He has not spoken in front of groups of unemployed; he has not spoken at welfare offices.

Obama's disconnect from those in distress may explain the remarkable collapse of his support among younger whites, once one of his most important groups of supporters. Pew reports a 10-point surge in Republican identification among whites under age 30 since 2008. These are some of the voters hardest hit by this recession. They are voters to whom this president has spoken least.

4. Obama over-relied on banks and bankers.

Like President George W. Bush before him, Obama took bold and necessary action to save the U.S. financial system in the early spring of 2009. A lot of ugly things were done. A lot of reckless people got away scot-free—in fact, richer than ever. But apocalypse was averted, so congratulations all around. Afterward though: Where was the reckoning? The administration remained focused on reassuring bankers long after it had finished the job of saving the banks.

Yes, Congress did pass a law, Dodd-Frank, that addressed some of the worst abuses of the 2000s. For example, Dodd-Frank exposes ratings agencies to private lawsuits for "knowing or reckless" failures to conduct proper investigations of the bonds they rate.

Unless you follow banking law closely, however, you would have little idea that any preventive measures have been taken against the next bubble. What got the headlines instead was the president's appointment of one high-profile banker, William Daley, as his chief of staff—and a rumor that he intended to appoint another as his second secretary of the Treasury, Jamie Dimon of JPMorgan Chase. Little enough justice was done. Almost none was seen to be done.

5. Obama is not a good negotiator.

It's really striking that any time the president inserts himself into a negotiation, he ends up with zero results and all parties mad at him. The Middle East may be the most extreme case, but there are domestic counterparts, too.

When he negotiated the renewal of the Bush tax cuts in 2010, why didn't he get himself an increase in the debt ceiling at the same time? The tax cuts expanded the deficit beyond what it otherwise would have been. Republicans dearly wanted the tax cuts extended and would have paid for them. But no.

In this round of debt negotiations, the president has drawn red lines. He has threatened to veto a small increase in the debt ceiling, one that would force him to return to the argument before the election in 2012. By contrast, he has not threatened to veto debt-ceiling measures that cut too deeply into social programs. His red lines are drawn for his political advantage—not to protect his core supporters' values and interests. His red lines are not theirs.

Whether it was health care or the deficit or now the debt ceiling, direct encounters between Obama and his Republican opposite numbers have always ended badly for the president. Yes, the president faces unusually extreme and intransigent opposition. But that's a description of the difficulty, not an excuse for failure.

Presidents win negotiations when they can mobilize the public behind them. That was Ronald Reagan's secret weapon in 1981. It has never been Barack Obama's. And the results are as we all see.

20110726-01	06:58	SteveB	"Congress Continues Debate Over Whether or Not Nation Should Be Economically Ruined"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Now we're getting closer to the truth...GO REPUBLICANTS!!!!

"Congress Continues Debate Over Whether or Not Nation Should Be Economically Ruined" The Onion

July 20, 2011, (<http://www.theonion.com/articles/congress-continues-debate-over-whether-or-not-nati,20977/>)

(WASHINGTON) Members of the U.S. Congress reported Wednesday they were continuing to carefully debate the issue of whether or not they should allow the country to descend into a roiling economic meltdown of historically dire proportions.

"It is a question that, I think, is worthy of serious consideration: Should we take steps to avoid a crippling, decades-long depression that would lead to disastrous consequences on a worldwide scale? Or should we not do that?" asked House Majority Leader Eric Cantor (R-VA), adding that arguments could be made for both sides, and that the debate over ensuring America's financial solvency versus allowing the nation to default on its debt—which would torpedo stock markets, cause mortgage and interests rates to skyrocket, and decimate the value of the U.S. dollar—is "certainly a conversation worth having."

"Obviously, we don't want to rush to consensus on whether it is or isn't a good idea to save the American economy and all our respective livelihoods from certain peril until we've examined this thorny dilemma from every angle. And if we're still discussing this matter whenever, well, then, so be it." At press time, President Obama said he personally believed the country should not be economically ruined.

20110726-02	07:26	SteveB	"God Urges Rick Perry Not to Run for President"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Another Republican winner! You tell him how it is, God, OK? This time, You know what You're talking about!

"God Urges Rick Perry Not to Run for President" by The Onion

July 21, 2011, (<http://www.theonion.com/articles/god-urges-rick-perry-not-to-run-for-president,20981/>)

(AUSTIN, Tex.) Describing Texas Gov. Rick Perry as grossly unqualified for the position, God, the Creator and Ruler of the Universe, urged Perry not to run for president of the United States Wednesday. "I prayed last night and asked the Lord to support my candidacy, and He said no," Perry told reporters outside the Texas Capitol, explaining that God had cited the governor's rejection of federal stimulus funds to expand state jobless benefits, his irresponsible speculation about Texas seceding from the union, and his overall lack of concrete solutions to the nation's problems as reasons why He could not endorse a Perry presidential bid.

I believe God made some valid points about my lack of credentials, and He's absolutely right. My extreme beliefs when it comes to social issues and states' rights are not only disturbingly narrow-minded, but would also make me a horrible president.

When reached for comment, God said He would not be present at Perry's much-talked about Christian day of prayer on Aug. 6, calling the governor's use of his public office to endorse a religion both "irresponsible" and a violation of the Constitution.

20110726-03	08:05	Dick	Fw: Social Security: An Entitlement?
-----------------------------	-------	------	--------------------------------------

A great email that make perfect sense, both ethically and mathematically. Since we pre-paid for these benefits, are they really an entitlement?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Social Security An "Entitlement???"

What is wrong here?

Remember, not only did you contribute to Social Security but your employer did too. It totaled 15% of your income before taxes. If you averaged only 30K over your working life, that's close to $220,500.

If you calculate the future value of $4,500 per year (yours & your employer's contribution) at a simple 5% (less than what the govt. pays on the money that it borrows), after 49 years of working (me) you'd have $892,919.98.

If you took out only 3% per year, you receive $26,787.60 per year and it would last better than 30 years, and that's with no interest paid on that final amount on deposit! If you bought an annuity and it paid 4% per year, you'd have a lifetime income of $2,976.40 per month.

The folks in Washington have pulled off a bigger Ponzi scheme than Bernie Madoff ever had.

Entitlement my a*s, Just because they borrowed the money, doesn't make my benefits some kind of charity or handout!! Congressional benefits, aka. free health care, outrageous retirement packages, 67 paid holidays, three weeks paid vacation, unlimited paid sick days, now that's welfare, and they have the nerve to call my retirement entitlements !!!!

Emergency Rooms for their general health care—At just one hospital the cost to taxpayers totaled over 25 million a year!!! Someone please tell me what the HELL's wrong with all the people that run this country!!!!!!

We're "broke" & can't help our own Seniors, Veterans, Orphans, Homeless etc.,???????????

In the last months we have provided aid to Haiti, Chile, and Turkey. And now Pakistan home of bin Laden. Literally, BILLIONS of DOLLARS!!!

Our retired seniors living on a 'fixed income' receive no aid nor do they get any breaks while our government and religious organizations pour Hundreds of Billions of $$$$'s and Tons of Food to Foreign Countries!

They call Social Security and Medicare an entitlement even though most of us have been paying for it all our working lives and now when it's time for us to collect, the government is running out of money. Why did the government borrow from it in the first place?

AMERICA: a country where we have homeless without shelter, children going to bed hungry, elderly going without 'needed' meds, and mentally ill without treatment—etc., etc.

YET.....They have a 'Benefit' for the people of Haiti on 12 TV stations, ships and planes lining up with food, water,tents, clothes, bedding, doctors, and medical supplies.

Imagine if the GOVERNMENT gave 'U.S.' the same support they give to other countries.

SAD? YEAH, OK, SO WHEN DO WE GET ANGRY AND DO SOMETHING ABOUT IT?????

99% of people won't bother to forward this.

I'm one of the 1%—I Just Did

20110726-04	10:19	SteveB	Re: Social Security: An Entitlement?
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------------

Dear Dick,

I disagree with the slight emphasis on foreign aid in this piece...I don't think it wise to abrogate our influence in the world at large, especially the little influence we seem to have left.

But...how can the American people and our political system allow the government to rob the poor to pay the rich, and let the country and its future be damned? This is really the Republicans' grand scheme!

Or how is it not, my friends?

Maybe Americans could get perturbed enough to raise hell with their Congressmen??? Not that it looks like they're listening.

20110727-01 09:21 SteveB Republicans

Don't these Republicans realize that they are over-reaching by a mile, especially since they are a minority in the House and the Democrats control the Senate and the Presidency? Have they completely failed to study their American history?

Should Obama choose, he can always (or instantly, it would/will be interesting to see his political calculation here) invoke a National Emergency of some sort (which would probably be accurate) and raise the debt ceiling one way or another. Default is simply not in the best interest of the country and may be in our dire interest.

In this, perhaps likely, case, the Republicans get nothing. No budget cuts at all. We continue to print money.

Here's what has happened so far, in a nutshell:

1. The Tea Baggers demanded huge concessions from the other Republicans and the President on taxes and spending, so big you would think they wanted a "no" from the opposition. They thought this demand and its rejection, along with a worsening economy they refuse to do anything about, would give them the next election.
2. Instead, Obama caved to all their demands, to the extent that the current Democrat proposal in the Senate contains more cuts than Boehner's bill in the House. The President caved on taxes. He caved, but he turned the tables on them at the same time.
3. The Republicans (probably secretly shocked, no?) shook their heads and said, "Can't!"

Oh, OK, they don't really want what they said they wanted. OK... So, what is it they want? Chaos? Destruction? Third-World status? Chinese overlords? :-)

20110727-02 11:08 Dick U.S. Debt Visualization

Open link and be sure to scroll to the end. OMG! (<http://www.wtfnoway.com/>)

20110727-03 12:10 Dennis Re: Republicans

from SteveB:

OK... So, what is it they want? Chaos? Destruction? Third-World status? Chinese overlords? :-)

Dear SteveB,

Geez, isn't it obvious? They are simply obsessed with wanting to destroy the alien being they see infesting the White House. The only consequence they see from doing that blindly narrow-minded act is that they can restore their political hegemony over all Americans. It doesn't matter if the country can be financially destroyed in the process. Hugely greater deficits from soaring interest on the national debt? Deficits don't matter, as Dick Cheney so clearly pointed out and Republicans accepted as convenient wisdom, before they realized it could be used as an issue for undermining the perceived Usurper-in-Chief. Just make up a set of facts and repeat the biggest lies ad infinitum ALA Joseph Goebbels. What does truth matter when the goal is simply authoritarian power?

20110728-01	10:34	SteveB	Democrats "In Retreat"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------

How much ground the Democrats gave...

"In Retreat" by Chuck Todd, Mark Murray, Domenico Montanaro, and Brooke Brower, CNN

July 28, 2011, (<http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/07/28/7187100-first-thoughts-in-retreat>)

1. In retreat?

In this debt debate, who's up one day can quickly go down the next—and vice versa. That's why, after we wrote yesterday that House Speaker John Boehner was boxed in, he now appears likely to get his legislation through the House today (he turned things around the old fashioned way; he willed it). But when you take a step back from the hour-by-hour movements in this debate, it's obvious how much ground the White House and Democrats have conceded. First, they retreated on their push for a clean debt-ceiling raise. Then they retreated on the size of the spending cuts (now both sides say the cuts must equal or exceed the eventual debt-limit hike). Then they backed away from insisting that tax revenues be included in the final package (both the Boehner and Reid plans exclude them). And now it seems that their final line in the sand is insisting that the debt ceiling must—in one step—be raised beyond 2012, versus Boehner's two-step approach, which would guarantee another debt showdown early next year.

2. Another line in the sand, and another retreat?

Yesterday afternoon, the entire Dem Senate caucus—the 51 Democrats and two Dem-leaning independents—signed a letter to Boehner saying they'd oppose his legislation if it gets to their chamber. "A short-term extension like the one in your bill would put America at risk, along with every family and business in it," the letter states. "Your approach would force us once again to face the threat of default in five or six short months. Every day, another expert warns us that your short-term approach could be nearly as disastrous as a default and would lead to a downgrade in our credit rating." But will Democrats once again blink? Bottom line: It looks like they've gotten their clocks cleaned in these negotiations, and Republicans are once again counting on Democrats to retreat. The one thing that could bail out Democrats: that the GOP doesn't know when to declare victory and walk away from the blackjack table.

3. Losing the debt battle, but winning the larger war?

Democrats admit that this entire debt battle hasn't been a big winner for them. But they argue that they could end up winning the longer-term war. They point to polls showing them winning the actual tax debate (that the public wants balance and is willing to pay higher taxes); they say they could still get their revenues through the commission the eventual legislation sets up, or with the expiration of the Bush tax cuts (if Obama wins in 2012); and they contend that the president likely comes out this messy debate looking better than anyone in Congress. In large part, Republicans have gained the upper hand in this game of chicken, because they've proved that their Tea Party is tying their hands to the steering wheel (and Republicans have proven adept at using the "we can't control these guys" negotiating strategy). But Democrats could wield this argument in 2012: No matter how much ground they gave up, they protected the country from the guys who were willing to crash both cars.

20110729-01	11:40	Dick	"President Obama Is No Longer Tethered to Reality"
-----------------------------	-------	------	--

Dear Steve,

What is your take on this?

"President Obama Is No Longer Tethered to Reality" by Peter Ferrara, Forbes

July 28, 2011, (<http://www.forbes.com/sites/peterferrara/2011/07/28/president-obama-is-no-longer-tethered-to-reality/>)

(Peter Ferrara is Director of Entitlement and Budget Policy for the Heartland Institute, general counsel for the American Civil Rights Union and senior fellow for the Carleson Center for Public Policy. He served in the White House Office of Policy Development under President Reagan, and as associate deputy attorney general under the first President Bush. He is the author of America's Ticking Bankruptcy Bomb, now available from HarperCollins.)

President Barack Obama's speech to the nation Monday night was highly disturbing. Because, read carefully, it reveals a president wildly divorced from the fundamental realities of the nation he is supposed to be leading.

President Obama actually told America on national television that it is a nation "with a system in which the deck seems stacked against middle class Americans in favor of the wealthiest few." It is incomprehensible how a man serving as president of these United States could make such a fundamentally false assertion about his own country.

As I explain in my new book, America's Ticking Bankruptcy Bomb, before Obama was even elected, official IRS data showed that for 2007, the top 1% of income earners paid more in federal income taxes than the bottom 95% combined. The top 1% paid 40.4% of all federal income taxes that year, almost twice their share of income. The middle fifth of income earners, the actual middle class, paid 4.7% of federal income taxes. Deck stacked against the middle class in favor of the wealthiest few?

Moreover, the bottom 40% of income earners as a group paid no federal income taxes that year. They instead received net payments from the IRS equal to 4% of total federal tax revenues. As my book explains, this was actually the result of nearly 30 years of Reaganomics. Today close to 50% of Americans pay no federal income tax.

We see the same in some states. In California, the top 1% pay 48% of all state income taxes. In New York, the top 1% pay 41% of all state income taxes. In New Jersey, until recently the top 1% paid 46% of state income taxes.

Moreover [again? —SteveB], America's corporate income tax rate is virtually the highest in the industrialized world at nearly 40% on average, counting state corporate rates. Even Communist China has a 25% corporate rate, with the average in the mostly socialist European Union below that. In formerly socialist Canada, the corporate rate today is 16.5%, scheduled to fall under current law to 15% next year. Doesn't sound like America suffers a deck stacked against the middle class in favor of the wealthiest few.

And already scheduled under current law for 2013 are increases in the top tax rates of every major federal tax, apart from the already too high corporate tax rate. That is because the Obamacare taxes become effective that year, and the Bush tax cuts expire. So the top two income tax rates would go up nearly 20%, the capital gains tax rate would go up nearly 60%, the tax on corporate dividends would nearly triple, and the Medicare payroll tax would go up 62% for the nation's small businesses, job creators and investors.

Obama's wildly erroneous statement Monday night indicates he is not living in the real world, which is dangerous for America. These tax policies so heavily skewed against the nation's small businesses, job creators and investors are central reasons why there has been no recovery from the last recession, why working people can't get jobs, why their wages are falling in real terms, why unemployment is still rising 3.5 years after the last recession started, why a record number of Americans are in poverty. As a consequence, in reality, it is Obama's anti-market economic policies that are actually in effect stacked heavily against the middle class, working people and the poor.

Obama also told the nation Monday night he wants to "ask hedge fund managers to stop paying taxes at a lower rate than their secretaries." This is another false truism that is widely circulated throughout the liberal/left. The allegation arises because capital gains income is taxed at 15%, while individual income tax rates range higher than that. But as I explain in my book, the fundamental mistake is the failure to recognize that capital income is taxed multiple times, not just by the capital gains tax. It is taxed at least four times, by the individual income tax, the corporate income tax, and the death tax, besides the capital gains tax. That is why the most fair as well as most economically productive rate for the capital gains tax would be zero, as is the case in much of the industrialized world.

The president further proclaimed Monday night that "most Americans don't understand how we can ask a senior citizen to pay more for her Medicare benefits before we ask corporate jet owners and oil companies to give up tax breaks that other companies don't get." But his Obamacare law already more than asks seniors to pay more for their Medicare benefits. It requires them to pay 40% to 200% more if they, in the President's infinite wisdom, earn too much, defined as over $85,000 a year this time.

Note also the tax break for corporate jet owners was adopted in the Obama stimulus to create jobs in corporate jet manufacturing. Yet, such tax breaks for corporate jets or oil companies that other companies do not get are special interest, central economic planning loopholes that undermine the economy rather than advance it. The only truly pro-growth tax policy is the lowest possible tax rates for all, with no special interest loopholes. But the amount of revenue lost on Obama's corporate jet scam is so trivial it is not even worth talking about as possibly even contributing to solving the deficit and debt crisis.

Finally on Monday night, Obama threatened America's seniors with more, saying that if House Republicans don't agree to his tax increase to increase the debt limit, "we would not have enough money to pay the bills—bills that include monthly Social Security checks." This can only be described as calculated deception.

The Social Security trust funds include $2.7 trillion in government bonds, which are due and payable when needed to pay Social Security benefits. As I also show in my book, those bonds do not represent any real savings and investment. They involve only a statement of the legal authority Social Security has to draw from general revenues, on top of payroll tax revenues. But in dealing with a crisis over the debt limit, that legal authority can be the critical factor.

While those bonds are explicitly not transferable, and so cannot be sold to the public to raise money, under prior practice they would be cashed out by selling new government bonds to the public. Since the Social Security trust fund bonds are included in the national debt subject to the debt limit, they can be replaced by such new public bonds without the total debt going over the limit.

Moreover [again? X3? —SteveB], those Social Security trust fund bonds are explicitly backed by the full faith and credit of the U.S. That means Obama is constitutionally required to pay them when needed to pay Social Security benefits. In addition, there is more than enough general revenue coming in to just cash out the trust fund bonds as necessary in any event, even without issuing any new public bonds.

As a result, Obama is constitutionally required to pay Social Security benefits, under his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. That means failing to pay those benefits would be an impeachable offense."

20110730-01	12:17	SteveB	"First Thoughts: A Game of Leverage"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------------

The debt limit battle...

"First Thoughts: A Game of Leverage" by Chuck Todd, Mark Murray, Domenico Montanaro, and Brooke Brower, NBC

July 29, 2011, (<http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/07/29/7195706-first-thoughts-a-game-of-leverage>)

In retreat

In this debt debate, who's up one day can quickly go down the next—and vice versa. That's why, after we wrote yesterday that House Speaker John Boehner was boxed in, he now appears likely to get his legislation through the House today (he turned things around the old fashioned way; he willed it). But when you take a step back from the hour-by-hour movements in this debate, it's obvious how much ground the White House and Democrats have conceded. First, they retreated on their push for a clean debt-ceiling raise. Then they retreated on the size of the spending cuts (now both sides say the cuts must equal or exceed the eventual debt-limit hike). Then they backed away from insisting that tax revenues be included in the final package (both the Boehner and Reid plans exclude them). And now it seems that their final line in the sand is insisting that the debt ceiling must—in one step—be raised beyond 2012, versus Boehner's two-step approach, which would guarantee another debt showdown early next year.

Another line in the sand, and another retreat?

Yesterday afternoon, the entire Dem Senate caucus—the 51 Democrats and two Dem-leaning independents—signed a letter to Boehner saying they'd oppose his legislation if it gets to their chamber. "A short-term extension like the one in your bill would put America at risk, along with every family and business in it," the letter states. "Your approach would force us once again to face the threat of default in five or six short months. Every day, another expert warns us that your short-term approach could be nearly as disastrous as a default and would lead to a downgrade in our credit rating." But will Democrats once again blink?

Bottom line: It looks like they've gotten their clocks cleaned in these negotiations, and Republicans are once again counting on Democrats to retreat. The one thing that could bail out Democrats: that the GOP doesn't know when to declare victory and walk away from the blackjack table.

Losing the debt battle, but winning the larger war?

Democrats admit that this entire debt battle hasn't been a big winner for them. But they argue that they could end up winning the longer-term war. They point to polls showing them winning the actual tax debate (that the public wants balance and is willing to pay higher taxes); they say they could still get their revenues through the commission the eventual legislation sets up, or with the expiration of the Bush tax cuts (if Obama wins in 2012); and they contend that the president likely comes out this messy debate looking better than anyone in Congress. In large part, Republicans have gained the upper hand in this game of chicken, because they've proved that their Tea Party is tying their hands to the steering wheel (and Republicans have proven adept at using the "we can't control these guys" negotiating strategy). But Democrats could wield this argument in 2012: No matter how much ground they gave up, they protected the country from the guys who were willing to crash both cars.

A game of leverage

Yesterday, we said that who's up one day in this debt debate can quickly go down the next. And that's precisely what happened on Thursday night, when House Speaker John Boehner—who had appeared likely to get his debt legislation through the House—had to postpone the vote. The reason: GOP leaders simply didn't have the votes to pass it. Why does all of this matter, even though Boehner's bill is supposedly D.O.A. in the Senate? It's about leverage. Had Republican passed their bill last night, it would have put pressure on the White House and Democrats, even though Senate Dems had vowed to oppose the Boehner bill. But with the GOP's failure last night, Democrats suddenly have much more leverage than they did yesterday. Expect Mitch McConnell and a band of frustrated Senate Republicans (whom McConnell is simply trying to keep calm) to give Boehner a couple of hours this morning to try to pass his legislation again. But if that doesn't happen, Senate Republicans might end up cutting a deal with Harry Reid and the Democrats—moving things faster than any of us thought possible.

Final House bill will need GOP and Dem votes.

Here's another reason why Democrats suddenly have more leverage in this debt debate: We've heard that House leaders weren't trying to flip just the last 10 or 15 votes yesterday. GOP leaders had already moved DOZENS of House Republican votes from "maybe" "no" to "yes." What does that mean: There just aren't enough House GOP votes—by themselves—to raise the debt ceiling. The eventual compromise bill is going to take 105 to 110 House Republican votes, as well as 105 to 110 House Democratic votes. So message to Kevin McCarthy and Steny Hoyer: Time to roll up your sleeves; Monday could be the REALLY long day.

Do House Republicans really want to do this again in six months?

Rhetorically, Democrats now have additional leverage in their fight to have a single debt-ceiling hike through 2012 (as opposed to the GOP desire to have another hike early next year). As White House Communications Director Dan Pfeiffer tweeted last night, "Someone remind me why Speaker Boehner is dead set on doing this again in December?" And as a top Senate Democratic aide emailed First Read, "If this isn't reason enough to avoid doing all this over again in six months, what is?" Some Republicans might believe doing this again will make the president look weak at a time when Americans are actually beginning to tune into the election. Is that possible? Maybe, but it's just as possible that it turns into a total you-know-what show, and has more of what last night highlighted—Republicans attacking Republicans and a party in disarray. So it's hard enough to imagine gambling with the U.S. economy at this point, but it also means gambling with your own political future and relevancy.

The old rules no longer apply.

There are two more lessons we learned last night. First, the old rules to twist recalcitrant arms no longer apply. Tea Party and conservative House members don't really care about important committee assignments. They don't place a value on fundraising help. And earmarks and extra pork for their districts? Forget about it. As the Washington Post recounts, GOP

Rep. Jeff Flake—who opposes Boehner’s bill—“praised the lack of horse-trading of the type that marred passage of Obama’s health-care legislation. ‘It is the most refreshing thing in the world to see what’s going on in there,’ Flake said. ‘This kind of negotiation a couple years ago would have cost about $20 billion.’” It is refreshing. But it’s also a curse if you’re trying to get things done.

Can Republicans govern?

A second lesson we learned: It’s a legitimate question to ask if the Tea Party fueled Republican Party can govern. Last night wasn’t just about Boehner failing to get the votes. House Majority Leader Eric Cantor and House Majority Whip Kevin McCarthy were united with their speaker in trying to get votes for the bill. Some folks are trying to make this a referendum on Boehner’s speakership, but could anyone else have managed this group?

Bottom line: The entire GOP leadership doesn’t know how to manage the Tea Party and their conservative members. Boehner and Republicans have spent the last several weeks accusing President Obama of not leading. But as one GOP member told NBC’s Luke Russert: "Our message has been that we lead and Obama doesn't. That didn't happen [last night]." Obama himself referred to Boehner’s challenge earlier this month: "The politics that swept him into the speakership were good for a midterm election; they’re tough for governing."

20110802-01	11:05	Mark	Fw: Bernie Madoff & Social Security
-------------	-------	------	-------------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

No matter what your political views are, this strikes a chord with us baby boomers who have paid into SS our entire lives and are just hoping that the $’s are there when we need them.....so we hope for lots of "new investors".

Why did Bernie Madoff go to prison? To make it simple, he talked people into investing with him. Trouble was, he didn't invest their money. As time rolled on he simply took the money from the new investors to pay off the old investors. Finally there were too many old investors and not enough money from new investors coming in to keep the payments going.

Next thing you know Madoff is one of the most hated men in America and he is off to jail. Some of you know this. But not enough of you. Madoff did to his investors what the government has been doing to us for over 70 years with Social Security. There is no meaningful difference between the two schemes, except that one was operated by a private individual who is now in jail, and the other is operated by politicians who enjoy perks, privileges and status in spite of their actions.

Do you need a side-by-side comparison here?

BERNIE MADOFF: Takes money from investors with the promise that the money will be invested and made available to them later.

SOCIAL SECURITY: Takes money from wage earners with the promise that the money will be invested in a "Trust Fund" (Lock Box) and made available later.

BERNIE MADOFF: Instead of investing the money Madoff spends it on nice homes in the Hamptons and yachts.

SOCIAL SECURITY: Instead of depositing money in a Trust Fund the politicians transfer it to the General Revenue Fund and use it for general spending and vote buying.

BERNIE MADOFF: When the time comes to pay the investors back Madoff simply uses some of the new funds from newer investors to pay back the older investors.

SOCIAL SECURITY: When benefits for older investors become due, the politicians pay them with money taken from younger and newer wage earners to pay the older investors.

BERNIE MADOFF: When Madoff’s scheme is discovered all hell breaks loose. New investors won't give him any money.

SOCIAL SECURITY: When Social Security runs out of money the politicians try to force the taxpayers to send them some more or they’ll cancel those who paid into it.

BERNIE MADOFF: Is in jail.

YOUR POLITICIANS: Remain in Washington with fat medical and retirement benefits.

"If you put the federal government in charge of the Sahara Desert , in five years there'd be a shortage of sand." —Milton Friedman

20110805-01 19:11 GaryF Fw: 1911

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

The year is 1911— One hundred years ago. What a difference a century makes! Here are some statistics for the Year 1911:

1. The average life expectancy for men was 47 years.
2. Fuel for the Model T Ford was sold in drug stores only.
3. Only 14 percent of the homes had a bathtub.
4. Only 8 percent of the homes had a telephone.
5. There were only 8,000 cars and only 144 miles of paved roads.
6. The maximum speed limit in most cities was 10 mph.
7. The tallest structure in the world was the Eiffel Tower !
8. The average U.S. wage in 1910 was 22 cents per hour.
9. The average U.S. worker made between $200 and $400 per year ..
10. A competent accountant could expect to earn $2000 per year,
11. A dentist made $2,500 per year, a veterinarian between $1,500 and $4,000 per year, and a mechanical engineer about $5,000 per year.
12. More than 95 percent of all births took place at home .
13. Ninety percent of all Doctors had NO COLLEGE EDUCATION! Instead, they attended so-called "medical schools", many of which were condemned in the press AND the government as "substandard."
14. Sugar cost four cents a pound.
15. Eggs were fourteen cents a dozen.
16. Coffee was fifteen cents a pound.
17. Most women only washed their hair once a month, and used Borax or egg yolks for shampoo.
18. Canada passed a law that prohibited poor people from entering their country for any reason.
19. The Five leading causes of death were: Pneumonia and influenza, Tuberculosis, Diarrhea, Heart disease, Stroke
20. The American flag had 45 stars.
21. The population of Las Vegas, Nevada, was only 30!
22. Crossword puzzles, canned beer, and iced tea hadn't been invented yet.
23. There was neither a Mother's Day nor a Father's Day.
24. Two out of every 10 adults couldn't read or write and only 6% of all Americans had graduated from high school.
25. Marijuana, heroin, and morphine were all available over the counter at the local corner drugstores. Back then pharmacists said, "Heroin clears the complexion, gives buoyancy to the mind, Regulates the stomach and bowels, and is, in fact, a perfect guardian of health!" (Shocking?)
26. 18% of households had at least one full-time servant or domestic help.
27. There were about 230 reported murders in the ENTIRE U.S.A.!

I am now going to forward this to someone else without typing it myself. From there, it will be sent to others all over the WORLD—all in a matter of seconds! Try to imagine what it may be like in another 100 years.

20110806-01 18:06 GaryF Quotes About Voters

Truer words were never spoken:

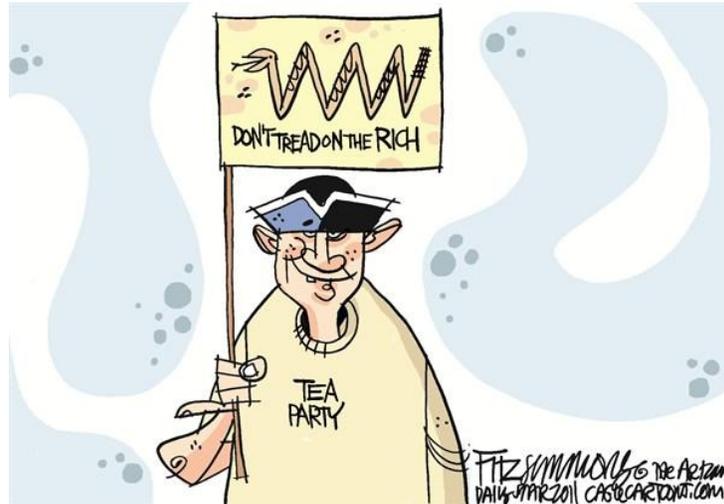

"The short memories of American voters is what keeps our politicians in office" —Will Rogers

"The greatest argument against democracy is a 5 minute conversation with the average voter." —Winston Churchill

Well...there's also the other question: If de-regulation and tax cuts for the rich and powerful generate wealth, jobs, and growth for the American economy...then why hasn't the great conservative experiment conducted since Ronald Reagan resulted in a successful America instead of a jobless, declining, failing America?

"The Question Conservatives Can't Answer" by Paul Buchheit, Common Dreams

July 26th, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/view/2011/07/26-1>)

David Fitzsimmons / Arizona Daily Star

The following fact was sent to numerous conservative pundits, politicians, and profit seekers:

Based on Tax Foundation figures, the richest 1 percent has TRIPLED its share of America's income over the past 30 years. Much of the gain came from tax cuts and minimally taxed financial instruments. If their income had increased only at the pace of American productivity (80 percent), they would be taking about a TRILLION DOLLARS LESS out of our economy.

And a question was posed:

In what way do the richest 1 percent deserve these extraordinary gains?

This question was not posed in sarcasm. A factual answer is genuinely sought. It seems unlikely that 1 percent of the population worked three times harder than the rest of us, or contributed three times as much to American productivity. Money earned from tax cuts and minimally taxed financial instruments is not productive income. And while some big earners have developed innovative ideas and leading edge businesses, it seems fair to say that taxpayer-funded research at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (the Internet), the National Institute of Health (pharmaceuticals), and the National Science Foundation (the Digital Library Initiative) has laid a half-century foundation for their idea-building.

So I asked anyone out there to explain, defend, or justify the fact that over 20% of our country's income (it was 7 percent in 1980) now goes to the richest 1 percent of Americans.

Very few responses were forthcoming. To his credit, renowned economist and writer Thomas Sowell took the time to respond. Unfortunately, his response relied upon classical economic theory: "Most people are paid voluntarily by others to whom they supply goods and/or services, and only to the extent that others value what is supplied enough to part with their own hard cash."

Mr. Sowell is also a believer in economic mobility, claiming that people often move from one earnings quintile to another over time. While there's some truth in this, Treasury Department figures show that nearly 9 out of 10 of those in the top 1% remained in the top quintile of earners over a ten year period.

A few other conservatives responded to my question, with varying degrees of coherence in their arguments. Reference was made to the "Pareto Efficiency," a situation in which an allocation of resources makes at least one individual better off without making any other individual worse off: the result is said to be a net improvement overall. But this does not address the resulting contribution to inequality, which is the main point.

Another respondent claimed: "What we found is that the rich did get richer over the last 30 years, but so did the middle class, the working class and the poorest." But based on 1980 dollars and IRS data, this is how U.S. income has been redistributed since that time:

- Incomes for the top 1 percent have gone from $148,000 to $450,000
- Incomes for the next 9 percent have gone from $46,000 to $50,000
- Incomes for the next 40 percent have gone from $17,500 to $15,000
- Incomes for the bottom 50 percent have gone from $5,400 to $3,750

As it stands, the question remains unanswered. Maybe if we offer a prize..?

20110807-02	11:00	SteveG	"30 Years Ago Today: The Day the Middle Class Died"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

"30 Years Ago Today: The Day the Middle Class Died" by Michael Moore, AlterNet

Aug. 6, 2011,

http://www.alternet.org/newsandviews/article/645360/30_years_ago_today%3A_the_day_the_middle_class_died...a_letter_from_michael_moore/#parag

From time to time, someone under 30 will ask me, "When did this all begin, America's downward slide?" They say they've heard of a time when working people could raise a family and send the kids to college on just one parent's income (and that college in states like California and New York was almost free). That anyone who wanted a decent paying job could get one. That people only worked five days a week, eight hours a day, got the whole weekend off and had a paid vacation every summer. That many jobs were union jobs, from baggers at the grocery store to the guy painting your house, and this meant that no matter how "lowly" your job was you had guarantees of a pension, occasional raises, health insurance and someone to stick up for you if you were unfairly treated.

Young people have heard of this mythical time—but it was no myth, it was real. And when they ask, "When did this all end?", I say, "It ended on this day: Aug. 5th, 1981."

Beginning on this date, 30 years ago, Big Business and the Right Wing decided to "go for it"—to see if they could actually destroy the middle class so that they could become richer themselves.

And they've succeeded.

On Aug. 5, 1981, President Ronald Reagan fired every member of the air traffic controllers union (PATCO) who'd defied his order to return to work and declared their union illegal. They had been on strike for just two days.

It was a bold and brash move. No one had ever tried it. What made it even bolder was that PATCO was one of only three unions that had endorsed Reagan for president! It sent a shock wave through workers across the country. If he would do this to the people who were with him, what would he do to us?

Reagan had been backed by Wall Street in his run for the White House and they, along with right-wing Christians, wanted to restructure America and turn back the tide that President Franklin D. Roosevelt started—a tide that was intended to make life better for the average working person. The rich hated paying better wages and providing benefits. They hated paying taxes even more. And they despised unions. The right-wing Christians hated anything that sounded like socialism or holding out a helping hand to minorities or women.

Reagan promised to end all that. So when the air traffic controllers went on strike, he seized the moment. In getting rid of every single last one of them and outlawing their union, he sent a clear and strong message: The days of everyone having a comfortable middle class life were over. America, from now on, would be run this way:

- The super-rich will make more, much, much more, and the rest of you will scramble for the crumbs that are left.
- Everyone must work! Mom, Dad, the teenagers in the house! Dad, you work a second job! Kids, here's your latch-key! Your parents might be home in time to put you to bed.
- 50 million of you must go without health insurance! And health insurance companies: you go ahead and decide who you want to help—or not.
- Unions are evil! You will not belong to a union! You do not need an advocate! Shut up and get back to work! No, you can't leave now, we're not done. Your kids can make their own dinner.
- You want to go to college? No problem—just sign here and be in hock to a bank for the next 20 years!
- What's "a raise"? Get back to work and shut up!

And so it went. But Reagan could not have pulled this off by himself in 1981. He had some big help:

The AFL-CIO.

The biggest organization of unions in America told its members to cross the picket lines of the air traffic controllers and go to work. And that's just what these union members did. Union pilots, flight attendants, delivery truck drivers, baggage handlers—they all crossed the line and helped to break the strike. And union members of all stripes crossed the picket lines and continued to fly.

Reagan and Wall Street could not believe their eyes! Hundreds of thousands of working people and union members endorsing the firing of fellow union members. It was Christmas in August for Corporate America.

And that was the beginning of the end. Reagan and the Republicans knew they could get away with anything—and they did. They slashed taxes on the rich. They made it harder for you to start a union at your workplace. They eliminated safety regulations on the job. They ignored the monopoly laws and allowed thousands of companies to merge or be bought out and closed down. Corporations froze wages and threatened to move overseas if the workers didn't accept lower pay and less benefits. And when the workers agreed to work for less, they moved the jobs overseas anyway.

And at every step along the way, the majority of Americans went along with this. There was little opposition or fight-back. The "masses" did not rise up and protect their jobs, their homes, their schools (which used to be the best in the world). They just accepted their fate and took the beating.

I have often wondered what would have happened had we all just stopped flying, period, back in 1981. What if all the unions had said to Reagan, "Give those controllers their jobs back or we're shutting the country down!"? You know what would have happened. The corporate elite and their boy Reagan would have buckled.

But we didn't do it. And so, bit by bit, piece by piece, in the ensuing 30 years, those in power have destroyed the middle class of our country and, in turn, have wrecked the future for our young people. Wages have remained stagnant for 30 years. Take a look at the statistics and you can see that every decline we're now suffering with had its beginning in 1981 (here's a little scene to illustrate that from my last movie).

It all began on this day, 30 years ago. One of the darkest days in American history. And we let it happen to us. Yes, they had the money, and the media and the cops. But we had 200 million of us. Ever wonder what it would look like if 200 million got truly upset and wanted their country, their life, their job, their weekend, their time with their kids back?

Have we all just given up? What are we waiting for? Forget about the 20% who support the Tea Party—we are the other 80%! This decline will only end when we demand it. And not through an online petition or a tweet. We are going to have to turn the TV and the computer and the video games off and get out in the streets (like they've done in Wisconsin). Some of you need to run for local office next year. We need to demand that the Democrats either get a spine and stop taking corporate money—or step aside.

When is enough, enough? The middle class dream will not just magically reappear. Wall Street's plan is clear: America is to be a nation of Haves and Have Nothings. Is that OK for you?

Why not use today to pause and think about the little steps you can take to turn this around in your neighborhood, at your workplace, in your school? Is there any better day to start than today?

Yours, Michael Moore

20110808-01 10:30 Ben Rick Perry's Texas A&M Transcript

Wow. Astonishing. But not.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/08/05/rick-perry-college-transcript_n_919357.html

[or] <http://www.scribd.com/doc/61684192/Rick-Perry-s-Texas-A-M-Transcript>

PER: JAMES RICHARD		585764		TEXAS A&M UNIVERSITY
ROUTE #2, HASKELL, TEXAS		3-4-50 HASKELL, TEXAS		COLLEGE STATION, TEXAS
DATE AND PLACE OF BIRTH	COURSE NUMBER	HOURS TH-PR	Grade	CR HRS	GR PTS
PRE-VETERINARY MEDICINE
1ST TERM SS 1968
COMP. & RHETORIC	ENGL 103	9 0	B	3	6
HISTORY OF THE U.S.	HIST 105	9 0	C	3	3
685764		6		6	9
FALL SEMESTER 1968
WORLD MIL. SYSTEMS	A S 101	0 2	C	1	1
GEN. BOT. OF SEED PLTS	BIOL 101	2 3	C	3	3
GENERAL CHEMISTRY	CHEM 101	3 3	C	4	4
IMPROV. OF LEARNING	EDUC 101	1 3	A	2	6
COMP. + RHETORIC	ENGL 104	3 0	C	3	3
ALGEBRA	MATH 102	3 0	B	3	6
REQUIRED PHY. ED.	P E 101	0 2	B	2	2
685764		16		16	25
SPRING SEMESTER 1969
WORLD MIL. SYSTEMS	A S 102	0 2	B	1	2
VERTEBRATE ZOOLOGY	BIOL 107	2 3	C	3	3
GENERAL CHEMISTRY	CHEM 102	3 3	C	4	4
HISTORY OF THE U.S.	HIST 106	3 0	C	3	3
PLANE TRIGONOMETRY	MATH 103	3 0	D	3	3
REQUIRED PHY. ED.	P E 102	0 2	B	2	2
685764		14		14	14
FOUR POINT SYSTEM EFFECTIVE JUNE 1969
FALL SEMESTER 1969
WORLD MIL. SYSTEMS	A S 201	0 2	A	1	4
ORGANIC CHEMISTRY I	CHEM 227	3 0	D	3	3
ORG. CHEM. LAB.	CHEM 237	0 3	B	1	3
INTRO TO LITERATURE	ENGL 203	3 0	B	3	9
REQUIRED PHY. ED.	P E 201	0 2	C	2	2
COLLEGE PHYSICS	PHYS 201	3 3	C	4	8
AMER. NATNL. GOVT.	POLS 206	3 0	B	3	9
685764		15		15	38
SPRING SEMESTER 1970
WORLD MIL. SYSTEMS	A S 202	0 2	C	1	2
ORGANIC CHEMISTRY II	CHEM 228	3 0	F	3	3
ORG. CHEM. LAB.	CHEM 238	0 3	D	1	1
SHAKESPEARE	ENGL 212	3 0	D	3	3
REQUIRED PHY. ED.	P E 202	0 2	B	2	2
COLLEGE PHYSICS	PHYS 202	3 3	C	4	8
685764		12		9	17
2ND TERM SS 1970
SOIL SCIENCE	AGRO 301	9 6	B	4	12
PRIN. OF ECONOMICS	ECON 203	9 0	D	3	3
685764		7		7	15
ANIMAL SCIENCE 8-31-70
ENTITLED ON PAGE 2
ADMISSION		DATE OF ENTRANCE		6-3-68
GRADUATE, PAINT CREEK RURAL H.S., HASKELL, TEXAS, 1968
<small>Grading System: A (92-100), B (84-91), C (76-83), D (70-75), F (0-49), WP - withdrew passing, WF - withdrew failing. Semester is 18 weeks. Summer term is 6 weeks. Credit Hour: 1 hour of recitation or 2 to 4 hours of practice a week for one semester.</small>
<small>ENTITLED TO HONORABLE DISMISSAL UNLESS OTHERWISE STATED. NOT AN OFFICIAL TRANSCRIPT WITHOUT IMPRESS SEAL OF UNIVERSITY.</small>
<small>TO THE RECIPIENT OF THIS DOCUMENT: THIS INFORMATION MAY NOT BE RELEASED OR TRANSFERRED TO ANY OTHER PERSON, AGENCY OR PARTY WITHOUT THE STUDENT'S CONSENT.</small>
<small>Date _____ Director of Admissions and Registrar</small>

20110808-02 20:47 Dick Fw: "545 vs. 300,000,000 People"

[Original source of email unknown. —SteveB]

Charlie Reese's Final Column

This is very interesting, but somewhat dubious. According to Snopes.com, it is an updating of a column first appearing in 1985 (when Ronald Reagan was President). It was updated again when Bill Clinton was President in 1995 and presumably again when G.W. Bush was President.

Charlie Reese retired from the Sentinel in 2001. There is an article praising the advent of Obama over G.W. Bush who "was a blunderer" dated Aug., 2008. That would be his final column as far as I can see.

This version, however, presumably dates from 2008 and has appeared only on the web. It's unclear whether it was modified by Charlie Reese. In any case, the whole business about taxes at the end is not from Reese's column.

As to my opinion, Reese is perfectly right, it is the Congress, not the President, who make the laws and set the budget. Thus the deficits are the creation of the Congress (although the President does have to sign the laws that Congress writes). As for taxes, they are the price we pay for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Air Force, federal, state and local roads, bridges, and courts, measures protecting our pharmaceuticals, meats and vegetables, federal, state and local parklands, regulating banks, regulating business in general, industry, state, interstate and international trade, Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security and a host of other things.

If you find taxes a burden and don't want to pay them, say goodbye to the Army, Navy, Marines, etc. your police and firemen, decent roads, honest business dealings, honest banks, health care and Social Security at 65, and say hello to potholes, deteriorating bridges, e coli at every restaurant and super market, etc. etc. It's a pain, but I'll pay, thank you.

And while I'm thanking folks, thanks to those geniuses in the Republican Party who decided to link raising the debt ceiling to cutting the deficit and nearly brought this country to default. Yes, they got their way, and now the nation's credit has been devalued, the market is tanking (so long 401-K!) and the reputation of the United States of America has been so badly damaged that it will take years to rectify it. A perfect example of what Reese was talking about. Ideologues and idiots in Congress (another term for Tea Party and Grover Norquist Republicans) have certainly fixed things for us. And the morons will blame Obama.

Charley Reese has been a journalist for 49 years. He is retiring and this is HIS LAST COLUMN for the Orlando Sentinel. Be sure to read the Tax List at the end.

This is about as clear and easy to understand as it can be. The article below is completely neutral, neither anti-republican or democrat. Charlie Reese, a retired reporter for the Orlando Sentinel, has hit the nail directly on the head, defining clearly who it is that in the final analysis must assume responsibility for the judgments made that impact each one of us every day. It's a short but good read. Worth the time. Worth remembering!

"545 vs. 300,000,000 People" by Charlie Reese, Orlando Sentinel

Apr. 26, 2011 (<http://stocksthatpay.com/?p=19394>)

Politicians are the only people in the world who create problems and then campaign against them.

Have you ever wondered, if both the Democrats and the Republicans are against deficits, WHY do we have deficits?

Have you ever wondered, if all the politicians are against inflation and high taxes, WHY do we have inflation and high taxes?

You and I don't propose a federal budget. The President does.

You and I don't have the Constitutional authority to vote on appropriations. The House of Representatives does.

You and I don't write the tax code, Congress does.

You and I don't set fiscal policy, Congress does.

You and I don't control monetary policy, the Federal Reserve Bank does.

One hundred senators, 435 congressmen, one President, and nine Supreme Court justices equates to 545 human beings out of the 300 million are directly, legally, morally, and individually responsible for the domestic problems that plague this country.

I excluded the members of the Federal Reserve Board because that problem was created by the Congress. In 1913, Congress delegated its Constitutional duty to provide a sound currency to a federally chartered, but private, central bank.

I excluded all the special interests and lobbyists for a sound reason. They have no legal authority. They have no ability to coerce a senator, a congressman, or a President to do one cotton-picking thing.

I don't care if they offer a politician $1 million dollars in cash. The politician has the power to accept or reject it. No matter what the lobbyist promises, it is the legislator's responsibility to determine how he votes.

Those 545 human beings spend much of their energy convincing you that what they did is not their fault. They cooperate in this common con regardless of party.

What separates a politician from a normal human being is an excessive amount of gall. No normal human being would have the gall of a Speaker, who stood up and criticized the President for creating deficits. The President can only propose a budget. He cannot force the Congress to accept it.

The Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, gives sole responsibility to the House of Representatives for originating and approving appropriations and taxes. Who is the speaker of the House now? He is the leader of the majority party. He and fellow House members, not the President, can approve any budget they want. If the President vetoes it, they can pass it over his veto if they agree to.

It seems inconceivable to me that a nation of 300 million cannot replace 545 people who stand convicted—by present facts—of incompetence and irresponsibility. I can't think of a single domestic problem that is not traceable directly to those 545 people. When you fully grasp the plain truth that 545 people exercise the power of the federal government, then it must follow that what exists is what they want to exist.

If the tax code is unfair, it's because they want it unfair.

If the budget is in the red, it's because they want it in the red.

If the Army & Marines are in Iraq and Afghanistan it's because they want them in Iraq and Afghanistan ...

If they do not receive social security but are on an elite retirement plan not available to the people, it's because they want it that way.

There are no insoluble government problems.

Do not let these 545 people shift the blame to bureaucrats, whom they hire and whose jobs they can abolish; to lobbyists, whose gifts and advice they can reject; to regulators, to whom they give the power to regulate and from whom they can take this power. Above all, do not let them con you into the belief that there exists disembodied mystical forces like "the economy," "inflation," or "politics" that prevent them from doing what they take an oath to do.

Those 545 people, and they alone, are responsible.

They and they alone have the power.

They and they alone should be held accountable by the people who are their bosses.

Provided the voters have the gumption to manage their own employees...

We should vote all of them out of office and clean up their mess! What you do with this article now that you have read it... is up to you.

This might be funny if it weren't so true. Be sure to read all the way to the end:

Tax his land, tax his bed, tax the table at which he's fed.
Tax his tractor, tax his mule, teach him taxes are the rule.
Tax his work, tax his pay, he works for peanuts anyway!
Tax his cow, tax his goat, tax his pants, tax his coat.
Tax his ties, tax his shirt, tax his work, tax his dirt. tax his tobacco, tax his drink,
Tax him if he tries to think.
Tax his cigars, tax his beers, if he cries tax his tears, tax his car, tax his gas,

Find other ways to tax his a*s.
Tax all he has then let him know
That you won't be done 'till he has no dough.
When he screams and hollers, then tax him some more.
Tax him till he's good and sore.
Then tax his coffin, tax his grave, tax the sod in which he's laid.
Put these words upon his tomb, 'Taxes drove me to my doom...'
When he's gone, do not relax. It's time to apply the inheritance tax.

Accounts Receivable Tax, Building Permit Tax, CDL license Tax, Cigarette Tax, Corporate Income Tax, Dog License Tax, Excise Taxes, Federal Income Tax, Federal Unemployment Tax (FUTA), Fishing License Tax, Food License Tax, Fuel Permit Tax, Gasoline Tax (currently 44.75 cents per gallon), Gross Receipts Tax, Hunting License Tax, Inheritance Tax, Inventory Tax, IRS Interest Charges IRS Penalties (tax on top of tax), Liquor Tax, Luxury Taxes, Marriage License Tax, Medicare Tax, Personal Property Tax, Property Tax, Real Estate Tax, Service Charge Tax, Social Security Tax, Road Usage Tax, Recreational Vehicle Tax, Sales Tax, School Tax, State Income Tax, State Unemployment Tax (SUTA), Telephone Federal Excise Tax, Telephone Federal Universal Service Fee Tax, Telephone Federal, State and Local Surcharge Taxes, Telephone Minimum Usage Surcharge Tax, Telephone Recurring and Nonrecurring Charges Tax, Telephone State and Local Tax, Telephone Usage Charge Tax, Utility Taxes, Vehicle License Registration Tax, Vehicle Sales Tax, Watercraft Registration Tax, Well Permit Tax, Workers Compensation Tax...

STILL THINK THIS IS FUNNY?

Not one of these taxes existed 100 years ago, & our nation was the most prosperous in the world. We had absolutely no national debt, had the largest middle class in the world, and Mom, if agreed, stayed home to raise the kids.

What in the heck happened? Can you spell 'politicians?'

I hope this goes around the U.S. at least 545 times!!! YOU can help it get there!!! GO AHEAD. . . BE AN AMERICAN!!!

20110808-03	20:49	Dick	Video: Marco Rubio vs. John Kerry on the Debt Crisis
-----------------------------	-------	------	--

Check out the video here:

<http://hotair.com/archives/2011/07/30/video-marco-rubio-vs-john-kerry-on-the-debt-crisis/>

It's long (15 min.) but worth it.

20110808-04	21:05	GaryF	"Poll: Will Anti-Congress Mood Cause Another 'Wave' Election?"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

"Poll: Will Anti-Congress Mood Cause Another 'Wave' Election?" by Susan Page, USA TODAY

Aug. 8, 2011, (http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/2011-08-08-poll-gallup-election_n.htm)

(WASHINGTON) A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds signs that another "wave" election with the potential to dramatically change the capital's political makeup may be building.

President Obama speaks at the State Dining Room of the White House Monday. Only 24% of those surveyed say most members of Congress deserve re-election, the lowest standing since Gallup began asking the question in 1991. Fifty-six percent say their own representative deserves another term, similar to responses just before tumultuous elections in 1994, 2006 and 2010 that changed control of the House or Senate.

And a majority of Americans, 51%, say President Obama doesn't deserve reelection; 47% say he does. In another question, Obama bests an unnamed Republican presidential candidate by 48%-45%, though he remains below the 50% threshold.

"Is there substantial dissatisfaction with the direction of the country, with the way things are, with the people in charge? The answer to that is yes," says Stuart Rothenberg, editor and publisher of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report, who has written about the prospect of a fourth "wave" election in a row. Less clear is whether voters are ready to blame one party or the other.

"These numbers don't say Obama is going to lose," he adds, "but as long as you have a majority of people who are disapproving and you have the president sitting only in the upper 40s, he's still at great risk."

The 2012 election is 15 months away, which is plenty of time for the political landscape to shift. About this time before the 1994 election, when Democrats lost control of the House and Senate, dismay with Congress already was set. But a year before the 2006 election, when Democrats regained control of both houses, incumbents still had somewhat higher support.

If congressional elections were held today, Americans by 49%-45% say they would vote for the Democratic candidate over the Republican. In the GOP contest to challenge Obama, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney continues to lead the field, at 24%, but a potential candidate who hasn't entered the race yet is in second place.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who has been exploring a presidential campaign, ranks behind Romney at 17%. Minnesota Rep. Michele Bachmann, who like Perry appeals to many Tea Party supporters and Christian evangelicals, is fourth at 13%. In third place is Texas Rep. Ron Paul, at 14%. No other Republican candidate breaks into double digits. Former House speaker Newt Gingrich is at 7%, businessman Herman Cain at 4%, former Minnesota governor Tim Pawlenty at 3%, former Utah governor Jon Huntsman at 2%, and former Pennsylvania senator Rick Santorum at 1%.

Perry narrowly leads Romney among Tea Party supporters, 23% to 22%. Bachmann claims 19% of members of the Tea Party movement.

The poll of 1,521 adults, taken Thursday through Sunday, has a margin of error of +/- 4 percentage points.

© 2011 USA TODAY, a division of Gannett Co. Inc.

20110810-01	09:40	Phil	Fw: Social Security 'Information'
-------------	-------	------	-----------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown, but most of it has been debunked by Snopes.com.
<http://www.snopes.com/politics/socialsecurity/changes.asp>. —SteveB]

PLEASE READ THIS. IT IS VERY IMPORTANT THAT YOUNG AND OLD ALIKE REALIZE WHAT HAS HAPPENED AND IS GOING TO HAPPEN & TO AND BE PREPARED TO FIGHT FOR SURVIVAL.

History Lesson On Your Social Security Card

Franklin Roosevelt, a Democrat, introduced the Social Security (FICA) Program. He promised:

1. That participation in the program would be completely voluntary.

No longer voluntary.

2. That the participants would only have to pay 1% of the first $1,400 of their annual incomes into the program.

Now 7.65% on the first $90,000.

3. That the money the participants elected to put into the program would be deductible from their income for tax purposes each year.

No longer tax deductible.

4. That the money the participants put into the independent 'Trust Fund' rather than into the general operating fund, and therefore, would only be used to fund the Social Security Retirement Program, and no other government program.

Under Johnson the money was moved to the general fund and spent.

5. That the annuity payments to the retirees would never be taxed as income.

Under Clinton & Gore up to 85% of your social security can be taxed.

Since many of us have paid into FICA for years and are now receiving a social security check every month — and then finding that we are getting taxed on 85% of the money we paid to the federal government to 'put away' — you may be interested in the following:

Q: Which political party took Social Security from the independent 'Trust Fund' and put it into the general fund so that Congress could spend it?

A: It was Lyndon Johnson and the democratically controlled House and Senate.

Q: Which political party eliminated the income tax deduction for Social Security (FICA) withholding?

A: The Democratic party.

Q: Which political party started taxing Social Security annuities?

A: The Democratic party, with Al Gore casting the 'tie-breaking' deciding vote as President of the Senate, while he was Vice President of the U.S.

AND MY FAVORITE:

Q: Which political party decided to start giving annuity payments to immigrants?

A: That's right! Jimmy Carter and the Democratic Party. Immigrants moved into this country, and at age 65, began to receive Social Security payments! The Democratic party gave these payments to them, even though they never paid a dime into it!

Then, after violating the original contract (FICA), the Democrats turn around and tell you that the Republicans want to take your Social Security away! And the worst part about it is uninformed citizens believe it! If enough people receive this, maybe a seed of awareness will be planted and maybe changes will evolve. Maybe not, some Democrats are awfully sure of what isn't so.

But it's worth a try. How many people can YOU send this to? Actions speak louder than bumper stickers. I love my country, it's myself serving corrupt government I hate.

20110816-01 08:37 SteveB Rick Perry

I feel so much better now, knowing that Gov. Perry is there to solve our problems, just like he did those of Texas. Jeez!

He is just one terrific guy, isn't he?

Too bad for him (besides his other problems) that he's from Bush's state, and so similar on the surface. I don't think anybody wants to be reminded of any of that again.

God, I hope the big lies of this "cowboy" don't work. Amen.

Thank you, God. And, Jesus, this isn't really one of your people, is it? If he is, he sure interprets your teachings strangely, doesn't he? P.S.—Did you really tell him to run, God? But...that would mean...

20110816-02 11:53 Mark Fw: Quote from Cicero
--

Learning curve...

[Source of original email unknown.—SteveB]

"The budget should be balanced, the Treasury should be refilled, public debt should be reduced, the arrogance of officialdom should be tempered and controlled, the assistance to foreign lands should be curtailed lest Rome become bankrupt. People must again learn to work, instead of living on public assistance."—Cicero, 55 BC

SO WHAT HAVE WE LEARNED IN THE LAST 2065 YEARS????? EVIDENTLY, NOTHING!

20110823-01	12:20	Dennis	from The Empire at Dusk & "Has Our Bloated Security Budget Made Us Safer?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Poorer and less safe...

The U.S. military is no longer interested in protecting America. It is interested in feeding itself.

And there's another view of the zombie pentagon. [Second article.—SteveB] excerpt from The Empire at Dusk, by Stephen Glain, Foreign Policy

Aug. 16, 2011, (http://www.foreignpolicy.com/articles/2011/08/16/the_empire_at_dusk)

(American pundits decry the onset of sharp defense cuts, but the Pentagon can't even account for $1 trillion in its own spending. Isn't it time to rein in the beast?)

In its scramble to avoid another legislative gang war over the nation's debt ceiling, Washington is preparing to shake down the Defense Department in the name of deficit reduction. While budget cutters preoccupy themselves with line-item expenditures, they overlook the Pentagon's biggest cost center: empire. The burden of global hegemony, the commitment to project force across every strategic waterway, air corridor, and land bridge, has exhausted the U.S. military and will be even harder to sustain as budget cuts force strategists and logisticians to do more with less. A national discussion about the logic of maintaining huge forward bases, to say nothing of their financial and human costs, is long overdue.

American relations with the world, and increasingly America's security policy at home, have become thoroughly and all but irreparably militarized. The culprits are not the nation's military leaders, though they can be aggressive and cunning interagency operators, but civilian elites who have seen to it that the nation is engaged in a self-perpetuating cycle of low-grade conflict. They have been hiding in plain sight, hyping threats and exaggerating the capabilities and resources of adversaries. They have convinced a plurality of citizens that their best guarantee of security is not peace but war, and they did so with the help of a supine or complicit Congress. Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, U.S. presidents have ordered troops into battle 22 times, compared with 14 times during the Cold War. Not once did they appeal to lawmakers for a declaration of war.

In ancient times, empires exacted tribute from their dependencies. In the age of American hegemony, just the opposite is the case. In return for the global commons, the United States bankrolls a geopolitical welfare state that allows some of its largest beneficiaries to neglect their basic responsibilities as sovereign states and allies...

The price of this deception is vast. If the Pentagon were a corporation, it would be the largest in the world as well as the most sloppily run. Its procurement budget, at a staggering $107 billion in 2010, expands even as the number of deployable warplanes, combat ships, and troops diminishes. To entice lawmakers into approving costly weapons programs, the Pentagon dangles the prospect of jobs in the states and districts of key lawmakers, a costly way of manufacturing but an astute political maneuver. Waste, inefficiency, and political patronage, no stranger to military legislative affairs, get more lavish by the year. In Apr., 2008, the Government Accountability Office found that 95 major Pentagon projects exceeded their original budgets by a total of nearly $300 billion. A year later, it concluded that nothing had changed. In 2009, lawmakers larded the Pentagon's annual budget proposal with nearly $5 billion in programs and weapons it did not request. With arms factories scattered like feeding troughs nationwide, America has become the equivalent of a company town with the Pentagon as primary employer. The making of war, or at least the preparation for it, has become a money center, a business line—a racket, as Marine general and Medal of Honor recipient Smedley Butler put it nearly a century ago.

"Has Our Bloated Security Budget Made Us Safer?" by Chris Hellman, Salon

Aug. 16, 2011, (http://www.salon.com/2011/08/16/national_security_budget_safety/)

(We've spent nearly $8 trillion on counterterrorism since 9/11. It's time to assess the results.)

The killing of Osama Bin Laden did not put cuts in national security spending on the table, but the debt-ceiling debate finally did. And mild as those projected cuts might have been, last week, newly minted Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta was already digging in his heels and decrying the modest potential cost-cutting plans as a "doomsday mechanism" for the military. Pentagon allies on Capitol Hill were similarly raising the alarm as they moved forward with this year's even larger military budget.

None of this should surprise you. As with all addictions, once you're hooked on massive military spending, it's hard to think realistically or ask the obvious questions.

So, at a moment when discussion about cutting military spending is actually on the rise for the first time in years, let me offer some little known basics about the spending spree this country has been on since Sept. 11, 2001, and raise just a few simple questions about what all that money has actually bought Americans. Consider this my contribution to a future 12-step program for national security sobriety.

Let's start with the three basic post-9/11 numbers that Washington's addicts need to know:

1. $5.9 trillion: That's the sum of taxpayer dollars that's gone into the Pentagon's annual "base budget," from 2000 to today. Note that the base budget includes nuclear weapons activities, even though they are overseen by the Department of Energy, but—and this is crucial—not the cost of our wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Nonetheless, even without those war costs, the Pentagon budget managed to grow from $302.9 billion in 2000, to $545.1 billion in 2011. That's a dollar increase of $242.2 billion or an 80 percent jump ($163.6 billion and 44 percent if you adjust for inflation). It's enough to make your head swim, and we're barely started.

2. $1.36 trillion: That's the total cost of the Iraq and Afghan wars by this Sept. 30th, the end of the current fiscal year, including all moneys spent for those wars by the Pentagon, the State Department, the U.S. Agency for International Development, and other federal agencies. Of this, $869 billion will have been for Iraq, $487.6 billion for Afghanistan.

Add up our first two key national security spending numbers and you're already at $7.2 trillion since the Sept. 11th attacks. And even that staggering figure doesn't catch the full extent of Washington spending in these years. So onward to our third number:

3. $636 billion: Most people usually ignore this part of the national security budget and we seldom see any figures for it, but it's the amount, adjusted for inflation, that the U.S. government has spent so far on "homeland security." This isn't an easy figure to arrive at because homeland-security funding flows through literally dozens of federal agencies and not just the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). A mere $16 billion was requested for homeland security in 2001. For 2012, the figure is $71.6 billion, only $37 billion of which will go through DHS. A substantial part, $18.1 billion, will be funneled through—don't be surprised—the Department of Defense, while other agencies like the Department of Health and Human Services ($4.6 billion) and the Department of Justice ($4.1 billion) pick up the slack.

Add those three figures together and you're at the edge of $8 trillion in national security spending for the last decade-plus and perhaps wondering where the nearest group for compulsive-spending addiction meets....

Are we safer?

An Apr., 2010 Heritage Foundation report, "30 Terrorist Plots Foiled: How the System Worked," looked at known incidents where terrorist attacks were actually thwarted and so provides some guidance. The Heritage experts wrote, "Since Sept. 11, 2001, at least 30 planned terrorist attacks have been foiled, all but two of them prevented by law enforcement. The two notable exceptions are the passengers and flight attendants who subdued the 'shoe bomber' in 2001 and the 'underwear bomber' on Christmas Day in 2009."

In other words, in the vast majority of cases, the plots we know about were broken up by "law enforcement" or civilians, in no way aided by the $7.2 trillion that was invested in the military—or in many cases even the $636 billion that went into homeland security. And while most of those cases involved federal authorities, at least three were stopped by local law enforcement action.

In truth, given the current lack of assessment tools, it's virtually impossible for outsiders—and probably insiders as well—to evaluate the effectiveness of this country's many security-related programs. And this stymies our ability to properly determine the allocation of federal resources on the basis of program efficiency and the relative levels of the threats addressed.

So here's one final question that just about no one asks:

Could we be less safe?

It's possible that all that funding, especially the moneys that have gone into our various wars and conflicts, our secret drone campaigns and "black sites," our various forays into Pakistan, Libya, Yemen, Somalia, and other places may actually have made us less safe. Certainly, they have exacerbated existing tensions and created new ones, eroded our standing in some of the most volatile regions of the world, resulted in the deaths of hundreds of thousands and the misery of many more, and made Iraq and Afghanistan, among other places, potential recruiting and training grounds for future generations of insurgents and terrorists. Does anything remain of the international goodwill toward our country that was the one positive legacy of the infamous attacks of Sept. 11, 2001? Unlikely.

(Chris Hellman is a Senior Research Analyst at the National Priorities Project)

20110823-02	16:13	Jim	Fw: Now You're Mad?
-------------	-------	-----	---------------------

Now you're mad... What did you say then?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT!!!! Folks: Let's keep a copy in our pockets for quick reference when speaking with, and sending out emails to friends on the other side.

Now, since Obama's regime, all of a sudden, folks have gotten mad, and want to take America Back...BACK TO WHAT/WHERE is my question????

After the 8 Years of the Bush/Cheney Disaster, Now You Get Mad?

You didn't get mad when the Supreme Court stopped a legal recount and appointed a President.

You didn't get mad when Cheney allowed Energy company officials to dictate Energy policy and push us to invade Iraq.

You didn't get mad when a covert CIA operative got outed.

You didn't get mad when the Patriot Act got passed.

You didn't get mad when we illegally invaded a country that posed no threat to us.

You didn't get mad when we spent over $800 billion (and counting) on said illegal war.

You didn't get mad when Bush borrowed more money from foreign sources than the previous 42 Presidents combined.

You didn't get mad when over $10 billion in cash just disappeared in Iraq. [I think they have since found it. —SteveB]

You didn't get mad when you found out we were torturing people.

You didn't get mad when Bush embraced trade and outsourcing policies that shipped 6 million American jobs out of the country.

You didn't get mad when the government was illegally wiretapping Americans.

You didn't get mad when we didn't catch Bin Laden.

You didn't get mad when Bush rang up 10 trillion dollars in combined budget and current account deficits.

You didn't get mad when you saw the horrible conditions at Walter Reed.

You didn't get mad when we let a major U.S. city, New Orleans, drown.

You didn't get mad when we gave people who had more money than they could spend, the filthy rich, over $1 trillion in tax breaks.

You didn't get mad with the worst 8 years of job creations in several decades.

You didn't get mad when over 200,000 U.S. Citizens lost their lives because they had no health insurance.

You didn't get mad when lack of oversight and regulations from the Bush Administration caused U.S. Citizens to lose $12 trillion in investments, retirement, and home values.

You finally got mad when a black man was elected President and decided that people in America deserved the right to see a doctor if they are sick. Yes, illegal wars, lies, corruption, torture, job losses by the millions, stealing your tax dollars to make the rich richer, and the worst economic disaster since 1929 are all okay with you, but helping fellow Americans who are sick...

Oh, Hell No!! Now you're mad!!!!

20110823-03	18:09	Jim	"Why Is President Obama So Anxious to Cut Social Security?"
-------------	-------	-----	---

Below is an article forwarded by Senator Bernie Sanders that deserves to be read in full instead of spreading false information about Social Security and scaring the sh*t out of people, especially about some proposals to start cutting benefits because of their supposed impact on the deficit because it does not contribute to that. but here is the encouraging part. I highlighted some things in bold most people don't know in the quote.

The determination to cut Social Security is especially strange given the finances of the program. Under the law, Social Security is financed by the designated Social Security tax. It does not contribute to the deficit, since the law prohibits payments from being made if there is not money in the Social Security trust fund. That means that if the trust fund were drained, rather than contributing to the deficit, full benefits would not be paid.

And the date where this could be an issue is still relatively distant. The Congressional Budget Office just released new projections showing that the Social Security trust fund is fully solvent through the year 2038. Even after that date, the program would have enough money to pay 81 percent of scheduled benefits for the rest of the century. The folks who say that there will be nothing there for our children or grandchildren are just making it up or repeating the nonsense promulgated by some political hack.

Furthermore, this gap is not hard to close. Currently, the tax on the wages subject to the tax is capped at $107,000. The upward redistribution of income over the last three decades has caused a large share of wage income to escape taxation, as more money ends up in the pocket of CEOs and Wall Street types than ordinary workers. If all wage income were subject to the tax, then it would leave Social Security fully solvent for its 75-year planning period.

We could also go the route of increasing the tax on ordinary workers to cover the shortfall. After all, part of the story is that people are enjoying longer retirements, even if the wealthy have benefited much more from the increase in longevity than the typical worker. By 2040, average wages are projected to be 45 percent higher than today, adjusting for the impact of inflation. If just 5 percent of the projected wage growth over this period was used to finance Social Security, the program would be fully solvent for the rest of the century.

Again, the whole story is worth reading.

"Why Is President Obama So Anxious to Cut Social Security?" by Dean Baker, Huffington Post

Aug. 23, 2011, (<http://sanders.senate.gov/newsroom/news/?id=5c3160f6-e9fa-41af-a63c-9895a793fbfc>)

On his tour of the Midwest last week, President Obama again indicated his interest in cutting Social Security. He repeated a proposal that his administration first put forward in the debt ceiling negotiations: he wants to cut the annual cost of living adjustment by 0.3 percentage points.

This cut may sound small, but it adds up over time. A person in their 70s who had been getting benefits for ten years would see a reduction of 3 percent. By the time they were in their 80s, the cut would be 6 percent. And if they lived into their 90s, their benefit would be more than 9 percent lower as a result of President Obama's proposal.

For an average retiree who can expect to get benefits for 20 years, President Obama's plan would cut their lifetime Social Security benefits by roughly 3 percent. By comparison, his much feared tax increases on the rich would reduce the after-tax income of someone earning $300,000 a year by just 0.5 percent. In this case, a beneficiary who will be mostly dependent on their Social Security income in retirement will take about six times as large a hit relative to their income under President Obama's plan to cut Social Security than a couple earning $300,000 would from his plan to raise their taxes.

This cut to Social Security seems especially inappropriate since the near retirees who would feel the full impact of this cut have just seen most of their wealth destroyed by the collapse of the housing bubble and the plunge in the stock market. The typical near retiree (ages 55-64) has just $170,000 in net wealth, including the equity in their home.

This means that if they used every last penny in their 401(k) and other savings, they would have just about enough money to pay off the mortgage on a typical home. This would leave them 100 percent dependent on Social Security for their income. And of course, half of near retirees have less than this amount, meaning that they will not even be able to pay off the mortgage on a typical home. But apparently President Obama feels that these people need to make greater sacrifices.

The determination to cut Social Security is especially strange given the finances of the program. Under the law, Social Security is financed by the designated Social Security tax. It does not contribute to the deficit, since the law prohibits payments from being made if there is not money in the Social Security trust fund. That means that if the trust fund were drained, rather than contributing to the deficit, full benefits would not be paid.

And the date where this could be an issue is still relatively distant. The Congressional Budget Office just released new projections showing that the Social Security trust fund is fully solvent through the year 2038. Even after that date, the program would have enough money to pay 81 percent of scheduled benefits for the rest of the century. The folks who say that there will be nothing there for our children or grandchildren are just making it up or repeating the nonsense promulgated by some political hack.

Furthermore, this gap is not hard to close. Currently, the tax on the wages subject to the tax is capped at $107,000. The upward redistribution of income over the last three decades has caused a large share of wage income to escape taxation, as more money ends up in the pocket of CEOs and Wall Street types than ordinary workers. If all wage income were subject to the tax, then it would leave Social Security fully solvent for its 75-year planning period.

We could also go the route of increasing the tax on ordinary workers to cover the shortfall. After all, part of the story is that people are enjoying longer retirements, even if the wealthy have benefited much more from the increase in longevity than the typical worker. By 2040, average wages are projected to be 45 percent higher than today, adjusting for the impact of inflation. If just 5 percent of the projected wage growth over this period was used to finance Social Security, the program would be fully solvent for the rest of the century.

Most people would be surprised to know that 5 percent of the wage growth projected over the next three decades would be sufficient to keep Social Security solvent. After all, there is a well-funded and well-connected industry of people spreading disaster stories about Social Security and its massive deficit.

Many people will be taken aback by the idea of "projected wage growth," after all most workers' wages have been stagnant or falling in recent years. This is true. The projections refer to average wages, which had been rising, at least until the recession.

This brings up the fundamental point. The country has been and is getting richer. The reason that most people do not feel better off is that most of the money has gone to those at the top. Part of the reason is that they have been distracted by nonsense about the crushing burden of Social Security, so they have not paid attention to the policies that put more money in the pockets of the rich. Unfortunately, at the moment, President Obama seems to be working with the distracters.

20110824-01	11:28	Bob	"Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	--------------------------------------

This woman let the cat out of the bag This clip is showing Congresswoman Maxine Waters discussing drilling for new oil reserves. She explains, in a slip of the tongue, what this whole thing is all about.

NOW... What can you say? (notice the reaction of the people around her) This clip is about as blatant as a Liberal can get. What she said was The Truth, accidentally, and notice that when she realized what she revealed to the public and the news media, it stopped her dead in her own tracks for a long moment. BUT it was too late.

Just hope the country wakes up in the 2012 elections!!!!... She leaked out: Obama's Scary Agenda. I don't think it is possible for Too Many Americans to see this video, and I hope you feel the same way. Please send it Far and Wide across America , and send it along as fast as possible. Thanks...

"Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!" by Joe Alberero, SBY News, (with video)

Aug. 23, 2011, (<http://sbynews.blogspot.com/2009/10/whoops-she-let-it-all-slip-out.html>)

Ok people. If you don't want to believe the right wing, crazy, religious conservatives, then believe what the far left liberals and the Obama administration are saying. Maxine Waters, the "liberals liberal", says it in just a few sentences. This clip is showing Congresswoman Maxine Waters discussing drilling for new oil reserves. She explains, in a slip of the tongue, what this whole administration's agenda is all about. Whoops! She let it all slip out!...What can you say...notice the people around her. This clip is about as blatant as a liberal can get.

What she said was accidental, and notice that it stopped her dead in her tracks for a long moment, but it was too late. Looks like the TRUTH came out of her mouth! Notice the lady to the left trying to control her reaction to what Maxine Walters just said.

Hard to lie about it when you see it for yourself in her own words. Just hope the country wakes up in the 2010 elections. Scary agenda. Watch the attached video and you will see the intent of Obama's grand plan and it is not pretty. But luckily, the "congress person" shifted her mouth into gear before engaging her brain and let the cat out of the bag.. I do not think it is possible for too many people to see this video and I hope you feel the same way and will help send it along as fast as possible. They certainly didn't waste any time. Look at GM, Chrysler and the banks. Obama's Socialist government is already taking over. Now, if they can just push Obamacare through, they will have complete control of America!

20110825-01	13:14	SteveG	"Big Government? Obama Has 273,000 Fewer Federal Employees Than Reagan"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Interesting numbers. Democrats are more conservative than Republicans...?

Aug. 24, 2011, (<http://www.politicususa.com/en/big-government-obama-reagan>)

Every single Republican today talks about being a Reagan conservative. This is a conservative that believes in small government, reducing federal spending and ultimately runs a lean and mean government. They talk about this stuff in campaigns, but in practice they failed miserably.

In fact HISTORICALLY, it is has been Democratic presidents who have reduced the size of the federal government. The Republicans have lied to the people so much that I believe the current crop somehow BELIEVES the history as they have been told, rather than researching the facts for themselves. This may be a stretch, but I am trying to give them the benefit of the doubt.

According to the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, which tracks the number of employees per year, the data shows that the "conservatives" for small government are really just big government conservatives. I know that is an oxymoron, but numbers don't lie.

Let's start with President Carter. On Dec. 31st 1976 (Not Carter's term yet), total nonmilitary personnel was 2,883,000. By Dec. 31st 1980 the end of his term (minus a month), the total in nonmilitary personnel was 2,875,000. Federal government nonmilitary employees shrunk by 8,000 employees under Carter.

On Jan. 21st, 1981, President Reagan started with 2,875,000 nonmilitary federal employees. By the end of Reagan's terms the total number of nonmilitary federal employees was 3,113,000. That is an INCREASE of 238,000

Let's move on to President George H.W. Bush. On Jan. 20th, 1989, total federal nonmilitary employment was 3,113,000 by the end of his only term, President George H.W. Bush had 3,083,000 federal nonmilitary employees on the books. That is a REDUCTION of 30,000 employees.

President Bill Clinton came into office with 3,083,000 and by the END of his TWO TERMS he reduced the number of Federal employees to 2,703,000. That is a reduction of 380,000 federal employees.

Now finally, President George W. Bush came into office with 2,703,000 nonmilitary employees and by the time his terms were through, the total nonmilitary federal employees on the books were 2,756,000, which is an INCREASE of 53,000 employees.

The small government, lean and mean political party, seems to be the Democratic Party. President Clinton reduced the size of the federal government's nonmilitary employees by OVER 10%.

The "so called" small government President Reagan INCREASED the nonmilitary size of government by almost 10%.

In fact, Democratic president Bill Clinton reduced the size of the federal government employee size to PRE- REAGAN levels. Clinton left office with 2,703,000 and Reagan started his term in 1981 with 2,875,000

The Reagan conservatives, in fact the entire GOP TODAY are trying to frame President Obama as a big government liberal but again, the numbers don't lie.

By the end of 2010, the United States STILL has less employees on the books than we did back in 1980 even though the population has grown from 226,545,805 to approximately 330,000,000 in 2010.

TOTAL NONMILITARY EMPLOYEES IN 1980 — 2,875,000
TOTAL NONMILITARY EMPLOYEES IN 2010 — 2,840,000

We have 35,000 less nonmilitary employees under President Obama than we had 30 years ago.

So it comes to mind that those who claim to be Reagan small government conservatives and blame Democrats for growing government are either lying to the American people or are themselves willfully ignorant.

AMAZING WORD GAME

Did you know that, the words "race car" spelled backwards still spells "race car"?

And that "eat" is the only word that, if you take the first letter and move it to the last, spells its own past tense, "ate"?

And if you rearrange the letters in "Tea Party Republicans," and add just a few more letters, it spells: "Shut the f*ck up you free-loading, progress-blocking, benefit-grabbing, resource-sucking, violent hypocrites, and deal with the fact that you nearly wrecked the country under Bush and that our President is black, so get over it."

Isn't that interesting?

20110826-02	16:58	Jim	Electile Dysfunction
-----------------------------	-------	-----	----------------------

A new word is born...

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I knew someone would find a name for our election process for this year.

Electile Dysfunction: The inability to become aroused over any of the choices for President put forth by either party in the 2012 election year.

20110826-03	19:06	Dennis	"The Cost of Corporate Communism"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

"The Cost of Corporate Communism" by Dylan Ratigan, Huffington Post

Aug. 23, 2011, (<http://www.dylanratigan.com/2011/08/23/the-cost-of-corporate-communism/>)

Lately I have been using the phrase "Corporate Communism" on my television show. I think it is an especially fitting term when discussing the current landscape in both our banking and health care systems.

As Americans, I believe we reject communism because it historically has allowed a tiny group of people to consolidate complete control over national resources (including people), in the process stifling competition, freedom and choice. It leaves its citizens stagnating under the perpetual broken systems with no natural motivation to innovate, improve services or reduce costs.

Lack of choice, lazy, unresponsive customer service, a culture of exploitation and a small powerbase formed by cronyism and nepotism are the hallmarks of a communist system that steals from its citizenry and a major reason why America spent half a century fighting a Cold War with the U.S.S.R.

And yet today we find ourselves as a country in two distinctly different categories: those who are forced to compete tooth and nail each day to provide value to society in return for income for ourselves and our families and those who would instead use our lawmaking apparatus to help themselves to our tax money and/or to protect themselves from true competition.

If you allow weak, outdated players to take control of the government and change the rules so they are protected from the natural competition and reward systems that have created so many innovations in our country, you not only steal from the citizens on behalf of the least worthy but you also doom them by trapping the capital that would be used to generate new innovation and, most tangibly in our current situation, jobs.

We are losing the opportunity cost of all the great ideas that should be coming from the proper deployment of that $23.7 trillion in capital. Everything from innovation in medical delivery systems to accessible space travel, free energy to the driverless car; all of these things may never come to bear because those powerful individuals who have failed, been passed over by technological advancements, innovation and flat-out smarts, have commandeered our government to unfairly sustain their wealth and power.

Unfortunately, they use our wealth and laws not only to benefit their outdated, failed companies, but also spend a small pittance of their ill-gotten gains lobbying and favor-trading with politicians so the government will continue to protect them from competition and their well-deserved failure.

The massive spike in unemployment, the utter destruction of retirement wealth, the collapse in the value of our homes, the worst recession since the Great Depression have all resulted directly from the abdication of proper government.

Even with all that — the only changes that have been made, have been made to prop up and hide the massive flaws on behalf of those who perpetuated them. Still utterly nothing has been done to disclose the flaws in this system, improve it or rebuild it. Only true rules-based capitalism ensures constant adaptation and implementation of the latest and best practices for a given business, as those businesses that don't adapt fail, and those who deploy the latest innovations to their customers benefit, prosper.

The concept of communism is rightly reviled in this country for the simple reason that it is blind to human nature, allowing a small group of individuals near-total control, while sticking everyone else with the same cr*ppy systems — and the bill. America spent countless lives and half a century fighting against this system of government. So why are we standing for it now?

20110826-04 19:45 Dennis "Why Conservatives Should Be Heard at the Enough Rally"

Conservatives who have had enough are invited....

"Why Conservatives Should Be Heard at the Enough Rally" by Shane Brooks, Wake Up & Stand Up

Aug. 26, 2011, (<http://www.coffeepartyusa.com/brooks-enough-2>)

20110829-01 15:03 Mark Fw: Congressmen Should Wear Uniforms Like NASCAR Drivers

[Source of original email unknown, but I like it! —SteveB]

"I think Congressmen should wear uniforms like NASCAR drivers so we could identify their corporate sponsors."

Found this at the end of a conservative rant against Obamacare.....so I deleted the major part and gleaned this! This is probably something we can all get behind.....

20110830-01 17:50 Jim "Three Charts to Email to Your Right-Wing Brother-In-Law"

Here are some charts that more people need to see concerning the actual numbers and not Fox spin about deficits, jobs, and presidents. Feel free to pass them along to people who prefer facts to rhetoric.

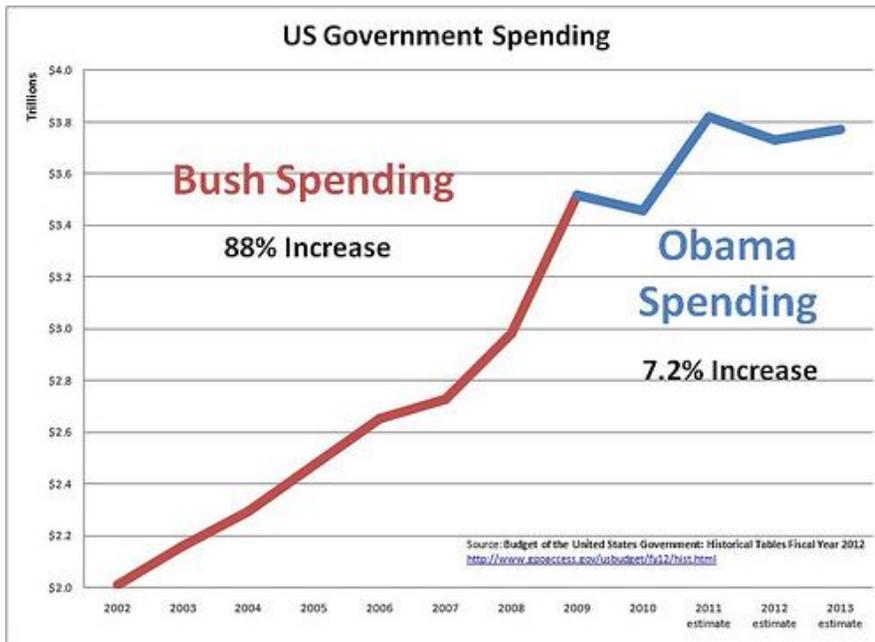

"Three Charts to Email to Your Right-Wing Brother-In-Law" by Dave Johnson, NationOfChange

Aug. 30, 2011, (<http://www.nationofchange.org/three-charts-email-your-right-wing-brother-law-1314715523>)

Problem: Your right-wing brother-in-law is plugged into the FOX-Limbaugh lie machine, and keeps sending you emails about "Obama spending" and "Obama deficits" and how the "Stimulus" just made things worse.

Solution: Here are three "reality-based" charts to send to him. These charts show what actually happened.

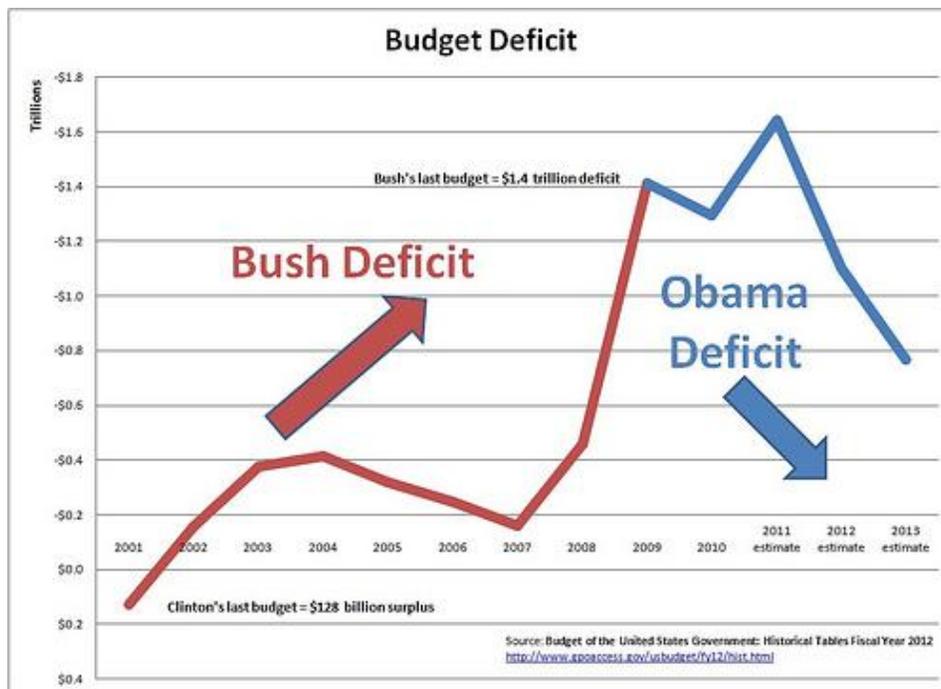

Spending

Government spending increased dramatically under Bush. It has not increased much under Obama. Note that this chart does not reflect any spending cuts resulting from deficit-cutting deals.

Most news sources are funded by corporations and investors. Their goal is to drive people to advertisers while pushing the corporate agenda. NationOfChange is a 501(c)3 organization funded almost 100% from its readers—you! Our only accountability is to the public.

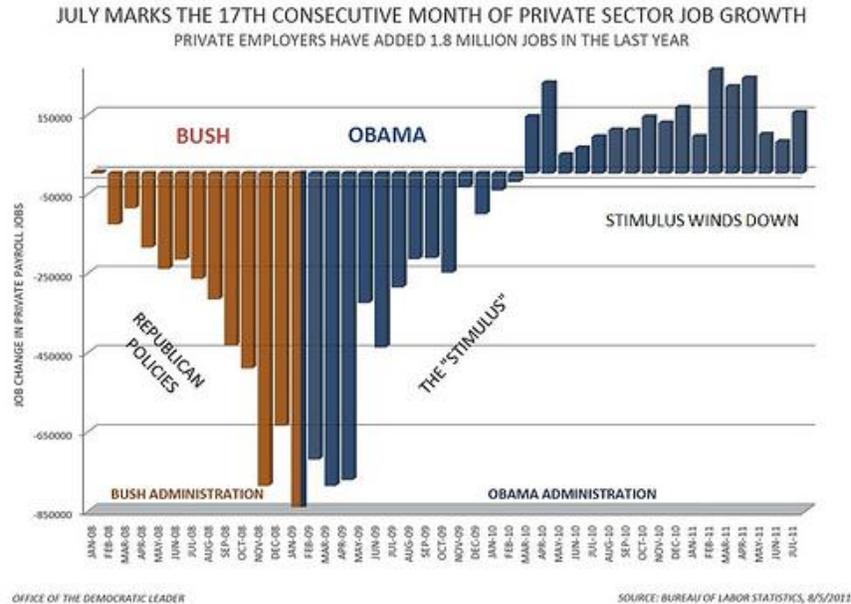

Deficits

Notes, this chart includes Clinton's last budget year for comparison.

The numbers in these two charts come from Budget of the United States Government: Historical Tables Fiscal Year 2012. They are just the amounts that the government spent and borrowed, period. Anyone can go look them up. People who claim that Obama "tripled the deficit" are either misled or are trying to mislead.

The Stimulus and Jobs

In this chart, the RED lines on the left side—the ones that keep doing DOWN—show what happened to jobs under the policies of Bush and the Republicans. We were losing lots and lots of jobs every month, and it was getting worse and worse. The BLUE lines—the ones that just go UP—show what happened to jobs when the stimulus was in effect. We stopped losing jobs and started gaining jobs, and it was getting better and better. The leveling off on the right side of the chart shows what happened as the stimulus started to wind down: job creation leveled off at too low a level.

It looks a lot like the stimulus reversed what was going on before the stimulus.

Conclusion: THE STIMULUS WORKED, BUT WAS NOT ENOUGH!

More False Things

These are just three of the false things that everyone "knows." Some others are (click through): Obama bailed out the banks, businesses will hire if they get tax cuts, health care reform cost $1 trillion, "Social Security is a Ponzi Scheme or is "going broke", government spending "takes money out of the economy."

Why This Matters

These things really matter. We all want to fix the terrible problems the country has. But it is so important to know just what the problems are before you decide how to fix them. Otherwise, the things you do to try to solve those problems might just make them worse. If you get tricked into thinking that Obama has made things worse and that we should go back to what we were doing before Obama—tax cuts for the rich, giving giant corporations and Wall Street everything they want—when those are the things that caused the problems in the first place, then we will be in real trouble.

20110905-01	12:06	Jim	"Humankind's Most Ambitious Science Projects"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---

Big science...

Here is a neat page with ten of the biggest ongoing science projects trying to find out about earth and space. There are links for each one for the curious.

Some lofty price tags for both construction and operations. Most with multination funding.

"Humankind's Most Ambitious Science Projects" by Gregory Mone, Brooke Borel, Katherine Bagley and Jennifer Abbasi, PopSci/MSNBC

July 16, 2011, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/44363598/ns/technology_and_science-future_of_technology/t/humankinds-most-ambitious-science-projects/?gt1=43001)

(Large, expensive instruments are helping man discover whole new worlds.)

To improve our view of a vast and complex universe, scientists are creating increasingly ambitious new tools. The work is not easy. Truly big science requires decades of expensive commitment from multiple nations. But the instruments that result are nearly as awe-inspiring as the new worlds they help us discover.

Like anything that's large and involved, big science is not easy to measure. For our rankings, we took into account four objective factors: the construction costs above all, but also the operating budget, the size of the staff and the physical size of the project itself. Even these were hard to compare on an apples-to-apples basis, though, so we also used a tiering system.

Then we added in three subjective factors, weighing them more heavily to reflect their relative importance: the project's scientific utility, its utility to the average person ("what will it do for me") and the always essential "wow" factor.

10. The Relativistic Heavy Ion Collider

The RHIC, on Long Island, N.Y., smashes gold ions into each other, producing temperatures of up to 7.2 trillion degrees Fahrenheit — so hot that protons and neutrons melt. Why? So scientists can re-create the conditions that existed during the first millionth of a second after the Big Bang.

Read more about the RHIC's time-machine-like abilities here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects>

9. Neptune, the world's largest undersea observatory

A massive ocean observatory network that includes some 530 miles of cable and 130 instruments with 400 sensors, is designed to provide the first large-scale, around-the-clock monitoring of an ocean system. That includes animal life, geology, and chemistry.

Read more about Neptune's battery of networked instruments here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=1>.

8. The Very Large Array

One of the largest telescopes in the world, the VLA has 27 individual radio antennas, each of which is 82 feet in diameter. It needs that kind of muscle to create detailed images of celestial objects as close as the moon — or as far away as the edge of the observable universe.

Read more about the VLA's use to you — like predicting an asteroid strike — here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=2>.

7. The National Ignition Facility

The world's largest and most energetic laser, Livermore, CA's National Ignition Facility stands 10 stories tall and generates 2 million joules of ultraviolet energy. It's capable of reaching temperatures and pressures similar to those found in the cores of stars.

Read more about this ridiculously powerful laser here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=3>

6. Juno, a Jupiter orbiter on a suicide mission

Juno will enter Jupiter's orbit in 2016, but before then, it'll reach speeds of 134,000 miles per hour — one of the fastest human-made objects ever built. It'll make 33 passes around the planet, then commit suicide by diving directly into it, burning up like a meteor in Jupiter's hydrogen atmosphere.

Read more about Juno's noble mission here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=4>.

5. Advanced Light Source

A Berkeley, CA-based particle accelerator, the ALS beams photons a million times as bright as the sun's surface into proteins, battery electrodes, superconductors and other materials to reveal their atomic, molecular and electronic properties. It's helped show the 3-D structure of RNA polymerase enzymes and described the dust from a comet's tail.

Read more about this "ultimate microscope" here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=5>.

4. The International Space Station

What's left to say about the ISS? It costs $2 billion a year and thousands of employees just to keep the lights on, and has supported the longest continuous human presence in space: 11 years this November. It's not just space fun, either: research on the ISS has led to the discovery of salmonella vaccines, too.

Read more about this long-lasting space presence here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=6>.

3. Spallation Neutron Source

A sort of ludicrously powerful movie camera for molecules, the SNS has a particle accelerator that shoots bursts (to the tune of 2 quadrillion neutrons per pulse) into a chamber to reflect off of materials. But it doesn't create explosions; the SNS is better suited to figure out how to create objects like, say, better batteries.

Read more about this neutron accelerator here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=7>.

2. The Large Hadron Collider

Ah, of course, the world's largest particle collider. It costs about $1 billion annually to run, more than 10,000 employees from 60 continents toil on it, and the whole thing is designed to unlock the fundamental physical secrets of the universe. Lately: Does the Higgs boson, commonly referred to as the "God Particle," actually exist?

Read more about the LHC and its quest to learn about dark matter and the origin of the universe here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=8>.

1. The Earthscope

The Earthscope is the world's largest science project. Designed to track North America's geological evolution, this observatory records data over 3.8 million square miles, amassing 67 terabytes of data. It analyzes seismic slips in the San Andreas fault, sure, but also the plume of magma underneath Yellowstone and much, much more.

Read more about the telescope that peers into the heart of our planet here:

<http://www.popsci.com/science/gallery/2011-07/big-science-universes-ten-most-epic-projects?image=9>.

20110906-01	18:06	Dennis	How to Think About Taxes
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

Posted by Jack on Truthout, Sept. 6, 2011: [No link found, Jan. 20, 2012. —SteveB]

To my friends on the right who frequent this blog, before you get your shorts in a knot (and I know you will), let me make a peace keeping proposal.

Here's an idea that serves me well and it may help you with your thinking. When I pay my $20,000 plus in annual income taxes, I just imagine it is my annual contribution to free and reduced lunches for needy kids, food stamps and unemployment benefits for folks who are un or underemployed, disaster relief, Headstart, college loans and grants for needy kids with promise, supplements to the interstate highway system and other infrastructure needs, the national parks, care for the elderly and disabled, veterans' benefits, government agencies and programs to protect the health of our citizens and insure environmental preservation...

You get the idea. This helps me sleep at night. You see, I think THESE are the things that make this nation great. They're things you hate, but I cherish. So, I don't sweat over my tax bill when I realize MY taxes are being used for those things. Remember now, it's my money, and I'm not asking you to spend one cent of yours on any of these endeavors.

Now because, in my mind, I can pretend that's where my money is going, it leaves you to cover paying for subsidies for oil, pharmaceutical and financial corporations, offsetting the tax breaks for each other or maybe just your rich buddies, offsetting the major corporations who pay little to no taxes, costs of waging and perpetuating unjust wars and wars of aggression, increasing the nuclear arsenal, building more prisons, enforcing warrantless law enforcement efforts, completing the wall between us and Mexico, and so on. You know the things you apparently cherish about this country.

After all, you folks attribute our greatness to being able to kick everyone else's a*s. You'll sleep better just knowing every penny of your taxes went into those pots, and are not being wasted caring for the people of the country or the environment. Both of which are evidently dispensable in your mind. Just say to yourself, "I have to pay my taxes, because that Jack is p*ssing away his money on unimportant things." Believe me, in my mind, I won't even try to share the cost of your stuff. I offer this deal to you so you can feel better.

Hey, it's win-win.

20110907-01	10:31	Phil	Re: How to Think About Taxes
-----------------------------	-------	------	------------------------------

Dear Dennis,

OK, I see your point. But here is an idea that serves me well. Let's take out all the waste that goes to the bureaucracy. We don't need thousands of government employees to handle and "skim off" these funds that the feds are receiving before funneling less back to our communities. I have absolutely no problem helping pay for reduced lunches for kids in my community, donating food to those that are unemployed or underemployed through no fault of their own WHO ARE TRULY SEEKING EMPLOYMENT. I have cared for elderly parents and would gladly donate sometimes to people in my community that I know need a helping hand. I have routinely donated for disaster relief. I think veterans' benefits should be increased multi-fold but don't think we need someone collecting a salary of a million dollars to oversee the handling of funds.

Now, because in my mind, I know that my tax dollars are being wasted by almost every governmental program; I know funds that should be used for infrastructure improvements, colleges and universities that act like big business rather than concentrating on providing students with a quality education, elected officials that squander my taxes on "pet" projects that benefit the very few instead of the many etc. etc. therefore, I just have a real problem sending money I earn to Washington for anything other than to protect our freedoms. Look at what the feds did to the Social Security fund, Medicare. Can there be any possible way that it could have been mishandled in a worse way.

So while you may sleep well at night with your misdirected logic, I seethe with the thought of what could be if the scoundrels that are misappropriating our tax dollars would handle our money in an honest and responsible manner. I do not hate the things you cherish, I loathe the fact that government is not more successful in achieving the goals you desire.

20110907-02	15:51	Pam	Re: How to Think About Taxes
-----------------------------	-------	-----	------------------------------

This juxtaposition of views is most interesting. There is obviously intelligence and good will on both sides, but I'd like to suggest a way of thinking about the differences. Too much waste (no statistics), suspicion that the un- or underemployed really prefer living on the dole to gainful employment, higher education becoming corporatized (good point), too much "pork" going to self-interested Congressmen (perhaps a point to be taken seriously), paranoia that the government is out to eliminate our freedom (maybe so, but what are those freedoms exactly? Freedom is such a huge term as to be meaningless). Weigh all that against help for the needy, money for the infrastructure, environmental protection, workplace safety, defense, etc. etc.

There are those who distrust government, as if it were a monolith out to pick our pockets and "nanny" us to death. And there are those who distrust big business (corporations making huge profits) and the financial industry (under-regulated for too long, as we can all see as our portfolios shrink). Just as there are responsible corporations (Whole Foods, for example) and honest bankers, so too there are government agencies that are under-funded but still trying to fulfill their mandates. We all recognize the urgent need for jobs. I have several (well educated) friends who have been looking for full-time work for up to three years. None of them enjoys the position they're in, believe me.

We have descended into a blame game that no one is going to win, not when it relies on snappy quips, bogus information, and fear-mongering on the one hand and platitudes and wishy-washiness on the other.

The debates are a joke, and I find them too painful to watch. Fine rhetoric, no matter how sincerely delivered, will not get the job done. What we need are sound analyses of verifiable facts and reasoned arguments as to why one course of action is better than another. Forget whether it's a liberal or a conservative who's working to convince you. Identity politics are a red herring. Will Obama's jobs bill help the economy and the unemployed? Then let's go for it. If small-business and corporate investment offer the best solutions, then let's support that. I don't care who delivers my mail, so long as it comes consistently and on time. If a single-payer health care system will deliver better care to more people, then let's not get hysterical and call it socialism. "Socialism" is another word like "freedom." Most people throw those terms around with little concern for what they actually mean. They are simply code words for one side or another and are useful mainly to inflame the audience.

What is working in other countries? We don't have to adopt everything Germany is doing, but couldn't we learn SOMETHING from them. Why is our medical system ranked tops when it comes to the latest, most expensive procedures and way down the list when it comes to infant mortality? Ask a Canadian or a Brit whether they'd rather have their own system or ours. Ask a pensioner if she'd rather not collect Social Security. Ask yourself how you can distance yourself from the suffering in our country and the world without recognizing that luck has a lot to do with your current comfort. Ask yourself whether ideas (ideology) are more important than people. And you might want to read Arthur Koestler's "Darkness at Noon" before you answer that.

I'm sick of Mitt Romney apologizing for what is apparently a successful health care program in Massachusetts because it sounds "socialistic." I'm sick of hypocrites who blame the unemployed, care more about image than truth, and buy elections. It's no longer a matter of how many votes you get, but of how much money you can raise, because money buys votes. I am beyond sick of Congress.

Yes, I guess I am a liberal, because I'd rather look for solutions that help people than b*tch about how feckless everyone else is. I assume that government (which WE ELECTED) is our best option for assuring fairness, just as I expect business to care more about profit than about general social welfare. If the private sector can save us, then let's see some results. If it can't, then let's let government help us over the hurdle that has stopped us in our tracks. A bit more pragmatism and a lot less "philosophy" would do us all a world of good.

If you read this far, I thank you. I need to vent—as you can see.

20110907-03	16:45	Mary	Re: How to Think About Taxes
-----------------------------	-------	------	------------------------------

Dear Dennis,

BUT, have you ever worked with welfare recipients? I have. Sad to say that many (sorry, no stats, but enough #s to be significant) ARE complacent and "prefer living on the dole to gainful employment. Much abuse there.

20110907-04	20:45	Mary	Re: How to Think About Taxes
-----------------------------	-------	------	------------------------------

Dear Pam,

I'm not in the mood to vent, so I'll be brief. You make good points...BUT one point you made makes you as guilty as those you attack. I refer to "I have several (well educated) friends who have been looking for full time work for up to three years." None of them enjoys the position they're in, believe me." Yes, we all know people who are suffering from this economy and long for work commensurate with their education. BUT, have you ever worked with welfare recipients? I have. Sad to say that many (sorry, no stats, but enough #s to be significant) ARE complacent and "prefer living on the dole to gainful employment. Much abuse there.

That's all the "vent" I have.

20110908-01 11:51 Jim Fw: A Group of Baboons?

This political joke would apply to both our charming parties, I thought I would forward it for your enjoyment.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

The English language has some wonderfully anthropomorphic collective nouns for the various groups of animals.

We are all familiar with a Herd of cows, a Flock of chickens, a School of fish and a Gaggle of geese. However, less widely known is a Pride of lions, a Murder of crows (as well as their cousins the rooks and ravens), an Exaltation of doves and, presumably because they look so wise, a Parliament of owls. Now consider a group of Baboons. They are the loudest, most dangerous, most obnoxious, most viciously aggressive and least intelligent of all primates. And what is the proper collective noun for a group of baboons?

Believe it or not a Congress!

I guess that pretty much explains things.....!

20110908-02 11:22 Dennis Re: How to Think About Taxes

from Mary:

BUT, have you ever worked with welfare recipients? I have. Sad to say that many (sorry, no stats, but enough #s to be significant) ARE complacent and "prefer living on the dole to gainful employment. Much abuse there.

Dear Mary,

Yes, I too have worked with welfare recipients, both as a social worker in Detroit and later as a photographer for corporate and business publications, such as Forbes magazine. As a social worker I found that there were some "complacent" people on welfare in Detroit, many who had given up on finding employment after years of trying in a city with over 30% employment, and others who had minimal education and the discipline to hold a steady job, in resignation feeling that it just wasn't worth the effort.

In contrast to these poor welfare recipients in Detroit who lacked empowerment, the recipients I encountered as a photographer were highly empowered, employing numerous lobbyists and politicians in Washington to make sure their welfare benefits were bountiful and uninterrupted. These recipients regularly receive tax refunds (even while making millions in profits), enormous subsidies from taxpayer funds (which they progressively contribute less and less to), and apparently (as if they needed more incentives since they are currently sitting on piles of cash) even more tax concessions to be promised tonight from Washington to produce new jobs (even after they have spent years downsizing employees through automation and sending jobs abroad).

Yes, there is much abuse of the system of welfare in America. Socialism, in the unique form that exists in this country, certainly works much better for the rich (consider too, the bailout of the megabanks) than for the poor. Too bad some people are more than willing to overlook the massive abuses by rich recipients while obsessively scapegoating the poor ones.

20110909-01 13:22 Pam Re: How to Think About Taxes

Dear Mary,

Not sure I understand this. Are you saying some welfare recipients are rich and hire lobbyists? Somehow that doesn't compute. You make a good point though: downsizing (to increase efficiency or whatever) and shipping jobs overseas have not put Americans back to work. Republicans want to cut spending, but when you cut govt. spending, people get laid off, adding to the unemployment problem. What are we to do? Seriously. What?

20110911-01 09:00 SteveB Re: How to Think About Taxes

Dear Dennis et al.,

I know I'm a little slow in responding! It's really not that I have had to think about it or anything. It's just that, for a lazy, retired guy, I've been really busy.

I like the humorous idea in this email, but it seems that human nature makes us do the opposite. We love to get p*ssed about our taxes going to what we don't want and probably won't give that up. But the main point is well-taken: the Right seems to hate that it is possible for government to do any good, except to destroy (wars, arrests, wiretaps, walls). Government does do some good, despite at least 50 years of Republican efforts, night and day, to prevent it from doing so, and have, instead, attempted to pervert government into becoming some kind of self-serving cash cow.

Hence our current problems.

On other fronts...it's 9/11 ten years later. I feel so much safer! Let's do more of those Republican things we've done, so we can sink all the way down to Libya's level, or Syria's. I wonder which pattern our government would follow in such a circumstance? Egypt's or Syria's? My bet is that the U.S. government would be the most ruthless of all. Remember Kent State? And that was when times were good and only college students were protesting (fairly mildly)... No one ever went to jail for the murders, if I recall correctly, just as in Libya under Khadafi.

While I'm online...I might as well take this opportunity to fill in the gaps a little. Yes, we're enjoying winter in Bolivia. The weather has been wonderful, if a little hot at times. We're still looking around for just the right restaurant location, but we're being really picky and not really in a hurry, even though the business plan is all set. Meanwhile, I'm treasuring my leisure time and trying to get as much writing done as I can every day. That's my #1 priority right now. I'm also working on a little local business, with others, to produce spice cabinets that I've designed. There really aren't any good ones here, I saw a need, then came into contact with a partner that can help make it happen. I've also got more beef cattle growing up than I've ever had before, but my brother-in-law, Diego, handles all that work very efficiently.

Marci has taken a little (we hope) consulting project. She knows so many people here from years in the gas and oil industry that it's hard for her to avoid working, and it's lucrative enough and she's young enough that it's difficult to resist requests from old friends, but we're trying to keep it to a minimum so we have more time for other things. Saul is heading for Miami next week to spend a year working and getting ready to go back to college, probably in Florida, after that. Thanks to my friend, Rebeca, who's now studying in Japan, I'm now a legal Bolivian immigrant for the next year.

I'll try to get everybody updated on everything else in individual emails in the coming days.

Obama is a traitor to the cause. The Republicans should love him! They should even love Obamacare! It's really more of a Republican than a socialist deal. But...the Republicans still hate Obama because, let's face it, he's black and not a real Christian and maybe not even a real American (though that seems to have finally simmered down a little, at least temporarily).

20110911-02 09:29 SteveB Re: How to Think About Taxes

Dear Mary,

Good to hear from you! So your response to Pam's brilliant, thorough email is that we need to destroy the country because of alleged massive abuse in the welfare system? Sorry. The numbers don't bear this out.

PLEASE! LAZY BROWN AND BLACK PEOPLE ARE NOT OUR PROBLEM! Corrupt politicians and their rich friends are our problem. You don't see any of the rich without jobs! (haha, just kidding).

20110911-03 11:03 SteveB Re: "Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"

Dear Bob,

I don't think I'd spend much time worrying about any socialist plots (despite what the poor, dumb Congresswoman says)....the Democrats are too inept to accomplish any such thing!

Worry more about the fascist plots that have already sold out the American people to the rich and powerful. Why do you think we have illegal aliens instead of jobs, like we used to have? In whose interest is it to have low wages and a surplus of labor in the U.S.? Let me make it simple: the powerful companies or the powerless poor?

20110911-04 21:32 Bob Re: "Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"

Dear SteveB,

The Republicans have taught you to be afraid very well. I doubt you can look at anything without their guiding hand so that the rich can get richer and kill the American Dream.

20110912-01 06:00 SteveB Re: "Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"

Dear Bob,

They have me scared alright! Especially that Rick Perry devil!

20110912-02 21:03 Dick Fw: Reportedly Dumb Traveling Congressmen

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says False. (<http://www.snopes.com/travel/trap/congress.asp>) —SteveB]

The idiots are running the asylum !!!!!!!

A DC airport ticket agent-must read! This is priceless funny stuff; but alas, is only a small indication of how much trouble our country is in. God Bless America! A DC airport ticket agent offers some examples of 'why' our country is in trouble:

1. I had a New Hampshire Congresswoman (Carol Shea-Porter) ask for an aisle seat so that her hair wouldn't get messed up by being near the window. (On an airplane!)
2. I got a call from a Kansas Congressman's (Moore) staffer (Howard Bauleke), who wanted to go to Capetown. I started to explain the length of the flight and the passport information, and then he interrupted me with, "I'm not trying to make you look stupid, but Capetown is in Massachusetts....."Without trying to make him look stupid, I calmly explained, "Cape Cod is in Massachusetts, Capetown is in Africa." His response—click.
3. A senior Vermont Congressman (Bernie Sanders) called, furious about a Florida package we did. I asked what was wrong with the vacation in Orlando. He said he was expecting an ocean-view room. I tried to explain that's not possible, since Orlando is in the middle of the state. He replied, "Don't lie to me, I looked on the map and Florida is a very thin state!" (OMG)
4. I got a call from a lawmaker's wife (Landra Reid) who asked, "Is it possible to see England from Canada?" I said, "No." She said, "But they look so close on the map." (OMG, again!)

5. An aide for a cabinet member (Janet Napolitano) once called and asked if he could rent a car in Dallas. I pulled up the reservation and noticed he had only a 1-hour layover in Dallas. When I asked him why he wanted to rent a car, he said, "I heard Dallas was a big airport, and we will need a car to drive between gates to save time." (Aghhhh)

6. An Illinois Congresswoman (Jan Schakowsky) called last week. She needed to know how it was possible that her flight from Detroit left at 8:30 a.m., and got to Chicago at 8:33 a.m. I explained that Michigan was an hour ahead of Illinois, but she couldn't understand the concept of time zones. Finally, I told her the plane went fast, and she bought that.

7. A New York lawmaker, (Jerrold Nadler) called and asked, "Do airlines put your physical description on your bag so they know whose luggage belongs to whom?" I said, "No, why do you ask?" He replied, "Well, when I checked in with the airline, they put a tag on my luggage that said (FAT), and I'm overweight. I think that's very rude!" After putting him on hold for a minute, while I looked into it. (I was dying laughing.), I came back and explained the city code for Fresno, Ca. is (FAT—Fresno Air Terminal), and the airline was just putting a destination tag on his luggage.

8. A Senator John Kerry aide (Lindsay Ross) called to inquire about a trip package to Hawaii. After going over all the cost info, she asked, "Would it be cheaper to fly to California and then take the train to Hawaii?"

9. I just got off the phone with a freshman Congressman, Bobby Bright from Alabama, who asked, "How do I know which plane to get on?" I asked him what exactly he meant, to which he replied, "I was told my flight number is 823, but none of these planes have that number on them."

10. Senator Dianne Feinstein called and said, "I need to fly to Pepsi-Cola, Florida. Do I have to get on one of those little computer planes?" I asked if she meant fly to Pensacola, FL on a commuter plane. She said, "Yeah, whatever, smarty!"

11. Mary Landrieu, La. Senator called and had a question about the documents she needed in order to fly to China. After a lengthy discussion about passports, I reminded her that she needed a visa. "Oh, no I don't. I've been to China many times and never had to have one of those." I double checked and sure enough, her stay required a visa. When I told her this she said, "Look, I've been to China four times and every time they have accepted my American Express!"

12. A New Jersey Congressman (John Adler) called to make reservations, "I want to go from Chicago to Rhino, New York." I was at a loss for words. Finally, I said, "Are you sure that's the name of the town?" "Yes, what flights do you have?" replied the man. After some searching, I came back with, "I'm sorry, sir, I've looked up every airport code in the country and can't find a "Rhino" anywhere." The man retorted, "Oh, don't be silly! Everyone knows where it is. Check your map!" So I scoured a map of the state of New York and finally offered, "You don't mean Buffalo, do you?" The reply? "Whatever! I knew it was a big animal."

Now you know why the Government is in the shape that it's in! Could anyone be this DUMB? YES, THEY WALK AMONG US, ARE IN POLITICS, AND THEY CONTINUE TO BREED.. I don't write it, I just offer it for your consideration. Like manure, you just gotta spread it around. [You're right. It is kinda like manure, since it's all lies. —SteveB]

20110913-01	08:21	SteveB	Re: Reportedly Dumb Traveling Congressmen
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dick,

God, I hope these aren't true!

20110913-02	20:39	Dick	Fw: Letter from an Airman About Military Pay
-------------	-------	------	--

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says the letter is genuine. (<http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/qipay.asp>)—SteveB]

MILITARY PAY

If you get this more than once, feel honored that you know more than one person who supports our military and appreciates what they do. If you don't forward it, you don't deserve their sacrifice.

CINDY WILLIAMS was appointed by Obama as an Assistant Director for NATIONAL SECURITY in the Congressional Budget Office.

This is an Airman's response to Cindy Williams' editorial piece in the Washington Times [sic, Post.—SteveB] about MILITARY PAY. It should be printed in all newspapers across America.

Ms. Cindy William wrote a piece for the Washington Times [sic, Post.—SteveB] denouncing the pay raise(s) coming service members' way this year citing that she stated a 13% wage increase was more than they deserve.

A young airman from Hill AFB responds to her article below. He ought to get a bonus for this:

Ms. Williams:

I just had the pleasure of reading your column, "Our GI's earn enough" and I am a bit confused. Frankly, I'm wondering where this vaunted overpayment is going, because as far as I can tell, it disappears every month between DFAS (The Defense Finance and Accounting Service) and my bank account. Checking my latest earnings statement I see that I make $1,117.80 before taxes per month. After taxes, I take home $874.20. When I run that through the calculator, I come up with an annual salary of $13,413.60 before taxes, and $10,490.40 after.

I work in the Air Force Network Control Center where I am part of the team responsible for a 5,000 host computer network. I am involved with infrastructure segments, specifically with Cisco Systems equipment. A quick check under jobs for "Network Technicians" in the Washington , D.C. area reveals a position in my career field, requiring three years experience in my job. Amazingly, this job does NOT pay $13,413.60 a year. No, this job is being offered at $70,000 to $80,000 per annum..... I'm sure you can draw the obvious conclusions.

Given the tenor of your column, I would assume that you NEVER had the pleasure of serving your country in her armed forces. Before you take it upon yourself to once more castigate congressional and DOD leadership for attempting to get the families in the military's lowest pay brackets off of WIC and food stamps, I suggest that you join a group of deploying soldiers headed for AFGHANISTAN ; I leave the choice of service branch up to you. Whatever choice you make though, opt for the SIX month rotation: it will guarantee you the longest possible time away from your family and friends, thus giving you full "deployment experience."

As your group prepares to board the plane, make sure to note the spouses and children who are saying good-bye to their loved ones. Also take care to note that several families are still unsure of how they'll be able to make ends meet while the primary breadwinner is gone. Obviously they've been squandering the "vast" piles of cash the government has been giving them.

Try to deploy over a major holiday; Christmas and Thanksgiving are perennial favorites.. And when you're actually over there, sitting in a foxhole, shivering against the cold desert night, and the flight sergeant tells you that there aren't enough people on shift to relieve you for chow, remember this: trade whatever MRE's (meal-ready-to-eat) you manage to get for the tuna noodle casserole or cheese tortellini, and add Tabasco to everything. This gives some flavor.

Talk to your loved ones as often as you are permitted; it won't be nearly long enough or often enough, but take what you can get and be thankful for it. You may have picked up on the fact that I disagree with most of the points you present in your open piece.

But, tomorrow from KABUL, I will defend to the death your right to say it.

You see, I am an American fighting man, a guarantor of your First Amendment right and every other right you cherish...On a daily basis, my brother and sister soldiers worldwide ensure that you and people like you can thumb your collective noses at us, all on a salary that is nothing short of pitiful and under conditions that would make most people cringe. We hemorrhage our best and brightest into the private sector because we can't offer the stability and pay of civilian companies.

And you, Ms. Williams, have the gall to say that we make more than we deserve?

A1C Michael Bragg, Hill AFB, AFNCC

IF YOU AGREE, PLEASE PASS THIS ALONG TO AS MANY PEOPLE AS POSSIBLE AND SHOW YOUR SUPPORT OF THE AMERICAN FIGHTING MEN AND WOMEN.

20110914-01 11:08 Phil Why S&P Downgraded the U.S.

This puts it in a good perspective. Enjoy...

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Why S&P downgraded the U.S.—this puts it in perspective...

U.S. Tax revenue:	$2,170,000,000,000
Fed budget:	$3,820,000,000,000
New debt:	$1,650,000,000,000
National debt:	$14,271,000,000,000
Recent budget cuts:	$38,500,000,000

Let's remove 8 zeros and pretend it's a household budget: [divided by 10,000,000. —SteveB]

Annual family income:	$21,700
Money the family spent:	$38,200
New debt on the credit card:	$16,500
Outstanding balance on the credit card:	$142,710
Total budget cuts:	$385

Understand those deep cuts now?

20110914-02 13:57 Dennis Re: Why S&P Downgraded the U.S.

from Phil:

Annual family income: $21,700

Dear Phil,

Here's the problem. People need a lot more family income to make it in the good U.S. of A. these days. No one can live like middle class Americans on a piddling third world salary.

20110914-03 21:05 Dick Fw: 1% Tax on All Bank Transactions—HR-4646

[Source of original email unknown. Sorry, Dick, but Snopes.com blew this out of the water!
<http://www.snopes.com/politics/taxes/debtfree.asp>. —SteveB]

Is this for real? Please pass on:

Watch for this AFTER November elections; remember this BEFORE you VOTE in case you think Obama's looking out for your best interest.

1% tax on all bank transactions (HR 4646)

This government just cannot think of enough ways to hurt the American people! This Bill must die FORWARD THIS TO EVERYONE YOU KNOW! NEW OBAMA TAX SLIPPED IN WHILE WE WERE ASLEEP.

Checked this on snopes, it's true! [see above,—SteveB] Check out HR 4646. (see below copied from Snopes) [which says it isn't at all as represented here. —SteveB]

President Obama's finance team is recommending a one percent (1%) transaction fee (TAX). Obama's plan is to sneak it in after the November elections to keep it under the radar.

This is a 1% tax on all transactions at any financial institution—banks, credit unions, savings and loans, etc. Any deposit you make, or even a transfer within your account, will have a 1% tax charged.

If your paycheck or your social security or whatever is direct deposit, it will get a 1% tax charged for the transaction.

If your paycheck is $1000, then you will pay Obama $10 just for the privilege of depositing your paycheck in your bank. Even if you hand carry your paycheck or any check into your bank for a deposit, 1% tax will be charged.

You receive a $5,000 stock dividend from your broker, Obama takes $50 just to allow you to deposit that check in the bank.

If you take $1,000 cash to deposit at your bank, 1% tax will be charged.

Mind you, this is from the man who promised that, if you make under $250,000 per year, you will not see on e penny of new tax. Keep your eyes and ears open, you will be amazed at what you learn about this guy's under-the-table moves to increase the number of ways you are taxed.

Oh, and by the way, you receive a refund from the IRS next year and you have it direct deposited or you walk in to deposit that check, you guessed it.. You will pay a 1% charge of that money just for putting it in your bank. Remember, any money, cash, check or whatever, no matter where it came from, you will pay a 1% fee if you put it in the bank. Some will say, oh well, it's just 1%. Are you kidding me? It's a 1% tax increase across the board. Remember, once the tax is there, they can also raise it at will. And if anyone protests, they will just say, "oh, that's not really a tax, it's a user fee"! Think this is no big deal? Go back and look at the transactions you made from last year's banking statements. Then add the total of all those transactions and deduct 1%.

Still think it's no big deal??? Do not let them do this to us Americans!!!

20110916-01

19:54

Dennis

excerpt from Between Race and Reason: Anti-Intellectualism in American Life

Interesting article with several good follow-up comments.....

excerpt from Between Race and Reason: Anti-Intellectualism in American Life, by: Susan Searls Giroux, Stanford University Press

Sept. 16, 2011, (<http://www.truth-out.org/between-race-and-reason-anti-intellectualism-american-life/1314634662>)

In late Oct., 2008, just days before the U.S. presidential election, George Monbiot of London's The Guardian, caught perhaps in a mood of deepening anxiety and dread over the impending outcome, leveled an indictment against the American government and at least half of the electorate in the form of a question: "How did politics in the U.S. come to be dominated by people who make a virtue out of ignorance?" In a rather unkind primatological allusion, he invoked as evidence the eight-year reign of George W. Bush, the recent vogue of Sarah Palin—and before her, Dan Quayle, apparently to round out the VP wing of "gibbering numbskulls" past and present—as well as the "screaming ignoramuses" in attendance at Republican rallies who insisted that Barack Obama was both a Muslim and a terrorist.

"Like most people on my side of the Atlantic," he ventured, "I have for many years been mystified by American politics. The U.S. has the world's best universities and attracts the world's finest minds. It dominates in discoveries in science and medicine. Its wealth and power depend on the application of knowledge. Yet, uniquely among the developed nations learning is a grave political disadvantage."¹ A troubling observation to be sure. How exactly does one make sense of, let alone respond to, such an astonishing contradiction, such an ungenerous play on the concept of American exceptionalism? There are, of course, a number of possibilities.

1. Denial: reduce the charge to a hiccup of European arrogance tinged with a bit of resentment.
2. Dismissal: declaim as cynical the blanket condemnation of ineptitude among government officials and the fools who elected them.
3. Deflection: assert that the election results—and the resounding defeat handed to the McCain-Palin campaign, which ran primarily on emotional appeals to fear and patriotic fervor—vindicate the good sense of the voters and render Monbiot's judgment too quick. It would be tempting to answer "
4. All of the above" and continue to bask in the warm afterglow of the Obama victory and the ensuing worldwide celebration that marked the end of the Bush era. But, alas, we are not saved.

Indeed the pre-election antics appeared in hindsight little more than an opening prelude to the "delirium," as The Economist termed it, of the summer of 2009 debates on health care; the furor over the president's "indoctrination" of school children; the growing momentum of the "birthers," unchecked by repeated proof against their claims; and other crazed conspiracy theorists who showed up at town hall meetings armed to the teeth, leaving many to wonder why the nation surrendered public debate over the most pressing political issues of our time (to say nothing of media coverage) to the most extreme and unstable elements of the far right.² Even the esteemed journalist Bill Moyers, deeply unsettled by current events, couldn't resist a bit of uncharacteristic sarcasm: "So here we are, wallowing in our dysfunction. Governed—if you listen to the rabble rousers—by a black nationalist from Kenya smuggled into the United States to kill Sarah Palin's baby."³ The peculiar degradation of these three fundamentals of a substantive democracy—informed and judicious political discourse, intelligence, and education—in contemporary American politics to which Monbiot and others refer has had a long and storied career, extending back to the early days of the republic. The subject was given unparalleled examination in Richard Hofstadter's Pulitzer-prize winning volume, Anti-Intellectualism in American Life, published in 1963. It is important to note, however, that for Hofstadter anti-intellectuals are neither the "gibbering numbskulls" nor the "screaming ignoramuses" that Monbiot and a growing chorus of journalists, scholars, and others criticize. Rather, Hofstadter viewed them as a far more effective enemy to the educated mind and to a vibrant, democratic political culture, which requires for its very survival an abiding commitment on the part of its citizenry to critical thought, moral judgment, the capacity for self-reflection, and an acute awareness of self-limitation. Neither uneducated nor unintellectual, anti-intellectuals constitute the ranks of the "half-educated," men and women who are "deeply engaged with ideas, often obsessively engaged with this or that outworn or rejected idea."⁴

Hofstadter describes them as hardly indifferent or hostile to the life of the mind, but as "marginal intellectuals, would-be intellectuals, unfrocked or embittered intellectuals, the literate leaders of the semi-literate, full of seriousness and high purpose about the causes that bring them to the attention of the world."⁵ Indeed, he notes, even the most rigorous thinkers are not immune to anti-intellectual moments. Writing in the immediate aftermath of McCarthy era, he locates among the anti-intellectual vanguard the following: highly intelligent and articulate evangelical ministers; religious fundamentalists of various sorts; politicians who inflamed populist and nationalist sentiment (including, he notes, some of the shrewdest); businessmen and other self-appointed spokespersons for practicality, utilitarianism, and free enterprise; right-wing editors with strong intellectual pretensions; anti-Communist pundits; and for that matter, Communist leaders, who held intellectuals in high suspicion, if not contempt. What such a disparate assemblage of characters share is a kind of militancy fueled by a severe, fundamentalist morality; he calls them "one hundred per centers," who brook no ambiguities, doubts, equivocations, reservations, and certainly no criticism. Such rigidity they consider evidence of their own toughness and strength—as well as, revealingly, a testament to their masculinity.⁶

Following Hofstadter's logic into the present moment, we would add to these ranks latter-day market fundamentalists, such as Jim Cramer and other disciples of the brilliant and tragically myopic Milton Freedman, and their powerful and embittered friends in the conservative movement, such as the peerless Grover Norquist and Karl Rove, Bush's reputed brain; the intellectual denizens of highly partisan think tanks, from the American Heritage Institute to the Heritage, Olin, Schaffie, and Coors foundations, like Charles Murray; as well as their learned counterparts in the academy, like Lawrence Mead or Samuel Huntington; the various crusaders of the Christian right, like Pat Robertson, who called for the assassination of a world leader, and others who rail against science and the rights of women and gays such as Bill McCartney, the founder of the Promise Keepers; demagogic populists like Patrick Buchanan and Rush Limbaugh; jingoistic patriots inspired by Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay; and the impassioned, often inflammatory anti-immigration and anti-terrorist politicians and media pundits, of whom there are far too many, such as Tom Tancredo, Thelma Drake, Bill

O'Reilly, Ann Coulter, Lou Dobbs, Glenn Beck. And we would acknowledge, as we do so, the continuing draw of masculinist posturing for both men and women. For nearly four decades, these "leaders of the semi-literate" have assisted in the transformation not only of all three branches of government but of the political culture of the nation as well, swaying the voting public through base appeals to our deepest insecurities and fears, most typically expressed and circulated through racially charged representational codes. In apocalyptic tones, they warned that "traditional American values" and "our American way of life" were on the brink of collapse as a result of some marauding horde—thugged-out young black men, welfare queens, overpopulating Latinos, illegal immigrants, radical Jihadists, or "gay married terrorists" (in economist Paul Krugman's satiric phrase). And most Americans went along for the ride. Even those who didn't buy the coded rhetoric (even as they enjoyed the privileges of a still-uneven playing field) complacently went about their lives, feasting on too-easy credit, flipping houses, or fixating on celebrity culture until all the consumer bubbles finally broke. Though the candidate who stood for change, for a restoration of democratic principle against a rising tide of fundamentalisms—market, military, religious—won the 2008 election by a respectable but not overwhelming margin, the legacy of the last forty years of conservative counterrevolution did not magically disappear after Inauguration Day.⁷

Nearly a half-century after it was written, Hofstadter's erudite volume remains essential reading for those troubled by the effects of anti-intellectualism, and the various fundamentalisms that inspire and inflame it, on democratic public life and political culture. In fact, his uncompromising analysis of the political climate in which Thomas Jefferson ran for president in the infamous 1800 election—an election that also signaled a revolutionary shift in the political direction of the nation—is particularly instructive in light of the 2008 campaign, which uncannily recapitulated many of the same themes. Jefferson was the first distinguished victim of a decisively anti-intellectual attack, and the assault on him (leveled principally by Federalist leaders and members of the established clergy) set a precedent for subsequent efforts to render an active, curious mind either trivial and ridiculous or evil and dangerous. The echoes of such efforts to sway the electorate on principles that violate reason, reflection, evidence, and judgment are heard to this day: intellect makes "men" timid and ineffectual; they are likely to vacillate rather than to act boldly in the face of crisis; their intellectual pursuits produce in general a suspicion of, or a hostility to, Christianity; and they are committed to abstract, radical, or even "foreign" ideas over the quintessential American values of God and country.

The capacity for reflective, creative, and critical thought, finely honed argumentation, and public persuasion—talents one might otherwise assume well recommend a candidate for the office of president—were transformed into the gravest of liabilities. Jefferson's critics assailed his philosophical training and literary talents, which they insisted made him unfit for practical tasks. Their eager acknowledgment of the elegance of his rhetorical style provided only further proof of the man's lack of political substance. Said one South Carolina congressman, William Loughton Smith:

The characteristic traits of a philosopher, when he turns politician, are, timidity, whimsicalness, and a disposition to reason from certain principles, and not from the true nature of man; a proneness to predicate all his measures on certain abstract theories, formed in the recess of his cabinet, and not on the existing state of things and circumstances; an inertness of mind, as applied to governmental policy, *a wavering of disposition when great and sudden emergencies demand promptness of decision and energy of action.*⁸

Thought, according to those suspicious of a critical and contemplative mind, inevitably got in the way of action. In addition to these offenses, Jefferson also stood accused of a lack of experience, particularly military experience—the very ingredient which had made his esteemed predecessor, George Washington, a patriot, a man of great character, and an effective, no-nonsense leader. Smith, contriving to portray Jefferson's astonishing and wide-ranging intellectual abilities as trivial and ridiculous, mocked his scientific interests and his inventiveness as "impaling butterflies and insects, and contriving turn-about chairs" adding that such merits "might entitle him to the Professorship of a college" but were utterly incompatible with the duties of the presidency and the command of the Western Army.⁹

Such charges should sound strangely familiar. Barack Obama's reflective capacities and rhetorical strengths have been frequently acknowledged by his opponents, who, interestingly enough, hailed from similar quarters: the religious right and Republican descendants of Federalist persuasion. But the praise, like that heaped on Jefferson, primarily served to underscore allegations of inexperience and unbridled idealism. Like its distant predecessor, the election of 2008 was framed as a choice between military experience and character—the strength of which seemed to rest on an ex-soldier's patriotic zeal and plain speech, on the one hand, and change—in the figure of a young cosmopolitan and former University of Chicago professor of law who represented new ideas, gifted oratory, and hope—on the other. Then, as now, when the bad news befalls the White House—whether by messenger on horseback or emergency phone call—at three o'clock in the morning, Americans are prompted to vote for a man of action, not intelligence, which is derided as inevitably naïve, "timid," "abstract," or "wavering." Whereas the former law professor was said to lack any military experience and have negligible foreign policy credentials, McCain emphasized his war record, his heroism, his endurance, as vouchsafed by his five-year imprisonment in a Viet Cong POW camp, and above all his patriotism.

Appeals to practicality and patriotism were not the only rhetorical weapons in the arsenal of Jefferson's opponents—or Obama's. Hofstadter regales his readers with various efforts to paint Jefferson as a dangerous scourge without faith or morals. His learning and speculation, it was said, made an atheist of Jefferson; he had not only challenged theologians about the age of the earth but opposed having school children read the Bible—vagaries that made him a threat to religion and society. Further proof of his alleged immorality was offered in a litany of accusations: that he was a coward during the Revolutionary War, that he started the French Revolution, that he harbored a secret ambition to become a dictator, another Bonaparte. And strikingly, though Hofstadter makes only a passing reference to the charge, the integrity of this white, patrician male was tainted by an association with race: it was asserted that he "kept a slave wench and sired mulattoes," a dishonor less to his wife than to his white blood—thus, according to the racial reasoning of the time, proof of moral depravity.

Obama was subject to similar demagogic efforts throughout the seemingly interminable two-year campaign cycle. While McCain played the role of the valiant soldier and patriot, Obama stood accused of "palling around with terrorists" like University of Illinois at Chicago professor Bill Ayers and other subversive intellectuals (a redundancy for conservatives).

Moreover, Obama's Christianity was called into question repeatedly with insinuations of his secret Muslim faith, as if the espousal of such doctrines were adequate grounds to disqualify him immediately from political office. Indeed, it was Sarah Palin's very religiosity—in addition to other perceived assets including her folksy demeanor, her status as mother of five, her fascination with guns, and not so implicitly her whiteness as mirrored in the clean, white snows of the Alaskan wilderness—that made this contemporary Annie Oakley such an appealing vice presidential pick for the McCain team. She embraced the very commitments and values of the Republicans' most stalwart constituency: the Christian right. In contrast, much was made of Obama's middle name, "Hussein," which was chanted over and over again at Republican rallies, betraying similar efforts to associate him with the dangerous Middle Eastern dictator, if not quite claiming, as in Jefferson's case, that he aspired to become a despot. (That accusation, of course, would come within Obama's first six months of office, when during the summer of 2009, angry constituents at town hall meetings would tout images of the president with a Hitler moustache or feature him on placards with Stalin, Mao, or Che Guevara.) Such charges performed a double duty for the Obama's critics, casting "Barack Hussein Obama" as not only a threat to all Christians, but beyond the pale of whiteness, both as a man of African descent and as an alleged Muslim, a category that increasingly carries both religious and ethno-racial "civilizational" implication.

Just as Jefferson's intellectual disposition, his sensibilities, his tastes were pilloried as "foreign," a clear precursor to contemporary tactics designed to generate fear toward those characterized as "not American," Barack Obama was consistently characterized as alien. Of Jefferson, one Federalist pamphleteer claimed: "It was in France, where he resided nearly seven years, and until the revolution had made some progress, that his disposition to theory, and his skepticism in religion, morals, and government, acquired full strength and vigor. Mr. Jefferson is known to be a theorist in politics, as well as in philosophy and morals. He is a philosophe in the modern French sense of the word."¹⁰

The anti-intellectual rejection of the candidate as a "theorist" and a "philosophe" anticipates accusations of anti-Americanism hurled at contemporary intellectuals, particularly those critical of the Bush administration, even as the charge ironically depicts thinking as a foreign, even subversive activity. Obama was not only educated in various regions of the world including Indonesia, Africa and the United States, but he was also of mixed-race heritage. Most definitely, it was implied, where not emphatically stated, he was "not one of us."¹¹ Of course, like Jefferson, Barack Obama did win the presidential election; but the rather shocking figure of the fifty-eight million (46 percent of the popular) votes cast for the McCain-Palin ticket, despite its many allegiances to the utterly corrupt and generally despised Bush administration, should give us pause. This brief engagement with the Jeffersonian legacy is all the more revealing for the decidedly ironic way in which Jefferson, and much of the iconography of the American Revolution, has been appropriated by the far right in post-election America—from "tea parties," to the incessant appearance of the Gladstone flag and other militia flags featuring rattlesnakes and often accompanied by the slogan, "Don't Tread on Me," to the "patriot movement" (and its various calls for revolution, succession, and state sovereignty), which has made Jefferson's quip that "the tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of tyrants and patriots" its rallying cry.

Historically speaking, the suspicion of intellect has for centuries spawned a variety of anti-intellectual commitments—the fetishization of folksiness, the cult of efficiency and practicality, jingoistic patriotism, militarized masculinity, and religious fervor. Whereas in the era in which Hofstadter wrote it was still possible to equate mainstream intellectual culture with the culture of liberalism, this is no longer the case. The below-the-radar conservative counter-revolution begun in the late 1960s, coterminous with a highly visible repressive law-and-order crackdown on various civil rights and anti-war protesters, and eventually displaced the liberal hegemony of mid-century America, as its advocates exploited and intensified the anti-intellectualism of the culture. The consequence of this ascendancy has been a crisis of liberal ideals and democratic values, of the very possibility of politics, which has generated a cottage industry of similarly themed tomes that commence where Hofstadter's probing analysis left off.

However, questions remain about whether the presumption that Obama's presidency commences an officially "post-racial" and "post-partisan" period of American politics will continue to hold true, providing yet another kind of dubious departure from reality and reason. To be sure the George W. Bush administration, if unsurpassed in the degree of its commitment to anti-intellectualism, was certainly not alone in its willingness to deceive and manipulate everyday "folks." Over the past century, there have been political leaders—Franklin Roosevelt, John Kennedy, and Bill Clinton—who successfully tempered their intelligence, invoked a colloquial idiom, claimed an affinity for common values and tastes (Bill and his Big Mac attacks) and survived. Others who were less adept—Adlai Stevenson, Al Gore, John Kerry—simply perished, as their opponents effectively labeled them as too cerebral, too elite, if not also effete, for effective leadership. While it is true that on the campaign trail, Obama exemplified thoughtfulness and circumspection and spoke with eloquence and dignity, he also proved adept at staying connected with the everyday, playing hoops with his mates from high school the morning of the election, assuaging the fears of children who faced a daunting move with the promise of a puppy.

In the service of heightening such "exuberant identification" (as Judith Butler describes it) with Obama's leadership, a few items are missing from the presidential agenda altogether, and their absence weighs heavily against soaring hopes for genuine democratic renewal. Successive bailouts for financials and other industries have proven unhelpful for everyday citizens—and particularly citizens of color—facing alarming levels of unemployment, impoverishment, and home foreclosure. Yet Obama has chosen to abet the nation's collective refusal to discuss race and, more emphatically, racial injustice—his one speech on the subject notwithstanding.

Yet at no other time have we been more in need of a critically engaged, creative, and thoughtful citizenry who can face with courage and conviction the challenges—political, economic, ecological, spiritual—that we face both nationally and internationally. Obama is a product of this elite system and will not push against its interests, unless compelled by an informed and active citizenry. "Obama used hundreds of millions of dollars in campaign funds to appeal to and manipulate this illiteracy and irrationalism to his advantage," observes Hedges.¹² And indeed the electorate was invited to focus increasingly on the person of this potential leader—his eloquence, his gravity, his unflinching cool, even his jump shot—and a compelling personal narrative that simultaneously invoked the triumphalism of America's beloved immigration mythology and offered a redemptive conclusion to its most egregious racial sins. However, Hedges warns that "these forces will prove to be his most deadly nemesis once they collide with the awful reality that awaits us."¹³

I suspect Hedges is largely correct in his assessment. Yet we cannot accept that our capacity to think, our educational system, and with it American democracy itself, have reached a terminal stage. And it is because I reject these premises that I argue strongly for academics, administrators, teachers, intellectuals, and others to assume their responsibilities as educators who play a vital role in molding citizens who can actively and critically participate in democratic public life. Hedges is undoubtedly right about one thing. The electorate is fast headed on that collision course with the reality that the Bush administration sought and that it apparently managed to repress for so long. As Obama himself acknowledged in his Inauguration Day speech, few presidents have taken the oath of office under conditions quite so devastating.

Perhaps for this reason, ultimately, he has been compared to former presidents Abraham Lincoln, also a one-term senator from Illinois who confronted a nation ravaged by civil war; Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who led America through the Great Depression and Second World War; and John Fitzgerald Kennedy, the civil rights-era commander in chief who inspired America with his youthful idealism and his sense of hope. But it is also for this reason that I've gone even further back in American history and invoked the legacy of Thomas Jefferson, who also served in the country's highest office in turbulent times, who like Obama would lead the nation through the convulsions of revolutionary change. Jefferson witnessed a political revolution in France and then in the United States, and was able, as a result of those who fought and died for their country, for its ideals of life, liberty, and equality, to ascend to the position of president of a new nation divided in its search for the way forward. Moreover, he was to serve while Western nations were experiencing yet another, equally profound revolution in economic development; he was a plantation owner and adherent of an agrarian way of life that was about to give way to new forces of industrialization, which would transform the country in ways quite unknown and unimaginable. And there was the fact of slavery, America's original sin, about which he wrote most eloquently and ambivalently.

In order to meet all of these political, economic, and spiritual challenges, the nation's third president understood all too well the necessity of an educated citizenry. Having survived his own bitter and contentious political campaign, Jefferson had witnessed first-hand the nefarious and—as we have seen—cataclysmic danger that anti-intellectual, populist demagoguery poses for a democratic nation. Surely it was this complex set of conditions and experiences that inspired his radical educational thought, for it was Jefferson who was one of the first to put forth a multi-tiered plan for free and universal public education as the primary means of safeguarding a young and fragile democratic nation. And it is this legacy that seems to me to offer the most important lessons for the Obama administration, and for those anxious to serve the country in its current state of multiple crises. For Jefferson, education was the primary means of producing the kind of critically informed and active citizenry necessary to both nurture and sustain a vibrant public sphere; he believed that democracy was the highest form of political organization for any nation because it provided the conditions for its citizens to grow both intellectually and morally through the exercise of these faculties. Consider this passage from Jefferson's moving preamble to the 1776 "Bill for the More General Diffusion of Knowledge," which bears the hallmark of his views on the relationship between education and public life:

Whereas certain forms of government are better calculated than others to protect individuals in the free exercise of their natural rights experience hath shewn, that even under the best forms, those entrusted with power have perverted it into tyranny; and it is believed that the most effectual means of preventing this would be, to illuminate, as far as practicable, the minds of the people at large; And whereas it is generally true that people will be happiest whose laws are best, and are best administered, and that laws will be wisely formed, and honestly administered, in proportion as those who form and administer them are wise and honest.¹⁴

Jefferson made education central to his philosophical thought and political commitments; it proved the best means for both preserving the natural rights of citizens from all forms of tyranny and a means for enabling wise and honest self-government. Jefferson conceived of education as a preeminently political issue—and politics as a preeminently educational concern.

As Obama confronts the challenges of the wars he has inherited, an economy experiencing a shift as profound as the industrial revolution which displaced agrarianism as a way of life, the moral stain of a vast carceral empire both at home and abroad, as well as a citizenry riven by the divisive and demagogic rhetoric of four decades of conservative counterrevolution, the legacy of Jefferson, and his insistence on the preeminence of education, may well provide the way forward—and, too, a warning. I have attempted to argue that a (raceless) racist logic has shaped each element of these knotted crises—the "civilizational" war on terror as well as the nation's willingness to transform the welfare state into a neoliberal warfare state—and the ease with which it criminalized the social ills that issued from that pervasive and repressive shift. In fact, as early as 2001, ACLU director Graham Boyd noted that the United States was incarcerating African-American men at a rate approximately four times the rate of incarceration of black men in South Africa under apartheid. Worse still, we have managed to replicate—at least on a statistical level—the shame of chattel slavery in this country: The number of black men in prison has already equaled the number of men enslaved in 1820. [And] if current trends continue, only 15 years remain before the United States incarcerates as many African-American men as were forced into chattel bondage at slavery's peak, in 1860.¹⁵

Following Boyd's prediction, the ranks of the incarcerated have swollen from 2 million to 2.3 million in the ensuing eight years. We have moved from a time in which black Americans were legally defined as property, to one in which they have been granted 3/5 humanity. From sub-humanity, they rose to the ranks of second-class citizens, and once a full schedule of rights had been achieved equally "before the law," those rights and entitlements were dismantled along with the social state, which held the promise of their provision. In the fantasy world where "there is no such thing as society," there are now only dysfunctional men, women, and their families locked up or locked out of the American Dream. Still marked by the original sin of slavery, which we have not entirely repudiated, we now find ourselves in an era ominously reminiscent of that biblical season of plague, only this time it is not divine power striking down the first-born children of Pharaoh's kingdom because he refused to grant full freedom to all people, but rather the sovereign power of the state seizing every third son born black. Or perhaps we should push even further back in locating an apt metaphor for the present to ancient Babylon, to the building of that colossal tower of Babel, which eventually wrought divine destruction, condemning humanity to endless confused chatter and conflict. Whatever path of destruction Jefferson envisioned for a nation that refused to take heed of its own moral recklessness and injustice, we would do well to heed his warning. In his Notes on the State of Virginia, he wrote: "Indeed I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just: that his justice cannot sleep forever."¹⁶ Averting catastrophe—the organizing theme of the second half of this book—will require a most arduous task for the nation's citizenry: a critical and consistent commitment to think and reflect, to act as citizens who are worthy of a democracy.

¹Monbiot, George. "How These Jibbering Numbskulls Came to Dominate Washington." Guardian, Oct. 28, 2008..

²Editor. "American Health Care: Keep It Honest." Economist, Aug. 20, 2009.

³Transcript. "Bill Moyers Journal", Sept. 4, 2009.

⁴Hofstadter, Richard. Anti-Intellectualism in American Life (p. 21.). New York: Vintage, 1963.

⁵Ibid.

⁶Ibid, 119.

⁷For a comprehensive analysis of these various fundamentalisms, see Hery A. Giroux's Against the Terror of Neoliberalism: Politics Beyond the Age of Greed (2008).

⁸Ibid., 147—48.

⁹Ibid., 149.

¹⁰On the blog accompanying the website accompanying his 2009 publication, The Threat of Race, David Goldberg pointed out the racially driven differences in the ways in which relative political newcomers Barack Obama and Sarah Palin were embraced by the electorate. He notes: "More than half the whites polled registered harsher senses of blacks than they did of whites. While 50 percent of white respondents at least sometimes have had sympathy for blacks, nearly half had never or rarely. Similarly, more than 30 percent of white respondents have never or rarely admired blacks. Nearly half the respondents characterized blacks as at least moderately violent, and 38 percent as lazy. Lest one think that generally stated racial prejudice does not necessarily translate into bias against a particular person, the study also revealed that 47 percent characterized Obama as 'inexperienced' while just 4 percent did McCain, 17 percent as 'un-American' and just 2 percent did McCain, and only 29 percent 'patriotic' while 61 percent did McCain. Just under 20 percent consider Obama's religion 'a reason not to vote for him,' perhaps a less surprising fact considering that 14 percent still think he is a Muslim."

¹¹Hedges, Chris. Empire of Illusion: The End of Literacy and the Triumph of the Spectacle (p. 111.). New York: Nation Books, 2009.

¹²Ibid.

¹³Peterson, Merrill D. The Portable Thomas Jefferson (p. 215.), New York: Penguin, 1975.

¹⁴Boyd, Julian P. The Papers of Thomas Jefferson. Volume 2: 1777 to 18 June 1779 (pp. 526—27). Princeton, NJ, Princeton University Press, 1950.

¹⁵Boyd, Graham. "The Drug War Is the New Jim Crow." NACLA Report on the Americas. July 31, 2001.

¹⁶Peterson, Merrill D. The Portable Thomas Jefferson (p. 215.), New York: Penguin, 1975.

20110918-01	17:07	Jim	"A Riddle That Brings Joy to Mega-Rich Hearts"
-------------	-------	-----	--

The difference between you and the rich is not just that they have more money...

Here is a background article that you might want to read when you start hearing more Teapublican attacks on the idea that the rich can't afford to pay more taxes.

Republicans keep trying to frame taxes as stealing from the rich instead of the price we pay for civilization.

The tax code is so skewed in their favor....

"A Riddle That Brings Joy to Mega-Rich Hearts" by Sam Pizzigati, Nation of Change

Sept. 17, 2011, (<http://www.nationofchange.org/riddle-brings-joy-mega-rich-hearts-1316324803>)

The Census won't count it. The IRS won't tax it, at anywhere near full freight. What is it? It's enough, all by itself, to keep grand fortunes constantly soaring.

Can we start the century over?

Economically, new Census Bureau income stats released last week suggest, our 21st century so far rates as the worst century in American history. We are hurtling backwards — at an alarmingly rapid rate.

The typical American household income, $53,164 in 2000 after adjusting for inflation, stood at just $49,445 last year. Incomes for the typical working-age household — under 65 — have dropped over 10 percent since 2000.

The number of Americans living in poverty, meanwhile, is rising. In 2000, 11.3 percent of Americans rated as officially poor. Last year, 15.1 percent fit the poverty definition — under $22,314 for a family of four — and almost half those in poverty, 44.3 percent, had incomes less than half the poverty threshold.

What about households at the other end of the income spectrum? The annual Census Bureau figures on incomes at our tippy top have never been particularly helpful. Census statisticians, to protect the confidentiality of the households they survey, “top code” income categories — at $1.1 million.

We know, as a result, exactly how many American households made under $10,000 last year or between $50,000 and $60,000. But we have no clue, from the annual Census figures, how many made over $5, $10, or $20 million.

The even bigger shortcoming with the annual Census stats: The Census income survey doesn’t count “capital gains,” the profits from the sale of stocks, bonds, and other assets. Capital gains just happen to make up the single biggest category of income America’s super rich pull in every year.

In fact, as the Washington Post reminded us last week, capital gains make up nearly 60 percent of the income that goes to America’s 400 highest-earning taxpayers. Since the early 1990s, over 80 percent of all capital gains have gone to America’s richest 5 percent — and almost half to the richest 0.1 percent.

None of this capital gains income shows up in the new Census income figures released last week, the prime reason why the Census data show the average income of America’s top 5 percent, adjusted for inflation, down over the past decade, down even more sharply than incomes in America’s statistical middle.

Top 5 percent households took home an inflation-adjusted $320,000 in 2001, according to the Census figures out last week, and only $288,000 in 2010.

But these totals bear only a passing resemblance to the sums households in the top 5 percent have actually been raking in. We know that for a fact, thanks to statisticians at the IRS. Their IRS annual reports do include capital gains income.

What sort of difference does this inclusion make to America’s income picture? A quite substantial one.

Between 2001 and 2008, the IRS stats show, the top 5 percent’s share of America’s national income rose from 31.99 percent to 34.74 percent. The Census Bureau annual data have the top 5 percent share, for these same years, falling from 22.4 percent to 21.5 percent.

A distressing irony lurks in all these numbers. The Census Bureau doesn’t count capital gains income. The IRS doesn’t tax it — at anywhere near the tax rate that applies to ordinary income. In real life, this preferential treatment for capital gains serves to make the super rich ever richer.

The world of professional baseball offers a particularly vivid example. In 2010, all Major League players will pay a 35 percent tax on any salary over $373,650. Any Major League owner who sells his franchise this year, by contrast, will pay just a 15 percent tax on the capital gains mega millions he makes on the sale.

That’s not, of course, the fault of the IRS. Over the past three decades, Presidents and members of Congress, both Democratic and Republican, have opted to lower the capital gains rate — and kept it low.

Still, capital gains only make up part of our national inequality story, and the latest Census figures, even without any capital gains data, do have important inequality stories to tell.

One such story: According to the new Census stats, the nation's income divide between households at the 95th percentile — that is, households making more than all but the nation's top 5 percent — and households at the 20th and 50th percentiles has, in modern times, never been higher.

Back in 1968, households at the 20th percentile made an inflation-adjusted $18,251. Households at the 95th percentile that year took home $156,316. In 2010, 20th-percentile households had incomes only slightly higher, just $20,000. The much more robust 2010 income at the 95th percentile: almost $181,000.

Overall income inequality, the new Census Bureau annual income report concludes after presenting stats like these, definitely "is increasing" much, much faster, unfortunately, than the Census stats show us.

20110920-01	16:46	Dennis	"Misconceptions & Realities About Who Pays Taxes"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Don't be conned by accusations that the poor don't have any skin in the game:

"Misconceptions and Realities About Who Pays Taxes" by Chuck Marr and Brian Highsmith, CBPP

May 31, 2011, (<http://www.cbpp.org/cms/index.cfm?fa=view&id=3505>)

A recent finding by Congress' Joint Committee on Taxation that 51 percent of households owed no federal income tax in 2009¹ is being used to advance the argument that low- and moderate-income families do not pay sufficient taxes.

Apart from the fact that most of those who make this argument also call for maintaining or increasing all of the tax cuts of recent years for people at the top of the income scale, the 51 percent figure, its significance, and its policy implications are widely misunderstood.

1. The 51 percent figure is an anomaly that reflects the unique circumstances of 2009, when the recession greatly swelled the number of Americans with low incomes and when temporary tax cuts created by the 2009 Recovery Act—including the "Making Work Pay" tax credit and an exclusion from tax of the first $2,400 in unemployment benefits—were in effect. Together, these developments removed millions of Americans from the federal income tax rolls. Both of these temporary tax measures have since expired. In a more typical year, 35 percent to 40 percent of households owe no federal income tax. In 2007, the figure was 37.9 percent.²

2. The 51 percent figure covers only the federal income tax and ignores the substantial amounts of other federal taxes—especially the payroll tax—that many of these households pay. As a result, it greatly overstates the share of households that do not pay any federal taxes. Data from the Urban Institute-Brookings Tax Policy Center show only about 14 percent of households paid neither federal income tax nor payroll tax in 2009, despite the high unemployment and temporary tax cuts that marked that year.³

3. This percentage would be even lower if federal excise taxes on gasoline and other items were taken into account.

4. Most of the people who pay neither federal income tax nor payroll taxes are low-income people who are elderly, unable to work due to a serious disability, or students, most of whom subsequently become taxpayers. (In a year like 2009, this group also includes a significant number of people who have been unemployed the entire year and cannot find work.)

5. Moreover, low-income households as a whole do, in fact, pay federal taxes. Congressional Budget Office data show that the poorest fifth of households as a group paid an average of 4 percent of their incomes in federal taxes in 2007 (the latest year for which these data are available), not an insignificant amount given how modest these households' incomes are—the poorest fifth of households had average income of $18,400 in 2007.⁴ The next-to-the bottom fifth—those with incomes between $20,500 and $34,300 in 2007—paid an average of 10 percent of their incomes in federal taxes.

6. Even these figures understate low-income households' total tax burden, because these households also pay substantial state and local taxes. Data from the Institute on Taxation and Economic Policy show that the poorest fifth of households paid a stunning 12.3 percent of their incomes in state and local taxes in 2010.⁵

7. When all federal, state, and local taxes are taken into account, the bottom fifth of households paid 16.3 percent of their incomes in taxes, on average, in 2010. The second-poorest fifth paid 20.7 percent.⁶

It also is important to consider who the people are who don't owe federal income tax in a given year:

1. Some 70 percent of people who owe no federal income tax in a given year are low-income working households. These people do pay payroll taxes, as well as federal excise taxes (and, as noted, state and local taxes). Most of these working households also pay federal income tax in other years, when their incomes are higher—which can be seen by looking at the low-income working households that receive the Earned Income Tax Credit (see next).

2. The majority of EITC recipients receive the credit for only one or two years at a time, such as when their incomes drop due to a temporary layoff; they pay federal income tax in other years. In fact, EITC recipients pay much more in federal income taxes over time than they receive in EITC benefits. A leading study of this issue found that taxpayers who claimed the EITC at least once during an 18-year period paid a net $473 billion in federal income tax over that period (in 2006 dollars).⁷ This finding shows that—while in any single year some taxpayers will receive refundable tax credits whose value may exceed their payroll tax liability—EITC recipients as a group pay significant federal income taxes over time in addition to the payroll and state and local taxes they pay each year.

3. The fact that most people who do not pay federal income tax in a given year do pay substantial amounts of other taxes, and also are net federal income taxpayers over time, belies the claim that households that don't owe income tax will form bad policy judgments because they ostensibly "don't have any skin in the game."

4. The federal tax system is progressive overall, but state and local tax systems are regressive and undo a significant share of that progressivity. There is nothing wrong with having one part of the overall tax system shield low- and moderate-income households, who pay substantial amounts of other taxes and who generally pay federal income tax as well in other years.

To significantly increase the share of households that owe federal income tax, policymakers would have to take such steps as lowering the personal exemption or standard deduction—which would tax many low-income working families into, or deeper into, poverty; weakening the EITC or Child Tax Credit, which would significantly increase child poverty while reducing incentives for work over welfare; or paring back the tax exclusion for Social Security benefits, which would subject more seniors with small, fixed incomes to the income tax.

This analysis now explores these issues in more detail.

Of-Cited 51 Percent Figure Is Temporary Spike Caused by Recession

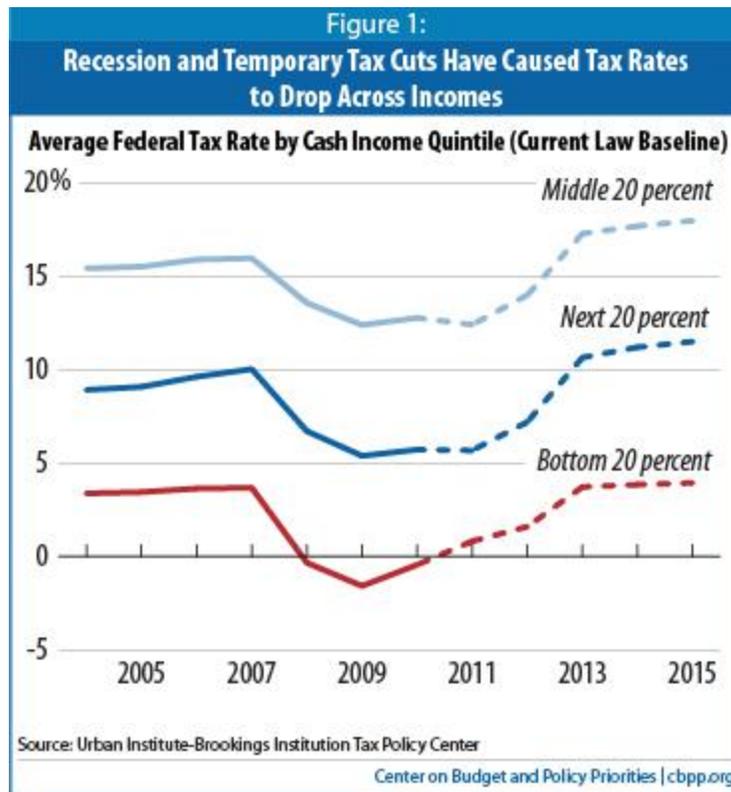

In a typical year, roughly 35-40 percent of households have no net federal income liability; in 2007, the figure was 37.9 percent.⁸ In 2009, however, two factors combined to cause a large, temporary spike in the share of Americans with no net federal income tax liability—the recession, which reduced many people's incomes, and several temporary tax cuts that have now expired. The 51 percent figure reflects these temporary factors.

Recession-induced decline in incomes. In 2009, unemployment was at its highest level in decades and rising sharply, and incomes were falling. Income tax liabilities are designed to adjust to these cyclical factors, rising when the economy is strong and falling when it is weak; this automatic adjustment helps to stabilize the economy by cushioning the drop in people's after-tax incomes—and thus their spending—during a downturn. One consequence of the economic downturn was a sharp decline in both federal and state tax receipts, as millions of workers lost their jobs or had their work hours reduced. For many Americans, the loss of income meant that while they owed federal income taxes in 2008, they did not in 2009.

Temporary tax cuts. Policymakers responded to the deep economic contraction by enacting policies to stimulate consumer demand, including targeted public investments and temporary tax cuts that removed millions more Americans from the tax rolls. Roughly 95 percent of working families benefited from the Recovery Act's Making Work Pay tax credit, which reduced their federal income tax liability by $400 for individuals and $800 for married couples. For some of these people, the tax credit eliminated their federal tax liability. Other temporary income tax cuts, including the exclusion of the first $2,400 in unemployment insurance benefits and a first-time homebuyer tax credit, eliminated federal income tax liability for additional taxpayers.

In other words, the federal income tax system did what it is supposed to do during the recession—take a smaller bite out of people’s incomes. As the temporary tax cuts expire and the economy and incomes strengthen, people’s tax liabilities will rebound (see Figure 1).

Lower-Income People Pay Considerable Payroll, State, and Local Taxes

The notion that “half of Americans don’t pay taxes” not only overstates the share of households that do not pay federal income taxes in a typical year. It also ignores the other taxes people pay, including federal payroll taxes and state and local taxes.

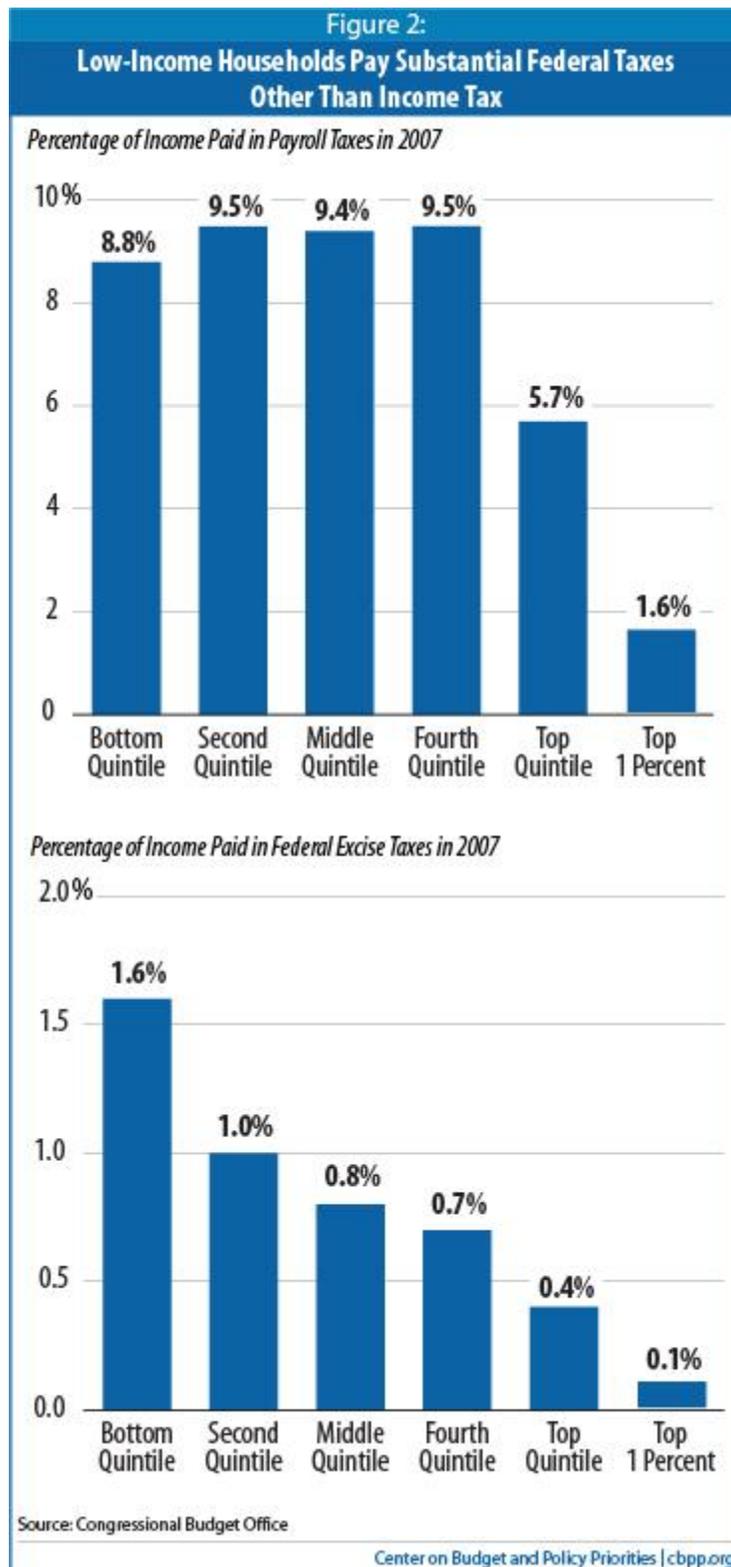

Policymakers, pundits, and others often overlook this point. At a hearing last month, Senator Charles Grassley said, “According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, 49 percent of households are paying 100 percent of taxes coming in to the federal government.” At the same hearing, Cato Institute Senior Fellow Alan Reynolds asserted, “Poor people don’t pay taxes in this country.” Last April, referring to a Tax Policy Center estimate of households with no federal income tax liability in 2009, Fox Business host Stuart Varney said on “Fox and Friends,” “Yes, 47 percent of households pay not a single dime in taxes.”⁹

None of these assertions are correct. As the Tax Policy Center’s Howard Gleckman noted regarding TPC’s estimate that 47 percent of Americans owed no federal income tax in 2009, “rarely has a bit of data been so misunderstood, or so misused.” Gleckman wrote:

Let me explain—repeat actually—what [the 47 percent figure] means: About half of taxpayers paid no federal income tax last year. It does not mean they paid no tax at all. Many shelled out Social Security and Medicare payroll taxes. In fact, only 14 percent of Americans didn’t pay either income or payroll taxes. Some paid property taxes and, it is fair to say, just about all of them paid sales taxes of one kind or another. So to say they pay no taxes is flat wrong.¹⁰

The reality is that the income tax is one of a number of types of taxes that individuals pay, both over the course of their lifetimes and in a given year, and it makes little sense to treat it as though it were the only one that matters. Some 86 percent of working households pay more in payroll taxes than in federal income taxes.¹¹ In fact, low- and moderate-income people pay a much larger share of their incomes in federal payroll taxes than high-income people do: taxpayers in the bottom 20 percent of the income scale paid an average of 8.8 percent of their incomes in payroll taxes in 2007, compared to just 1.6 percent for taxpayers in the top 1 percent of the income distribution (see Figure 2).¹²

In addition, Congressional Budget Office data show that lower-income households pay a significantly larger share of their incomes in federal excise taxes (levied on goods such as gasoline) than middle- and upper-income households do.

When all federal taxes are considered, it is clear that the overwhelming majority of Americans pay such taxes. The poorest fifth of households paid an average of 4 percent of their incomes in federal taxes despite their low incomes in 2007, while the next fifth paid an average of 10 percent of income in federal taxes.

Low-income families also pay substantial state and local taxes. Most state and local taxes are regressive, meaning that low-income families pay a larger share of their incomes in these taxes than wealthier households do. The bottom fifth of taxpayers paid 12.3 percent of their incomes in state and local taxes in 2010, according to the Institute on Taxation and Economic Policy (ITEP) model.¹³ That was well above the 7.9 percent average rate that the top 1 percent of households paid (see Figure 3).

Considering all taxes—federal, state, and local—the bottom 20 percent of households paid an average of just over 16 percent of their incomes in taxes (12.3 percent in state and local taxes plus 3.9 percent in federal taxes) in 2009. The next 20 percent paid about 21 percent of income in taxes, on average.¹⁴

In fact, when all taxes are considered, the share of taxes that each fifth of households pays is similar to its share of the nation's total income.¹⁵ The tax system as a whole is only mildly progressive.¹⁶

Policy Options to Force People with Low Incomes to Pay Federal Income Tax Are Unsound

Some have implied or suggested that people who do not owe federal income tax are “freeloaders” who don’t have a “stake in the system” and that making them pay federal income taxes would improve the tax code. Yet the vast majority of the people who owe no federal income taxes fall into one of three categories (see Figure 4):¹⁷

1. Approximately 70 percent are working people who pay payroll taxes. As noted above, even the low-income households in this group pay substantial federal income taxes over time. The main options to force these people to pay federal income tax in years when their incomes are low include cutting the EITC or the Child Tax Credit, which would tend to reduce work incentives and increase child poverty and welfare use, and lowering the standard deduction or personal exemption, which could tax many low-income working families into, or deeper into, poverty.

2. An additional 17 percent of people who did not pay federal income taxes in 2009 are people aged 65 or older. The main option to make these individuals pay federal income tax would be to subject their Social Security benefits to taxation.¹⁸

3. The remaining 13 percent consists largely of students, people with disabilities, the long-term unemployed, and others with very low taxable incomes.¹⁹ To make these people pay federal income taxes, policymakers would have to tax disability, veterans', and similar benefits or make full-time students and the long-term jobless individuals borrow (or draw from any available savings) to pay taxes on their meager incomes.

In short, the kinds of policy changes that would impose federal income taxes on these groups of people would make the overall tax system less fair and less sensible, not more so. An examination of the EITC illustrates this point, as the next section explains.

Corporations and Small Business Owners Also Pay No Income Tax During Bad Years

As this report notes, in addition to paying other taxes each year (many of which involve significant tax burdens), most people who do not pay federal income tax in a given year do pay that tax over time. For example, more than half of the tax filers who received the EITC between 1989 and 2006 received the credit for no more than a year or two at a time and generally paid substantial amounts of federal income tax in other years.* In fact, the taxpayers who claimed the EITC during this 18-year period paid $473 billion in net federal income tax over that period (in 2006 dollars) even after taking the EITC payments they received into account.

The tax-paying record of both large corporations and small businesses follows an analogous pattern—in some years no taxes are paid, while in other years substantial taxes are paid. During the years when they have net operating losses, companies that are subject to the corporate income tax generally have no tax liability.

A GAO study found that in every year from 1998 to 2005, approximately 55 percent of large corporations paid no corporate income tax. But just 2.7 percent of large corporations reported no net tax liability in all eight of those eight years. This reflects a similar pattern as applies to families and individuals—those who do not pay income tax in a given year often do pay income tax over time.

This pattern also applies to small business owners and others who deduct business losses from their taxable incomes and thereby eliminate their income tax liability in some years.

*Tim Dowd and John B. Horowitz, "Income Mobility and the Earned Income Tax Credit: Short-Term Safety Net or Long-Term Income Support," Public Finance Review (forthcoming).

Large corporations are those with at least $250 million in assets or $50 million in gross receipts. Government Accountability Office, "Comparison of the Reported Tax Liabilities of Foreign- and U.S.-Controlled Corporations, 1998-2005," July 2008, <http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d08957.pdf>.

Cutting the EITC Would Discourage Work and Increase Poverty

From its roots as an idea from conservative economist Milton Friedman several decades ago, the EITC has become an increasingly important tool to make work pay more than welfare and enough to lift people working full time at the minimum wage out of poverty. Research has demonstrated the EITC's effectiveness. Nobel laureate (and noted conservative economist) Gary S. Becker has written, "Empirical studies confirm . . . that the EITC increases the labor force participation and employment of people with low wages because they need to work in order to receive this credit."²⁰ (Becker also has applauded the EITC for being "fully available to families with both parents present, even where only one works and the other cares for their children [i.e., for being available to low-income working families with stay-at-home mothers].")

Studies of the EITC expansions of the 1980s and 1990s found those expansions induced more than half a million people to enter the labor force. One prominent study identified the EITC as "a particularly important contributor to both the recent decrease in welfare use and the recent increase in employment, labor supply, and earnings" among female-headed families.²¹ The creation of the refundable component of the Child Tax Credit, which like the EITC is available only to families that work, has complemented the EITC's pro-work efforts. Moreover, the EITC and the refundable Child Tax Credit together lifted 7.2 million people out of poverty in 2009, including 4 million children.²² These refundable credits lift more children out of poverty than any other program or category of programs at any level of government.

Several factors reinforce the importance of these credits in promoting and rewarding low-wage work. In recent decades, incomes in the United States have grown increasingly unequal, with the lion's share of the economic gains from globalization, advances in technology, and the like accruing to those on the upper rungs of the income ladder. CBO data show that the average income among people in the lowest income fifth was $17,700 in 2007; if all incomes had grown at the same rate since 1979, that figure would have been $6,000 higher. Our economy benefits from globalization and technological change, but there are winners and losers. The refundable tax credits help to offset a portion of the effects of the stagnation of wages at the bottom of the income spectrum.

In addition, the weak labor market is likely to continue exerting downward pressure on wages over the next several years. The unemployment rate remains stubbornly high, at 9 percent in Apr., 2011. CBO projects that it will not drop to under 6 percent until 2015. Taking note of the current bleak employment picture facing out-of-work men, columnist David Brooks recently wrote that "wage subsidies" should be on the list of future policy responses. The EITC is a much-needed wage subsidy for low-income workers (although the EITC for poor workers without children remains very small and could be strengthened).

Finally, over the past several decades, policymakers have essentially relied more on the EITC to supplement low wages and less on the minimum wage, which they have allowed to decline by 19 percent in purchasing power since 1970 (i.e., the minimum wage has fallen by 19 percent in inflation-adjusted dollars).

For all of these reasons, scaling back the EITC in order to require more low-income working households to pay federal income taxes would be a significant step backward, discouraging work and increasing poverty.

End Notes:

¹The Urban Institute-Brookings Institution Tax Policy Center had previously estimated the share of households who owed no federal income tax in 2009 to be 47 percent. (http://www.cbpp.org/cms/index.cfm?fa=view&id=3505#_ftnref1)

²Tax Policy Center, "Tax Units with Zero or Negative Tax Liability, 2004-2008," Oct. 16, 2009, <http://www.taxpolicycenter.org/numbers/Content/PDF/T09-0412.pdf>.

³Tax Policy Center, "Tax Units with Zero or Negative Tax Liability, 2009-2019," July 1, 2009, <http://www.taxpolicycenter.org/numbers/Content/PDF/T09-0333.pdf>.

⁴Congressional Budget Office, "Average Federal Taxes by Income Group," June 2010, http://www.cbo.gov/publications/collections/tax/2010/all_tables.pdf.

⁵Citizens for Tax Justice, "All Americans Pay Taxes," Apr. 15, 2010, <http://www.ctj.org/pdf/taxday2010.pdf>.

⁶Citizens for Tax Justice, 2010.

⁷Tim Dowd and John B. Horowitz, "Income Mobility and the Earned Income Tax Credit: Short-Term Safety Net or Long-Term Income Support," Public Finance Review (forthcoming)

⁸Tax Policy Center, "Tax Units with Zero or Negative Tax Liability, 2004-2008," Oct. 16, 2009, <http://www.taxpolicycenter.org/numbers/Content/PDF/T09-0412.pdf>.

⁹Media Matters, "Do conservative media figures want to raise taxes on middle- and low-income Americans?," Apr. 9, 2010, <http://mediamatters.org/research/201004090030>.

¹⁰Howard Gleckman, "About Those 47 Percent Who Pay 'No Taxes,'" TaxVox, Apr. 15, 2010, <http://taxvox.taxpolicycenter.org/2010/04/15/about-those-47-percent-who-pay-%E2%80%9Cno-taxes-%E2%80%9D/>.

¹¹Len Burman and Greg Leiserson, "Two-Thirds of Tax Units Pay More Payroll Tax Than Income Tax," Tax Notes, Apr. 9, 2007.

¹²Congressional Budget Office, 2010.

¹³Citizens for Tax Justice, 2010.

¹⁴Citizens for Tax Justice, 2010.

¹⁵Citizens for Tax Justice, 2010.

¹⁶Before taxes, the bottom 20 percent of households received 4 percent of national income and the top 1 percent received 19.4 percent. After taxes, the bottom 20 percent of households received 4.9 percent of national income and the top 1 percent received 17.1 percent. Congressional Budget Office, 2010.

¹⁷Tax Policy Center, "Who Doesn't Pay Federal Taxes," <http://www.taxpolicycenter.org/taxtopics/federal-taxes-households.cfm>

¹⁸Under current law, Social Security benefits are not subject to the income tax for filers whose income is below $25,000 for individuals and $32,000 for couples.

¹⁹March 2010 Current Population Survey, U.S. Census Bureau.

²⁰Gary S. Becker, "How to End Welfare 'As We Know It'—Fast," Business Week, June 3, 1996.

²¹Jeffrey Grogger, "The Effects of Time Limits, the EITC, and Other Policy Changes on Welfare Use, Work, and Income among Female-Headed Families," The Review of Economics and Statistics, May 2003.

²²Arloc Sherman, "Despite Deep Recession and High Unemployment, Government Efforts—including the Recovery Act—Prevented Poverty From Rising in 2009, New Census Data Show," Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, Jan. 5, 2011.

It amazes me that right-wing politicians are all in an uproar about "class warfare," as if such a clash would be inappropriate and un-American. When millions of Americans struggle to house, clothe, feed, and educate their families, while a few wealthy citizens guard their treasure with ever fiercer dragons, it is inappropriate to blame the poor for somehow fomenting a class "war." The war is being waged against them. I can't help thinking about the heavily taxed peasants in pre-Revolutionary France who finally revolted and burned the chateaux of their overlords, who were exempt from taxes. Where is the fairness? Yes, the poor have "skin in the game." The rich are taking their prosperity out of their hide.

20110925-01 17:32 Dennis Stephen Colbert Quote: A Christian Nation

"If this is going to be a Christian nation that doesn't help the poor, either we have to pretend that Jesus was just as selfish as we are, or we've got to acknowledge that He commanded us to love the poor and serve the needy without condition and then admit that we just don't want to do it."

20110926-01 09:41 Jim Video: "Recycled Water Bottles Act Like Electricity"

Practical Third World energy conservation...

They had been blocking the sun getting in to keep the house cool but then had to use electric lights if they wanted to see well. A clever solution to give light without heat and almost zero cost after cheap installation.

Ingenious!

Video: "Recycled Water Bottles Act Like Electricity" (<http://youtu.be/SBW13NtND68>)

20110927-01 17:47 Dennis "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

"Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War" by Roger Bybee, CommonDreams

Sept. 27, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/headline/2011/09/27-8>)

In his severely distorted view of the "class war" currently splitting America apart, House Budget Committee Chair Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), who represents southeastern Wisconsin's crumbling factory towns, reflects a juvenile embrace of the view of his heroine, Ayn Rand (required reading for his entire staff).

Through the shift of capital from productive industries to deregulated Wall Street, the relocation of much of America's industrial base to low-wage nations, and unilateral wage cutting by CEOs who see how the Great Recession has strengthened their leverage over workers, we are witnessing the ongoing shrinkage of middle-class job opportunities. Like Rand, Ryan interprets any move toward easing America's crushing inequality as showing ingratitude toward those he worships as the "job creators." This view is repeated incessantly by Republicans.

However, the fact remains that, it's been some time since the "job creators" actually created any significant number of jobs in the United States. We saw 0.9 percent job growth in the 1999-2009 decade marked chiefly by Wall Street deregulation and $1.2 trillion in tax cuts mainly siphoned up by the ultra-wealthy investor class. But the very notion of a mild tax increase on millionaires and billionaires provokes cries from Ryan that "class warfare" is being self-destructively waged against the Job Creators:

A top House Republican accused President Obama of appealing to Americans' "fear, envy and anxiety" by pushing a new tax rate on people making more than $1 million annually, saying the "class warfare path" will only hurt the economy.

'Class warfare ... may make for really good politics, but it makes for rotten economics,' Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wis., chairman of the House Budget Committee, told "Fox News Sunday."

Behind the 'class war' rhetoric

The domestic politics of much of the 1990s were shaped by GOP demonization of welfare clients; current politics in Wisconsin and elsewhere are dominated by contempt directed against teachers and other public employees. The reality: On one side stands the richest 1 percent, increasingly unified in their resistance to paying their fair share of taxes and assuming the burdens of healing an economically divided society. Their share of the national pie has tripled since the 1970s, to about 24 percent of all income. Just 400 individuals control as much wealth as the bottom 150 million Americans.

A vast torrent of dollars, rapidly shooting upward in a jet-stream, has given the top 1% more political power than at any point in the last 90 years. The super-rich have gained more surplus wealth to contribute more massively to candidates who serve their interests and to hire lobbyists to advance policies of tax-cutting, deregulation, privatization and "free trade."

These are all policies that detach the ruling class further from a commitment to strong public institutions (e.g., schools, healthcare, access to higher education), American workers and the nation itself.

On the other side of the class divide stands a fragmented, atomized, and—until the Wisconsin labor rebellion earlier this year—badly demoralized majority of working families. They face a constant and totally one-sided bombardment by corporate and government policies that undermine their economic security, take away rights to unionization, and make their survival ever more precarious.

Without cohesiveness and organizations, families scramble simply to survive, with political involvement often falling as a priority despite its potential for relieving their suffering.

Warren Buffet, the billionaire investor who is viewed by many of his fellow CEOs as a traitor to his class for his frankness about the low taxes that he pays relative to his secretary, expressed the current reality bluntly:

There's class warfare, all right," Mr. Buffett said, "but it's my class, the rich class, that's making war, and we're winning.

Through the shift of capital from productive industries to deregulated Wall Street, the relocation of much of America's industrial base to low-wage nations, and unilateral wage cutting by CEOs who see how the Great Recession has strengthened their leverage over workers, we are witnessing the ongoing shrinkage of middle-class job opportunities.

The loss of middle-class jobs has been severe, and is of course still growing. Former Reagan budget director David Stockman estimated the loss nationally at 12 percent of "high-value" jobs, falling to 68 million from 77 million. That means plummeting wages. In Ryan's hometown of Janesville, hollowed out by the pre-Christmas 2008 shutdown of its giant GM plant, the average wage has fallen from $23.27 in 2007 to $18.82 last year.

Up until now, the tensions have largely and tragically been contained within families and working-class neighborhoods as victims of declining incomes and disappearing dreams turn on each other. Janesville has been afflicted by rising abuse against women and a major increase in child abuse and neglect.

Child poverty has nearly doubled to 47.1 percent since 2000, and the town has also experienced a near-doubling in suicides over the past two years.

When will class war victims fight back?

Eventually, all the frustration, pent-up rage and seemingly endless suffering felt by the victims of the CEOs one-way class war will erupt. The potential for mass disorder in the streets of the United States is becoming apparent even to elite figures like New York's billionaire Mayor Michael Bloomberg:

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg warned today that public frustration over joblessness in the U.S. is in danger of boiling over and could lead to riots in the streets if the government fails to create more jobs.

You have a lot of kids graduating college who can't find jobs. That's what happened in Cairo. That's what happened in Madrid. You don't want those kinds of riots here.

There is also an even larger number of young people who can't afford college who are seething with anger.

I'm sure that Paul Ryan and his allies also don't want "those kinds of riots" taking place in Janesville, Racine, or anywhere else in the United States. Yet while prescribing austerity for the vast majority of his already-struggling constituents, Ryan has been leading a life marked by anything but fiscal discipline.

For example, Ryan and two of his pals were spotted in Washington spending $700 on two bottles of $350 wine. Susan Feinberg, an associate business professor at Rutgers did the math and figured out that the $700 in wine the trio consumed over the course of 90 minutes amounted to more than the entire weekly income of a couple making minimum wage.

Of course, Ryan is opposed to increasing the minimum wage, in the same way that he has voted to oppose extended unemployment benefits, foreclosure assistance and expanded S-CHIP healthcare to children. He's been pushing to end taxation on the overseas operations of U.S. corporations.

With a lifestyle reminiscent of Marie Antoinette and his contempt for the plight of workers and the poor, Ryan and his allies may well be lighting the fuse for a social explosion.

© 2011 In These Times

20110928-01 19:02 Dennis Quote: Remember When...

Remember when teachers, public employees, Planned Parenthood, NPR and PBS crashed the stock market, wiped out half of our 401Ks, took trillions in taxpayer funded bail outs, spilled oil in the Gulf of Mexico, gave themselves billions in bonuses, and paid no taxes?
Yeah, me neither... Pass it on 20110929-01 08:36 Pam Hillary Clinton in 2012?

I have a question for you all. How would you feel about Hillary running in 2012? She's smart, experienced, and tough. Is she a Democrat who could win? Is Obama falling behind the curve of history, or do you think he'll get his engine started? I guess that's more than two questions—and a mixed metaphor to boot.

20110929-02 12:49 Clark Re: Hillary Clinton in 2012?

Dear Pam,

While it's true that Hillary has high approval ratings at the moment, challenging Obama in 2012 would doom any chances the Democrats have of keeping the White House and probably doom any chances she would have of ever becoming president in 2016.

Taking on an incumbent from your own party always weakens the incumbent but seldom (never?) results in actually getting the nomination (most recently, see: Reagan vs. Ford in 1976, Kennedy vs. Carter in 1980—with both wounded incumbents losing in the general). Ted Kennedy never recovered (though Reagan did, he was taking on an "inherited" presidency in Gerald Ford, who had never actually been elected president and didn't have an ardent constituency).

Hillary would risk losing huge numbers of Obama loyalists (perhaps especially African-Americans, who otherwise would be very strongly for her) in 2016.

Also, as a major player in the Administration, on what basis would she run against him? He even incorporated the individual mandate into his health care program (which she supported in the 2008, primaries, and he did not). As Sec. of State, she can't run against his foreign policy, either. And by attacking him as a weak leader, again she'd be risking alienating African-Americans, in particular. She could only attack him on the economy, which would just give ammunition to the GOP in the general, and doom either Democrat to defeat.

No, if she's interested, she'll wait till 2016.

20110930-01 10:44 SteveB Re: Hillary Clinton in 2012?

I have to say I have a couple of problems with Hillary. I don't think she can defeat anybody. I don't think I would ever know if she or Bill (again) were the President. Maybe that's a plus.

And I have to say, though Obama is not really our guy either, that I think Hillary & Bill represent the failed Democrat policies and actions of the past. She's the ultimate insider, at this point in time, though I think those Republican dogs in Congress would eat her fat butt alive. And the Clintons are not adverse to selling favors, like nights in the White House, remember? Wonder what else they sold while in power?

But, of course, the really massive, definitive lies and hugely, tragically failed policies and philosophies sleep in the Republican tents.

We'd better stand behind Obama and hope for the best. I think that's what Hillary thinks too, though I might have missed something lately.

20110930-02 13:00 Pam Re: Now You're Mad?

Dear Jim and SteveB,

This is an amazing list. No wonder I feel so bummed.

20110930-03 14:58 SteveB Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

Dear Gary C,

I just found this from my friend, Dennis, and it expresses a lot of things I've been thinking about. What do you think?

[See Sept. 27, 2011, 5:47 pm, "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War" by Roger Bybee, CommonDreams, Sept. 27, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/headline/2011/09/27-8>). —SteveB]

Do you really think these stupid, evil, born-agin' Christians all somehow, uncannily, know which political philosophy is best for the country? What are the odds that Bachman, Perry, Gingrich, Palin et al, are somehow, miraculously right? Pretty low, in my betting book!

20110930-04 15:07 GaryC Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

Dear SteveB,

Well, they may have a lot of good solutions but it always scares me when they invoke religion as part of the solution. There is separation of church and state for a damn good reason. And, it goes both ways, not just to protect secularism.

However, I feel the Democrats do the same thing by making EVERYTHING politically correct to the detriment of the majority and often the poor.

It's all about POWER. Very few in public office have the cajones to do what's right regardless of the opinion of their constituents.

Therefore, eliminate the potential and create TERM LIMITS.

20110930-05 15:14 SteveB Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

Dear GaryC,

No, "eliminate the potential", and end the corruption of unfettered campaign financing and the resulting favors owed that distorts all the professional political thinking in this country. This term limit talk is a tea bagger's red herring.

What you say about Democrats is true in many ways. But remember, we are only here on this one cusp of history, and, at this moment, one party seems out to destroy us just to prove some esoteric point. The other party seems bent on merely remaining stuck in the past.

To me it's sort of like the difference between Armageddon and a fart.

20110930-06 15:39 GaryC Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

Dear SteveB,

My concern about financing reform is that you HAVE to apply it to Corporations, Unions, Fat Cats and other concerns that can raise a lot of money. I am always afraid that limiting donations too much opens the door more so for under the table financing. My call for term limits has been going on for over 30 years after spending time in DC. I could care less what the tea party wants or calls for. It's a lunatic fringe in many cases just like the environmental wackos on the left.

For example, we have a private company that wants to build a pipeline from Canada to the U.S. that will create 18,000+ good paying construction jobs for mostly low skilled people plus over 1000 permanent jobs after the construction. In addition, the pipeline will supply cheap Canadian natural gas and reduce our dependence on foreign petrol. But, the f*cking regulators in DC are concerned about the environmental impact even though it has passed every study conducted for the past 5 years. You can't blame this one on the Republicans or the Tea Party. These are your boys f*cking the poor on this one.

[This Keystone XL Pipeline is no big deal, yet see how the Right lines up monolithically and monomaniacally behind it, as if it were the end all and be all of the nation in 2011. How do these troops get rallied like this? —SteveB]

20110930-07 15:51 SteveB Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

Dear GaryC,

Of course, the law of the land must be applied to all! Not even illegal immigrants shouldn't be able to corrupt our politics. Definitely not corporations, unions, fat cats, or foreign governments.

The Teabaggers want term limits so Washington, with its complications and subtleties, will be full of rookies who know nothing. They would be putty in the hands of the powerful vested interests that run this country.

Term limits is the last thing I want. The amendment on the President should be reversed to level the playing field and prevent all the lame duck cr*p we have now. Imagine how hard things would be with even more lame ducks sitting around quacking and powerless.

I would think, after the Gulf oil debacle/disaster, which potentially could have ruined your beach for quite some time, you would see that it's almost impossible to be too careful in these matters. The powers that be are almost never careful enough in my book.

20110930-08 16:06 SteveB Re: Now You're Mad?

Dear Pam,

It pretty much sums it all up, doesn't it? Haven't heard back from any of my misguided Republican friends yet. ☺

20110930-09 16:14 Pam Re: Now You're Mad?

Dear SteveB,

I simply do not understand how anyone can support these bozos. My best friend has moved from being a Republican to calling herself a Libertarian, but I don't see that as much better. We talk about politics—some—but we have to be careful not to step on each others' toes. I keep trying to get to the bottom of what accounts for the difference between us, and I think it's this: she doesn't trust govt. but likes private enterprise; I don't trust the corporations but think govt. is at least SUPPOSED to work on all citizens' behalf. I never thought I'd say this, but maybe Marx had it right—about capitalism that is. And this Supreme Court is terrifying. Citizens United is dreadful. Elections are to be bought now, more than ever. America is losing its soul, and I don't see anything on the horizon to change that. Aaaarrrrrgh!!

20110930-10 17:24 SteveB "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"

<http://news.yahoo.com/awlaqi-killing-re-ignites-us-debate-rights-152720230.html> [No longer available. See below. — SteveB]

"Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights" by AFP

Sept. 30, 2011

(http://www.khaleejtimes.com/DisplayArticle09.asp?xfile=data/middleeast/2011/September/middleeast_September611.xml§ion=middleeast)

(WASHINGTON) The killing of U.S.-born Al-Qaeda cleric Anwar al-Awlaqi has renewed the debate over how far Washington can go in hunting down and assassinating alleged terror suspects who are American citizens.

Awlaqi, killed in Yemen with several other suspected militants, had been at the center of a court case filed last year challenging the U.S. government's right to target its own citizens for assassination which highlighted questions about constitutional rights.

Many U.S. lawmakers and other Americans cheered the news of Awlaqi's death, but civil rights backers said the case raises serious questions.

Glenn Greenwald, a lawyer and commentator, said there had been no effort to indict Awlaqi on any crimes and that there was "substantial doubt" about his involvement in any attacks against the U.S..

"He was simply ordered killed by the president: his judge, jury and executioner," Greenwald wrote on Salon.com.

"What's most amazing is that its citizens will not merely refrain from objecting, but will stand and cheer the U.S. government's new power to assassinate their fellow citizens, far from any battlefield, literally without a shred of due process," he added.

Last year, civil liberties groups filed a lawsuit on behalf of the cleric's father, Nasser al-Awlaqi, saying it was unconstitutional for the CIA to order the death of an American citizen without due process.

A judge dismissed the case without ruling on the merit of the suit, saying he could not legally block the government from targeting Awlaqi, but said it raises serious constitutional issues.

"Can (the president) order the assassination of a U.S. citizen without first affording him any form of judicial process whatsoever, based on the mere assertion that he is a dangerous member of a terrorist organization?" U.S. District Judge John Bates wrote in December.

In Apr., 2010, a U.S. official said President Barack Obama's administration had taken the rare step of authorizing the targeted killing of Awlaqi, after U.S. intelligence agencies linked him to attacks.

Ari Fleischer, who was spokesman for former president George W. Bush, said the action shows the need for aggressive actions in the fight on terrorism.

"I wonder if the Bush-violated-the-Constitution crowd will decry the killing of an American without a trial via drone?" he said in a Twitter message.

Despite the legal questions, many members of Congress hailed the killing of Awlaqi, who was born in New Mexico and became an Internet phenomenon by producing video and audio recordings in fluent English to lure Westerners into militant actions.

Republican Representative Peter King, chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, called Awlaqi's killing "a great success in our fight against Al-Qaeda and its affiliates."

"For the past several years, al-Awlaqi has been more dangerous even than Osama bin Laden had been. The killing of al-Awlaqi is a tremendous tribute to President Obama and the men and women of our intelligence community," he said.

"He fueled hate against America, and we are safer because al-Awlaqi is dead. We must nevertheless continue our efforts to combat and discredit the violent Islamist ideology he espoused and disseminated," said Republican Senator Susan Collins.

Last year, a group of U.S. lawmakers unveiled legislation to strip Americans thought to have joined extremist groups like Al-Qaeda of their citizenship. But the effort was criticized by some who said this appeared to lack due process.

Defense Secretary Leon Panetta, who was previously CIA chief, told ABC News last year: "Awlaqi is a terrorist, and yes, he's a U.S. citizen, but he is first and foremost a terrorist and we're going to treat him like a terrorist. We don't have an assassination list, but I can tell you this, we have a terrorist list and he's on it."

Awlaqi, a charismatic preacher who spoke fluent English, was seen as having the unique ability to recruit Al-Qaeda operatives in the West.

U.S. intelligence officials believe Awlaqi was linked to a U.S. army major who allegedly shot dead 13 people in Fort Hood, Texas, and to a Nigerian student accused of trying to blow up a U.S. airliner on Dec. 25, 2009.

He also was believed to have coordinated the 2010 plot to blow up cargo aircraft bound for the United States and had called for attacks against U.S. and Arab governments across the world.

Dear SteveB,

I find this one difficult. On the one hand, this guy was clearly very dangerous. But should we just arbitrarily take someone out? I wasn't sorry when Bin Laden went, and I wish Hitler had perished when that bomb went off. I've often thought targeted killing preferable to all-out war. But I'm in a muddle here.

20111001-01 19:31 SteveB Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"

Dear Pam,

No, I think your gut instinct is right, Pam, though there are many worrisome elements to such a killing, especially if a government is not of the highest moral fiber, like ours is.

But I part company with the bleeding heart liberals here. We are in a unique situation, unforeseen by the Constitution and past law. But we are at war, and there are situations in, for instance, a place like Afghanistan, where an officer might have to summarily execute one of his own men for mutiny, etc. This would be an American executed without trial. Not good, but maybe necessary if you're in that situation—one reason not to get into those situations, if at all possible.

But this present war cannot be avoided and I say, especially on foreign soil, we fight it tooth and nail and to hell with combatants' rights. Where are the rights of suicide bomber victims?

Regardless, the legal precedents are now pretty much set, it seems to me, and things have gone against terrorists' rights, at least in the U.S. of A. I also happen to think that things should go too against any potential rights of illegal aliens, except a trip back home, but that's just me. I say we have too many people already. The place is too damned crowded for me...except maybe Maine and Montana.

Personally, I like the way these CIA guys can sit there at their laptops and guide these little killers to their targets. No muddle for me. I'd like to do one myself, honestly. I think we need to make peace with these Islamic dudes, but in the meantime, I still agree with George Bush's goal—just not his methods—of doing something to make our enemies ponder that maybe they would have been much better off to leave us alone and just continue to water their camels and pump their oil.

Maybe it's a testosterone thing, but I should be having less of that by now...?

20111001-02 20:39 Pam Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"

Dear SteveB,

I think you're right. Al Awlaki (or however you spell it) gave up his rights to due process when he went to Yemen and started making bombs. I guess I just worry about our becoming like Russia, offing people right and left because they pose a threat to the govt. I trust Obama to go after the right targets, but I'd hate to see targeted assassinations happening here. We've had assassinations, yes, but, so far as I know, none sanctioned by the govt., conspiracy theories notwithstanding. You ever get the feeling I worry too much??

:-) One of my students once told me I think too much. He probably had a point.

20111001-03 11:29 SteveB Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"

Dear Pam,

My old Zen instructor once told me that the only problem with thinking is that it doesn't get you anywhere. I guess it was one of those "one hand clapping" things.

20111001-04 14:40 Bill Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"

Dear Pam and SteveB,

I think I'm with SteveB on this one. My reasoning isn't perfectly apt, but if the police see someone, known to be a lawbreaker, about to murder someone, wouldn't it be permissible for them to preempt the murder with deadly force? One can argue that, even if al Awlaki's acts were in relative slow motion compared to the described police action, there is great similarity.

20111002-01 14:49 SteveG Fw: Occupy Wall St.

from Van Jones, RebuildTheDream.com:

Wall Street has long been the home of the biggest threat to American democracy. Now it has become home to what may be our best hope for rescuing it.

For everyone who loves this country, for everyone whose heart is breaking for the growing ranks of the poor, for everyone who is seething at the unopposed demolition of America's working and middle class: the time has come to get off the fence.

A new generation has gone to the scene of the crimes committed against our future. The time has come for all people of good will to give our full-throated backing to the young people of the Occupy Wall Street movement.

So this Wednesday, we're joining with MoveOn, and labor and community groups in New York for a massive march down to the Occupy Wall Street encampment. And for those who can't make it to New York, we're also holding a huge online "Virtual March on Wall Street" in solidarity with the brave protesters in New York.

Occupations are springing up all over the country as well. Our movement was born after Madison, Wisconsin, to stand up for middle and working class families. We've engaged 130,000 people to crowd-source our own jobs agenda—the Contract for the American Dream. In August, tens of thousands of us demonstrated for jobs in rallies across the nation. And this week in Washington, D.C., we host our first national gathering: the Take Back The American Dream conference.

The occupation of Wall Street—and the occupations throughout the country—are expressions of the same spirit and dynamic. And these particular demonstrations, perhaps uniquely, contain the spark to grow into a movement that can be transformative. They are the first, small step in the creation of a movement that can restore American democracy, and renew the American Dream.

Now is our time to choose. Will we keep rewarding those whose financial manipulations have brought us to ruin? Or will we stand with those whose democratic innovations are breathing life into our finest ideals? Both groups are within blocks of each other in downtown Manhattan.

For the past 30 years, the country has stood behind the titans on Wall Street and their values. We listened when they said that their banks were too big to fail. Today, there is only one thing that's too big to fail: the dreams of this new generation, finding its voice in Liberty Park. All of America should now stand with them. Thank you for being a part of, and believing in, this movement.

<http://www.occupytogether.org/>

—Van, Natalie, Billy, Jim, Ian, Somer, and the rest of the Rebuild the Dream team

20111003-01 14:00 SteveB "The Word Obama Won't Dare Say"

"The Word Obama Won't Dare Say" by LZ Granderson, CNN

Sept. 13, 2011 (<http://edition.cnn.com/2011/09/13/opinion/granderson-obama-stimulus/index.html?iref=obnetwork>)

(Grand Rapids, Mich.) Say what you will about the Republican Party's politics, but one thing I think we all can agree on is that they know how to control the message.

Instead of "educated," they say "elitist."

Instead of "the rich," they prefer "job creators."

And in their latest linguistic sleight of hand, the modern-day Houdinis have managed to turn "stimulus" into a four-letter word.

Or at least a word President Barack Obama no longer feels comfortable saying. In 2009, he couldn't say it enough. Now ... well, I didn't hear it once during his jobs speech last week, even though $447 billion in tax cuts and government spending would certainly qualify as being one.

Perry: 'Stimulus created zero jobs' But the president and his administration can avoid whatever word they choose in describing the jobs bill; that's not going to change what Republicans say about it:

"With the president traveling the country touting his Stimulus II plan, it is important to understand the lessons from his first stimulus," Republican National Committee Reince Priebus said.

"I suspect I am not the only American asking, if a trillion dollars' worth of stimulus didn't work, why will another $450 billion do the trick?" former New Mexico Gov. Gary Johnson asked.

"He had $800 billion worth of stimulus in the first round of stimulus. It created zero jobs, $400-plus billion in this package. And I can do the math on that one. Half of zero jobs is going to be zero jobs," said Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

As usual, Republicans are dictating the conversation, this time massaging their response to the president's jobs bill to support their assertion that his $787 billion stimulus package was a failure.

And each day Obama avoids saying the word, he inadvertently gives their claims credibility by appearing to distance himself from his initiative.

Instead of using equivocal language, the president just needs to reclaim the word "stimulus." And he needs to do it now as he tries to sell his jobs bill to the public. After all, it's not like anyone's forgotten the word or the 2009 measure he pushed through Congress. Might as well talk about its successes and shortcomings while trying to help out-of-work Americans, as opposed to being forced to do so in the general election, where such talk will be interpreted as simply trying to help himself.

Besides, the truth is the administration's projections were overly optimistic and failed to meet the president's own mark of keeping the unemployment rate under 8%. Not to mention by its very spending structure, the impact of the stimulus package was not even designed to be felt by the majority of Americans quickly, which may have been wise fiscally but not so politically.

However, even with all of that, for anyone to characterize the stimulus package as a complete failure means he or she either had no idea just how bad the country's economy was or they're just parroting partisan talking points. (Between May 1999 and May 2009, private-sector jobs increased by just 1.1%, the lowest 10-year period since the Depression.)

And I can't help but notice how the chatty Republicans' tongues are tied when it comes to mentioning the 750,000 jobs that were lost on average in the first three months of 2009, during which the stimulus took effect and how that number declined to 35,000 by the beginning of 2010?

And am I the only one who finds it strange that Republican leadership wants to deem the stimulus a failure but fails to mention the studies performed by economists across the political spectrum that credit the stimulus for staving off a depression.

And then there's front-runner Perry calling the president's stimulus package a failure during Monday's debate while not mentioning how he used $6 billion from the first "failed" stimulus package to balance his state's budget. Not sure what they call that in Texas, but in the Midwest we call that hypocrisy.

Maybe I'm just being silly for letting the facts get in the way of a good campaign slogan. Perhaps I'm a bit naive to think the GOP should actually point out the stimulus pros with the cons in hopes of finding a more perfect solution to the country's economic woes.

In any case, it seems Obama's strategy of trying to pass a jobs stimulus package without saying the word "stimulus" just makes talking about the bill more difficult than it has to be. And if he continues to let undecided voters believe the first stimulus package was unsuccessful, what's their motivation for getting behind him and pressuring their representatives to pass the second?

Or even vote for him?

20111003-02 06:02 Pam Re: Occupy Wall St.

Dear SteveG,

I've wondered for a long time when people were going to take to the streets, so I guess I shouldn't complain when they do. I'm delighted to see Americans making a collective public statement of our discontent. What I do wish, though, is that this movement—which I support—would articulate a specific cause(s). We could think about what would boil down into a catchy slogan like in the old days: "Make Love, Not War," "Hell, no, we won't go," "End Apartheid Now," "One Man, One Vote." Here are some ideas: End Tax Loopholes Now, Share the Wealth, Health Care for All, Support Our Schools, Social Security is Not a Gift, Take Back the Power, Vote as if Your Life Depended on it. These aren't very good, but you get the idea. I know we're all generally dissatisfied, but we need to put pressure on specific nerves. It's not just the Tea Party that's angry. Progressives need to do some shouting and hollering too. If we know where we want to go, I believe someone will emerge to lead us there. We all thought that would be Obama, and it may yet be, but we need to make enough noise to drown out the Right. They're not the only ones that need to be appeased.

20111003-03 06:04 Dennis Video: "Occupy Wall Street Protester Lectures Fox News Reporter"

Here's a Fox News interview that you won't be seeing on Fox News:

Video: "Occupy Wall Street Protester Lectures Fox News Reporter" by David Taintor, TPM

Oct. 3, 2011, (<http://tpmlivewire.talkingpointsmemo.com/2011/10/occupy-wall-street-protester-lectures-fox-news-reporter-video.php?ref=fpb>)

20111003-04 06:56 SteveB Re: Occupy Wall St.

Dear Pam,

I like your signs, Pam! Makes me think you must have been out there in the streets back in the day...I certainly was. Helping to publish an anti-war newspaper (The Spread Eagle) while I was in the army, plus appearing on Nashville, TN television during a protest, ended up keeping me out of Viet Nam as an almost sure-to-die medic. Part of the army wanted to get me out of the country as fast as possible, but another department wanted to investigate me, so they "flagged" my records, and I couldn't go anywhere. Nothing ever happened except that I didn't die in Viet Nam. I ended up working as a disk jockey at an Army radio station. The military and government are such stupid organizations. Even Republicans realize the latter, but seem to be blind to the former. Maybe it's that gun thing they got goin'?

But, ya, I've been amazed that with so many huge problems, especially for lower-income (or zero-income) people, that the people themselves are so sheep-like and sleepy. It's like they've been drugged with TV and football and the feeling that all is hopeless. We didn't used to feel this way in America.

And has been eloquently pointed out in these postings by Dennis and others, it is many of the most victimized who are the most confused, having decided that what's good for rich Republicans must be good for them too, and all the rest of us. Sorry, WRONG! Proven wrong by the last 30 years of U.S. history!

I'm so happy to see this movement of dissatisfaction grow! I love it when things work logically. Maybe, finally, people will remember who really has the power, though you might think the Arab Spring would have reminded them. But are we that brave and ballsy? Well, that remains to be seen. We appear to be nothing more than a nation of complete pu*sies, in every way, to me right now...people, government, business...all of it.

Something's wrong!

I do wish we had a leader who feels as so many of the rest of us do...that radical change is needed, but even more radical Republican change must be avoided at all cost. Where is that dude or lady?

20111004-01	07:54	SteveB	"Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Another excellent use of our tax dollars would be to spend a little more to do a better and more expeditious job of inspecting our crucial food supply.

"Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected" by Brad Racino, MSNBC

Oct. 3, 2011, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/44701433/ns/health-food_safety/#.Txcflm9SQhJ)

(As shipments rise, many say FDA can't ensure the food that ends up on your plate is safe.)

EAST LOS ANGELES, Calif.—At a sprawling warehouse here, two investigators from the U. S. Food and Drug Administration watched intently as 50 boxes of preserved bean curd from China were emptied into a grinding machine.

The monstrously loud apparatus worked its way through 1,800 glass bottles, grinding the glass and spewing out a stream of chunky yellow ooze that would be collected, treated and disposed of in the sewer system.

FDA investigators had decided that the bottles of bean curds were improperly heat-sealed and, as a result, were susceptible to harmful bacteria like botulism, which can be fatal.

The case of the destroyed bean curds was relatively straightforward: They had been flagged as suspect as soon as they arrived in port due to a defective heat seal and were sent directly to an FDA warehouse for testing.

That's not always how it happens.

The FDA's Los Angeles district is one of the busiest in the U. S., overseeing the inspection of more than half a million food shipments arriving through 24 ports of entry in the L.A. area. Through the port stream products like Cambodian rice by the ton, tapioca pearls from the Philippines, tea biscuits from China, sugar cane and fish from around the world.

In 2010, about 3,500 shipments here were refused entry because they were contaminated with filth, pesticides, drug residue or traces of salmonella, according to a News21 analysis of the FDA's database of import refusals. Some of the imports contained unsafe color additives or were mislabeled. And some were even poisonous.

Nationwide, the FDA said that last year it rejected nearly 16,000 food-related shipments out of more than 10 million that arrived in more than 320 ports.

"If it comes in here and it's bad," said Denise Williams, a supervisor in the FDA's Division of Import Operations in Southern California, "we're gonna get 'em."
Except when they don't.

Critics, including the U.S. Government Accountability Office, say the FDA is simply not up to the task of ensuring the safety of food imports, which are entering this country in ever-growing numbers. The FDA expects 24 million shipments of FDA-regulated goods to pass through the nation's ports of entry this year, up from 6 million a decade ago.

About this project

This three-part food safety series is the result of a partnership between msnbc.com and the Carnegie-Knight News21 program. The project, "How Safe is your Food?" was reported by 27 journalism students from Arizona State University, Harvard University, University of Maryland, University of Missouri and the University Nebraska.

During that time, the number of FDA investigators stayed constant at about 1,350. The agency began adding investigators in 2009 and now has about 1,800—still far short of the number required to keep up with the pace of imports.

In 2010, FDA inspectors physically examined 2.06 percent of all food-related imports. The FDA expects only 1.59 percent of all food imports to be examined this year and even less—only 1.47 percent—next year, according to its Office of Regulatory Affairs.

Which shipments get inspected is increasingly determined by a new computer system called PREDICT, or Predictive Risk-based Evaluation for Dynamic Import Compliance Targeting, that is now used at 70 percent of U.S. import operations at land, sea and air ports. It analyzes information such as a manufacturer's history with the agency, lab test results and even current weather patterns, assigning a risk-based score to each shipment to direct investigators toward the riskiest ones.

After a shipment is flagged, it's up to a person to investigate further. Investigators give top priority to the items with the highest scores and work their way down—at least, to the point they can with limited staff.

This summer, the FDA gave News21 unusual behind-the-scenes access at its largest operating district to show the ways in which front-line operations attempt to keep unsafe food from reaching American supermarket shelves and dinner tables.

Sensory tests

Bugs in your food? It's allowed!

1. Macaroni and noodle products: One insect fragment per gram.
2. Ground thyme: Less than 925 insect fragments per 10 grams.
3. Canned tomatoes: Nine or fewer fly eggs or four or fewer fly eggs and one maggot per 500 grams. (Source: FDA)

Steve Angold works out of a narrow lab at the FDA's new $40 million testing facility in Irvine, Calif. He is one of about 25 FDA specialists across the country who rely on their senses of sight, touch, taste and smell to detect decomposition or filth in food products.

"It's either pass or fail," Angold said. "Ocean grimy smells would be passing; even stale or fishy odors would be passing."

But if the food smells like turnips or cabbage, it's probably spoiled, he said.

"The worst ones are fecal," Angold continued, the fish inches from his face. "Some people refer to it as baby diapers. I don't have kids, so ..."

Reaching the tail, Angold laid the fish on a sterilized countertop.

"There's nothing wrong with this fish," he announced. "It's pretty good."

Organoleptic testing—or the evaluation of a food's taste, appearance, smell and texture—is one of several methods the FDA uses to determine the safety of food products. Others include chemical and microbiological tests as well as tests to detect insects.

Ants in your sugar? Some may be OK

A few doors down from Angold, entomologist John Sedwick placed a sample of sugar cane under a microscope and moved the Petri dish slowly under the lens until he spotted black ants—some whole, some cut in half, all dead—among the particles of sugar.

The FDA is tolerant of ants and other field insects that get mixed in with foods prior to harvesting because they pose little threat to human health. If investigators are uncertain, they can consult the "Food Defect Action Levels," a manual that sets out exactly how many insect parts, larvae or animal hairs are acceptable.

"Other things like blowfly maggots, cockroaches, they carry a whole host of food borne pathogens," such as bacteria and viruses as well as parasites, Sedwick said, "so there's a very low tolerance for those kinds of insects."

Entomologists also look for "anything that a human would find repulsive or aesthetically displeasing," he said.

"I've had samples where I've found rat hair, shrew hair, bat hair ... beetles, maggots ... all in one sample," he said.

Those are the food products the FDA rejects, either ordering the food to be destroyed like the Chinese bean curd or returned to the country it came from.

Circumventing the system

The food inspection system is far from foolproof.

In order to avoid holding up commerce, food shipments often are allowed to proceed directly from a port to the importer. The FDA may decide to physically inspect a shipment only after it has been moved.

But once food products are in the hands of the importer, there are opportunities for fraud. To thwart investigators, importers may re-label a shipment or swap out the original product for something more likely to pass FDA inspection, said Williams, the FDA supervisor.

Sometimes importers will mislabel products they know will get scrutiny.

"And they do get clever," Williams said.

A section of the Long Beach warehouse called "the museum" houses hundreds of confiscated items that importers tried to slip into this country by calling them something other than what they are.

The counterfeit Nike shoes piled onto one table were labeled rice sticks, Williams said. These will be passed to U.S. Customs and Border Protection, which might slap the importer with a fine.

FDA investigators admit they can't catch every risky import. There's just too much.

The FDA outlined some of the ways it is trying to keep up in a special report issued in July 2011, titled "Pathway to Global Product Safety and Quality." In the report, the agency said it has opened offices in several large food-exporting countries, including China, India and Costa Rica, and has boosted the number of inspections in other countries in an attempt to stop problems at the source.

Still, the report paints a gloomy picture of the FDA's ability to cope. "Despite ... recent improvements, FDA does not—nor will it—have the resources to adequately keep pace with the pressures of globalization," the report states.

Carl Nielsen, former director of the FDA's Office of Regulatory Affairs Division of Import Operations and Policy, said the biggest problem the FDA faces is an antiquated structure that focuses mostly on domestic food.

The FDA has about 1,800 investigators who oversee more than 44,000 U.S. food manufacturers and more than 100,000 additional registered food facilities, such as warehouses and grain elevators.

At the same time, the agency is responsible for nearly 200,000 foreign food facilities that have registered with the FDA in order to import the millions of food shipments that arrive in the U.S. each year.

With numbers like that, "Where would you want the people?" Nielsen said. "Would you want some people at the border? Well, there's very few."

FDA Public Affairs Officer Patricia El-Hinnawy said the number of investigators assigned to examine imported food shipments nationally is 277 full-time equivalents. That's just five more than in 2009. These employees do field exams, sample collections and conduct security reviews, among other things, at ports of entry around the country.

Nielsen said the FDA's food import operations are "still a bastard child" within the FDA. Until the agency sets up a separate, well-financed division devoted to food imports, inspections are "not going to happen effectively for a very, very long time," he said.

A new mandate

By the numbers: FDA in brief:

1. Budget: $784 million.
2. Responsible for the safety of 80 percent of the nation's food supply.
3. Employs 1,900 investigators in the U.S.
4. Employs an additional 900 investigators in the greater Washington area.
5. Responsible for oversight of 44,000 U.S. food manufacturers, 100,000 additional registered food facilities and 200,000 registered foreign facilities.

The Food Safety Modernization Act, passed earlier this year, gives the FDA a new mandate to make certain food is safe for U.S. consumers. Among the requirements are stricter rules for imported foods and more inspections.

The law places more responsibility for food safety on foreign manufacturers. And it calls for the FDA to inspect at least 600 foreign food facilities within the next year and to double the number of inspections each year for the next five years. That would mean 19,200 foreign inspections in year six.

The FDA inspected 354 foreign food establishments in 2010 and estimates it will inspect 994 in 2011.

In its July report, the FDA said the 2011 goal might be attainable but not the rest.

"It would be impossible for FDA to complete 19,200 foreign food inspections in year six without a substantial increase in resources or a complete overhaul in the way it operates," the report said.

More resources also are needed for intelligence-gathering and technological improvements, such as a global data-information sharing system, the FDA report said.

Technology, Nielsen said, has long been the biggest weak spot in the FDA's ability to monitor food imports. In 2000, FDA officials came up with a list of 10 things they needed to better monitor imports, and seven of them had to do with technology, Nielsen said.

"And I promise you, they're still not done," he said.

Additional resources are unlikely as Congress cuts spending in an effort to reduce the nation's debt. A measure in the U.S. House of Representatives would cut $285 million from the agency's 2012 budget, with $35 million coming from food safety, according to the Agriculture Appropriations Bill.

Los Angeles District Director Alonza Cruse said the FDA has made major improvements over the past decade, including better communication and collaboration with other agencies such as U.S. Customs and Border Protection and the use of PREDICT, the new computer system that is helping pinpoint which shipments should be inspected. But while PREDICT is a powerful tool, the safety of food imports still lies largely in the hands of investigators like Denise Williams and scientists like Steve Angold.

Until someone invents a robot that can distinguish safe food from unsafe food, Cruse said, it's "a person who has to ultimately decide, yea or nay."

While tools may be able to help do that more quickly, he said, ultimately "it all comes down to a person."

20111004-02	07:59	GaryC	Re: "Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

Dear SteveB,

I am not sure this story is accurate. All of the meat products we import are inspected in Denmark to U.S.D.A. standards and then pre approved in the U.S. before they can ship. In addition, all of the pastry products we purchase in France are inspected in France to U.S.D.A. standards and the pre approved before we can ship to the U.S.. Even for samples, we have to get clearance. Even if the goods are not inspected in the foreign country to U.S. standards, I would suspect that in the vast majority of cases that there is an inspection in the foreign country and in the U.S..

Is it to U.S. standards? Is it 100% tested? Probably not but the same goes for U.S. food and restaurants.

20111004-03 08:14 SteveB Re: "Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected"

Dear GaryC,

You know, meat (and dairy products in another way) works a little differently. I know from my work in the industry that every meat plant in the U.S. has to have a U.S.D.A. inspector on-site. He has to approve everything. It's a system that has served us well, I think.

Our problem is that our sauces keep getting hung up in Miami for long periods of time, even though, for 20 years or so, they have never found one problem. They just don't seem to have the resources to do their job.

When you look at thing like this and the status of our national infrastructure, education, etc., you gotta wonder how squeezing more dollars and jobs out of a shrinking economy is going to be able to turn things around or make anything better. Not that we even have much choice at this juncture. We have been put into such a difficult position by the Bush years. That's a fact. A fact Obama and the Democrats can use to re-educate the people with no memories.

20111004-04 12:53 Pam Re: Occupy Wall St.

Dear SteveB,

Actually, I wasn't out in the streets. I was even in Angel Flight, the girls who socialized and paraded around with the ROTC guys. I can't believe I ever did that, but I thought it was socially cool. I quickly woke up to reality after I graduated (DePauw was pretty conservative when I was there—one reason I "have issues" with it) and opposed the war. As I told you, we adopted a baby from Viet Nam in 1974. He just turned 38. I feel about Iraq and Afghanistan pretty much the way I felt about Viet Nam—such a waste of lives and money and for what? Kudos to you for taking a stand early on.

I have this overwhelming feeling that the whole engine of capitalism is grinding up the world. I've always been a capitalist (with qualifications), and I still am, I guess, but I think it's gotten way out of control. It's become as destructive an ideology as communism was. We don't have gulags yet (unless you count Gitmo), but Big Brother is gaining in power every day. Who has any secrets left, if the govt. decides it wants to poke around? Who controls the whole shooting match if not the corporations? I am so glad to see—finally—a protest movement gathering steam. It's amazing how long it took the mainstream media to finally start talking about it. I wonder why that could be? (Heavy irony.) The system needs to be changed, for sure, but once the genie of revolution is out of the bottle, you never know what will happen. I don't want a complete breakdown, and I fear that might happen. I can't imagine living under oppression or fearing for my life because of who I am or what I believe, as so many ordinary people are today in Afghanistan, Egypt, Iran, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Israel, etc. It feels today like anything is possible—and not all good, to say the least.

I'm so glad to be in touch with your group. It really does help me feel less alone. This is so funny (not ha, ha), as I actually have a great life. I took a long walk in our beautiful city garden this morning, and everything was green and lovely. It's a bit off-putting that most of the folks there are old, white-haired ladies. I don't want to think of myself as one of them, but it's wonderful to have the leisure and the energy to get out and enjoy the world. I'm trying not to be such a sourpuss, as you can see.

I must go pick up my grandson. Adorable doesn't begin to describe him.

20111004-05 13:02 Dennis "The Big Picture: A 40-Year Scan of the Right-Wing Corporate Takeover of America"

from SteveB:

I'm so happy to see this movement of dissatisfaction grow! I love it when things work logically. Maybe, finally, people will remember who really has the power, though you might think the Arab Spring would have reminded them. But are we that brave and ballsy? Well, that remains to be seen. We appear to be nothing more than a nation of complete pu*sies, in every way, to me right now...people, government, business...all of it. Something's wrong!

Dear SteveB et al.,

Here's a good discussion of how and why we've gotten to where we are now.

"The Big Picture: A 40-Year Scan of the Right-Wing Corporate Takeover of America" by Don Hazen and Colin Greer, AlterNet

Oct. 3, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/152605/>)

At this moment, there are growing protests on Wall Street in Manhattan, in Boston at the Bank of America, and in cities around the country. These embryonic and creative efforts are targeting the greed of the banks, the collusion of the corporate class with their corrupt elected officials, the high level of unemployment, the huge burden of student loans in a time of diminished opportunities, the increasing numbers of poor and hungry people, and much more. These protests, along with those earlier in Wisconsin, Michigan and Ohio, are signs of revival of a long tradition of popular revolt against excesses of wealth and the corporate class.

The new protests come after a long dark period—specifically the last 11 years of George W. Bush and Barack Obama—during which time conservatives have gained more power and ability to control the national debate than they have in the past 75 years. The current right-wing power presence, spiked by the corporate media's obsession with Tea Party protests, came most immediately as a result of the Great Recession caused by the housing bubble and obscene corruption of the banks. This crisis was exacerbated by large-scale anger about the subsequent bank bailout, and corporate-backed attacks on the health care reform package passed by Congress. But that is just part of the latest political news.

The conservative ascendancy is hardly an overnight phenomenon. Rather, it represents a dynamic shift in American politics that has taken place over more than 40 years, beginning in the 1970s. During this time, conservative billionaire donors, corporations and the Chamber of Commerce, all invested in conservative think-tanks and communications infrastructure, while Fox News, Rush Limbaugh and a broad and deep media network of right-wing pundits have come to dominate the public discourse.

Subsequently, the liberal/progressive side of the political equation has lost much of its influence from the period of the 1970s and early '80s. How this has happened over time is little understood. In fact, the lack of protest and effective organizing against the right wing during the Tea Party ascension especially has been a mystery to many, and a source of great frustration.

Colin Greer, a transplanted Brit, has observed and engaged in every phase of progressive politics. Greer is the author of a number of books (with his best-known being The Great School Legend), has been a professor at Brooklyn College of CUNY, and for many years has served as president of the New World Foundation, known in the philanthropic world for its commitment to supporting grassroots organizing and providing seed money for many of the most effective progressive political efforts over the last decades. Over this long period, Greer has had a cat-seat view of all the forces that have shaped our last 40-plus years. He has a big-picture take on the turmoil and politics of this period, as major shifts—globally, economically and culturally; the tectonic plates of change and reaction—have reshaped our world in ways we have yet to fully understand. AlterNet sat down with Colin Greer in his office in New York in late September.

Don Hazen: Why have conservatives succeeded so dramatically in this period, and liberals and progressives are arguably the weakest in decades?

Colin Greer: There is no single causal factor. The shaping of these two divergent paths begins in the 1980s when you had the last flourish of an expansive society. But the last three years of the '70s were characterized by stagflation and disappointment and took a great toll, forfeiting a real sense that the constant growth of openness in American society and economy was endlessly sustainable. Fast-forward to the present and we have the twin dominance of austerity, i.e.

eviscerating public spending as the solution to economic crises; and aristocracy, represented by the protected tax and profit oasis of the wealthiest 1 percent.

It's instructive to note that events in the U.S. are not in isolation. Back in the '60s and '70s when progressive movements were in ascendency, the liberation themes of the time were part of a global anti-colonial uprising, and broad disgust at the war in Vietnam. Today, trade policies and globalization means that the other major economies of the world are also in the grips of a greed and hyper-profit which is in the process of discarding hard won values, rights and decent living conditions.

DH: That was Carter and also the hostage crisis too at the end of the '70s, yes?

CG: Yeah, it's about how social and economic consciousness changed. Carter's inability to act effectively in the hostage crisis or to defeat stagflation reinforced a national feeling of malaise and weakness. That's why Reagan campaigned on "hope in America" versus Carter's kind of dismal, high-standing morality, an apparent inability to act from strength. It was the beginning of a long term of undermining the presumption of multi-dimensional social and economic expansion, which had flourished since World War II.

So in the 1980s you had Reagan, along with the last flourish of direct political action on the left and the last gasps of the global social change that characterized the 1960s and '70s; i.e. the fight against apartheid, which succeeded in turning the Reagan administration around to support the anti-apartheid/ divestment movement, and you had the Nuclear Freeze movement.

DH: These were the last grassroots successes of the left?

CG: Yes. Although one can never do a one to one equation, the Freeze was a factor in Reagan's shift in nuclear arms negotiations with the Russians and the anti-apartheid divestment strategies, fueled by a popular movement with strong student leadership, which created shantytowns on campuses throughout America, helped win that struggle.

But then there was a dramatic change in direction when the air traffic controllers went on strike. Reagan seized the moment, and fired the air traffic controllers, destroying PATCO, their union. That was the beginning of the end of the labor deal with capital; a deal that was carved out in the Cold War in which labor got negotiated settlements here at home for its support for the Cold War abroad. In a sense it was anti-red internationally and social democratic here in the United States. And that deal went through the beginning of the 1980s, until Reagan, responding to the conservative base, changed the ground rules. And with it, labor's guaranteed negotiating strength ended.

We have seen a diminishing power of labor since. And we've also seen a shrinking power of popular movements on the left as well, so that by the time we got to the invasion of Iraq, a million people in the street could be ignored. How different that was from the last gasps of enduring popular protest against Reagan's contra-aid and its illegal processes.

DH: Those demonstrations against the Iraq invasion seemed like a big deal at the time, a major accomplishment, and around the world as well.

CG: Yeah, but for only one day. What is required is the ability to constantly bring people out and not end it when there's no popular response. You need to get the news story, and push the politicians to shift. We're up against the kind of new politics in which they didn't shift and we didn't come out with continual resistance, and that inability to resist played out in the 1990s when you have a Democratic president who was disappointing over and over, with no popular mobilization against his deregulation of the finance industry or his welfare reform initiative.

DH: Is it possible to have a popular movement against a disappointing Democratic president?

CG: I think it was in 1992, but only theoretically; it didn't happen. By the 1990s, because progressives in a sense had been disciplined by the reduced power of labor, by the new power of the right, the visceral fear that Republicans would be worse, and the fact that a certain amount of administration figures came from progressive organizations and might still influence policy, all contributed to a lack of action against Clinton policies. And there is another crucial point: by the time we get to late 1980s and 1990s, social movements on the left were essentially demobilized into NGOs and legislative agendas, so progressive politics became more about winning elections, seeking legislative reform, and building not-for-profit institutions that represented progressive vision and options. There no longer was a base beyond labor, which was itself shrinking.

DH: How sudden was this shift from more popular movements to foundation-funded projects?

CG: It happened over time. The trends were growing in the early '70s because progressives had control over a lot of federal spending, and a lot of activists had access to all the major agencies. There was a kind of flourish of success and even progress under Nixon. Legislative efforts were working. We especially got environmental legislation, and it looked like the courts were on our side. Meanwhile the right, in earnest, started building both its base and its options, with think tanks, organizations and communications capacity. But by 1990, the left so to speak, except for labor, had become almost entirely dependent on foundation support, which was based in the IRS 501 (c) (3) tax structure which required grant recipients to be non-partisan. But it was influential at the level of government and so it felt like it could deliver through the lobbying capacity of NGOs and by winning in the electoral, legislative and judicial spheres.

In the '80s, when they saw the right-wing agenda through Reagan taking serious root, many groups worked on voter registration to expand the electorate, but were constrained again by the IRS rules. It took a Jesse Jackson presidential campaign as a reminder that you need a popular base to move an agenda and to build a popular base to undercut the climate of low taxes, high profits, and the growing transfer of public assets into private control. Jackson created a social movement—he went to organized farm workers, he worked with gay activists, he really did see that campaign as a progressive, social movement campaign.

But after Jackson ('84 and '88) that kind of campaign mobilization didn't happen again until Obama. And Jackson did exactly what Obama did. He demobilized his campaign agency. He turned into a kind of not-for-profit organization, and Obama turned it into the Democratic Party. But they are two moments—and it's interesting that both black figures produced the sense of a national movement. But the end of the Jackson campaign coincided with end of '80s, and that was where the Democratic Leadership Council, that Clinton led, emerged strongly and represented the shift to a "new progressive politics" where they made progressive mean something else. Imagine if the Jackson campaign had remained mobilized in relation to the Clinton administration and/or if the Obama campaign had remained live going into the 2010 elections when victories on the right were won by small margins.

DH: I assume when you say progressive came to mean something else, it meant moderate?

CG: In a sense once you had Murdoch and Fox and a growing conservative infrastructure, it labeled the DLC—transfused Democratic party—as the left. Any real left was marginalized into virtual invisibility and anonymity, the center was moved significantly to the right, and progressives increasingly pushed into protecting eroding rights and benefits, without a political infrastructure or national leadership of its own. In the electoral arena, in the media, and in the mainstream foundation world, moderate was called left or liberal, and leaders in pursuit of public office more and more have eschewed the liberal label by moving ever so profoundly to the right.

DH: So the middle became the left, and the conservatives keep moving successfully to the right—a trend we have seen reach the present moment of the far, far right influencing the political process. And there has been no pendulum swinging back, that's for sure.

CG: Yes, and one of the critical ingredients in this huge shift rightward over the last few decades, as I inferred earlier, was the end of the Cold War. The collapse of the Soviet Union had a profound effect on two things: 1) the idea that there was a left alternative, and that there was a path to reform that had the best interest of the public at large as its highest priority, and had the "state" involved directly in business and the interest of public; and 2) the shift of states in the Soviet orbit to capitalism basically made capitalism the world model. So then it was a question of what you did in the framework of capitalism, not challenging its framework. That's been the umbrella for China, India, Brazil. All over, left groups moved into the electoral arena, and didn't challenge the capitalist model. As a result, we now have a global context that advances austerity and aristocracy in support of a global capitalism that has declared war on the social contract.

In the Scandinavian model, they're more responsive to public conditions, but not to challenging capitalism itself. I'm not arguing that we need a left to challenge capitalism because it isn't clear that we do have that option. But what we're faced with now is that any system that has monopoly status moves toward tyranny. So we're now seeing that 40 years of the rogue rise of the right has produced a tyrannical right. All of the conditions, the improvements around tolerance and cultural openness and responsibility for the poorest of the poor, the perspective that a healthy society is one that has a priority to care for all its people—those standards have so diminished so that you have candidates now talking about the fact that people may have to starve. And that's now a legitimate thing to say. Killing gets cheered by the GOP grassroots. The four Republican debates so far are really interesting because they indicate something really seriously bad.

DH: The rise of the Tea Party, aided by its intense promotion by the corporate media, has given the public the sense that there is a powerful angry grassroots movement underway. How does that play out?

CG: Tyranny grows first of all in the establishment of a legitimization of its point of view, even on the margins. You can see it in Swift Boat attacks on John Kerry, a war hero, and with Murdoch and Roger Ailes growing Fox. There is the constant testing of a model that is very similar in tone to the most successful moment of progressives in the 1960s. It reaches into high levels of rhetorical hysteria. When we were on the streets 40 years ago there was a kind of hysteria—police were the enemy. There's a similar level of hysteria now. What that means is basically that on the road to power, most people committed to power will use the "crowd"—they construct a crowd. You need the crowd, even if it's only a tiny fraction of the population. If the crowd is visible through spectacle then you start conditioning the public's readiness to act, and you encourage readiness of others not to act.

So in the present political reality, you have the convergence of the crowd's mentality, with the readiness to be tyrannical in leadership, with leaders in Congress like Jim DeMint, Eric Cantor, and of course funding for it all from the Kochs. This tyrannical style of leadership has grown through the Bush years to a dramatic level, and has not been effectively challenged by Obama. You have the growth of the crowd and the paralysis of public at large. When you look at poll data there is no way in which the public agrees with the Tea Party or with right-wing political figures, but it is paralyzed, and paralyzed serially over time.

A million people on the street didn't get listened to over the Iraq invasion, or the defeat of Kerry through usurping of the public stage by Swift Boat in 2000. Then the inability of Gore to fight for his election followed by the Supreme Court decision which gave us eight years of Bush. The choice to fight or not is rarely a popularly held prerogative until the public bursts forth as perhaps in the Arab Spring. Until such moments, leadership is top down, especially in the electoral arena, where money and incumbency determine authority and good judgment.

The Tea Party is the latest in a series of experiments—remember the Promise Keepers and the Christian Coalition back in the '80s—to advance right-wing politics from the margins to a new center. We've been holding them off time and time again but not by producing anything for the future. Instead we have benefitted from the cultural victories of the '70s and '80s that have become enshrined in entertainment conventions and interpersonal lifestyles. In both realms we have taken great strides to persuade Americans that young people should have the vote at 18, that women are equal, that abortion is pretty much something you can argue rhetorically but hard to lose practically, but now we're losing ground on everything. The death penalty for a while looked like we were humane, we don't just kill people—we've lost ground on that. We didn't go to war casually—we've lost ground on that pretty disastrously.

DH: Without tension of competing systems, is there an inevitable march to the extreme? Is there a theory that most extreme seems to always win out?

CG: The fact is, a society grows into tyranny over time as the most powerful cultivate extreme crowd behavior, which, unless resisted can have a contagion effect into the public at large, paralyzing resistance and recruiting frightened supporters. While clearly minority politics, the Tea Party zealots who cheered at death and execution in the Republican debates much as Sarah Palin once called on us to "Drill, baby, drill!" ought to be a reminder and a warning. But I don't know any mainstream media that treated the cheers for the death penalty and barbarous inhumanity to the sick as a story truly worth engaging. The crowd is the critical thing that tyranny requires eventually—the mobilization of the crowd. With recessions every 10 years, the circumstances periodically creates the possibility for angry people to be organized into a crowd. Progressives did that. The New Deal was about using the circumstance of the depression to organize a progressive crowd.

DH: Mostly organized by the Communist Party. But we have no capacity to do that now?

CG: and the Socialist party. But there was a plethora of organizations. And no, we have no apparent capacity do that now, although we desperately need it. New protests and organizing efforts are definitely sparks of hope. But that kind of action is primarily on the right.

DH: It's a resource question, too?

CG: Yes, and it's also a planning and leadership question. The Socialist party, Catholic Workers, Communists—they were planners, they had an agenda not limited by electoral and legislative politics, and not dependent on foundation resources for scale. Forty years ago a dozen small progressive foundations could help support strong action and analysis. The big checks now come from professionalized, very mainstream foundations that do not, as was the case with the earlier funders, institutionally identify with a progressive world view.

DH: The Kochs write the big checks for the right today. So is the weakness primarily an issue of class—resources staying in the educated class?

CG: No. It is that and it is something deeper, more psychological. When I was in England a bit ago, I was talking to a Syrian cab driver, this was in the middle of the Arab Spring. I said, why is it that you've got (this was before the riots) English kids protesting at Trafalgar Square against tuition increases? You've got women in Rome—a million people—protesting against Silvio Berlusconi. The next day they've all gone home, the kids have gone home. In America we had the resistance against the Iraq war, they went home. But in Egypt they came back every single day. In Yemen they come back every day. And he said, "Well, we in the West have freedom. They don't have the freedom."

So there is some way in which we have the consciousness here that we have something that could be lost that we don't want to risk. In the Middle East, there is nothing left to be lost.

DH: So fast-forward to the present. How has the right-wing philosophy which has dramatically increased its influence, changed the nature of government?

CG: What we are up against is the constant reduction of compassion as the highest priority in how you make public policy and deliver public goods. The right wants to take public space. They want to take public resources. In response, progressives get lost in the message of trying to re-instill belief in government. With the government argument, I think we're missing the point, both in terms of compassion but also that it's not about belief in government. It's about who owns government and what it's for. Despite the right's anti-government rhetoric, their practice is pro government. But it is government for them. So we must challenge the principle of who owns government. We are saying they've diminished the belief in government, but why does Rick Perry want to become president of the United States and, in effect, CEO of the nation's investment engine, that is, government.

It's not because he doesn't believe in government, it's because he wants to control government. They want to control and privatize government resources. Capitalism is exhausted here. It needs more public money. It's always needed public money, it needs more now. When you look at the growth of capitalism in America from railroads all the way to the computer, it's publicly funded. I say to people what do Velcro and GPS have in common? They were both created by the military. And who is making a profit from that? Does the public get any return for its investment?

But if we had a conception of government that was not only tax agent, service deliverer, but also an investor in the economy like a bank, and it was entitled to a return just the way a bank gets return, we'd have plenty money. But we don't treat ourselves as the investor. But every major technological growth has been publicly invested in. If we were a shareholder in Microsoft because we invented the computer, it would be a very different terrain. So the reinvention of capitalism is the issue, and the reinvention of government is what is happening. So capitalism is directly claiming public investment now.

DH: Can you provide a current example of the privatization impulse?

CG: Charter schools are a very good case study for the impulse. Forget anti-unionism; forget whether or not they work, because they don't. But even if they did they are not cheaper. Charter schools are simply the transfer of public money to profit-making activity. That's the system they are steadily building—prisons, schools, public parks, there's a conversion of the whole system into an investment of capital which is a major extension of what's always been true.

It's a way of government supporting the expenditure of money, but it has been organized so that it stays in private control. And in private control it's become increasingly privileged in how the decisions are made. So you've got hedge fund people now funding charter schools—they are the largest engine behind charter schools. And so they care about education. Some of them even believe public schools are so bad we need this alternative.

But there's not a lot of thinking about whether profit is compatible with learning. If profit is the major goal and keeping costs down is the major goal, then how do you have learning be the major goal? That's exactly the contradiction. If you're going to have learning be the major goal, you have to invest in it like you would a war. You don't in a war say the major goal is how to make profit and we'll only fight the war according to the profit.

DH: With the enormous investment in military arms, and more recently mercenaries, it seems like we are headed there.

CH: Well, that is one reason we have more war. But in the end hopefully you can't sell to the public that the measure of our success here is profit. And in education, we're saying basically you can trust profit. The market will give you better results. There's no reason to believe that. The public hasn't accepted it, although it's getting pushed on them because of the power that's established in the state houses. Also, what's not well understood, is there are three kinds of charters. So the privatization has three identities and they're being merged. One is public school experiments with the charter system. The second is not-for-profit charters run by not-for-profit organizations are closer to the base. The third is the for-profit charter.

The first two models are perfectly fine. We have private schools and parochial schools which have tax exemptions so they're only quasi private. Those two forms are part of the American education fabric, so having another thing called charters wouldn't be a problem. It's nice to experiment with different forms of government organization and curriculum. But the for-profit charter is a very different entity and to allow it to be conflated with the other two is basically to let the Trojan horse in.

DH: As a longtime foundation executive, how has philanthropy exacerbated the progressive weakness?

CG: Foundations mostly gave money according to sociology or class, so people gave money to organizations led by people most like them, or slowly there was entry of people who were not like them but were being identified by people like them, and also very little money when you think about it. If you take the most successful community based organization in philanthropy at community based building level, it's probably SCOPE in Los Angeles.

And they went from a $5,000 grant to its founder from New World Foundation to a $3 million, maybe a $4 million budget, which took 25 years to get to. We have a number of very strong local and state organizations that have built powerful bases to influence local politics, pioneering such inventions as "living wage," and "community benefits." But to date this is a record of policy reform and some electoral victories for local leaders, all of which is very important. It is, however, not yet a coherent, comprehensive and compelling base for challenging the structural realignment of capitalism in our time.

DH: What are the consequences of that lack of a base to challenge the excesses of capitalism?

CG: So middle-income workers and people in impoverished communities are all under serious attack by this realignment, and are not yet organized in an aggressive agenda of their own within a worldview they share. I think there's a sense that we have more to lose than to gain in such action at this time, but time may be running out on that one. Most people do have a certain level of freedom, they have a lot of harassment—but they have a certain level of freedom. And for the average African American who is now 25—they have family that experienced the change so they are freer than they were.

They don't get off the street curb when they're coming up to a white person. They can be on the street with a white date or partner. There have been significant changes, not necessarily lasting changes, but changes that make you feel you've got something. The real danger is now that the economy can't produce the benefits it was producing, and the greed in capitalism has gone to such an extreme, that the Captains of capitalism seem not to be concerned about the social order dangers that the extreme inequalities create, which opens the gates to fascism.

When you have the a tyrannical crowd, you have the tendency to tyranny, you have the crowd behaving the way they did in those four Republican debates. So while they're only a minority, they're setting a tone. In the first debate nobody was willing to say that a dying child, a very ill child, should get medical care. In the second debate you've got cheering for the death penalty. In the third debate you've got the call to kill, for a young man who's on life support. And in the fourth debate the gay soldier is booed. So you've got this extreme hysteria that is not being challenged.

DH: So you can imagine serious political repression here in the U.S.? Where is the hope?

CG: I think we know what's going to come down. I think people know. People are afraid. There's an implicit fear. And also there are moments when spontaneity breaks out. Who knows, we may be lucky enough that spontaneity e.g. at Occupy Wall Street that will help produce a social movement. And all that's been funded and developed will be ready to move. We don't have that now. There was a kind of serial violence that you couldn't have predicted, when Martin Luther King was assassinated. The Nuclear Freeze movement was not predictable when it suddenly flourished. You can't predict them. But it's obvious why after they happen.

So we don't know that we don't have the ground for something major to happen. In almost every state, strong organizations have been developed that might well be the basis for movement capacity when forces outside of their own terrain call them to new and unified action. If one looked at the black churches before the Civil Rights Movement flourishes of the 1960s, they probably would not have looked as strong one by one as they did when called to unified action. So too with their leaders. Indeed, so too with the Tea Party and right-wing movements. The external call for the latter has been heavy duty private money and a driving corporate agenda that is committed to reversing the deals it made since the 1930's.

But what's observable is the right has established an ideology and a worldview, a sense of what's right and what's wrong that has captured enough of public to dominate news with visible activism, and to paralyze public at large. That doesn't mean they can hold onto it, but that's the phenomenon were facing. The economy has no ability to buy the public back into the equation. This recent disaster relief controversy is an example. We are unable to buy back into the equation of what looked like we had won forever—that is the public good. We've lost a major piece of the ideology that was built over 40 or 50 years—that we care about people in pain. If we don't have the ideology that we care about people in pain as your basic ethical compass, then you have the kill mentality. Because we're always balancing between compassion and fear. If compassion doesn't dominate and you don't have resources to feel you can be compassionate without paying a high price yourself, then you're going to turn to fear to protect what you've got, or reach your hand out for what you can get.

I think the health care debate is an interesting case to consider in all this. Obviously, the social benefit is intrinsic to a progressive perspective. The kind of health care reform we've received is, for a variety of reasons, insufficient and insecure. Foundation funding for advancing public education and lobbying ran to the millions of dollars but it was all silo policy oriented and for the most part, top down. If that kind of money could have been used to help build a comprehensive foundational commitment to social welfare and organizational capacity, a partial achievement might well have helped produce a powerful movement advance.

DH: Does that loss of the moral compass, along with the fear, have to translate into passivity? How do we combat that?

CG: Well, I don't know that were not doing some of what is necessary. We have to reinvest in the ideology... lots of organizations have gotten lost in the idea that you have to invest in resurrecting belief in government. This is about messages. Elections may be fought on messages. Social movements are about consciousness. We have still to invest psychically, financially and organizationally in rebuilding a shared consciousness for a threshold number of Americans that is characterized in the idea that we want a compassionate society and that government is the best vehicle to deliver that.

One thing I didn't mention about the '80s that the assault on government that Reagan led, the left created earlier. We talked about problems of welfare system, about the ineffectiveness of the education system—that was us. Cloward and Piven, me, everybody. We undermined that system. We didn't have a sense, probably because we were young, that you win a victory and then you evolve the maturity of that victory. We wanted it to be correct, and the right will suffer the same hubris—they're moving way beyond their ideological reach, beyond the ability to deliver it.

DH: So, what happens in the interim? What about political repression?

CG: As Eric Cantor said, "People could starve." He said, "If you haven't saved for a rainy day yourself, that's your responsibility."

That's the opposite of compassion; that generates fear. And if you have violence on the street, they will have their own excuse for political repression. If there is an excess of even the right-wing on the street you could have the excuse of police intervention that looks like it's in public interest. But we have work to do, not least is to protect the moment. By that I mean, we should give serious thought about the impact of colluding in the electoral defeat of this president by undermining him publicly and reducing his viability as a candidate. The alternative is truly dangerous.

At the same time, we must think of ourselves in a political era that calls for breaking from the conventions of recent political discourse that has narrowed our social and political vision. It's time to name what is happening in our country without hysteria, but to be clear that the next elections are part of a struggle for a social and cultural threshold that will determine the quality of life and democracy in this country.

And we need to keep in mind what's always been true in the politics of social movements—they are the province of the young. Just look for example at how the brave young people in the Dream Act campaigns have actually won victories against inhumane ICE practices. They took and they take risks. Now, as other young people are stepping up to make powerful statements, take risks, try new tactics, they need our support and understanding.

(Don Hazen is the executive editor of AlterNet. Colin Greer is president of the New World Foundation in New York. Among his books is A Call to Character (HarperCollins, 1995).)

© 2011 Independent Media Institute

20111004-06 16:26 SteveB Re: "The Big Picture"
--

from "The Big Picture: A 40-Year Scan of the Right-Wing Corporate Takeover of America" by Don Hazen and Colin Greer, AlterNet, Oct. 3, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/152605/>)

...we must challenge the principle of who owns government. We are saying they've [the Republicans] diminished the belief in government, but why does Rick Perry want to become president of the United States and, in effect, CEO of the nation's investment engine, that is, government?

It's not because he doesn't believe in government, it's because he wants to control government. They want to control and privatize government resources. Capitalism is exhausted here. It needs more public money. It's always needed public money, it needs more now. When you look at the growth of capitalism in America from railroads all the way to the computer, it's publicly funded. I say to people, what do Velcro and GPS have in common? They were both created by the military. And who is making a profit from that? Does the public get any return for its investment?

But if we had a conception of government that was not only tax agent, service deliverer, but also an investor in the economy like a bank, and it was entitled to a return just the way a bank gets return, we'd have plenty of money. But we don't treat ourselves as the investor. But every major technological growth has been publicly invested in. If we were a shareholder in Microsoft because we invented the computer, it would be a very different terrain. So the reinvention of capitalism is the issue, and the reinvention of government is what is happening. So capitalism is directly claiming public investment now.

We don't even get the public royalties from mineral rights and minerals that almost all other countries demand from corporate exploiters. We don't tax imports created with near-slave labor and dreadful pollution. Instead, we shutter our own factories. We give the rich a free ride, essentially. These are now our public policies, even with Obama as President.

Such a perilous slope we have descended, my friends...

20111004-07 18:14 Dennis "Top Five Reasons Why the Occupy Wall Street Protests Embody Values of the Real Boston Tea Party"
--

Getting the facts straight about Tea Parties...

"Top Five Reasons Why the Occupy Wall Street Protests Embody Values of the Real Boston Tea Party" by Lee Fang, ThinkProgress

Oct. 4, 2011, (<http://www.truth-out.org/top-five-reasons-why-occupy-wall-street-protests-embody-values-real-boston-tea-party/1317739240>) (<http://thinkprogress.org/politics/2011/10/03/333925/top-5-reasons-why-the-occupy-wall-street-protests-embody-values-of-the-real-boston-tea-party/?mobile=nc>)

In recent years, the Boston Tea Party has been associated with a right-wing movement that supports policies favoring powerful corporations and the wealthy. As ThinkProgress has reported, lobbyists¹ and Republican front groups² have driven the current manifestation of the Tea Party to push for giveaways to oil companies and big businesses.

However, the Occupy Wall Street demonstrations picking up momentum across the country better embody the values of the original Boston Tea Party. In the late 18th century, the British government became deeply entwined with the interests of the East India Trading Company, a massive conglomerate that counted British aristocracy as shareholders. Americans, upset with a government that used the colonies to enrich the East India Trading Company, donned Native American costumes and boarded the ships belonging to the company and destroyed the company's tea. In the last two weeks, as protesters have gathered from New York to Los Angeles to protest corporate domination over American politics, a true Tea Party movement may be brewing:

1. The Original Boston Tea Party Was a Civil Disobedience Action Against a Private Corporation.

In 1773, agitators blocked the importation of tea by East India Trading Company ships across³ the country. In Boston harbor, a band of protesters led by Samuel Adams boarded the corporation's ships and dumped the tea into the harbor. No East India Trading Company employees were harmed, but the destruction of the company's tea is estimated to be worth up to $2 million⁴ in today's money. The Occupy Wall Street protests have targeted⁵ big banks like Goldman Sachs, Bank of America, as well as multinational corporations like GE with sit-ins and peaceful rallies.

2. The Original Boston Tea Party Feared That Corporate Greed Would Destroy America.

As Professor Benjamin Carp has argued⁶, colonists perceived the East India Trading Company as a "fearsome monopolistic company that was going to rob them blind and pave the way maybe for their enslavement." A popular pamphlet called The Alarm agitated for a revolt against the East India Trading Company by warning that the British corporation would devastate America⁷ just as it had devastated South Asian colonies: "Their Conduct in Asia, for some Years past, has given simple Proof, how little they regard the Laws of Nations, the Rights, Liberties, or Lives of Men. [...] And these not being sufficient to glut their Avarice, they have, by the most unparalleled Barbarities, Extortions, and Monopolies, stripped the miserable Inhabitants of their Property, and reduced whole Provinces to Indigence and Ruin."

3. The Original Boston Tea Party Believed Government Necessary to Protect Against Corporate Excess.

Smithsonian historian Barbara Smith has noted⁸ that Samuel Adams believed that oppression could occur when governments are too weak. As Adams explained in a Boston newspaper, government should exist "to protect the people and promote their prosperity." Patriots behind the Tea Party revolt believed "rough economic equality was necessary to maintaining liberty," says Smith. Occupy Wall Street protesters demand⁹ a country that invests in education, infrastructure, and jobs.

4. The Original Boston Tea Party Was Sparked by a Corporate Tax Cut for a British Corporation.

The Tea Act, a law by the British Parliament exempting tea imported by the East India Trading Company from taxes and allowing the corporation to directly ship its tea to the colonies for sale, is credited with setting off the Boston Tea Party. The law was perceived as an effort by the British to bailout the East India Trading Company by shutting off competition from American shippers. George R.T. Hewes, one of the patriots who boarded the East India Trading Company ships and dumped the tea⁷, told a biographer that the East India Trading Company had twisted the laws so "it was no longer the small vessels of private merchants, who went to vend tea for their own account in the ports of the colonies, but, on the contrary, ships of an enormous burthen, that transported immense quantities of this commodity." Occupy Wall Street demands¹⁰ the end of corporate tax loopholes as well as the enactment of higher taxes on billionaires and millionaires.

5. The Original Boston Tea Party Wanted a Stronger Democracy.

There is a common misconception that the Boston Tea Party was simply a revolt against taxation. The truth is much more nuanced, and there were many factors behind the opposition to the East India Company and the British government. Although the colonists resented taxes levied⁸ by a distant British Parliament, in the years preceding the Tea Party, the Massachusetts colony had levied taxes several times to pay for local services. The issue at hand was representation and government accountable to the needs of the American people. Patrick Henry and other patriots organized the revolutionary effort by claiming that legitimate laws and taxes could only be passed by legislatures elected by Americans. According to historian Benjamin Carp, the protesters in Boston perceived that the British government's actions were set by the East India Trading Company. "As Americans learned more about the provisions of the new East India Company laws, they realized that Parliament would sooner lend¹¹ a hand to the Company than the colonies," wrote Carp.

Links:

¹http://thinkprogress.org/politics/2009/04/14/37536/lobbying-clients-teaparties/.

²http://thinkprogress.org/politics/2011/09/06/312478/koch-admits-tea-party-gop-gotv/.

³http://books.google.com/books?id=XvAQAQAAMAAJ&pg=PA374&lpg=PA374&dq=charleston+east+india+company+rot&source=bl&ots=Fu29FF4zpl&sig=zBJN4qsS1Ddm1-S_XJs1Czk-7nU&hl=en&ei=KMaITrrCLK3diALqtbyLDQ&sa=X&oi=book_result&ct=result&resnum=1∓ved=0CB4Q6AEwAA#v=onepage&q=charleston%20east%20india%20company%20rot&f=false.

⁴<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052748703673604575550510314664790.html>.

⁵http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/10/01/bank-of-america-protests_n_990100.html.

⁶<http://www.time.com/time/nation/article/0,8599,2031687,00.html>.

⁷<http://www.thomhartmann.com/blog/2009/04/real-boston-tea-party-was-against-wal-mart-1770s>.

⁸<http://hnn.us/articles/134859.html>.

⁹<https://occupywallst.org/forum/proposed-list-of-demands-for-occupy-wall-st-moveme/>.

¹⁰<https://occupywallst.org/forum/specific-demand-and-action-list-for-washington-dc/>.

¹¹<http://books.google.com/books?id=upd6d3UDfTgC&dq=benjamin+carp+tea+party+corrupt&sitesec=reviews>.

20111005-01 03:11 SteveB "Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes"
--

Maybe it's time to re-think the wars...

Obama, where are you, dude? Why do you always have to do Bush's dirty work? Stop!

"Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes" by Robert Burns, AP

Oct. 5, 2011, (<http://news.yahoo.com/poll-1-3-vets-sees-iraq-afghan-wars-040253311.html>)

(http://www.northjersey.com/news/international/100511_Poll_1_in_3_vets_sees_Iraq_Afghan_wars_as_wastes.html)

(WASHINGTON) One in three U.S. veterans of the post-9/11 military believes the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan were not worth fighting, and a majority think that after 10 years of combat America should be focusing less on foreign affairs and more on its own problems, according to an opinion survey released Wednesday.

The findings highlight a dilemma for the Obama administration and Congress as they struggle to shrink the government's huge budget deficits and reconsider defense priorities while trying to keep public support for remaining involved in Iraq and Afghanistan for the longer term.

Nearly 4,500 U.S. troops have died in Iraq and about 1,700 in Afghanistan. Combined war costs since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks have topped $1 trillion.

The poll results presented by the Pew Research Center portray post-9/11 veterans as proud of their work, scarred by warfare and convinced that the American public has little understanding of the problems that wartime service has created for military members and their families.

The survey also showed that post-9/11 veterans are more likely than Americans as a whole to call themselves Republicans and to disapprove of President Barack Obama's performance as commander in chief. They also are more likely than earlier generations of veterans to have no religious affiliation.

The Pew Research Center, a nonpartisan organization that studies attitudes and trends, called the study the first of its kind. The results were based on two surveys conducted between late July and mid-September. One polled 1,853 veterans, including 712 who had served in the military after 9/11 but are no longer on active duty. Of the 712 post-9/11 veterans, 336 served in Iraq or Afghanistan. The other polled 2,003 adults who had not served in the military.

Nearly half of post-9/11 veterans said deployments strained their relationship with their spouses, and a similar share reported problems with their children. On the other hand, 60 percent said they and their families benefited financially from having served abroad in a combat zone. Asked for a single word to describe their experiences, the war veterans offered a mixed picture: "rewarding," "nightmare," "eye-opening," "lousy."

There are about 98,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, where the conflict began with a U.S.-led invasion on Oct. 7, 2001. Obama campaigned for the presidency in 2008 on getting out of Iraq and ramping up the military campaign in Afghanistan. He is on track to have all U.S. troops out of Iraq by the end of this year, and in July he announced that he would pull 10,000 troops out of Afghanistan this year and 23,000 more by next September.

The Pew survey found that veterans are ambivalent about the net value of the wars, although they generally were more positive about Afghanistan, which has been a more protracted but less deadly conflict for U.S. forces. One-third of post-9/11 veterans said neither war was worth the sacrifices; that was the view of 45 percent in the separate poll of members of the general public.

Fifty percent of veterans said Afghanistan was worth it, whereas the poll of civilians put it at 41 percent.

Among veterans, 44 percent said Iraq was worth it. That compares with 36 percent in the poll of civilians.

Of the surveyed former service members who were seriously wounded or knew someone who was killed or seriously wounded, 48 percent said the war in Iraq was worth fighting, compared with 36 percent of those veterans who had no personal exposure to casualties.

Exposure to casualties had an even larger impact on attitudes toward the war in Afghanistan. 55 percent of those exposed to casualties said Afghanistan has been worth the cost to the U.S., whereas 40 percent of those who were not exposed to casualties held that same view.

Pew said its survey results found "isolationist inclinations" among post-9/11 war veterans. About 6-in-10 said the United States should pay less attention to problems overseas and instead concentrate on problems at home. In a Pew survey conducted earlier this year, a similar share of the general public agreed.

The survey also reflected what many view as a troublesome cultural gap between the military and the general public. Although numerous polls have shown that Americans hold the military in high regard, the respondents in the Pew research acknowledged a lack of understanding of what military life entails.

Only 27 percent of adult civilians said the public understands the problems facing those in uniform, and the share of veterans who said so is even lower—21 percent.

20111005-02 08:44 SteveG Re: "Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes"
--

Dear SteveB,

Random thoughts bring out the facts that the costs of rebuilding, the cost of other nations, the cost of Iraq and Afghan citizen lives, the cost of paying contractors, the cost of no mechanism established to account for expenditures. No plan for getting out of either country, no plan for provision of medical care of the wounded, no provision for retraining of returning servicemen. The list could on and on. We learned nothing from the Russian 10 year experience in Afghanistan. We learned nothing from our experience in Vietnam. As a nation I don't think we are very bright.

The economy and housing market falls apart in 2008. As people of the nation we do nothing. Unemployment rises. We watch Tunisia, Egypt, Yemen, Syria, Libya, etc. and their demonstrations and their results. So we decide to do something thus Occupy Wall Street, etc. Last night I watched the news on ABC, NBC, and CBS and saw no mention of the demonstrations. Oh yeah, I forgot they are all owned by large corporations.

It was time to re-think the whole thing years ago—why are we so late in starting the discussion? Oh yeah I forgot, there is a lot of money to be made in war.

20111005-03 12:49 SteveB Re: "Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes"

Dear SteveG,

Just what Eisenhower warned us about. You know, he was kind of a modern George Washington, only in a more international way. And what he and our parents helped give birth to after WWII should have worked better and lasted longer than this. You're right, years ago we let them (our enemies, the uber-rich, the military-industrial complex) take the prize.

But if Bush had done a good job, if he had been intelligent and aware, it was during his critical 8-year watch, that the solving of problems could have begun or been accomplished, but everything was only made much worse. That was really such a crucial historical time, we know now. Nothing was that difficult to fix or unfixable before then.

Now they want us to elect another Republican President. LOL!

20111006-01 06:31 SteveB "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest One Percent of Americans"

Money money money...

This is originally from Dennis, but I thought everyone should see this up close and personal...

Now, I'm not prejudiced against the rich...why, some of my best friends are rich... We need rich people. Some people even deserve to be rich.

But the rich, as a group, are out for only themselves. They don't remember that they are the mere product of a society, not the creator and owner of that society. It's about time they were identified as a group...as the enemy of the working class people of America. They don't want to preserve the American way of life...our educational system, our disappearing freedom, our limited opportunities, our very minimal safety net, our dream of a better life for our children, a little health care, maybe just a job that can actually support a person. Do you think the poor welfare recipients of America shipped all the jobs to other countries? The rich don't even think they should have to pay their fair share of taxes. They don't even want to pay what the middle-class pays.

And the masses of poor people who result from this selfishness...well, f*ck them! Right?

Maybe it's about time we let the rich and the government know who the boss is?

"5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest One Percent of Americans" by Zaid Jilani, ThinkProgress

Oct. 4, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/152601/>)

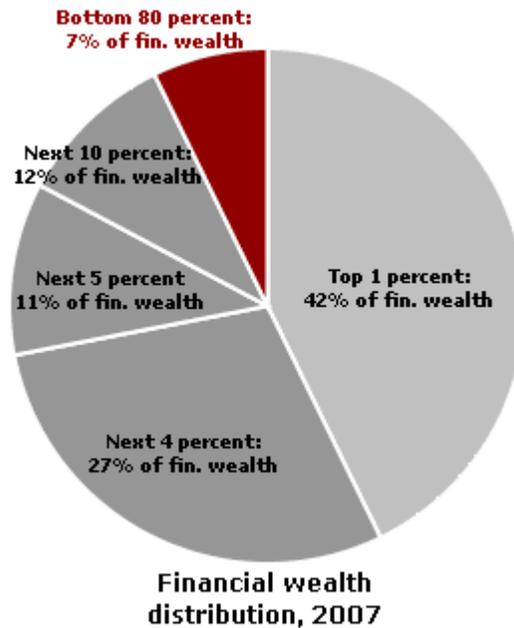

(It may shock you to learn exactly how wealthy this top 1 percent of Americans is.)

As the ongoing occupation of Wall Street by hundreds of protesters enters its third week—and as protests spread to other cities such as Boston and Los Angeles—demonstrators have endorsed a new slogan: "We are the 99 percent." This slogan refers to an economic struggle between 99 percent of Americans and the richest 1 percent of Americans, who are increasingly accumulating a greater share of the national wealth to the detriment of the middle class.

It may shock you to learn exactly how wealthy this top 1 percent of Americans is. ThinkProgress has assembled five facts about this class of super-rich Americans:

1. The Top 1 Percent of Americans Owns 40 Percent of the Nation's Wealth.

As Nobel Laureate Joseph Stiglitz points out, the richest 1 percent of Americans now own 40 percent of the nation's wealth. Sociologist William Domhoff illustrates this wealth disparity using 2007 figures where the top 1 percent owned 42 percent of the country's financial wealth (total net worth minus the value of one's home). How much does the bottom 80 percent own? Only 7 percent. As Stiglitz notes, this disparity is much worse than it was in the past, as just 25 years ago the top 1 percent owned 33 percent of national wealth.

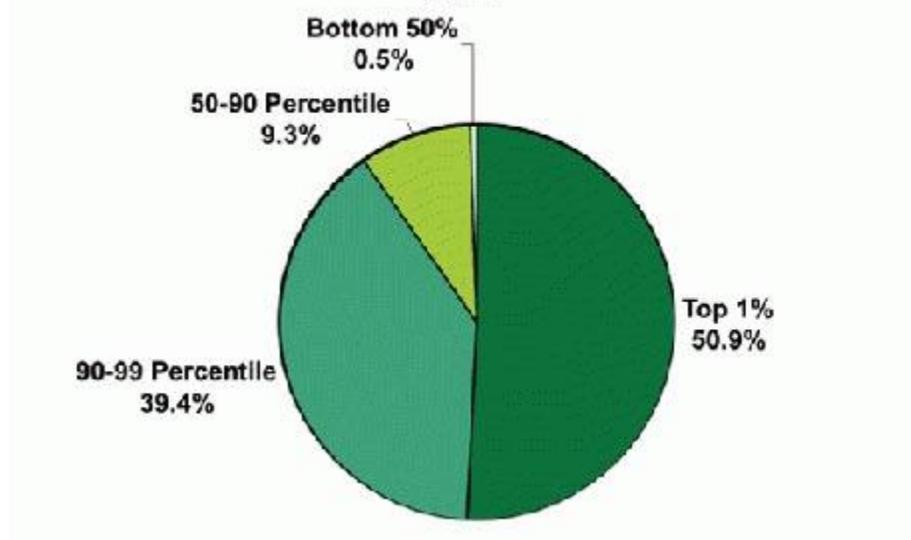

2. The Top 1 Percent of Americans Take Home 24 Percent of National Income.

While the richest 1 percent of Americans take home almost a quarter of national income today, in 1976 they took home just 9 percent—meaning their share of the national income pool has nearly tripled in roughly three decades.

3. The Top 1 Percent Of Americans Own Half of the Country's Stocks, Bonds and Mutual Funds.

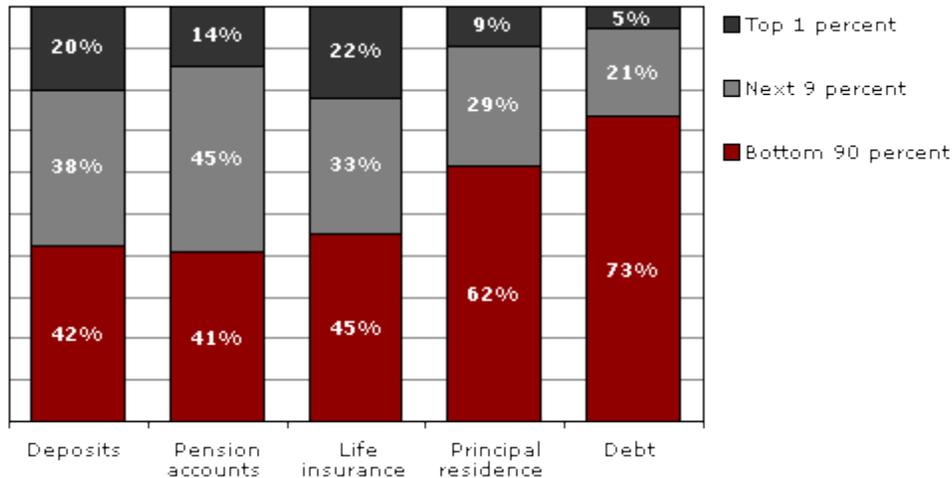

The Institute for Policy Studies illustrates this massive disparity in financial investment ownership, noting that the bottom 50 percent of Americans own only .5 percent of these investments.

Distribution of U.S. Stock, Bond and Mutual Fund Ownership, 2007

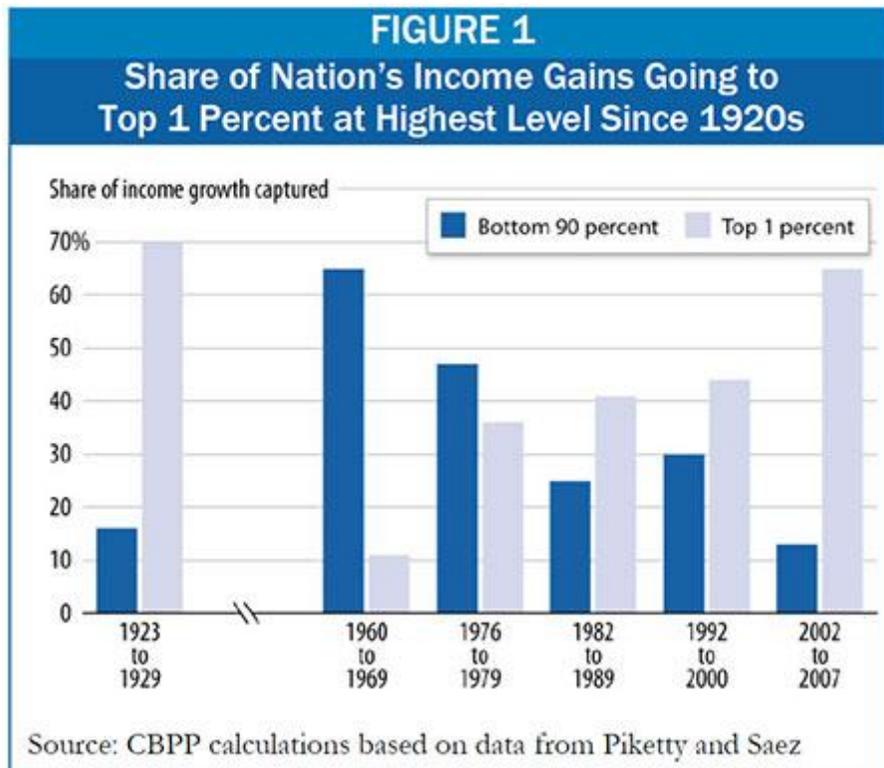

4. The Top 1 Percent Of Americans Have Only 5 Percent of the Nation's Personal Debt.

Using 2007 figures, sociologist William Domhoff points out that the top 1 percent have 5 percent of the nation's personal debt while the bottom 90 percent have 73 percent of total debt:

5. The Top 1 Percent are Taking In More of the Nation's Income Than at Any Other Time Since the 1920s

Not only are the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans taking home a tremendous portion of the national income, but their share of this income is greater than at any other time since the Great Depression, as the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities illustrates in this chart using 2007 data:

As Professor Elizabeth Warren has explained, "There is nobody in this country who got rich on his own. Nobody... Part of the underlying social contract is you take a hunk of that and pay forward for the next kid who comes along."

More and more often, that is not occurring, giving the protesters ample reason to take to the streets.

20111006-02 09:19 Pam Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"

The more Fox News mouthpieces squawk about how the Wall Street protesters are just hippies who hate capitalism, freedom, and the American way, the more idiotic they show themselves to be. When did fairness become un-American? When did a decent standard of living become the privilege of the wealthy? When did workers' having some control over their lives become greed and selfishness? When did going into massive debt to purchase an education your leaders convinced you you had to have become acceptable? When did medical care become a luxury item? I am so very pleased that the country seems to be waking up. I've heard that once people take to the streets the change is already in the works. I sure hope that's right. Thank god for people like you all.

Keep spreading the word.

20111006-03 11:03 SteveB N'ifttt'y!

I thought some of you might be interested in this useful web application.

Ifttt: The cool tool that allows you to link together your Facebook, Twitter, Google+, weather, Gmail, and practically everything else you use on the Internet

This will make it easier for the FBI, CIA, and IRS to keep track of you.

<http://www.ifttt.com/wtf>

http://www.slate.com/articles/technology/technology/2011/10/ifttt_the_cool_tool_that_allows_you_to_link_together_your_facebo.html

20111006-04 11:30 Pam Re: N'ifttt'y!

Dear SteveB,

It's gratifying to know that I'm not the only one who thinks like this. Only it's probably too late now. I doubt if the FBI would have trouble finding any of us. Chilling thought.

20111006-05 12:48 SteveB Re: N'ifttt'y!

Dear Pam,

They might have a little trouble finding me (or, at least, retrieving me), especially if all of you can keep your traps shut.

20111006-06 13:37 Pam Re: N'ifttt'y!

Dear SteveB,

Aw, I wouldn't know how to find you if my life depended on it. I guess you're safe. We can joke about this, but just imagine what life would be like if we truly were in danger for speaking our minds. I shudder to think of it.

20111006-07 14:43 SteveB "Does Evil Exist? Neuroscientists Say No"

"Does Evil Exist? Neuroscientists Say No" by Ron Rosenbaum, Slate

Sept. 30, 2011,

(http://www.slate.com/articles/health_and_science/the_spectator/2011/09/does_evil_exist_neuroscientists_say_no_.3.html)

(The End of Evil? Neuroscientists suggest there is no such thing. Are they right?)

Is evil over? Has science finally driven a stake through its dark heart? Or at least emptied the word of useful meaning, reduced the notion of a numinous nonmaterial malevolent force to a glitch in a tangled cluster of neurons, the brain?

Yes, according to many neuroscientists, who are emerging as the new high priests of the secrets of the psyche, explainers of human behavior in general. A phenomenon attested to by a recent torrent of pop-sci brain books with titles like Incognito: The Secret Lives of the Brain. Not secret in most of these works is the disdain for metaphysical evil, which is regarded as an antiquated concept that's done more harm than good. They argue that the time has come to replace such metaphysical terms with physical explanations—malfunctions or malformations in the brain.

Of course, people still commit innumerable bad actions, but the idea that people make conscious decisions to hurt or harm is no longer sustainable, say the new brain scientists. For one thing, there is no such thing as "free will" with which to decide to commit evil. (Like evil, free will is an antiquated concept for most.) Autonomous, conscious decision-making itself may well be an illusion. And thus intentional evil is impossible.

Have the new neuroscientists brandishing their fMRIs, the ghostly illuminated etchings of the interior structures of the skull, succeeded where their forebears from disciplines ranging from phrenology to psychoanalysis have failed? Have they pinpointed the hidden anomalies in the amygdala, the dysfunctions in the prefrontal lobes, the electrochemical source of impulses that lead a Jared Loughner, or an Anders Breivik, to commit their murderous acts?

And in reducing evil to a purely neurological glitch or malformation in the wiring of the physical brain, in eliminating the element of freely willed conscious choice, have neuroscientists eliminated as well "moral agency," personal responsibility? Does this "neuromitigation" excuse—"my brain made me do it," as critics of the tendency have called it—mean that no human being really wants to do ill to another? That we are all innocent, Rousseauian beings, some afflicted with defects—"brain bugs" as one new pop-neuroscience book calls them—that cause the behavior formerly known as evil?

Are those who commit acts of cruelty, murder, and torture just victims themselves—of a faulty part in the head that might fall under factory warranty if the brain were a car?

The new neuroscience represents the latest chapter in a millennia-old and still divisive cultural conflict over the problem of evil, the latest chapter in the attempt by science to reduce evil to malfunction or dysfunction rather than malevolence. It's a quest I examined in Explaining Hitler: the way the varieties of 20th-century psychological "science" sought to find some physiological, developmental, sexual, or psychoanalytic cause for Hitler's crimes. (One peer-reviewed paper sought to trace Hitler's evil to a mosquito bite—to the secondary sequelae of mosquito-borne encephalitis which were known to cause profound personality changes as long as a decade after being contracted in the trenches of World War I.)

It would be consolatory if not comforting if we could prove that what made Hitler Hitler was a malfunction in human nature, a glitch in the circuitry, because it would allow us to exempt "normal" human nature (ours for instance) from having Hitler potential. This somewhat Pollyannaish quest to explain the man's crimes remains counterintuitive to many. I recall the late British historian and biographer of Hitler Alan Bullock reacting to the claims of scientism by exclaiming to me vociferously: "If he isn't evil, then who is? ... If he isn't evil the word has no meaning."

Indeed recent developments demonstrate that evil remains a stubborn concept in our culture, resistant to attempts to reduce it to pure "physicalism." To read the mainstream media commentary on the Breivik case, for instance, is to come upon, time after time, the word "evil." Not just that the acts were evil, but that he, Breivik was, as a Wall Street Journal columnist put it, "evil incarnate."

But what exactly does that mean? The incarnation of what? Satan? The word "incarnation," even without explicit religious context, implies, metaphorically at least, the embedding of a metaphysical force in a physical body. One can understand the scientific aversion to this as a description of reality. But evil as a numinous force abides. It is not surprising that Pope Benedict issued a statement following the attacks in Norway calling on everyone to "escape from the logic of evil." (Although what exactly is that "logic"?)

Even if it was not surprising for the Pope to invoke evil thus, it was surprising to see a devout atheist such as my colleague Christopher Hitchens invoke "evil" in his "obituary" for Osama bin Laden. Hitchens admits wishing he could avoid using "that simplistic (but somehow indispensable) word." But he feels compelled to call whatever motivated bin Laden a "force" that "absolutely deserves to be called evil."

But what is this "force," which sounds suspiciously supernatural for an atheist to believe in? Some kind of Luciferian Kryptonite? Where is it located: in the material or nonmaterial world?

That is the real "problem of evil" (or, to use the technical term philosophers employ for conscious, freely-willed, evil-doing: "wickedness"). We tend to believe it exists: Popular culture has no problem with it, giving us iterations from Richard III to Darth Vader; politicians use it promiscuously ("the axis of evil"). But even religious thinkers continue to debate what it is—and why a just and loving God permits evil and the hideous suffering it entails to prevail so often, or even—if they shift the blame to us (because God gave man free will to sin)—why God couldn't have created a human nature that would not so readily choose genocide and torture. (For the record, I'm an agnostic.)

This argument has been going on for more than a millennium, at least since Augustine proclaimed that evil was in the realm of "non-being," which seems to some a great evasion. Meanwhile pop neuroscience—and its not-very-well-examined assumptions—has taken center stage in the struggle to put evil in its place under the thumb of science.

One person whose work on these matters has received considerable attention lately is the British Professor of Psychopathology, Simon Baron-Cohen. (Yes, cousin of Sacha Baron-Cohen aka Borat, but highly regarded as a serious scientist.) He's the author of The Science of Evil, which seeks to dispose of the problem of evil in part at least by changing its name.

"My main goal," says Baron-Cohen, "is replacing the unscientific term 'evil' with the scientific term 'empathy.'" What he means is that instead of calling someone evil we should say they have no empathy.

Baron-Cohen goes to great lengths to posit an "empathy circuit" in the brain whose varying "degrees" of strength constitute a spectrum, ranging from total, 100 percent empathy to "zero degrees of empathy."

This empathy circuit, he tells us, consists of 13 specific regions of the brain involved in the generation of non-evil choices, among them "the medial prefrontal cortex," "the inferior frontal gyrus," and "the posterior superior temporal sulcus."

Ideally all of these act together empathetically to defeat "single minded focus," which appears to be Baron-Cohen's explanation for what was previously called evil. Single-mindedness is the inability to "recognize and respond" to the feelings of others. A healthy empathy circuit allows us to feel others' pain and transcend single-minded focus on our own. This theory does, however, seem to carry a presumption that when one "recognizes and responds," one will do so in warm and fuzzy ways. But what about those who "recognize and respond" to others' feelings with great discernment—and then torture them? It happens.

One troubling aspect of Baron-Cohen's grand substitution of a lack of empathy for evil is the mechanistic way he describes it.

He characterizes those who lack empathy as having "a chip in their neural computer missing." He tells us "empathy is more like a dimmer switch than an all-or-none switch." The big problem here is that by reducing evil to a mechanical malfunction in the empathy circuit, Baron-Cohen also reduces, or even abolishes, good. No one in this deterministic conceptual system chooses to be good, courageous, or heroic. They just have a well-developed empathy circuit that compels them act empathetically—there's no choice or honor in the matter.

And so evil for Baron-Cohen is just "zero degrees of empathy." And I'm left with the non-empathetic feeling that his boast that he is "replacing" evil with non-empathy is more a semantic trick than a scientific discovery. It's another instance of what one of the authors in an important collection of academic papers from MIT Press called Neuroethics, calls "Brain Overclaim Syndrome."

A number of papers in Neuroethics pour cold water on the triumphalism of the giddy new pop-sci brain books. It makes clear there is a debate within the neuroscience profession about what exactly all those impressive-looking fMRI images tell us. And these "neurocritics" or "neuroskeptics" warn about the consequences for acting too quickly on these claims. (There is a valuable British website called Neuroskeptic that offers the general reading public these critiques and correctives from the point of view of someone within the profession. People need to know!)

The "Brain Overclaim" paper by Stephen Morse of the University of Pennsylvania's Center for Neuroscience and Society is a tongue-in-cheek "diagnostic note" on the grandiosity of the assumptions of the brain-book fad, mainly concerned about the way they have been creeping into jurisprudence. fMRIs have made their way into a Supreme Court opinion this year, for instance; Justice Stephen Breyer cited "cutting edge neuroscience" in his dissent to a ruling denying the right of California to ban violent video games, because the otherwise-pro-free-speech justice was alarmed at neuroscientific studies that claim such games could create mental pathways for actual violence.

But Morse's critique extends beyond the jurisprudential and goes to the heart of the failure of current neuroscience to explain or "replace" evil. Popular neuroscience has claimed to find the neural locus of love and God and evil, but Morse points out a fundamental flaw in their logic:

Despite all the astonishing advances in neuroscience, however, we still know woefully little about how the brain enables the mind and especially about how consciousness and intentionality can arise from the complicated hunk of matter that is the brain. ... Discovering the neural correlates of mental phenomena does not tell us how these phenomena are possible.

In other words, correlation doesn't always equal causation: We may know the 13 regions that light up on an fMRI when we feel "empathy" (or fail to light up when we choose evil) but that doesn't explain whether this lit-up state indicates they are causing empathy or just reflecting it.

The problem of evil—and moral responsibility—is thus inseparable from what is known in the philosophical trade as "the hard problem of consciousness." How does the brain, that electrified piece of meat, create the mind and the music of Mozart, the prose of Nabokov? Where is consciousness, anyway?

Many neuroscientists, confronted by the "hard problem of consciousness," evade it by citing a quarter-century-old experiment by one Benjamin Libet, which purported to reveal that apparently conscious decisions are actually made unconsciously—preconsciously—some 500 milliseconds (half a second) before the illusion of a conscious decision is made conscious. (A recent paper puts it at a full second.) But Libet's study fails to explain how the initial unconscious decision is made by the electrified piece of meat—he just kicks the can into the preconscious, you might say—or why we have the illusion of consciousness at all. It does suggest that those who purport to study the science of the brain do themselves—and science—a disservice by failing to learn from the contexts of history, logic, and very basic philosophy.

Those neuroscientists who disdain the idea of consciousness or free will and believe that Libet has disproved it all ought at least to give some attention to Francis Crick. Crick, whose co-discovery of DNA earned him a Nobel Prize and who recently daringly proposed a scientific locus for free will, offers his candidate for its neural coordinates. In his 1994 study The Astonishing Hypothesis Crick places it somewhere in or near the area called "the anterior cingulate sulcus" which is "next to Brodman's area 24. This is on the inside surface [of the skull] ... toward the front ... and near the top" of the brain. If that's the center of free will it's the center of evil as well. But even if Crick has trumped Libet, neither has dealt with the most disturbing implications of the new research that purports to find neural explanations for evil.

One can find some of these troubling possibilities laid out in a paper by Jonathan Marks of Harvard's Safra Center for Ethics and Pennsylvania State University in the American Journal of Bioethics. The paper is called "A Neuroskeptic's Guide to Neuroethics and National Security," and in it Marks references a growing resistance to "brain over-claims" within the profession. His objections are technical and ethical. He criticizes both the fetishizing of fMRIs, and their misuse. He reminds laymen looking at all the impressive fMRIs in pop-psych brain books that they are not actual images of individual brains in action, but rather composites based on statistical compilations of images of multiple brains, overlaid with special effects lighting he compares to "Doppler-weather radar images."

"Would it be going too far to call this Photoshopping?" I asked Marks in a phone conversation.

"Photoshopping isn't the right word, but in one sense, it doesn't go far enough," he said. The images are "constructed from the start."

Marks' paper warns of "aggressive marketing" of fMRI scans by intelligence-contractor types as "lie detector" substitutes that could be used to select candidates for "enhanced interrogation" if their fMRI indicates potential deception under ordinary interrogation.

And he offered what I thought was one of the wisest responses to the debate over the existence of evil (and thus free will):

What he suggested is that we ought to act as if we had free will to choose good or evil.

And his warnings against the consequences of believing otherwise are validated by the fantasies of some fMRI enthusiasts. Consider, for instance, one of the more prominent new brain books: David Eagleman's Incognito.

In an excerpt in the Atlantic's "big ideas" issue, Eagleman depicts an Orwellian future in which fMRI scans will be used to preemptively identify those who have the potential to commit acts formerly known as evil, and prescribes for such possible malfeasants a regimen of "prefrontal workout[s]" to "better balance" those selected (how? by whom?) for brain remodeling.

He actually goes so far as to say, "Some people will need to be taken off the streets," on the basis of their fMRIs, "for a longer time (even a life time)." Neuroscientific totalitarianism invades your brain! The ultimate panopticon. No one seemed to notice or to care. It's science!

No mention of constitutional rights or preemptive detention or the Orwellian implications of this for radical dissenters, say, those whose rage against injustice might need to be toned down in the brain gyms.

I hesitate to say it, but these are evil ideas. Indeed, reading Eagleman, and returning to this debate about evil, led me to think about something that had occurred to me in examining the fallacious attempts to scientize Hitler. Evil does not necessarily inhere in some wiring diagram within the brain. Evil may inhere in bad ideas, particularly when they're dressed up as scientific (as Hitler did with his "scientific racism").

As for evil itself, the new neuroscience is unlikely to end the debate, but it may cause us to be more attentive to the phenomenon. Perhaps evil will always be like the famous Supreme Court pronouncement on pornography. You know it when you see it. I don't like its imprecision, but I will concede I don't have a better answer. Just that we can do better than the mechanistic, deterministic, denial of personal responsibility the neuroscientists are offering to "replace" evil with.

I recall an exchange in my conversation with one of the original neuroskeptics, Daniel S. Reich, now head of a research division on nerve diseases at the National Institutes of Health. Reich was one of the first to critique "neuromarketing"—the promotion of fMRI technology to help pushers of commercial products and political candidates learn what words and images lit up what buttons in the brains of consumers and voters.

Toward the end of our conversation I asked Reich if he believed in evil. He was silent for a bit and then started talking about Norway. About degrees of evil. About the difference between the typical suicide bomber and the Oslo killer. How the former has only to press a button to accomplish his murderous goal and never has to see the consequences.

But on that summer camp island in Oslo, Reich said, Breivik was stalking victims for hours. He'd shoot one or more and, according to survivors, not register anything, just continue trudging forward, looking for more.

"He saw the consequences, the blood gushing, heard the screams. He just kept going." Some will try to say this is sociopathy or psychopathy or zero degrees of empathy and other exculpatory cop-outs. But fueled by his evil ideas Breivik kept going. To echo Bullock, if we can't call him evil who can we?

20111006-08	17:26	SteveB	Re: N'ifttt'y!
-------------	-------	--------	----------------

Dear Pam,

Several times during the Arab Spring, I have thought about how our government would react to such actions by the people.

I don't know how such a tragic series of events would end-up, but I have a feeling there would be a blood bath first.

We are permitted to bear arms for this very reason, but not cannon, or grenades, or bombs, etc., etc., etc.

We/they would be crushed mercilessly (at least at first) all in the name of...you remember, I bet, "law 'n order". (Why do such usually Republican terms have such a Southern ring to them?) I have already seen attempt to sort of de-humanize the Wall St. protesters by making them seem stupid and misguided.

Not that I'm not all for law and order. We are only talking about some hypothetical situation which we both pray can be prevented by our astute government servants in our nation's capitol. And my things never get that bad.

(I think I'll stop using my address as my, like, "by-line", just in case the CIA is watching. :-)

Ironically, right now in Bolivia there is a huge, interesting dispute going on between an Indian group and the government over the building of a transcontinental highway through their allegedly protected primitive jungle homeland. It has been stopped for now only because the government killed (probably) some demonstrators. But the Bolivian government tapped the phones of the Indians and found them communicating with the U.S. government, instructing them how to conduct their protest more effectively. The U.S. may also have provided some money. This is a good thing, really, because the road would be a disaster and also greatly increase, again, the supply of cocaine. (google "TIPNIS Bolivia")

In Bolivia, protests and marches are a way of life and sometimes effective, sometimes not. It's a little unruly at times (not usually), but in this near dictatorship of a country, people take their democracy very seriously. I kinda like that.

20111006-09

17:30

Mary

Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%" & "The Problem with 'Tax the Rich': It Won't Work"

Dear SteveB,

I know it's hard to let facts get in the way of good slogan especially as our new find Marxists, including the one hiding out in Bolivia, but a little research shows that the poor don't pay income tax and the rich are paying the most of the taxes to begin with.

[I'll state the "fairness doctrine" for taxes one more time: The last dollar of tax paid should cause an equal amount of pain, for rich or poor. We never achieve this, so the rich always come out better, but it's a worthy goal for fair and equitable taxation. —SteveB]

from "The Problem with 'Tax the Rich': It Won't Work", by Charles Hugh Smith, OfTwoMinds.com

May 28, 2010, (<http://www.oftwominds.com/blogmay10/tax-the-rich05-10.html>)

The top-earning 25% of taxpayers (AGI over $62,068) earned 67.5% of the nation's income, but they paid more than four out of every five dollars collected by the federal income tax (86 percent). The top 1% of taxpayers (AGI over $364,657) earned approximately 21.2% of the nation's income yet paid 39.4% of all federal income taxes. That means the top 1% of tax returns paid about the same amount of federal individual income taxes as the bottom 95% of tax returns.

My conclusion is this: by heavily taxing earned income, the system extracts the highest taxes from the most productive citizens, leaving the less-productive with essentially no income taxes and the super-wealthy with the huge tax break offered to capital gains and other unearned income.

To the consternation of the unearned income crowd and their politico flak-catchers, it seems baked in that the 15% long-term capital gain tax rate will rise to 20%. Given that the nominal tax rate on significant amounts of earned income is about 40%, that represents a 50% "discount" on what wage earners have to pay.

As I noted in "Tyranny of the Majority, Corporate Welfare and Complicity" (Apr. 9, 2010): In essence, this is a vote-buying scheme by the Status Quo: the top 1% control the policies of the State in alliance with the State's own Elites, and together they buy the complicity of the bottom 60% to passively accept their dominance.

In other words, the bottom 60% are recipients of Central State largesse and the top 1% who "own" the political, and thus the taxation, process limit their taxes by favoring unearned income (what they collect from sales of securities, stock options, rents, etc.). Thus the productive quintile (top wage earners) pay the highest tax rates and most of the taxes.

It's a partnership of "Tyranny of the Majority" and "Outsized Influence of Elites." If the political status quo alienates the majority by making them pay more taxes, they risk losing power in the next election. If they alienate the top 1% who fund their multi-million-dollar campaigns, then they will also lose power. So they heap the tax burden on those "rich" who are actually earning their money rather than clipping coupons.

There are deep structural problems with any scheme to "tax the rich." One is that it appears to be impossible to collect more than about 20% of all income as Central State taxes: The Revenue Limits of Tax and Spend: taxes never rise above 20% of GDP. While this is an academic study, the explanation for this is commonsensical:

1. High wage earners tend to be smart people, and they are adept at "gaming the system" to lower their taxes.
2. At some point, high wage earners are incentivized to opt out of higher tax rates by voluntarily reducing their taxable earnings and/or moving their income offshore to nations with lower effective rates such as Switzerland.
3. The super-wealthy simply "buy" tax credits or loopholes via millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

If you set a higher tax rate at, say, $249,000 per household, smart people will make sure their taxable income is $248,900. Many of these high wage earners either control their workload or own small businesses, and thus it is well within their powers to simply pay themselves less, work less or simply sell off their assets/business and retire.

I know a number of readers of this blog who fit this description. At some point, usually when you're paying 50% or more in total income taxes, business license fees, property taxes and a host of junk fees, then it's not worth it to work so hard. Rich people (the self-made variety, not the inheritors of wealth) also tend to be thrifty, so bailing out is often a plausible alternative to grinding away at keeping the business afloat. The super-wealthy buy loopholes and tax credits as a regular "cost of business." Hence the generous "depletion allowances" for owners of oil wells, and the immense tax breaks offered by family trusts, which enable the sheltering of millions of dollars for relatively modest legal fees.

The other structural problem is the Federal deficits are now so large that they exceed even the most extractive tax schemes. Many observers have noted that Federal corporate tax collections have declined for decades. What they fail to note is that this how this tracks the globalization of U.S. corporate earnings.

You only have to pay taxes on income in one country, so if you have a choice (and global corporations and the truly wealthy always do), then why declare income in a high-corporate tax nation like the U.S.? It makes no sense.

We can rant and rave all we want about evil corporations who don't pay enough Federal taxes, but in the globalized economy where many U.S. firms make most of their sales and profits overseas, high corporate tax rates simply drives income overseas. If we want to collect more corporate taxes, then we should set them below equivalent rates in China, Japan, the EU, Switzerland, etc.

You cannot control the flow of capital and earnings in the current global economy, and every attempt to tighten the screws on capital and earnings will simply drive more of it overseas.

Even on a local-government level, the politicians who raise taxes and junk fees in breathless anticipation of higher revenues find that revenues fall when taxes are raised.

But let's say we managed to collect the vast majority of Corporate America's earnings: let's say we collected a cool $1 trillion. Unfortunately, the Federal deficit is now structurally set at $1.5 trillion a year. That's how much the Central State has to borrow just to maintain the status quo. So we would still be "short" a half-trillion dollars. The same can be said of doubling the tax rate on the top 25% who pay almost 90% of the Federal taxes. That would raise another $900 million. Oops, we're still $600 billion short.

The truth is that raising taxes will never be able to reduce the gaping Federal deficit. That is a pipe dream. As I noted in "Tyranny of the Majority, Corporate Welfare and Complicity" (Apr. 9, 2010): Meanwhile, the slow poison of gargantuan deficits is eating away the soul of the nation. The Federal government gets $900 billion in individual income taxes and borrows $1.56 trillion each year. That is a rather stark number: the government borrows almost double what it collects in individual income taxes.

The "deal" is obvious: the costs of borrowing that $1.5 trillion are hidden from both the bottom 60% who are recipients of government funds and also from the top 1%, who believe that socializing risks and bailouts and privatizing profits is the ideal system of governance.

The people paying most of the taxes will opt out when taxes get too oppressive, and the super-wealthy will just buy more loopholes and credits or move their earnings overseas. We cannot collect more than 20% of the nation's earnings in Federal tax. Thus the only fiscal solution is to spend no more than 20% of the nation's income at the Federal level.

Borrowing $1.5 trillion a year is a "solution" only until the dollar loses its value or the interest payments overwhelm revenues. There is no other endgame to borrowing 11-12% of GDP every year just to maintain the status quo.

Here is the source document: Summary of Latest Federal Individual Income Tax Data, (<http://www.taxfoundation.org/news/show/250.html>)

[Interesting. Mary, this article seems to argue my side of the issue (he thinks the rich don't pay enough), though he is obviously wrong about higher taxes lowering revenue. Higher taxes gave us budget surpluses in the 90's! And the Bush tax cuts have clearly not raised revenue. —SteveB]

20111006-10	17:37	Dennis	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

from Mary:

I know it's hard to let facts get in the way of good slogan especially as our new find Marxists, including the one hiding out in Bolivia, but a little research shows that the poor don't pay income tax and the rich are paying the most of the taxes to begin with.

Dear Mary,

Oh, so you want some facts:

In 2010, the average middle-class family took home $49,445, a drop of $3,719 or 7%, in yearly earnings from 10 years earlier. In other words, that family now earns the same amount as in 1996. After peaking in 1999, middle-class income dwindled through the early years of the George W. Bush presidency, climbing briefly during the housing boom, then nose-diving in its aftermath.

In this lost decade, according to economist Jared Bernstein, poor families watched their income shrivel by 12%, falling from $13,538 to $11,904. Even families in the 90th percentile of earners suffered a 1% percent hit, dropping on average from $141,032 to $138,923. Only among the staggeringly wealthy was this not a lost decade: the top 1% of earners enjoyed 65% of all income growth in America for much of the decade, one hell of a run, only briefly interrupted by the financial meltdown of 2008 and now, by the look of things, back on track.

20111006-11	17:48	SteveB	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Mary,

Good to hear from you, my old friend! Bet you're sorry Mitch dropped out so quickly...I have to admit he's a lot better than these bozos we have left (at least minus Sarah!).

Why is anyone always a Marxist, communist, or socialist if they aren't extreme right wingers? I'm really, really, honestly very conservative and freedom and free-enterprise oriented and loving. That being said, I'm not about to throw the non-rich under the bus and destroy the country.

I think we are all on the same side. We realize that, at this moment in history, though we can debate the cause and solutions, America is in great peril. Our very way of life is in great danger. I believe this and so do many others, even the Tea Party. They are simply wrong about the facts.

Now, why don't we just all come together for the love of our country and try to reasonably discuss solutions? The guy(?) in your article below seems to be searching for solutions that stray from the Tea Party and uber-rich line, and that's a good thing to be trying to do.

Let's actually do a little work together to find the truth, then the solutions. I'm willing to try. I really do want to have all opinions represented in our little group, because that keeps it so much more interesting, and, I believe, increases our chances of discovery.

I do not happen to believe that sacrificing the poor for the benefit of the rich is the solution to our problems, and neither is the opposite (if the rich were to be sacrificed as completely, to have everything taken from them, as so many of the poor have).

Oh, they aren't as smart or productive as Steve Jobs? Well, aren't they just the worst, laziest, most worthless a-holes around!

20111006-12 18:07 SteveB Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"

Please allow me to add that a lot of evidence has been presented in this forum of the catastrophic effect the Bush years had on our country. The Republican lies trying to smear Obama with this mess just don't cut it around here. We know better than that. We also don't judge the success of an entire country based only on increasing wealth of the richest 1%. Neither do any Republican politicians, apparently, or they'd be telling us how great things are right now. Look at world history? When has it ever been a good thing for the wealth of a nation to be concentrated in the hands of a few? Germany in the 1930's? Egypt, Libya, Syria, Iran, or Yemen at the present time? Do you see what happens? War and instability...not what we want for our children.

I have yet to see one shred of evidence presented by the right that America and its long-vaunted middle class is doing better now than when we were kids, or, especially, since 2001. Do you have such evidence you are withholding? We agree the rich pay more taxes than the poor. Duh? What do you expect? The opposite? I guess that's what the Republicans want and lament. We just think the rich should pay what the rich used to pay, at which time they didn't complain any harder than they do now, so how painful could it have been?

Or...you could try to squeeze blood out of a turnip like Greece is trying to do...

20111006-13 18:30 Mark Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"

Dear Mary,

Gee whiz, there really is another person that shares my POV! Hallelujah!

20111007-01 06:38 SteveB "Romney: God Wants U.S. to Lead, Not Follow"

OMG—another militarist!

How far behind the times can you possibly be? Just what we need, more military spending and adventures. These Republicans just don't get it—we're broke! We gotta scrape some money together and fix ourselves somehow, not fight more wars!

And, even more dangerous—HE KNOWS WHAT GOD WANTS! (Hey, maybe he could ask God what happened to those golden plates Jesus gave the Mormons that they somehow managed to "lose".)

I guess "better than the rest" [of the field] doesn't mean much, huh? Now, Mitt, let's go out there in the world and dominate! hahaha This is not what we need at this point in our nation's history, in my humble opinion.

"Romney: God Wants U.S. to Lead, Not Follow" by Bruce Smith and Steve Peoples, AP

Oct. 7, 2011, (<http://news.yahoo.com/romney-god-wants-us-lead-not-081157082.html>)

(CHARLESTON, SC) Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney is calling for a century of American dominance in his first major foreign policy address, outlining plans to strengthen the U.S. military while rejecting multilateral institutions like the United Nations when necessary.

The former Massachusetts governor also condemns the isolationist policies supported by some tea party members in a speech to be delivered Friday at The Citadel, South Carolina's iconic military college.

"This is America's moment. We should embrace the challenge, not shrink from it, not crawl into an isolationist shell, not wave the white flag of surrender, nor give in to those who assert America's moment has passed. That is utter nonsense," Romney says in prepared remarks obtained by The Associated Press.

The leading GOP presidential contender offers no clear direction for the war in Afghanistan, but says he would conduct a full review of the situation in his first 100 days in office to determine "the presence necessary to secure our gains and successfully complete our mission."

"This century must be an American century. In an American century, America has the strongest economy and the strongest military in the world," Romney says. "God did not create this country to be a nation of followers. America is not destined to be one of several equally balanced global powers. America must lead the world, or someone else will."

While he served as a Mormon missionary in France more than four decades ago, Romney has limited foreign policy experience. As he says in nearly every campaign stop, he has spent the majority of his life in the business world. But Romney has been critical of President Barack Obama's foreign policy, particularly the president's aggressive timeline to withdraw troops from Afghanistan.

At a campaign stop in Mount Pleasant on Thursday, Romney previewed some of the themes for Friday's speech. He called for 100,000 new troops, increased military spending and a larger Navy.

"You would think that the president and the people in Washington would recognize the importance of the United States military and the need not to shrink our military budget but strengthen it," Romney told veterans on the hangar deck of the World War II-era aircraft carrier U.S.S. Yorktown.

The former governor acknowledged waste in defense spending and "my life in the private sector taught me to go after waste and economize, and there is an opportunity to do that." But he said he wouldn't, as European nations have done, reduce defense to bolster social programs.

Romney also released the names of 22 advisers he will consult on foreign policy issues.

The Citadel speech comes three days before his rival Jon Huntsman, the former ambassador to China, delivers a foreign policy address of his own. And it comes as Romney has jumped back into the lead in national polling following Texas Gov. Rick Perry meteoric rise and fall in recent weeks. The location of the speech, in the early voting state of South Carolina, is of course no coincidence.

Romney calls for working with the United Nations when appropriate.

"But know this," he says. "While America should work with other nations, we always reserve the right to act alone to protect our vital national interests."

20111007-02 09:43 Pam Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"

One of the problems I see with this analysis is the assumption that corporations and the wealthy will always find ways to get their money off-shore. If our laws permit such actions, why can't we amend those laws to keep more revenue here? That would require regulation and enforcement, which, done right, would be a good thing. Of course, incentives would perhaps be better, and I can see that favorable tax rates would be a big one. Still, isn't it a matter of balance?

It seems to me there is a more fundamental issue involved in our current dilemma. I read recently that in the 18th c. most people thought most about observing the proper deference to the different ranks in society. In the 19th c. the improvement of one's character was uppermost in everyone's mind. In the 20th c. (in America) having a decent standard of living was the priority. What will the 21st c. be known for? When future generations look back, how will they describe us?

The Soviet Union under Lenin & Stalin believed it was beneficial to sacrifice the current generation(s) in order to ensure a more glorious future. The IDEA of communism was more important than mere individual people. So far, what I see in this century in the U.S. is an overwhelming obsession with money, whether it be taxes, investments, IRAs, having it, or not having enough. We don't think about beauty or compassion or social responsibility or fairness or sacrifice. In the end, everything boils down to MONEY. How much does a person need to be happy? How much should a person give so that others can be happy too? How responsible is the social contract to each individual, including the weakest?

This morning I heard Herman Cain say that if you're successful, you're deserving; if you're a failure it's your own fault. He really said that. Hobbes said that human life is "nasty, brutish, and short." That it's a war of all against all. I'd say, rather, life in America today is about the rich against the poor. It was ever thus. Most of human history has been divided up this way. I find it more than a little disturbing that living in a dog-eat-dog world is acceptable to so many of us. Compassion, simple humanity, empathy, gratitude—I see very little of these on the public stage. We teeter on the edge of barbarism.

"European socialism" is the monster in the closet; the welfare state makes life cushy for slackers. Americans have been sold this bill of goods for too long. I can think of many countries that put the welfare of ALL their citizens first, Canada being the one I'm most familiar with. I cringe when I hear politicians (Romney) brag about how America is—and OUGHT to be—number one in the world. Who made us the chosen people? and don't you dare say God. Wouldn't it be better to fight against our tribal instincts, to avoid thinking in terms of US and THEM?

Selfishness is not a virtue and greed is not good, even if they might seem so in the short run. A healthy society is a fair society, not equal but fair, and we're a long way from fair these days. We can argue about taxes and hedge funds and mortgage derivatives all day long, but what's really important is what we've lost sight of: compassion for our fellow man. We shouldn't keep asking, Who's to blame (well, maybe we should); we should ask, How can we help?

It's been unfashionable in university English departments for years to talk about "beauty" in literature, but beauty, expressed in art, is what makes life tolerable. I believe compassion is even more important, even though I may sound squishy and new agey to say so. I forget who it was who called Joseph McCarthy out by asking if at long last he had no simple, human decency, but he articulated what every moral American was privately thinking. America has stopped caring about its "huddled masses." It's survival of the fittest now, and if you can't keep up, well, tough sh*t. It's time for those "better angels" Lincoln appealed to show themselves in these days of uncertainty.

20111007-03	11:00	GaryC	"Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
-------------	-------	-------	--

"Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive" by John Bussey, The Wall Street Journal

Oct. 7, 2011, (<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB20001424052970204294504576615251485073540.html>)

A few years ago in Hong Kong I met a furniture manufacturer from South Carolina who had outsourced production to China and then been crushed by his Chinese partners, who bumped him aside and started selling directly to the U.S. market.

He no doubt would be intrigued to see the tide turning again today.

In the Great Game of global wage and cost arbitrage, bits of some rather surprising industries are drifting back to U.S. shores, and the pace could quicken. Furniture making—usually labor intensive and low-skilled—is just one shocker. On Tuesday Ford said it will build some auto parts in the U.S. that have traditionally been sourced in China. And there's more.

Currency hawks in Congress are this week promoting legislation to penalize China for manipulating the Yuan. They might want to take note of this trend: The jobs they want to bring home may already be trickling back to the U.S.—emphasis on the trickle.

Bruce Cochrane is emblematic of the incipient shift. He's opening a furniture factory in Lincolnton, N.C., a rare event in a region and industry that have been walloped by outsourcing. Employment in U.S. furniture factories fell by 60% over the last decade.

Mr. Cochrane says furniture made in China and sold in the U.S. previously had a price advantage of up to 50%. That's often down to 10% to 15% now, in part because wages in China are soaring—up 15% or more a year in some locales. Shipping costs, he says, have doubled from a few years ago.

"About 2006 I saw a pivot point, especially with labor costs," says Mr. Cochrane, who has spent time in China.

Certain jobs have been dribbling back to the U.S. for a few years. But now the sectors most likely to repatriate production may be coming into focus.

Hal Sirkin of Boston Consulting Group has identified seven industry categories that are most susceptible to relocating production aimed at the U.S. market (production for the Chinese market would stay chiefly in China). They are furniture, transportation goods, computers and electronics, electrical equipment and appliances, plastics and rubber products, machinery, and fabricated metal products.

Mr. Sirkin says products in these categories may be cheaper to make in China now. But with labor, materials and shipping costs rising, the advantage will tip to the U.S. in four years or so.

In a study he's releasing Friday, Mr. Sirkin calculates that production that returns to the U.S. could add 800,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector, and up to three million altogether if service-sector support jobs are included.

There have been optimistic prognostications of this sort in the past that fell flat. But a number of forces at work today suggest that this time could indeed be different.

Among the forces: those ever-rising costs in China; more flexibility from some U.S. unions, resulting in fewer work rules and lower labor costs; more subsidies from some state governments; far higher productivity in the U.S.; and pressure from retailers to shorten turnaround time and cut inventories, prompting more manufacturers to abandon long supply chains to China.

And the Yuan. After considerable jawboning by governments around the world, Beijing has allowed its currency to rise roughly 30% against the dollar since 2005. Since a stronger Yuan makes China's exports more expensive in foreign markets, that's bad for U.S. manufacturers who serve their global customers from factories in China—and for U.S. consumers hooked on cheap Chinese products.

But for those who want to reclaim production to U.S. shores, it's a plus.

"We're in the process of bringing everything back from China," says David Gil, marketing director for Sleek Audio, which makes high-end tunable earphones. Along with rising costs in China, quality control proved a headache.

The company sells its SA Six earphones for $250, and the price won't change when production moves to Palmetto, Fla., though costs will rise about 20%. Mark Krywko, the chief executive, says better quality control and less lost inventory will offset those increases. "Profits will go up," he says.

No one in North Carolina's furniture industry, meanwhile, is expecting a return to the flush times. Patricia Bowling of the American Home Furnishings Alliance, the furniture makers' trade group, says some companies that kept production in the U.S. are seeing an uptick in demand because of the rising cost of imports. But she says new factories like Mr. Cochrane's are rare indeed.

As for Mr. Cochrane, he's buying state-of-the-art saws, routers and other machinery for his facility, exemplifying why productivity is robust in the U.S.

The flip side, though, is employment. When North Carolina's newest furniture factory is up and running, Mr. Cochrane expects to accomplish with 135 employees what it took 250 to do in the past.

20111007-04	14:57	SteveB	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear GaryC,

Well, one has hope, but we don't seem to have the will to win any economic war with anybody, or to even compete well. Let me give you an example from close to home—Bolivia. Right now, we're having a flood of Chinese cars. We have BYD, Zxauto, Great Wall, Geely, and Autoplaza (at least). I don't know if they're any good, but they're cheap. Until recently (and maybe still) Toyota ruled here with the Koreans coming on strong in all goods, not just vehicles.

If these Chinese cars are allowed into America, even with modest import duties, I'm afraid the American car companies and most American manufacturing will be history. Remember too that the Chinese control 90% of the world's rare earth elements necessary for many of the cars of the future.

Meanwhile, what American products do we have here in Bolivia? A couple of enterprising souls, who love American food, manage to bring in Hellman's, Kraft, Heinz, and a few other food brands—on their own. Marlboro and Camel cigarettes abound. No American beer. The American car companies still try a little, but their prices are so high! Bolivians love used and reject American clothes...now all made somewhere else. Other American brands are manufactured in Brazil or Chile, etc. People love America and things from America, but can't get them or can't afford them. Mainly, they don't even exist here. Think about it, what does America make? Not much. As in China, nearly all music, movies, software, and even books are sold for almost nothing in the street. CD's and movies are about $1 each and of plenty good enough quality. No money to the U.S. for that stuff in Bolivia.

And this is here in our back yards, on our turf. We should own the Latin American market. But companies were too lazy to do it. Maybe they were intimidated by the language thing, having complicated labels, who knows. They have to cope with that anyway now that America has sort of joined the Latin world. What were we afraid of that made our businesses stay at home and allow the Japanese, the Germans, the Koreans, the Brazilians, the Indians, the Arabs, and now the Chinese to make fortunes here and send them home to their people?

American business needs to address its disadvantages in world trade. If we need to adjust currency, do it. If we need less free trade, do it. If we need to teach a second language to all students from kindergarten on, do it. If we need to cultivate more of a world view, do it. If we need to get tough about international intellectual property rights, then do it. There's a good use for the Army, in my book. We need to work, work, work to get our products on the world's shelves. We have not done that.

Otherwise, if we want to be isolationist, we'd better figure out how to rebuild our factories (just when there's no money to do so), do without foreign goods, and live like we used to in a more dangerous world.

But the path backwards to isolation looks very, very difficult to me. If we were to suddenly stop buying Chinese goods, they might see it as economic warfare, attack us, defeat us (probably easily), and simply impose their slavery-produced goods on us. Make us consume.

Gee, the Republicans might really like that, because then the government would be very efficient.

20111007-05 15:14 Dennis Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"

from SteveB:

Meanwhile, what American products do we have here in Bolivia?

Dear SteveB,

How about American financial products? Got any of those nifty Wall Street derivatives available there? Seems to be all America has been able to export in the last few years.

20111007-06 15:20 Pam Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"

Dear SteveB,

LOTS of good points here. I hadn't really thought about these things, but you make sense to me. I ask myself over and over, How can intelligent people be so stupid? No one ever seems to have a Plan B.

20111007-07 16:02 Dale Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"

Dear Dennis,

You bring up a good point. Our economy and our U.S. companies are so screwed up that millions of dollars flow in weekly from overseas to be invested in these firms. Miami is the primary hub for financial transactions with Central and South America and there are complete brokerage offices devoted to satisfying the demand from southern foreign clients looking to invest, not hide mind you, money in U.S. companies. European investors just want to try to get their money out and into a safe haven.....the U.S.. You don't see them pouring the money into China where the books are cooked, the courts are rigged and the economy is controlled. For all the success stories that are leaked by the controlled press in China, there are massive abuses and broken people who lost out when it wasn't their business that was chosen for special treatment.

20111007-08 16:32 SteveB Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"

Dear Dennis,

Hey, you can buy any of that stuff anywhere, right?

You know, now that I think about it, the one export that is ubiquitous in the entire Caribbean, Central and South America, even Canada (I bet Iraq and Afghanistan) is the almighty U.S. greenback. They're everywhere in huge supply.

Now, I'll never know how we can have so much money everywhere that it's part of the money supply, even often official, of so many countries, yet we fail so miserably at commerce. Somebody's taking advantage of us?

I wonder how much of the Arab and China problems come from the fact that they are so much better dealmakers, maybe better at money, than we are...???

When we had all the power, why didn't we make sure we had a solid oil supply at low prices? Why haven't we forced China, and Japan before them, to play fair with international trade? Why didn't we protect, nurture, and grow our mighty industries and keep them at home (especially their profits)?

Weird, huh?

20111007-09 16:50 SteveB Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"

Dear Dale,

If you have numbers that show we are doing so darned well, I'd love to see them. Maybe you're talking about money that only goes to the Bernie Madoffs? None of this seems to result in positive balance of payment, GNP, or personal income statistics over the last 10 years in question.

Funny this flood of money you talk about doesn't seem to be creating many jobs or bringing about what anyone could call prosperity, except for a very few.

I disagree about investment in China, though I am certainly no defender of China. Money is pouring into China (still) and Brazil right now. Even into Chile, Peru, India, Indonesia, and Africa.

20111007-10 18:31 Dale Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive" & "Corporate Profits Surge to Record High in Q2"

Dear SteveB,

Try to focus. You are on a rambling rant. [Remark resented. —SteveB]

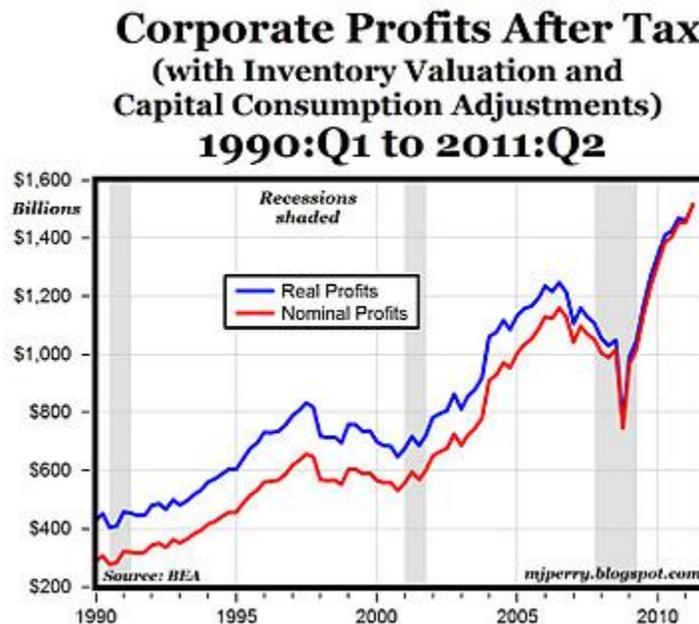

You asked for numbers, read economist Mark Perry's report from Aug. 26, 2011.

I didn't comment on the state of the economy, which is lame to say the least, but on the FACT that many people from around the world who want to invest their own money choose to do it in U.S. companies, both the stocks and the corporate bonds.

There are companies and the China government who are investing money in plant and equipment in China, but most rational individual and institutional investors are wary of the pitfalls with investing in China stocks. The judicial system doesn't exist, the accounting rules the rest of the world follows are a sham in China and there is a total disregard for patent protection. Would you invest your money in a stock market and legal system set up like that?

"Corporate Profits Surge to Record High in Q2" Mark J. Perry, Carpe Diem

Aug. 16, 2011, (<http://mjperry.blogspot.com/2011/08/corporate-profits-surge-to-record-high.html>)

Corporate profits in the second quarter (both nominal and inflation-adjusted using the business sector price deflator) reached all-time record highs during the April-May period of this year, according to today's BEA report on GDP and corporate profits for the second quarter (see chart above). Real GDP growth in the second quarter was revised down from the previous estimate of 1.3% to 1%, based on more complete data. While overall economic growth remains weak as measured by real GDP, the record level of corporate profits shows that American companies are financially healthy and strong, and can easily weather the current spring-summer "soft patch."

Compared to the cyclical low of $770 billion in the fourth quarter of 2008, real corporate profits have almost doubled to the current record level of $1,540 billion, which confirms the fact that corporate profitability has made a full recovery from the effects of the Great Recession. Based on post-war history, the U.S. economy has never experienced a recession that is not preceded by sharp declines in corporate profits, so I think we can safely say we're definitely not headed for a double-dip recession in the near future.

20111007-11	18:42	Dale	Trend Hunter
-----------------------------	-------	------	--------------

Dear SteveB,

On a lighter vein, you might want to subscribe to this. It is a hoot and has unending mind expanding stuff.

<http://www.trendhunter.com/popular>

20111007-12	18:46	GaryC	Re: Trend Hunter
-----------------------------	-------	-------	------------------

Dear Dale,

I am guessing that the Poop Powered Motorcycle would give him [SteveB, probably. —SteveB] an outlet for his prolific amount of excrement while being environmentally friendly.

20111007-13	18:52	SteveB	"Twisted Government Accounting Behind Postal Service Woes"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Thieves, Liars, and the USPS...

Learn how Congress has stolen the money from the Post Office just like it has stolen the money we paid into Social Security.

Now the government tries to blame their bankruptcy on your mailman, Social Security recipients, and the New Deal...as if they aren't a bunch of damned thieves and liars.

"Twisted Government Accounting Behind Postal Service Woes" by Bob Sullivan, MSNBC

Oct. 7, 2011, (<http://redtape.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/10/07/8191425-twisted-government-accounting-behind-postal-service-woes>)

You might have heard that the United States Postal Service is in trouble: that it's losing billions, that it will have to end Saturday service and close branches—and most inflammatory, that it might need a government bailout. Perhaps you heard that the Postal Service couldn't pay $5.5 billion bill that came due Sept. 30 and that only an emergency postponement saved it from the government's equivalent of default.

In fact, it's the Postal Service that's currently bailing out the U.S. government. Politicians have been raiding Postal Service revenues for years, using them to make the federal deficit appear smaller than it really is. The fiscal gyrations are so twisted that the Postal Service is right now forced to pre-pay health care benefits for employees the agency hasn't even hired yet—in fact, for many future employees who haven't even been born yet—all to artificially shrink the federal deficit.

It's these crushing accounting tricks, not the cost of delivering mail, that has pushed this 200-year-old institution to the brink.

Welcome to the wacky world of Washington, D.C., accounting.

There's a long and a short story to the tragic tale of Postal Service financial trouble. I'll start with the short one. Right now, the Postal Service is being forced to pre-pay health benefits for the next 75 years during a 10-year stretch. In the past four years, those prepayments have totaled $21 billion. The agency's deficit during that time is about $20 billion. Remove these crazy pre-payments—a requirement that no other government agency endures and no private industry would even consider—and the Postal Service would be in the black.

Of course, it's not quite that simple. And no one denies that the rise of e-mail has meant the fall of first-class mail, creating a real long-term challenge to USPS relevancy. But the current fiscal "crisis" is entirely manufactured by the Washington way—in fact, the payment missed on Sept. 30 represents this year's tithe to the federal deficit, disguised as health care benefits layaway for a mail carrier the agency might not hire until the year 2060.

The controversy over the future of the post office has been slowly coming to a head, and it reached a fever pitch around the Sept. 30 payment, meant to satisfy this year's health care pre-payment costs. The agency begged for a delay, which it received—but that led to detractors' calling for immediate reforms, such as post office closings and the elimination of Saturday delivery. But supporters have rallied to the agency's side—about 500 rallies were held last week all around the country in support of the agency.

Meanwhile, some advocates are desperately trying to call attention to the USPS's unique budget situation, which is not quite the crisis it appears.

"It is clear that these prepayments for future retiree health care benefits are—at this point—the primary reason for the U.S. Postal Service's financial crisis," Ralph Nader wrote in a letter to Congress last week. "In fact, simply looking at the numbers reveals that the Postal Service's 'financial crisis' is in fact an entirely manufactured crisis.

Why would the Postal Service find itself in this crazy arrangement, bleeding red ink today so it can pay for employees' health benefits 50, 60, or 75 years from now? Believe it or not, there is an explanation, but it's not so simple—delivered with fair warning from Jim Sauber, chief of staff of the National Association of Letter Carriers.

"It takes a long time to explain how crazy and complicated it is," he said.

But a quick tour into this fiscal crisis is incredibly instructive as to the ways of Washington, and failing to understand it might mean someday soon you won't get mail at your house any longer.

First, it's important to note that the USPS is financially self-sufficient. Since the 1970s, it has been mandated by Congress to operate entirely on its own revenue, with no taxpayer money. It's an enormous agency—with $65 billion in annual revenue, it would be a Fortune 50 company if it were a private entity. As a quasi-government agency, it enjoys privileged fiscal status—its revenue and expenses are "off budget," meaning Congress isn't supposed to be able to toy with them. It shares this privileged state with only one other government entity: the Social Security Trust Fund. But as you know, Congress finds a way to toy with everything.

In 2006, Congress passed the "Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act" to modernize the agency's stamp-price-setting tools and a host of other elements of mail delivery. That law set up this seemingly crazy health care prepayment fund.

To bean counters at the U.S. Treasury Department, however, the fund made perfect sense. It was a crazy arrangement to cover for another crazy arrangement the Postal Service escaped in 2006.

When former members of the U.S. military take a government job, their military service counts as annual credits toward pension eligibility. This holds true when service members take postal jobs—but who pays for the value of those credits? In 2006, the Postal Service was shouldering that cost on its balance sheet, even though there was general agreement that the Treasury Department should be responsible for pension credit earned prior to employment with the Postal Service. The 2006 law shifted the burden from the USPS, but that meant an addition burden on the Treasury—that is, it would have added to the federal deficit. So to balance out that negative on Treasury's balance sheet, the Postal Service was ordered to make health care pre-payments equivalent to the cost of the pension cost shift.

The problem of military pension credits itself was a creation of just such a deficit-hiding accounting trick. In 2002, an audit of the USPS budget found it had overpaid into the federal government's pension plan by roughly $80 billion. Postal Service officials lobbied hard have its pension payments readjusted. They were, in 2003, but in order to make the shift revenue neutral, military pension credit costs were shifted from Treasury to the USPS.

The 2006 law passed by Congress was designed to put an end to this fiscal football. In the middle part of the last decade, the Postal Service was so awash in operating cash that the 10-year tithe to the federal government seemed a small price to pay for a promise that the crazy cost shifting would be over in a decade. In the meantime, the cash played a small but measurable part in reducing the federal deficit.

"But it became very clear that these payments were unaffordable once the economy tanked," Sauber said. In short order, the health care prepayments became "a million pound weight" on the Postal Service budget.

Sauber and other Postal Service advocates say the Postal Service would have no trouble balancing its own budget if Congress and the Treasury Department stopped adding billions to its annual expenses through fiscal maneuvering.

Still, powerful forces have gathered in an attempt to use this budget bickering as an excuse to reform the post office dramatically. Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), the Republicans' top government cost-cutting advocate in the House and head of the powerful Committee on Oversight, has introduced legislation that would dramatically alter the agency. His Postal Reform Act of 2011 would end Saturday delivery, create a commission to study post office closings and create a Solvency Authority that could break union contracts if the agency fell into the red.

Last month, President Barack Obama proposed that the Post Office end Saturday delivery. His proposal offered some relief from health care prepayments, but it merely by spreading the costs out over a longer period of time. Issa responded by calling Obama's plan a "thinly veiled attempt to offset continued operating losses with a taxpayer-funded bailout."

Others have advocated complete dismantling of the service, turning mail delivery over entirely to private industry. Rarely do those arguing against mention that the Postal Service starts its year in a hole designed to hide a portion of the federal deficit.

A Heritage Foundation report published last month called "You've Got (No) Mail: Is the End Near for the Post Service?" indicated that the agency "barely avoided default" and was down to "a week's worth of cash."

"Congress should act quickly to address this not-so-slow-motion postal train wreck. The goal, however, should not be to 'save' USPS or even to save mail delivery," the report said. It mentioned the pension overpayments but made no mention of the health care costs prepayment, and it concluded that the USPS cannot survive unless supported by "tens of billions of dollars in subsidy."

Sauber says it's hard to counter such arguments with a long discussion of Washington accounting tricks.

"It's so much easier to say, 'Oh, it's the Internet.' That seems obvious, but that's not really what's going on," he said. "It is frustrating for letter carriers to have to deal with all this misinformation. ... It's easy to demagogue on this, for people who don't like government workers to say the Postal Service is failing because it's a government agency. But in this case the easy explanation isn't the right explanation."

The postal workers' union favors legislation proposed by Reps. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., and Stephen Lynch, D-Mass., that would allow the agency to access overpayments to the federal pension system, and to restructure its health care prepayments, to solve its immediate budget woes.

It's also hitting back at critics with an aggressive TV ad campaign that began running last month.

"Congress created this problem, and Congress can fix it," the ads say.

Sauber doesn't deny that the Postal Service has problems. Revenue shrank from $74 billion to $67 billion from 2008 to 2010. Mail volume plummeted from 202 billion to 170 billion pieces during that same stretch, a 22 percent fall. While the drop parallels the recession, common sense dictates that even a robust economic recovery probably won't lead to an increase in handwritten love letters.

But Sauber says the rise of the Internet has created almost as many opportunities as problems for the Post Office—package delivery from online shopping has soared, for example. Meanwhile, the agency has shrunk full-time employee ranks from 663,000 to 583,000.

The Postal Service hasn't always done itself any favors—long lines, unhelpful employees and stories of double-dipping by pensioners feed the public's notion that change is needed.

"We know we have to change. But the right way to do that is to clear up this artificial fiscal crisis now, survive the recession and then see where we are," he said, "not to gut the Postal Service now based on misinformation and budget politics."

20111007-14	20:41	Ben	Re: "Twisted Government Accounting Behind Postal Service Woes"
-------------	-------	-----	--

Dear SteveB,

So this is really not crazy at all: it's a well-orchestrated scheme to privatize yet another properly running service so that profit-oriented "businessmen" can squeeze out a huge chunk of change for themselves.

Crazy: right. Just another kind of hazily legalized graft.

Privatization is even in theory a dirty word to me. How can one possibly inject a new layer of profit-taking into any business or institution and expect it to operate at the always-promised lower cost? Every time I hear "privatization will improve quality and lower cost" I want to barf. I cannot recall a single instance where either has resulted.

20111008-01 08:06 GaryC "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Why don't they legalize and tax the stuff. As a fiscal conservative, social liberal this is the kind of stuff that makes me hate both parties.

"Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop" by John Stossel, FOX

Oct. 7, 2011, (<http://www.foxbusiness.com/on-air/stossel/blog/2011/10/07/feds-announce-obama-flip-flop>)

Yesterday, dozens of California medical marijuana dispensaries got letters like this one from Obama's Department of Justice that warned they must shut down "even if such activities are permitted under state law."

This afternoon, four DOJ attorneys held a press conference and said this:

We are making these announcements together today so that the message is absolutely clear—that commercial marijuana operations are illegal under federal law, and that we will enforce federal law.

That's a shame. I don't doubt that many customers of pot dispensaries have no medical need. But who cares? Our drug laws do more harm than good.

Don't campaign promises mean anything? On the campaign trail, President Obama promised: "I'm not going to be using Justice Department resources to try to circumvent state laws on this [medical marijuana.]"

Then, once he was in office, a spokesman confirmed that: "The president believes that federal resources should not be used to circumvent state laws."

Never mind, I guess. It's one of a long list of Obama's broken promises.

20111008-02 09:15 Pam Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop / Our Group"

One thing I like about this group is that we each bring something different to it. I keep learning things I never knew and seeing things in a new light. Very interesting.

20111008-03 09:45 Pam Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear SteveB,

Wow. No wonder it's hard to know what to think; I never have enough information. I suppose if someone knew EVERYTHING, he'd be able to figure out what to do. As it is, I think it's important to keep an open mind and be ready to change it if the facts seem to warrant it. Dogma is dangerous.

20111008-04 10:16 GaryC Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear Pam and SteveB,

Well, Jimmy Carter was one of the smartest Presidents ever elected. I voted for him and expected big things. However, he suffered paralysis by analysis and was one of the worst Presidents ever. I expect the history books will show that Obama suffered the same fate, thinking he is smarter than everyone else and getting nothing done, except destroying the economy.

20111008-05 10:58 Pam Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear GaryC,

I heard someone on NPR talk about what it takes to be a good President, and it's not necessarily intelligence. This person (I think he wrote a book about it) said that some of our best Presidents have been of average intelligence. This is pure speculation, but it's interesting, I think. I agree with you about Carter, and you may be right about Obama too. A bulldog with a simple agenda might work better.

20111008-06 14:11 SteveB Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear GaryC,

Get serious one minute. We all know beyond the shadow of a doubt that Obama did nothing to destroy the economy. It was destroyed when he got there, remember?

We also know that the actions Bush finally took and Obama continued kept us at least temporarily from dropping off the precipice in 2008. The precipice had been created mainly during Bush's term. I've seen no evidence that we were in bad shape when Bush took over. All of us, I believe, would gladly have those days back and call them the "good times" even though the mortgage crisis, etc., were slowly brewing, and brewing in a pot provided by the government during Clinton's watch. Bush did nothing but make everything far, far worse.

Obama has made nothing worse. He has simply made nothing better, but how much help has he had from Congress? If you think I'm wrong, please prove it or at least mention what specific actions of his have destroyed the economy.

This will be very very new news to me!

20111008-07 14:54 Pam Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear SteveB and GaryC,

I agree, SteveB. Obama inherited a train wreck, and he did keep a worse depression at bay, even if it was done with the lesser of two evils. I just wish that when the banks get bailed out, regular folks could catch a break too. The unfairness of that makes my blood boil. The Republicans in Congress wouldn't throw a drowning man a life raft if he was a Democrat. They will do everything possible to obstruct everything Obama tries to do. That is obvious to everyone. The Republican leadership has said as much. I like Obama, and I think he's trying to do his best in dreadful circumstances. I feel sorry for him, to tell the truth. I don't know how he keeps it all together. I just remember Lyndon Johnson, a son of a b*tch perhaps, but he got a lot of good things done just by the force of his personality. At least, that's how I remember it.

20111008-08 15:15 SteveB Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear Pam and GaryC,

I suspect you're both right about this guy being too intellectual, patient, considerate, and deliberative in some weird way.

I guess a leader has to always make everyone think that they know exactly what they're doing. Good leaders do this instinctively.

If we can't find one guy out of 300 million who has the right qualities, then our electoral system is flawed. Boy, is it!

But I'll still pick an intelligent, compassionate man every time I can.

20111008-09 15:28 GaryC Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear SteveB,

The electoral process is a mess. The election process begins way too early. The primary process is flawed beyond belief. Hilary was the best candidate for the liberals. McCain was also worthless. But, Obama was and is a joke. He is not qualified to be a community organizer.

Look at his record. What has he done. I don't care if the guy is black or white or Democrat or Republican. This guy is not qualified to be the leader of the U.S. In my opinion, he was elected only because he is black. I agree that we need intelligent leaders. However, the operative word is leader. Obama is a follower. And, of flawed theories.

I know you hate Republicans but I honestly believe we need some adults running the country so we can create jobs for all U.S. citizens (even union people). The middle and lower class have been hurt the most by Obama's (and Reid and Pelosi's policies) far more than the upper class. Most of my liberal friends (not the socialists, of course) see that Obama was a big mistake.

I just hope to hell we don't get a God-squader in there that will push religious social issues when JOBS are the problem. Plus, who the hell cares if gays marry, or marijuana is legal (and taxed) or gambling on the internet is legal (and taxed).

20111008-10 15:34 SteveB Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear GaryC and Dale,

I can think of a million things he has not done to make things better. Most of which you probably wouldn't want done. Name one important thing he has done to sink the economy? Not health care. Not implemented yet. I can name many for Bush, and of course there is an inherent inertia to your car or General Motors. A mass as titanic as the American economy obviously has a little more. I've never heard of anyone denying this...

20111008-11 15:58 GaryC Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear SteveB,

Even Obama has admitted that the U.S. is worse off now than when he was elected. He is like you and blames Bush, hurricanes, Europe, earthquakes, tsunamis, China, Republicans and everyone else. Unemployment, U.S. debt, bankruptcies, foreclosures etc. are all up since the Messiah took over. Using your train of thought, I can only assume when the economy recovers under a new President that you will say it was all because of Obama.

Unlike you, I will state that no U.S. President can control the economy in a good way or a bad way when other factors have created the mess. However, everything Obama has done is make the situation worse and the recovery longer.

20111008-12 16:23 GaryF Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Remember, in the general election you basically have to choose between two candidates, is there actually anyone out there who really thinks we'd be better off if McCain and Palin had won?

20111008-13 16:31 SteveB Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

I wonder if McCain would still be claiming we have no economic problems at all? Then suspending his Presidency while he takes part in an Indian vision quest to search for the solution.

The only good thing about their administration would have been that McCain is still alive, so maybe he would have made it through at least four years without turning over the reins of power to one of the stupidest, most inappropriate candidates for anything in the history of the world. Wait, let me think...no, that's stating it too mildly.

20111008-14 16:58 Dennis Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

from GaryC:

I expect the history books will show that Obama suffered the same fate, thinking he is smarter than everyone else and getting nothing done, except destroying the economy.

Dear GaryC,

I think the 2008 election was about the desire for "hope and change" and not necessarily about the candidate who was elected. That's why so many people, including many who voted for Obama, are disappointed in the lack of change, especially from Bush economic and other policies. Obamacare was a disappointment, but will be a plus for the economy if the right wing of the Supreme Court doesn't suppress it. Dodd-Frank is also much weaker that it should have been and won't do much to correct the abuses of Wall Street bankers run amok (Clinton gets a lot of credit for that mess since Glass-Steagall was repealed by his administration). So if you have some facts about what Obama has done to "destroy the economy" other than allow the same people to try to correct the problems that got us into the mess in the first place (Summers, Geithner, et al), then I would like to hear them spelled out.

Republicans have made a lot of accusations about the failures of Obama but have offered no specifics and no real ideas for improvement (and don't say by making government smaller since the Republicans have proven they really love big government as long as they are in charge).

20111008-15 17:45 Jim Collective Bargaining

Dear SteveB,

Just wanted to share something from my own experience forty years ago. I was president of the Mishawaka Education Association in 1971 which was the first year state law was going to make school boards bargain with teachers' unions.

We had been bargaining before the law for salaries and some fringe benefits like group insurance but had no standing to bargain any other conditions of work. And after "discussions" the Board really was free to do whatever they wanted to do.

They did not have to sign any kind of a master contract with the teachers representatives. Each individual teacher was given a contract and in some corporations they did not use a uniform salary schedule and township trustees bargained with each teacher to pay what would keep them there or encourage them to look for another job.

The administration and board were used to arguing money. They knew we would ask for more than our final number and they would come back with less than theirs and we would meet somewhere in between.

In trying to bargain about working conditions and classroom conditions it was a different story. It took a long time to get them to figure out how to do it. We would start out by saying we had a problem and we were offering a change that we thought would solve the problem for us.

They would just say "no" After many sessions and a few years they got to the point where they could say "yes, we see the problem exists, but we have a problem with your solution. Here is what we think we could do to solve the problem." Then we would look at their plan and try to modify it to work better. We got pretty good at working together later. The first year I had to lead a strike to break the ice.

Now forty years later there is a joint administration-teacher committee that meets monthly and solves a lot of problems without waiting for contract renewal.

In Congress now there do not seem to be any Republicans who can say anything but NO and they are not interested in solving any problems that people are interested in like jobs or protecting the environment just in getting rid of Obama and ordinary people.

Will these people ever grow up or do we just have to take them out of government since they cannot govern this way?

20111008-16 18:17 SteveG Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

LBJ got a lot of social issues through, and as I remember, he did most of the domestic issue governing during Ike's terms, as Ike attended to foreign policy.

When the statement was, "Our goal is to make Obama a one term president," and that has not altered, I believe it hasn't mattered what he has done. The Republicans would block it—anything to make him a one termer.

20111009-01 06:11 SteveB Re: Collective Bargaining

Dear Jim,

Thank you so much, Jim. This story is certainly a great illustration of what workers, management, and government have to do to actually function.

But, of course, despite our long labor history in America (which evidently students have not been learning well enough), the Republican leadership evidently feels that workers should have no unions, hence, they should not have a say in anything. Workers should have no rights, I guess.

And, as you say, they aren't even willing to talk about it.

Amazing to me that the progress I hoped to see in my lifetime has turned into decline, especially of government.

Always great to know your thoughts and feeling. Have a great fall and please stay in touch.

20111009-02 06:31 SteveB Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear GaryC,

It does seem like a weird move at a weird time and I'm totally against it. Like Ron Paul, I say legalize the stuff, tax the hell out of it, guarantee its quality, then really crack down on the Mexican border and the Mexican drug cartels.

What a stupid, stupid, wasteful failure the policy of both parties has been in the "war on drugs". I think what they needed instead was a war on sending jobs out of the country. Maybe a war on greed, though that's a fine line, because greed can be good if harnessed and controlled—hence, the U.S.

I agree and have always agreed with Rick Perry about one thing—"without border security, there is no security." Someday, we will probably learn that the hard way.

Obviously, few of us are really happy with Obama...for very different reasons. But I'll pick him a million times with glee before I will pick another Republican lying dog puppet!

20111009-03 07:50 SteveG Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear SteveB,

Washington has medical pot laws and it seems that each person gets a permit and is allowed to grow a certain number of plants for their own use. There were I believe 6 people with their licenses posted growing the proper number of plants in a small area, minding their own business in accordance with Washington law. The Feds came, tore out all the plants and arrested one individual.

The other interesting part of pot growing in this area is that a lot is done on large scale within federal forests and within vineyards. They have found areas of 10,000 plus plants growing. Usually Mexican nationals get arrested.

Hemp has been shown to be better than cotton for making clothes. Start the farming and tax/regulate the THC portion and let us have better clothes. I have seen some hemp made clothing, usually imported from Central America.

The Yakama Nation has their own cigarette manufacturing plants and get around state and federal taxes for those products. They also have a few gas stations that gets around federal and state taxes on gasoline.

20111009-04 08:47 Pam Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

I'm a child of the 'sixties, but I'm proud to say I've never once used recreational drugs of any kind, unless you count wine and caffeine. That said, I do support the legalization of marijuana. It can't be worse than beer and cigarettes, and it's responsible for a lot of social disorder, and not because of its effects. Think of the money that could be raised if it were sold legally and taxed. If people get high and commit crimes under the influence, then prosecute those crimes. But if someone wants to smoke a joint in his own living room, then where's the harm? Even if it were legal, I still wouldn't use it; I wouldn't even encourage it, but I do think those who want it should be able to get it without risking jail time. About cocaine, I'm not as sure. As I understand it, cocaine does do harm and can really mess people up. Heroin is off the table. But maybe if marijuana were legal it wouldn't be a gateway drug so much as a final destination. I love my wine, but it hasn't led me on to whiskey and gin. (Not ruling it out, mind.)

20111009-05 09:14 Pam Re: Collective Bargaining

I'm dismayed by the flak teachers get. The debacle in Wisconsin should make us all ashamed. It just goes to show how little Americans really think of education—or intelligence for that matter. To treat teachers like greedy slackers is outrageous and self-defeating.

Education is IMPORTANT. Like good medical care, good education is necessary for the health of a nation and builds a foundation for its future.

I spent a career teaching in a public university, where I was underpaid but loved my job. I also spent two years teaching in a public high school—a very nice one—and I don't think I've ever worked harder or endured so much stress. Teaching kids is hard work, and it takes a special person to do it well. Why do so many people assume that the teaching profession is larded with lazy bozos? The less than good ones usually drown and leave. It's the dedicated, strong ones who keep getting back on the horse. Anyone who thinks teaching is a cushy job needs to spend a week—just a week would do it—in a classroom. The discipline alone is enough to drain your batteries, and woe unto you if you haven't sufficiently prepared for every class every day. Then pile on the energy and creativity it takes to keep 20 or 30 squirmy kids or teens paying attention and maybe even enjoying the lesson, and you have one exhausted teacher at the end of the day. Sure, lots of jobs are hard. But doctors and lawyers get respect and compensation. Teachers too often have to beg for scraps and put up with lousy working conditions. When I taught high school back in the day, there was a teachers' union at my school, but I didn't join. I didn't think it was right for teachers to strike, and I didn't want to support something that might call for that. I have since changed my mind.

Teachers aren't sacrificial lambs; they deserve to be treated fairly. Labor unions have not always been clean and pristine, but they are responsible for an incalculable amount of progress and worker security. Every cause needs a critical mass to make itself felt. Unions are a way for teachers to have the power of a large organization, and they need it. Sorry for this rant, but you can tell how passionate I am about this subject. Thank you, group, for putting up with my vents.

20111009-06 09:21 Lianne Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop / Our Group"

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Why don't you start an interactive blog that one can choose to go to.

20111009-07 09:36 Mary Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"

Dear SteveB,

Agreed w/ you till your last paragraph...Democrats don't lie? I'm against blind faith which you obviously have w/ Mr. O, who bowed to the King of Saudi Arabia, promised you hope and change (are you seeing it yet? oh, I know, it's still Bush's fault....poor Mr. O can't follow thru w/ promises), didn't deal w/ immigration or close GITMO, promised no drilling, yet did, openly lied about how much "the rich" are paying in taxes, shovel-ready were NOT shovel ready....AND asking you: did the stimulus program really work?

At your own admission, you vote for the party and not the man [Don't believe I admitted any such thing. — SteveB].....shame on you....and I thought you liberals were more open-minded. Pam's the smartest one of all. [Well, this may be true. —SteveB]

20111009-08 10:22 GaryC Re: Collective Bargaining

Dear Pam,

My wife was a teacher in a private school for 30 years and was underpaid by at least 30% yearly. But she would never trade it for her public school experience with higher pay but stupid rules and requirements. I could not disagree with you more on the unions for teachers. First, teachers are protected by federal and state law which obviates the need for most of what the union is supposed to be doing. Second, study after study has shown that the unions are bad for the kids and bad for the teachers. Even Obama's Secretary of Education says that public schools have failed and is promoting charter schools. New Orleans is on the way to an entire system of charter schools. And, the effort in New Orleans is being led by senior teachers and administrators fed up with the failure of the system including their own union, who is opposing the plan.

There is a lot of evidence also that union officials use the dues money to "bribe" politicians and feather their own nest with lavish trips to conferences etc.

Unions screw the teachers and screw the children. Teachers, for the most part, are not the problem. But I am sure you know that not all teachers are of the same caliber as you are. There are many that should be ruffed as they do not care one wit about the kids. I was an attorney representing IPS for many years and the process we had to go through to get bad teachers fired was unbelievable. These were teachers who were doing drugs in the school, child molesters, child abusers etc. Yet, even when the teacher had been charged by the police for crimes, it took months if not years to get them fired even after they had been convicted and incarcerated. The union would continue to support these bums when their energy and resources should have been directed to helping the good teachers and students.

20111009-09 10:50 SteveB Re: Collective Bargaining

Dear GaryC,

Great! We're all agreed that education is important. Even vital.

I thought Republicans were fervently for deregulation, free enterprise, the free marketplace, lack of government interference, right?

I don't think the state legislatures or the national Congress should be dictating every detail of education, teacher working conditions, salaries, or even student performance. Or providing the money with so many strings.

I think there have to be some state, even national is OK, standards and some equality of funding. Sorry, but one or both of these bigger governmental entities has to provide this function. Other than this, I think education works best on a local level, with administrators, teachers, parents, and even students working together to solve problems in creative, fair, intelligent, even different ways. Education thrives on experiment, just not too much experiment.

Unions have proven to be a vital force to magnify the voice of individual teachers. Things work better— even in Japanese car factories—when workers have a say in their work. I know of no work where that is more important than teaching.

And a free, unfettered marketplace established between the unions and management and the capitalist system itself can be trusted to provide fair wages and costs.

This is the way all you Republicans want it to work for CEO's. This is the way it does work with CEO's except that they don't need unions, because they're powerful enough without them. But if they needed them, believe me, they'd have them!

Let's have it your way. Let's get big government (including state legislatures) out of education as much as possible. But let's leave a level playing field.

I say, what's fair for CEO's is fair for our fine, overworked, underpaid teachers who have my deepest admiration and appreciation.

From my upfront, inside view of having been a public school teacher myself for a while, I appreciate the teachers' unions too!

20111009-10 10:58 SteveB Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop / Our Group"

Dear Mary,

Just wanted to say thanks for writing. I hope you'll stay with us. And I never mean to offend, even though I have a very direct, sometimes provocative, way of stating things. I just want to wake people up. If I've offended you, I am sorry.

I agree that I am disappointed in Obama too.

That being said, I did not say I was going to vote by party. I never do that. I don't like either party that much. All my comments and questions reference a very small, specific sphere in this forum...searching for solutions to our specific problems, and the specific people who are running for, especially, the office of President in 2012.

There are a lot of Republicans I like and vote for who are more practical and less dogmatic than many of these Presidential candidates seem to be.

20111009-11 16:26 Mary Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop / Our Group"

Dear SteveB,

I appreciate your humility.

20111009-12 23:14 Mary Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop / Our Group"

Dear SteveB and Pam,

Like Pam, I like stimulating conversations, as long as there is no name-calling, or mocking of values. [Personal content removed. —SteveB] You are wrong, SteveB....I always seek the truth, and yea, sometimes it disappoints, but I couldn't be happy w/ a lie, nor should you even if it betrays your liberal views. My major point thru all of this is I'm against big government, which I believe Mr. O pushes. If someone can show me I'm wrong I'm all ears, but please don't do what Dennis has often done w/ me....."best defense is a good offense". I'm not a zealous student of history, but I believe that at times when our country was the most productive, good economy, etc. it was when the government wasn't running things. (just got back from a long road trip, so signing off and again, agreeing w/ Pam!)

20111010-01 06:41 Pam "Where's Your $50,000?"

I love Alan Grayson. I hope he runs for Pres. in 2016. He is the ONLY politician I can think of who tells it like it is. Straight out.

"Where's Your $50,000?" by Alan Grayson, Huffington Post

Oct. 7, 2011, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/rep-alan-grayson/gao-bank-bailout_b_1001009.html)

The Government Accountability Office (GAO) says that our Government has handed out $16 trillion to the banks.

Let me repeat that, in case you didn't hear me the first time. The GAO says that our Government HAS HANDED OUT $16 TRILLION TO THE BANKS.

That little gem appears on Page 131 of GAO Report No. GAO-11-696. A report issued two months ago. A report that somehow seems to have eluded the attention of virtually every network, every major newspaper, and every news show.

How much is $16 trillion? That is an amount equal to more than $50,000 for every man, woman and child in America. That's more than every penny that every American earns in a year. That's an amount equal to almost a third of our national net worth—the value of every home, car, personal belonging, business, bank account, stock, bond, piece of land, book, tree, chandelier, and everything else anyone owns in America. That's an amount greater than our entire national debt, accumulated over the course of two centuries.

A $16 trillion stack of dollar bills would reach all the way to the Moon. And back. Twice. That's enough to pay for Saturday mail delivery. For the next 5,000 years.

All of that money went from you and me to the banks. And we got nothing. Not even a toaster.

I have been patiently waiting to see whether this disclosure would provoke some kind of reaction. Answer: nope. Everyone seems much more interested in discussing whether or not they like the cut of Perry's jib.

Whatever a jib may be.

In the next few weeks, I'm going to be writing more about this. But right now, I wanted to keep this really simple. Just give folks something to talk about when they're standing next to the coffee maker.

The Government gave $16 trillion to the banks. And nobody else is talking about it.

Think about it. Think about what that means.

Courage, Alan Grayson

20111010-02	06:45	SteveB	Re: Our Group
-------------	-------	--------	---------------

Dear Mary,

I agree that things work so much better when people are respectful of each other. At the same time, I may, at times, not show much respect for certain political candidates I don't personally know. If you do the same thing, with Obama or anyone, I will not mind or take offense and hope you won't either.

I've decided Obama is too much of a professor-type (though I love him dearly). Like Jimmy Carter. Very smart, but not exactly connected in just the right way with the practical world. Somehow able to become President, then not able or willing to lead. Strange. I guess Woodrow Wilson was the last President before Carter who was the professor-type and I think he did OK.

There was a post from someone in this group the other day with numbers showing there are fewer government employees now than there were during the Reagan administration. I checked it out and it seemed to be true.

I'd love to know the truth for sure, but I suspect the government was running things just as much if not more in those days. Remember, we've had lots of deregulation and tax cuts since then.

The repeal of the banking regulations in the 90's allowed the housing bubble to happen—aided and abetted by both parties—in the opinions of even some conservative economists I have read.

The truth is not always easy to find, which is why I am pleased and encouraged if you are one of those that help all of us to find it and know it.

20111010-03 07:16 SteveB Re: Our Group

Dear Pam,

You are a good ally and I'm so happy to have you as a friend. Things will settle, thanks in large part to you. I loved your long comments the other day, and you seem to have woken some people up in a good way.

I'm so interested to know if anybody can be convinced by anything or anyone to actually change their minds if the facts warrant.

If we all agree, why bother... And I think we have such a smart group...

Thank you! Give that little boy a hug today. (If I don't remind you, you probably won't. Haha!)

20111010-04 08:30 GaryC Re: Our Group

Dear SteveB,

I was going to respond in kind. I have no issues with any of your correspondence or comments. WE have different opinions, but I would fight to the death your ability to express them in a civilized discourse. I don't think some of the people understand you and are funning with each other at times. [Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I was not trying to assassinate you with my comments. Sometimes an email can be taken out of context and not understood by all. I apologize if I offended you or caused your reputation to suffer.

What is interesting to me is how two people with similar backgrounds and experiences can look at facts and arrive at different conclusions. I have always believed that life is like a pendulum that swings back and forth. It really doesn't matter what concept you look at, there are always ebbs and flows with the direction of play, perception or outcomes. In baseball, we have gone from pitcher domination, to lowering the strike zone and steroids for higher run production, and now back to more pitching. In politics, we go from anti war, to job creation incentives, to environmental concerns, to religious nut bags, to government intrusion. As a whole, I think most people want security, safety, jobs, property rights, religious freedom, fairness and a future for their children. How we get there is always a matter of interpretation. I hope that I have learned something through these discussions. I know I form my opinions through reading, observation, listening to others and discussions like this. I certainly don't always agree with the comments but it does help me to understand the opinion of others and why they have them. I really don't believe in a one track approach to solving problems.

You and I agree on a lot of issues, but we just don't see the cause or the solution in the same way. I really don't feel that unions are evil but they are just as abusive and corrupt as government and corporations.

On a personal note, I am sorry to hear about your son. Nothing can be worse in my opinion than to lose a child early in their life. My friends who have had the same experience all have a void in their life. I have seen way too many divorces because of early deaths like Aaron's.

As to the consequences of the legalization of Marijuana, I know our drug policies (Dem or Repub) have been failures and always will be. I prefer to spend the money policing the border and stopping heavy drugs. Taxing the stuff and providing safe outlets for its purchase and production MIGHT stop kids from drifting into harder drugs through their association with dealers. The results in Holland are a mixed bag. Usage is up but violent crimes are down. I know Holland is planning a shift in their policies based on years of study but I can't remember the direction. I think those people with addictive traits will migrate further and further down the ladder regardless of how they get started.

Again, MY BAD for offending you and your delicate sensibilities!

20111010-05 11:44 SteveG The Sluggish Economy

Dear Mary and Pam,

The actual number of federal government employees compared to the size of the population is the smallest it has been in decades.

The economy is sluggish at best; banks are reluctant to loan money even though the interest rates are at a record low; banks have somewhere in the neighborhood of $1 trillion on hand; companies have a $1 trillion or so sitting around but won't expand, hire, because the economy is sluggish/unstable. Unemployment is high, you can probably pick any number above 9% and be right. If banks won't loan money to businesses to expand and companies won't use their money to expand, how is unemployment to decrease? How is the economy to grow?

20111010-06 11:53 Bill Re: The Sluggish Economy

Dear SteveG,

Well stated. This is the conundrum. There is a wonderful article on John Maynard Keynes in the current issue of The New Yorker, touching on this problem and relating Keynes statement that "animal spirits" are involved in resolving the question of resurgence in lending and investment. No kidding: "animal spirits." It was just Keynes's way of describing the non-quantifiable and amorphous psychological dimension of economic activity.

20111010-07 12:12 GaryC Re: The Sluggish Economy

Dear Bill,

I agree with Keynes on this observation, which begs the question "Why are governments involved in trying to stimulate the economy when they have no idea what the results will be?" Sort of like the "Law of Unintended Consequences". Or, our wonderful stimulus plan creating jobs at the cost of over $1,000,000 per job.

20111010-08 12:48 Dennis Re: The Sluggish Economy

from GaryC:

Or, our wonderful stimulus plan creating jobs at the cost of over $1,000,000 per job.

Dear GaryC,

This is one of those wonderful statistics made up and spread by the right wing lamestream media. If there is something to back it up, I'd like to see it.

20111010-09 15:37 Pam Re: Our Group

I'm glad there is some diversity in this group. When I was teaching, the university was always holding "diversity workshops," I guess in the effort to get people with different ethnicities, religions, and political opinions to talk to each other. I applauded the effort (it was well-intentioned), but I found those workshops kind of ridiculous. What's necessary isn't an hour doing diversity exercises with strangers or semi-strangers. What's necessary is friendship—and love.

I have an adopted black-Vietnamese son. I love him. How could I possibly, then, hate black people? My dearest friend is a conservative Christian; I am a liberal atheist. We've been friends for nearly 30 years. We've worked together and watched each other's children grow up. When we taught together, we were the poster-children for mutual respect between people with very different ideas about some important things. I think it was good for our students to see us in action. I think making a trivial cliché out of "Some of my best friends are _____" is too bad. When your best friend is somehow "different," it's harder to carry around prejudices.

I just want to say, I love this group.

20111010-10 16:06 Pam Re: The Sluggish Economy

Dear Mary, SteveG, and Bill,

I heard someone (yes, on NPR) say that if we're not careful we'll talk ourselves into another recession. It does seem that fear plays a large part in our troubles. I'd like to know why those corporations that have so much money lying around don't unlock their vaults and get things going. You'd think it would be in their best interest to do so. If just one corp. would take the first step, mightn't the others follow? I agree that economics is the "dismal science." And I admit most of what's going on is beyond me; it took me forever to figure out what mortgage-backed securities are. But I hear everyone saying the corporations have so much money, and if they'd just spend some of it and hire some people, the whole engine could start up again. Don't the CEOs listen to the same news? What are they waiting for?

I've wondered for a long time when people would take to the streets. No surprise there. I have to say I'm glad people are finally taking a stand. It's too bad a lot of the protesters look like wild and crazy hippies rather than nice respectable middle-class homeowners, but at least they're bringing some attention to a problem that is affecting millions of us.

I am fighting hard not to become a conspiracy nut, but I can't help wondering whether everything isn't ALL about making money. I don't think six guys sat down in a room and planned to rip off an entire class of Americans, but that is, in fact, what has happened. Someone did it. And someone is protecting those responsible. Bernie Madoff was just one they couldn't ignore, though even there it took years of warnings to get the govt. to move in on him. Sometimes I wonder if we aren't all being pacified with material goods, television, big-time sports (read the article in the Atlantic), and full to bursting supermarkets. Bread and circuses in other words. I, for one, don't want to risk what I have unless there are tanks rolling down my street. Violence breaks out when people feel like rats backed into a corner, and I don't think we're there yet. But the young have less to lose. Revolutions are sparked by the young who are most often the ones—like today—who are over-educated and underemployed. Family values are important not least because a young man with kids and a mortgage is less likely to burn the barn down. Freud said the two necessary things for happiness are love and work. We really do need to get a handle on unemployment. Ideas anyone?

20111010-11 16:23 Pam Re: Our Group

Dear SteveB,

I have come to really love this group. I find the conversations incredibly interesting. You're right, it's a smart group of people. I worry sometimes that I mouth off too much; I don't want to drown out anybody else. I do find, though, that when I can write my thoughts to this group I feel less depressed and hopeless. I'm pretty introverted, so while I enjoy interacting with other people (especially ones I know well), it takes me a long time to get really close to someone. In person, that is. Somehow, when I write I can be more forthcoming. Writing gives me energy, while the best cocktail party in the world exhausts me. I'm glad you found me and opened this door. Thanks.

20111010-12 17:08 SteveG Re: The Sluggish Economy

Dear Pam and Mary,

Well put. Where I currently live is about 50% Hispanic and some of the surrounding communities are 50% Hispanic and 25% Native American. Diversity is everywhere, if you look. I grew up poor, but didn't know it and enjoyed my life, still do. Some friends are religious, some go to church and think they are religious, others do not believe in traditional religions, and others do not believe. Some of you I have gotten drunk with, others I haven't; some I have made corn liquor with, others I haven't; some of you I have never met.

The important thing at the moment is finding a way or ways to get the economy, country moving in a positive/future direction for mankind—neither party alone can do that. Working together seems to be a lost art. How do you get cooperation going, how do you get mutual respect; how do you establish common goals, etc.?

20111010-13 17:32 GaryC Re: Our Group

Dear Pam,

Another issue I have with the U.S. citizenry, we are myopic. Most of us don't understand other cultures because we don't really travel abroad and embrace new cultures. I have been embarrassed so many times when I have taken customers to Asia who will not eat the local food, go out to see the local monuments or museums or engage in conversations with everyday people to see what is up in their lives.

I am sure that really well traveled people like Dennis and SteveB would agree. Well, maybe not, since I proposed the concept!

20111010-14 18:07 SteveB Quotes: Aristotle & William Shatner

"It appears necessary that there should be a limit to all riches, yet in actual fact we observe that the opposite takes place; for all men engaged in wealth-getting try to increase their money to an unlimited amount."

—Aristotle, a while ago

"This country is being torn apart by people with great passion who believe in their point of view and to disparage that point of view is to lose the argument. We are approaching a crisis where people see not just the necessity [of cooperating], but the Armageddon of not cooperating. Hopefully the people we elect will see it as well. —William Shatner, Oct. 5, 2011

20111010-15 18:21 Mark Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

I'd say that Obamacare helped destroy the economy.....it certainly didn't help it.....I also think that it's helped to nurture the public's feelings of doom.....he's runnin' up the country's charge card with no means of paying it back.....I hope it's repealed asap.....there, that ought to ruffle a few feathers.....all in good fun and discourse of course.....

20111010-16 18:47 GaryC Quotes: Aristotle & William Shatner

Dear SteveB,

Well played! But what is the incentive for these clowns in Congress to work for the common good?

20111010-17 21:24 Dennis Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

from Mark:

I'd say that Obamacare helped destroy the economy.....

Dear Mark,

Considering that most of Obamacare (aka Romneycare) hasn't even been implemented yet, I'd like to hear an explanation of how this could be.

I think you should look at the repeal of Glass-Steagall for the real reasons of why the financial system was turned into a casino and allowed Wall Street banks to almost take down the capitalist system. That, in case you don't remember, was during the Clinton administration. Obama was in the Illinois Senate at the time.

20111010-18 22:15 SteveB Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

from Mark:

I'd say that Obamacare helped destroy the economy...it certainly didn't help it. I also think that it's helped to nurture the public's feelings of doom. He's runnin' up the country's charge card with no means of paying it back.

I think the cost of "Obamacare" (unimplemented, so far) has been zero, but is projected by the budget office to save billions over the next 10 years. So how has it "destroyed the economy"? I believe our problems all come from greed.

20111011-01	06:26	SteveB	"America Is Getting Soft"
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------

"America Is Getting Soft" by Fareed Zakaria, CNN

Oct. 9, 2011, (http://globalpublicsquare.blogs.cnn.com/2011/10/09/america-is-getting-soft/?hpt=po_r1)

Barack Obama has apparently committed blasphemy. In an interview in Florida last week, he dared to say that America had gotten "soft." The denunciations came in fast and furious from the right.

Rick Perry said, "Americans are plenty tough. What we've got is a soft President."

Romney added, "It's not that we have become soft. It's that he's on our shoulders and is too heavy."

If you watch the clip, here's what the President really said:

The way I think about it is, you know, this is a great, great country that had gotten a little soft and, you know, we didn't have that same competitive edge that we needed over the last couple of decades. We need to get back on track.

Isn't this self-evidently true? And isn't this what conservatives have been saying for decades? The evidence on the topic is pretty clear. The United States is slipping by most measures of global competitiveness. In category after category—actual venture capital funding, research and development—America has dropped well behind countries like Japan, South Korea and Sweden.

The Information Technology and Innovation Foundation measures 39 countries on their efforts to improve competitiveness over the last decade. America comes in next to last. Perhaps the most crucial measure of our ability to compete in a global economy is our educational levels, especially in science, math and engineering. A generation ago, America had the highest percent of college graduates in the world. Today we're ninth and falling. In 2004, only 6% of U.S. degrees were awarded in engineering, which is half the average for rich countries. In Japan it's 20% and in Germany it's 16%.

The great scholar, Daniel Bell, once summed up the essence of the Protestant ethic that had spawned industrial civilization—delayed gratification. The ability to save and invest today for a better tomorrow has been at the heart of every society's leap from poverty to plenty. America was a country marked by this ethic. I'll give you three examples.

1. In the 1950s, household debt was just 34% of disposable income; today it is 115% of disposable income.
2. Over the same period, investments in infrastructure and R&D spending are both down by a full percent of GDP.
3. Today, the federal government spends four dollars on every adult over 65. Compare that with what we spend on children under 18—just one dollar. Every level of government now spends less of its money investing for the future and more and more on consumption for the present.

Conservatives used to believe in confronting hard truths, not succumbing to comforting fairy tales. Some still do. In a bracing essay in the right-wing National Review, Peter Thiel, the co-founder of PayPal and a politically active libertarian, describes how America has, well, gone soft. He notes that the economy hasn't been performing well for decades and that median wages have been stagnating. He argues that the country's innovation culture has begun to decay, corroded by a widespread search for "easy progress" and quick fixes. "In our hearts and minds," Thiel writes, "we know that desperate optimism will not save us."

That's just what the feel-good mantras you hear so often these days sounds like—desperate optimism.

20111011-02 06:47 SteveB Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

Dear GaryC,

Dennis is 110% correct on this one! On "Obamacare" and on the repeal of Glass-Steagall, which had protected us at least somewhat since 1933. The repeal (in the name of deregulation to produce a flourishing economy—haha) left us all vulnerable to...GREED!

20111011-03 12:00 Pam Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

What juicy can of worms do we have here?

I imagine each of us has a pet issue; SteveB's would be immigration; I won't try to speak for the rest of you. My pet issue for over 40 years has been healthcare. I can hardly wait to dig into this email from Dr. Mark. (I assume you're a medical doctor?)

As has already been pointed out, Obamacare has barely gotten out of the starting gate. The economy was in the toilet long before health care reform was under much discussion. As the great novelist Anthony Trollope would say, "As the world knows," most of our economic woes stem from the housing bubble and its attendant corruptions.

I agree with Robert Reich that what the economy needs now is more spending to lubricate the economy in the short term. This is not to say that the deficit isn't important, just that a frozen, jobless economy is worse. We need to shake out some of those corporate profits that are just sitting there and get credit moving again.

Capitalism depends on credit. Credit depends on confidence. What we are deficient in is trust. When bank deposits were insured by the federal government, people no longer kept their money under a mattress. They put it in banks that could then use that capital to support growth. I am a very risk averse person. I would rather save $100 than take a 50/50 chance on winning $500. When the banks were divided into institutions where people could safely park their money and different institutions that specialized in investment, a person could choose where to go. Now we're all in the pot together, like frogs in a tub of increasingly hot water. I'm telling you, I'd be one of the first frogs to leap out. Those risk-taking frogs are gonna get boiled. Back in the days when I was actually poor, I didn't pay much attention to the stock market, because I had nothing in it. I was poor, but I wasn't worried about losing anything.

Now I am invested—through my retirement plan—and I do pay attention and I do feel vulnerable. Doesn't it make sense to back up a little, look at what was going on when our economy was doing well, and maybe return to our more reasonably cautious behavior?

OK, now health care. (Thank you, thank you, thank you for being an audience. I'd feel I'm imposing on you except for the fact that I know you have a delete button.) I would like to see universal health insurance with a single-payer plan. I am not now, nor have I ever been, a socialist!! Universal health care is no more socialistic than public education. (I, for one, do not suffer the vapors when the word "socialism" comes up, but I won't go there now.) Insurance works because risk is shared. If only healthy people are insured (insurance companies like those folks best), then the cost of care for the sick and uninsured becomes prohibitive—and people will die. If we all contribute (as we do with Social Security), then the burden is shared by and lessened for all. If we insure everyone, we will have to ration care—and people will die. The outcome for all of us is the same, whatever kind of insurance we do or do not have. Some huge proportion of health-care dollars are spent on the last few months of life. No one wants to die, but we live as if we were in denial of our own mortality. We want life forever (or as long as possible), no matter the cost. If I had to choose between aggressive treatment for an 85-yr. old who's at death's door and treating a curable childhood leukemia, there is no doubt which one I'd choose. Even if that 85-yr. old was me. That, to me, seems a reasonable choice, not some sort of Nazi death-panel diktat.

Single-payer, universal care has worked in other countries (Canada, Sweden, England, to name the most obvious) for over half a century. Ask any citizen in Great Britain if he'd like to trade their system for ours, and you'd get a resounding "No."

There are so many arguments in support of universal care that I hardly know where to begin, but since money is what everybody seems to care about most, we should look at that first. Follow the money. Are insurance companies in business out of altruism and a desire to take care of people, or is their first obligation to make money? We all know the answer to that. Sometimes, no, all the time, it seems to me decisions of policy are decided solely on the basis of economic exigency.

Instead of saying we can't afford to take care of everyone, why don't we ask how we can make sure everyone has full access to a decent level of care? I lived in Canada for four years. My daughter was born there. My hospital bill was $40.00, and that was because I had a private room. All I ever had to do when I went to a doctor was show my OHIP card. I went to whomever I wanted and never had to wait. Most doctors' offices had only one, maybe two, administrative personnel, who handled all the paperwork, which was pretty straightforward. True, physicians probably made a lot less money than American doctors, and many of them fled south where the pickings were better. But most stayed, in no small part I would imagine, because of the quality of life in Canada. Why do so many of England's finest actors remain in England, when they could make pots more money in the New World? Maybe they prefer life in England. Which is more necessary to happiness: way more money than you really need or the security of knowing you have enough?

We're seeing what happens when society gets too lopsided, when a small elite gets all the cake, and the majority scrape by on the crumbs. The riots of the 'sixties were awful, but would African-Americans be equal under the law without them? Racial equality was a just cause. I believe that even the most ardent bigot deep down knows that. But there were so many ostensibly good reasons why the country couldn't afford change, the country wasn't ready, yadda, yadda, yadda. Justice could have been served without the looting and burning—but it wasn't. We could devise a fair, comprehensive health-care system without the protests on Wall Street, but I doubt we will. Healthcare for all is a just cause. We should support Obama's efforts (which don't go far enough), not become hysterical because we think being able to get treatment is at odds with being free.

20111011-04	12:17	Pam	Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich Exposing 7 GOP Lies?"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	--

Dear SteveB,

Could you send this to your group? I don't know how to. I trust this guy.

Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich Exposing 7 GOP Lies?" by Angie, MoveOn.Org

Oct. 11, 2011, (<http://bit.ly/nFXUy8>) or (http://front.moveon.org/what-if-everyone-saw-this-clip-of-robert-reich-exposing-7-gop-lies/#.TpRsBu_00j4.email)

20111011-05	12:19	Dennis	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy & "Doctors Avoid Penalties in Suits Against Medical Firms"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Pam et al.,

Here's a related article about health care costs. It's an issue that my rheumatologist and my pharmacist son both feel strongly about:

"Doctors Avoid Penalties in Suits Against Medical Firms" by Tracy Weber and Charles Ornstein, ProPublica

Sept. 16, 2011, (<http://www.propublica.org/article/doctors-avoid-penalties-in-suits-against-medical-firms>)

(This story was co-published with the Washington Post.)

Two years ago, drug maker Eli Lilly pleaded guilty to illegally marketing its blockbuster antipsychotic Zyprexa for elderly patients. Lilly paid $1.4 billion in criminal penalties and settlements in four civil lawsuits. But a doctor named as a co-defendant in one suit—for allegedly taking kickbacks to prescribe the drug extensively at nursing homes—never was pursued.

Last year, Alharma paid $42.5 million to settle federal allegations that it paid kickbacks to doctors to prescribe its painkiller Kadian.

"Health-care decisions must be based solely upon what is best for the individual patient and not on which pharmaceutical company is paying the doctor the biggest kickback," Rod J. Rosenstein, U.S. attorney for the District of Maryland, said in a statement announcing the settlement.

But the doctors accused of trading prescriptions for paid speaking gigs faced no consequences.

At least 15 drug and medical-device companies have paid $6.5 billion since 2008 to settle accusations of marketing fraud or kickbacks. However, none of the more than 75 doctors named as participants were sanctioned, despite allegations of fraud or of conduct that put patients at risk, a review by ProPublica found.

Reporters reviewed hundreds of pages of court records and interviewed current and former federal prosecutors, state medical board officials, attorneys for whistleblowers and, when possible, the doctors. For each doctor identified in a suit, ProPublica checked for state medical board discipline, penalties from the Medicare program and federal criminal charges.

In many of the cases, it appears that not even a cursory investigation was done to see whether the physicians had behaved inappropriately.

"Doctors have kind of gone under the radar," said Tavy Deming, a Philadelphia lawyer who represents drug company whistleblowers.

Amid concerns about the influence of drug company money on medicine, whistleblower lawsuits have emerged as a headline-grabbing tool for holding manufacturers accountable.

Yet, despite their power to secure large settlements from drug makers, the suits have failed to resolve the culpability of physicians. Doctors often are not named as defendants, even though descriptions of their alleged misconduct are used to bolster the suits. And even when settling, many companies, including Alharma, continue to deny the allegations.

After cases are resolved, the internal company documents used as evidence remain confidential, preventing further exploration of the physicians' behavior. Patients have no way of knowing whether their doctor's judgment has been compromised, and doctors may be tarnished by spurious accusations.

Medical boards, which normally pursue tips or complaints of wrongdoing, do not routinely scan for such cases. Justice Department lawyers, wary of spending more time and effort on a case, usually are not interested in going after lesser players.

Tony West, the assistant attorney general who oversees civil litigation nationwide for the Justice Department, declined through a spokeswoman to discuss the issue. In announcing settlements with the drug companies, however, West has said that kickbacks undermine doctors' credibility.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said in a written statement that it takes "two sides to perpetuate this fraud" and that both need to be held accountable. "Otherwise, regardless of how big of a civil settlement a drug company makes, the incentive to cheat the taxpayers will still be in place for those willing to take part," said Grassley, who has led investigations into conflicts of interest in medicine.

Doctors less-attractive targets

In recent years, pharmaceutical and medical-device companies have been barraged by whistle-blower lawsuits detailing how the pursuit of profit allegedly fueled fraud and corruption.

The suits are typically filed by former employees who say that the companies promoted drugs for unapproved uses or paid doctors to prescribe drugs or use medical devices. The suits seek to recover millions—even billions—of dollars spent on these products by government health programs.

The Justice Department joins the cases—known as "qui tam" suits, from Latin—if it believes they have merit. Whistle-blowers and their lawyers get a cut of any money collected. The government has come to rely on such cases to police companies' conduct.

For Justice Department lawyers, big drug companies make attractive targets. They are flush with profits and determined to avoid crippling legal defeats. Their bureaucratic sprawl often leaves an inadvertent trail of incriminating email and memos. The massive financial settlements they are willing to pay are often modest in light of their annual sales and profits.

Zyprexa, for example, had U.S. sales of nearly $3 billion in 2010 alone. Kadian, Alpharma's painkiller, brought in nearly $263 million, according to IMS Health, which tracks prescription drug sales.

Also, the rules governing drug and device companies are strict: They are banned from pushing their products for uses not approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

Doctors, on the other hand, make particularly unattractive targets. Fearful of losing their licenses—and perhaps going to prison—they will devote every penny to their legal defenses. And juries like to think the best of physicians.

"It's a scorched-earth battle" for a doctor, said Michael Loucks, a former federal prosecutor in Massachusetts who led some of the nation's biggest health-care fraud investigations. "If he's convicted, it's not only a federal prison sentence, but he loses his license."

Rules governing doctors are less strict than those for drug companies. Doctors are permitted to talk about unapproved uses of drugs or prescribe them when they believe a patient will benefit. To secure a conviction, prosecutors must show that doctors knowingly traded their prescription pads for money or perks.

Of course, doctors can be and have been held accountable in other circumstances for negligence and malpractice if they prescribe the wrong drug for a patient or quantities that are harmful.

Another factor weighing against prosecution is burnout. After spending years taking on a drug company, many government attorneys are loath to tack on more time for a relatively minor victory.

Take the case of Maryland psychiatrist Peter Gleason. In 2006, federal prosecutors in New York charged him with pushing the narcolepsy drug Xyrem, also known as GHB or the "date-rape drug," for unapproved uses such as depression and fibromyalgia, a condition marked by chronic pain and fatigue.

Gleason vigorously challenged the charges, saying he believed in the benefits of the drug. He ultimately pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor count of misbranding a drug for interstate commerce. In 2010, he was given one year of probation.

In July, Florida's health department filed an administrative complaint against him based on his conviction, apparently unaware that Gleason had committed suicide in February.

Evidence sealed at settlement

For concerned outsiders, the whistle-blower suits are often troublingly vague. Many don't provide enough specifics about physicians' roles to allow assessment of their veracity. Some offer only worrisome hints of doctors' misconduct.

But the case against Lilly and Florida psychiatrist George Jerusalem, unsealed in 2009, was rich with detailed allegations. While purportedly receiving money and gifts from Lilly from 2001 to 2003, Jerusalem favored its antipsychotic Zyprexa, according to a case filed in federal court in Pennsylvania by Steven Woodward, a former Lilly sales representative.

Jerusalem was a consulting psychiatrist at more than 100 nursing homes in Florida's panhandle, treating 3,000 to 5,000 residents. According to the lawsuit, he prescribed more than $1 million worth of Zyprexa a year to them even though it was known to be potentially dangerous for older patients.

Jerusalem had a change of heart, the suit said, when Lilly balked at hiring his son as a sales rep.

"As he had threatened, Dr. Jerusalem retaliated by immediately starting to switch his thousands of patients from Zyprexa" to a competitor's drug, the suit said. Sales of Zyprexa among Jerusalem's patients plummeted by 33 percent in one month, the lawsuit alleged.

Jerusalem did not return calls seeking comment. His wife, Tessie, who was also named as a defendant, said the accusations in the suit about trading prescriptions for favors are "not true."

Tessie Jerusalem, who managed his home office, said her husband gave only a few talks about Zyprexa over the years. If Woodward "can prove that Dr. Jerusalem made $50,000 from the company, oh my goodness," she said. "Where did he get that amount is beyond me."

Lilly settled this and three similar suits for $1.4 billion in 2009 and pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge for promoting Zyprexa in elderly populations as a treatment for dementia. Although Jerusalem was named as a defendant, the case against him was dropped when Lilly settled and there was no response from him in the court file. His case shows how hard it is for outsiders to get to the bottom of such allegations.

Once the Justice Department joins a case like this one, government lawyers have access to any evidence the whistleblower brings. With their subpoena power, they also can secure patients' medical records, a breakdown of the drugs prescribed and a listing of a company's payments to physicians.

When a case is settled, however, any evidence typically remains confidential, is sealed or even returned to the drug company. The public is effectively left in the dark.

ProPublica's effort to substantiate the allegations against Jerusalem was inconclusive. Reporters sought Medicaid-prescribing data from Florida for Jerusalem. Those records show he had prescribed only a small amount of antipsychotics during 2003.

But the data might not reveal his true impact on the prescriptions of his patients. State records showed he had treated at least 1,557 patients enrolled in both Medicare and Medicaid (mostly nursing home residents) in 2003 alone.

It is common for consulting psychiatrists such as Jerusalem to recommend drugs for patients, while the actual prescriptions are then written by physicians who work as medical directors for the nursing homes. Assessing the allegations against Jerusalem would require a review of confidential patient medical records to show that he recommended a drug that was later prescribed by another doctor.

Prosecutors could conduct such a review with a subpoena, but federal patient privacy laws would shield the records from reporters.

Asked for substantiation, attorneys for Woodward said his claims were based on memory because he was not allowed to take his records when he was fired. They said the government found him to be a trustworthy source. Woodward did not return calls for comment.

Two government lawyers involved in the case wouldn't comment on it but said the Justice Department typically focuses on whether the allegations in a suit support a pattern of behavior by the company. The department does not vouch for whistle-blowers' specific claims about individual doctors.

Brian Kenney, a Woodward attorney, said he pushed prosecutors to pursue the psychiatrist because his conduct was "egregious," but they were not interested.

"Dr. Jerusalem's conduct is tantamount to elder abuse," the suit alleged.

Medical boards don't follow up

When physicians are accused of sexual misconduct, medical malpractice or criminal behavior, medical boards typically launch investigations and impose public discipline if justified.

Medical-board officials in several states, however, said they could not recall any cases in which a doctor had been sanctioned for taking a kickback from a drug company or being part of a company's plan to market drugs "off-label"—for uses that are not approved by the FDA.

Russell Aims, chief of staff for Massachusetts Board of Registration in Medicine, said such cases are hard to prove because physicians can always claim they are prescribing and promoting a drug because they believe in it—not because of the money they are being paid.

"It's not like a wrong-site surgery, like sexual misconduct, like getting popped for a DWI," where the evidence is clear-cut, he said.

Further, many whistle-blower suits are filed in federal courts and never referred to state officials. Some former federal prosecutors said such suits should be routinely forwarded to state medical boards.

Attorney Marcella Auerbach, whose Florida practice represents whistle-blowers, said she is struck by the lack of interest in the cases by boards.

"There is absolutely no follow-up by any medical organization—not an email, a phone call—ever that we've received in the office," she said. "No one's asked the question."

The federal government can fine doctors or strip them of their ability to bill federal health programs. But none of the physicians named in the suits settled since 2008 have faced such actions, according to a review this summer of a list of physicians excluded from billing Medicare and Medicaid.

In an earlier round of cases, the inspector general at the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services sanctioned three Florida doctors for seeking or receiving kickbacks from hip- and knee-device makers. One was banned from Medicare and Medicaid for three years and fined $65,000. The others were fined $650,000 and $101,000, respectively.

None was disciplined by Florida's medical board.

Lewis Morris, chief counsel to the HHS inspector general, said doctors need to know there are repercussions. "If you don't focus on doctors, this is a problem that will never end," he said.

He also acknowledged that he only has the resources to focus on the most glaring cases.

"I don't have a logical defense," Morris said. "We have a finite number of people to do a hell of a lot of work, so we can't get to every case we'd like to."

Doctors say they're unfairly labeled

Some doctors named in the suits say they've been unfairly branded. The inclusion of allegations in an official court document gives them a ring of truth, they say.

A 2008 whistle-blower lawsuit against Pfizer, for instance, names Delaware psychiatrist Neil Kaye as "one of the key champions of this nationwide fraudulent marketing scheme" involving the antipsychotic Geodon.

At least one of Kaye's PowerPoint presentations, the suit alleged, promoted the drug to treat a host of conditions for which it was not approved by the FDA.

Pfizer paid Kaye $4,000 a day plus expenses, said the suit, filed in Massachusetts. He even used his private helicopter to fly to speaking gigs "all at Pfizer's expense," the suit said.

Pfizer paid the government $2.3 billion in 2009 to resolve this and 10 other civil suits and a criminal case. As part of the settlement, a Pfizer subsidiary pleaded guilty to felony charges relating to the painkiller Bextra, which was pulled from the market in 2005. Kaye was named as a co-defendant but said he was never served with the suit nor was a party to the settlement.

A Pfizer spokesman said the allegations against Kaye are false. In an interview, Kaye said, "I've never off-label marketed. I never would."

Kaye said people have mentioned the suit to him. "I sometimes try to convince people that not everything that is on the Internet is the truth."

Jeffrey Bostic, a child psychiatrist in Boston, similarly was accused of being a cog in Forest Laboratories' marketing of its antidepressants Celexa and Lexapro for children. The drugs were not approved for that use.

In court papers filed in Massachusetts, the government said Bostic gave more than 350 Forest-sponsored talks and presentations.

"Dr. Bostic became Forest's star spokesman in the promotion of Celexa and Lexapro for pediatric use," the complaint said. The firm paid Bostic more than $750,000 in honoraria for his presentations on Celexa and Lexapro between 2000 and 2006, it said.

Bostic, who was not named as a defendant, said he was paid for his speeches but not $750,000. He said his talks were based on his experiences treating depressed children at a community mental-health center where he worked in southern New Hampshire.

Forest settled criminal and civil cases for $313 million in 2010. One of its subsidiaries pleaded guilty to a felony count of obstructing justice involving the thyroid hormone Levothyroid and separate misdemeanor counts of off-label promotion of Celexa as a treatment for pediatric patients and distributing Levothyroid even though it was not approved.

The misdemeanor counts did not allege that the company intended to violate the law, the company said in a statement at the time.

"I've never had difficulty sleeping at night feeling I did anything inappropriate," Bostic said. "Maybe I'm deluded. There were no kickbacks."

20111011-06 14:31 Pam Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

I think it was Mortimer Adler who said that during the course of history institutions have improved (the Catholic church no longer burns heretics) but individuals haven't. This article seems to bear that out. Unless you count cheating drug companies as institutions.

The thing about democracy is it doesn't work without an educated and basically honest populace. Without trust, it just doesn't work. When a society is corrupt, every enterprise gets tainted. But what is society? It's us. I am appalled by the idea that a doctor, a person his patients entrust with their very lives, would place personal gain above his patients' welfare, but there must be a lot of them out there. If "reputable" companies like Eli Lilly take every advantage they can lay their hands on, and the FDA fails to act against them, and Medicare is forbidden to negotiate drug prices, where's the trust?

I wonder if anyone has done a study of the relative trustworthiness of various societies. I assume that politics in Italy is more corrupt than it is here. I know that in Afghanistan nothing gets done without bribes all around. I bet Denmark is trustworthy. I'm ashamed that a venerable profession like medicine has so many rotten eggs in it. Where do things go wrong? What causes these moral lapses in people who look on the surface like everyone else? It's an age-old question, I know. No wonder we remember Demosthenes with his lantern, looking in vain for an honest man.

20111011-07 16:18 SteveG Illegal Immigration

There cannot be 50 different immigration policy, one for each state. There needs to be one for the country and it needs to be enforced in all states. Typically we talk of illegal immigration through the Mexican borders, yet there is a lot of illegal immigration through the Canadian border—eastern Europe, Middle East, etc. Increased undocumented immigration from South and Central America is coming through Puerto Rico.

We have had the War on Drugs since the 1960's. So far drugs have won. A lot of states have prescriptions for medical marijuana. In this area the mountain forest areas and the vineyards are prime growing spots for pot—one spot was found with 10,000 plants.

16 states currently offer in-state tuition for undocumented students while documented students have to pay out of state tuition. Where is the fairness?

20111011-08 16:25 GaryC Re: Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveG,

It's all about power. Illegals vote in many states and vote Democrat. If you want to get votes, then you don't enforce the laws. It's very simple. Republicans do the same thing in other areas. I still say reform of the primary system and term limits would reduce this pandering.

20111011-09 18:28 Dennis The End of Loser Liberalism: Making Markets Progressive

Here's a free book you can download that is worth reading.

The End of Loser Liberalism: Making Markets Progressive, by Dean Baker

2011, (<http://www.cepr.net/index.php/publications/books/the-end-of-loser-liberalism>)

(Published by the Center for Economic and Policy Research, 1611 Connecticut Ave. NW, Suite 400, Washington, DC 20009 www.cepr.net. Cover photo by Helene Jorgensen. Cover design by Justin Lancaster. Creative Commons (cc) 2011 by Dean Baker. Notice of rights: This book has been published under a Creative redistributed, displayed by anyone, provided that proper attribution is given.)

(ISBN: 978-0-615-53349-0)

(Acknowledgments: I have benefitted enormously from discussing the ideas in this book with my colleagues at the Center for Economic and Policy Research, Eileen Appelbaum, Heather Boushey, Helene Jorgensen, David Rosnick, John Schmitt, and Mark Weisbrot. I also received helpful comments on the manuscript from Alan Barber, Kris Warner, and Nicole Woo. Jane Farrell helped with the graphs. Pat Watson did his usual outstanding job editing the book. I thank Helene, Walnut, Olive, and Kiwi for tolerating my neglect while writing the book. And Biscuit deserves special note for allowing himself to be the poster boy of Loser Liberalism.)

Chapter 1—Upward Redistribution of Income: It Didn't Just Happen

Money does not fall up. Yet the United States has experienced a massive upward redistribution of income over the last three decades, leaving the bulk of the workforce with little to show from the economic growth since 1980. This upward redistribution was not the result of the natural workings of the market. Rather, it was the result of deliberate policy, most of which had the support of the leadership of both the Republican and Democratic parties.

Unfortunately, the public and even experienced progressive political figures are not well informed about the key policies responsible for this upward redistribution, even though they are not exactly secrets. The policies are so well established as conventional economic policy that we tend to think of them as incontrovertibly virtuous things, but each has a dark side. An anti-inflation policy by the Federal Reserve Board, which relies on high interest rates, slows growth and throws people out of work. Major trade deals hurt manufacturing workers by putting them in direct competition with low-paid workers in the developing world. A high dollar makes U.S. goods uncompetitive in world markets.

Almost any economist would acknowledge these facts, but few economists have explored their implications and explained them to the general public. As a result, most of us have little understanding of the economic policies that have the largest impact on our jobs, our homes, and our lives. Instead, public debate and the most hotly contested legislation in Congress tend to be about issues that will have relatively little impact.

This lack of focus on crucial economic issues is a serious problem from the standpoint of advancing a progressive agenda. Mainstream economic conservatives already have an enormous advantage in national politics because they control most of the money that finances political campaigns. To add to that, they also use their money to buy directly into the national debate by funding organizations and projects intent on undermining important programs they don't like — as investment banker Peter Peterson has done with his decades-long crusade against Social Security and Medicare. But all the money in the world will hardly matter if progressives do not understand how basic, conventional economic policy militates against the interests of working people and the disadvantaged. If they don't even know what winning would look like, then the prospects for a progressive economic agenda are bleak.

For the most part, progressives accept the right's framing of economic debates. They accept the notions that the right is devoted to the unfettered workings of the market and, by contrast, that liberals and progressives are the ones who want the government to intervene to protect the interests of the poor and disadvantaged.

But this view is utterly wrong as a description of the economy and competing policy approaches. And it makes for horrible politics. It creates a scenario in which progressives are portrayed as wanting to tax the winners in society in order to reward the losers. The right gets to be portrayed as the champions of hard work and innovation, while progressives are seen as the champions of the slothful and incompetent. It should not be surprising who has been winning this game.

In reality, the vast majority of the right does not give a damn about free markets; it just wants to redistribute income upward. Progressives have been useful to the right in helping it to conceal this agenda. Progressives help to ratify the actions of conservatives by accusing them of allegiance to a free-market ideology instead of attacking them for pushing the agenda of the rich.

For the last three decades the right has been busily restructuring the economy in ways that ensure that income flows upward. The rules governing markets, written by the rich and powerful, ensure that this gravity-defying outcome prevails. The right then presents the imposition of rules that it likes as the natural result of unfettered market forces.

Rarely does this upward flow of income require a government check to the wealthy. But when the checks are necessary, they come. The Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board gave trillions of dollars in loans, at below-market interest rates, to the largest Wall Street banks at the peak of the financial crisis in 2008. These loans kept Goldman Sachs, Citigroup, and most of the other major Wall Street banks from collapsing, and the subsidies implied by the loans and guarantees to the world's largest banks were in the tens if not hundreds of billions of dollars. Yet somehow this massive intervention on behalf of these banks' executives, shareholders, and bondholders — some of the richest people in the country — is not viewed as interference with the market.¹

While the bank bailouts were big news, there is no shortage of less-visible instances in which conservatives have long been eager for the government step in to support the interests of the wealthy. We'll quickly discuss seven examples here: continued support for too-big-to-fail banks, patent and copyright protection, restrictions on organized labor, corporate liability limitations, Federal Reserve monetary controls, trade and dollar policy, and housing policy.

Too-big-to-fail banks

To start with an easy one, how many "free market fundamentalists" have rallied behind efforts to break up "too-big-to-fail" banks? This one should be a no-brainer for any genuine believer in free markets. A too-big-to-fail bank is a bank that everyone expects will be bailed out by the government if it gets in trouble, as happened in 2008. Because investors can assume that the government will back up the bank, they are willing to lend it money at a lower interest rate than if they thought the bank was standing on its own. How could any believer in the virtue of free markets support the existence of large financial institutions that borrow at a lower cost than their competitors because of an implicit guarantee from the government?

To start with an easy one, how many "free market fundamentalists" have rallied behind efforts to break up "too-big-to-fail" banks? This one should be a no-brainer for any genuine believer in free markets. A too-big-to-fail bank is a bank that everyone expects will be bailed out by the government if it gets in trouble, as happened in 2008. Because investors can assume that the government will back up the bank, they are willing to lend it money at a lower interest rate than if they thought the bank was standing on its own. How could any believer in the virtue of free markets support the existence of large financial institutions that borrow at a lower cost than their competitors because of an implicit guarantee from the government?

The fact that most of those claiming to be "free marketers" have overwhelmingly been on the side of the too-big-to-fail banks tells the world as clearly as possible that their motivations have nothing to do with a commitment to market fundamentalism and everything to do with a commitment to serving the interests of the rich and powerful. This is disguised as a commitment to the market for the obvious reason that doing things out of a commitment to free market principles sounds better than explicitly claiming to pursue policies that redistribute income from the vast majority of the population to the rich.

Patent and copyright protection

Patents and copyrights offer another example of how conservatives quietly support massive intervention by the government. Though we tend to think of them as integral parts of the free market, patents and copyrights are anything but.

Patents and copyrights are both explicit government policies to promote innovation and creative work. They reward inventors, musicians, writers and other creative workers with government-enforced monopolies for set periods of time, and these monopolies allow the holders to charge prices far above the free-market price. For example, the nation will spend close to $300 billion in 2011 on prescription drugs.² In the absence of government-enforced patent monopolies, the same drugs would cost around $30 billion, an amount that implies a transfer to the pharmaceutical industry of close to $270 billion a year, or about 1.8 percent of gross domestic product. It is close to 15 times current federal spending on the main government welfare program, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), and it dwarfs the money at stake from a main goal of progressives: eliminating the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy.

Restrictions on organized labor

Yet another area where the government intervenes in the market at the behest of the well-off to diminish the well-being of workers and the disadvantaged is labor-management policy. The accepted view is that progressives want the government to intervene to protect workers, while conservatives would rather let workers and management sort things out for themselves. That's not quite the story.

Though labor law provides protections to workers and their unions, it also constrains workers' power in important ways. For example, it is illegal to organize or honor a secondary boycott. If the workers at a restaurant go on strike and then arrange for the Teamsters to refuse to deliver food to honor the strike, the restaurant can enlist the government to deliver injunctions and impose fines against the Teamsters. If Teamsters officials ignore the injunction (e.g., they don't tell their members that they cannot refuse to deliver food to the restaurant), they can face imprisonment.³ This is not the free market; this is the government intervening on behalf of employers.

Another example of how labor-management policy is rigged away from market forces is the fact that 22 states currently deny workers freedom of contract with their employers. Under "right-to-work" laws, workers are prohibited from signing contracts with employers that require workers covered by a union contract to pay their share of the union's costs. The law requires that everyone who is in a union bargaining unit — regardless of whether they are actually in the union — gets the same pay and benefits. The law also requires that the union represent workers in disputes with employers on issues covered by the contract, whether or not a worker is in the union. This means that if a worker who does not pay to support the union is fired, the law requires that the union represent the worker through any appeals process established under the contract.

While the law requires unions to provide the same benefits to all workers covered by a contract, right-to-work laws prohibit unions from signing agreements with employers that would require workers to pay for the benefits they are receiving. It in effect guarantees representation without taxation. This restriction of freedom of contract is not consistent with a free market. "Right-to-work" laws are just another way in which the right uses the power of the state to reduce the power and income of workers. Free marketers are perfectly willing to deny the freedom of contract to accomplish this end.

Corporate liability limitations

The modern limited liability corporation is another example of interference with a pure free market. Corporations do not exist in the natural world or in the free market; they have to be chartered by a government. They are artificial entities that can inflict damage on the public without the individuals at fault being held fully accountable. Limited liability means that the government allows corporations to harm individuals — for example, by allowing toxins to get into a community's drinking water — without the corporation's top management or shareholders being obligated to pay compensation. The victims (those drinking contaminated water in this case) are entitled to whatever assets are held by the corporation, but they cannot take the personal assets of the top managers or the shareholders.

By creating limited liability corporations the government is allowing the individuals who form a corporation to take the property (or even lives) of others without compensation. This is not a free market.

Federal Reserve monetary controls

A government policy with tremendous influence over economic outcomes is the power of the Federal Reserve Board in determining the level of employment. The Fed can foster growth and employment with low interest rates and expansionary monetary policy. But it can and often does deliberately raise the unemployment rate by raising interest rates. Moreover, the Fed's policy on holding assets like government bonds has an enormous impact on the government's debt burden, which in turn has redistributive implications.

Yet Fed policy receives little attention from progressives. We spend far more time arguing over jobs bills that will have a trivial impact on employment compared to the Fed's monetary policy. And we devote major lobbying efforts to tax or budget items that don't have a tenth of the impact on the debt as the Fed's decisions on its asset holdings.⁴

When the lost output from the Great Recession, an event that could have been averted with competent Fed policy, is compared with revenue that would be gained over the years 2011-2020 from eliminating the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy, the lost output from the Great Recession is more than five times as large.

The right is happy to keep the Fed out of public debate since, as things stand, the right largely controls it. Conservatives promote an image of the Fed as an august institution, managed by high priests who are unsullied by the dirty back-and-forth of partisan politics. This view works out great for conservatives, since policy decisions by the Fed and for that matter other central banks typically have far more impact on the economy than most of the issues debated by Congress. The right manages to stir up big debates over relatively small matters, leaving it to control one of the most important levers of power in the economy. And this, the right would have us believe, is the work of the free market.

Trade and dollar policy

Another example of an area in which the right has almost completely controlled the debate, and therefore the policy outcome, is trade and dollar policy. The right has pushed a trade (and immigration) agenda over the last three decades that has had the explicit goal of putting non-college-educated workers in direct competition with low-paid workers in the developing world. The predicted and actual effect of this policy is to reduce the wages of non-college-educated workers relative to the wages of more highly educated workers and to increase corporate profits.

The trade deals negotiated over the last three decades have left highly educated workers largely protected from this competition; the agreements mostly focus on subjecting workers without college degrees to international competition. This policy has been carried through under the guise of free trade, but it has nothing to do with promoting free trade: a genuine free trade policy would be designed to place all U.S. workers, not just those without college educations, in competition with their lower-paid counterparts in the developing world.

The value of the dollar is another key policy lever that has been largely kept out of public policy debates. The Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury have enormous ability to influence the value of the dollar. A high dollar makes U.S. goods and services less competitive in the world economy. It makes our exports more expensive to people living in other countries, and it makes imports cheaper for people in the United States. As a result, a high dollar will reduce our exports and increase our imports, creating a trade deficit.

A trade imbalance matters hugely for the distribution of income in a context where some workers are exposed to international competition and others are protected. The high-dollar policy redistributes income from the workers who are exposed to international competition (non-college-educated workers) to those who are largely protected from such competition (primarily highly educated professionals, like doctors and lawyers). The high dollar means that the non-college-educated workers, in the face of competition from lower-cost imports, have to work for less to keep their jobs. On the other hand, those who are protected from this competition keep their good jobs and salaries and get to buy lower-cost imported products.

Is dollar policy just an esoteric, econometric issue? Hardly. Moving the value of the dollar up or down against other currencies by 10 percent has the impact on U.S. employment and wages of a hundred North American Free Trade Agreements. Yet how often might the dollar move that much without a peep from the press or progressive policy makers?

Of course, the hand that controls dollar policy is not the invisible hand of the free market. Business and financial interests have the upper hand at the Treasury Department and the Fed, but almost no one is talking about this important lever of economic power.

Housing policy

Though it is not hard to follow and appreciate Fed policy or the ups and downs of the dollar, we ignore these important economic policies at our peril. Instead, many progressives take the lead of conservatives and focus on the easy-to-see ups and downs of the stock market as a measure of economic health. Yet a mainstream economics textbook would tell us that the value of the stock market is supposed to reflect the value of future corporate profits. Rising profits could mean that future growth will be stronger and that wages as well as profits will be higher. On the other hand, the stock market might rise because investors believe that profits will rise at the expense of wages, or as a result of lower corporate tax payments. In the latter, redistributive case, only those who hold lots of stock would have reason to be happy about the prospect of higher stock prices. Higher stock prices ought not to provide any more cause for celebration than higher corn or zinc prices — it's good news for corn and zinc producers, but bad news for everyone else. Thus, there's little benefit from rising stock prices to give progressives cheer.

The same confusion about who benefits extends to rising home prices. Higher home prices do not make society as a whole wealthier; they just increase the share of society's wealth that can be claimed by homeowners. Those who own the most expensive homes are the biggest gainers.

Since homeowners as a group tend to be wealthier than non-homeowners, it is hardly progressive to support the upward redistribution of wealth implied by higher home prices. Higher home prices also have the effect of making it more expensive for current renters to become homeowners. In other words, a policy that leads to higher home prices can be thought of as an unaffordable housing program, a plan for an upward redistribution of income that is 180 degrees at odds with progressive policy.

Most economists, even progressive ones, would no doubt take the arguments presented above in different directions — for example, by arguing that the Fed must restrain employment growth to keep inflation in check, or that patent policy is essential to promote the development of new drugs. But they would not dispute the basic points: the Fed indeed has enormous ability to influence the economy through its control of interest rates and patents are government-granted monopolies that cause drugs and other items to sell for prices far above the free-market price.

If progressives can come to grips with the basic economics of the big issues of the day, then it will at least be possible to make real progress in policy debates. Without this knowledge, it is impossible to even know when progress is being made. When progressives applaud a run-up in the stock market, as many did in the Clinton years, they are rooting for the other team. When progressives devise policies to keep a housing bubble from deflating, they are plotting to use taxpayer dollars to allow the better-off segment of society to benefit at the expense of the less-well-off, the ones who don't own homes or own homes of little value.

The political system and the "free market" are rigged to the advantage of the rich and powerful, which makes it difficult for progressives to make headway in pushing policies that advance the interests of everyone else. However, this mission goes from difficult to achievable if we pay attention to the basic economics. There are enormous obstacles in our path, but if we don't know where we are going, then we can be absolutely sure that we are not going to get there.

Chapter 2—The Economic Crisis: Where We Are and How We Got Here

There is no cause for progressives to be on the defensive as the United States and most other wealthy countries struggle to recover from the worst downturn since the Great Depression. The economic disaster was entirely the result of conservative economic policies, pursued with reckless abandon. If a progressive government had driven the economy off a similar cliff, progressives could expect to spend at least 40 years in the political wilderness. No one would want to go near such discredited policies.

But progressives are on the defensive. A reinvigorated right is openly attacking Social Security and Medicare, looking to take back economic gains that date from the New Deal. It is also doing everything in its power to undermine unions in both the public and private sectors because it recognizes their importance as bulwarks of the Democratic Party and progressive politics more generally. It is even taking steps to roll back the right to vote by pushing measures that will make it more difficult to vote and will explicitly disenfranchise particular groups of people.

How could progressives have allowed themselves to be beaten back? The root of the problem is that President Obama and the leadership of the Democratic Party backed away from telling the truth about the economic collapse. By refusing to “demonize” Wall Street and the rest of the financial industry for the damage inflicted on the economy and the nation, the president and his party left a huge void that has been filled with alternative stories.

Those who rely on the Washington Post and National Public Radio for their news might think that the economy fell into this downturn because reckless government spending sent financial markets into a panic, causing businesses to lay off millions of workers. They are also likely to believe that there will be no hope of recovery until the president and Congress agree on a credible plan to bring spending under control in the decades ahead.

The truth is, this story makes as much sense as blaming the downturn on an attack by space creatures, but in Washington debates it is not necessary that a narrative be grounded in reality. Despite the fact that the budget deficit holds center place in news accounts, it is not the cause of the economy’s current problems. The large deficit is rather the result of the economic downturn that began in late 2007, a fact that can be easily shown by examining the Congressional Budget Office’s analysis of the budget.⁵

Going into the downturn in 2007, the budget deficit was a relatively modest 1.2 percent of GDP, and it was projected to get smaller in the years ahead. It is arguable that even the 2007 deficit was too large — that with the economy near full employment the government should have been running budget surpluses — but it would be a stretch to equate a deficit equal to 1 percent of GDP with runaway borrowing that poses a threat to the government’s finances.

The downturn increased the deficit for two reasons. First, government tax revenue and spending responds automatically to a weakening economy. When the economy slows, the government takes in less money in tax revenue. Unemployed workers stop paying Social Security taxes and pay less in income tax. In addition, a higher rate of unemployment means that more money will be paid out in various forms of benefits like food stamps and unemployment insurance. Although budget deficits increase every time we have a recession, the increase this time was larger than most because of the severity of the downturn.

The other reason that the deficit increased in the downturn was that the government enacted various stimulus packages to boost the economy. It is possible to identify at least three distinct stimulus packages since the downturn began. The first consisted primarily of a tax cut. President Bush signed this package into law in February 2008 at a time when the unemployment rate was just 4.8 percent. President Obama proposed the second package just as he was taking office in January 2009, and Congress approved roughly $700 billion in new tax cuts and additional spending, mostly over calendar years 2009 and 2010.⁶ The third stimulus, approved at the end of 2010 at a point when most of the money from the second stimulus had been spent, extended President Bush’s 2001 tax cuts for another two years, reduced the payroll tax by 2 percentage points for a year, and continued extended unemployment benefits through 2011.

These stimulus packages were explicitly designed to offset the effect of reduced private-sector spending. The resulting rise in the deficit stemming from the stimulus packages was not an accident — it was a deliberate goal of the policy. Together the packages added more than $1.5 trillion to the deficits over the fiscal years 2008-2011. However, the spending almost certainly boosted the economy; it increased growth and created jobs.⁷ A smaller deficit in these years would have meant slower growth and fewer jobs. In this sense, the deficit is part of the solution, not the problem.

If the deficit were impeding the economy’s recovery, it would be through its effect on the interest rate. This is the story of government borrowing pulling money away from the private sector. However, the interest rate on long-term bonds has remained extraordinarily low throughout this period. At the height of the financial crisis, when investors fled to U.S. bonds as a safe asset in a dangerous world, the interest rate on 10-year Treasury bonds hit a low of 2.2 percent. It has remained under 4.0 percent since then and in the summer of 2011 was back down to about 2.2 percent when the threat of the break-up of the euro again panicked financial markets and has been close to 3.0 percent most of the time.

Assuming a 2.0 percent expected inflation rate puts the real interest rate (the actual interest rate minus the inflation rate) at under 2.0 percent and often under 1.0 percent for these high-deficit years. This is a historically low real interest rate that is not consistent with a story of investors panicking over the ability of the U.S. government to repay its debt. When lenders worry about the solvency of their borrowers, they demand real interest rates of 6, 8, or even 10 percent.

If investors are willing to hold vast amounts of government bonds at very low interest rates, it is clear that the people who actually have money on the line are not worried about the creditworthiness of the U.S. government, even if the politicians and the pundits are telling them that they should be. In short, the deficit is not the country’s problem right now. The problem is a lack of demand, pure and simple. The deficit is hyped as a problem by people who have an alternative agenda of gutting important government social programs, such as Social Security and Medicare.

The cause of the economic crisis: The collapse of the housing bubble

There continues to be enormous confusion about almost every aspect of the economic crisis. The first point that needs to be clarified is that the main story of the economic crisis was not the financial crisis. The picture of banks collapsing and a chain reaction of defaults and bankruptcies made for exciting news stories and provided the basis for several bestselling books, but this panic was secondary to the collapse of the housing bubble. The housing bubble drove demand in the years since the 2001 recession, and when the trillions of dollars of bubble-generated housing equity disappeared, there was nothing to take its place. This is the complete story of the downturn to date.

The story is not complex or mysterious. It is a simple story that should be widely known, at least by economists, if not the general public. The bubble in housing led to near-record rates of residential construction over the years from 2002 to 2006. Builders rushed to build new homes to take advantage of record-high home prices. The boom also generated an enormous amount of employment in the financial industry, which issued mortgages not just for new homes but also to refinance homes people already owned, as tens of millions of homeowners sought to take advantage of the run-up in prices and low interest rates to take equity out of their homes.

This "housing wealth effect" is well-known and is a standard part of economic theory and modeling. Economists expect households to consume based on their wealth. At its peak, the housing bubble generated more than $8 trillion in home equity on top of what would have been generated had home prices continued to rise at their historic pace. Recent estimates of the size of the wealth effect put it at 6 percent, meaning that homeowners will increase their annual consumption by 6 cents for every additional dollar of home equity.⁸ If so, then the equity generated by the housing bubble at its peak in 2006 would have led to almost $500 billion a year in additional consumption.

A bubble in nonresidential real estate led to a building boom in that sector that followed on the heels of the boom in housing; as construction of housing began to trail off at the end of 2005 and into 2006, construction of nonresidential projects like office buildings, retail malls, and hotels exploded. This boom led to enormous overbuilding in the nonresidential sector, and so when the recession kicked in, and especially after the financial crisis in the fall of 2008, nonresidential construction plummeted.

The impact of the collapse of these two bubbles on the demand for goods and services in the economy was enormous, and continues to be felt. The residential housing sector fell from a peak of 6.2 percent of GDP in 2005 to just 2.2 percent in the first quarter of 2011. The loss of $7 trillion in housing equity (the bubble had not yet fully deflated by the spring of 2011, so there was still about $1 trillion to be lost) led to a sharp fall in consumption. As a result of this lost housing wealth, the savings rate rose from near zero in the years 2004-2007 to over 5 percent by the first quarter of 2009.⁹ This corresponds to a loss of more than $500 billion in annual consumption (and reinforces the similar estimate derived from a calculation of the housing wealth effect). It is worth noting that this reduction in spending (and implied increase in savings) has little to do with consumers being pessimistic or wary about the future, though they likely are. Rather, consumers are spending in line with their wealth. Now that their wealth has been hugely reduced by the collapse of the bubble, they have adjusted their spending accordingly.

The overbuilding and collapse of the bubble in nonresidential real estate led to a further loss in annual demand of roughly $250 billion. Adding together the $600 billion in lost residential construction demand (the 4 percentage-point drop in GDP noted above), the $500 billion in lost consumption demand, and the $250 billion in lost demand in nonresidential construction gives a total drop in annual demand of $1.35 trillion.

It didn't end there. State and local governments sought to cut spending and raise taxes when the recession sent their tax collections plummeting. Most state and local governments have balanced-budget requirements, which means that they had no alternative but to raise taxes and cut spending. Their actions had the effect of further reducing demand in the economy by roughly $150 billion a year, bringing the total loss of demand in the economy resulting from the collapse of the housing bubble to $1.5 trillion a year.

President Obama's first stimulus package, created to counteract this lost demand, injected roughly $300 billion a year into the economy in calendar years 2009 and 2010.¹⁰ It should not be surprising, and dozens of policy makers and economists warned of it at the time, that this stimulus was inadequate to bring the economy back to anything resembling normal levels of employment and output. It simply was not large enough.¹¹

The collapse of the real estate bubbles as the cause of our continued economic weakness stands in contrast to the financial crisis stories we keep reading and hearing about in the news. These stories hinge on the idea that the problem in the economy is the improper working of the financial system following the financial crisis of the fall of 2008. This story has an obvious problem: the reason we have a financial system is to allocate capital, and it doesn't seem that anyone is having difficulty getting capital.

Homebuyers who seek mortgages seem to be getting them; we know this because there has been no appreciable increase in the ratio of mortgage applications to home sales. The Mortgage Bankers Association issues an index every week that tracks the number of mortgage applications received by its members.¹² The banks included in this survey account for well over half of the mortgages issued in the country.

If banks were more hesitant to issue mortgages, we would expect to see the ratio of applications to home purchases skyrocket, because many creditworthy customers would have to make multiple applications just to get a single one approved. Some potential homebuyers would make multiple applications and still not be able to get a mortgage. Since there has been no rise in the ratio of applications to sales, we can assume that access to mortgages is not a big problem in the economy. For the most part, creditworthy homebuyers are still able to get mortgages, generally at historically low interest rates.

There undoubtedly are stricter mortgage standards in place than in the housing bubble years, but this should be expected. During those years, banks issued mortgages whether or not they could be repaid because they were selling them immediately in the secondary market. This is not a sustainable model. It was necessary to return to something resembling the lending patterns of the pre-bubble years.

In the case of businesses, a large portion of corporate America has direct access to credit markets. Large companies routinely go around the banking system by selling bonds and commercial paper directly on credit markets. In this way the United States is fundamentally different from Japan, where banks are far more central in providing finance to the business sector. For this reason, the often-used comparison to Japan's lost decade following the collapse of its bubbles is inappropriate. Whatever problems may still persist in the banking sector, they are likely to have little impact on the investment and hiring behavior of large corporations.

Looking at the credit markets directly, the interest rates on corporate bonds have been at historically low levels since early in the crisis. From the summer of 2009 through the summer of 2011, the interest rate on high-grade corporate debt was about 5 percent, and the interest rate on Baa debt (lower quality, but still investment grade) averaged less than 6 percent. If we assume a 2 percent average inflation rate going forward, these translate into real rates of 3 percent and 4 percent, respectively — much lower than at most points in the last two decades. These low rates suggest that large corporations with direct access to credit markets — corporations whose output accounts for close to half of private sector GDP — have had little difficulty obtaining capital. In other words, lack of capital has not been a factor restraining their investment and hiring.

What about small businesses? If large corporations had access to credit markets but smaller businesses were unable to pursue investment opportunities because they could not get bank credit, then we would expect to see large corporations expanding aggressively in order to gain market share at the expense of their credit-constrained smaller competitors. Yet we see nothing of the sort. Almost all of the major chains, such as Wal-Mart and Starbucks — which would be expected to expand rapidly in this situation — have sharply curtailed their expansion plans in the wake of the downturn. And the reason is weak demand, pure and simple, not any major issues with the banking and financial system.

In any case, access to credit also does not seem to be a problem for small businesses either. The National Federation of Independent Business surveys small business owners to ask what their biggest problem is at the moment. Very few answer that it is difficult for them to borrow money. In the August 2011 survey, 92 percent of small business owners said either that they had ample access to capital or that they had no interest in borrowing.¹³ The biggest problem cited by these small business owners was "poor sales" — in other words, inadequate demand.

In addition, business investment in equipment and software has actually held up fairly well in this downturn, suggesting that access to capital is not the problem. Figure 2-5 shows investment in equipment and software as a share of GDP over the last decade. While the levels reached at the end of 2010 and the start of 2011 are still below their pre-recession levels, they are surprisingly high given the large amounts of excess capacity in most sectors of the economy.

We also hear over and over again the claim that uncertainty about tax or regulatory policy is impeding hiring and causing continued economic weakness. If this were true, we would expect to see firms increasing average hours per worker and/or hiring more temporary workers to meet demand. Through these strategies, firms could get more labor without making the commitment to hiring new permanent employees.

Yet there is no evidence of either trend in the economy. While average weekly hours have risen slightly from their low point of the downturn (from 33.7 hours per week in June 2009 to 34.4 in June 2011), the average work week is still below its pre-recession peak of 34.7 hours per week. The uptick in average weekly hours thus far has been fairly typical of what would be expected in a recovery. The same applies to the hiring of temporary employees. Temporary employment fell by more than 30 percent at the start of the downturn, as firms reduced the number of temporary workers by more than 800,000. Less than 500,000 of these workers have been rehired thus far in the upturn, leaving temporary employment almost 13 percent below its pre-recession level.¹⁴

Moreover, if uncertainty about regulations and taxes were a major factor impeding hiring, then its impact should be uneven between sectors with high and low turnover. In sectors with high turnover, like retail and restaurants, it is difficult to see how regulatory uncertainty could be an issue, since firms could quickly get back to their desired employment level through attrition. This would mean that, if the economy were fine and the problem was regulation, we should expect to see high-turnover sectors growing rapidly, while sectors with low turnover, like manufacturing, would have very slow employment growth. There is no evidence of this sort of shift in job gains in the recovery, providing yet another reason for rejecting the argument that uncertainty about the future is a serious factor slowing employment growth.¹⁵

In short, the basic story of the economic downturn approximately four years after the start of the Great Recession is a simple one. The economy suffers from a shortfall in demand. Whatever problems may persist in the financial system are not substantially impeding growth. Larger firms have little difficulty getting access to capital at historically low interest rates. Smaller firms do not identify access to capital as one of their biggest problems. And homebuyers appear undeterred in their attempts to secure mortgages.

Finally, it is worth putting to rest one of the most pervasive myths that came out of the worst days of the financial crisis in late 2008 and early 2009. This myth is that the country was saved from the risk of a second Great Depression only by the quick action of the Fed and the Treasury.

According to the story, the lending approved by Congress in the Troubled Asset Relief Program (TARP) along with special lending facilities created by the Federal Reserve Board prevented a financial collapse that would have precipitated another Great Depression. While these measures deserve credit for preventing a financial collapse, there is no reason to believe that a financial collapse would have led to a second Great Depression, defined as a decade of double-digit unemployment.

The first Great Depression was not just the result of mismanagement of a banking crisis in its early days. The failure of the Fed and the Treasury to take steps to backstop the banking system undoubtedly led to a more severe downturn for the economy and to financial disasters for millions of families who lost their life's savings in failed banks. However, nothing about this initial failure to act decisively doomed the economy to a decade of double-digit unemployment. Rather, the extended depression was the result of persistent policy failures over the course of a decade.

The United States ultimately emerged from the depression as a result of the massive deficit spending associated with World War II. The spending associated with the war can be seen as a beneficial accident from the standpoint of an economy that desperately needed a massive dose of government stimulus. However, nothing in principle would have prevented massive government spending for domestic reconstruction efforts at a much earlier point. In other words, there was no economic reason that the government could not have made the same commitment in terms of spending and hiring for projects to rebuild the country's infrastructure, to build up its housing stock, and to improve education and training that it eventually made to fight World War II. Had it made this commitment in 1931 rather than 1941, the government would have spared the country a decade of depression.

This sort of increase in spending could have pulled the country out the Great Depression at any point after the initial financial crisis. The obstacles to going this route were political, not economic. The same would have been the case had the financial crisis in 2008 actually led to the collapse of the financial system and the need to pick up the pieces from scratch. Today, having learned the lessons from World War II, we know how to re-inflate the economy. While a full-scale financial collapse — with the destruction of tens of trillions of dollars of wealth overnight — would be devastating to the economy and the people who suffer the losses, it would take a decade of failed policy in addition to this collapse to give us a second Great Depression. There is no reason to believe that the country would have repeated the policy mistakes of the thirties even if the Fed and the Treasury had failed to check the financial panic at the start of the crisis.

This point is relevant in terms of how we view the conduct of the Bush and Obama administrations and the Fed under Chairman Ben Bernanke. If it is really the case that a second Great Depression was only narrowly averted, then we all should be grateful, even if the cost was to largely leave the financial system in place, with the too-big-to-fail banks even bigger than they were before the crisis. After all, giving taxpayer money to the top management and shareholders of Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, and Morgan Stanley is a price worth paying if it was necessary to prevent a second Great Depression.¹⁶ However, such handouts may look different if even the worst-case scenario did not look anything like the Great Depression.

We have high unemployment because we lack the political will to get the economy moving again.

We know how to get out of this trough: we need to spend much more money. However, the current political situation precludes this option. Politicians and the national media have become fixated on reducing the budget deficit and have largely decided to ignore the problem of unemployment and underemployment.

In the current political environment it is somehow responsible to push spending cuts, even though the main impact of these cuts is to slow the economy and raise the unemployment rate further. But logic has little place right now in national policy debates, just as arithmetic played little role in economic policy in the buildup of the housing bubble.

Deficit reduction has become an end in itself. In this scenario, "serious people" propose large spending cuts, but only "crazy ideologues" talk about measures that would boost economic growth and reduce unemployment.

Chapter 3—The Great Redistribution

The U.S. economy has been driven by asset bubbles since the mid-1990s, but this is not the ordinary source of our economic growth. In the three decades following World War II, the economy had strong growth driven by wage-led consumption. Throughout this period, productivity growth translated into wage growth at all points along the income ladder. Those at the bottom saw their wages and income rise as fast, or faster, than those at the top. This created self-sustaining growth, since most workers spent most of their income and ensured that demand kept pace with productivity growth. Firms would then invest in new plant and equipment, which would lead to further increases in productivity, and in turn to additional wage growth.

Apart from some brief recessions, this cycle continued until it was derailed by the oil price shocks of the 1970s. The price of oil more than tripled between 1972 and 1975, shaking an economy that was already facing high inflation. Then, during the Iranian revolution at the end of the decade, oil prices rose by more than 150 percent.¹⁷ Both shocks coincided with, and possibly caused, a sharp slowdown in productivity growth that, combined with high inflation, brought an end to the period of broadly shared growth of the prior three decades.

When President Reagan took office in 1981, he had an explicit policy of putting the country on a different sort of growth path, and he largely succeeded. While President Reagan's tax cuts — which disproportionately benefited higher-income taxpayers — are widely remembered, they are the less important part of the story. The upward redistribution of before-tax income in the years since 1980 has had far more impact on inequality and the living standards of the bulk of the population than the changes toward a more regressive system of taxation.

Making money flow upward

This upward redistribution was not the result of the natural workings of the market. President Reagan and his successors put in place a variety of measures that had the effect of weakening the bargaining power of ordinary workers. Together these measures had the effect of driving down the wages of those at the middle and the bottom of the income distribution, to the benefit of those at the top.

Heading this list of policy changes was the tighter monetary policy pursued by the Federal Reserve Board in the years after 1980. Fighting inflation became the Fed's overwhelming concern, and it was willing to tolerate high unemployment rates to reduce inflation to levels it considered acceptable. This was clearly demonstrated by Paul Volcker in 1982 when he pushed the unemployment rate to almost 11 percent in order to rein in inflation. His successor, Alan Greenspan, was similarly committed to low inflation. The modest acceleration in the inflation rate at the end of the 1980s was sufficient to prompt a round of interest rate hikes that eventually led to the 1990-1991 recession. The current Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke, has committed the Fed to a 2.0 percent inflation ceiling, implying that he would raise interest rates and push up unemployment if he believed that core inflation might exceed this level.

This focus on inflation represents a sharp shift from the Fed's policy in prior decades. While the Fed was always concerned about inflation and had brought on recessions in the past as part of its effort to control it, Volcker began a new era in which fighting inflation became a much greater priority than sustaining high employment, the other half of the Fed's mandate.

The policy of raising unemployment to fight inflation has the effect of redistributing income upward because it is overwhelmingly less-educated workers who lose their jobs when the unemployment rate rises. The unemployment rate for all categories of workers rises during a recession, but the largest increases will be for workers with less education. The percentage of factory workers and retail clerks who lose their job in a downturn is far higher than the percentage of doctors and lawyers. As a result, the workers who end up taking the biggest pay cuts in a downturn are those without college degrees and especially those without high school degrees.¹⁸

High unemployment is a class-biased mechanism for fighting inflation. In effect it forces the less-advantaged groups in society to sacrifice to ensure that the more-advantaged can enjoy price stability — and a ready supply of low-cost labor to provide household help or serve them in hotels and restaurants.

Weakening unions

As another element of this process of upward redistribution, President Reagan took a number of steps to weaken the power of unions. Foremost was weakening the enforcement of labor laws that protect workers' right to organize. While labor laws that protect management are still vigorously enforced (a union engaged in a secondary strike¹⁹ can expect to have its officers jailed and its bank accounts seized), the enforcement of rules protecting the right to organize has become a joke. Employers routinely fire workers for organizing²⁰ and they know that they are unlikely to lose a case at the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) or that in any case penalties will be inconsequential.

The Reagan administration not only placed more management-friendly officials in the NLRB, it also deliberately underfunded the board, allowing an enormous backlog of complaints to build. At its worst, the backlog was more than two years, meaning that employees fired during an organizing drive might have to wait more than two years before they could have a hearing. In this case, even if the NLRB ruled for the workers and gave them their jobs back, any organizing drive in which they had participated would almost certainly be long over.

The strike as a weapon to protect workers' rights has become less effective because employers now routinely hire replacement workers. This became a common practice in the private sector after President Reagan fired the air traffic controllers who went on strike in the summer of 1981. While the strike was illegal and Reagan had the authority to fire and replace striking workers, until then the usual practice at all levels of government had been to try to reach an accommodation with striking workers.

Major firms in the private sector — notably Eastern Airlines and Greyhound — quickly emulated Reagan's hard-line stance. In the wake of the controllers' strike, hiring replacements became a standard response to strikes and seriously reduced the value of strikes as a union weapon. The fact that there are large numbers of potential replacement workers readily available for hire is the result of both the sharp decline in unionization rates over the last three decades and also the difficulty that most workers have in finding decent-paying jobs.

Deregulation of major sectors like airlines, trucking, and telecommunications was another route to weaken labor unions. Together the transportation and utility sectors employed more than 6.4 million workers in 1979, 8.6 percent of the private-sector workforce.²¹ Prior to deregulation (which began in the Carter administration), these sectors were heavily unionized, with workers sharing in the gains from the protection that regulation afforded. Deregulation both opened these sectors to non-union competitors and also put serious pressure on the wages of workers in the unionized firms that survived. While there were clear benefits to deregulation in these industries, one of the major outcomes was a sharp reduction in the size of the unionized workforce.

Together these policies had the effect of sending the unionization rate in the private sector plummeting. It had been close to 20 percent in 1980 when Reagan took office, but it was down to 12 percent by 1990, had fallen to 9 percent in 2000, and was below 7 percent in 2010.²² This drop in the unionization rate not only weakened the bargaining power of non-college-educated workers, but it also substantially reduced their political power.²³ In political campaigns, unions had been an effective counterweight to corporate interests and the interests of the wealthy more generally. As their membership has declined over the last three decades, they have become less able to play this role.

The high-dollar policy

The high dollar, coupled with U.S. trade policies of the last three decades, is also an important tool for redistributing income upward. A conscious goal of trade agreements like the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) is to make it as easy as possible for U.S. manufacturers to relocate their operations to Mexico and other developing countries. This has the effect of putting U.S. manufacturing workers in direct competition with low-paid workers in the developing world. The predicted and actual result of this policy is to eliminate jobs in manufacturing in the U.S. and to put downward pressure on the wages of the workers still employed in the sector.

It is important to realize that these deals have nothing to do with free trade, even though all the pacts are called free trade agreements to make them sound more appealing to the general public, or at least to the pundits who like to think of themselves as supporters of free trade. These agreements do little to undermine the legal and professional barriers that protect highly educated professionals from competing with their lower-paid counterparts in the developing world.

Just as trade models show that U.S. consumers can benefit from having work performed by low-paid manufacturing workers in the developing world, the same models show that U.S. consumers can benefit from having access to low-paid professionals from the developing world. The developing world has an enormous pool of highly educated workers, some of whom are already trained to U.S. standards, and many more of whom could and would be trained to U.S. standards, if there were a reason. Because these workers live in countries that are much poorer than the United States, they would be willing to work for wages that are far lower than their professional counterparts here, just as in the case of manufacturing workers in the developing world.

However, free-trade agreements are not designed to free trade in professional services. In drafting NAFTA, U.S. trade negotiators eagerly sought out the opinion of manufacturers, asking them to identify obstacles that prevented them from relocating operations to Mexico and other developing countries, but there was no comparable outreach to hospital administrators or law firms to determine the barriers that prevented them from hiring low-paid (but highly qualified) doctors and lawyers from India or Mexico. This apparent discrepancy was again the result of a conscious decision to design policy in a way that redistributes income upward.

The impact of current trade policy is amplified by the overvaluation of the dollar. A higher-valued dollar makes U.S. exports more expensive to the rest of world and makes imports from abroad cheaper for people living in the United States. These price differences increase the downward pressure on the wages for workers in sectors subject to international competition while actually benefiting those who are protected, since the latter will be able to buy imported goods more cheaply. Over most of the period since 1980 the United States has had an overvalued dollar, often quite deliberately, further contributing to the downward pressure on the wages of less-educated workers.

Many large manufacturers were pushed to the edge of bankruptcy or beyond in the mid-1980s, the first period of major dollar overvaluation. Millions of manufacturing jobs disappeared in the late 1990s and 2000s, even before the recession, as a result of a second surge in the value of the dollar starting in 1997. This has all had the effect of weakening unions — once heavily concentrated in manufacturing — and putting downward pressure on wages in major sectors such as the auto and steel industry.

Corporate governance

The rules on corporate governance also play an important role in the upward redistribution of income. As the practice stands now, the top management of major corporations is in a position to pick the board of directors, who then decide the salaries of top management. To ensure that directors will be loyal, they are offered annual compensation in the hundreds of thousands of dollars to attend four to eight meetings a year. Few directors will jeopardize such a plush deal by making an issue out of management pay. Of course, likely troublemakers are unlikely to be picked for a board in the first place.

The result is that top corporate management in the United States has come to be paid far more than its counterparts in Europe and Asia, primarily over the last three decades. Essentially, the structures (either dominant shareholders or social norms) that had previously placed a check on the pay of top management broke down. With no policy response to create new checks on management pay, top managers have been freed to write their own paychecks at the expense of the employees, shareholders and other corporate stakeholders.

Patent monopolies

Finally, the number of patents has exploded in the last three decades, as patent protection has become both easier to obtain and stronger. Patent monopolies allow firms to charge far more than the competitive market price for their products. This price advantage can be seen most clearly in the case of prescription drugs. In 2010, spending on prescription drugs amounted to almost 2 percent of GDP, compared to less than half a percent in 1980. The higher expenditures are almost entirely a function of patent protection. Then, as now, drugs are cheap to produce, and it is only patent monopolies that make them expensive to buy.

The main beneficiaries of patent protection are invariably more highly educated workers. A recent study of wealthy countries by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) found that the number of patents per capita was the most important factor determining the extent to which income was redistributed upward from those at the middle and bottom to those at the top over the last three decades.²⁴

Wage-led versus bubble-driven consumption

The upward redistribution of income since the early 1980s laid the basis for the bubble economy. This can be seen by looking at two important implications for the larger economy which had resulted from the broad sharing of the benefits of productivity growth in the three decades after World War II. First, since most workers could be counted on to spend most of their income, the pattern of distribution ensured that demand would keep pace with productivity growth. The income generated by productivity growth was spent rather than saved. When ordinary workers stopped sharing in the gains of productivity growth, inadequate demand became a problem.

The second implication was that rising wages could lead to inflationary pressures. If wages generally rise in step with productivity growth, there is always a risk that wages will occasionally outstrip it. For example, if a contract provides for real wage increases of 2 percent, but productivity growth is only 1 percent, firms will either see a reduction in profit margins or be forced to raise their prices by more than the overall inflation rate. This response can lead to the sort of wage-price spiral the country experienced in the 1970s, when productivity growth lagged real wage growth for a short period.

However, in a climate where workers have considerably little bargaining power, a wage-price spiral is a less serious threat. This diminished risk was the reason Alan Greenspan felt so comfortable in the 1990s with allowing interest rates to remain low and for the unemployment rate to fall to levels unseen since the 1960s. With the weak bargaining position of workers in the 1990s, inflation simply was not a problem, and Greenspan was an astute enough observer of the economy (unlike most academic economists) to recognize this fact.

Low interest rates have a positive but limited impact in increasing demand. They do lead to somewhat higher investment, but a large body of research shows that investment is not very responsive to lower interest rates. Low interest rates can lead to a fall in the dollar, which would boost net exports, but there were other factors keeping the dollar high during this period. In fact, the main effect of the low interest rates sustained through the late 1990s and the 2000s was to create the possibility for the bubble economy, the dynamics of which are explored in the next chapter.

Chapter 4—The Bubble Economy

There is a frequently told tale in Washington of the 1990s prosperity, and Bill Clinton is its hero. In this story, President Clinton performed the hard work of bringing down the deficit and balancing the budget. He raised taxes and contained spending, but the pain was rewarded by low interest rates and a growth boom that delivered the lowest unemployment rates in more than three decades. It's a great morality tale, but it has little to do with the actual economic history of the decade.

During the first half of the Clinton era, the economy experienced very modest growth. Workers saw little benefit because wages were essentially stagnant. Then, in the late 1990s, a stock bubble emerged, and growth took off and real wages started to rise. This extraordinary period of bubble-driven growth was the main factor in flipping the government's budget from deficits to surpluses.

The Congressional Budget Office's (CBO) projections from May 1996 (after all the tax increases and spending cuts had been put into law) showed the government running a deficit of 2.7 percent of GDP in 2000. Instead, that year saw a surplus equal to 2.1 percent of GDP, which translated into a shift from deficit to surplus of more than 5 percentage points of GDP (about $750 billion in 2011 dollars). Not one dollar of this shift was attributable to fiscal restraint. According to CBO, the net effect of legislated changes over this period was to increase the fiscal year 2000 deficit by $10 billion. Rather than higher taxes or spending cuts, the entire cause of the shift from deficit to surplus was better-than-expected growth and lower-than-expected unemployment. In its 1996 projections, CBO assumed that the unemployment rate would be 6.0 percent in 2000, which was its estimate of the non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment (NAIRU) at the time. It was only because the stock bubble drove demand much faster than expected, and Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan allowed the unemployment rate to fall below the generally accepted estimates of the NAIRU, that the deficit turned into a surplus.

There is another important chapter of the Clinton morality tale that turns out to be more fiction than fact. Nominal interest rates indeed fell, but the decline in the real interest rate from the high-deficit years of the 1980s was quite modest. And the small decline had little effect on investment. The investment share of GDP at its peak in the 1990s cycle (which was in 2000) was somewhat higher than it had been in the 1980s but was still below its 1970s' peak.²⁵ Furthermore, the uptick in productivity growth in the 1990s, which many associate with an "investment boom," began before investment had recovered even to the 1980s level.

In short, the good economic news in the 1990s had little to do with the deficit reduction measures of the Clinton administration. The fuel for the business cycle was consumption, not investment, which was in turn the result of the wealth effect attributable to $10 trillion of stock bubble wealth. This ephemeral wealth increased annual consumption by $300-400 billion a year, or 3 to 4 percent of GDP. The household savings rate fell to what were at the time record lows. Net national savings actually hit their lowest levels of the postwar period, in spite of the large budget surpluses at the end of the decade. In fact, the switch from federal deficits to surpluses was more than offset by a reduction in private-sector savings. By the end of the decade, the country was engaged in large-scale borrowing from abroad, even as it was running huge budget surpluses.

The overvalued dollar of the Clinton era

If the story of the virtues of President Clinton's fiscal austerity is often oversold, the story of his overvaluation of the dollar is rarely told at all. A major part of the standard story of deficit reduction is supposed to be a decline in the value of the dollar. The lower interest rates that result from reduced government borrowing are supposed to make it less attractive for foreign investors to hold dollar-denominated assets, like government bonds and the bonds of private corporations. If foreign investors buy fewer dollar assets, then the value of the dollar should fall relative to the value of other currencies.

This is a good outcome in the context of deficit reduction because a lower-valued dollar makes our exports cheaper for people living in other countries, and so they buy more of them. A lower-valued dollar will also make imports more expensive for people living in the United States, leading us to buy fewer imports and more domestically produced goods. The result is that we export more and import less, thereby reducing the trade deficit and possibly even turning it into a surplus.

In the first half of the Clinton administration, to some extent, this process played out as the textbook would dictate, but the tables turned when Robert Rubin became Treasury Secretary in January 1995. Rubin was openly committed to a strong dollar. When he first took office this may have just been words, but in 1997, during the East Asian financial crisis, he had the opportunity to put some serious muscle behind them.

The United States used its de-facto control of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to impose harsh conditions on the crisis countries. The IMF effectively acted as an enforcement agent for the banks that had made loans to the companies and countries in the region. To repay these loans, the countries had to run massive trade surpluses, which required a sharp decline in the value of their currencies against the dollar in order to make their exports hypercompetitive and to discourage imports.

The impact of the IMF's policies extended well beyond the countries directly affected by the crisis. Other developing countries took their cue from the experience of East Asia and realized that they did not want to be in a similar situation where they might be forced to turn to the IMF for assistance. Protecting themselves meant accumulating huge amounts of currency reserves as an insurance policy. And the way to accumulate reserves is to run large trade surpluses. This in turn means lowering the value of your currency relative to the dollar.

These moves gave Robert Rubin the strong dollar he wanted. A strong dollar helped to keep inflation low by keeping import prices down. It also meant running a huge trade deficit, an inevitable result of an overvalued dollar. At the end of the Clinton boom, the U.S. economy was fueled by an unsustainable stock bubble and was running an unsustainable trade deficit. Neither was good long-term policy, but together they created several years of prosperity in which unemployment fell to lower levels than most economists thought possible, and most workers experienced healthy wage growth.

The end of the stock bubble and the 2001 recession

Bubbles inevitably burst, and the stock bubble in the United States did so in dramatic fashion beginning in 2000. The tech sector was the leading edge of the bubble; it had seen the biggest run-up and eventually endured the deepest plunge.²⁶ The NASDAQ, which is dominated by relatively new firms in the tech sector, rose from 925 at the end of 1995 to 3740 at the end of 1999. After peaking at 5148 in March 2000, it fell below 4000 by the summer. It had some further ups and downs, but it eventually bottomed out at just over 1100 in September 2002, losing more than 75 percent of its value.

The stock market plunge affected the economy in two ways. First, the bubble years were extraordinary in that they were a period in which firms sold stock on a large scale to finance new investment. (More typically new firms sell off stock to allow entrepreneurs to cash out some of their profits, whereas older firms sell off stock to pay down debt.) However, the plunge in the market ended this channel of investment finance. Investment fell by 14.2 percent between the fourth quarter of 2000 and its bottom in the first quarter of 2003.

The more important channel through which the plunge in the market affected the economy was through its impact on consumption. The savings rate had fallen to 2.9 percent at the peak of the bubble in 2000. The destruction of $10 trillion in paper wealth would theoretically lead to a reduction in annual consumption of $300-400 billion, as mentioned above. Consumption did in fact fall sharply in response to the drop in the stock market. The adjusted savings rate rose by roughly 3 percentage points between 2000 and 2002, corresponding to a drop in annual consumption of more than $250 billion.²⁷

The result of the drop in investment and the fall in consumption due to the wealth effect was the 2001 recession. Officially and by most accounts this recession was short and mild; it is dated as running from March to December 2001, almost as short as a recession can possibly be. However, the economy had considerable difficulty recovering from it. Job losses continued through 2002, and the economy didn't start creating jobs again until September 2003. It was not until February 2005 that the economy finally regained all the jobs it lost during the recession. Until the current downturn, this was the longest stretch that the United States had gone without creating jobs since the Great Depression.

The recovery was slow and weak because the 2001 downturn was not like prior postwar recessions. The Federal Reserve Board had engineered the previous recessions by raising interest rates to combat inflation. The intention of higher rates was to slow the economy through reduced demand for interest-sensitive items, like houses and cars. When demand fell, growth would slow, leading to fewer jobs. Fewer jobs translate into a higher unemployment rate, which in turns puts downward pressure on wages, thereby alleviating the threat of inflation. This is the standard Fed formula.

When the Fed determines that the threat of inflation has been eliminated, it lowers rates again. Since the recession period of high interest rates creates pent-up demand for housing and cars, the lowering of interest rates usually triggers a flurry of home buying and new construction as well as a surge of car sales.

However, this was not the story in the 2001 recession. The recession was the result not of the Fed raising interest rates but of the collapse of the stock bubble. Thus, there was no pent-up demand to be triggered by a decline in interest rates. The Fed did push the overnight federal funds rate down to 1.0 percent, the lowest level since the early 1950s, but the response was limited.

It is worth emphasizing how constrained the Fed was at this time. It had not pushed the federal funds rate below 3.0 percent since the early 1960s, so the 1.0 percent rate was truly extraordinary. For practical purposes, the federal funds rate was pretty much at its lower bound, since the marginal impact of going all the way down to zero from 1.0 percent is likely to be minimal. The European Central Bank has never lowered its overnight rate below 1.0 percent in the post-2007 downturn even though it engaged in quantitative easing and other extraordinary measures to boost the economy.

The Fed's response to the 2001 downturn belies the notion that the recession was short and mild. Though that may have been the case officially, and the unemployment rate did not rise strongly, the consequences for the economy and especially the labor market were severe.

One aspect of the weak recovery is the pattern followed by the trade deficit. Usually the trade deficit shrinks in a downturn, as the country buys fewer imports along with less of everything else. The trade deficit declined modestly in 2001, but it began to rise rapidly in 2002 and continued to rise until 2006. This outcome was more fallout from the overvalued dollar.

The turnaround that eventually allowed the economy to grow fast enough to create jobs was primarily due to the growth of the housing bubble. Like the alcoholic who recovers from the effects of a hangover by drinking again in the morning, the economy used the growth generated by the housing bubble to recover from the collapse of the stock bubble.

By 2002 it was already possible to recognize that the housing market was in a bubble.²⁸ In the years since 1996, home prices had risen by more than 30 percent after adjusting for inflation. This rise followed a 100-year trend in which nationwide home prices had just tracked the overall rate of inflation.²⁹ The U.S. housing market was valued at more than $14 trillion in 2002, making it the largest market in the world. When there is a longstanding trend in an enormous market, it is reasonable to expect it to persist unless some large change in the fundamentals justifies a departure from the trend.

A quick examination of the fundamentals showed there to be no plausible explanation for the sharp run-up in prices. On the demand side, neither population growth nor income growth provided helpful explanations. Population growth had actually slowed considerably from prior periods. It might have been reasonable to expect some pressure on home prices when the huge baby boom cohort was first forming its own households, but this would have occurred in the 1970s and 1980s, not 2002, when the youngest baby boomer was already 38 and the oldest was 54.

The story on the income side was no better. The country had experienced healthy income growth in the late 1990s, but it was not extraordinary — no better than the average income growth the country had experienced over the long boom from 1947 to 1973. Home prices had already increased in real terms over that period, and so there is no reason to expect that four years of good growth in the late 1990s would lead to a 30 percent rise in home prices. Furthermore, the recession in 2001 brought this income growth to an end, with real incomes flat or declining subsequently, yet home prices continued to rise.

The supply side also offered no plausible explanations. In testimony before Congress in 2002, the Federal Reserve Board chairman commented on the run-up in home prices and mentioned the limited supply of available land and environmental restrictions on building.³⁰ Neither of these seemed plausible as explanations for an increase in home prices beginning in the mid-1990s. There had always been a limited supply of land in especially attractive places to live; this was not a new feature of the housing bubble. As far as environmental restrictions on building, Republicans had taken over Congress in 1994 (and many state houses as well), so the late 1990s could hardly be viewed as the heyday of environmental legislation. Furthermore, it was only necessary to look at the data on construction, which showed housing starts at a near-record rate. While there may have been obstacles to building, they were not impeding supply in any important way.

Lacking any explanation for the price run-up on either the supply or demand side of the market, it was also possible to turn to rents for evidence that fundamentals were not responsible for the rise in home prices. If the rise were being driven by the fundamentals of the housing market, there should be a comparable increase in rents, since owning and renting are loose substitutes. If the fundamentals of the housing market were driving up sales prices, then they should also be driving up rents. But rents showed no remotely comparable rise. They did outpace the overall inflation rate by about 1 percentage point annually from 1996 to 2000, but from that point forward they were flat in real terms until the bubble finally burst. This should have been a big warning sign that the run-up in prices was driven by a bubble.³¹ One other item that economists could have checked to determine whether home prices were driven by fundamentals was the vacancy rate. The Census Bureau publishes data on vacancy rates every quarter,³² and these data are a very basic measure of the slack in the housing market. If the run-up in home prices had been due to a shortage of housing, then vacancy rates ought to have been at very low levels. In fact, the opposite was true: the vacancy rate had already hit a record high by 2002 (and it continued to rise through the later bubble years).

The fact that the big increase in vacancies was in rental units, not ownership units, still reflected an excess supply of housing that could be expected to exert downward pressure on rents, which would in turn also put downward pressure on sale prices as people opted to take advantage of cheap rents rather than buying. In addition, if rents are falling while sale prices are rising, landlords will convert rental units into ownership units. This can be costly in some cases (many cities have laws protecting renters from being displaced), but if the gains are large enough, landlords can and do find ways to make these conversions. Furthermore, almost a third of rental units are single-family homes that require little work to convert to ownership units.

In sum, by 2002 the housing market was experiencing a bubble that should have been apparent to policy makers. Instead, all the people in top policy-making positions ignored the evidence and insisted that everything was fine with the housing market and the economy.

The second phase of the housing bubble: 2002-2006

The housing bubble was already visible and large enough in 2002 that its collapse likely would have led to a recession in that year. However, rather than take any steps to rein in the bubble, the Federal Reserve Board and others in policy-making positions almost cheered it on.³³ Greenspan applauded subprime mortgages as a financial innovation that allowed moderate-income families who could not otherwise afford a home to buy one.³⁴ In early 2004, he even suggested that people could save money by taking out adjustable rate mortgages, in spite of the fact that the interest rate on 30-year fixed-rate mortgages was near a 50-year low.³⁵

As tends to be the case in the later phases of bubbles, all the excesses of the early stages became ever more exaggerated. Weak lending standards became weaker. In its 2005 survey of homebuyers, the National Association of Realtors found that 43 percent of first-time homebuyers had made down payments of zero or less.³⁶ Banks were happy to make loans that were highly risky because they knew they could quickly sell them in the secondary market. In fact, many of the most aggressive subprime initiators, like Countrywide and Ameriquest, frequently filed inaccurate information for borrowers to allow them to get loans for which they were not qualified. Since they could sell these loans in the secondary market, they had little concern about the default risk.³⁷ The secondary market for subprime issuers was the major investment banks, which were eager to buy up as many mortgages as possible and resell them as mortgage-backed securities. These securities, as well as derivative instruments based on them, like collateralized debt obligations, could then be sold all over the world.

The investment banks cared little about the quality of the mortgages they stuffed into these securities, since they knew they could get an investment-grade rating on almost anything they put together. (The bond rating agencies are paid by the issuers, so the agencies had a major financial stake in keeping Goldman Sachs, Citigroup, and other major investment banks happy.) In this context, questionable mortgages and even outright fraud provided little reason for concern.

The federally chartered Federal National Mortgage Association and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation (Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac), identified as the main culprits in the housing debacle by many on the right, clearly contributed to the bubble by happily supplying mortgage credit throughout the run-up. Housing is their business, and they should have been able to recognize that prices had grown out of line with the fundamentals of the housing market. An explicit restriction on lending by one or both of these giants — for example, by basing loans on price-to-rent ratios instead of just appraised sale prices — likely would have been sufficient to deflate the bubble, especially if the agencies had aggressively argued their case in public. However, they followed along with everyone else.

But Fannie and Freddie were followers, not leaders. They were not the buyers of the worst subprime loans. This role fell to the major investment banks, which eagerly seized on a market that Fannie and Freddie had shunned. As a result, Fannie and Freddie's share of the secondary market plummeted in the years 2002-2005. They entered the subprime market in 2005, but did so to retake market share. As Moody's commented in a section labeled "Upcoming Challenges" in its 2006 assessment of Freddie:

Freddie Mac has long played a central role (shared with Fannie Mae) in the secondary mortgage market. In recent years, both housing GSEs [government sponsored enterprises] have been losing share within the overall market due to the shifting nature of consumer preferences towards adjustable-rate loans and other hybrid products. For the first half of 2006, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac captured about 44 percent of total origination volume — up from a 41 percent share in 2005, but down from a 59 percent share in 2003. Moody's would be concerned if Freddie Mac's market share (i.e., mortgage portfolio plus securities as a percentage of conforming and non-conforming origination), which ranged between 18 and 23 percent between 1999 and the first half of 2006, declined below 15 percent. To buttress its market share, Freddie Mac has increased its purchases of private label securities. Moody's notes that these purchases contribute to profitability, affordable housing goals, and market share in the short-term, but offer minimal benefit from a franchise building perspective.³⁸

In other words, Fannie and Freddie followed the investment banks into the subprime market, rather than led the way. And their reason for getting in was first and foremost the desire to maintain market share and increase profits, just like any other private business. The potential for extending homeownership to more moderate-income families was an afterthought added for public relations.

Remarkably, as the housing bubble was growing ever larger and the quality of mortgages continued to deteriorate, the government responded by loosening regulation. There had been several important moves toward deregulation in the Clinton years, most importantly the repeal of the Glass-Steagall Act, which allowed for the merger of investment banks and commercial banks, and the Commodities Futures Modernization Act, which restricted the regulation of derivatives. In the same vein, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) in 2004 changed its rules on valuing assets (its “net capital rule”) by allowing investment banks to value assets using their own modeling methods rather than standardized procedures. This change meant that these banks could conceal bad assets from scrutiny by regulators, as it appears Lehman was doing on a large scale at the time it went bankrupt.

It is not clear how much of a role the SEC’s rule change played in the process, but the investment banks did become much more highly leveraged following it. They went from leverage ratios of less than 12-to-1 prior to the change to as high as 40-to-1 in the case of Bear Stearns at the time of its collapse.

2006: The end of the housing bubble and the beginning of the collapse

Home prices peaked in the summer of 2006 and began to edge downward in the second half of the year. One widely used measure of home prices, the Case-Shiller 20 City index, was down by 3.5 percent from its summer peak by the end of 2006. It was inevitable that this decline would pick up steam. Once homebuyers no longer anticipated that prices would automatically rise every month, they became more cautious about buying.

The price declines created problems for lenders as well. As long as home prices keep rising, every loan is a good loan. If borrowers get in trouble they can always refinance based on the higher value of the home. Even if the borrower defaults, the bank gets possession of a property that is likely to be of greater value than the mortgage. All this changes once prices start falling. The subprime market began to freeze up in the second half of 2006, and by early 2007 it had become clear that there were major problems in the subprime market. It was in March 2007 that Fed Chairman Bernanke issued his famous comment that he expected the problems in the housing market to be contained to the subprime sector.³⁹

The price decline accelerated over the course of 2007, with prices dropping by 2 percent in the first six months of the year and another 7 percent in the second half. By December 2007, when the recession officially began, prices had fallen by almost 11 percent from the peak of the bubble, implying a loss of more than $2.2 trillion in housing equity. With prices falling at the rate of 2 percent a month and the economy already shedding jobs due to the falloff in construction and weakening consumption as a result of lost wealth, it was inevitable that the bubble would continue to deflate.

At the point when the financial markets began to seize up in September 2008, home prices had fallen by almost 25 percent from their bubble peaks, corresponding to a loss of more than $5 trillion in housing wealth. Given the extent of their losses and their extreme leverage, it was inevitable that major actors in the financial industry, including Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, would take serious hits. The investment banks should not have been surprised since they had large amounts of mortgages, mortgage-backed securities, and derivative instruments that they had been unable to offload before the collapse of the market.

The financial crisis in the fall of 2008 undoubtedly sped up the pace of the downturn, and the economy went into a free fall until the spring of the next year. However, the economy’s main problems — massive overbuilding in both the residential and nonresidential sectors, coupled with the prospect of losing $8 trillion in housing bubble wealth — were not the result of the financial crisis. These problems had pushed the economy into recession long before the financial crisis. It might have taken longer for their full effect to have been felt absent the crisis, but it is difficult to see any sector of the economy that would be stronger in the summer of 2011 than it is now had the financial crisis been averted. In short, this recession is the story of a collapsed housing bubble, not a financial crisis.

Chapter 5—Fulcrums of Power I: The Fed and Interest Rates

The two most important levers of economic policy are the Federal Reserve Board, through its control of interest rates, and the Treasury, through its ability to influence the value of the dollar in international currency markets. Both policies are far removed from democratic control by explicit design, so it is difficult for even a well-informed public to alter them. However, it is essential that people at least understand how these levers are controlled so that they understand the ways in which government policy determines economic outcomes. We’ll save the Treasury for Chapter 7 and focus on the Fed first.

The Fed’s control of interest rates cannot always lift the economy quickly back toward full employment, since interest rates take a long time to affect the economy. And in an economy in which consumers are already heavily indebted and in no position to borrow more, as is the case in the United States in 2011, the Fed finds its traditional tools to be of relatively limited value.

But the Fed is not so hobbled when it wants to move the economy in the opposite direction. If it raises interest rates enough in response to real or imagined inflation, it will slow growth and reduce employment. Furthermore, if it has an unemployment target that it does not want to see breached — for example, a 6.0 percent estimate of the non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment (NAIRU) — the Fed can raise interest rates enough to ensure that the unemployment rate does not fall below this level.

Who rules the Fed?

The Federal Reserve Board is further removed from democratic control than any other institution of the federal government, with the possible exception of the Supreme Court. Nothing symbolizes this lack of accountability better than the Fed's budget. In contrast to the Supreme Court, which must have its budget approved by Congress, the Fed draws up its own budget. The budget outlines the major streams of income flows (e.g., interest on holdings of government debt, fees from check clearing and foreign exchange clearing) and the major categories of spending. It simply sends over a copy of this budget to inform Congress, not to get congressional approval.

Under the law, the Fed is a mixed public-private entity. The public portion of the Fed, the board of governors, is located in Washington. The seven members of the board are appointed to 14-year terms by the president and approved by Congress. The length of the term is intended to give the governors considerable independence from the president who appointed them and the particular Congress that approved them. (As a practical matter, most governors do not serve full 14-year terms, and the average period of appointment is considerably shorter.) The chair of the board of governors is appointed to a 4-year term, although he or she can serve as a governor for 14 years. (By custom, chairs have resigned from the board at the end of their term as chair.)

The 12 district banks are the private portion of the Fed. Each of these banks is formally controlled by a nine-person board of directors. There are three categories of directors. The three Class A directors are selected by the banks in the district and are supposed to represent the interest of the banking industry. The three Class B directors are also selected by the banks in the district, but are supposed to represent other portions of the business community. The three Class C directors are selected by the board of governors in Washington and are supposed to represent broader segments of the community. Historically, Class C directors have included individuals associated with labor unions, consumer and community groups, and nonprofits, as well members of the business community.

This process for selecting directors basically puts the banks in control of the district Federal Reserve Banks. They appoint the Class A directors, who are by far the most important directors under the law. Furthermore, by virtue of their knowledge of banking, these directors are likely to be far more effective in influencing decisions than the Class B or Class C directors, who often have little background in finance or economics. While they may occasionally be able to raise a point for consideration by the board, it is highly unlikely that the Class B or Class C directors would be able to push an agenda item over the united opposition of the bank-appointed Class A directors.

Each district bank board picks a president. In addition to overseeing the operations of the district bank, the bank president also sits on the Federal Reserve Board's Open Market Committee (FOMC), which is the Fed's main decision-making body. The FOMC votes every six weeks on interest rate policy and monetary policy more generally. All seven governors are voting members of this committee, as is the president of the New York District Federal Reserve Bank, by far the most important district bank because its venue includes Wall Street. The other 11 bank presidents rotate into 4 remaining voting slots. This means that at any point in time, 5 of the 12 voting members of the FOMC will be individuals who were essentially selected by the banks. In addition, the seven other district bank presidents, who were also effectively appointed by the banks, take part in the policy discussion.

This formal structure creates a strong bias toward the interests of the banks in setting monetary policy, but the informal mechanisms pushing in this direction may be even stronger. The Fed was originally established in 1913 to provide a government backup for the banks. The immediate impetus was the financial crisis of 1907, in which the banker J.P. Morgan acted as a backstop to the financial system and helped to prevent a complete collapse. The country's leading bankers, recognizing the need to institutionalize the role played by Morgan in this crisis, lobbied Congress to establish the Fed.

The Fed's banker-friendly organizational structure was not an accident; it was first and foremost intended to serve the banks and only secondarily to serve the larger public. The Fed's culture is thoroughly intermeshed with the financial industry. While its legal mandate from Congress places an equal priority on the goals of price stability and full employment,⁴⁰ the Fed has maintained a much greater commitment to the former goal than the latter. In fact, current Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke has openly committed the Fed to targeting inflation at 2 percent, a policy which implies that the Fed would be willing to tolerate high jobless rates if it were concerned that more expansionary policy would raise the rate of inflation above its target.

Inflation is generally the main concern of the financial industry for the simple reason that its loans are fixed in dollar terms. If inflation reduces the value of the dollar, lenders lose money. This loss takes two forms. First, if inflation is running at a 5 percent annual rate, then the money paid back to lenders at the end of the year on loans they made at the beginning of the year is worth 5 percent less than the money they lent.

Of course if the banks had anticipated 5 percent inflation then they would adjust for this expectation in the interest rate they charge by adding into it this amount of expected inflation. If they were prepared to make a loan at 3 percent interest in a world with zero inflation, then they would demand 8 percent interest in a world where the inflation rate was expected to be 5 percent.

This brings up the second way in which banks lose money as a result of inflation. The bonds and loans they hold will fall in value in response to a rise in the rate of inflation. The price of bonds and long-term loans moves in the opposite direction of interest rates. If interest rates rise, then the price of these assets falls. And so if people come to expect higher rates of inflation, and then interest rates rise in response, the existing bonds and loans held by the banks will be worth less. For this reason, banks and other financial institutions typically face large losses if the rate of inflation increases.

This was the scenario that played out when many of the nation's savings and loan associations (S&Ls) became insolvent in the 1970s. S&Ls had issued low-interest mortgages in the low-inflation environment of the 1960s. When inflation reached double-digits in the late 1970s, the 30-year mortgages they had issued at 6 percent interest were suddenly worth much less. Since these mortgages were the primary asset of savings and loans (under the law, the vast majority of their lending had to be for residential housing), for many the losses on these mortgages exceeded their capital, making them insolvent.

It is not just the bank presidents who share the banks' concern about inflation. The governors of the Fed and most of its staff tend to share these concerns as well. They do not view the problem of high inflation and high unemployment as being symmetric.⁴¹ The social circle in which these people circulate includes the top management of the country's largest banks, as well as their economists and other professional staff. It does not include union members, small business owners, or other actors in society who may have a different view on the tradeoffs between the risks of higher inflation and unemployment and slower growth. Any Fed governor committed to making lower unemployment the top priority, especially in a context where the policy risked higher rates of inflation, would face an enormous uphill struggle.

Another way to address this question of „who rules the Fed“ is by asking what sort of failures would get a Fed chairman fired. The last Fed chairman to be effectively fired was William Miller in the summer of 1979. He had been in the post for only 19 months. During this period, the rate of inflation had continued to accelerate, a process that had begun with the end of the recession in 1975, but the U.S. unemployment rate was just under 6 percent. Jimmy Carter replaced Miller with Paul Volcker, who was determined to bring down inflation regardless of the cost in unemployment. By January 1980, Volcker had raised interest rates enough to push the economy into recession.⁴² After a brief reprieve in the second half of 1980, he began to push up interest rates again. The economy returned to recession in July 1981, with unemployment peaking at just under 11 percent. Volcker was clearly serious about fighting inflation, and he retains a legacy as “a giant of the financial industry” who “restored credibility to the Federal Reserve.”⁴³

In a similar vein, Ben Bernanke was chairman of the Fed when the housing bubble collapsed and the banking crisis threatened to bring down the financial system. Even though the resulting fallout has given the country the worst downturn since the Great Depression, almost no one in a position of authority has suggested that Bernanke be fired for this policy failure.

While it is true that Bernanke only took over as Fed chair in January 2006, after the housing bubble had already expanded to a level where it would have been almost impossible to deflate without causing serious damage, Bernanke had been in top policy positions since the summer of 2002. He was a governor of the Fed until the summer of 2005, when he became the chief economist in the Bush administration. He remained there until he took over as Fed chair. During this time, he never raised any concerns about the housing bubble or the questionable finance that was fueling it. In fact, like Chairman Greenspan, he glibly dismissed anyone who raised questions along these lines.

In short, if the Fed's responsibility to maintain high levels of employment was taken seriously, it is difficult to imagine how someone could be more deserving of dismissal than Bernanke. The policy failures by Bernanke and his colleagues had disastrous consequences by this standard, yet neither he nor any of the other people in top positions at the Fed lost their jobs. In fact, their track record in leading the economy into disaster was never even raised seriously in policy debates.

We have to recognize that regardless of its legal mandate, as it stands now, the Fed is answerable to people who care much about inflation and little, if anything, about unemployment. Even modest increases in the rate of inflation are viewed as a high crime, despite the fact that there is little evidence that moderately higher inflation (e.g., 3 to 4 percent, as compared to 2 percent) causes any serious harm to the economy. By contrast, even sharp divergences from full employment, which cause enormous suffering and massive losses of potential output, are not viewed as a serious failure by the interest groups to whom the Fed is accountable.

However bad the situation with the Fed, it is worth noting that it is likely the most democratic of the world's central banks, both in its levers of control and its mandate. Most other major central banks operate with a single mandate, to maintain price stability, which is generally specified as a 2 percent inflation target. These banks make no apology for the persistence of high rates of unemployment. It is officially not their job.

In terms of democratic accountability, it is possible to see how the Fed could be restructured to pursue policies that were more favorable toward the working population. In principle, Congress could strip the banks of their special power in determining the Fed's agenda by making all the Fed officials in decision-making positions presidential appointees subject to congressional approval. A president committed to appointing governors who focused on employment at least as much as price stability could change the Fed's orientation.

It is much more difficult to see how the European Central Bank (ECB) could be restructured to force it to serve the interests of Europe's workers rather than its financial sector. The European political structure is sufficiently convoluted that there is not even a clear mechanism to change an institution like the ECB: it was established to be in its current form indefinitely. A political movement hoping to alter this structure would be paving new ground altogether.

Regaining control over monetary policy

The Fed has been deliberately designed to insulate it from democratic control and leave it instead to be a tool of the financial industry. It will be hard to unrig the process, but there is no alternative to trying, given that the stakes for economic outcomes are so high. The long-term goal must be to establish the same sort of accountability from the Fed that would be expected from any other government agency. The Fed must answer to democratically elected officials.

However, any change in the governing structure of the Fed is many years in the future. In the meantime, we can take shorter-term steps to influence the Fed's behavior.

First, progressives can take a lesson from the right's message machine. After the initial phase of the financial crisis, many right-wing politicians and some economists began beating the drums about runaway inflation. Their argument was that the Fed's huge expansion of the money supply would inevitably cause prices to skyrocket. In reality, there was little reason to believe that inflation would be a problem at all. With massive amounts of idle capacity in almost every sector of the economy and an extraordinarily high unemployment rate, the conditions did not exist for inflation to take off. Furthermore, there had been prior instances in which central banks had vastly expanded a country's core money supply⁴⁴ during severe slumps, most obviously the Fed during the Great Depression and Japan's central bank in the 1990s. In both cases the money went to excess reserves, since banks faced no demand for loans in a depressed economy. Inflation did not result.

However unrealistic they may have been, the complaints by the right had their intended result. They bolstered the inflation hawks on the Fed and almost certainly made Chairman Bernanke and other relative doves more cautious about pushing expansionary monetary policy. In effect, those warning about inflation were able to get at least part of what they wanted: a Fed that was more cautious in stimulating the economy than would otherwise be the case.

How would the media, Congress, and the Fed have responded to an aggressive push in the opposite direction? Progressive members of Congress and other prominent political figures could have made a point of complaining that the Fed was taking inadequate steps to meet the portion of its mandate requiring it to pursue full employment.

Progressives could have called attention to the fact that Bernanke was not even following his own advice, offered while he was a professor at Princeton. In a 1999 paper harshly critical of the Japanese central bank's response to that country's financial crisis, Bernanke argued that the Japanese bank should explicitly target a higher inflation rate in the range of 3 to 4 percent.⁴⁵ He argued that the higher rate would be desirable both because it would lower the real interest rate and also because it would reduce the debt burden of Japanese homeowners and corporations.⁴⁶

Had a chorus arisen from the left that was remotely comparable to the absurd inflation fears raised by those on the right, it could have at least neutralized the pressure to tighten up on interest rates and slow economic growth. It's at least possible that such an effort could have paved the way for Bernanke to take more aggressive steps to boost the economy.

To illustrate the importance of the Fed to the economy, suppose that more aggressive monetary policy managed to boost growth by just 0.3 percent over the course of a year, certainly a modest target. A proportionate increase in employment would translate into 400,000 additional jobs. Job numbers of this size should be worth the attention of progressives. There have been major fights over policies that would have much less impact on employment.

Another aspect to the Fed's policy remarkably has received even less attention. When the Fed earns interest on the assets it holds, it refunds the money to the Treasury. In fiscal year 2010, the Fed paid the Treasury almost $80 billion as a result of the interest it earned on the government bonds and mortgage-backed securities it held.

Current budget projections assume that the Fed will sell off the assets it holds at present, so that the interest paid to the Treasury will diminish through time, even as interest rates rise when the economy recovers. But selling off these assets is a policy decision. The Fed could continue to hold its government bonds and refund the interest to the Treasury so that the interest does not pose as large a burden to the government in future years.

The potential impact of this decision is substantial. If the Fed held $3 trillion in government bonds over the next decade (roughly its current asset level), it would reduce the interest burden to the government by a total of more than $600 billion.

The potential reduction in the national debt over the next decade as a result of a Fed policy to hold $3 trillion in assets compared to the impact of ending the Bush tax cuts on the richest 2 percent of the population would be virtually costless. Fed policy is comparable to that of one of the policies that most dominates public debate. Yet, the idea of the Fed holding its assets to alleviate the interest burden of the debt is almost never discussed.⁴⁷

If progressives were aware of the importance of the Fed in determining employment and other economic outcomes, they would almost certainly target more of their efforts on its policy decisions. The potential impact of the Fed on unemployment and wages dwarfs the impact of the vast majority of legislative items that garner attention from progressives. Even if the channels for directly changing Fed policy are limited, it is important for the public to understand the way in which Fed policy can hurt a person's ability to be employed and earn a decent wage.

This knowledge is also a necessary precondition for changing the structure of the Fed. As it stands now, most people have only the vaguest understanding of what the Fed is and very little idea of why it could be important in their lives. People recognize that the government can affect their well-being by raising or lowering taxes and cutting programs like Social Security and Medicare. There is almost no awareness that an agency of the government, the Federal Reserve Board, can pursue policies that will ensure that people remain employed or, alternatively, can maintain a sufficiently high rate of unemployment so that most workers will have little bargaining power with employers.

Opportunities suggest themselves for interesting and unusual coalitions in organizing to take on the Fed. Many grassroots libertarians are wary of the Fed, often because they view it as an instrument of Wall Street banks. Progressives can find allies among libertarians for at least some actions related to the Fed, most importantly measures that increase accountability.

In the last session of Congress, Ron Paul, one of its most conservative members, and Alan Grayson and Bernie Sanders, two of its most progressive, introduced bills requiring greater disclosure of the Fed's lending practices. Despite the opposition of the Democratic leadership, the Paul-Grayson bill won the support of the majority of the House, as most Republicans and about one-third of Democrats signed on as co-sponsors. Despite the strong opposition of the Fed, which predicted disastrous consequences if details of loan information were made public, a version of these bills was eventually attached to the Dodd-Frank financial reform bill and passed into law. (To date, the disastrous consequences have not been apparent.)

Other measures like the Paul-Grayson-Sanders bills, that shine a spotlight on the Fed's actions, are likely to gain the support of a substantial number of libertarians. Many libertarians would prefer to shut down the Fed altogether, a move that would take away an important instrument for supporting the economy.⁴⁸ Though this goal will limit the degree of progressive cooperation with libertarians, on the issue of making the Fed more open and accountable, there is a clear common interest.

The long-term goal of Fed reform must be to strip the banking industry of its privileged role in determining Fed policy. The Fed should be restructured so that it operates in a similar manner to any other government agency, though even this change will not guarantee that it will act in the public interest. The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) is an independent agency answerable to Congress, but it would be hard to contest the fact that it often is more responsive to industry concerns than the interests of the general public. But at least Disney and Comcast do not get to directly appoint members of the FCC.

Chapter 6—Full Employment Without the Fed

In principle, the Fed should vigorously pursue policies that promote full employment.⁴⁹ However, it does not do so now, nor is it likely to do so in the near future. Under its current structure, the Fed is primarily responsive to the financial industry's concerns about inflation, and full employment comes in a distant second.

A progressive agenda should include efforts to educate the public about the Fed's importance and its structure, for two reasons: to maintain pressure on the Fed to pursue the full-employment portion of its mandate, and to create support for legally restructuring the institution so that it is more accountable to democratically elected officials.

But even in a best-case scenario, the Fed will be controlled by financial interests long into the future. This raises the question of whether there are other steps that can be taken to move the economy back toward full employment even when the Fed is at best indifferent — if not outright hostile — to this effort.

Work sharing: The quickest route back to full employment

In the absence of a growing demand for labor that would increase employment, an alternative route is to divide up the existing work among more workers. While this may be an inferior path — there is enormous waste associated with an economy operating below its potential — it may be the only route available given that the possibility of further fiscal stimulus appears to be blocked by political considerations. Yet, in any case, work sharing might be a proper route back to full employment, since there is nothing written in stone about the current length of the work week or work year.

Work sharing is not a new idea. The idea of shortening work time to create more jobs has a long history. In the context of an economy that is at full employment, the approach might be misguided, since legislated reductions in work time can lead to increased inflationary pressure and economic distortions. However, in an economy that is operating well below its potential and that is projected to remain below potential output for much of the next decade, as is the case with the U.S. economy, work sharing may be the most viable way of bringing the nation back to full employment.

Germany is the model in this respect. It has aggressively promoted a policy of work sharing, along with other measures aimed at persuading employers to retain workers. As a result, its unemployment rate stood at 6.1 percent in June 2011, 2.1 percentage points below the rate at the start of the downturn.⁵⁰ This remarkable achievement was not due to superior economic growth. Through the first quarter of 2011, the growth rate of Germany's economy since the start of the downturn had actually lagged somewhat behind the growth rate of the United States. The nearly steady fall in Germany's unemployment rate — at a time when the unemployment rate in the United States sharply increased and then remained high (peaking at 10.1 percent in October 2009 and only falling to 9.2 percent by June 2011) — was entirely due to different labor market responses to the downturn.⁵¹

Germany's experience with reducing work hours as an alternative to unemployment has been remarkable. But it is important to note that most of the reduction in work hours was not brought about by the formal short-work program run by the government. The OECD estimated that 25 percent of the reduction in hours worked in Germany resulted from the formal short-work program, 40 percent from employer agreements with unions or work councils, 20 percent from reduced overtime, and 20 percent from tapping work-hour accounts (accounts that allow workers to bank paid time off by working extra hours).⁵² While the role of the short-work policy was important, it played out in the context of a larger commitment to preserving employment.

The overwhelming majority of the workers in short-work programs in Europe are men, disproportionately middle-aged, and tend to work for medium- and large-sized firms rather than smaller businesses.⁵³ The construction and manufacturing industries accounted for a hugely disproportionate share of participation in short-work programs, although they also accounted for the bulk of the job loss in the recession; hence, the concentration of covered workers in these sectors may be more a function of the pattern of job loss than the nature of the programs. By education level, workers with college and advanced degrees were underrepresented, as were workers without high school degrees.⁵⁴ The experience of short work in Europe suggests that it has primarily benefited a relatively narrow group of workers: less-educated middle-aged men in manufacturing and construction. To some extent this undoubtedly reflects features of the programs. For example, the programs generally place lower limits on the size of firms that can qualify. Insofar as men are more likely to be employed at larger firms, men will be overrepresented among the beneficiaries of the program. However, the fact that manufacturing and construction, which disproportionately employ men without college degrees, were hit hardest in the downturn also was important in determining the mix of beneficiaries from short-work programs.

The United States has limited experience with work sharing. States offering the programs tend to tie them to unemployment insurance: a worker receives unemployment benefits to make up for the income sacrificed for the shorter hours. Eighteen states had a work-sharing program attached to their unemployment insurance systems prior to the start of the recession, and several more states began the process of starting programs after the recession began.⁵⁵ Most of the existing programs date from the late 1970s or early 1980s. While some of the largest states, including California and New York, make work sharing available, the programs have had relatively little impact nationwide on unemployment in the downturn. Participation in work-sharing programs peaked in 2009 at just over 150,000 workers, less than 0.2 percent of payroll employment.⁵⁶ In only two states, Rhode Island and Kansas, did participation in work-sharing programs exceed 1.0 percent of payroll employment.

Since the end of 2009, participation in work-sharing programs has fallen sharply, due to the fact that participants in work sharing in most states are ineligible for extended unemployment benefits and in no state are they eligible for the Emergency Unemployment Compensation program that provides benefits for jobless spells lasting more than 52 weeks. This means that, for the most part, because participation in the program is tied to receipt of unemployment insurance benefits, workers can be on a work-sharing compensation program only for 26 weeks.

At the start of the downturn, layoffs occurred disproportionately in manufacturing and construction, the sectors where workers were most likely to take part in work-sharing programs. By the beginning of 2010, manufacturing had stopped shedding large numbers of jobs and the rate of job loss in construction had slowed sharply. As a result, the number of new entrants in work-sharing programs would have been expected to fall while many of the workers enrolled in the program would have reached the maximum length of time in which unemployment benefits compensated them for their reduced hours.

As it exists in the United States today, work sharing has at best had a marginal impact on employment, affecting only a small sliver of the workforce. The next section discusses some of the implementation issues that could make the program more attractive to both workers and employers.

Issues of implementation

Work-sharing programs in the United States are little changed from the time they were first put in place in the late 1970s and early 1980s. They tend to be overly bureaucratic and not well publicized. Many employers in the states where programs exist do not even know they might have the option to take advantage of them as an alternative to laying off workers.

One of the basic issues of implementation is the closeness with which employers are held to a specific plan for work sharing. Most states require that an employer certify that the proposed reduction in hours per worker is an alternative to layoffs, and it then must lay out a plan for reduced hours, usually for specific workers. This procedure allows individual workers to claim unemployment benefits against the scheduled reduction in work time. For example, if a worker is scheduled to have a reduction in work time of 20 percent, he or she can claim an unemployment insurance benefit equivalent to 20 percent of the benefit that would be available if the worker were unemployed altogether.⁵⁷

This system has the disadvantage of both locking the employer into a specific pattern of hours reduction and requiring employees to individually apply for benefits. Drawing up a specific schedule of hours reduction and holding to it for a specified period may overly constrain employers operating in an environment where there is considerable uncertainty about demand for their products. The rigid scheduling can also be cumbersome, since any workplace will have some amount of turnover. If, for example, an employer moved a worker out of the work-sharing compensation system and into a full-time position elsewhere in the company, the firm could not replace the worker with another receiving work-sharing compensation without filing a new plan with the state employment agency.

These restrictions can be avoided if the employer is given more discretion over which workers are covered and how much work time is actually reduced. In this case, the state agency would probably make payments directly to the company rather than to the individual worker. The payments could be made based on scheduled reductions in hours and then adjusted in accordance with the actual reduction in hours on a quarterly or annual basis. While this system would leave more opportunities for abuse, the experience rating of insurance payments⁵⁸ should limit the extent to which employers have incentive to game the system. An employer that deliberately flouted the system would find itself faced with much higher payments into the system in subsequent years.⁵⁹

Two other important issues of implementation affect the willingness of workers to accept work sharing. First, there is the question of whether fringe benefits are still paid for the workers for the hours they are not working. The state programs are based on wage compensation, so in many cases workers seeing a 20 percent reduction in work hours will also see a 20 percent reduction in the portion of health insurance premiums paid by their employer as well as a 20 percent reduction in contributions to pensions or other benefits. This reduction in benefits could be a substantial disincentive to workers to take part in a work-sharing program.

The other issue is that work-sharing benefits generally count against regular unemployment benefits. If a worker has been in a work-sharing program for, say, 20 weeks with hours reduced by 20 percent, then upon being laid off the duration of work-sharing would reduce the eligibility period for conventional unemployment insurance by 4 weeks. Since firms that use work-sharing are experiencing shortfalls in demand almost by definition, there is a high probability that there will be layoffs at some point. The concern over the possibility of being laid off with a reduced period of eligibility for benefits could make workers reluctant to take part in work-sharing programs.

There is also the problem noted earlier that workers in work-sharing programs generally are not eligible for benefits beyond an initial 26-week period. This means that only those experiencing relatively short spells of reduced work hours will be able to take part in work-sharing programs.

All of these problems can be addressed in ways that are likely to increase the use of work-sharing with only a modest commitment of additional resources to the program. All else equal, when it comes to reducing their demand for labor, employers should be largely indifferent to whether it's by laying off workers or reducing hours for the existing workforce.⁶⁰ Since there is a clear public interest in keeping people employed, it would make sense to structure a work-sharing program in ways that make it more desirable than laying off workers from the standpoint of employers, even if it comes at a somewhat higher cost to the government than the current unemployment insurance system.

Specifically, it could be desirable to pay a premium of 25 to 30 percent to companies in excess of what their workers would receive in unemployment insurance benefits if a comparable reduction in work hours had to be accomplished through layoffs. This system would best take the form of an employer credit,⁶¹ so that workers would not have to individually file for the benefit and employers would have the freedom to alter work weeks as needed and change the specific workers who were receiving work-sharing compensation. The program could require that employers maintain their full contributions for health insurance, defined-benefit pensions, and any other benefits that are not easily divisible. The increased premium could also be used to cover an additional period of eligibility for conventional unemployment insurance if workers on work-sharing programs were laid off. This enhanced protection should make workers more willing to accept work-sharing plans.

The impact of work sharing on employment

There is evidence available for predicting the take-up rates for a more generous work-sharing program. With other policies, like wage subsidies, it is possible to derive a projected impact based on estimates of the elasticity of labor demand (i.e., the extent to which lowering the cost of labor leads firms to add workers). In the case of work sharing, demand is not really an issue since the immediate goal is not to increase the demand for labor but rather to change its distribution. The relevant question is the willingness of employers to take part in the program and to readjust patterns of work to meet its requirements. The answer will depend both on the extent to which employers view the program as advantageous to keep workers on the payroll and on the costs of making the necessary adjustments in the structure of work.

Based on the German experience, it is possible that employers will view shortening work hours as preferable to layoffs, even with little or no additional subsidy from the government. German employers have been supportive of the country's short-work policy in large part because they recognize the advantage of having workers on their payrolls whose hours can be increased quickly when demand grows, as opposed to the disadvantage of spending time and money hiring new workers. However, there are other features of Germany's labor market, which do not exist in the United States, that make short work relatively more attractive there.

First and foremost, Germany has a far higher union coverage rate, with approximately 43 percent of its workers covered by collective bargaining agreements compared to about 13 percent in the United States.⁶² This means that German employers are more likely to have to negotiate layoffs with a union rather than unilaterally lay off workers. Second, firms with more than 250 employees are required to have a works council, which would play a role in any layoff decisions. In addition, employment protection rules in Germany do not allow employers to dismiss most workers at will. Thus, German employers have a strong incentive to develop plans for reducing work hours in ways that are acceptable to their workers.

At the same time, employers in the United States do recognize the benefits of keeping their incumbent workers on the job rather than being forced to hire new workers when demand increases. In the latest downturn the length of the average workweek fell substantially in every sector of the economy, an indication that employers did not adjust labor demand exclusively through layoffs. If a better advertised, more generous, and less bureaucratic system were in place, surely employers would be more likely to take advantage of the option of work-sharing.

A relatively simple calculation can tell us with some certainty the cost per job, if not the number of jobs saved. If the target is to increase the generosity of the unemployment insurance system by 30 percent by having the system cover non-wage benefits for workers on work-sharing and implicitly by extending the length of unemployment benefits through not counting the period of work-sharing against the benefit limits, then the cost per job saved would be roughly 30 percent of the average unemployment benefit. With benefits currently averaging $300 a week or $15,000 a year, a more generous system of work-sharing would cost roughly $4,500 per job saved.

What would be the impact of this policy on employment by industry, assuming take-up rates by employers for job losses of 10 percent, 15 percent, and 20 percent? (In other words, 10 percent, 15 percent, and 20 percent of the workers who would otherwise be dismissed are instead kept on as a result of work-sharing programs.) Assume that the average period that workers are in a work-sharing program is six months. An average hours' reduction of 20 percent would imply that the total number of workers in work-sharing programs is five times as large as the number of jobs saved.

If these assumptions are plausible, then the potential of work sharing on employment is substantial. A 10 percent take-up rate from a more flexible work-sharing program would increase employment by more than one million. With a 20 percent take-up rate, employment would rise by more than two million. Based on the pattern of layoffs by industry, the biggest impact would be in the professional and business service sector.⁶³ The next largest impacts would be in construction and the leisure and hospitality sector.

Two important factors are likely to cause the take-up rate by industry to be different from the rate of job loss by industry: firm size and pay rates. As noted before, smaller firms are generally prohibited from participating in work-sharing programs. The rationale for excluding smaller firms is that it would be difficult to monitor their compliance, and it would be more difficult for them to reorganize their workplaces to adjust to shorter workweeks.

Let's look at the percentage of job loss in the first two quarters of 2010 by firm size. Most of the job loss occurred in smaller firms during this period, with firms with more than 50 employees accounting for just 35.8 percent of the gross job loss. This means that if eligibility for participation were restricted to firms that employ more than 50 workers, then the take-up rate among eligible firms would have to be almost three times the levels shown in Table 6-1 in order to reach the same employment growth targets. Achieving a 10 percent take-up rate among all workers who would otherwise lose their jobs would require a take-up rate of almost 28 percent among firms that employed more than 50 workers; an overall 20 percent take-up rate would require a take-up rate of almost 56 percent among firms employing more than 50 workers. If the cutoff for participation were instead put at 20 employees, then there would have to be a 21 percent take-up rate among the eligible firms to reach the 10 percent target and a 42 percent rate to reach the 20 percent target.

Finally, the take-up rate is likely to be affected by pay levels. Since unemployment benefits are capped in most states at relatively low levels, the potential compensation provided through a work-sharing program will be a smaller share of the wages of highly paid employees than of relatively low-paid workers. Based on data from the Current Population Survey on the distribution of hourly wages by industry for 2010, by wage distribution—the retail sector, restaurants, and hotels would seem to have the largest proportion of workers who could benefit from a work-sharing program. Of course, these sectors also have many small employers that would likely not be eligible, and so the highest take-up rate could be expected to be among the larger establishments.

The longer-term benefits of work sharing

Work sharing offers the short-term benefit of allowing a return to something resembling full employment in a reasonable period. However, its potential long-term benefits could be at least as important. In 1980, the average number of hours worked by full-time workers in the United States was not very different than in other wealthy countries. But in the decades since 1980 most other wealthy countries have seen sharp reductions in work hours in favor of paid vacation days, paid family leave, and paid sick days. In many countries, the standard workweek is now considerably less than 40 hours. As a result, the typical full-time worker in Western Europe puts in many fewer hours than the typical worker in the United States; in some countries the gap in hours for full-time workers is more than 20 percent.

There are reasons to think it would be a good thing for the United States to follow the path of Western Europe in having shorter work weeks. The move to shorter work weeks in many cases was intended to ensure more family-friendly workplaces. Paid family leave means that workers in Western Europe can stay home to care for young children or elderly parents. Paid sick days mean that a parent doesn't have to worry about losing his or her job to care for a sick child. And paid vacation time means that workers are guaranteed some time off that they can spend with family and friends. These are all benefits that can be viewed as substantially increasing the quality of life.

Of course there is a tradeoff. The cost of working fewer hours is that per capita income in Western Europe averages more than 20 percent less than in the United States. There is little difference in productivity — output per hour — between Western Europe and the United States, and in effect workers in Europe have taken much of the benefits of productivity growth over the last three decades in leisure rather than income. (It is worth noting that the gap in incomes between the United States and Western Europe refers to average incomes. The gap at the median, if it exists at all, is considerably smaller.)

While Europeans no doubt appreciate the greater amount of leisure that they enjoy compared with their counterparts in the United States, it is not obvious that they suffer as a result of a lower average income. There is undoubtedly a substantial relative component in assessments of well-being, so if a job in Germany or Belgium pays a wage that is close to the median, it is likely that workers feel reasonably contented with their standard of living even if it leaves them with a somewhat lower material standard of living than a similar U.S. worker. Not being able to afford a new car every few years may be less of a concern if people buy new cars rarely compared with a country where workers buy new cars more frequently.

Another aspect of the labor-leisure trade-off is that there is a strong correlation between greenhouse gas emissions and income.⁶⁴ Essentially, wealthier people use more energy and therefore have more greenhouse gas emissions. Western Europe emits approximately half as much greenhouse gases per capita as the United States.⁶⁵ There are two obvious explanations for this gap. First, because people in the United States have more money, they are more able to afford items such as big cars or the cost of air conditioning their homes to very low temperatures in the summer. And if Europeans have more time, they may place less of a premium on driving their own cars, as opposed to taking public transportation or riding a bicycle, to get somewhere a few minutes faster. Because time is at much more of a premium in the United States, people are willing to pay a higher price in terms of money and energy to save time.

Thus, in addition to the benefits of making work more family friendly and improving the quality of life, there are also environmental reasons for preferring that people take the benefits of productivity growth in the form of more leisure rather than income. Yet to date, environmentalists have not taken much notice of the potential to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and other pollutants by promoting shorter work weeks or work years.

When considering measures that are designed to influence the length of the work week or work year, it is important to remember that it was not just the market that determined the work schedules we have today. One of the main reasons employers are reluctant to add more workers and reduce the hours of the current workforce is the overhead cost of hiring a worker, most importantly health care costs. Typically health care is a per-worker expense: employers pay a fixed amount for a worker's health insurance policy regardless of how many hours he or she actually works.⁶⁶

The structure of health care provision in the United States was not determined by accident. It dates back to World War II, when employer-provided health insurance became a mechanism for raising compensation while evading wartime wage-price controls. Also, the policy of exempting employer-provided insurance from the income tax (along with most other employer-provided benefits) gave firms an incentive to provide a substantial portion of workers' compensation in health care and other non-wage benefits.

This history is relevant because it means that the current length of the average work year is not simply the result of the workings of the market and the preferences of employers and employees. Government policy provided substantial incentives for hiring fewer workers for more hours rather than more workers for shorter hours. Since policy got us here, there is no reason to be shy about using policy to set the economy on a different course.⁶⁷

Work sharing as a state-based way to get to full employment

One of the best things about work sharing is that it can be implemented largely at the state level, especially if the federal government provides some leeway in restructuring unemployment insurance. States could experiment with different structures to see which is most successful in maximizing take-up by employers and minimizing fraud.

While the political establishment in the United States is very effective at ignoring policy successes in other countries (how often have you heard about Germany's 6.1 percent unemployment rate?), it is more difficult to ignore successes at the state level. If Ohio or Washington State implemented a work-sharing program that pushed their unemployment rates under 5.0 percent, they would provide a model that other states would want to emulate. So even if gridlock at the national level prevents any major work-sharing initiative, there is nothing to prevent innovative action at the state level.

A successful work-sharing initiative can accomplish several goals simultaneously. First and most importantly, it will keep people at work, a hugely important objective in a context of high national unemployment. As people are out of work for longer periods, it becomes increasingly difficult for them to find re-employment. Many of the long-term unemployed may never find work again. The devastation to individual workers and their families from this situation is enormous, as is the waste to the economy when qualified and willing workers are unable to find jobs. If work sharing can substantially reduce the number of unemployed, it will be a beneficial policy in both the short and long term.

Work sharing can be coupled with policies that make the workplace more family friendly. These include paid family leave, sick days, and paid vacation. The United States lags far behind other wealthy countries in providing these benefits to its workers. Incentives for shortening the work week or work year as opposed to laying off workers should help to offset the institutional factors that have led employers to prefer longer hours to the hiring of additional workers.

Furthermore, work sharing can be coupled with environmental benefits. Structuring incentives to encourage workers to take the gains of productivity growth partly in leisure rather than income would almost certainly lead to a reduction in greenhouse gas emissions. For example, if participants in a work-sharing program were to work four, instead of five, days per week, that would mean one less day per week per worker of the pollution associated with commuting.

As a final note, it is worth thinking about the labor market dynamics of promoting a reduction in hours through a system of work sharing as opposed to layoffs through unemployment insurance. The system of work sharing is most likely to primarily affect the less-educated portion of the labor force, both because less-educated workers are more likely to face unemployment, and because unemployment insurance benefits are capped, meaning that the program would pay a larger share of the wage package of a less-educated workers than that of more highly educated workers.

A reduction in the typical work year for less-educated workers would have the same effect on the labor market for these workers as a reduction in their supply, and reducing their supply would be expected to increase their bargaining power and their relative wages. In other words, if institutional changes led to a reduction in standard work years by 20 percent, this would have the same effect on the labor market as reducing the supply of workers by 20 percent. It is basic economics that wages are to a large extent determined by supply and demand. Most economists attribute the rise in wage inequality over the last three decades to the fact that the increase in the supply of less-educated workers has exceeded the increase in the demand for them. However, policies that have the effect of reducing the average number of hours worked would put upward pressure on the wages of less-educated workers in the same way as a reduction in the number of workers or an increase in the demand for their work. In other words, work-sharing is a policy that would structure the market in a way that reduces inequality.

Chapter 7—Fulcrums of Power II: The Treasury and the Dollar

The U.S. Treasury's ability to influence the value of the dollar in international currency markets might at first seem to be a trivial power that matters little to ordinary people, unless they travel abroad or happen to be employed in an import-export business. But it is a power that can and does have a major impact, not only on the unemployment rate but also on which workers become unemployed and how much employed workers earn. And it is a power exercised with little understanding or oversight by the public.

The Treasury has the authority to intervene directly in currency markets by buying or selling dollars, though it rarely uses this authority. (The Treasury can in principle coordinate its interventions with the Fed, which also holds a large amount of foreign currency.) Usually its efforts to influence the value of the dollar have been more subtle, such as making pronouncements about a "strong dollar," or indirect, through its control of the International Monetary Fund.

Nonetheless, the Treasury could intervene more actively in currency markets if it opted to do so. Acting in coordination with the Fed, the Treasury could choose to bring the value of the dollar down against other currencies, and thereby produce a huge improvement in the country's trade balance. In turn, this would create millions of new manufacturing jobs. A boost to manufacturing would increase the demand for non-college-educated workers and push up their wages relative to those of more highly educated workers. There is remarkably little awareness, even in policy circles, that the value of the dollar is a policy tool under the control of the government. This is striking because there have been major debates over trade agreements like NAFTA and CAFTA (The Central American Free Trade Agreement), primarily over concern about their potential impact on jobs in the United States. By contrast, the value of the dollar is almost never mentioned in policy debates. Even small changes in the value of the dollar are likely to have far more impact on trade and employment than the most important of these trade agreements. Typically, trade pacts comprise relatively small reductions in tariff barriers, coupled with changes in investment rules designed to facilitate the movement of manufacturing jobs overseas. Even the largest of the recent trade pacts involved only a relatively small portion of U.S. trade — for example, the entry of Mexico into NAFTA.

A rise in the value of the dollar against other currencies by, say, 10 percent is equivalent to giving a 10 percent subsidy on all the goods imported into the United States and imposing a 10 percent tariff on all the goods we export. This sort of increase in the value of the dollar could easily increase the trade deficit by more than 1 percent of GDP (about $150 billion), an amount that would imply the loss of far more than one million jobs. Yet, such an increase in the value of the dollar could occur over a couple of months and get almost no mention outside of the business pages, and even then would not likely garner major headlines.

This works to the advantage of those who benefit from a high-dollar policy. At the top of this list would be the financial industry, which receives benefits of a high dollar through two channels. First, by making imports cheaper, a high dollar helps to keep inflation low, and stable prices are a financial industry obsession. Second, when the financial industry looks to move abroad, its dollar assets go much further when the dollar is overvalued.

Other industries have a more ambiguous view toward a high dollar. Domestic manufacturers should oppose a high dollar since it places them at a disadvantage relative to their foreign competitors. However, insofar as manufacturers are able to establish operations overseas, they are likely to be content with a high-dollar policy that disadvantages only some of their operations. Because they can shield themselves with their foreign operations, they can gain an advantage over purely domestic competitors.

Major retail chains like Wal-Mart are advantaged in a similar way. By contracting with suppliers in China and other countries with low labor costs, these chains enjoy a supply of low-cost imports that allows them to undercut retailers that pay higher domestic prices for their products. For this reason, major retailers are likely to oppose any effort to lower the value of the dollar.

There is also a peculiar class dynamic to the dollar debate. When American tourists travel to Europe or Asia, their money goes further when the dollar is high. While only a small portion of the population makes regular trips overseas, it is an important group for policy purposes. The people who staff congressional offices and the higher levels of the bureaucracies in Washington, the people who run and contribute to political campaigns, and the reporters who cover them all are likely to be among the group of frequent foreign travelers. For all these people, a decline in the dollar might be viewed as bad news because it means that their next trip to France or Italy will cost more.

The importance of this aspect of the policy debate should not be underestimated. Even the staffers of progressive members of Congress and journalists from progressive opinion magazines are far more likely to take vacations in Europe than the typical person. It is easy for them to understand that a high dollar makes their overseas trips less expensive. This fact can make it much harder for them to understand that a high dollar can also cause millions of workers to be unemployed or force them to work at lower wages.

While a substantial number of powerful special interest groups will benefit from an overvalued dollar, it is harmful to the economy as a whole in both the short run and the long run. In the short run, an overvalued dollar virtually guarantees a large trade deficit, and a trade deficit both reduces overall employment and changes the mix of jobs in a way that works against workers without college degrees. The jobs that are lost as a result of a trade deficit will be disproportionately in manufacturing, which continues to be a source of relatively high-paying jobs for less-educated workers. For this reason, the trade deficit is an important factor contributing to the increase in inequality that we have seen over the last three decades.

It is also important to recognize how the dynamics of a trade deficit affect the overall economy. If the country has a trade deficit, then it is, on net, borrowing from abroad. In other words, someone must be lending us money in some form to allow us to buy more than we are selling. If the country as a whole is borrowing more than it is lending, then the culprit must be either the public sector or the private sector. (That's all we've got.)

Borrowing on the public-sector side corresponds to the large budget deficits that we hear so much about. A budget deficit means that the government is spending more than it pulls in as tax revenue and therefore must borrow the difference. A large budget deficit can be one result of a large trade deficit. The causation would be that the loss of jobs due to the trade deficit reduces tax revenues and increases payouts for unemployment insurance and other benefits. In this story, if we get the dollar down, then we can make substantial progress in reducing the budget deficit, since the jobs created by reducing the trade deficit will lead to more income tax revenue and lower benefit payments.⁶⁸

If the budget is near balance or in surplus, then the borrowing must be on the private side. This would be the story of extraordinarily low private savings that we saw during the years of both the stock and housing bubbles. In both cases, the inflow of foreign capital helped to inflate the bubbles. The wealth created by these bubbles led people in the United States to spend more and save less, yielding large negative private savings. This is not a sustainable course, since bubbles eventually burst.

Recovering from a burst asset bubble can be a long and difficult process, as the country is now experiencing. If the dollar does not fall enough to allow the trade deficit to get much closer to balance, then the government must run large budget deficits to sustain employment. The only alternative would be to create yet another bubble to drive the economy.

A high trade deficit means that we have either a large budget deficit and/or low private savings. This is what in economics and finance is called an accounting identity: there is no way around this fact.

Getting the dollar under control

The story with the dollar is similar to the story with the Fed. As with the Fed, there is little ability for the public to directly influence a policy that is set by the Treasury with no obvious mechanisms for congressional input. However, the Treasury is susceptible to public pressure, just like any other government agency.

The first step must be to raise awareness of the importance of the dollar in determining the trade balance and therefore both the number and mix of jobs in the economy. Although the topic is taught in every introductory economics class, few people in Washington policy debates understand the basics of the relationship between the value of the dollar and the trade balance. For this reason, the issue is, at best, part of a larger laundry list of concerns to be raised in the context of trade. Few recognize that lowering the value of the dollar will almost certainly have more impact than all the other items on the list put together.

In addition to understanding the economic impact of an overvalued dollar, the public should also recognize how interests divide on this issue. It is standard practice for politicians to treat dollar policy as something outside of the control of the U.S. government. Consider, for example, what we have read about the need for the U.S. to confront China over its currency "manipulation," that is, its practice of deliberately depressing the value of its currency against the dollar.

There are several aspects of this framing of the issue that are inaccurate. First, China has an explicit policy of pegging its currency to the dollar. This is not something it is doing in the dark when no one is looking, so the use of the term "manipulation" is not really appropriate. It is also worth noting that China is hardly the only country that pegs its currency to the dollar; many other developing countries do so as well. However, China is by far the biggest, and the others are likely to let their currencies follow the Chinese currency upward against the dollar.

Second, when the United States discusses currency values with China, it is in the context of a range of economic and non-economic issues. Because China is a great power, it does not just agree to whatever the United States demands from it. It makes concessions on some issues in exchange for concessions on other issues from the United States.

When U.S. negotiators confront China with their list of issues, one of which includes raising the value of the renminbi (RMB) against the dollar, they are not likely to get concessions on the RMB unless it is clearly identified as a top priority issue — one for which the United States is prepared to make concessions on other issues. If the U.S. negotiators do not bring out the currency issue front and center, then the Chinese will understand that the U.S. government is not especially concerned about it.

In fact, the Chinese would likely reach the conclusion that the U.S. negotiators were just raising the currency issue for show; our negotiators could honestly claim that they had pressed the Chinese government to raise the value of its currency, but the Chinese refused to yield. This sort of charade has allowed both the Obama and Bush administrations to claim that they are concerned about the overvaluation of the dollar and that they are doing what they can to rectify the situation.

Yet the United States has the power to unilaterally take steps to lower the value of the dollar against other currencies. It can be difficult or even impossible to keep the price of a currency above the market-clearing level, but it is always possible to push down the value of a currency, through relatively simple mechanisms.

One route, which is completely legal under all U.S. trade agreements, would be to tax the interest earnings of a country that we believe is maintaining an undervalued currency against the dollar. For example, the United States could impose a 20 percent tax on all of the earnings on dollar assets held by China's central bank or state-owned enterprises. It could then raise the tax by 10 percentage points a year if China refused to reduce its dollar holdings and allow the value of its currency to rise.⁶⁹ This would eventually impose a sizable penalty on the Chinese government, making its high-dollar policy ever more costly.

The U.S. government has other, more extreme options available to force down the value of the dollar against the RMB. One would be to simply establish an exchange rate that set a much higher price for the RMB. For example, the U.S. could set a price of 4 RMB to the dollar instead of the rate of close to 6.6 RMB to the dollar set by the Chinese government. While it would be illegal, under Chinese law, for Chinese companies or citizens to sell currency to the Treasury at this U.S.-set rate, given the enormous potential gains, it is likely that many Chinese companies and wealthy individuals would find ways to evade the law. This could have the effect of making the U.S. Treasury rate the effective exchange rate in the rest of the world.⁷⁰

The existence of these sorts of unilateral steps to force down the value of the dollar against the RMB is important because it establishes that the United States is not helpless in its negotiations with China. If there were sufficient determination to bring down the value of the dollar, then the United States could pursue one of these channels.

In the real world, the sort of currency war that these measures might imply would never materialize. If the United States were prepared to take unilateral measures to push down the value of the dollar, then China's government would almost certainly look to negotiate an increase in the value of its currency. It would inevitably demand concessions in other areas, but it is difficult to imagine China insisting on maintaining a low value for its currency as a fundamental principle. After all, it is not being asked to cede territory to the United States.

Know how the game is played

At the end of the day, the U.S. Treasury has enormous ability to influence the value of the dollar. It is certainly capable of forcing the dollar down against the Chinese RMB and other important currencies, if this is a major goal of economic policy. So far, a lower-valued dollar has not made the cut. A high-valued dollar is in the interest of the financial industry and other powerful actors, and so the Treasury Department has not pursued a lower-valued dollar as major goal in negotiations with China or anyone else.

To this point, there has been little pressure to pursue a lower-valued dollar. The general public and many progressives are profoundly confused on this issue, as with so many others. We tend to view a high dollar as a point of pride, and feel it would be a humiliation if the dollar were to fall in value, or, even worse, lose its standing as the world's preeminent currency.

Deficit hawks, for example, routinely warn that a drop in the value of the dollar is a possible outcome of the failure to reduce the deficit. In fact, the standard economic models predict that a drop in the dollar is one of the outcomes of succeeding in the reduction of the deficit. This should be a desired outcome of a deficit-reduction policy, as net exports would displace government spending or consumption in generating demand.

In the case of the Treasury's power over the dollar, as with the Fed's control of short-term interest rates and its power to hold Treasury assets, progressives and the larger public are profoundly confused. There are few areas that are more important in determining economic outcomes, yet they are hardly in the debate. This is sort of like playing football without knowing that the way to score points is to get the ball into the other team's end zone. It's hard to win when you don't know how the game is played.

Chapter 8—Trade in an Overvalued-Dollar World

Combining a U.S. trade policy that encourages firms to move production abroad and a Treasury policy that overvalues the dollar is comparable to blowing up a levee and shoving ordinary workers into the current. The overvalued dollar directly handicaps U.S.-made products in international competition by making imports relatively cheap and exports relatively expensive. Trade deficits are the result, and they appear in the sectors of the economy that are exposed to international competition.

It just so happens that the sectors that have been subjected to international competition through trade agreements — first and foremost manufacturing — disproportionately employ non-college-educated workers. The loss of relatively good-paying jobs for workers without college degrees puts downward pressure not only on the wages of manufacturing workers but on the wages of all workers without college degrees.

Alternative dollar and trade policies could relieve the pressure on wages, and state-level policy measures and even private initiatives could potentially circumvent the regressive currency and trade policies at the national level.

As a practical matter, it will be difficult politically to alter dollar policy so that the value of the dollar is brought down to a level that is consistent with balanced trade. Dollar policy is conducted outside any arena in which the public has much say.

However, it should be possible to restructure the contours of trade policy so that more than just manufacturing workers are subject to international competition. Trade can be restructured in such a way that the most highly educated and highly paid workers are forced to compete against lower-paid counterparts from the developing world, by making it easier for foreign-born professionals to work in the United States and for U.S. residents to go abroad to receive highly skilled services.

This policy shift would have a direct, positive outcome, since forcing down the wages of the most highly paid workers would reduce the costs of goods and services they produce, thereby raising the real wage to all other workers.

Bringing the threat of international competition to the most highly paid workers would also be beneficial for the future of U.S. dollar policy. A high dollar would then put downward pressure on the pay of doctors and lawyers and other high-paid workers and increase their risk of job loss. It is a safe bet that these powerful constituencies would act as important lobbies pushing for a lower-valued dollar.

In effect, subjecting these highly paid workers to international competition would also push them into the current created by the overvalued dollar. Disempowered manufacturing workers are not in a position to have much impact on the value of the dollar. But if large numbers of doctors and lawyers suddenly saw their incomes threatened by imported services made cheap by an overvalued dollar, these professionals would likely be far more effective in lobbying to bring the dollar down to a sustainable level.

A lower dollar would be an important side benefit of pushing these groups of more highly educated workers into the current where ordinary workers have been treading water for nearly three decades. While the United States is likely to be able to borrow substantial amounts of money from foreign investors long into the future, it is not going to be able to run trade deficits equal to 5 to 6 percent of GDP indefinitely. Switching back to domestic production at some point is likely to be a costly process, since in many cases the U.S. now lacks capacity to meet its domestic demand. This switch would likely involve some supply disruptions and higher prices.

However, the shift toward more domestic production will be more painful the longer it is delayed. Each year we lose more physical capacity in key areas, while unemployed workers lose their skills. Making the adjustment sooner rather than later, and bringing trade closer to balance, will help to get the economy on a sustainable growth path with less disruption.

The simple act of pushing more dollars overseas helps to increase pressure on the dollar. Other things equal, spending tens or hundreds of billions of dollars each year buying the services of foreign professionals will directly lower the value of the dollar and improve the competitive position of U.S. manufacturing.

Alternatively, countries that peg their currency against the dollar may opt to increase their purchases to offset this effect, but this will make their pegging policy even more expensive than it already is. These countries already stand to lose large amounts of money on their dollar holdings; if we start buying professional services from abroad, they will stand to lose even more. There is presumably a limit to how much money China and other developing countries are prepared to lose subsidizing the purchases of consumers in the United States.⁷¹

The economics and politics of beating up professionals

The idea of deliberately trying to reduce the wages of physicians, lawyers, and other relatively high-paid professionals may seem perverse to many progressives. After all, these people make good salaries, but they are not the really big winners from the upward redistribution of the last three decades. Besides, for many progressives some of our best friends (including economists) are in these highly paid professions.

But several important points on this issue are poorly understood. First, everyone's salary is a cost to someone else. Paying our doctors twice as much as those in other wealthy countries, which is roughly what we do, has the same impact on the living standards of non-doctors as if we imposed a tax of $100 billion a year (about $300 per person) to hand each doctor in the country a $100,000 check. A policy of taxing truck drivers and school teachers so that doctors' pay can average more than $200,000 a year would strike almost anyone as outrageous, but policies that protect U.S. doctors from effective competition with their foreign counterparts have the same effect.

As a practical matter, highly paid professionals tend to be conservative, especially on economic issues, and so measures that reduce their pay would have political as well as economic benefits. In addition to increasing the real income of nonprofessionals, lower pay for professionals would reduce their political power (less money, less power). It might also cause many of these professionals to become less conservative when they see that their lives can be made every bit as insecure as the lives of an auto or construction worker. While it is true that excessive compensation of doctors and lawyers is dwarfed by the extremes of corporate CEOs and Wall Street financiers, doctor and lawyer pay is nonetheless a substantial drain on the incomes of ordinary workers. A progressive agenda cannot support protectionist measures that continue to redistribute income upward to professionals.

Of course, measures designed to expose highly paid professionals to more competition will inevitably impact lower-paid workers within the same and related sectors. For example, a policy that facilitates medical trade (patients traveling internationally to receive medical services) will reduce demand not only for physicians but also for a wide range of workers in health care.

There is a view among many progressives that we have to structure our policies so that they don't harm anyone we care about. Yet, as a practical matter this is not possible. If we think that we have somehow protected all the affected parties, it is almost certainly because we have not fully considered the impact of the policy. For example, suppose we build a new airport or highway. These are great job-creating projects, but a new airport is likely to take away business and jobs from existing airports. Similarly, a new road will divert traffic from existing roads, and gas stations, motels, and stores along the older routes will lose sales.

Even if we create special funds to compensate affected workers, as has been proposed for coal miners in the case of restrictions on greenhouse gas emissions, the money must come from somewhere. The taxes needed to pay such displaced workers will lead to some job loss. The conservatives' argument about taxes having a negative impact on employment is generally true, though they typically overstate the size of the effect.

The point is that almost any policy that progressives want to promote will have losers among people whom we care about (the non-rich). That we choose to remain ignorant of those who lose out economically does not mean they don't exist. Ignorance is never good policy. We have to accept that there will be some losses and hardship and try to structure the economy in a way that ensures that those paying the cost will have other employment opportunities, and we need to structure the social safety net in a way that ensures those affected will be able to maintain a decent standard of living through any transition period.

If the right were as concerned about ensuring that no one in its ranks was ever harmed by its policies, it would oppose reductions in tax rates on the wealthy, since lower rates on high earners harm the accounting firms that specialize in creating tax dodges. Conservatives support policies that hurt particular segments of the business community all the time, but their expectation is that, on average, these policies will make the wealthy even wealthier. If progressives don't have the same attitude, then we should just acknowledge that we are playing games and not doing serious politics. That strategy is guaranteed to lose.

The bizarre logic of the trade ideologues

There is a peculiar view among the “free trade” lobby that somehow workers in the United States, because it is a wealthy country, should not be doing manufacturing work. Rather, we should all be employed in professional jobs that require college or even advanced degrees.

While the desire to see U.S. workers obtain more education and move up the skill ladder is commendable, the logic in the argument is warped. The reason that the United States loses manufacturing jobs to the developing world is that, with the same machinery and infrastructure, workers in the developing world can be every bit as productive as U.S. workers. But because they live in much poorer countries, workers in the developing world are willing to work for a fraction of the pay. As a result, auto workers with pay and benefit packages reaching $40 to $50 an hour can find themselves competing with workers in China or Mexico who receive pay and benefits less than a tenth as much.

However, the developing countries are also generating a workforce of skilled professionals who are prepared to work for much less money than their counterparts in the United States. Many Chinese engineers, computer programmers, and architects are every bit as skilled and creative as their counterparts in the United States, but they are willing to work for salaries that are a fifth or a tenth as much because they live in a poor country.

There is no logic whatsoever in the view that somehow the United States will remain dominant in highly skilled occupations, exporting the services produced in these areas to the rest of the world while importing manufactured goods from the rest of the world. It is perhaps a racist conception to believe that workers in the developing world somehow lack the capacity to compete effectively in skilled professions with people in the United States.

This view is especially bizarre given that many of the people who fill jobs in areas like computer engineering, conventional engineering, and other technical fields in the United States are of Indian or Chinese ancestry or are immigrants from these countries. To imagine that the United States can maintain an advantage over these countries in international trade involving these occupations would require a view that these engineers and designers can be effective when working in Silicon Valley or Seattle but suddenly become 80 or 90 percent less efficient if they return to their home countries or the countries of their forebears.

The United States is destined to import major quantities of highly paid professional services in the decades ahead, just as it now imports major quantities of manufactured goods. The argument for the benefit from these imports is the same as the argument for the benefit of importing manufactured goods: it allows us to buy these items at lower prices than if we relied on domestic production. This frees up income to purchase other goods and services, making us richer and increasing growth.

This is the nearly two-hundred-year-old argument for comparative advantage. It just turns out that the comparative advantages for the United States will not be where many economists and policy analysts believe they will be. Our advantage will not be exclusively in highly skilled professional services, although we will undoubtedly continue to have a large sector of our economy devoted to these activities. It is likely that the United States will end up producing in a wide range of sectors for both its domestic market and exports. In addition to highly paid professional services, this mix will also include tourism (an important growth sector for exports) and of course manufacturing.⁷²

The outlook for currency policy

As noted in Chapter 4, the Clinton administration began to promote an overvalued dollar when Robert Rubin took over as Treasury secretary. The Treasury’s direction of the IMF bailout of the East Asian countries following the 1997 financial crisis put muscle behind this policy. While the dollar has come down considerably from the peaks hit at the end of the 1990s, it must come down much further to close the United States’ chronic trade imbalance.

Both the Bush and Obama administrations have tolerated moderate declines in the value of the dollar, but neither has opted to push for a lower dollar as a matter of policy. Given the powerful interests who benefit from an overvalued dollar, most importantly the financial industry, it is unlikely that any president will deliberately push for a lower-valued dollar in the near future.

This means that we should expect that the dollar will continue to be overvalued for some time to come. It may trend downward but, barring a major change in the constellation of power in the country, the interest groups pushing to maintain an overvalued dollar are likely to continue to get their way. This means that in designing policy, we can take an overvalued dollar as a given.

Trade policy and the employment mix

The reason that the overvalued dollar leads to an upward redistribution of income and disproportionately hurts workers without college degrees is that it has been a deliberate goal of trade policy to subject these workers to international competition. The main objective of trade deals like NAFTA is to make it as easy as possible for manufacturing firms to relocate their operations to other countries. The trade deals' success can be measured by the more than five million manufacturing jobs lost (almost one-third of total manufacturing jobs) in the last 15 years.

Large-scale national campaigns organized to counter this trade policy over the last two decades have garnered considerable grassroots support and to a large extent have won over public opinion. Polls generally show that the public opposes NAFTA-type trade deals and sees them as a threat to jobs.⁷³

These campaigns have had some success in slowing the Clinton-Bush-Obama trade agenda. Most of the bilateral trade deals have been delayed for years, and the Doha round of the World Trade Organization has now been delayed for more than a decade. To make trade deals more palatable to the U.S. public, negotiators have sought to include labor rights and other provisions that might reduce the negative impact that the deals would have on manufacturing employment in the United States and improve conditions for workers in our trading partners.

However, labor rights and worker protection provisions would have at best a marginal effect on reversing the extent to which trade policy redistributes income upward. As a result of current trade policy, U.S. manufacturers already have access to a vast pool of relatively low-paid workers in China, India, and elsewhere in the developing world. It will make little difference if they can also get access to low-cost labor in Colombia or Panama as a result of a new trade agreement.

It is almost inconceivable that this access to low-paid workers in the developing world, having once been granted, would be taken away by canceling or substantially altering existing trade pacts. And so, for the foreseeable future U.S. manufacturing workers will be forced to compete with the lowest-paid workers anywhere in the world and be disadvantaged further by an overvalued currency.

If we cannot restore protection to less-educated workers or reduce the value of the dollar to a sustainable level, we can at least redesign trade policy so as to place highly educated, high-cost workers — doctors, lawyers, dentists, etc. — into direct competition with their low-paid counterparts in the developing world. The key to such an effort would be to identify the factors that make it difficult for qualified professionals from the developing world, or even from other wealthy countries, to practice their professions in the United States. In other words, we would seek to eliminate the barriers to a free flow of professionals into the United States in the same way that NAFTA sought to eliminate the obstacles to manufacturers relocating their operations in Mexico.

These barriers take a variety of forms, immigration policy being one. Since the provision of professional services is generally facilitated by the professional being physically located in the United States, restrictions on immigration effectively serve as restrictions on free trade in these services. While restaurants and construction companies have little to fear from not following the law in hiring immigrant employees, a hospital would risk serious sanctions if it hired doctors without the appropriate visas, even if the doctors met U.S. licensing standards.⁷⁴

Getting trade agreements that allow free trade in professional services, and thereby put downward pressure on the wages of those at the top end of the labor market and reduce the cost of the services they provide to less-educated workers, will be a tough sell. The immediate obstacle is that these professionals are extremely powerful interest groups, wielding their influence both directly, through organizations like the American Medical Association and American Bar Association, which can be counted on to lobby against measures that increase the exposure of their members to international competition, and indirectly, through their control of public debate.

The categories of professional workers who are most protected from international competition overlap hugely with the categories of workers who write and report the news, staff congressional offices, and teach at colleges and universities. They are the people who shape the debate over policy issues like trade. And they use their control over this debate to prevent the notion of increased international competition in professional services from entering public debate.

In the mid-1990s there was a debate over efforts to tighten restrictions on the number of foreign medical residents entering the United States. The two sides in the debate were the physicians' organizations, who contended that foreign-born doctors were driving down the wages of doctors born in the United States, and community health groups, who argued that foreign-born doctors were serving underserved areas like rural areas, places where native-born doctors did not want to practice.⁷⁵

Remarkably, no one was cited in this debate who gave the standard economists' argument that increasing the number of qualified foreign-born doctors in the country would drive down the wages of native-born doctors. This outcome would be good for the economy, since it would reduce the cost of medical care to patients, but the argument was not on the radar screens of the people reporting on the issue because the idea that reducing the wages of doctors could be positive is simply an alien notion.

While reporters and their editors understand completely how reducing the wages of retail clerks, auto workers, and school teachers can provide savings to consumers or taxpayers, they have difficulty applying the same logic to the pay of highly educated professionals. This disconnect likely stems from the fact that they are closely connected and identify with these professionals. Probably someone in their immediate family is a highly paid professional. They live in the same neighborhoods as doctors and lawyers; their kids go to school with the children of doctors and lawyers. For reporters and editors, highly paid professionals are friends and relatives, not people to be viewed as a cost of production.

The extent to which this class controls public debate makes it difficult to organize efforts to change policy. When almost every written and broadcast news story conceals the ways in which policy is designed to transfer income from ordinary workers to the most highly paid professionals, it raises the policy bar considerably, and it makes it difficult for most of us to even conceptualize what it is taking place.

Of course, consumers also have personal relationships with professionals. Patients usually like their doctors; otherwise they would get a different doctor if they had the option. Most patients do not want to force their doctors to take a big cut in pay, especially since patients generally are not covering the bulk of the cost themselves, but instead have it covered by a private insurer or the government.

Patients might view the matter differently if they were told that an average family of four is effectively paying a tax of $1,200 a year to allow doctors in the United States to enjoy higher living standards than doctors in other wealthy countries.⁷⁶ The savings from eliminating these excess physician salaries far outweigh the revenue to be gained from ending the Bush tax cuts on the wealthy.

It is essential that people understand that the income of professionals is a cost to them, and that immigration and trade policies that restrict access to lower-cost alternatives is government intervention in the market. Conservatives understand fully that the pay of an ordinary worker is money out of their pockets, which is why they are so eager to use the levers of government to reduce it. However, few progressives seem to recognize the symmetry in the relationship: the money that goes to high-income individuals is money out of everyone else's pocket. This should be about as simple as it gets but, due to the bias in policy discussions, we rarely hear this obvious point.

Economists are almost completely useless in this respect because, like reporters and news editors, they belong to the same class of highly paid professionals. As a result, they bristle at the idea that anyone would apply trade theory to educated, accomplished people like themselves.⁷⁷

Economists have also been known to put forward the "Mexican Avocado Theory of International Trade." Under this theory, going to the grocery store and finding an avocado that was grown in Mexico is proof that the United States has free trade in agricultural products. This is obviously an absurd extrapolation. The United States has a wide range of restrictions on importing agricultural products; the fact that it is still possible to buy a Mexican avocado proves nothing. Yet economists often apply this theory to convince themselves that we have free trade in professional services. For example, when an economist encounters a professional who is foreign born (e.g., the family's physician or the economist in the next office), the economist assumes there are no restrictions on foreign-born professions working in the United States.

As a practical matter, almost no trade barrier ever leads to an absolute prohibition on trade. The point of barriers is that they raise the cost of importing items, causing us to import less of the protected item. The barriers to foreign-born professionals working in the United States do not completely exclude them from working in the United States; they simply make it more difficult than necessary. A certain number of intelligent hard-working foreigners will overcome these barriers in order to take advantage of the better conditions enjoyed by professionals in the United States than in their home countries. However, the more typical foreign-born professional may not be prepared to make the necessary sacrifices. This leads to losses both for them and for consumers in the United States.

An economist once said to me, for the purpose of dismissing the notion that there were barriers preventing foreign-born economists from working in the United States, that "all the best economists I know were born in India." While this might well have been true, if the United States actually had free trade for economists then it is likely that the vast majority of the mediocre economists he knew would also have been born in India. It's not surprising that some of the best economists in India have been able to overcome the barriers to working in the United States. But if we actually had free trade, the typical economist in India would have the opportunity to work here too.

One of the misleading arguments often used to deny the existence of protectionist barriers that artificially inflate the salaries of professionals is to claim that foreign-born professionals are typically not trained to U.S. standards. This may be true in many cases, but it raises a chicken-and-egg question. If foreign-born professionals are largely excluded from working as professionals in the United States, why would they bother to train to U.S. standards? They would train to meet the standards in their home country. But if they knew there were an open door, offering the same opportunities as a professional born in New York or Los Angeles, then a huge number of foreign-born professionals would train to these standards. This is where trade agreements like NAFTA come in.

If the United States had wanted to open up professional services like medical care and the legal profession in the same way that it opened up trade in manufacturing goods, it would have written up clear guidelines for the standards that Mexican doctors and lawyers would have to meet in order to have free access to practicing their professions in the United States. The agreement also would have established testing systems within Mexico (by U.S.-certified testers) that would allow Mexican professionals the convenience of obtaining the necessary certification in their home country before committing themselves to the expense and disruption of moving.

Once they obtained their certification, Mexican professionals would have the same opportunity to practice their profession in the United States as native-born professionals.⁷⁸ This would be a situation where both the immigrant professionals and U.S. consumers come out as winners: the professionals would view themselves as better off, and the influx of a large number of qualified Mexican professionals would reduce the amount that people in the United States would have to spend on health care, legal fees, and a variety of other services.

It will be important to structure this policy so that Mexico also benefits from having its professionals work in the United States. A tax on these professionals' wages that was repatriated to Mexico for the first 10 years would likely total enough money to train several professionals for each one who goes to work in the United States. This arrangement can help to ensure that Mexico doesn't suffer a shortage of doctors or other skilled professionals because they have all gone to work in the United States.

Getting around federal trade policy

The irony of free trade is that the market actually favors progressive outcomes. If the barriers that protect the most highly paid professionals can be weakened or eliminated, the bulk of the population will benefit. Essentially, progressives should want a free market.

While it is simple to envision policy changes that would ensure that trade benefits the bulk of the population rather than simply redistributing income upward, as a practical matter such policies have no chance in Washington for the foreseeable future. There is no organized constituency arguing for a forward-thinking trade policy that would benefit those at the middle and bottom, and the debate is completely controlled by people who benefit from the status quo.

However, there are arenas beyond Washington that might be more favorable.

One place where the battle could be contested is at the level of state licensing. States license doctors, lawyers, and most other professionals. While the point of licensing is ostensibly to ensure the quality of the services being provided and protect patients and other consumers, in reality professional groups use the process to protect their incomes. (Ask your state medical board how many doctors have lost their licenses because of malpractice over the last decade.)

It would be relatively easy to open up the licensing process to allow a far wider range of people to be admitted into the professions while still ensuring quality standards. For example, allowing doctors who have been licensed in countries with comparable standards to automatically be licensed in a given state could potentially give many more doctors the opportunity to practice in the state. Major hospitals, clinics, and other employers of large numbers of doctors ought to be natural allies in such a campaign, and insurers should welcome the opportunity to pay lower reimbursement schedules to doctors and other highly paid professionals.⁷⁹

Businesses looking for attorneys and universities seeking teachers ought to welcome the opportunity to hire foreign lawyers and foreign professors who will work at much lower wages than the current workforce.

Outsourcing offers another means to take advantage of lower-cost professional services — just ask the manufacturers who have used outsourcing to employ workers at lower wages. In the case of medical care, the obvious mechanism is medical trade.⁸⁰ While it would not pay to go abroad for routine medical procedures (except for people living near the Canadian or Mexican borders), for more complex medical procedures, the savings can be so large as to cover travel expenses and an extended stay overseas for patients and their family members.

Table 8-1 compares the price of major medical procedures in India, Thailand, and Singapore with the price in the United States. The prices shown are taken from modern hospitals that have state-of-the-art medical technology and doctors who are trained to Western standards. There is no reason to believe that using these facilities would compromise the quality of the care received by the patient, although traveling halfway around the world to receive medical care is obviously a major inconvenience.

Table 8-1

Comparative costs of medical procedures, by country
Procedure	U.S.	India	Thailand	Singapore
Heart valve replacement	$160,000	$9,000	$10,000	$12,500
Heart bypass	$130,000	$10,000	$11,000	$18,500
Spinal fusion	$62,000	$5,500	$7,000	$9,000
Angioplasty	$57,000	$11,000	$13,000	$13,000
Hip replacement	$43,000	$9,000	$12,000	$12,000
Knee replacement	$40,000	$8,500	$10,000	$13,000
Hysterectomy	$20,000	$3,000	$4,500	$6,000
AMA-OMSS Governing Council (2007).

While no one should be forced to go overseas to get care (unfortunately, some uninsured are already in this situation), insurers could nevertheless provide incentives to patients to get their treatment at a lower-cost facility overseas. By sharing the savings, insurers could vastly increase the number of people seeking lower-cost care abroad. If an insurer can save $110,000 when a patient receives a heart bypass operation in Singapore rather than the United States, it could share perhaps $50,000 of the savings with the patient. Both come out ahead.

Of course, ensuring the quality of care in facilities in other countries would be vital. An international licensing organization that could certify the quality of facilities in foreign countries could be valuable in this respect. There would also be the need for clear legal rules to allow patients redress in the event of malpractice. Ideally, the host countries would tax medical trade and use the revenue to build up their health care systems to the benefit of their own populations.

State and local governments can advance the growth of medical trade by taking the lead themselves. They can offer insurance plans to their own workers that allow patients to share in the savings from having major medical procedures performed in overseas facilities. They can also secure substantial savings by allowing for foreign medical care in state Medicaid programs. If governmental units take the lead, private-sector employers are likely to follow. Also, large governmental units may be better situated than most private companies to ensure that high-quality care is provided to the first large groups of patients that go overseas for medical care.

State governments can carry through most of the legal and regulatory changes necessary to facilitate large-scale medical trade, and as the industry gained size it would reduce demand for medical services within the United States. Salaries within the industry, especially among the most highly paid professionals, would fall,⁸¹ as would the cost of health care.

Traveling overseas for medical care may seem a perverse alternative to simply fixing the domestic health care system in the United States. It is. But as the debate over President Obama's health care reform bill made clear, there is no realistic prospect of fixing the domestic health care system given the current distribution of power in the United States.

From the beginning, the Obama administration negotiated deals with most of the major interest groups in the industry: the pharmaceutical companies, the insurance companies, and the physicians' lobbies. This strategy ensured that the final product would not be a plan that substantially reduced the profits/incomes of any of the big actors. And if the incomes of the big actors are not reduced, then health care will eventually be unaffordable to individuals and the government.

It's possible to criticize the Obama administration's approach as a moral failure, but this is irrelevant. Officials in high office are always going to respond first and foremost to political concerns. President Obama is much less likely to face serious political consequences from having pushed a health care plan that depended on deals with the major interest groups in the industry than he would have had he pushed a plan that threatened these groups' incomes.

By contrast, President Obama would have faced serious political risks had he taken the more progressive route. Unless advocates of more progressive health care reform can bring some symmetry to the political calculus, there is little hope that President Obama or any other elected official in a position to effect change will go the progressive route.

It is nevertheless difficult to envision a scenario in which the political balance moves much in a progressive direction on this issue in the foreseeable future. If this is the case, then fixing the domestic health care system within the current political framework is not a viable path. There have to be ways to alter the structure of the debate so that more extensive reform becomes possible.

The experience of the U.S. auto industry provides an interesting, if painful, lesson in this respect. The control of the U.S. auto market by the Big Three automakers through the late 1970s allowed for secure employment with good wages and benefits for a large group of workers with limited education. Moreover, the factories provided a solid tax base for the governments where auto plants were located. Several generations of auto workers were able to attain a comfortable middle-class status. They were able to raise their children in decent neighborhoods, send them to good schools, and pay for their college.

The downside of this picture is that the limited competition among the Big Three meant that the industry became complacent. It produced cars of mediocre quality, and it was slow to innovate. Foreign competition changed that. This first became a major issue for the auto industry in the early 1980s, when high oil prices sent consumers to look for more fuel-efficient imports. The high dollar of the mid-1980s provided a large cost advantage to imports, which placed further pressure on the domestic manufacturers.

The pressure from import competition continued to build through the 1990s and into the last decade, eventually leading to the bankruptcy of General Motors and Chrysler. As a result of these bankruptcies and the continuing pressure on industry profits, the United Auto Workers (UAW) accepted large cuts in pay and benefits. The new starting wage for union auto workers under the most recent contract is just $14 per hour, an amount that would certainly not provide sufficient income to maintain a middle-class lifestyle and put children through college.

Gains in living standards that the UAW built up over many decades were wiped out when the survival of the domestic industry was called into question. However, it is important to recognize that this victory over the auto workers was not the result of a head-on confrontation. Rather, it was the result of several decades in which their position was eroded by the growing presence of foreign manufacturers with lower-cost structures.

The same sort of structures can be put in place to weaken the power of the domestic health care industry. Buying lower-cost health care services elsewhere will gradually erode demand for services from domestic health care providers in the same way as the growing presence of foreign manufacturers in the U.S. market eroded the demand for U.S. cars. However the big losers in this case will be highly paid physicians, not middle-income workers.

A side benefit of people taking advantage of lower-cost health care in other countries is that it would undermine much of the mythology that has grown around the U.S. health care system. Politicians who make grand statements about how the United States has the best health care system in the world should be greeted with howls of laughter, because it is obviously untrue. Yet they tend to get away with it. If a substantial portion of the population had direct experience with the health care systems in other countries, politicians would have to choose their words more carefully.

While state governments can attempt to remove barriers to private insurers taking advantage of other countries' health systems, there is a relatively simple measure that could be implemented at the national level. The federal government could allow Medicare beneficiaries to buy into the health care systems of countries with longer life expectancies than the United States. Per-person health care costs in other wealthy countries average less than half as much as in the United States. In fact, the bulk of the long-term deficit problem at the center of budget debates stems from the fact that this enormous gap in per-person health care costs is projected to grow over time.

This big cost difference means that there are enormous potential savings from allowing Medicare beneficiaries to receive their care in Canada, Germany, or other wealthy countries rather than in the United States. If Medicare beneficiaries, and dual beneficiaries of Medicare and Medicaid got their care in Canada and split the savings with the government, the gains to beneficiaries would easily dwarf the average Social Security benefit in the decades ahead, according to the government's projections. Splitting the savings would both provide beneficiaries with a substantial boost to their retirement income and allow the government to address its deficit.⁸²

Allowing for international Medicare vouchers does require action from Congress, which is an enormous obstacle. However, the usual conservative arguments against any policy that might benefit ordinary working-class people at the expense of the wealthy hold no water in this case. The proposal does nothing to disrupt the existing system of health care in the United States. Plus, it saves the government money and gives people a choice — exactly the sort of policy that any honest conservative would favor. The only real argument against the policy is that domestic medical and pharmaceutical industries would lose money. In other words, conservatives' inevitable opposition to the policy will illuminate the fact that the right's goals have nothing to do with small government or promoting the market and everything to do with redistributing income upward.

Free trade in professions other than medical care

It should be easy to make progress toward free trade in highly paid professions beyond medical care and dentistry, since a smaller share of most others' work is likely to be location-specific. To a substantial extent, the transfer of services overseas is already taking place. In the case of software design, the United States is already a large net importer of software from India.⁸³ The deficit is virtually certain to grow rapidly in the years ahead, with designers in the United States still receiving pay packages 5-10 times greater than their counterparts in India. And it's far cheaper to send a computer program from India to the United States than to ship a car from the other side of the world.

The story is similar in engineering. A vast pool of low-cost engineering labor in India and China is willing to work for wages that are far lower than those that engineers receive in the United States, and so governments and private corporations will be able to save large sums by substituting engineers in these countries for engineers in the United States. The same is true for architects, biomedical researchers, and workers in most other professional and technical fields.

Outsourcing top management

It is not just highly paid professionals who work for less in other countries than they do in the United States. The CEOs and other top executives of major corporations in Europe and Asia generally receive much lower pay — to the tune of millions of dollars each — than do American executives.

This pay gap suggests the possibility of large gains to the U.S. economy and to groups of workers who are not in top corporate management from taking advantage of lower-paid top management at foreign companies wherever possible. The best recent example is the bailout of Chrysler, which saved the jobs of tens of thousands of manufacturing workers both at Chrysler itself and in its chain of suppliers. Chrysler's rescue was accomplished in part by outsourcing top management and engineering roles to Fiat, an Italian car manufacturer.

U.S.-based companies have been telling the public for years that their first obligation is to their bottom lines and not to the U.S. economy. This may not be entirely true — they seem to be operating to serve the interests of top management first and foremost — but corporate managers are being truthful when they tell the public that they should not be expected to operate in the national interest.

But on the flip side, the public has no patriotic obligation to favor contracts with U.S.-based companies simply because the companies have a headquarters in the United States. Where foreign-based companies like Fiat can offer lower costs, at least in part because their executives are lining their pockets much less amply at the company's expense, progressives should jump at the opportunity to bring them on board. And if U.S.-based companies with bloated executive compensation packages are frozen out of public contracts at the local, state, and federal level, it will be a good thing. We should care that work is done in the United States, not whether we support an overpaid U.S.-based CEO.

Chapter 9—Reining in Finance

The financial sector serves an essential economic purpose by channeling money from savers to those who want to borrow, whether to buy a home, start a business, or pay for a college education. An efficient, well-run financial sector accomplishes these tasks with the fewest possible resources, meaning that it employs a small share of the workforce and pays salaries comparable to those earned elsewhere in the economy.

This is not the financial sector that the United States has today. Our financial sector is hugely bloated, and it is a massive source of waste in the economy. Measured as a share of private-sector GDP, the financial sector more than quadrupled between 1975 and 2009.⁸⁴ The enormous expansion would be justifiable if it resulted in a better allocation of capital, so that promising start-ups, say, could more easily raise funds than they could in the 1960s. A better allocation of capital would also mean that hare-brained schemes like Pets.com or Webvan would be less likely to receive funding today than in prior decades. But neither seems to be the case, or at least not obviously enough to justify the quadrupling of the sector as a share of GDP. Moreover, productivity growth, the most direct measure of the rate of innovation, was more rapid in the 1950s and 1960s than in the last two decades.

Another indication that the economy was being well-served by its booming financial sector would be that people felt more secure in their savings than they did four decades ago. Here again, the sector falls short. Not only have we experienced extraordinary volatility in the stock and housing markets over the last 15 years, but we are also less secure because we are far less likely today to have defined-benefit pensions at our workplaces. In the 1960s and 1970s, roughly half of all private-sector workers had a defined-benefit pension; by 2011 the share was less than 20 percent and falling.

The financial sector thrives on a huge amount of economic rent, which means it makes money through tax and regulatory arbitrage that provides no real benefit to society. For example, it became common in the 1980s and 1990s for government agencies like transit departments to sell off equipment, such as buses and subway cars, to private companies, and then lease it back. The logic of these deals is that the private company can take the depreciation on the equipment as a tax write-off, whereas as the state or local government agency cannot. The value of the tax break gets split between the company buying the equipment and the governmental agency selling it, and the bank or insurance company that worked out the deal gets a cut.

This sale/leaseback arrangement engineered a way for the federal government to subsidize the purchase of capital equipment through a tax benefit. This might be good policy, but it would be much more efficient if the law were simply changed to allow governments to take the tax deduction directly instead of going through this unnecessarily elaborate routine.

A similar scam, the "dead peasant" insurance policy, gained prominence when it was featured in Michael Moore's film, "Capitalism: A Love Story." A dead peasant policy is insurance purchased by a company on the lives of its lower-level employees. Wal-Mart reportedly purchased life insurance policies on 350,000 of its workers. Under these policies the company is the beneficiary and the employees generally do not even know that a policy has been taken out on their behalf. In fact, the relatives of employees typically will not know of the policy even after their family member has died.

Moore focused on the morbid nature of the policies — companies profit from the death of employees who never even knew they were insured. However, the fuller story is even more disturbing. Wal-Mart and other companies taking out dead peasant policies do not directly profit from the policies, in the sense that Aetna or some other major insurer is paying them back more in benefits than they paid in premiums. Insurers are not charities, or dummies.

Rather, the benefit is that dead peasant policies allow companies to control the timing of their earnings. If a company wants to show lower profits in 2011 for tax purposes or just smooth a growth rate, the dead peasant policy can be the perfect tool. The payment on 30,000 insurance policies in 2011 will be a deduction from profits in 2011. With a relatively large pool of insured workers, Wal-Mart can be reasonably confident of the rate at which they will die, and so it can count on collecting benefits that will boost profits in future years.

The result is that the dead peasant policy is in effect another financial instrument that allows corporations to adjust earnings in ways that minimize their tax liability.⁸⁵ And of course some brilliant finance people thought this one up, making themselves and their employer large amounts of money as a result. This is the sort of activity that has quadrupled the financial sector's share of the economy. It is not about allocating capital to its best uses or making savings more secure, it's about finding clever ways to rip off taxpayers, productive businesses, and other actors. The economy will benefit from having less of this sort of inefficient rent-seeking behavior. While this may have seemed like a radical assessment a decade ago, even the IMF now recognizes that there are substantial rents in the financial sector and that governments should adopt policies to reduce the sector's size.⁸⁶

Tremendous waste in the financial sector is not the only justification for reducing its size. The sector has also been a major cause of instability. It fueled both the stock and housing bubbles, and restructuring it to make it less bubble-prone would be a huge boost to the economy.

Finally, the financial sector is potentially harmful simply because of its outsized political influence, which it marshals to support policies that stand in direct opposition to the interests of the bulk of the population. It favors very low inflation, even at the cost of higher unemployment, and prefers a high dollar so that it can be a bigger actor in international finance. In contrast, for workers a high dollar is a major subsidy to their foreign competitors.

For these reasons, reducing the size of the financial sector is both good economics and good politics. A smaller financial sector that is more directly focused on its economic function should be at or near the top of every progressive's agenda.

While it is good politics and good economics, what it is not is a battle between those wanting regulation and those wanting an unfettered market. The financial sector in its current form is heavily dependent on the government for its survival. The insurance provided by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) and comparable government insurers is certainly not a market mechanism, and it can subsidize bank excesses if it is given without proper regulation.⁸⁷ In addition, banks enjoy the back-up liquidity guarantees provided by the Federal Reserve Board.

The largest banks also have the implicit support of the government's too-big-to-fail policy. Virtually no one believes that the government would allow J.P. Morgan or Goldman Sachs to simply go bankrupt. As a result, these huge banks are able to borrow funds at a lower cost than their smaller rivals, an arrangement that amounts to a substantial subsidy from the government to these large banks.⁸⁸

The elimination of these subsidies would be a genuine free-market approach, but the financial industry wants to maintain its insurance while removing restrictions that limit the risk to taxpayers. The banks' efforts do not represent a debate between those advocating an unfettered market and those who want government regulation. This is an argument with an industry that wants the taxpayers to provide it insurance but doesn't want to have to pay for the insurance and doesn't want to have any restrictions that prevent it from raising the risk to taxpayers. In other words, the industry wants to set up a fireworks factory in its basement and not even pay the standard homeowners' insurance rate.

While there was considerable rhetoric about reforming the financial sector and reining in its abuses following the collapse of the housing bubble and the ensuing financial crisis, little about the industry has changed as a result of the Dodd-Frank financial reform bill. The industry is still dominated by too-big-to-fail institutions that are now bigger than ever as a result of crisis-induced mergers.

In principle, regulators have expanded resolution authority that gives them a non-bankruptcy alternative to address a Lehman or AIG-type situation in which a systemically important nonbank financial institution faces collapse. However, few believe that regulators would use resolution authority to allow a Goldman Sachs liquidation that left its uninsured creditors out in the cold. For this reason, the country's largest banks continue to be able to borrow at much lower interest rates than their smaller competitors. The basic story is simple: it's cheaper to borrow when the government co-signs your loans.

The progressive agenda on finance

In dealing with the financial industry progressives would do well to think like economists. We need the financial industry to connect borrowers with lenders in an efficient way, meaning that the industry uses as few resources as possible. A financial sector that employs few people is better than a financial sector that employs many people, at least if the smaller sector is as effective at connecting lenders and borrowers as the larger sector. An economy is efficient when it employs its resources in productive tasks. We do not need people shuffling financial assets back and forth in make-work projects.

Breaking up the big banks is a necessary part of financial reform for both political and economic reasons. As noted above, treating an institution as too-big-to-fail effectively amounts to a government subsidy to its top executives and shareholders. It is difficult to see any rationale for providing such a subsidy.

However, big banks are also politically powerful banks. The major Wall Street financial institutions have an extensive network of connections with the Treasury and the White House and key members of Congress — regardless of which party is in power — and they use these connections to defeat or dilute regulatory efforts that threaten their profitability. While other countries may have a tradition of an independent civil service that can effectively regulate large financial institutions, the United States does not. There is little reason to believe that regulators will be any more successful at standing up to the large banks in the future than they have been in the past.

The technical issues associated with breaking up large banks are not nearly as difficult as the banks' defenders have argued. The government does not actually have to break up the banks; it just has to tell the banks to break themselves up. This point is important because it would undoubtedly be difficult for regulators to figure out how to best disassemble a J.P. Morgan or Bank of America into manageable chunks.

However, there is no reason for regulators to ever be in that position. They need only set size limits to be reached by specific dates, with severe penalties for failing to meet the deadlines. For example, each of the six large banks could be given a deadline by which time it must have assets of less than $1 trillion, another deadline for getting its assets under $800 billion, a third for getting under $600 billion, etc. The bank would then face a penalty in the form of a tax on the assets it holds over the limit for the period of time it holds them. The top executives of these banks know the companies they manage and they know how to best divide the companies in a way that maximizes the value to shareholders.

In addition to reducing the size of the largest banks, we also need to re-introduce a Glass-Steagall-type separation between insured banking activities and speculative transactions. The public interest requires that we ensure the soundness of the banks that maintain the system of payments, and this is why we have deposit insurance and the protections afforded by the Fed and the FDIC. There is no comparable interest in protecting institutions like investment banks and hedge funds that are engaged in more speculative activities, and so banks that benefit from deposit insurance should not be engaged in such activity.

This wall between banking and speculation was the intention behind the Volcker Rule that was included in the Dodd-Frank financial reform law of 2010. The Volcker Rule prohibits insured banks from trading on their own accounts. While this is consistent with the original intention of Glass-Steagall, it is not clear that it will be possible to enforce a narrow restriction like the Volcker Rule as opposed to a broader Glass-Steagall prohibition on combining commercial and investment banks.

The enforcement problem stems from defining trading on a bank's own account as opposed to trading on behalf of clients. Banks that act as market makers in stocks and other assets will inevitably take positions for periods of time, buying an asset from clients who want to sell and arranging the purchase of an asset to fill orders for customers. Distinguishing trades that are necessary to this market-making role from trades transacted by the bank for its own gain will not be an easy job for regulators.

The public will always be at a disadvantage in this situation because the financial industry will heavily influence the rules set by regulators. The design of these sorts of rules requires specialized expertise in the nuts and bolts of the financial industry. Few people outside of the financial industry have this expertise. Since there are potentially tens of billions in profits at stake in the specifics of these rules, the industry is prepared to spend substantial sums to ensure that they are written in a way that is not overly restrictive. Comparable expertise on the other side is rare, and this creates a strong bias for regulators to adopt an industry-friendly position.

For this reason, a clear separation between conventional banking and investment banking, like the one imposed by Glass-Steagall, may be the only effective way to keep banks with insured deposits from taking excessive risks. It is worth noting that the repeal of Glass-Steagall did not contribute in any major way to the inflation of the housing bubble or the subsequent financial crisis. Most of the major investment banks did buy up commercial bank subsidiaries that fed them mortgages for securitization, but this was a minor part of the story. Investment banks acquired the vast majority of the junk loans they securitized during this period on the open market.

However, just because allowing banks with government-insured deposits to engage in speculative activity did not cause the last crisis does not mean it will not cause the next one. There is no obvious reason that a bank that receives government insurance for a substantial portion of its operations should be allowed to take excessive risks in its other operations. The banks argue that they will keep the insured and speculative portions of their operations strictly separate. If this is so, then why operate them both? There are no economies of scale or scope achieved by bringing them together under a single corporate roof.

Even the supposed convenience of providing customers with one-stop shopping, where they can bank, buy insurance, and invest in the stock market, does not hold water on closer inspection. If consumers really want to be able to conduct business in all three areas at the same time, there is nothing to prevent an independent insurer or brokerage house from sharing a building with a bank.

Securitization and mortgage mayhem

The collapse of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac has left the future of housing finance wide open. Unfortunately, the solutions on the table are more likely to enrich the financial industry than promote homeownership.

Before considering the prospects for the reform of Fannie and Freddie, it is worth discussing the benefits of homeownership. Over the last seven decades, politicians from both parties have pushed homeownership as a ticket to the middle class. This view of homeownership ignores much evidence and shows sloppy thinking.

First, homeownership involves large transaction costs. The combination of realtors' fees, mortgage origination fees, inspection fees, and other costs associated with buying and selling a home are likely to push the combined purchase and sale costs to close to 10 percent of the home's price, or $20,000 on a $200,000 home. Averaged over a long period these costs will diminish, but for someone who lives in a home for five years or less they loom large. This means that anyone who is not in a stable employment or family situation in which they can expect to stay in the same place for five years or more would be best advised not to buy a home.

A second point is that home prices on average only rise with the overall rate of inflation. This means that owning a home is not necessarily a good investment. A standard 30-year fixed-rate mortgage is one way to effectively force people to save, since mortgage holders accumulate equity over time. However, other mechanisms for savings can offer higher returns. In many cases, people would be better off renting and placing money in a retirement fund than being a homeowner.

Third, homeownership can be a risky investment. This was not only true during the housing bubble, which made a home purchase an almost guaranteed losing investment at its peak, but also more generally. While in some areas home prices rise substantially more than inflation, in others they fall far behind inflation.

Furthermore, the prospect for home prices in many cases is likely to be highly correlated with the area's employment prospects. For example, home prices in Detroit have followed the ups and downs of the auto industry. The same is true for many other areas where a single industry or even a single employer dominates a city's economy. This creates a situation in which the value of a worker's major asset, his or her home, is dependent on the same forces that determine the health of the worker's employer.

Having your job and your home's value tied to the same thing is like putting all your retirement savings into the stock of the company you work for. If the company takes a downturn, you run the risk of losing both your job and most of your savings. This is roughly the situation faced by tens of thousands of unemployed homeowners in the Detroit area and hundreds of thousands around the country. They have lost their jobs and are also faced with the prospect of selling their homes at large losses.

While the specific situations that many workers find themselves in may have been unpredictable, the risk was 100 percent predictable. The idea that homeownership is somehow a secure investment immune to the ups and downs of the economy is nonsense. The fact that the downs are associated with periods of unemployment makes the risks even greater.

In spite of these cautions, one can still argue that the government has an interest in promoting homeownership as a way to provide secure housing and a mechanism for savings. However, this does not mean that homeownership is a sure ticket to the middle class or that more homeownership is always better than less.

The most obvious way that the government subsidizes homeownership is through the mortgage interest deduction. However, the deduction is an inefficient mechanism for helping low- and middle- income people buy homes because it is worth less to families in lower income brackets, many of whom do not even itemize their deductions. The overwhelming majority of the benefit goes to the upper-middle class and the wealthy. A simple way to increase the subsidy to lower-income families would be to change the deduction into a refundable tax credit of some amount (e.g., 15 percent). The additional cost could be covered by reducing the availability of the subsidy for higher-income homeowners. In any case, a credit for mortgage interest can be used to make the subsidy as large as is desired.

This point is important in the context of restructuring Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, because having a government role in the mortgage financing process effectively amounts to a second source of subsidy to homeownership. It is not clear why it is necessary to create a second channel through which the government subsidizes homeownership. Fannie Mae's establishment in 1937 created a secondary market for mortgages, which ensured that banks in different regions could secure the necessary capital to issue new loans even if they had a large stock of mortgages. Fannie Mae was an important innovation that played a major role in promoting ownership in the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s.

However, with a much more developed national financial system there is no obvious reason that the government needs to create a secondary mortgage market. Banks can both sell mortgages without government guarantees and tap the national (as opposed to regional) credit market to obtain additional deposits if they find themselves lacking money to lend.

In this context current proposals to recreate a Fannie/Freddie type system that would have the government guarantee mortgage-backed securities seem to be more a subsidy to the financial industry than to homeowners.⁸⁹ If the goal is to provide additional subsidies to low- and moderate-income homeowners, then a sizable tax credit for mortgage interest ought to do the trick. There is no reason to create a separate system of finance.

Put another way, a government guarantee of mortgage-backed securities is most directly a government subsidy to securitization and only very indirectly a subsidy of homeownership, and certainly not a subsidy that progressives should support.⁹⁰ A structure of securitization that arises through the workings of the market might be a good way to allocate capital, but creating such a structure should not be the explicit goal of government policy. There may be a public interest in subsidizing home ownership, but there is no public interest in subsidizing mortgage securitization.

Universal retirement accounts

Another way in which to downsize the financial sector is to reduce the fees associated with its management of 401(k)s and other types of retirement savings accounts. These fees average more than 1.0 percent of the assets held in the accounts and in many cases exceed 1.5 percent. This is a huge drain on workers' savings, and the money paid out in fees comes directly out of the return in these accounts. Over 30 years, a 1.0 percent annual fee will reduce total returns by almost 25 percent. If the fees average 1.5 percent, the reduction will be 35 percent. In addition, the financial industry typically charges fees of around 10 percent for turning an accumulation into an annuity when a worker retires.⁹¹

These sorts of fees are pure waste. The fees for the federal employee Thrift Savings Plan average less than 0.15 percent of the money in the accounts. Well-run private plans, like Vanguard, keep their fees under 0.25 percent of account balances. If the average savings on a well-run plan is equal to 0.85 percent of the money in the funds, the cumulative savings over the course of a decade could be more than $900 billion.

The government could offer a major service by making a version of the Thrift Savings Plan available as an option to every worker in the country.⁹² This sort of voluntary system can also be put in place at the state level. Several states were close to implementing such a plan before the recession refocused policy makers' attention on other issues and made even the modest seed money needed for starting such a system unaffordable. (Once a plan is up and running, it would be fully paid for from fees charged to participants.)

There is widespread recognition across the political spectrum of the need to increase retirement savings,⁹³ and there is a great deal of evidence that a simple government-managed retirement account system can be more efficient than privately managed 401(k)s or IRAs. Why not give people the choice and let them decide for themselves?

The management of public pension funds

The financial industry makes a considerable sum from managing public pension funds, but there is good reason to question whether the industry is always acting in the best interests of the pension funds for which it works. For example, New York financier Steven Rattner, who also served a stint in the Obama administration overseeing the auto bailouts, agreed to pay a $10 million fine to end a suit charging that he made payoffs to gain oversight of $150 million in New York State pension funds.⁹⁴

If investment fund managers are prepared to make payoffs to land contracts, then it is a safe bet that the state is not getting the best deal for managing its pension fund assets. This is a case where a little bit of transparency might go a long way. It should be possible to go to a pension fund website and see the exact terms of every management contract the fund signed, including the representatives of the fund who approved the contract. The pension fund should also show the returns, both before and after fees, of any money managed by private investors. Compiling and posting this information on the web every six months or each year should involve no more than a few hours of clerical work. Once it was posted anyone should be able to recognize any contracts that appear to be excessive or any returns that substantially underperform the market. Pension fund managers with a habit of directing investments to underperforming assets could be easily identified by any interested beneficiary or reporter.

Public postings may not completely prevent kickback schemes and sleazy deals, but the information should make such scams considerably more difficult to perpetuate. Furthermore, the cost is trivial, so there is no obvious reason for pension funds not to follow this practice.

Financial speculation tax

Another tool for downsizing the financial industry is a financial speculation tax of the sort the United Kingdom currently imposes on stock trades. This tax is a modest fee on trading stocks, bonds, options, futures, and other derivative instruments. It is both a revenue-raising measure and a way to discourage excessive speculation by raising its cost.

The sorts of fees involved with these trades would have almost no impact on normal financial activity. For example, the fee on stock trades in the United Kingdom is 0.5 percent on the purchase side of each trade. Since there has been a sharp reduction in trading costs over the last three decades as a result of computerization, a fee of this size would just raise trading costs back to their level of the mid-1980s, a time when the United States and the world had well-developed financial markets.

The potential revenue is substantial. The U.K. raises an amount that is close to 0.2 percent of its GDP (about 3 billion pounds per year, or the equivalent to about $30 billion a year in the United States) from just taxing stock trades. A tax applied to a broad range of assets should raise close to 1.0 percent of GDP, or about $150 billion a year in the United States and $1.8 trillion over the course of a decade. These sums dwarf the revenue from eliminating the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy.

This money would come almost entirely at the expense of the financial industry as opposed to actors in the productive economy. Several studies have shown that trading is very responsive to changes in costs, which means that if a tax raised costs, the volume of trading would fall sharply. In other words, the higher cost per trade (including the tax) would be offset for most people by a reduced volume of trading. For example, investors with $100,000 in a 401(k) who made $20,000 in trades every year before the imposition of a tax might reduce the volume of their trading to $10,000 a year after the tax. If the tax doubled the cost of the trade, then they would be spending no more on trading after the tax was imposed than they did before.

The only loser in this story is the financial industry. Money that had been going to the industry in fees would instead be collected by the government in taxes. The end result will be a smaller, more efficient financial industry, exactly what any good economist should want.

While a financial speculation tax would most likely have to be implemented at the national level, states could implement a financial activities tax (FAT) along the lines recommended by the IMF.⁹⁵ A FAT would be, in effect, a type of sales tax on financial activity of all sorts, most of which now goes largely untaxed. A 5 percent tax imposed on all financial-sector activity could raise more than $115 billion a year. This tax would not be as well-targeted on wasteful speculative trades as a transactions-based speculation tax, but its ease of implementation means that a progressive legislature in any state could tap a major new source of revenue at the expense of the financial sector. It is unfortunate that the tax will also hit ordinary transactions by average people, but it's hard to see why it is okay (in many states) to tax food but not to tax checking account fees or credit card penalties.

Corporate governance, the much-overlooked cesspool

It is remarkable that conservatives, who are inherently suspicious of governmental institutions, tend to pay little attention to the structure of corporate governance. Just as governments at all levels offer the opportunity for corruption, so do corporations. The big difference is that corporate managers — unlike their counterparts in government — operate largely in secret, control many of the rules under which they are re-elected, and make payoffs (in the form of directors' fees) to the people who determine their salaries.

Former Illinois Governor Rod Blagojevich gained national notoriety over the tape recordings of his discussion of plans to sell the Senate seat vacated by Barack Obama after he was elected president. The chief executive officers running most major companies can be viewed as little Blagojeviches, but unlike the governor they don't have to go through the trouble of breaking the law to get more money into their pockets.

In most corporations, CEOs play a large role in selecting the board that determines their pay. If they decide they want more compensation, whether in straight pay or in the form of an increased bonus or pension, they are likely to have a receptive audience. After all, board members are typically paid several hundred thousand dollars a year for attending four to eight meetings, and they will naturally be grateful to the person who gave them this plum job and who could take it away from them if they prove uncooperative. The CEOs keep getting higher pay, the board members get to pocket $200,000, $300,000, or $400,000 a year, and everyone is happy.

Where do the stockholders fit into this picture? It's difficult for ordinary stockholders to organize, just as it is difficult for average voters to unite to ensure that their elected officials act in their interest. In addition to facing the same problems in organizing as voters face in local, state, or national elections, shareholders also must deal with the fact that corporate managers can rig the election rules to make it more difficult for shareholders to overturn management decisions.

For example, it is standard practice to treat uncast proxy votes as votes cast in support of management's position. This rule can make it all but impossible to pass a shareholder resolution on an issue like cutting the pay of top management. Also, if top management can count on the support of one or two major shareholders, who might be mutual fund managers, then it will be almost impossible for shareholders to overrule decisions on executive compensation or anything else.

Shareholders can always just sell their shares, and undoubtedly this is a wise move if corruption in a company gets out of hand. But it rarely gets out of hand, relatively speaking. In major corporations annual profits can easily reach $10 billion a year. If the CEO and top management overpay themselves by $200 million a year, their greed might translate into just 2 to 3 percent of corporate profits. Just as with government waste, this may be a big sum to the individuals directly involved, but it generally doesn't make much difference to the bottom line. In both cases, it is usually more difficult to weed out the waste than it is worth, which means that managers are likely to get away with excessive pay under the current system.

This discussion is especially relevant to the financial sector because there is nowhere else in the economy where pay has diverged so sharply from performance for shareholders. The top executives of companies like Lehman Brothers, Fannie Mae, and Freddie Mac received huge paychecks based on short-term profits, which encouraged them to take outsized risks that, in effect, were one-sided bets. Every year that the bets paid off allowed the CEOs and other top managers to put huge sums in their pockets. But if the bets went bad the CEOs could simply walk away with their prior earnings, and perhaps bonuses and a severance. After the executives drove their companies to bankruptcy, shareholders were left with little or nothing while the CEOs walked away with fortunes.⁹⁶

It is not difficult to structure contracts so that incentives are aligned more closely with the long-term performance of the stock and so that top management doesn't do well unless the shareholders do well. (We may be concerned about corporate stakeholders other than shareholders as well, but it would be a big step forward to have a pay structure that at least protected shareholders.) But the boards that set pay are working for the CEOs, not the shareholders, and so outsized pay packages are likely to persist unless there are major changes in the rules of corporate governance.⁹⁷

The outlandish CEO pay packages of today are a relatively new development. While CEOs have always been well paid, the ratio of executive compensation to the average worker's pay was in the range of 25 or 30 to 1 as recently as the 1970s, which would put CEO compensation in the area of $1.5-$2.0 million. By contrast, multiples of 200 or 300 to 1 are the norm today. One would be hard-pressed to argue that CEOs as a group are doing a better job now than in the 1950s and 1960s, when the country enjoyed its most rapid rate of productivity growth.

Moreover, CEO pay in the United States is hugely out of line with CEO pay in the rest of the world. The top executives of big companies like Volkswagen, Toyota, and Sony are likely to have pay packages in the low millions, not the tens of millions and certainly not hundreds of millions, like their counterparts in the United States. This level of compensation has not prevented these companies from finding executives who have been able to run the business profitably. The best guess to explain the huge difference in CEO compensation between the United States and other wealthy countries is that it is attributable primarily to the laws and norms of corporate governance, not the inherent workings of the market.

As discussed in Chapter 8, we should welcome other opportunities to find lower-cost top management. CEOs take this approach when they look for the lowest-cost workers, and the rest of us ought to take the same approach when it comes to top management.

We should also use every lever at our disposal, such as the power of pension funds, socially responsible investment funds, or socially minded individual investors to bring CEO pay back in line with international standards. This activism is not really a great leap in principle. CEOs are ripping off their companies. Why not use the market to overcome a problem of bad governance?

Chapter 10—Government-Granted Monopolies Are Not Small Government

One of the main problems facing progressives is that they do not control the terms of the debate. Nowhere is this more true than in the case of patents and copyrights. These are both government-granted monopolies and forms of interference in a free market. Yet these policies, under the guise of “intellectual property,” are treated as a natural part of the market. Enforcing them is treated as supporting the free market, whereas opposing them is viewed as government intervention.

Huge amounts of money are stake with these claims to property. We spend close to $300 billion a year on prescription drugs that would sell for around $30 billion in a competitive market. This difference of $270 billion a year is more than five times as large as the annual cost of President Bush’s tax cuts for the wealthiest 2 percent of the population. Computer software sales are more than $80 billion a year.⁹⁸ Sales of recorded music, movies, and video material easily come to more than $20 billion a year. Textbook sales alone total over $9 billion a year.⁹⁹ Video games account for another $25 billion in annual sales.¹⁰⁰ The patents and copyrights that protect these revenues are public policies, not individual rights. Intellectual property is actually mentioned in the Constitution, though it is not a right guaranteed to individuals by the Bill of Rights. The ability to convey monopolies for limited periods of time, like patents and copyrights, is one of the powers explicitly delegated to Congress, like the power to tax.

Furthermore, the power to grant patent and copyright protection is tied to a specific purpose: “to promote the progress of science and useful arts.” The language implies no individual right: the Constitution simply gives Congress the authority to create patent and copyright monopolies as a way to promote innovation and creative work. It does not require Congress to create these monopolies any more than it requires Congress to tax people. The policy question that needs to be addressed is whether patents and copyrights are the most effective mechanism for promoting innovation and creative work.

The case of drug patents

The serious issues that surround the efficacy of patents as a tool to promote innovation in a modern economy are especially striking in the context of drug patents.¹⁰¹ Patents tend to have a more pernicious impact in the case of prescription drugs than in most other sectors of the economy, for two reasons.

First, drugs are a standalone consumer product, rather than an innovation or a feature for which a company can negotiate with the patent owner to allow for its efficient use. For example, an auto manufacturer might negotiate for the use of a patented technology in the production of its cars. The efficient outcome is that the marginal cost of the patent is zero. In other words, the car manufacturer can either buy the patent outright or license it for a specific period of time, but its cost for using the patent on an additional car is zero. This is not possible with drugs, as the patented product is sold directly to patients.

The other major difference is that there is enormous asymmetry in knowledge about the product. The drug company will know much more about the effectiveness and safety of a drug than will the patient or even a well-informed doctor. The company has access to test results that are not in the public domain. This means that it is almost impossible to make a fully informed decision about the use of a particular drug.

It also matters that drugs involve people's health or even their lives. Most people will pay almost any price to protect their life or the life of a loved one. Giving the drug companies "monopoly control over potentially life-saving drugs is like allowing firefighters to negotiate their pay package with the homeowner when the house is on fire. Needless to say, firefighters would be very well paid under these circumstances, and drug companies raise enormous revenue under the patent system.

The importance of prescription drugs to our lives and health belies the fact that they are cheap. Few could not be profitably manufactured and distributed for less than $10 per prescription. The reason that we face moral dilemmas about paying $80,000 a year for a drug that may extend the life of an 80-year-old cancer patient by a few years is that we give drug companies patent monopolies that allow them to charge $80,000 a year. If the drugs were sold in a free market, we could avoid the dilemma and pay about $200 a year, making this a simple choice.

Of course, the research and testing necessary to bring a drug to market has enormous costs. But this expenditure has already been made when the drug comes on the market. The key goal of progressive policy should be to separate the payment for the research from the payment for the drug. If the payment for the research is made independent of the payment for the drug, then all drugs can be sold in a free market without patent monopolies, just as generic drugs are sold today.

The two main alternatives for financing research apart from the patent system are a prize system and direct public funding. Both would involve an expansion of public funding for biomedical research.¹⁰² Currently, the federal government spends $30 billion a year on biomedical research through the National Institutes of Health. For an additional $30 billion to $80 billion it could replace the research currently funded through the patent system. Even taking the higher figure, the government would soon recoup this cost through savings on drug expenses in Medicare, Medicaid, and other public health programs.

A prize system would effectively buy out patents from drug companies, with the price determined based on some measure of a new drug's effectiveness and importance. After buying the patent, the government would place it in the public domain, where any manufacturer could use it.

A system of direct public funding would pay for research in advance. Companies would contract with a government agency, for example, a much-expanded version of the National Institutes of Health. A limited number would receive large long-term contracts (e.g., lasting 10-12 years) to support research into specified areas. As the end of the contract period approached, companies could reapply for a contract based on their track record of achievement.

All the results, both preclinical and clinical, would be public, a transparency that should allow researchers to make informed assessments of the relative efficacy of different drugs and determine if some drugs are better for specific groups of individuals.¹⁰³ The patents would be in the public domain, and so the drugs developed through this system would be sold at generic prices.

Getting from the current system of patent monopolies to a system of free-market drugs will be a Herculean task. The pharmaceutical industry is enormously powerful, and it can be expected to use all its resources to prevent any major changes to the patent system. In addition, overhauling the way the country finances prescription drug research will undoubtedly sound scary to many people.

An intermediate step that might make the shift less scary and certainly make it less expensive would be to have public funding for the clinical testing of drugs, which, according to the industry, accounts for close to 60 percent of research costs, while leaving the preclinical research supported by patents. In this scenario, patents would be bought out for testing, with the results placed in the public domain. This arrangement would put an end to the worst marketing abuses by the drug industry and still allow drugs to be sold at their free-market price.

Potential allies among industry groups for this sort of shift include the small innovative drug companies that tend not to do well in the current system. Generally, these companies race to find a valuable patent before they run out of funding, with most not succeeding.

Another potential ally is insurers who want to save money on drug costs, but a large-scale restructuring of a major health care sector might hit too close to home for their comfort. In principle, even the large pharmaceutical companies could be allies, since there is no reason that they could not profit as much under either a prize system or a system of direct funding as under a patent system.

The real expertise of the major pharmaceutical manufacturers at present is their marketing, not their innovation. They typically buy many of the patents for the drugs they market from smaller startups. For this reason, a system that effectively eliminated the huge profits from the marketing of drugs that can be sold at monopolistic prices would undermine the companies' whole way of doing business. As a result, the big pharmaceutical companies can be expected to strongly oppose any major reform of the patent system.

But this is a case where the market can be used to undermine the industry's position. A substantial number of drugs currently flow into the United States from Canada and other countries who, rather than grant pharmaceutical companies unrestricted monopolies, instead set limits on the extent to which drug companies can exploit their patent monopolies. As a result, drug prices in Canada are 30 to 60 percent less than prices in the United States.

Progressives should promote this trade wherever possible. For example, by organizing bus trips from neighboring states into Canada to allow people to buy low-cost drugs, or by supporting efforts by state and local governments to fight federal restrictions on their ability to buy cheaper drugs from other countries for their workers' health care plans, their state Medicaid programs, and their residents more generally.

Progressives should also actively oppose conditions in trade agreements that force other countries to impose U.S.-type patent rules. Patent restrictions could be a life-or-death matter for tens of millions of people in the developing world who may be able to afford drugs at their market price now but will find the patent-protected price impossibly expensive. In addition, by extending the reach of U.S.-type patent rules, these trade agreements eliminate potential sources of low-cost drugs for people in the United States.

It is important to understand what is at stake here. The pharmaceutical industry wants government-imposed monopolies to allow it to make huge profits. The rest of us want free markets. The amount of money involved in this sector dwarfs the amount at stake in most government programs. When conservatives talk about $10 billion or $20 billion a year for child care or family assistance programs, we should turn the discussion to the drug industry which is costing $270 billion a year in higher payments for its patent-protected drugs. It is the pharmaceutical industry that wants big government and wants a powerful state that will arrest competitors who undercut its monopoly prices. Progressives should want a free market.

Copyright is big government in your bedroom, not the free market

Copyrights for books, recorded music, movies, video games, software, and other items present the same sort of issue as patent protection for prescription drugs. Items that would essentially be available at zero cost in a free market can instead command high prices because the government grants copyright monopolies. While the consequences of copyright protection are not as pernicious, — in the sense that people's lives generally do not depend on access to copyrighted material, — the cost to the public of copyright protection is enormous. Including software, the public spends more than $100 billion a year for items that would be available at much lower or even zero cost in a free market.

In addition to the direct cost in the form of above-market prices, copyright enforcement in the Internet age also incurs enormous costs. And the government has eagerly assisted the publishing, entertainment, and software industries in their efforts to protect and extend their monopolies.

Many of the measures taken are absurd. For example, the government has repeatedly extended the period of copyright (now 95 years after the death of the author) and applied the extensions retroactively. This is bizarre: the purpose of copyright monopolies is to provide incentives for creative work, and it is impossible to provide incentives retroactively. These retroactive extensions are sometimes dubbed the "Mickey Mouse Law," since Disney, hoping to keep its copyright on Mickey Mouse in force further into the future, was a major proponent of the extensions.

Enforcement actions have involved police breaking into dorm rooms and high school kids' bedrooms in search of computers allegedly used to download copyrighted material without authorization. Police arrested a Russian computer scientist after an academic talk in Denver for work he had done on breaking encryption codes in Russia (where it was completely legal). Copying devices have been banned from the market because they did not have adequate safeguards to protect copyrighted material. In one civil prosecution, a young mother in Minnesota was fined hundreds of thousands of dollars for using her computer to share two dozen copyrighted songs. The Recording Industry Association of America has even developed propaganda courses on the evils of unauthorized reproductions (a.k.a. pirated copyrighted material).

This effort to enforce copyright is both very big government and very wasteful. No genuine "small government conservative" would support this sort of extraordinary intervention in the market and interference with people's lives.

Creative workers need to be compensated for their work, but copyright is an inefficient mechanism for accomplishing this goal. There are alternative mechanisms for supporting creative work, several of which are already in existence.

The most important alternative mechanism is probably the university system, in which faculty are expected to publish in their areas of expertise in addition to teaching. The work supported in this way is mostly designed for professional audiences, but a substantial body of work produced by university faculty is intended for general audiences. In addition to universities, private foundations support a large amount of creative work in writing, music, and the arts more generally. In the United States, the federal government supports a substantial amount of creative work through the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities, and indirectly through the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. State and local governments also provide limited support. Of course, in most other wealthy countries, the government provides considerably more support for creative work.

As it stands, the amount of work supported through mechanisms other than copyright is almost certainly less than what society would desire, which suggests the need to expand the existing mechanisms and/or create new ones. In the case of the United States, expanding the government's role is likely to meet considerable resistance, in part because people may object to having the government fund work they dislike and also because they may not like the idea of the government having a big hand in determining what creative work gets support.

It is not difficult to get around this problem. One way would be an "artistic freedom voucher," a refundable tax credit for a specific amount (e.g., $100) that individuals could contribute to whatever creative worker/organization they choose.¹⁰⁴ The condition of getting this money would be that the recipient individuals/organizations would not be eligible to receive copyrights for some period of time (e.g., three years) after receiving the money. All the work they produced would be in the public domain so that it could be reproduced and circulated around the world.

One benefit of this structure is its low enforcement costs. Artists who had received voucher money and then tried to violate the rules and get a copyright would find their copyright unenforceable. Anyone would have the right to freely reproduce the material as though the copyright did not exist.

This mechanism is not very different from the current tax deduction for charitable organizations. As it stands, wealthy individuals can make large charitable contributions that are subsidized by the government through the tax deduction. If people in the top tax bracket give $10 million to their local symphony, the government effectively subsidizes this contribution by reducing their tax liability by $3,600,000.

In the case of the artistic freedom vouchers, the whole payment would come from the government, rather than just a fraction, but the sums involved would be much smaller. Instead of giving millions of dollars in subsidies to a small number of individuals, the system would give a modest subsidy to hundreds of millions of individuals. There would inevitably be some amount of gaming and fraud, as there is with the charitable deduction, but it would likely be limited, as the potential gains would be small relative to the opportunities that already exist with the charitable deduction.¹⁰⁵

The advantage of an artistic freedom voucher system is that it preserves individuals' choice in determining what creative work that they wish to support. It separates the decision to buy material from the decision to support a specific type of creative work. Presumably people will mostly support the type of work they actually enjoy, but they would have the option of supporting one type of work even if they don't enjoy it themselves. For example, they might support classical music even if they listen only to rock music. The important point is that it would be a matter of individual choice, not a decision made by a government agency.

The obstacles to moving from the copyright world we have today to the artistic freedom voucher world described above are enormous, but there are important market forces pushing in this direction as well as powerful potential allies.

The opponents of this sort of transformation include the entertainment industry, a large, politically powerful industry that will do everything possible to preserve and extend its copyright monopolies. The entertainment industry is also influential among many progressive politicians because it is one of the few pockets of wealth that have been a reliable source of support in political campaigns. The software and publishing industries are also quite powerful. In the latter case, the fact that newspapers weigh in on political campaigns is also likely to be a deterrent to elected officials who want to weaken copyright protections or propose alternatives.

As with patent monopolies, the market is a powerful force working against copyright monopolies. While the industry groups can be expected to continually invent new locks and search mechanisms to prevent the reproduction of copyrighted material and to trace its transmission path, innovative software engineers will be equally energetic in designing ways to crack locks and avoid detection.

Progressives should be on the side of the free flow of material, which means opposing repressive legislation that increases penalties for reproducing and circulating copyrighted pieces. It also means opposing efforts to promote the spread and extension of copyright protection, such as those in trade agreements that force U.S. trading partners to impose stronger copyright laws. (This is the sort of issue that could lead to a productive trade agreement with China's government. We could tell them they can apply their own laws to Microsoft's software and Disney's movies, and they could agree to raise the value of the Yuan against the dollar.) Progressives should also oppose the use of propaganda courses in schools and universities that tout the virtues of copyrights.

In addition, progressives should support in every way possible the creation and circulation of free music, movies, software, and other creative material. This support can take a variety of forms. A vast body of material is already available on the web that is not subject to restrictive copyrights. It includes work that was always in the public domain, work that has fallen into the public domain because of the expiration of copyrights, and work that is subject to Creative Commons copyright. The latter is a less-exclusive form of copyright that can allow for free distribution of material.¹⁰⁶ The promotion of this material can further acclimate the public to work that is not protected by copyright.

Private foundations can also be sources of support for non-copyright-protected material. As part of an economic development strategy, state and local governments could create artistic freedom voucher systems involving some modest amount per resident, like the federal programs described above. However, a condition of receiving money could be that the musician, writer, singer, or other creative workers physically live within the state or city for at least eight months a year, in addition to forgoing a copyright. Musicians and other creative workers living in a state or city for eight months a year would almost certainly plan to perform there or in other ways practice their work, both as a way of earning money and making themselves more popular among the residents and thereby better positioned to get voucher money.

A state or city setting up this sort of system could become a cultural Mecca, where hundreds of musicians performed their music every night and theaters produced original plays. Writers could have workshops to train aspiring writers, and all manner of creative workers could receive lessons in their areas of specialization. A large inflow of visitors would take advantage of these offerings. For depressed areas with a good housing stock and scenic environment, this could be a promising development path.

It would be easier for a state or local government to follow this path if it received a grant from a foundation to pick up part of the expense. For example, an Albany-size city of 100,000 could have $10 million to support artistic freedom vouchers if it received a $5 million grant and could come up with $5 million itself. The prospect of garnering some portion of this money could bring a large number of creative workers to the city from surrounding areas. This sum would be sufficient to provide $25,000 to 400 creative workers, a substantial subsidy to the living standards of many workers struggling to get by.

Cities and states can explicitly promote free material in the textbooks they use in schools at all levels. A number of high school and college textbooks are already available for free downloads without copyright protection.¹⁰⁷ In many cases these books are perfectly adequate substitutes for expensive copyrighted textbooks. State and local governments could also contract with academics to write textbooks that will be available freely to their students online. These will almost certainly cost far less than having students buy textbooks individually through the copyright system, especially if the process can be coordinated among many governments. Several states have already gone this route.

As a basic principle, free material will drive out copyrighted material. If people have access to quality work for which they don't have to pay, why should they pay for copyrighted material? The model here is Wikipedia, which offers entries that are every bit as accurate as those available from traditional encyclopedias on a far wider range of topics. As a result, it has virtually eliminated the market for traditional encyclopedias.

A challenge will be to find mechanisms for ensuring that creative workers are paid decent wages. However, few creative workers are able to earn decent livelihoods under the copyright system, so we don't have a model that works now. We surely can do better.

The push for material unprotected by copyright should extend to software as well. Open and ideally free software is preferable to protected software. In this philosophy Google and Linux (originally GNU/Linux, in recognition of its roots in the free software movement) are preferable to Microsoft and Apple. Computers and other devices with freely available software should cost less. And any system that is constantly improved by tens of thousands of people will be far better than a system designed in the closed confines of a corporate production process. (Is there anyone anywhere who would be using a Microsoft anything if the company had not used its market power to gain a dominant position in software?)

The move to a non-copyright-protected world should lead us to better and more widely available creative material and software, and put an end to some of the concentrations of wealth created by the copyright system. Microsoft could be the new Commodore, Disney could truly be a Mickey Mouse outfit, and Rupert Murdoch could retire as a less-wealthy patron of right-wing causes.

Chapter 11—Follow the Money: The Guiding Light for a Progressive Strategy

In the fall of 2007, as the collapse of the housing bubble was about to crash the economy, the biggest economic concern under debate in Congress was a budget deficit that at the time was equal to 1.2 percent of GDP, or roughly $180 billion in the 2011 economy.

Then, as now, the political debate over economic policy was a sideshow to the real economic issues that most affected people's lives. The obsession over a relatively small budget deficit helped to drown out warnings about an economic tsunami that would soon throw more than eight million people out of work, cause millions to lose their homes, and cost the country more than $4 trillion in lost output. The effects of this collapse will have added trillions of dollars to the national debt when all is said and done.

But no one in a leadership position in Washington wanted to talk about the housing bubble in 2007. There was a budget deficit to worry about. Obsessing about budget issues while ignoring fundamental economic issues led to a disaster with consequences for the budget that were far worse than any budget hawk could have feared in 2007. If the budget hawks really cared about the deficit and debt, they should have focused their efforts on the economy and ignored the budget, rather than the other way around.

Progressives have been similarly shortsighted by misdirecting their attention to the narrow realm of tax and transfer policy while largely ignoring far more important policies that determine the distribution of before-tax income. As a result, conservatives have gained control of the mechanisms that distribute income and used tax and transfer policy as a sideshow to divert public attention.

The arithmetic on this story is straightforward. Federal government spending averages roughly 20 percent of GDP. Adding in state and local government spending gets us a bit over 30 percent. This means that all levels of government spending account for less than one-third of the economy. If this is the exclusive realm for political debate, and we ignore the way in which the government structures the larger economy, then we have given up two-thirds of the game.

Even worse, this approach leaves progressives much less well-situated to contest the portion of income that is controlled by the government for both political and economic reasons.

Politically, the idea of taking money from the people who have lots of it and giving it to those who have not earned much is always going to be problematic, especially in the United States. The idea of government redistribution does not sell well.

It also poses economic problems. Conservatives' complaints about the economic distortions created by high taxes have some basis in reality, even if they are often hugely overstated. Progressives should steer clear of the potential for being seen as having an agenda that means slower growth and less job creation.

Shifting attention to before-tax issues of income means talking about the big policy items, most importantly the Fed and the dollar, that have the greatest impact on economic outcomes. Though the chance of achieving major policy changes in these areas in the near future is slim, the public should at least understand the importance of the Fed and the value of the dollar in determining economic outcomes. Continuing to pursue low-inflation and high-dollar policies will leave tens of millions of people unemployed or underemployed, and the public should understand that this path is a choice made by those in power.

It is also important to change the orientation of progressive thinking and rhetoric both to achieve success politically and to get better policy outcomes even on less consequential issues. A recent debate on restricting the government-subsidized student loans available to low- and middle-income students to pay tuition at for-profit colleges provides an excellent case in point. The right managed to turn this argument on its head, successfully portraying itself as the protector of a free market and the Obama administration and Democrats in Congress as supporters of increased government regulation.

Proponents of restricting the availability of these loans argued that many students use the loans at schools where they often do not complete a degree or from which they fail to land a job even with a degree. This outcome leaves the students with large debts and little ability to repay them, and leaves the government on the hook since it guarantees the loans.

The intention of the new regulations was to ensure that students used the loans only at schools that provide their graduates with reasonable prospects for "gainful employment" (determined by graduates' debt-to-income ratios and loan repayment rates). This was a regulation of the loan program to prevent abuse and to ensure that the money was doing what was intended: helping low- and middle-income students get the education and skills they need to get a good job.

What position do you think an advocate of free markets would take in this debate? Obviously, a true free-marketer would eliminate the program altogether. It's a subsidy that interferes in the education market.

But for-profit colleges wanted and needed the subsidy (as up to 90 percent of their revenue comes from taxpayer-provided student loans and grants), and so in true conservative fashion they turned the debate into a battle between those who favored a "free market" (them) and those who wanted increased government regulation. The industry argued that it would be strangled and many colleges would be put out of business by the new regulations.

It is almost impossible to exaggerate the absurdity of this position. Nothing being proposed would prevent the schools from doing whatever they wanted or prevent any students from choosing to attend any school they wanted. The debate was over the limitations applied to a government aid program. The for-profit college industry essentially opposed clamping down on fraud (bogus colleges); it wanted the freedom to rip off students and taxpayers and did not want the government to get in the way.

We can view this through another example. New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and others have advocated that food stamp recipients be prohibited from using food stamps on soda and sugary drinks. Regardless of the merits of this policy, there is little doubt that it is being proposed as a limitation on food stamp recipients and what they can do with this government benefit.

While Mayor Bloomberg proposed this as a simple exclusion of certain items from the list of products that could be purchased with food stamps, it would almost certainly lead to a situation where there would be a substantial number of products that fell into a grey area (for example sweetened ice tea). This in turn would likely mean establishing standards that the industry would have to show that they met in order to avoid being excluded from the program. The requirement for meeting some set of nutritional standards would be comparable to the record-keeping requirements that the for-profit college industry claimed would be onerous. In other words, prohibiting food stamp beneficiaries from buying soft drinks with their food stamps would impose requirements on the food industry, just as restricting the use of student loans imposes requirements on the for-profit college industry.

In this event, would the makers of soft drinks manage to pitch their objections as a complaint about intrusive government regulation interfering with the free market? Would the proponents of increasing the restrictions on the use of food stamps be labeled as advocates of stronger government regulation? That seems unlikely but that is exactly what happened in the effort to prevent abuses of the student loan system.

The position of the for-profit colleges had nothing to do with the free market. Yet the progressives pushing for tighter regulation and accountability ceded ground, agreeing to a four-year-long "three strikes and you're out" examination before a school could lose eligibility for the government giveaway. "We believe that very few programs will be forcibly closed by our standards," Secretary of Education Arne Duncan said. "We want to give people a chance to reform. As a country, we need this sector to succeed. This is not about 'gotcha.'"¹⁰⁸ Of course, the issue is not "gotcha;" the issue is a pattern of abuses that borders on criminal fraud, and the secretary of education essentially committed the department to not taking them seriously.

It is interesting to ask whether the outcome of the student loan fight would have been different if the proponents of the new regulations had insisted on characterizing them as an effort to limit waste in a government program for low- and moderate-income people, which is in fact what the regulations were.

The caricature of conservatives as anti-government and progressives as pro-government makes arguments in support of huge government programs like Social Security and Medicare confusing and difficult. At least in the case of these two massive social insurance programs, the vast majority of the public — regardless of political affiliation — supports their purpose of providing necessary protections to the elderly and disabled. And, for this reason, conservatives who want to dismantle these programs almost never argue that we don't need a Social Security or Medicare-type system; they argue that their privatized system will be better than the current government-run system. (In nearly 20 years of policy debates in Washington and around the country I don't believe that I have confronted a conservative who advocated simply eliminating these programs.)

In this instance, we are debating not values but whether privatized systems can provide the protections — which both sides seem to agree are desirable — more efficiently. And the evidence is overwhelming that privatization adds unnecessary costs to providing retirement income security or health care. Part of the cost is the profits that private firms extract, but much of the increase is associated with the inefficiency of a decentralized system as opposed to a single centralized system.

In selecting most goods and services, we value choice, but there is not much value to individual choice in the way we receive our core retirement income. People want to know the money will be there — end of story. Marketing and creating 20 different flavors of the same product simply makes providing a secure retirement income more expensive.

Extensive experience with privatized systems throughout Latin America and elsewhere in the developing world, as well as in some wealthy countries like the United Kingdom, bears this out. We also have the private retirement system in the United States if we need evidence that the debate over privatizing Social Security is a debate over whether workers want to see their retirement income reduced so that the financial industry can have more money. The only values question here is whether it is better for workers to keep their money or for the financial industry to have it.

The same story applies to efforts to privatize Medicare. The Congressional Budget Office's analysis of the Republican Party's voucher plan (which the House of Representatives approved) projected that the plan would raise the cost of buying Medicare-equivalent policies by $34 trillion over Medicare's 75-year planning period.¹⁰⁹ The issue in this case is simply whether retired workers want to have $34 trillion pulled out of their pockets and handed to the insurance and health care industries.

Framing this as a debate over values is a distraction. The right claims its goal is "to get government off our backs," but it would merely replace one method of providing retirement security and health care with another. It says its way of providing these services is better, but the evidence shows that's not the case. And that, pure and simple, is why the right makes this a values debate.

Bringing back the market

The cases of Social Security and Medicare are great examples of how the logic of the market leads to progressive outcomes. In these cases a simple centralized system is more efficient than a decentralized, privatized system. There is no need to contrast the logic of the government and the logic of the market: if we want efficient programs, we want ones that look like Social Security and Medicare.

In the same vein, we can structure the market more generally to produce progressive outcomes. The enormous growth of inequality over the last three decades did not come about as the result of the natural workings of the market; it came about through conscious design. The job of progressives is to point this out in every venue and in every way we can. It is not by luck, talent, and hard work that the rich are getting so much richer. It is by rigging the rules of the game.

From a political perspective it is much better to say that the progressive agenda is about setting fair rules for the market. The argument that highly paid professionals should face the same international competition as factory workers is a compelling one, and more arresting than the argument that we should redistribute money from the winners to the losers.

Since public debate is so badly misinformed on almost all economic issues, most people will be hearing these arguments for the first time. Few realize that an agency of the government, the Federal Reserve Board, actively throws people out of work to fight inflation. Few know that the loss of manufacturing jobs and the downward pressure on the wages of manufacturing workers are not accidental outcomes of trade agreements but rather the whole basis for them. (The enigma of trade is that it can make a whole country richer and yet most of its people poorer.) And hardly anyone understands that a higher-valued dollar intensifies the hurtful effect of trade by putting further downward pressure on the wages of workers subject to international competition.

Our Federal Reserve policy, trade policy, and dollar policy redistribute income upward from the less advantaged to those who disproportionately control the nation's wealth and political power. Each policy is designed for this outcome. Knowing this economic reality is not the same as changing it, but it is an important first step.

Progressives have to start playing hardball. The right is not just trying to win elections; it is working to destroy the basis of progressive opposition. Breaking private-sector unions in the 1980s was not just about getting lower-cost labor; it was also a deliberate effort to undermine one of the pillars of progressive politics in the United States. Recent efforts at the state and federal levels to weaken public sector unions are not about saving money for the government; they are a deliberate effort to destroy the strongest remaining segment of the labor movement.

Progressives must think the same way. When a Medicare patient has $50,000 to put in her pocket after receiving a heart bypass operation in Singapore rather than Topeka (remember that the government also saves $50,000), she is a walking advertisement for the waste and inefficiency of the U.S. health care system. Every person who takes advantage of these health care savings will make a mockery of the politicians from both parties who have the gall to say the U.S. health care system is the best in the world.

When we convince a state or local government to contract out its architectural or engineering design tasks to lower-cost firms in India or Brazil, to purchase open-source software and textbooks for its students, and to fill its Medicaid prescriptions through low-cost Canadian suppliers, we un-rig the protections set up for highly paid professionals, copyright holders, and pharmaceutical firms and demonstrate that the market can save ordinary people money.

Success will build on success, just as it has for the right. If a progressive state gets its unemployment rate down to 4 percent through work sharing, or cuts its Medicaid spending by 30 percent by using medical trade and foreign pharmaceuticals, others will follow.

These innovations will also have a cumulative effect that amplifies their impact. If work sharing brings the unemployment rate in a state down to 4 percent, then ordinary workers in that state will be far more likely to see wage increases. They also may feel more empowered to unionize, since the threat of job loss has much less consequence in a situation where it is relatively easy to find another job.

Moreover, the increased spending on foreign-sourced highly paid professional services will put downward pressure on the dollar. Sending enough dollars overseas to pay for foreign doctors, lawyers, and economists may push the dollar down to the point that our manufacturing goods become more competitive on world markets. This would create millions of new manufacturing jobs.

The right plots long-term strategies along these lines. Progressives must think along the same lines to have a hope of winning.

The fundamental structure of economic debates has been turned on its head to favor the right. Progressives cannot hope to win a political debate if we think that we have an interest in inflating stock and housing prices. Given everything that is stacked against the progressive side in economic debates, we must at least know which way is up. Hopefully this book has helped to point the way.

Footnotes

¹Supporters of the bailout have been eager to claim that the government made money on these loans. This is not honest accounting. The money was lent at rates far below the market rate at the time. No accountant would ever say that a below-market loan turned a profit because it was repaid. Providing a loan at below-market rates implies a government subsidy, and while Wall Street banks were able to get this subsidy from the government, millions of struggling small businesses across the country were not so lucky.

²Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services (2011a), Table 11.

³The Teamsters generally negotiate contracts that include a provision to the effect that they do not have to cross a picket line if they fear for their personal safety. There have been many incidents over the years in which truck drivers have feared for their safety upon seeing a union picket line.

⁴The Fed currently holds close to $3 trillion in mortgage-backed securities and government bonds. As long as the Fed holds on to these bonds, the interest on these assets is refunded to the Treasury: in 2010 the refund was almost $80 billion. By continuing to hold these assets indefinitely, rather than selling them to the public (which would mean the Fed would no longer be able to refund the interest), the Fed would substantially reduce the government's interest burden in future years.

⁵The annual budget projections from the Congressional Budget Office, along with regular updates, are available at <http://www.cbo.gov/publications/bysubject.cfm?cat=0>.

⁶This stimulus package also included roughly $80 billion for a fix to the alternative minimum tax (AMT) that prevented it from raising taxes on millions of middle-income families. This fix really should not be included as part of the stimulus because it is a measure that Congress has passed every year for two decades. No one ever expected to pay the higher AMT rate, so preventing this tax increase from going into effect could not have provided a boost to anyone's consumption.

⁷See Blinder and Zandi (2010), CBO (2011a), and Feyrer and Sacerdote (2011). It is important to point out that the Feyrer and Sacerdote study almost certainly understates the job impact of the stimulus because it looks exclusively at in-state effects. Much of the employment impact of stimulus spending is likely to spill across state lines. For example, spending on a major construction project in Manhattan is likely to involve subcontractors located in New Jersey. The materials are also likely to come at least in part from out of state. Furthermore, when workers on the project spend their wages, they will be creating jobs in other states if they don't live in New York. For these reasons a study such as this that only picks up the in-state effects will substantially underestimate the full jobs impact of the stimulus.

⁸Carroll and Zhou (2010).

⁹The official savings data are somewhat distorted by the mis-measurement of income. Capital gains from the housing market and the stock market appear to have been reported as part of normal income in the government data. (Capital gains are not supposed to count as income in the GDP accounts.) This led to a large shift to a negative statistical discrepancy in the years 2002 to 2007. See Rosnick and Baker (2011b).

¹⁰Roughly $100 billion of the stimulus was scheduled to take effect in 2011 or later.

¹¹For instance, see Baker (2009a), Baker and Deutsch (2009), and Krugman (2009).

¹²The Mortgage Bankers Association index can be found on their website: <http://www.mortgagebankers.org/>.

¹³Dunkelberg and Wade (2011).

¹⁴These numbers refer to the somewhat larger "employment services" category that includes temporary help agencies as well as some employment leasing services that are not included in this category.

¹⁵It is also worth noting that the NFIB shows no rise in the percentage of firms that list regulation and taxes as major problem compared with the Bush presidency.

¹⁶It is worth noting again that taxpayers gifted tens of billions of dollars to the financial industry despite the oft-repeated claim that the government made money on TARP and the special lending facilities. The money that the government lent to banks like Goldman Sachs and Citigroup was made available at interest rates far below what the banks would have been required to pay in the market at the time. In the case of Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, the two surviving independent investment banks, the Fed allowed them to change their status in the middle of the crisis to bank holding companies that had the protection of the Fed and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. This change effectively told the markets that these huge institutions would be backstopped by the government, bringing to an end a run on both banks. An enormous premium was placed on liquidity at the time of TARP. The fact that the major Wall Street banks were able to borrow at near zero rates, at a time when they were insolvent and would have found it almost impossible to get private-sector loans at any price, was an enormous subsidy.

¹⁷At the time, Iran was the world's second-largest exporter of oil, and the revolution removed these exports from world markets. For a history of oil prices in the post-World War II era see http://www.inflationdata.com/inflation/inflation_rate/historical_oil_prices_table.asp.

¹⁸The differential effect of unemployment on the wages of less-highly paid workers is discussed in Bernstein and Baker (2004).

¹⁹Also known as a "secondary boycott," a secondary strike is "an attempt to stop others from purchasing products from, performing services for, or otherwise doing business with a company that does business with another company that is in the midst of a labor dispute."

See <http://www.nolo.com/dictionary/secondary-boycott-term.html>.

²⁰Schmitt and Zipperer (2009).

²¹Bureau of the Census (1980), Table 679.

²²Reinhold (2000) and Bureau of Labor Statistics.

²³While many college-educated workers and even workers with advanced degrees are unionized, unionization leads to much larger wage gains for less-educated workers (Schmitt, 2008).

²⁴OECD (2011).

²⁵It's worth noting that about 0.3 percentage points of the increase in investment in the 1990s is simply an accounting issue. There was a huge expansion of car leasing in the decade. A leased car counts as investment on the part of the car leasing company. By contrast, if a person buys a car it counts as consumption. The shift from purchases to leases increased annual investment by an amount equal to 0.3 percent of GDP at the end of the decade.

²⁶The bubble is often referred to as the "tech bubble" or the "internet bubble," implying that it was restricted to a narrow category of the stock market. While these sectors were most affected by the bubble, virtually all sectors of the market saw substantial price increases during the inflation of the bubble and experienced substantial declines when it burst. For example, Ford's stock rose from under $29 in late 1995 to a peak of more than $63 in early 1999. It eventually fell below $9 in the fall of 2002. McDonald's stock rose from under $20 in the summer of 1995 to a peak of more than $45 in early 1999, and it eventually fell to under $15 in early 2003.

²⁷The adjusted savings rate adds the statistical discrepancy in the national income accounts to income, under the assumption that most of the change in the statistical discrepancy through time is attributable to capital gains income showing up as normal income (Rosenick and Baker, 2011b). This explains the fact that the statistical discrepancy shifted from being positive through most of the postwar period to being a large negative at the peaks of the stock and housing bubbles.

²⁸The evidence is laid out in Baker (2002b).

²⁹The existence of a 100-year-long trend was uncovered in research by Robert Shiller (2006), which was not yet available in 2002. However, it was possible to use publicly available data sources to determine that nationwide home prices had just tracked inflation since 1953 (see Baker 2002b).

³⁰Greenspan (2002).

³¹There was the possibility that the gap between home sale prices and rent was driven by the extraordinarily low mortgage rates available at the time. This argument has two problems. First, home prices have not historically been very sensitive to interest rates, and for prices to fluctuate in major ways as interest rates moved up or down would amount to a sharp break with past patterns. The other, more important, problem with this story is that no one expected interest rates to remain at such low levels. If it was the case that the extraordinary run-up in home prices was due to the unusually low interest rates available at the time, then one would expect home prices to fall back to their trend level when interest rates rose back to more normal levels. Rather than being an argument against a bubble, this interest rate story would have in fact implied a bubble. For more on this, see Baker (2002a).

³²The Census Bureau's vacancy data are available at <http://www.census.gov/hhes/www/housing/hvs/hvs.html>.

³³While higher interest rates will eventually deflate a bubble, the Fed was right to keep interest rates low at the time, given the weakness of the economy following the collapse of the stock bubble. The Fed has many other tools at its disposal, most immediately its ability to direct attention to a bubble. If the Fed had focused its research on documenting the evidence for a housing bubble, and Greenspan and other Fed officials had used congressional testimony and other public appearances to warn of the bubble, it is difficult to believe that they could not have curbed the irrational exuberance that was driving home prices higher. The Fed also has substantial regulatory power that it could have used to slow the tide of bad mortgages that was flooding the financial system.

³⁴Remarkably, Greenspan told the Washington Post that he had been unaware of the extent of the spread of subprime mortgages until January 2006, just as he was ending his tenure as Fed chairman (Klein and Goldfarb, 2008).

³⁵Kirchhoff and Hagenbaugh (2004).

³⁶Bishop, Hightower, and Bickicioglu (2005). Many people borrowed more than the purchase price of their homes, using the extra money to cover closing costs or other expenses.

³⁷See Hudson (2010).

³⁸Harris (2006) p. 6.

³⁹Bernanke (2007).

⁴⁰The Federal Reserve Act, Section 2A, Monetary Policy Objectives, available at <http://www.federalreserve.gov/aboutthefed/section2a.htm>.

⁴¹On one occasion, a governor of the Fed acknowledged to me that there was little risk of runaway inflation even if the unemployment rate fell slightly below the so-called non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment. He also acknowledged that there was little harm from moderate rates of inflation, meaning that if the Fed took this gamble and lost, there would be little cost associated with a rate of inflation that was stable, but slightly higher than the Fed's target. I asked why the Fed shouldn't take the virtually cost-free risk, and he responded by saying that the Fed is an institution that is committed to price stability. I pointed out that the Fed is also an institution that is committed to full employment, to which he replied that, "No one takes that commitment seriously." When I suggested that he then also doesn't need to take the commitment to price stability seriously, he responded, "Yes, I do."

⁴²As a separate measure to slow consumption, Volcker also restricted the use of credit cards. At the time, the Fed had the ability to impose this type of credit control, but it does no longer.

⁴³*New York Times*, Times Topics.

⁴⁴The core money supply refers to the reserves that the Fed uses to buy government bonds, mortgage-backed securities, and other assets. These reserves are the basis for broader measures of the money supply.

⁴⁵Bernanke (1999).

⁴⁶The real interest rate is the nominal interest rate minus the inflation rate. The nominal interest rate cannot go below zero. Once the central bank has set the nominal interest rate at zero (as both the Japanese central bank did in the 1990's and the Fed has done in the Great Recession), the real interest rate cannot go lower unless the inflation rate rises.

⁴⁷There is a concern that the bank reserves created by the Fed's holding assets could lead to inflation when the economy recovers. The Fed could head off inflation by raising bank reserve requirements, as an alternative to reducing the reserves of the banking system by selling assets. While this is a less-preferred tool of monetary policy, given the huge potential gains it is worth the risk. Scheduling the increases in advance could reduce any potential disruptions created by raising reserve requirements.

⁴⁸Rep. Paul wrote a book titled End the Fed so there is little ambiguity about the direction he would like to take.

⁴⁹An earlier version of this chapter appeared as Baker (2011).

⁵⁰This is the harmonized unemployment rate used by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), which puts national rates on an internationally comparable basis.

⁵¹See Schmitt (2011) for an analysis of the policy responses of the United States, Germany, and Denmark during this period.

⁵²OECD (2010). When demand for labor fell in the recession, companies could cut back hours and maintain workers' pay by using hours in these accounts.

⁵³This discussion relies largely on data from EFILWC (2010, Chapter 2).

⁵⁴An analysis of firms' participation in short-work programs in Germany by the International Labor Organization (Crimmann, Wießner, and Bellmann, 2010, p. 26) found a strong correlation between firm size and participation in work sharing programs. The use of freelancers was negatively correlated with participation, as was the percentage of college graduates among the workforce. Being involved in an export industry was highly correlated with participation, although this could also be attributable to the sharp drop in exports at the start of the downturn as opposed to the specific characteristics of these industries.

⁵⁵President Obama's 2012 budget includes funding to support the establishment of work-sharing programs in states that do not already have them.

⁵⁶Email communication with Employment and Training Administration, U.S. Dept. of Labor, December 2010. See Woo (2011) for additional details.

⁵⁷This discussion follows that of Messenger (2009).

⁵⁸Experience rating is the comparison of the insured's actual loss against losses common to similar workers, or in this case, the work-sharing experience of a given firm compared to similar firms.

⁵⁹This situation involves two potential risks. The first is that a firm in a shaky position financially may opt to abuse the system, recognizing the likelihood that it will not survive long enough to ever repay more than a fraction of the excess benefits claimed, or that new firms may not stay in business long in any case. To limit this avenue of abuse, if a firm did not appear to be financially stable, then the state employment agency could be given the option to refuse a work-sharing plan on this basis. The other opportunity for abuse would be if employers claimed the benefit without actually reducing workers' hours. There could also be a requirement that employers post any approved work-sharing plans in a visible place at their workplace so that workers could easily find them and verify that they were actually seeing the reductions in work hours claimed by their employers.

⁶⁰Employers are likely to prefer work sharing to layoffs in many cases since it means that they can retain skilled workers. When demand increases they just have to raise workers' hours rather than find and train new workers.

⁶¹See Baker (2009b).

⁶²See Visser (2011). The U.S. figure here is Visser's "adjusted coverage." The German figure is Visser's unadjusted coverage; the adjusted figure for Germany is 63 percent.

⁶³This may be somewhat misleading, since business and professional services includes the temporary employment sector.

⁶⁴Rosnick and Weisbrot (2006).

⁶⁵United Nations Statistics Division (2010).

⁶⁶Firms often have a category of workers they define as "part time" who work less than 35 or 30 hours a week and therefore are not given health care, whereas full-time employees receive insurance. It is becoming more common for employers to pay a certain amount toward a worker's insurance policy (rather than paying for the policy itself). In some cases this sum would be paid on a per-hour basis, but this is more the exception than the rule. The vast majority of health care policies are still paid for as a fixed amount per worker.

⁶⁷It is worth noting that the higher marginal tax rates in European countries relative to the United States provide a greater incentive in these countries to take the benefits of productivity growth in leisure. If workers took the benefits in higher pay, they would see less gain after-tax than their counterparts in the United States.

⁶⁸Deficit hawks generally reverse this chain of causation, claiming that the budget deficit is responsible for the trade deficit. This can be true if the budget deficit leads to higher interest rates, which in turn raise the value of the dollar, as investors want to buy dollar assets to take advantage of high U.S. interest rates. No one ever opts to buy an imported product instead of a domestically produced item because of the budget deficit. They choose to buy the imported product because it is cheaper. However, if the dollar stays high, then reducing the budget deficit will not affect trade — unless it leads to a decline in GDP and employment. In short, if the goal is to reduce the trade deficit by reducing the budget deficit, then the intention must be to lower the value of the dollar or raise the unemployment rate. Anyone who wants to combine a low budget deficit and a high dollar, and still have a low trade deficit, wants a high unemployment rate. There is no plausible way to avoid this conclusion.

⁶⁹This route was first outlined in Gagnon and Hufbauer (2011).

⁷⁰Another possible route would be to have the U.S. government buy up huge amounts of futures of RMB in derivative markets. This could also have the effect of pushing up the value of the RMB in spot markets as wealthy Chinese and Chinese corporations attempted to hold RMB off the spot market to take advantage of selling them at higher prices in future markets.

⁷¹When other countries buy up U.S. government bonds or other dollar-based assets to prop up the dollar, they are in effect subsidizing our purchases of their exports. The higher dollar makes their exports cheaper. However, since they are likely to get paid back in dollars that are worth less than the dollars they bought (because the value of the dollar declines) they will take a loss on their dollar assets. This loss is the cost of the subsidy to these countries.

⁷²Tourism in the United States by foreigners is treated as an export in the national income accounts. In effect people from abroad come to the United States to buy services from the industry. These purchases have largely the same impact on the economy as if the services could be packaged and shipped overseas as physical products.

⁷³See for example Pew Research Center (2010).

⁷⁴Freeman (2003).

⁷⁵The “problem” of too many foreign doctors entering the country is discussed in Sun (1996) and Pear (1997).

⁷⁶Physicians in the United States earn on average more than $200,000 a year, compared to close to $100,000 a year in western European countries and Japan (Congressional Research Service, 2007). With 950,000 doctors in the United States, the savings if doctors in the U.S. were paid the same amount as in other countries is roughly $95 billion a year, which is roughly $300 per person or $1,200 for a family of four. It is worth noting that a much higher share of doctors in the U.S. are specialists, who require more years of training, and therefore command higher salaries than family practitioners, than in most other wealthy countries. It is not clear that the greater number of specialists improves the quality of care, but it is likely that they are used in the United States in instances in which family practitioners would suffice. This sort of rent-seeking, with specialists inserting themselves into situations where their skills are not necessary, is exactly what would be expected when government interventions obstruct the normal workings of the market.

⁷⁷Once while on a panel discussing trade policy, I made a reference to the effort in the 1990s to tighten industry requirements in order to reduce the number of foreign-born doctors who could practice in this country. My fellow panelist, a prominent trade economist, said that he didn’t know anything about the restriction and acted as though it had nothing to do with his line of work. This should have been a hugely embarrassing admission for a trade economist. There is far more money at stake in the salaries of doctors in the United States than in the various trade agreements that have been the topic of much political debate, or in the few instances in which the United States has imposed special trade restrictions (e.g., the Buy America provision of the stimulus) to assist a troubled industry.

⁷⁸Those concerned about too many immigrants entering the country need not worry. There are about 4.5 million workers with doctorates or professional degrees in the United States. Even if foreign professionals equal to half this number entered the country over the next decade, the annual flow would total just 230,000 workers, or less than 20 percent of the projected flow of immigrants over the next decade. If there is a desire to keep the total flow of immigrants below some fixed level, then the number of people allowed to enter the country to work in construction, hotels, and restaurants can be reduced to offset the number of additional professionals entering the country.

⁷⁹Employers are already aggressively following this approach with regard to foreign nurses, pushing to ease immigration restrictions in order to bring in ever-larger numbers of nurses with the explicit intent of lowering their wages. If this effort can be redirected toward doctors and others at the top of the pay ladder, then there is an opportunity for large economic gains that benefit nearly everyone.

⁸⁰Medical trade is often referred to as “medical tourism.” This is an unfortunate term because it trivializes what could be a life-saving trip in which a patient goes overseas to get an essential medical procedure that he or she could not afford in the United States.

⁸¹The downward pressure will be greatest for those at the top for the simple reason that these people enjoy the greatest economic rents. As much as physicians may complain about their inadequate pay, they have few choices since they are already at the top of the pay scale. Specialists earning $300,000 a year have few comparable employment options. If their pay were cut to $180,000 they would not do better by leaving medicine and going to work as clerks in a shoe store. On the other hand, those lower down the pay ladder have less to lose by leaving their professions. If pay were cut substantially for nurses, nurses’ assistants, lab technicians, and other lower- and middle-paying occupations, these jobs would more likely go unfilled.

⁸²This policy is outlined in Baker and Rho (2009). Since many Medicare beneficiaries are enrolled in the Medicaid program, the potential savings per beneficiary can run into the tens of thousands of dollars a year, using current projections.

⁸³The Commerce Department reported that in 2009 the United States imported $8.9 billion of business and professional services from India, while it exported only $1.3 billion (<http://www.bea.gov/international/xls/tab5a.xls>).

⁸⁴These figures come from the Commerce Department’s National Income and Product Accounts, Tables 6.2B and 6.2D. The securities and investment portion of private-sector employee compensation rose from 0.5 percent in 1975 (lines 55 and 89) to 2.4 percent in 2009 (lines 59 and 61).

⁸⁵Control over the timing of earnings may also be at the expense of shareholders. For example, this mechanism may make it easier for top executives to time earnings in ways that ensure that they will meet bonus targets.

⁸⁶IMF (2010).

⁸⁷Even in cases where deposit insurance is provided privately, there is still an expectation that the government will stand behind these insurers in a crisis, since the consequences of letting a major private bank insurance fund go bankrupt would be disastrous.

⁸⁸Baker and McArthur (2009).

⁸⁹See U.S. Departments of Treasury and Housing and Urban Development (2011).

⁹⁰An analysis by Zandi and deRitis (2011) was widely held up as supporting a proposal for a new system of government guarantees. Their analysis estimated that a system of government guarantees would reduce the interest rate on 30-year fixed-rate mortgages by approximately 90 basis points (0.9 percentage points). This reduction in interest rates would be almost fully offset by an increase of approximately 8 percent in average home prices, leaving typical homeowners paying almost the same amount in their monthly mortgage payment. The analysis didn’t show the full economic effects of this subsidy, but higher home prices would be expected to lead to more consumption through the wealth effect, implying reduced investment and slower growth.

⁹¹This is in addition to the payment reductions associated with adverse selection, where insurers reduce annual payments under the assumption that people who buy annuities have longer life expectancies than the population as a whole.

⁹²It can also be made a default option in which a portion of workers’ wages (e.g., 3 percent) is put into a savings fund every year, unless the worker opts out. If workers actively decided that they preferred to have the money to spend now or preferred some other savings vehicle, they need only decline the savings option (Baker and Rosnick, 2011). Several recent studies indicate that many workers will save more in situations where it is a default option. This proposal and others rely on this evidence.

⁹³For example, David John at the Heritage Foundation co-authored a paper advocating a government-managed voluntary system of defined-contribution pensions (Iwry and John, 2009).

⁹⁴See Popper (2010).

⁹⁵IMF (2010).

⁹⁶Remarkably, many of these CEOs continue to be sought-after executives. Daniel Mudd and Richard Fuld, the CEOs who, respectively, led Fannie Mae and Lehman into bankruptcy, both are again employed in high-paying jobs in finance.

⁹⁷The “say on pay” provision of the Dodd-Frank financial reform bill requires companies to have nonbinding shareholder votes on executive compensation packages. This is a step forward that will at least call greater attention to outlandish pay packages, but by itself is likely to have little effect on CEO pay.

⁹⁸This figure is derived from the industry’s claim that the value that it assigns to “pirated” software was $59 billion in 2010 and that this was equal to 42 percent of total software shipments; see Business Software Alliance (2011).

⁹⁹Milliot (2010).

¹⁰⁰Newzoo (2011).

¹⁰¹There is a whole industry of “patent trolls,” individuals or firms that buy up patents with the hope of finding a major innovation that is arguably derivative of the patent in question. The profit comes from filing a patent infringement suit. The troll just needs to be able to make a plausible case so that it can threaten the company with the possibility of an expensive legal suit and/or an injunction denying the company the use of the technology. This is generally sufficient to force a settlement even if the case for actual infringement is weak.

¹⁰²These mechanisms are described more fully in Baker (2004).

¹⁰³Patients often have multiple ailments, so it would be important to know if a particular heart medication was likely to have bad effects for people who are being treated for arthritis. It is also likely that drugs might differ in effectiveness based on characteristics like sex, age, and weight. Typically drug companies will not provide the information necessary to make these sorts of assessments.

¹⁰⁴This mechanism is outlined more fully in Baker (2003).

¹⁰⁵Simple restrictions could go far toward eliminating some of the obvious opportunities for small-scale fraud. For example, requiring that an individual or organization get some minimal amount (e.g., $2,500) would prevent any sort of simple trade-off scheme in which individuals exchanged their vouchers among themselves. Arranging for 25 people to give their vouchers to one person or organization in a kickback scheme might be possible, but it would involve considerable effort and risk for limited gain.

¹⁰⁶This book is subject to a Creative Commons copyright that allows for its free reproduction. The one exclusion is that the copyright requires the author’s permission to publish the material in an altered form. The purpose of this restriction is to prevent the misrepresentation of material in this book. Libel law also provides protection against misrepresentation, but the copyright restrictions are more easily enforced.

¹⁰⁷Hundreds of textbooks available for free download can be found at Open Education Resources Commons: <http://www.oercommons.org/>.

¹⁰⁸Lewin (2011).

¹⁰⁹Rosnick and Baker (2011a).

References

AMA-OMSS Governing Council. 2007. “Report B: Medical Travel Outside the U.S.” American Medical Association: Report from the 2007 Annual AMA-OMSS Assembly Meeting.

Baker, Dean. 2002a. “The Housing Affordability Index: A Case of Economic Malpractice.” Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/housing_2002_12.pdf

- Baker, Dean. 2002b. "The Run-up in Home Prices: Is It Real or Is It Another Bubble?" Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/housing_2002_08.pdf
- Baker, Dean. 2003. "The Artistic Freedom Voucher: An Internet Age Alternative to Copyrights." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/ip_2003_11.pdf
- Baker, Dean. 2004. "Financing Drug Research: What Are the Issues?" Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/intellectual_property_2004_09.pdf
- Baker, Dean. 2009a. "The Housing Crash Recession and the Case for a Third Stimulus." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/intellectual_property_2004_09.pdf
- Baker, Dean. 2009b. "Job Sharing: Tax Credits to Prevent Layoffs and Stimulate Employment." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/job-sharing-tax-credit-2009-10.pdf>
- Baker, Dean. 2011. "Work Sharing: The Quick Route Back to Full Employment." Washington, DC: The Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/work-sharing-2011-06.pdf>
- Baker, Dean and Rivka Deutsch. 2009. "The State and Local Drag on the Stimulus." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/stimulus-2009-05.pdf>
- Baker, Dean and Travis McArthur. 2009. "The Value of the "Too Big to Fail" Big Bank Subsidy." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/too-big-to-fail-2009-09.pdf> The End of Loser Liberalism: Making Markets Progressive 157
- Baker, Dean and Hye Jin Rho. 2009. "Free Trade in Health Care: The Gains from Globalized Medicare and Medicaid." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/free-trade-hc-2009-09.pdf>
- Baker, Dean and David Rosnick. 2011. "A Voluntary Default Savings Plan: An Effective Supplement to Social Security." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/cepr-savings-plan-2011-02.pdf>
- Baker, Dean, Robert Pollin, Travis McArthur, and Matt Sherman. 2009. "The Potential Revenue from Financial Transactions Taxes." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/ftt-revenue-2009-12.pdf>
- Bernanke, Ben. 1999. "Japanese Monetary Policy: A Case of Self-Induced Paralysis?" New Jersey: Princeton University. http://www.princeton.edu/~pkrugman/bernanke_paralysis.pdf
- Bernanke, Ben. 2007. "Testimony of Chairman Ben S. Bernanke: The Economic Outlook," before the Joint Economic Committee, U.S. Congress, March 28. <http://www.federalreserve.gov/newsevents/testimony/bernanke20070328a.htm>
- Bernstein, Jared and Dean Baker. 2004. The Benefits of Full Employment. Washington, DC: Economic Policy Institute.
- Bishop, Paul C., Shonda D. Hightower, and Harika Bickicioglu. 2005. "Profile of Homebuyers." Chicago, IL: National Association of Realtors. http://www.realtor.org/Research.nsf/files/2005HBSOnlineHighlights.pdf/\$FILE/2005HBSOnlineHighlights.pdf
- Blinder, Alan and Mark Zandi. 2010. "How the Great Recession Was Brought to an End." West Chester, PA: Moody's Analytics. <http://www.economy.com/mark-zandi/documents/End-of-Great-Recession.pdf>
- Bureau of the Census. 1980. "Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1980." Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Commerce. <http://www2.census.gov/prod2/statcomp/documents/1980-01.pdf>
- Business Software Alliance. 2011. "Eighth Annual BSA Global Software 2010 Piracy Study." Washington, DC:

Business Software Alliance. http://portal.bsa.org/globalpiracy2010/downloads/press/pr_global.pdf

Carroll, Christopher D. and Xia Zhou. 2010. "Measuring Wealth Effects Using U.S. State Data." Paper presented at the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco Conference on Empirical Macroeconomics Using Geographical Data on March 18, 2011. <http://www.frbsf.org/economics/conferences/1103/Zhou.pdf> 158 Dean Baker

Center for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMMS). 2011a. "National Health Expenditure Projections 2010-2020." Washington, DC: CMMS. <http://www.cms.gov/NationalHealthExpendData/downloads/proj2010.pdf>

Center for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMMS). 2011b. "National Health Expenditure Amounts by Type of Expenditure and Source of Funds: Calendar Years 1965-2020." Washington, DC: CMMS. <http://www.cms.gov/NationalHealthExpendData/downloads/nhe65-20.zip>

Congressional Budget Office (CBO). 2011a. "Budget and Economic Outlook, Fiscal Years 2011-2020." Washington, DC: CBO. <http://www.cbo.gov/doc.cfm?index=12039>

Congressional Budget Office (CBO). 2011b. "Estimated Impact of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act on Employment and Economic Output from January 2011 Through March 2011." Washington, DC: CBO. <http://www.cbo.gov/doc.cfm?index=12185&type=1>

Congressional Research Service (CRS). 2007. "U.S. Health Care Spending: Comparison With Other OECD Countries." Washington, DC: CRS. http://assets.opencrs.com/rpts/RL34175_20070917.pdf

Crimmann, Andreas, Frank Wießner, and Lutz Bellmann. 2010. "The German Work-sharing Scheme: An Instrument for the Crisis." Geneva: International Labour Organization. http://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/—ed_protect/—protrav/—travail/documents/publication/wcms_145335.pdf

Dunkelberg, William C. and Holly Wade. 2011. "NFIB Small Business Economic Trends." Nashville, TN: National Federation of Independent Business. <http://www.nfib.com/Portals/0/PDF/sbet/sbet201108.pdf>

European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions (EFILWC). 2010. "Extending Flexicurity: The Potential of Short-Time Work Schemes." Dublin: EFILWC.

Feyrer, James, and Bruce Sacerdote. 2011. "Did the Stimulus Stimulate? Real Time Estimates of the Effects of the American Readjustment and Recovery Act." Cambridge, MA: National Bureau of Economic Research.

Freeman, Eric. 2003. "Barriers to Foreign Professionals Working in the United States." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/professional_supplement.htm

Gagnon, Joseph, and Gary Hufbauer. 2011. "Taxing China's Assets: How to Increase U.S. Employment Without Launching a Trade War." Foreign Affairs, April 25. <http://www.foreignaffairs.com/articles/67810/joseph-gagnon-and-gary-hufbauer/taxing-chinas-assets>

The End of Loser Liberalism: Making Markets Progressive 159

Greenspan, Alan. 2002. "Monetary Policy and Economic Outlook." Testimony before the Joint Economic Committee, U.S. Congress, April 17. <http://www.federalreserve.gov/boarddocs/testimony/2002/20020417/default.htm>

Harris, Brian. 2006. "Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation, Analysis." Moody's Investors Service, Inc. http://www.freddiemac.com/investors/pdf/files/fm2006_moodys.pdf

Hudson, Michael W. 2010. The Monster: How a Gang of Predatory Lenders and Wall Street Bankers Fleeced America and Spawned a Global Crisis. New York: Times Books.

International Monetary Fund (IMF). 2010. "A Fair and Substantial Contribution by the Financial Sector." Report to the G-20 Toronto Summit, Toronto, Canada, June 26-27. <http://www.imf.org/external/np/g20/pdf/062710b.pdf>

Iwry, J. Mark, and David C. John. 2009. "Pursuing Retirement Security Through Automatic IRAs." Washington, DC: Brookings Institution. http://www.brookings.edu/papers/2009/07_automatic_ira_iwry.aspx

- Kirchhoff, Sue and Barbara Hagenbaugh. 2004. "Greenspan says ARMs might be better deal." USA Today, February 24. http://www.usatoday.com/money/economy/fed/2004-02-23-greenspan-debt_x.htm
- Klein, Alec and Zachary A. Goldfarb. 2008. "The Bubble." Washington Post, June 15. <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/14/AR2008061401479.html>
- Krugman, Paul. 2009. "Failure to Rise." New York Times, February 12. <http://www.nytimes.com/2009/02/13/opinion/13krugman.html>
- Lewin, Tamar. 2011. "Education Department Increases Its Regulation of For-Profit Colleges." New York Times, June 2. <http://www.nytimes.com/2011/06/02/education/02gainful.html>
- Messenger, Jon C. 2009. "Work Sharing: A Strategy to Preserve Jobs During the Global Jobs Crisis." Geneva: International Labour Organization. http://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/—ed_protect/—protrav/—travail/documents/publication/wcms_120705.pdf
- Milliot, Jim. 2010. "Book Sales Fell 1.8% in 2009, to $23.8 Billion, AAP Says." New York: Publishers Weekly. <http://www.publishersweekly.com/pw/by-topic/industry-news/bookselling/article/42745-book-sales-fell-1-8-in-2009-to-23-8-billion-aap-says.html>
- Newzoo. 2011. "Total Consumer Spend 2010." Newzoo. http://www.newzoo.com/ENG/1575-Total_Consumer_Spend_2010.html
- Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). 2010. "Employment Outlook 2010: Moving Beyond the Job Crisis." Paris: OECD. 160 Dean Baker
- Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). 2011. "Growing Income Inequality in OECD Countries: What Drives It and How Can Policy Tackle It?" Paris: OECD. <http://www.oecd.org/dataoecd/32/20/47723414.pdf>
- Pear, Robert. 1997. "A.M.A. and Colleges Assert There Is a Surfeit of Doctors." New York Times. March 1.
- Pew Research Center. 2010. "Americans Are of Two Minds on Trade." Washington, DC: Pew Research Center. <http://pewresearch.org/pubs/1795/poll-free-trade-agreements-jobs-wages-economic-growth-china-japan-canada>
- Popper, National. 2010. "Andrew Cuomo, Steve Rattner Settle N.Y. Pension Fund Case." Los Angeles Times, December 30.
- Ray, Rebecca and John Schmitt. 2007. "No-Vacation Nation." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/2007-05-no-vacation-nation.pdf>
- Ray, Rebecca, Janet C. Gornick, and John Schmitt. 2008. "Parental Leave Policies in 21 Countries: Assessing Generosity and Gender Equality." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/parental_2008_09.pdf
- Reinhold, Rich. 2000. "Union Membership in 2000: Numbers Decline During Record Economic Expansion." Illinois Labor Market Review. Vol. 6, No. 4. <http://lmi.ides.state.il.us/lmr/union.htm>
- Rosnick, David and Dean Baker. 2011a. "Representative Ryan's $30 Trillion Medicare Waste Tax." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/ryan-waste-2011-04.pdf>
- Rosnick, David and Dean Baker. 2011b. "When Numbers Don't Add Up: The Statistical Discrepancy in GDP Accounts." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/gdp-2011-08.pdf>
- Rosnick, David and Mark Weisbrot. 2006. "Are Shorter Work Hours Good for the Environment? A Comparison of U.S. & European Energy Consumption." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/energy_2006_12.pdf

Schmitt, John. 2008. "The Union Wage Advantage for Low-Wage Workers." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/quantile_2008_05.pdf The End of Loser Liberalism: Making Markets Progressive 161

Schmitt, John. 2011. "Labor Market Policy in the Great Recession: Some Lessons from Denmark and Germany." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/labor-2011-05.pdf>

Schmitt, John and Ben Zipperer. 2009. "Dropping the Ax: Illegal Firings During Union Election Campaigns, 1951-2007." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/documents/publications/dropping-the-ax-update-2009-03.pdf>

Shiller, Robert J. 2006. "Long-Term Perspectives on the Current Boom in Home Prices." The Economists' Voice, Vol. 3, No. 4.

Sun, Lena H. 1996. "Caught in the Middle." Washington Post, March 19.

Tax Policy Center. 2010. "T10-0188 - Department of the Treasury Revenue Estimates for Extension of 2001 and 2003 Tax Cuts and the Administration's High-Income Tax Proposals Impact on Tax Revenue ($ billions), 2010-20." Washington, DC: Tax Policy Center. <http://www.taxpolicycenter.org/numbers/displayatab.cfm?DocID=2785>

United Nations Statistics Division. 2010. "Environmental Indicators: Greenhouse Gas Emissions." New York: United Nations. http://unstats.un.org/unsd/environment/air_co2_emissions.htm

U.S. Department of the Treasury and U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. 2011. "Reforming America's Housing Finance Market: A Report to Congress." Washington, DC: U.S. Department of the Treasury and U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Visser, Jelle. 2011. "ICTWSS: Database on Institutional Characteristics of Trade Unions, Wage Setting, State Intervention and Social Pacts in 34 countries between 1960 and 2010." Amsterdam: Amsterdam Institute for Advanced Labour Studies. <http://www.uva-aias.net/208>

Woo, Nicole. 2011. "Job Creation that Both Parties Can Agree On." Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research. <http://www.cepr.net/index.php/blogs/cepr-blog/job-creation-that-both-parties-can-agree-on>

Zandi, Mark and Cristian deRitis. 2011. "The Future of the Mortgage Finance System." New York: Moody's Analytics. <http://www.economy.com/mark-zandi/documents/Mortgage-Finance-Reform-020711.pdf>

About the Author (and his dog)

Dean Baker is an economist and the co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research (www.cepr.net). He is the author of Taking Economics Seriously, False Profits: Recovering from the Bubble Economy, Plunder and Blunder: The Rise and Fall of the Bubble Economy, The United States Since 1980, The Conservative Nanny State: How the Wealthy Use the Government to Stay Rich and Get Richer, Social Security: The Phony Crisis (with Mark Weisbrot), and The Benefits of Full Employment (with Jared Bernstein). He was the editor of Getting Prices Right: The Debate Over the Consumer Price Index, which was a winner of a Choice Book Award as one of the outstanding academic books of the year. He appears frequently on TV and radio programs, including CNN, CBS News, PBS News Hour, and National Public Radio. His blog, "Beat the Press," features commentary on economic reporting. He received his B.A. from Swarthmore College and his Ph.D. in economics from the University of Michigan.

Biscuit is a 10-year old lapdog. He is retired from his career as unwanted pet. Biscuit's former owner surrendered him to the Washington Humane Society due to economic hardship. He went to foster care and was adopted quickly. However, his new owner returned him half a year later because of health problems. Biscuit quickly settled into his old foster home and this time was determined to stay. He succeeded. His foster parents adopted him after failing to find a home for him. Biscuit graduated from the Washington Humane Society's Learning and Behavioral Center with a degree in Well-Mannered Dog. He is currently in training for his Canine Good Citizen certificate and would love to become a therapy dog working in retirement homes. He lives in Washington, DC with Dean Baker, Helene, and his two sisters Kiwi-the-shep-mix and Olive-the-Doberman.

20111011-10 19:41 Mary Re: Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveB,

I understand your "issue" is immigration, so I wondered what you thought about SB1070, and the fact that the federal government is suing AZ over it. I also understand, although I can't authenticate my source, that 1/3 of felons in AZ prisons are illegals. Looks like U.S. tax dollars are taking care of them one way or another, huh? How is it that Obama and Holder are on the side of the drug cartel? Guess I'm just old school, but I expect my government to protect its citizens against "foreign and domestic enemies". Just wanted to get y'all going again!

20111012-01 06:05 SteveB Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

So happy to see the healthcare / "Obamacare" issue debated. I don't know of anything more important.

I am absolutely appalled that anyone would think "Obamacare" is what has sunk the economy. Ludicrous (or Ludacris!)!

We have "socialized" medicine here in Bolivia, and it works very well. Doctors are happy and it doesn't break the bank of even a poor country (yet poor Bolivia has no national debt). I feel much more secure here than I would in the States as far as my medical care goes. I believe Pam is right about Canada being a model system too.

The numbers [partly obscured by the recession] show that Obama is doing a much better job than George Bush at border security and handling illegals, but it's still not nearly enough. It's not my biggest issue, but I think border security is important. And I don't share all this agony, guilt, or suffering over the issue. Regardless, given the relative performance of the last two Presidents, I don't see this as any issue to make me go running into the outstretched arms of Rick Perry or any other Republican candidate. But neither party has shown much courage in dealing with illegal immigration, have they?

To me, it's just one more area that is not being handled by our non-functioning government.

MY BIGGEST ISSUE IS THE CORRUPTION OF OUR POLITICAL SYSTEM VIA HUGE CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS THAT MUST BE PAID BACK WITH FAVORS!!!! WE NEED REAL CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM TO EVER BE ABLE TO RETURN TO A WORKING DEMOCRACY.

And I must try to remember my morning mantra: The Founding Fathers did not want us to have a functioning government because of their extreme mistrust of government. (Now, if there was just a way for this extremist philosophy to help us solve our problems...)

20111012-02 06:12 SteveB Re: Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich..."

Dear Pam,

I certainly will (see it). Love it! Thank you. This is what we need, more clear talk. And I loved your last email about healthcare and couldn't agree more. When I think about all the children needlessly suffering and dying... I hate that this part of the political system is controlled by the greed of doctors and big corporations, to the detriment of patients and non-patients alike. Everyone knows the current system is broken, but the greed prevents the repair.

20111012-03 06:18 SteveB Re: Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich..."

This is some clear thinking and talking from Pam and Robert Reich. The site was so busy this morning that I had a little trouble with the first link, so if it doesn't work, maybe try one of the others.

What are your thoughts?

<http://bit.ly/nFXUy8>

<http://front.moveon.org/what-if-everyone-saw-this-clip-of-robert-reich-exposing-7-gop-lies>

<http://front.moveon.org/>

20111012-04 06:26 SteveB Re: The End of Loser Liberalism...

Dear Dennis,

WOW!

20111012-05 06:27 Pam Re: Our Group

Dear Steve,

Question: Why are some people dropping off your list? It doesn't seem to me that anyone has been too ugly, though I suppose if this were a right-wing group I'd want off too. I just think that if people keep talking and not just shouting past each other, and if everyone truly wants what's best, regardless of politics, then eventually we could work our way out of this mess. I think there's something flawed in human nature itself that dooms us from the get go. Like hyena babies that when they're born the stronger one kills the weaker one right off.

Savage. That's us.

20111012-06 08:02 GaryC Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

Dear SteveB,

If Socialized medicine is so great, why is your hero Cesar Chavez going out of country for treatments instead of staying in Venezuela? Is it because the facilities suck, the doctors are leaving the country in the middle of the night and normal people wait months for operations?

In fairness, (since I believe in the full story not half truths), he is going to Cuba for treatment. But, it is still ironic. Cuba can be explained by the fact that most of their resources go to the health care system and restoring old cars.

20111012-07 09:26 Clark Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

Dear GaryC,

This is a total non-sequitor and red herring. You're confusing the health care system (most likely backward in Venezuela—did Venezuela have a good medical system before Chavez?) with access to health care, which is the problem in the U.S. The U.S. has top-flight facilities but millions of people effectively lack access to them due to lack of insurance or the money to pay even if they have insurance (which often sucks). Why do you think more and more Americans are traveling to India for their health care? Because it's cheap. World leaders can afford to go where the best facilities are, but many of our own citizens cannot. And the world leaders won't be turned away—or turned down for care by our stingy, profit-hungry insurance companies. And yes, Chavez did go to Cuba, which by your own admission has damn good socialized medicine—as well as access to it by its own citizens. And their auto repair shops are amazing. And their mojitos. Wouldn't want to be in prison there, though, or waiting in a food line. Why can't we have affordable health care access along with relative political and economic freedom?

20111012-08 09:50 Pam Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

Dear Clark and GaryC,

That's the big question, Clark. Why can't we have both? I think it's because too many people are making money out of the system we have now, and they don't want to give it up. I don't know how the medical profession felt about socialized medicine in Britain in 1948, but they didn't have a choice. Now the Brits feel about the National Health the way we do about Social Security—keep your hands off! I know some will say their system has flaws; so does everything a human being puts his hands on. But overall, by every measurement, America is NOT tops when it comes to health care. Our infant mortality, to name just one indicator, is nowhere near the top. Sure, if you live in Boston or New York and have a Cadillac insurance plan, you can get the latest thing. But if you live in Podunk, U.S., or in a building covered with graffiti, you'd better have luck on your side.

It seems to me that our attitude towards money is a big part of what holds us back. The love of money is the root of all evil, and all that. I fully understand the anxiety felt by middle class people who, if they lost half their income, would be poor. But those who never have to count the cost of anything should give a little. I used to know a family in Indiana who were, at least to my eyes, rich, probably the richest people I've ever been close to. Here's what they did with all that money: adopted a Korean orphan, served in the Peace Corps, put two Ethiopian boys through Purdue, started and ran (in a specially designed room in their house) the county humane society, built that house by hand in a cornfield, supported an art gallery, and who knows what else. They lived a comfortable life, but they didn't sit on their wealth like a dragon sits on treasure. Great, you say, but people should be free to decide what to do with their own money. Well, past a certain point, I'm not so sure. If more people had jobs and good health care and a decent place to live and affordable education for their children, we wouldn't need Occupy Wall Street. Everyone could just get on with their lives. But too many of us don't have those things. Too many of us are like Charles Dickens, who as a hungry child stood outside a pastry shop with his nose pressed against the glass, wishing for what he couldn't have. I wish Dickens were alive today. He'd have a thing or two to say about Wall Street, Big Pharma, and the rest.

20111012-09	11:21	Pam	Re: Our Group
-------------	-------	-----	---------------

Here I go again.

First, about this group. For months (years?) I went around boiling with anger at what was going on in our economy and our politics. I'm not an angry person, so I found these feelings very troubling. I didn't want to feel the way I was feeling and no amount of discussion with my like-minded friends seemed to help much. We expressed our anger and went home still feeling mad as hell.

Then I found this group—or it found me—and I started slowing down enough to think. Writing focuses my mind, perhaps because of my training, and leads me to clarify my arguments in such a way that I hope they have a chance of maybe changing somebody's mind. When I do this, I no longer feel so angry. All that emotion gets drained off in writing these posts. I feel less angry and troubled, and that's a good thing. I welcome different points of view, because I really do want to get as close to the truth as possible. This isn't "My dad can beat up your dad." We have serious problems, and it's foolish to waste our breath ranting when we need to be figuring things out. (The occasional rant is OK by me. We don't want to get too stodgy.)

Was it you, Dennis, who recommended the article in the New Yorker on Keynes? I just read it and found it most enlightening. If he isn't reasonable, I don't know who is. He was a pragmatist, not an ideologue. He saw through Marxism and communism when other intellectuals got sucked down a rabbit hole. I know argument by analogy proves nothing, but it can be illustrative. Compare an 18th c. physician to a 21st c. doctor. Both want to save their patient. The 18th c. doc opens a vein, weakening the poor slob gasping for breath. The 21st c. healer prescribes an antibiotic, and the patient is well in ten days. You can't say the 18th c. doctor didn't have good intentions. He wanted to preserve life, right here, right now.

Now compare Marxism or Stalinism to capitalism. Capitalism is meant to float all boats, make life better and richer for people alive today, without worrying about what creed or ideology they believe in. Stalin wanted to remake humanity. He wanted to cram that stepsister's foot into Cinderella's shoe, and he actually believed he could do it. BELIEF doesn't make things WORK. Capitalism is not a belief system. Everything I read tells me that when our gov't. has spent money to get us out of a recession, it has worked. You don't have to take antibiotics forever to get over pneumonia; you don't have to have a stimulus or a jobs bill forever to get things going. But letting nature take its course is not the way to go.

20111012-10 11:32 Mark Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

Actually access to healthcare facilities in the U.S. is not the problem here.....my wife works in an emergency room.....anyone that can drag themselves to an emergency room in any small town or large city will be seen. They're seen and treated even if they don't have a dime to spend. That's a whole 'nother problem. Using an emergency room as a " family doctor" has become a common occurrence. I'm sure you've read some stories about hospitalized illegal aliens that are receiving rx. at a hospital and have run up costs in the millions.....the hospitals have attempted to repatriate the patient due to the costs...

[Yet access to healthcare is still a big problem. Try going to an Emergency Room for cancer treatment or dialysis. — SteveB]

20111012-11 11:35 Pam Re: Our Group

Dear SteveB,

I love getting email too, and most of it these days is coming from the group. I find our discussions very energizing. I don't know how to post to the group without clicking Reply though. Can you help me there?

I wondered if you were open to adding people. I know at least one person who might be interested. She's a dear friend, living in RI, who shares most, if not all, of my views. She's also very articulate. I will float the idea to her.

20111012-12 11:44 Clark Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy

Dear Mark,

True, as far as it goes. Rather than "facilities" I should have said the health care system as a whole, which includes necessary tests, preventative care and check-ups, non-emergency treatments and surgeries, prenatal care etc etc, all the things that go way beyond the emergency room for those who can't afford them or have inadequate insurance.

You've certainly identified one of the things most wrong with our system, the reliance on emergency rooms for medical care that often otherwise would be handled in a doctor's office. This is an expensive, wasteful system that taxpayers often pick up the tab for, or hospitals pass the costs along to other patients. It's insane, and one of the things Health Care Reform is attempting to address by making sure everyone has insurance.

20111012-13 13:19 Dennis "Something's Happening Here"

from Pam:

Capitalism is not a belief system. Everything I read tells me that when our government has spent money to get us out of a recession, it has worked. You don't have to take antibiotics forever to get over pneumonia; you don't have to have a stimulus or a jobs bill forever to get things going. But letting nature take its course is not the way to go.

Dear Pam,

With all due respect for Keynesian theory I think it is not more than an antibiotic to temporarily treat the symptoms of a hemorrhaging unsustainable capitalism. Thomas Friedman's column today spells it out. [below]

The right suffers from believing in an illusion of capitalism that doesn't exist. Their ideological solutions are even based on theories by Hayek, Milton Friedman, et al, that they don't even comprehend and then misrepresent. They believe that economics can be determined by political alchemy, sort of a version of Mao Zedong's "politics in command" theory that was so disastrous for China. That's why it's so futile trying to discuss these ideas with them. The whole capitalist system will implode around them and they will remain clueless.

"Something's Happening Here" by Thomas Friedman, The New York Times

Oct. 12, 2011, (http://www.nytimes.com/2011/10/12/opinion/theres-something-happening-here.html?_r=1&ref=thomasfriedman)

When you see spontaneous social protests erupting from Tunisia to Tel Aviv to Wall Street, it's clear that something is happening globally that needs defining. There are two unified theories out there that intrigue me. One says this is the start of "The Great Disruption." The other says that this is all part of "The Big Shift." You decide.

Paul Gilding, the Australian environmentalist and author of the book "The Great Disruption," argues that these demonstrations are a sign that the current growth-obsessed capitalist system is reaching its financial and ecological limits. "I look at the world as an integrated system, so I don't see these protests, or the debt crisis, or inequality, or the economy, or the climate going weird, in isolation—I see our system in the painful process of breaking down," which is what he means by the Great Disruption, said Gilding. "Our system of economic growth, of ineffective democracy, of overloading planet earth—our system—is eating itself alive. Occupy Wall Street is like the kid in the fairy story saying what everyone knows but is afraid to say: the emperor has no clothes. The system is broken. Think about the promise of global market capitalism. If we let the system work, if we let the rich get richer, if we let corporations focus on profit, if we let pollution go unpriced and unchecked, then we will all be better off. It may not be equally distributed, but the poor will get less poor, those who work hard will get jobs, those who study hard will get better jobs and we'll have enough wealth to fix the environment.

"What we now have—most extremely in the U.S. but pretty much everywhere—is the mother of all broken promises," Gilding adds. "Yes, the rich are getting richer and the corporations are making profits—with their executives richly rewarded. But, meanwhile, the people are getting worse off—drowning in housing debt and/or tuition debt—many who worked hard are unemployed; many who studied hard are unable to get good work; the environment is getting more and more damaged; and people are realizing their kids will be even worse off than they are. This particular round of protests may build or may not, but what will not go away is the broad coalition of those to whom the system lied and who have now woken up. It's not just the environmentalists, or the poor, or the unemployed. It's most people, including the highly educated middle class, who are feeling the results of a system that saw all the growth of the last three decades go to the top 1 percent."

Not so fast, says John Hagel III, who is the co-chairman of the Center for the Edge at Deloitte, along with John Seely Brown. In their recent book, "The Power of Pull," they suggest that we're in the early stages of a "Big Shift," precipitated by the merging of globalization and the Information Technology Revolution. In the early stages, we experience this Big Shift as mounting pressure, deteriorating performance and growing stress because we continue to operate with institutions and practices that are increasingly dysfunctional—so the eruption of protest movements is no surprise.

Yet, the Big Shift also unleashes a huge global flow of ideas, innovations, new collaborative possibilities and new market opportunities. This flow is constantly getting richer and faster. Today, they argue, tapping the global flow becomes the key to productivity, growth and prosperity. But to tap this flow effectively, every country, company and individual needs to be constantly growing their talents.

"We are living in a world where flow will prevail and topple any obstacles in its way," says Hagel. "As flow gains momentum, it undermines the precious knowledge stocks that in the past gave us security and wealth. It calls on us to learn faster by working together and to pull out of ourselves more of our true potential, both individually and collectively. It excites us with the possibilities that can only be realized by participating in a broader range of flows. That is the essence of the Big Shift."

Yes, corporations now have access to more cheap software, robots, automation, labor and genius than ever. So holding a job takes more talent. But the flip side is that individuals—individuals—anywhere can now access the flow to take online courses at Stanford from a village in Africa, to start a new company with customers everywhere or to collaborate with people anywhere. We have more big problems than ever and more problem-solvers than ever.

So there you have it: Two master narratives—one threat-based, one opportunity-based, but both involving seismic changes. Gilding is actually an optimist at heart. He believes that while the Great Disruption is inevitable, humanity is best in a crisis, and, once it all hits, we will rise to the occasion and produce transformational economic and social change (using tools of the Big Shift). Hagel is also an optimist. He knows the Great Disruption may be barreling down on us, but he believes that the Big Shift has also created a world where more people than ever have the tools, talents and potential to head it off. My heart is with Hagel, but my head says that you ignore Gilding at your peril.

You decide.

20111012-14 14:07 Jim Re: Our Group

I just threw out all the old stuff that had accumulated on this title. At least half of it was a paragraph of addresses and a one or two line comment but the topics went back to Oct. 8 and ranged from the postal funding through several presidents, medical care or the lack thereof and immigration etc., etc.

It is convenient to hit reply all and keep the topic header but let's clean up after ourselves occasionally or start a new topic and actually type in addresses. Or you can reply with this one and delete my message. Thank you.

20111012-15 14:17 SteveB Re: Our Group

Dear Pam,

Well...the medium is not perfect...but I'm not sure blogs always are either. Mmmmm...

When I open one of my two main mailboxes in the mornings, I find a lot of email and I'm used to it. And I'm not counting the stuff in my Junk mailbox that wants to make my thing bigger and stronger and help me through menopause, rich from an incredibly great banking error in my favor in Nigeria.

I take a few seconds and delete the marketing stuff I'm not presently interested in.

Put the travel deals in the travel folder. Handle business. Then I'm happy to have a very few personal emails directly to me. Then I'm happy to have emails from my friends with jokes, satire, tips, links, articles, or whatever. And I'm very happy to have emails from our "group" about important subjects.

Some people don't like too much email and, for some reason, fight it tooth and nail. Some people don't like "politics". We'll get them weeded out. Their loss, in my estimation.

I think Jim's suggestion today of starting new threads more often and deleting stuff from existing threads to keep things smaller should help. I've been trying to do that for a while. And I need to ask everyone to think about and inquire of people on their email lists who might share our concerns if they might like to join the discussion. All my life I have always gone under the assumption that my friends' friends are my friends, and that has usually served me well. And it's a group I've always been impressed with.

Yes, I've already pretty much made up my mind. But I want to learn how we change people and how they went wrong in the first place. Hopeless, probably, but hope springs eternal.

20111012-16 14:24 Jim Re: Our Group

Dear Jim,

Excellent idea. I, for one, am going to start doing a better job with the cleanup. Thank you!

20111012-17 15:28 Pam Re: The End of Loser Liberalism...

Dear Dennis,

This is very good. I think Friedman has it right. I have no idea which view is going to prevail. Are we at the end of something and heading for the abyss, or is this the beginning of a brave new world? Whichever way it goes, a lot of people are going to get chewed up in the process. I've never been much of an optimist; I wish I were. If the climate keeps getting ever more inhospitable, politics is going to be the least of our worries.

I just read another article in this week's New Yorker—about Art Pope, a conservative moneybags who is buying up the state where I live: North Carolina. I found the article as chilling as anything I've read lately, especially as I have seen firsthand the effects of his influence. He has decimated the state university system, just for a start. I can't help feeling that the Right is on a roll. I feel like we're being engulfed by ideologues who have forgotten or never knew what life was like in Britain during the 18th & 19th c. laissez faire market and industrial revolution. England avoided revolution in the mid-19th c. (in my view, at least) by instituting a series of Reform Bills that expanded the franchise. These reforms were not necessarily an attempt at fairness; they were a frightened response to the riots in the streets and the Luddites who were smashing up factories. William Blake wrote poems about little chimney sweeps dying of cancer of the scrotum caused by exposure to soot, and laws were enacted to protect workers from abuse, exploitation, and dangerous working conditions. Read Engels on the London poor if you want your hair raised. Sometimes it's been two steps forward, one step back, but over the last couple of centuries, we have made progress. Now I see it slipping away. An ugly mindset has become not just acceptable but popular.

Up until the 19th c. in England, charity was left to local parish churches. Gentlewomen took baskets of food to starving widows and orphans, which made those ladies feel good and the poor families beholden. Those who slipped too far down the economic ladder were sent to workhouses, where families were split up and children were put to work picking oakum out of rope—a nasty job. SteveG posted a video about the plight of migrant-worker children (either here or on Facebook), which shows that even today similar abuses are occurring. I know that when I buy out-of-season raspberries I am complicit in an unfair system, but I'm weak and I like raspberries. That's why fairness has to be socially implemented, not left up to personal caprice. I think that's why moral arguments, persuasive as they might be, are no match for self-interest. If our system collapses, the rich are going down just as surely as the rest of us.

20111012-18	17:34	GaryF	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

This is the problem, if you don't have insurance you go to the emergency room, where you get trauma treatment at the very least. If we had universal health care the emergency rooms would not be so crowded because people could go to a doctor, and the hospitals wouldn't have to make up for the lost revenue by charging those of us with insurance.

20111012-19	18:23	SteveG	Fw: DCCC Petition: Call for an Immediate Investigation into Koch Industries' Business Dealings with Iran
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

from DCCC:

Controversial Republican billionaire brothers Charles and David Koch — who have spent untold millions bankrolling right-wing candidates and causes — are now the subject of a new Bloomberg investigation that shows Koch Industries profited from business with Iran.

This is all despite American trade sanctions against Iran and the country's known links to financing terrorists. House Republican Leadership's response: Silence.

This is unacceptable. We can't let this stand.

Sign our petition right now calling for Speaker Boehner and House Republicans to immediately demand an investigation of Koch Industries' business dealings with Iran:

<http://www.dccc.org/pages/kochbrothers>.

20111013-01	07:25	SteveG	Why Republicans Like Cain's 9-9-9 Plan
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

From comments at <http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/44881446>:

9-9-9. Really?

1. This is kiddy code for reducing (1) the highest marginal income brackets and (2) the capital gains rate. All while increasing sales and use taxes that would disproportionately impact those of us who spend all or most of our income (which would thus be subject to taxation).
2. Under 9-9-9, assuming you're like the 98% of Americas who spend basically all of their income, your tax would be 18%. you'd get taxed once when you made it and once when you spent it. Notably, since the rich spend only a very tiny portion of their income (think 10%), their effective tax rate would be somewhere around 10%.
3. One thing is for sure, the poor will pay more!
4. For the rich, the 9-9-9 tax plan would reduce taxes for most. For the poor, the 9-9-9 plan would increase taxes...devastating for the very poor. I assume charitable donation and mortgage interest deductions would cease...devastating to non-profit organizations and the Middle Class.
5. This is just another attempt to balance the budget on the backs of the poor...especially the poor brown and black brothers of one Herman Cain. Let me spell the real 9-9-9 plan for you: G-R-E-E-D!

20111013-02 07:45 SteveB Why Democrats Don't Like Obama

This is what Obama had to say on Tuesday:

I was mentioning to some of the basketball players who were here that this is like the second quarter, maybe the third, and we've still got a lot of work to do. But I want everybody to know I'm a fourth-quarter player.

I guess that explains why he hasn't done anything so far, including leading the country. He's saving himself until the very end! Now I get it. I just wish that during the last election, when we were in a state of national crisis, Obama would have mentioned to us voters that we shouldn't expect him to actually do anything until, maybe, his last few months in office.

(Though I still would never have been able to bring myself to vote for that old, senile guy and his ignorant sidekick. I guess I would have had to wait on the sidelines, hoping the 4th quarter would bring better candidates. But no such luck.)

20111013-03 08:18 SteveB "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

"What Should the White House Do? Panic!" by James Carville, CNN

Sept. 18, 2011, (<http://www.cnn.com/2011/09/14/opinion/carville-white-house-advice/index.html>)

(Obviously, the White House didn't listen...)

(Editor's note: James Carville is a Democratic strategist who serves as a political contributor for CNN, appearing frequently on CNN's "The Situation Room" as well as other programs on all CNN networks. Carville remains active in Democratic politics and is a party fundraiser.)

People often ask me what advice I would give the White House about various things. Today I was mulling over election results from New York and Nevada while thinking about that very question.

What should the White House do now? One word came to mind: Panic!

We are far past sending out talking points. Do not attempt to dumb it down. We cannot stand any more explanations. Have you talked to any Democratic senators lately? I have. It's pretty damn clear they are not happy campers.

This is what I would say to President Barack Obama: The time has come to demand a plan of action that requires a complete change from the direction you are headed. I don't know how else to break this down. Simply put:

1. Fire somebody.

No—fire a lot of people! This may be news to you but this is not going well. For precedent, see Russian Army 64th division at Stalingrad. There were enough deaths at Stalingrad to make the entire tea party collectively orgasm. Mr. President, your hinge of fate must turn. Bill Clinton fired many people in 1994 and took a lot of heat for it. Reagan fired most of his campaign staff in 1980.

Republicans historically fired their own speaker, Newt Gingrich. Bush fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. For God's sake, why are we still looking at the same political and economic advisers that got us into this mess? It's not working. Furthermore, it's not going to work with the same team, the same strategy and the same excuses. I know economic analysts are smart—some work 17-hour days. It's time to show them the exit. Wake up—show us you are doing something.

2. Indict people.

There are certain people in American finance who haven't been held responsible for utterly ruining the economic fabric of our country. Demand from the attorney general a clear status of the state of investigation concerning these extraordinary injustices imposed upon the American people. I know Attorney General Eric Holder is a close friend of yours, but if his explanations aren't good, fire him too. Demand answers to why no one has been indicted.

Mr. President, people are livid. Tell people that you, too, are angry and sickened by the irresponsible actions on Wall Street that caused so much suffering. Do not accept excuses. Demand action now.

3. Make a case like a Democrat.

While we are going along with the Republican austerity garbage, who is making the case against it? It's not the Democrats! We are allowing the over-educated, over-explanatory bureaucrat by the name of (Congressional Budget Office director Douglas) Elmendorf do all the talking. Do not let him make your case. Let us make your case. Is it any wonder that we were doing better in the middle of the stimulus-spending period than we are doing with the austerity program?

4. Hold fast to an explanation.

Stick to your rationale for what has happened and what is going to happen under your leadership. You must carry this through until the election (never say that things are improving because evidently they are not).

As I watch the Republican debates, I realize that we are on the brink of a crazy person running our nation. I sit in front of the television and shudder at the thought of one of these creationism-loving, global-warming-denying, immigration-bashing, Social-Security-cutting, clean-air-hating, mortality-fascinated, Wall-Street-protecting Republicans running my country.

The course we are on is not working. The hour is late, and the need is great. Fire. Indict. Fight.

20111013-04	08:50	SteveB	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Mark,

The GAO states that the new health care legislation could provide “notable improvement” to our economic outlook. Tell me once again what it is that the Republicans find so distasteful about this.

“The federal government faces long-term fiscal pressures that predate the economic downturn and are driven on the spending side largely by rising health care costs and an aging population. GAO’s simulations show continually increasing levels of debt that are unsustainable over the long-term. Under the Alternative simulation, debt held by the public as a share of GDP would exceed the historical high reached in the aftermath of World War II by 2020. Both of these simulations incorporate effects of health care legislation enacted in Mar., 2010, which includes a number of provisions to control the growth of healthcare costs. GAO finds fiscal “notable improvement” in “Obamacare.””

Republicans hate it.

20111013-05 08:51 Pam Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear SteveB,

I think James Carville is creepy, and I love that guy on Sat. Night Live who does an imitation of him. But he's right on the money here. People ARE livid. I'd like to see some heads roll and some accountability, but more importantly we need to follow Keynes' advice.

I know this sounds crazy, but do you think there will ever be a unified global economy, along the lines of the euro (rip)? Would it ever be possible for every person in the world to have opportunity and a decent income? Or does there always have to be an underclass to prop the rest up?

20111013-06 08:52 Pam Re: Why Republicans Like Cain's 9-9-9 Plan

Dear SteveB,

Total agreement here. My best friend, Laurie, LOVES Herman Cain and his 999 boondoggle. I can't see it. It's so obvious to me that 999 is good to the rich and horrible to the poor and middle class. I never liked Steve Forbes' 17% flat tax either.

20111013-07 09:02 GaryC Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Great points by James. [Carville —SteveB]

However, this is what you get when you elect a community organizer who never did anything in the ILL or U.S. Senate, other than vote present. (Disclaimer: I didn't like the other choice either.) One point I want to make about Carville though is that as long as he wants to indict Wall Street, you need to add Frank, Dodd, Reid, and Pelosi who made this mess happen in the first place.

[You mean when they weren't really in power? Because that's when the "mess happened in the first place." —SteveB]

20111013-08 09:15 Bill Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Pam,

Good questions, and perhaps Keynes would agree, but he would advise, I'm sure, that Congress balance the budget as soon as possible or, better, generate a surplus to pay down debt. Since the Congress, for purposes of a balanced budget, seems unwilling to restrain spending or impose more or higher rates of taxation, the answer seems elusive.

20111013-09 9:21 Charis Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear GaryC,

The Dodd-Frank Act was designed to ensure multinational companies of the extractive industries (primarily mining, oil and gas) avoid practices such as "transfer pricing" and to ensure they report their costs and profits on a country by country basis, for each and every one of their subsidiaries. It was designed to ensure their illegal use of transfer pricing and tax havens is cut short so they will be obligated to report and pay all the taxes they are supposed to pay in each country in which they work.

20111013-10 09:40 GaryC Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Charis,

Dodd and Franks should be indicted for the housing mess they helped to create and perpetuate.

[Oh, but no Republicans should be indicted for the 2008 Crash? —SteveB]

20111013-11 09:44 GaryC Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Pam,

Keynes' theory has been pretty much repudiated by none other than the Nobel Prize committee, hardly a bastion of conservatism. check this out.

<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052970203499704576622840100251326.html?KEYWORDS=nobel+prize+economics>

[See article below: "The Return of Rational Expectations" —SteveB]

20111013-12 09:51 Pam Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear GaryC,

Did you read the New Yorker article? I'd like to know what you think of it. Also, explain why the economy improved with the stimulus, then tanked again when the stimulus ran out. :-) (That's a friendly smile, not a sarcastic one. You can't be too careful.)

20111013-13 10:16 GaryC Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Pam,

I can't say that I have totally read enough about the Obama stimulus to make a really educated "guess" but I think the stimulus did not work because it did not really create jobs. A lot of the money was used to keep teachers, firemen and state employees employed. It not create construction jobs as promised because of the fact that the planning and permitting had not been done. In my simplistic opinion, it was a temporary band aid done to appease the voters who put Obama in office. It did not address infrastructure or systemic issues with the economy. It certainly helped a few people and it reduced some misery but the cost per job is way higher than what the private economy could have done if the same amount of money had been "invested" in the U.S.

Unfortunately, we who pay taxes will be bearing the burden of this "mistake" for a long, long time. Here is the worst statistic from this fiasco. 30% of black males under 25 are unemployed in our major U.S. cities. So the very people who vote blindly for him are the worst hit by this recession.

Yes, I know, George Bush created this mess!

20111013-14 11:25 Pam Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear GaryC and Bill,

OK, the economy hasn't tanked, not with all those corporate profits we keep hearing about. We all agree that joblessness is the biggest issue at the moment. I know that spending yourself out of a recession is counter-intuitive, but what's the alternative? Firing teachers, social workers, firefighters, police? If money can be spent to rescue the banks, and I understand why that was done, then why can't money be "invested" in people on the street? If the banks won't give credit to small business entrepreneurs and potential home buyers, then the money has to come from somewhere. I say, let the govt. kick in and get money flowing.

Maybe if we could unlock the engine, we wouldn't have to keep providing a jump start. What's going to MAKE people and businesses spend money and expand? Isn't money what is needed? Let's see, who's got some?

20111013-15

12:03

GaryC

Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!" & "The Return of Rational Expectations" & "Economists Win Nobel for Focus on Real World"

Dear Pam,

Here are the articles if you cannot get to them. Interesting read.

"The Return of Rational Expectations" by Paul Gigot and Dan Henninger, WSJ

Oct. 12, 2011, (<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052970203499704576622840100251326.html>)

(On the Nobel Prize in Economics winners and this week's GOP debate.)

This year's winners of the Nobel Prize in economics have played key roles in developing what we now call modern macroeconomics. But we wouldn't blame Thomas Sargent and Christopher Sims if they feel less than fully welcome these days in the field they helped to shape.

Consider Mr. Sargent's influential work on rational-expectations models. According to this theory, people do not respond passively to changes in economic policy or circumstances. They anticipate future conditions and adjust according to their best interests.

As Mr. Sargent, who teaches at New York University and is a fellow at the Hoover Institution, has put it:

The concept of rational expectations asserts that outcomes do not differ systemically (i.e., regularly or predictably) from what people expected them to be. The concept is motivated by the same thinking that led Abraham Lincoln to assert, 'You can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time.' [Rational expectations] does not deny that people often make forecasting errors, but it does suggest that errors will not persistently occur on one side or the other.

This means it is hard for politicians to manipulate people into behaving in ways that don't make economic sense. One implication is that loose monetary policy cannot permanently lower unemployment because people will anticipate higher future inflation and demand higher wages and interest rates in compensation. Likewise, temporary fiscal stimulus won't change consumer spending permanently because it doesn't change underlying wealth or income.

The rational-expectations school was supposed to have been discredited by the 2008 Panic, with the conventional wisdom saying that it was a lesson in market failure and the need for government intervention. The mania and panic of the 2000's certainly were a reminder that markets sometimes overshoot, especially when prodded by government subsidies for credit. We also know many investors who have become very rich betting not on fundamentals but on the occasional madness of crowds.

Yet markets also inevitably correct, as new information is absorbed. And as we move further from the subprime meltdown, the wisdom of rational expectations is once again asserting itself. The failure of the "temporary, targeted" Keynesian agenda to restore growth has become obvious.

A professor at Princeton, Mr. Sims is best-known for his mathematically elegant work on methods for interrogating macroeconomic data. He has been an active proponent of the "fiscal theory of the price level," which suggests that consumer prices aren't merely determined by the money supply. The public fiscal matters too. A persistent government budget deficit can cause run-ups in the price level because of the inflationary measures that governments are tempted to take to finance their liabilities.

Yet Mr. Sims has also argued that the powers of central banks are limited. "Monetary policy," he said in a 2007 interview, "is not as important as many people have thought in generating business cycles." The irrational expectation that so many have placed for three years on near-zero interest rates to conjure a recovery would seem to validate his point.

With this year's picks, the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences upholds its reputation of being less cloistered and distant from reality than some of the other Nobel selectors. It may well be a sign of the times that the Academy selected two economists so at odds with the recent Keynesian vogue, and in tune instead with the frustration with government fine-tuning that has dominated world economic policy since 2008.

Asked yesterday what he would do with his half of the $1.5 million prize money, Mr. Sims said: "First thing I'm going to do is keep it in cash for a while and think." Good advice, not least for our political class.

"Economists Win Nobel for Focus on Real World" by Ben Casselman and Justin Lahart, WSJ

Oct. 11, 2011, (<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052970203499704576622561219152894.html>)

Two Americans won the Nobel Prize in economics for their research on how economic policy affects the real world—a pivotal issue as politicians and central bankers grapple with fallout from the financial meltdown and resulting recession.

Thomas J. Sargent of New York University and Christopher A. Sims of Princeton University were honored Monday "for their empirical research on cause and effect in the macroeconomy," said the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences, which awards the prize.

The two men, working mostly separately, helped rewrite the models that central bankers and other economic policy makers use to analyze the likely effects of measures from tax increases to interest-rate cuts. Earlier models had proved simplistic, failing to account for the ways that policies and individual behavior affect one another.

"They've totally changed the way people do macroeconomics," said Kenneth Kuttner, a former economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York who now teaches at Williams College. "There's a pre-Sargent/Sims and a post-Sargent/Sims. It's that significant."

The economists' work has real-world implications. In different ways, the two have demonstrated that the world of economics is more interconnected than traditional models recognized, and that economic policy must reflect those connections. In a news conference Monday on Princeton's campus, Mr. Sims said the Federal Reserve and other central banks can't resolve the current economic crisis alone; their work must be supported by fiscal policy, which is controlled by the president and Congress.

"Monetary policy always has fiscal implications, and vice versa," Mr. Sims said. "It's dangerous to think that one of the two policies can by itself take care of an economic crisis." Mr. Sargent added, "The difficult thing is the politics, and I can't help you with that."

The economy is forever undergoing short-term changes, known as shocks: Unemployment rises, inflation falls, policy makers move interest rates up or down. But traditional economic models have often struggled to separate cause from effect: Did inflation fall because unemployment rose, or vice versa?

Mr. Sims tried to answer the question with statistical methods that helped identify the underlying shift, known as a 'fundamental shock,' that set the other changes in motion. Mr. Sims then studied how those fundamental shocks affected the economy over time. An interest-rate increase, for example, has an almost immediate, negative effect on total economic output, but generally won't affect consumer prices for a year and a half. Central bankers use models based on Mr. Sims's analysis to determine how policy actions will affect the economy in the future.

In a traditional macroeconomic model a central bank that wants to reduce unemployment will lower interest rates, encouraging consumers to spend and companies to invest, which drives up demand for goods and services and spurs more hiring. Eventually, that will increase inflation, at which point the central bank can raise interest rates to slow the economy down.

But according to rational-expectations theory, a branch of macroeconomics that Mr. Sargent helped pioneer, consumers and companies know that lower rates will mean higher inflation in the future. So workers demand higher wages and investors demand greater return on their capital. That limits the effectiveness of the bank's policies.

Professors Sargent and Sims, both 68 years old, both were educated at Harvard, did much of their early research at the University of Minnesota and are now co-teaching a course at Princeton, where Mr. Sargent is a visiting professor. Despite their similar biographies, the two men had markedly different approaches to their field. Mr. Sargent worked to develop complex models meant to mirror the behavior of the economy, then used those models to see how economic outcomes would change based on different policies or other structural changes. Mr. Sims generally has been skeptical of such models and focused instead on direct analysis of economic data.

"We have a series of continuing arguments, many of which are still going on as I slowly persuade him of the error of his earlier positions," Mr. Sims quipped Monday.

The prize, formally known as the Sveriges Riksbank Prize in Economic Sciences in Memory of Alfred Nobel, isn't one of the original Nobel Prizes. It was established by Sweden's central bank in 1968 to mark the bank's 300th anniversary. Princeton economists have won or shared three of the past 10 economics prizes.

Mr. Sargent is perhaps best known for his work in the early 1970s on "rational expectations theory," which argues that people base their behavior not just on government policies but also on what they expect those policies and their effects to be in the future. Thus when a bank lowers interest rates in an effort to boost the economy and lower unemployment, workers anticipate that inflation will rise and they will demand higher wages, pushing up prices even before the direct effects of a rate cut are felt.

As Mr. Sargent summarized his work on Monday, "What's going to happen is going to depend partly on what you think is going to happen."

Arthur J. Rolnick, a longtime economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis who now serves as co-director of the Human Capital Research Collaborative in Minnesota, said policy makers should pay attention to the implications of Mr. Sargent's research. Huge government liabilities that will come due in future decades, such as Medicare and Social Security, are an issue now, Mr. Rolnick said, because people will make decisions now based on how they believe the government will deal with the problem.

"This theory would say you ignore these problems at your peril," Mr. Rolnick said. "If you made a credible commitment to do this now and the markets saw that, this theory would predict you would have a much more positive impact on the economy today."

Mr. Sims, who was recruited to Princeton from Yale in 1999 by then-department chairman Ben Bernanke, is best known for his work with methods used to tease statistical relationships out of reams of data. In a 1980 paper, Mr. Sims showed how a statistical technique now widely used by economists known as vector auto regressions could be applied to studying changes in the economy.

"He said, let's push statistics as far as we possibly can and figure out what we can pull out of the data and what we cannot," said Middlebury College economist David Colander. "That was a major advance in macroeconomics."

20111013-16 12:55 Pam Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
--

Dear GaryC,

OK. I read the articles. I still don't have any idea what we should DO. Analysis of past behavior is all well and good, but what's next? I have a former colleague (and director) who's now at Duke heading up an institute for study of the history of economic ideas (funded by the Pope Foundation!), who used to talk all the time about how people make "rational" decisions when it comes to money. We used to have energetic conversations about economics—he a PhD in it, me a humanities type all the way. We never convinced each other. But I'm really trying to learn and understand. Why aren't the suggestions Robert Reich made in that little video I posted worth considering? I'm not so sure people do make rational decisions. Most people (47%) don't make financial decisions at all; they just hope the money doesn't run out before the end of the month. That means the ones making the decisions are already ahead of the game. Help me out here.

20111013-17 13:05 Dennis Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

from Pam:

I'm not so sure people do make rational decisions.

In my experience a lot of money can be made in the stock market betting against the irrational herd mentality of investors and consumers.

Mr. Sargent is perhaps best known for his work in the early 1970s on "rational expectations theory," which argues that people base their behavior not just on government policies but also on what they expect those policies and their effects to be in the future.

I found this paragraph ironic. If people are fed negatives about the competency of the government, which is the anti-government Republican mantra, the expectation will be that any efforts by the government will fail thus insuring this as a self-fulfilling prediction. It may be good politics for Republicans, but bad economics for the country.

20111013-18 13:32 SteveG Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

It seems that when the Republican-run House and their Senate partners state flat out that their goal is to assure that Obama is a one-term president, economic theories do not matter—none will be implemented.

20111013-19 13:33 Dennis Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

from Bill:

Good questions, and perhaps Keynes would agree, but he would advise, I'm sure, that Congress balance the budget as soon as possible or, better, generate a surplus to pay down debt.

Dear Bill and Pam,

My understanding of Keynes is that a budget surplus is maintained when the economy is strong and deficit spending is called for when it's weak and needs a boost. Maybe the problem is that building the surplus started at the end of the Clinton years wasn't continued, but instead was reversed by the Bush tax cuts and increased spending on the wars and the Medicare Part D profit bonanza for Big Pharma. Of course, I, like Rick Perry, only got a D in Econ 101 and could be mistaken.

20111013-20 13:36 GaryC Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Dennis,

Are you stating that Democrats do not engage in this activity?

20111013-21 13:52 Dennis Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

from GaryC:

Are you stating that Democrats do not engage in this activity?

Dear GaryC,

No, Democrats are Pollyanna's who will make you think that happy days are here again if you will only elect them. Theirs is not a rational expectation either. The fact is that government and the economic system both need a radical makeover which would cause too much pain during the transition for either party to tell the truth about if they want to get elected.

The change will happen during the Third Industrial Revolution and the U.S. will no doubt be a revolutionary laggard:

"The Third Industrial Revolution: Leading the Way to a Green Energy Era and a Hydrogen Economy" by Jeremy Rifkin, FOET

from The Hydrogen Economy: (<http://www.foet.org/lectures/lecture-hydrogen-economy.html>)

[See below, classified under Energy. —SteveB]

20111013-22	14:01	SteveB	"Free" Trade & Where the Jobs Went
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

When it comes to economics, I have to think in simple terms I know are valid. I don't trust any economists. We've never been here before, Dorothy. For many years, American business/money has gotten what it wants from our government. Freedom.

That should be a good thing. Let the marketplace work, we've been told over and over, right? But too much freedom, when coupled with greed can be a bad thing. We don't let people walk into banks and be "free".

Here's how "free trade" works. I will use the case of China, because it is the largest and most important. But the U.S. hasn't exactly come out on the good side in trade with Japan, Taiwan, Korea, Mexico, Canada, or India either. Not even with defeated Iraq.

In 2000-2001, I spent quite a bit of time designing and programming some automation for a brand new Amway factory in China to manufacture makeup. I was lucky enough to go there to help get things running. In the biz it's called a "startup". Some years earlier, Amway had burst onto the Chinese market like a comet. Door-to-door sales for millions of women! Free enterprise! Makeup and things Chinese women wanted and had been doing without or with little.

Business boomed.

Later, the government came to Amway and essentially told them they would be barred from the Chinese market if they did not build their factories in China. As quickly as possible, they built factories. The market is huge. Labor is incredibly cheap, though becoming more dear recently. Pollution control costs about 50 cents per year plus bribes.

I believe another stipulation was that the Chinese government, itself, had to own 50% of the Chinese enterprise. I can't remember if the government paid for this or just extorted it. That was before my time. And I'm not sure how things work now. Dennis and GaryC would be better informed than I.

Meanwhile, Amway found that it was manufacturing things in Michigan for one cost and in China for a far lower cost. Jeez! Michigan even had a few of those pesky unions, driving up wages to astronomical levels. So it just made sense to start using the Chinese factories to produce goods for the U.S. and elsewhere.

China stopped importing and started exporting Amway products to the U.S. Good jobs went down the tubes in the U.S. Did anyone think anything else was going to happen?

The company did all this with impunity. Their profits soared, much of it kept in China to avoid U.S. taxes. They spent a little money "retraining" some of the workers, but where are they now? And where are the jobs?

This story has been repeated over and over again for the last many years and I have yet to hear one Republican or Democrat tell us why unfettered free enterprise has been allowed to destroy our way of life in a way the U.S.S.R. never could.

Now you know why even the mighty Obama can't turn this ship around on a dime. Neither can any Tea Party. The jobs don't exist now.

20111013-23	14:11	Dennis	From The Post-Corporate World, Life After Capitalism : Corporations as Persons
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Are corporate stockholders slave owners? Consider this:

from David Korten's The Post-Corporate World, Life After Capitalism (pp.185-6) [Apparently debunked here: http://www.de-fact-o.com/fact_read.php?id=33. —SteveB]

In 1886, in the case of Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that a private corporation is a person and entitled to the legal rights and protections the Constitution affords to any person. Because the Constitution makes no mention of corporations, it is a fairly clear case of the Court's taking it upon itself to rewrite the Constitution.

Far more remarkable, however, is that the doctrine of corporate personhood, which subsequently became a cornerstone of corporate law, was introduced into this 1886 decision without argument. According to the official case record, Supreme Court Justice Morrison Remick Waite simply pronounced before the beginning of argument in the case of Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company that the court does not wish to hear argument on the question whether the provision in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which forbids a State to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, applies to these corporations. We are all of opinion that it does.

The court reporter duly entered into the summary record of the Court's findings that the defendant Corporations are persons within the intent of the clause in section 1 of the Fourteen Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which forbids a State to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Thus it was that a two-sentence assertion by a single judge elevated corporations to the status of persons under the law, prepared the way for the rise of global corporate rule, and thereby changed the course of history.

The doctrine of corporate personhood creates an interesting legal contradiction. The corporation is owned by its shareholders and is therefore their property. If it is also a legal person, then it is a person owned by others and thus exists in a condition of slavery—a status explicitly forbidden by the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution. So is a corporation a person illegally held in servitude by its shareholders? Or is it a person who enjoys the rights of personhood that take precedence over the presumed ownership rights of its shareholders? So far as I have been able to determine, this contradiction has not been directly addressed by the courts.

See source document: <http://www.ratical.org/corporations/SCvSPR1886.html>.

20111013-24	14:14	SteveB	Democratic VP Candidate?
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

Dear Pam,

Yes. Yes. Yes. More people is good! Pam is good!!

Just had a great idea, then discovered it wasn't mine. Hillary for VP! Sorry, Joe, but maybe it's time to retire or maybe run for a House seat.

OR...maybe a black VP candidate...Jesse Jackson? Denzel Washington? Morgan Freeman? At least then we'd have more black candidates—maybe—than the other side!

20111013-25	14:23	Ben	I Find Myself Reading This Stuff Even When I Don't Have Time
-------------	-------	-----	--

Dear SteveB,

I have had to set up an auto file for this list. Please send any messages or correspondence intended for me personally to me separately.

I find myself reading this stuff even when I don't have time... no good!

Obviously, it all matters, and yes, I DO care.

I will open that massive folder from time to time, and slurp. I've come close to reading all of it, but must grind to a slow creep.

Tom the Guard, my ex-spec-ops buddy, really enjoys it, too.

20111013-26 14:36 SteveB Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear GaryC,

I believe the lack of results as far as jobs goes cannot be laid on Obama either. He did what he could do. This actually is one I agree with the Tea Party about—government is very limited in what it can do at times, especially in the short run. Why would Republicans then so take to the idea that Obama and the government have failed by not creating more jobs? I thought they believed the government couldn't do anything good anyway? They are sort of right. Especially when destructive policies have been pursued by both parties for so long.

Again, this is all one of the big lies. For 30-40 years the jobs have been shipped overseas at no penalty to employers, but at incredible cost to American jobs and American taxpayers. The government can't employ that many people directly or through incentives. Only the right policies in the long run can save us now, with our eroded tax base, lack of will, and one party crying and screaming whenever a dollar gets spent, then crying and screaming that the government didn't do enough...well, I'm about as optimistic as Pam... But just as with "Obamacare", the Stimulus, etc. didn't hurt us one bit, didn't end up costing that much (a lot has been paid back), and probably saved us from the precipice...for a while longer. As far as creating jobs goes, Obama simply hasn't done it. With Bush having spent all the money, what could he do?

Neither has American business with the lowest tax rates in decades. With, as Pam, I believe, pointed out, $trillions in cash sitting in piles, the mega-corporations are not bringing their foreign profits home to be taxed and reinvested in America to create jobs. This is what people should be irate about!

20111013-27 14:44 SteveB Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Pam,

Yes! Japan, Korea, China, Brazil, and India, in turn, learned from us, then kicked our butts. They know how to do this, and they learned it from us.

Why don't we know how to do it anymore?

I just did a little history review. It appears that, in cases of modern recession and worse, government intervention has often been helpful, sometimes not. But when governments don't act, the results can be pretty horrific...like a 50% cup in GNP in one year, and years to recover from that. Ouch!

Maybe better if big business, the rich, and the people's representatives (our beloved government) could get together and plot how to fix the country instead of how to do what for whom for politicians to stay in power.

20111013-28 14:57 Dennis Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

from SteveB:

As far as creating jobs goes, Obama simply hasn't done it. With Bush having spent all the money, what could he do?

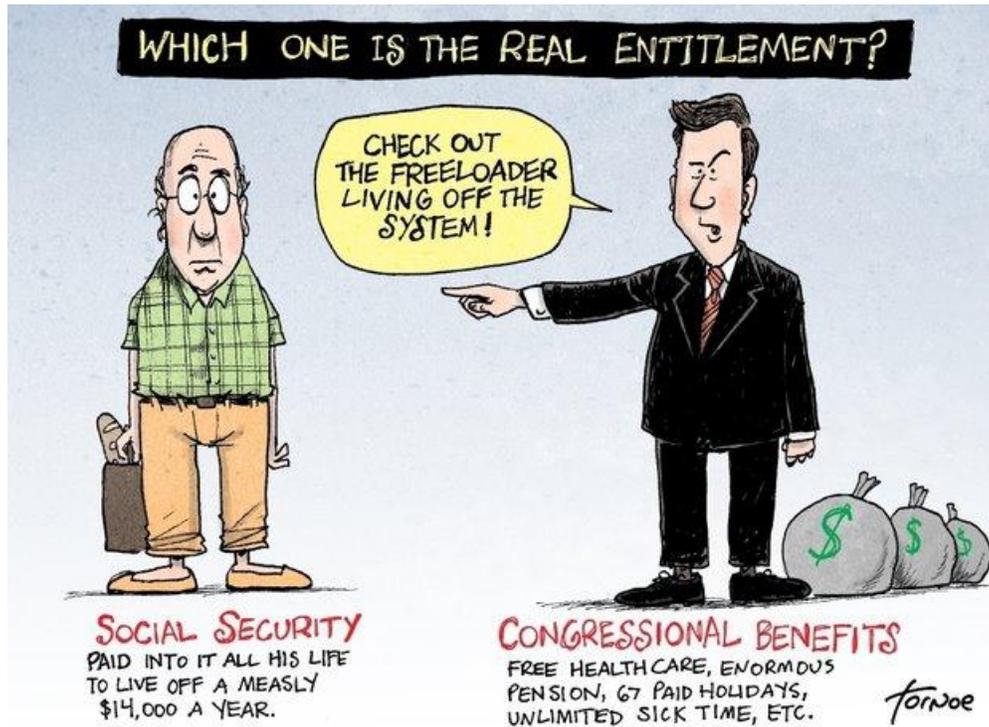

Dear SteveB,

It wasn't just Bush with the borrow and spend addiction. The American consumer maxed out their credit cards as well. And it was Greenspan's Fed that provided the artificially cheap credit (which also led to the housing bubble) to keep both addicted.

Now there is still plenty of cheap credit available but business, which is also sitting on piles of cash, isn't ramping up production with consumers completely tapped out, and pessimistic as well. Obama and the Fed are pursuing the same policies as before since Bernanke and Geithner apparently have no new ideas from the ones that got us into this mess.

Carville is correct about cleaning house. There are some new ideas out there that could be tried with advisors who can re-imagine politics and the economy. But I think Obama, ironically, is way too cautious to have the audacity to move on it.

PS: Love this cartoon:

20111013-29 15:59 Pam Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

I saw Austin Goolsbee interviewed by Jon Stewart, and I liked him a lot. He was just getting ready to leave D.C. and was obviously delighted and relieved to be getting out of town. He said some smart things that he probably wouldn't have said if he were still in government, and he had a sense of humor, always a plus. I'd like to see him come back.

Goolsbee, Grayson—there are some good, young people out there. We need to bring them back in. I like these two because they talk straight and have what I consider the right ideas. Isn't it ironic that being IN government makes politicians cautious about what they say, so what they say is mush? Sarah Palin is an idiot, but I can see why people are attracted to her honesty, if not her intelligence. Now that I've retired, I find that I am much more outspoken than I was when I was teaching, so I can sort of understand how this happens. I didn't want to proselytize; that wasn't my job. And I didn't want to offend students, thus losing their trust. I allowed glimmers of my true thinking out now and then, but nowadays I feel I can say anything. It's so liberating.

I have a friend who's big on civility. I value it too. But does being civil mean keeping some things to yourself? Maybe you can be uncivil with your intimates (or an online group you trust)—calling la Palin an idiot isn't exactly good manners. There ought to be a way to be civilly uncivil, in other words, to tell the truth and be true to yourself without being afraid.

20111013-30 16:41 Pam Re: Corporations as Persons

Dear Dennis,

What an interesting tidbit of information. You should write a letter to the Times.

20111013-31 16:49 SteveB Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

Dear Dennis,

You mean he lacks the "audacity to change"? Damn, there goes that campaign promise by the guy I now call "The Professor" or "Professor Obama", up there in his Ivory Tower with his elaborate yet opaque decision making process. Mmmmm, has he reached a decision yet?

20111013-32 16:51 SteveB Re: I Find Myself Reading This Stuff...

Dear Ben,

Thanks for the comments and for hangin' in there. I always value your contributions!

20111013-33 17:24 SteveG Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"

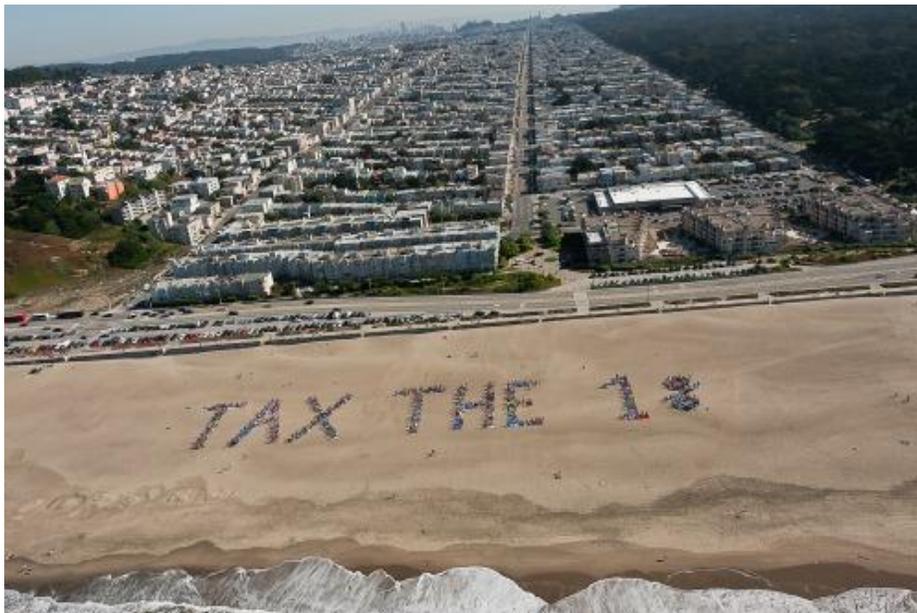

Dear Pam,

Politicians, by their very position as a politician and by the dictates of their party affiliation, have to raise money for elections of others and for their own reelection. Their whole existence becomes centered around money and the election process. Until, as Pam has mentioned previously, there is a change in the funding of the elections and some control of the election timeframe as there is in England, I doubt that much will change in politicians. Congress and elected officials need to become free to govern, make laws, form policy, lead discussions that center on problem solving rather than controlled by funding.

20111013-34 17:25 SteveG Graphics: What 99% Means

"What 99% Means" a Graphic Sensation and the OWS Piece That's Going Viral Today

<http://front.moveon.org/what-does-i-am-the-99-mean/?rc=daily.share&id=31980-18997482-K1BNHUX>

20111013-35 17:31 SteveG Re: "Free" Trade & Where the Jobs Went

As reported on the national news this week, unemployed U.S. executives are moving to China and being hired and have a faster track to the top than they would have had if they had remained employed in the U.S. With the lower cost of living, they are living better than the ever expected in the U.S.

20111013-36 17:53 Pam Re: "Free" Trade & Where the Jobs Went

Dear SteveB,

I also heard a piece on NPR about how young opera singers are moving to China to sing in their opera companies, because there are no jobs for them here—what with all the budget cuts and all. Not only are our jobs going overseas, our people are too. Rats leaving a sinking ship?

20111014-01 08:49 Pam Re: "The Third Industrial Revolution..."

I don't remember who posted the article on hydrogen and a third industrial revolution. At least I think I read it on this list. I want to send it to my son, but I can't find it on my computer. Would whoever sent it please post it again. Thanks a bunch!

20111014-02 13:52 Dennis "The Third Industrial Revolution: Leading the Way to a Green Energy Era & a Hydrogen Economy"

"The Third Industrial Revolution: Leading the Way to a Green Energy Era and a Hydrogen Economy" by Jeremy Rifkin, FOET

from The Hydrogen Economy: (<http://www.foet.org/lectures/lecture-hydrogen-economy.html>)

Lecture Synopsis:

We are approaching the sunset of the oil era in the first half of the 21st century. The price of oil on global markets continues to climb and peak global oil is within sight in the coming decades. At the same time, the dramatic rise in carbon dioxide emissions from the burning of fossil fuels is raising the earth's temperature and threatening an unprecedented change in the chemistry of the planet and global climate, with ominous consequences for the future of human civilization and the ecosystems of the earth.

While oil, coal, and natural gas will continue to provide a substantial portion of the world's and the European Union's energy well into the 21st century, there is a growing consensus that we are entering a twilight period where the full costs of our fossil fuel addiction is beginning to act as a drag on the world economy. During this twilight era, the 27 EU member states are making every effort to ensure that the remaining stock of fossil fuels is used more efficiently and are experimenting with clean energy technologies to limit carbon dioxide emissions in the burning of conventional fuels. These efforts fall in line with the EU mandate that the member states increase energy efficiency 20 percent by 2020 and reduce their global warming emissions 20 percent (based on 1990 levels), again by 2020. But, greater efficiencies and mandated global warming gas reductions, by themselves, are not enough to adequately address the unprecedented crisis of global warming and global peak oil and gas production. Looking to the future, every government will need to explore new energy paths and establish new economic models with the goal of achieving as close to zero carbon emissions as possible.

The great pivotal economic changes in world history have occurred when new energy regimes converge with new communication regimes. When that convergence happens, society is restructured in wholly new ways. In the early modern era, the coming together of coal powered steam technology and the print press gave birth to the first industrial revolution. It would have been impossible to organize the dramatic increase in the pace, speed, flow, density, and connectivity of economic activity made possible by the coal fired steam engine using the older codex and oral forms of communication. In the late nineteenth century and throughout the first two thirds of the twentieth century, first generation electrical forms of communication—the telegraph, telephone, radio, television, electric typewriters, calculators, etc.—converged with the introduction of oil and the internal combustion engine, becoming the communications command and control mechanism for organizing and marketing the second industrial revolution.

A great communications revolution occurred in the 1990s. Second generation electrical forms of communication—personal computers, the internet, the World Wide Web, and wireless communication technologies—connected the central nervous system of more than a billion people on Earth at the speed of light. And, although the new software and communication revolutions have begun to increase productivity in every industry, their true potential is yet to be fully realized. That potential lies in their convergence with renewable energy, partially stored in the form of hydrogen, to create the first "distributed" energy regimes.

The same design principles and smart technologies that made possible the internet, and vast distributed global communication networks, will be used to reconfigure the world's power grids so that people can produce renewable energy and share it peer-to-peer, just like they now produce and share information, creating a new, decentralized form of energy use. We need to envision a future in which millions of individual players can collect, produce and store locally generated renewable energy in their homes, offices, factories, and vehicles, and share their power generation with each other across a Europe-wide intelligent intergrid [interconnected electric grid]. (Hydrogen is a universal storage medium for intermittent renewable energies; just as digital is a universal storage mechanism for text, audio, video, data and other forms of media)

The question is often asked as to whether renewable energy, in the long run, can provide enough power to run a national or global economy? Just as second generation information systems grid technologies allow businesses to connect thousands of desktop computers, creating far more distributed computing power than even the most powerful centralized computers that exist, millions of local producers of renewable energy, using hydrogen storage and intelligent utility networks, can potentially produce far more distributed power than the older centralized forms of energy — oil, coal, natural gas and nuclear — that we currently rely on.

The creation of a renewable energy regime, partially stored in the form of hydrogen, and distributed via smart intergrids, opens the door to a Third Industrial Revolution and should have as powerful an economic multiplier effect in the 21st century as the convergence of mass print technology with coal and steam power technology in the 19th century, and the coming together of electrical forms of communication with oil and the internal combustion engine in the 20th century.

European industry has the scientific, technological, and financial know-how to spearhead the shift to renewable energies, a hydrogen economy, and an intelligent power grid and, by so doing, lead the world into a new economic era. Europe's world class automotive industry, chemical industry, engineering industry, construction industry, software, computer and communication industries, and banking and insurance industries, give it a leg up in the race to the Third Industrial Revolution.

By fostering renewable energies, a hydrogen infrastructure, and a continent-wide intelligent intergrid, the European Union can help create a sustainable economic development plan for its 500 million citizens in the first half of the 21st century.

The Third Industrial Revolution will require a wholesale reconfiguration of the transport, construction, and electricity sectors, creating new goods and services, spawning new businesses, and providing millions of new jobs.

Being first to market will position the European Union as a leader in the Third Industrial Revolution, giving it the commercial edge in the export of green technological know-how and equipment around the world. Producing a new generation of renewable energy technologies, manufacturing portable and stationary fuel cells, reinventing the automobile, transforming Europe's millions of buildings into power plants to produce renewable energy for internal consumption or distribution back to the grid, reconfiguring the electrical power grid as a intelligent utility network, as well as producing all of the accompanying technologies, goods and services that make up a high-tech Third Industrial Revolution economy, will have an economic multiplier effect that stretches well toward the mid decades of the 21st century.

The coming together of distributed communication technologies and distributed renewable energies via an open access, intelligent power grid, represents "power to the people". For a younger generation that's growing up in a less hierarchical and more networked world, the ability to produce and share their own energy, like they produce and share their own information, in an open access intergrid, will seem both natural and commonplace.

The key challenge that every nation needs to address is where they want their country to be in ten years from now: In the sunset energies and industries of the second industrial revolution or the sunrise energies and industries of the Third Industrial Revolution. The Third Industrial Revolution is the end-game that takes the world out of the old carbon and uranium-based energies and into a non-polluting, sustainable future for the human race.

(Jeremy Rifkin is president of The Foundation on Economic Trends in Washington, DC. and teaches at the Wharton School's Executive Education Program at the University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Rifkin is currently advising the Prime Minister of Slovenia, Janez Janša, during his presidency of the European Union (January to July 2008). Mr. Rifkin also served as an adviser to Chancellor Angela Merkel and Prime Minister Jose Socrates of Portugal during their respective European Council

Presidencies, on issues related to the economy, climate change, and energy security. He currently advises the European Commission, the European Parliament, and several EU heads of state, including Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero of Spain and Prime Minister Romano Prodi of Italy. Mr. Rifkin is the author of seventeen books on environmental, energy and economic related issues including The Hydrogen Economy: The Creation of the World Wide Energy Web and the Redistribution of Power on Earth (Tarcher/Penguin).

20111014-03 16:37 SteveB "Steve Jobs, in His Own Words"

There are words that should be more than heard or read. They should be absorbed and tested and lived, kept inside and made part of you. I believe these are such words. Hope you all have a great weekend. More to come.

I hope all of us can learn to reject dogma and look at things in new ways that enable new possibilities...even when there is no crisis there is no time to waste. And I refuse to be one of those who is "cleared away" without kicking and screaming.

"Steve Jobs, in His Own Words" by Aaron Lammer, Slate

Oct. 6, 2011,

(http://www.slate.com/articles/technology/longform/2011/10/steve_jobs_best_speeches_and_interviews_from_longform_org.html)

Playboy: Why is the computer field dominated by people so young? The average age of Apple employees is 29.

Jobs: It's often the same with any new, revolutionary thing. People get stuck as they get older. Our minds are sort of electrochemical computers. Your thoughts construct patterns like scaffolding in your mind. You are really etching chemical patterns. In most cases, people get stuck in those patterns, just like grooves in a record, and they never get out of them. It's a rare person who etches grooves that are other than a specific way of looking at things, a specific way of questioning things. It's rare that you see an artist in his 30s or 40s able to really contribute something amazing. Of course, there are some people who are innately curious, forever little kids in their awe of life, but they're rare.

Jobs (having been diagnosed with pancreatic cancer, addresses the Stanford graduating class of 2005):

No one wants to die. Even people who want to go to heaven don't want to die to get there. And yet death is the destination we all share. No one has ever escaped it. And that is as it should be, because Death is very likely the single best invention of Life. It is Life's change agent. It clears out the old to make way for the new.

Right now the new is you, but someday not too long from now, you will gradually become the old and be cleared away. Sorry to be so dramatic, but it is quite true. Your time is limited, so don't waste it living someone else's life. Don't be trapped by dogma—which is living with the results of other people's thinking. Don't let the noise of others' opinions drown out your own inner voice. And most important, have the courage to follow your heart and intuition. They somehow already know what you truly want to become. Everything else is secondary.

20111014-04 17:24 GaryC Re: "Steve Jobs, in His Own Words"

Dear SteveB,

A great email. I am proud to say at 64 that I am still embracing new concepts and trying new adventures while many of my friends have retired to the pasture. I prefer living, learning, loving and lying. I plan to never let myself get old until I die, then I start a new adventure. I can't wait for those 21 virgins Allah has promised.

20111014-05

"Prison or Deportation: What Choices Are Immigrants Given?" by Elizabeth Ruiz and Oliver Lazenby, NationOfChange

Oct. 13, 2011, (<http://www.nationofchange.org/prison-or-deportation-what-choices-are-immigrants-given-1318561564>)

I had been living in the United States for 10 years. I was a refugee: I left Oaxaca because of financial trouble. I didn't have a U.S. visa yet, though my daughter, who was three, was born here. And I had learned English through ESL classes at Clark College. One morning I left home to go to work in Portland and never made it.

I left my driver's license in my car before boarding the train from Vancouver, Wash., to Portland. I had my bus pass, but I didn't have any identification to prove that it was mine. There was a Caucasian guy who also didn't have proof of his fare, but the fare inspector allowed him to buy a ticket and continue riding the train.

I told the fare inspector, the security officer, and the two police officers that had arrived that I could buy a new ticket, but they didn't give me the opportunity. "You are illegal," one of the police officers said, and he arrested me.

I spent two days in different jails. During this time, my family didn't know where I was.

When I didn't come home, my husband went to several jails looking for me, and each time he was directed to a different one. On the third day, I was taken to Tacoma in a locked van. There were chains on my hands, feet, and stomach. I thought, what if we have an accident and die because we are chained and locked in? I wouldn't see my son and daughter again. They let me call my husband when I got to Tacoma, but first I had to register his name in a log. Since he wasn't a citizen, I was afraid to give them his phone number.

In the detention center, they treated us like we were the most dangerous people in the world. After showering, I wrapped my hair in a towel. I heard a guard yelling, but I didn't think it was directed at me until she screamed, "Take that damn towel off your head!"

I cried. I never imagined someone would yell at me over a towel.

I shared a windowless room the size of a bathroom. We were locked in twice a day to be counted. Usually we would have the same flavorless food for all three meals, but disguised in different sauces. To keep my mind occupied, I took a volunteer job folding laundry for a dollar a day.

There were Mexicans and Central Americans, Chinese, French, Cambodians, Koreans, and Pakistanis. Whenever someone started crying, all of us, no matter what our background, gathered to show support.

After one week at the detention center, an immigration official asked me to sign a deportation order. He told me I could leave right away and be on the next plane to Mexico, but I feared I would never see my family again. When I decided to wait to see a judge, he looked upset that I didn't sign.

While I was in the detention center, my husband and kids had to move out of our apartment and live with friends so they could afford a lawyer. My husband sold some of our possessions, and even now, we live with friends and don't own much more than our car and the clothes on our backs. Our friends helped raise money by selling tamales and enchiladas and having garage sales.

I was released on bail after two months at the Tacoma detention center, and my case continued until last December when my green card was granted.

Ten years ago, I knew that I had to come to the United States—there was no future for me or my son in Mexico. But during my time in the detention center and the months of immigration hearings, it felt again like I had no future. I couldn't plan my life; I could only wait.

Despite all of that hardship, this country is home now for me and my kids. My kids come back from school and say they've learned the national anthem. They love this country. And I am glad that I fought to stay here with them.

20111014-06	22:06	SteveB	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------

Dear Pam,

It is a very serious matter to enter a country illegally. I know because I've done it. It sounds like this person was treated very fairly. The fact that she got a green card tells me that she could probably have been legal the whole time or almost that she was illegal. If she didn't want a little pain, maybe she shouldn't have broken the law?

And I don't think we're talking about anything controversial here, like the legalization of marijuana. No one in the world honestly believes that a country should not have immigration laws that it enforces for its own benefit. There's nothing wrong in that, nothing to feel guilty about.

How is it fair to citizens or legal aliens who go through the process that these admittedly fine people can come here illegally and:

1. Harm the nation's security and open us up to the drug cartels and/or other terrorists.
2. Take our jobs (especially those of our existing minorities and young people who need them most).
3. Lower our wages and help destroy our unions.
4. Bankrupt our health care system with free emergency room visits.
5. Send much of their money back home, hurting our economy.
6. Destroy respect for the law and the government in this country.
7. Drive up the cost of auto insurance by driving uninsured (very often).
8. And then receive in-state tuition at many state universities where my kids have to pay out-of-state tuition.

And the impact is actually much worse than this. But the rich and big corporations want that cheap labor, so the government turns its back. The rich and powerful get their way again and down goes our middle class.

20111015-01	09:28	SteveG	"Rick Perry Makes Post-Debate Gaffe: 'We Fought the Revolution in the 16th Century'"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Harbinger of things to come...

[Note: SteveG was being very prescient here! It was not until Nov. 9 that Perry made his famous "Oops!" gaffe, which essentially ended his presidential bid and, probably, career. See:

<http://politicalhumor.about.com/b/2012/01/19/rick-perrys-greatest-gaffes.htm>.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2011/11/10/rick-perry-oops-video_n_1085336.html.]

"Rick Perry Makes Post-Debate Gaffe: 'We Fought the Revolution in the 16th Century'" by Alex Alvarez, Media ITE

Oct. 12, 2011, (<http://www.mediaite.com/online/rick-perry-makes-post-debate-gaffe-we-fought-the-revolution-in-the-16th-century/>)

The political sphere—from the venerated marble monoliths of Washington, DC to the fine film of perspiration and Funyun dust lining the keyboards of so many online commenters—is a strange one, and one that has taken an increasingly disturbing, if anthropologically fascinating, turn in recent times. Sometimes, perhaps because they're nervous or impassioned or high on adrenaline, politicians get their facts wrong. It's embarrassing, certainly, but they're mostly human beings, and these things happen. But, as politics is a team sport where anyone with internet access has the potential to become a rabid hooligan, instead of demanding or expecting an apology when politicians inevitably stumble over their words or confuse their facts, people defend them. People defend them even if it means wrestling with semantics or fashioning historical timelines into a series of elaborate knots.

So it'll be interesting to see how people who are not just supporters of GOP presidential hopeful Rick Perry, but fans of his particular team (and members of the opposing team) will react to a gaffe he made following last night's Republican debate. Here is how MSNBC described the hiccup in history:

The Texas governor was comparatively energetic at his stop at the Beta Theta Pi fraternity on the Dartmouth College campus, taking questions on energy policy, Social Security, and states' rights. But he stumbled in his answer to a young woman's question about states' rights; Perry said that one of the "reasons we fought the revolution in the 16th century was to get away from that kind of onerous crown."

The Revolutionary War was fought in the 18th century.

Not only that, it was fought against an advancing alien army, from another dimension, who were upset with the founding fathers' decision to free the slaves and who wanted desperately to offer Paul Revere a reality series aimed at finding him a date, the rather saucily-named "Riding with Revere". Maybe. Or not!

Again, everyone makes mistakes. Maybe Perry became confused over how centuries are named, jumping to a number ahead instead of a number following. Maybe he was caught up in the moment and didn't realize what he'd said. What we're more interested in is how this will be spun and how, exactly, it will be reported on and built into a wider narrative. Thanks to the hyperactive television news cycle and the internet, we now have greater access to candidates than ever before. We spend more time with them and they are better able to reach out to their supporters and detractors, often without the benefit of a prepared statement or teleprompter. So, naturally, they are going to make more mistakes and we are going to hear about them. And it's not so much how politicians themselves deal with these gaffes that is interesting (or infuriating), but how those who either love or hate them and keeping tabs on them on home react and spin. And spin. And spin. So. We shall see.

20111015-02 17:00 SteveB Re: "The Third Industrial Revolution..."

Dear Pam,

Jeremy Rifkin wrote it. Dennis reposted the original article above. Here are a couple of additional articles:

<http://www.nakedeyez.com/content/jeremy-rifkin-hydrogen-economy>.

<http://www.fastcompany.com/1764063/the-hydrogen-economys-dirty-secret>.

I have written previously about my experience with a hydrogen explosion in Massachusetts. I'll look that up too.

20111016-01 06:01 SteveB Re: "Rick Perry Makes Post-Debate Gaffe..."

I'm thinking Perry may be dumber than Sarah Palin, if that's possible. What is with these Texans? (not Palin)

SteveG, I bet you'll love reading this about the Koch brothers and Herman Cain:

<http://news.yahoo.com/extensive-ties-powerful-koch-group-boost-cain-085542290.html>.

I love the truth of the statement calling Cain, "...the first presidential corporate spokes-candidate."

But Cain did go to Purdue, where he got a masters in 1971, but I don't remember seeing him around campus. Maybe he hung out with the black guys, but I doubt it.

20111016-02 06:31 SteveB "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Rich and poor...

"In fact, there's little evidence that the Bush tax cuts had any effect at all."

"Cutting taxes on the wealthy during the Bush years didn't stimulate growth, and raising taxes back to the levels we've had in the past—when growth was quite robust—won't have much of an effect either."

In this forum we have seen a lot of hard evidence that the Bush years and tax cuts have been disastrous for America.

There has been a lot of conjecture from the right, but no hard evidence of any kind, except Dale's article showing the rise in corporate profits.

We consider Dale's figures, along with all the other economic numbers, to be further proof of our case, since these profits stayed at the top instead of trickling down to workers. The rich got richer when they didn't need to, the country got poorer. This is so obvious! Investors didn't fare too well either. Now they're calling the last 10 years the "lost decade" for American investors.

I believe this article says it all. I'd love to see any of these points seriously refuted with evidence, not guesses, conjecture, name-calling, or dogma.

NO MATTER WHAT THEY TELL YOU, TAXES ON THE RICH DO NOT STUNT GROWTH! THE EVIDENCE INDICATES THE OPPOSITE!

"Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth" by Mark Thoma, The Fiscal Times

Oct. 14, 2011, (<http://money.msn.com/investing/why-us-should-spread-the-wealthfiscaltimes.aspx>)

America sacrificed equity for the false promise of efficiency and growth, and society is now more unequal than at any time since the early part of the last century.

Many economists worry that making societies more equal through income redistribution or other means reduces economic growth.

This big trade-off between equality and efficiency, which is supported by comparisons of capitalist and socialist countries, implies that there's a limit to how much redistribution a society should pursue. At some point, the trade-off of more equality for less output—which worsens as we push toward more and more equality—becomes intolerable.

However, while the trade-off is quite unfavorable as we push to extremes, recent experience suggests there is a wide region where the trade-off is hard to detect. Thus, worries about this trade-off appear to be overblown.

For example, the Bush tax cuts were justified, in part, by the assertion that equity had overshadowed efficiency in tax policy. Taxes on the wealthy, and the inefficiencies that come with them, were much too high, it was argued, and lowering taxes would cause output to go up enough to lift all boats substantially.

Accordingly, the lower end of the income distribution would fare much better after income trickled down than it would under redistributive policy.

The economy did grow after the Bush tax cuts, but the rate of growth was unremarkable, especially for jobs, and there's little evidence that they caused large increases in output growth, as promised.

In fact, there's little evidence that the Bush tax cuts had any effect at all. The tradeoff simply wasn't there.

And the tax cuts at the upper end of the income distribution did nothing to correct for the fact that although worker productivity was rising, wages remained flat—a problem that began in the mid-1970s.

This was an indication that something was amiss in the mechanism that distributes income to different members of society. Workers were helping to increase the size of the pie, but income did not trickle down, and their share of the pie was no larger than before.

This is not the only way in which the distribution of income has become disconnected from productivity. While some argue that those at the top of the income distribution earn every cent they receive, and hence deserve to keep all of it, there is plenty of evidence that the compensation of financial executives, CEOs of major corporations and others at the top of the pyramid far exceeds the value of what they contribute to society.

That holds true even without the 2008-09 financial crisis, but how, exactly, can we justify the extraordinarily high income of this group when the result of their actions was to ruin the economy?

If those at the top of the income distribution receive far more than the value of what they create, and those at lower income levels receive less, then one way to correct this is to increase taxes at the upper end of the income distribution and use the proceeds to protect important social programs that benefit working-class households, programs that are currently threatened by budget deficits.

This would help to rectify the mal-distribution of income that is preventing workers from realizing their share of the gains from economic growth.

And there is another reason why taxes on the wealthy should go up. Someone has to pay taxes, and the question is how to distribute the burden among taxpayers.

Many believe, and I am one of them, that progressive taxes are the most equitable way to do this. In particular, the guiding principle is that the last dollar of taxes paid should cause the same amount of sacrifice for rich and poor alike.

There has been an attempt to make it appear that taxes are mostly paid by the wealthy; the deceptive claim that half of the people pay no taxes is part of this. But taxes are less progressive than before the Bush tax cuts, and when all taxes at all levels of government are taken into account, "the U.S. tax system just barely qualifies as progressive," according to a 2010 report from Citizens for Tax Justice.

We face a choice between cutting key benefits for the middle class and creating an ever more unequal society, or raising taxes on the wealthy to preserve the social programs that lower-income households rely upon.

We hear that raising taxes is unfair and that tax increases will harm economic growth. But there's nothing unfair about correcting the mal-distribution of income that we've seen in recent decades, or about making sure the burden from paying taxes is more equitable than it is now.

And there's no reason to fear that economic growth will be lower if taxes are increased. Cutting taxes on the wealthy during the Bush years didn't stimulate growth, and raising taxes back to the levels we've had in the past—when growth was quite robust—won't have much of an effect either.

20111016-03	08:28	SteveG	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
-------------	-------	--------	---

He might have something here... [It seems more like a bill than a Constitutional amendment, but, as I have said, it could be either...the amendment is harder to repeal. —SteveB]

Really hard to get traction on this one. Let's not give up.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Warren Buffett, in a recent interview with CNBC, offers one of the best quotes about the debt ceiling:

"I could end the deficit in 5 minutes," he told CNBC. "You just pass a law that says that anytime there is a deficit of more than 3% of GDP, all sitting members of Congress are ineligible for re-election."

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified! Why? Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971...before computers, e-mail, cell phones, etc.

Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven took 1 year or less to become the law of the land... all because of public pressure.

Warren Buffet is asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; and in turn ask each of those to do likewise.

In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. No Tenure / No Pension: A Congressperson collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.
2. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system and Congress participates with the American people. It may not be used for any other purpose.
3. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.
4. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.
5. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.
6. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.
7. All contracts with past and present Congressmen are void effective 1/1/12. The American people did not make this contract with Congress.

Congressional members made all these contracts for themselves. Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

If each person contacts a minimum of twenty people then it will only take three days for most people (in the U.S.) to receive the message. Maybe it is time.

COULD THIS BE HOW WE FIX CONGRESS?

If you agree with the above, pass it on. If not, just delete.

20111016-04	09:17	Pam	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
-------------	-------	-----	--------------------------------

from SteveB:

How is it fair to citizens or legal aliens who go through the process that these admittedly fine people can come here illegally and:

1. Harm the nation's security and open us up to the drug cartels and/or other terrorists.
2. Take our jobs (especially those of our existing minorities and young people who need them most).
3. Lower our wages and help destroy our unions.
4. Bankrupt our health care system with free emergency room visits.
5. Send much of their money back home, hurting our economy.
6. Destroy respect for the law and the government in this country.
7. Drive up the cost of auto insurance by driving uninsured (very often).

8. And then receive in-state tuition at many state universities my kids have to pay out-of-state tuition at.

Dear SteveB,

1. I don't think our immigration policy much affects what the drug cartels do. It's illegal to tunnel from Mexico into the U.S., but the traffickers do it anyway. What "opens us up to the drug cartels" is the demand for drugs this side of the border. Take away the demand—by legalizing marijuana?—and the cartels will have to look for a market elsewhere.

2. I just heard a small business owner, from Alabama, on NPR, say he couldn't find workers, now that AL has their new draconian immigration law. How are immigrants taking "our" jobs, when Americans don't want them or aren't qualified to do them? We have to import engineers and other professionals because we don't have enough here. Let those middle-class or formerly middle-class teenagers get out in the strawberry fields for a week, and see how they do.

3. "Our wages"? When's the last time you cleaned a motel room or mulched a flower bed? It's too bad "illegals" don't have unions. Maybe they'd get a better shake if they did. The truth is, we need them and their labor. And they need a way out of a country where city mayors and journalists are shot down in the street. When I lived in Canada, there were lots of foreign doctors and professors, but I didn't see many low-wage workers. I wondered why, but I have an idea. Canada doesn't have big agribusiness—like, say, California does (maybe out west, I don't know. I lived in Ontario.) Also they've got us between them and Latin America. Immigration was the big issue though, I can't deny that.

4. Improper use of an emergency room is a problem, for sure, but illegals aren't the only ones taking advantage. The 40+million uninsured who are citizens have something to do with it too. The problem, as I see it, isn't crowded emergency rooms but a shortage of local clinics that provide free or low-cost care, no questions asked. In my city, there's the Public Health Dept., where anyone (even rich people) can get care—decent care; I know some of the doctors—for little or nothing. One of my rich friends (I have so many you know-ha) took her kids there for all their immunizations. I don't know if you have to show a birth certificate to get a tetanus shot; I hope not.

5. Do illegals really account for a drain on our GDP? Compared to lots of other holes we could plug, I bet that's a pretty insignificant one. Do you have any compelling figures?

6. Oh, I'd say illegals have a lot of respect for law enforcement in this country. Just look how they're making themselves scarce in Alabama—even legal immigrants are scared. Next we'll be making all Latinos wear a yellow star on their sleeve.

7. If they COULD get health insurance, maybe they WOULD. And another thing: if we can require car insurance, why can't we require health insurance?

8. I'll give you in-state tuition. But not public education, which I know imposes a strain on school budgets. Of course, college tuition is a whole other subject that I won't go into here. I'd recommend "Hunger for Memory" by Richard Rodriguez (I think that's his name; I know it starts with an R) and/or "The House on Mango Street" by Sandra Cisneros.

I have a confession to make. When my first husband and I moved to Canada with our two boys (a daughter was born while we were there), we were legal. My husband had a work permit, good for a year. After the first year, he got it renewed. The next time he tried to renew it, a new immigration officer had taken over, and he turned us down. My husband was not "in the national interest." He was not a sympathetic man. In fact, he made it his mission to clear out all the "illegals" under his jurisdiction. including us. We had been trying to get "landed immigrant" status, hired a lawyer and appealed to our provincial rep., but we weren't getting anywhere.

One evening, as I was fixing dinner, there was a knock at the door. When I opened it, two men were standing there, looking very grim indeed. They identified themselves and asked to see my husband. My stomach dropped into my shoes. I hustled the kids upstairs—to protect them—and when I came down, my husband told me we had to be gone within a week. He had to leave his job in the middle of a semester; our oldest son was abruptly taken out of school, never to return; the life I loved came to a startling and sudden end.

So every time I read about some immigrant—like the girl who grew up here, was accepted to Yale (some good place?), then told she was to be deported—whose life is coming apart, I feel not only sympathy but kinship. Everyone has a story. If you knew it, maybe it wouldn't be so easy to get angry. Circumstances alter cases. To be fair, the law sometimes has to bend a little. Bend it or break it? Maybe that's the real choice.

20111016-05 10:02 Pam Re: "The Third Industrial Revolution..."

Dear SteveB,

It was Dennis, and he sent it to me. Thanks. I want to hear about your "hydrogen experience."

20111016-06 12:14 Susette Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Anecdotal evidence that those tax cuts didn't help the common man is all around us. The Bush era tax cuts are basically still in effect and people are tanking. Look at the business section of your paper, especially the personal financial advice section. Mine has articles: "Public sector remains anchor for local economy", "There's no place for your cash like a right-size home", "New recession may be looming; make plan to handle risk".

Doesn't look good.

20111016-07 12:28 GaryC Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Susette,

Based on the astute economic logic displayed here, wouldn't it be better to take all of the money from all workers and let the state distribute the funds? How has that worked out in history?

20111016-08 12:30 Pam Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Susette and SteveB,

"Public sector remains anchor for local economy." This is perhaps the most important sentence in this post. How does downsizing the Post Office, firing teachers and cops, etc. help the unemployment problem? What Boehner basically says is, we have to eliminate jobs in order to create jobs. He talks (as do all Repubs) about the "government" as if it were some big old mean man who only wants to suck up our money for his own pleasure. Government is not a monolith. The GOP just loves to oversimplify everything it can and deny what they can't. The politicians we see all over the media monopolize our attention, but maybe the real threat comes from those moneybags like the Koch brothers and Art Pope who pull strings from behind a curtain. Politicians are just the mouthpieces for moneyed interests. But I'm not telling you anything you didn't already know.

20111016-09 12:52 Pam Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear GaryC,

I just read an article in the last couple of days that presented a very persuasive argument for some "income redistribution." Alas, I can't remember where I saw this, and I can't find it after searching around. The gist of it was that the increasing wealth gap isn't doing anyone any good. We don't need to see everyone make the same salary or have equal amounts of money, but when the rich and the rest grow too far apart from each other, there's a hollow in the middle, and the whole society collapses. I'm so tired of hearing rich people defend their wealth by saying they earned it. I can't think of any job, no matter how important, that deserves multimillion dollar remuneration. I'd say an air-conditioner repairman who could get the cool air going again in a high-rise office building "deserves" quite a bit.

20111016-10 13:54 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear GaryC,

Neither of your replies here, where you jump to extremes of socialism and Democrat misbehavior, bear any relation to the "moderate" goals of Democrats compared to the radical goals of the Republicans.

Your case depends upon somehow proving that either:

1. The economy (and American workers) are really doing great, it's just that nobody knows it. I guess you'd also have to prove here that we're really in better shape than ever and going in a positive direction;
2. Or that it has really been Democratic not Republican policies that have been in effect most of the time and increasingly for the last 40 years or so, and they are the reason the economy and middle class are doing so poorly.

Good luck proving either of these points. In fact, for month, this forum has been full of hard evidence to the contrary. And simply look around you. Are we doing great? Do you see Democrat policies in effect? What? Social Security from 1933? Not the greatest, but provably a working system without the constant thefts of funds by Congress. Medicare/Medicare? Might need a little touching up, but probably the most popular and helpful government programs in America. Do you really want to advocate such a self-destructive position as your party seems to hold?

Isolated cases of Democrat mistakes or evil do not make the case for a lack of pervasive Republican tax, trade, business, education, and social policies—except to oppose anything the government could possibly do. In the case of one thing only do they lobby for more—WAR!

What has sunk us: the Republican wars, corruption, free trade, deregulation, ridiculous tax policies, and the failure (greed) of American big business and money to invest in America when a few more bucks could be made elsewhere.

Please prove otherwise or let's get on the same page and figure out how to fix things.

20111016-11	14:15	Dale	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
-------------	-------	------	---

Dear Pam,

Who decides what products and services are worth? Is it you. Is it Obama? Is it me? Is it a committee selected by election or appointment? No...in a free enterprise economy, the market decides. Government intervention has positive and negative effects. There is value in regulation and enforcement to reduce as much as possible fraud and abuse, but once the government starts setting prices/wages and deciding arbitrarily who "deserves" to get paid a specific amount or how much it will cost, the system breaks down. If you don't agree with this approach, there are still a few places in the world who are trying to make a government controlled economy work. Most countries that have experimented with centralized control have painfully recognized that the people finally rebel and choose to change. It would be way easier to go to one of these remaining holdouts and help them "perfect" that plan, then to undermine and overthrow the process that has enabled the U.S. to prosper, albeit with cycles of "better and worse" conditions.

There are NO plausible arguments for income redistribution. There are many arguments for compassion and caring for those who cannot take care of themselves. There are lots of valid arguments why society needs to create opportunity and support the pursuit of more than mere subsistence living standards, in other words enable the "pursuit of happiness." There are unquestionably actions that we could be taking to improve our current situation, but finding ways to enable lower income people to make more is the right objective. Taking it away from someone else is not the right answer. Let me ask, where do you draw the line? Who decides who the winners and losers will be? What if it were decided YOU needed to pay more and do with less?

[The last sentence... But, of course, all of us, here, are fortunate to have been in that position most of our adult lives, have we not? Most of us have not been on welfare, etc., we have had income taken from us and redistributed. So what? We (all of America, many times over) decided democratically that we want it that way. Look at it like this: the taxes you and I have paid all our lives have also been "redistributed" unfairly and unequally as far as military spending goes—it's not just "entitlements" that "receive" redistributed wealth. Defense spending redistributes wealth in a huge way, but you never hear Republicans squawk about that. Interesting, huh? —SteveB]

Under our current tax code, redistribution is baked in the cake. Half the population pays ZERO tax, yet those same people get the most benefit of public services (on average). It's a double whammy. Just out of curiosity, how do you justify having people pay zero tax on an ongoing basis, many for their whole life, while they get fire protection, police, schools, national defense, licensing, etc. all for nothing? (OK, I know, they pay sales tax in most states.) The bummer is that in an effort to socially engineer the tax code, we have ended with a labyrinth of laws that no one can understand and it costs the taxpayers to have experts do their forms and it costs the taxpayers for all the government inefficiencies to track and collect. Another double whammy. Scrapping the tax code and starting over is making a lot of sense to me.

[The overwhelming evidence suggests that almost no one pays zero tax their entire lives. The vast majority of people ended-up contributing. Maybe just so they can collect unemployment and Social Security checks, huh? —SteveB]

What do you think?

[There would be a lot of business climate uncertainty during the lengthy debate. I thought you and business hated that above all else? Maybe it would be enough uncertainty to drive us back into recession? —SteveB]

20111016-12 14:16 SteveB Re: "Prison or Deportation..."

Dear Pam,

I think this is a tough issue, especially for compassionate people. And I would admit that I feel compassion for many people in our prisons, even those guilty of violent crimes. Wow! What bad lives! What awful breaks! So, of course, I also feel compassion for illegal aliens. But I don't advocate eliminating violent crime laws or letting all the people out of prison and letting them break the law.

This is actually another rich versus the rest of us issue. Just because it has a human face doesn't make it any different. The rich benefit, and most of the rest of us pay the price by allowing so many illegals in the country.

Our citizens are in trouble. These people make things worse for them, for those who are undeniably our own. One of the two has to go. Which one do you want to leave? Our citizens or the illegal aliens?

I have compassion. And I think the government should and does handle at least some cases compassionately, like the lady in the story you sent me who got her green card instead of being deported. The same way you should have been treated in Canada, but were not, so maybe the U.S. is better? (Canada had no trouble with my Army deserter brother-in law or half of China). But I have more compassion for my children, grandchildren, friends, the black guy down the street, etc. who need jobs as much as illegal aliens.

And I think it's a myth that Americans won't do these jobs. I just spent six months mainly living in hotels and resorts in Florida. In some areas, like Orlando, all our maids and hotel workers were illegal aliens. None legal. In places with hillbillies instead of Hispanics, they were plenty able somehow to find hillbillies to do the jobs. Believe me, you give Alabama enough time and they are going to find people to do those jobs. If we'll pick cotton, fight wars, and work in steel mills (and we have and we will!), we'll do any damned thing!

Nobody loves Hispanic people more than I do. But their home countries need them more than the U.S. does. That's a fact.

20111016-13 14:40 Pam Re: "Prison or Deportation..."

Dear SteveB,

I don't see this as an all or nothing issue. If illegals commit crimes, deport them. Unless it's murder or something, I wouldn't pay taxpayer money to put them in jail. Ship 'em out. But if they're just poor folks trying to get by, and they're working (or someone in the family is), then I say, consider their circumstances before making a decision. I don't want to see bad people get rewarded, but I don't like to see good people hurt either.

We happened to get to Canada too late. Not long before our arrival, there was a total amnesty; all illegal aliens were automatically allowed to stay, and the country started all over. All those draft dodgers got to stay, which is fine by me. We got there after the deadline, so we were treated under different rules. I'm not complaining about how Canada treated us; I'm not mad or anything. But it did give me some insight into what people far worse off than us went through. We had no home, no job, nothing to go back to. We did have family, and that's where we went. That was no picnic, but it was a safe harbor until my husband was able to find another job. If I'd spent my whole life in the U.S. and then had to go back to Nigeria or wherever, it would be a catastrophe. Do we really have to round people up just because they have brown skin? Do you really want an America where everyone has to carry an identity card? Prosecute criminals, and deal with the rest humanely. I'd rather see more effort put into stopping the drugs flowing into this country from Mexico than into hounding some strawberry picker.

20111016-14 14:57 Mary Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Dale,

Wow! Nail on the head!

20111016-15 15:29 Pam Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Dale,

Lord, no, not a committee! I am a good capitalist, and I don't think wage and price controls are the answer. Much, if not most, of the time the market does a pretty good job of managing things—the invisible hand and all that. I would hate to have a planned economy. The countries that have tried it, like the Soviet Union, ended up with too many cabbages and not enough soap. Long lines had to queue for bread or go without if the bakery had sold out its quota for the day. That would be a nightmare.

But having reasonable limits is, well, reasonable. That's where a progressive income tax comes in. It's not meant to punish achievement or be a giveaway to low-end earners. The poor do pay taxes every time they buy something. No one is completely exempt. I like the proposal to keep taxes low on everyone making up to—what? a million dollars a year, two million? I don't care where you draw the line. But huge salaries (plus bonuses etc.) should be taxed hugely, or at least substantially. I don't see how this would hurt anyone, and I don't think it would slow down business. We've already seen what lowering taxes on the rich has done for us; just look around.

I suppose I do approach most things from a compassionate angle, but the strongest arguments don't have to do with fairness. They persuade me, but I acknowledge that the pragmatists among us need more than feeling good. The danger—and it is a danger—is that the have-nots will get fed up and trample through the rose beds of the rich, and where will that get us?

20111016-16 15:49 Pam Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Dale,

"Taking it away from someone else is not the answer."

Then what is the answer?

The money has to come from the people who have it, one way or another. A good tax system is our best bet. People hated the income tax when it was first introduced, but no one is suggesting now that we get rid of it. How else would anything get done? Should we hire our own private security guards? Wait, the rich already do that. Should we let our infrastructure crumble away? Rotten bridges are just as bad for the rich as they are for the poor. Should we continue to let corporations like GE pay no tax and hide their money offshore? Oh yeah, that's already happening. Reasonable limits and regulations, that's all I favor.

I'm so glad we are not all of one mind in this group. We'd have nothing to talk about then. Maybe we won't change anyone's mind, but at least we clarify our own beliefs and possibly get others to think. I'm not the best on facts and figures; others of you do that much better. (Maybe you're not as lazy as I am.) :-) But I'm trying to find reasonable arguments that make sense to me. I don't want anyone to ever think I'm attacking them personally.

What are the things we'd all like to see? As close to full employment as possible. A state-of-the-art health care system. Investment in small business and a good climate for entrepreneurship. Affordable, if not free, education, including college level or its equivalent. Everyone in a decent home. Homeless people off the streets. Mentally ill people in compassionate care facilities. An end to war. Healthy food. Development of sustainable energy and a reduction of the use of fossil fuels. A decent standard of living for all, as well as the opportunity to get rich. What on this list do we not all want? The question, I think, is how to accomplish these things. Setting goals is a good step. JFK had the race to the moon. LBJ had the War on Poverty. People keep saying they don't know what the Wall St. protesters want? Really? I think it's pretty clear.

20111016-17	18:27	Art	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---

Dear Pam,

Well I agree with scrapping the tax code because it is certainly heavily weighted in favor of the rich as we all know. Not many poor people can pay to buy congressmen to juggle tax laws.

History is replete with examples of what happens to a country if adjustments are not made at the national level to somehow balance the distribution of wealth. France in 1789 and Russia in 1917 are pretty good examples. We could well be headed in the same direction. All we have to do is look at what has happened in the last few decades. I think almost everything I have read states that virtually all the increase of wealth has gone to the top few per cent in the country. Interesting coincidence that the time period is the same when all the tax breaks occurred, hmmm mostly for the rich. So maybe the accumulation of wealth is not because they have done better but perhaps rather because they have benefited from tax reductions. I also read somewhere they we are in the top, or bottom if you prefer 5 countries in disparity of wealth distribution. We used to call those places Banana republics but now , to quote Pogo, they are us.

I always try to read in detail the company annual reports when I receive them and I am always, astounded at the astronomical salaries they award themselves. (I know it is supposed to be a Board of Directors but who is kidding who? They are all part of the scam.) The CEO of Bank of America, a bank the taxpayer had to bail out just awarded himself a $9.5M bonus. Think anyone is really worth that? And to add insult to injury, as Buffet says, he pays less percentage of tax than his secretary does who make 1/500th as much. What's fair about that?

So, back to wealth. Just ask yourself if you had been given $10M or $20M as you graduated from college do you think you might be a little better off today? it is not a level playing field. There is no evidence anywhere that taxing the rich hurts the economy. It is all just republican blather, and they want to reduce taxes for the rich. All that will do is provide more jobs in China, plus perhaps the occasional illegal alien gardener here in the U.S.

Happy to be in the group.

20111016-18	20:52	SteveB	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------

Dear Pam,

Yes! The last one went out to everybody, it looks like. You're doing great!

But you're really p*ssing me off with this immigration stuff! Just kidding of course. (Ya, I was happy too that my brother-in-law and the draft-dodgers got amnesty in Canada. He's done well there, it's a great country, and he gave me more opportunity to get up there.) You know, I was just thinking. Immigration is a tough issue, but it's a whole lot easier than the budget problem or the energy or health care or jobs problems, maybe.

I think what you say sounds reasonable and has been the status quo for a long time...total tolerance. Not half-way tolerance, almost complete. With two amnesties already granted, over the years.

But...would you be for stopping any additional people coming illegally? Would you be for actually controlling the border? Don't you think there are some very negative consequences for the U.S. and its citizens under the current system?

I could maybe see a little tolerance, but I want some kind of deal in return. I'll meet you halfway. How about if no more come and half of the ones who are here get shipped back and half given amnesty? The illegal aliens would choose themselves who gets to stay and who goes. Anyone who leaves would, of course, have their chance to return legally. Sound fair? Or...I'm open to other creative solutions...

20111016-19 21:01 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Art,

Welcome to our informal group and thanks for your comments. I'm sure you'll be hearing back from people. Always good to have another ally on board, though actually I'm just as happy to have a contrarian. :-)

Where do you live? That Pam is a smart girl, huh? Must be the water where she grew up!

20111017-01 06:23 Mark Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

from Dale:

There are NO plausible arguments for income redistribution.

Scrapping the tax code and starting over is making a lot of sense to me. I'm whole-heartedly with you, Dale.

20111017-02 06:37 Pam Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Mark,

I don't think it would be feasible to scrap the whole thing, leaving nothing in its place.

Wouldn't it be better to start at one end and work toward the other? Say, begin with the top 10% of individual incomes and work down from there. Also, have a separate process for small businesses and corporations. The whole system does need to be rationalized. It's like a Rube Goldberg contraption as it is.

20111017-03 06:38 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Dale,

"There are NO plausible arguments for income redistribution." You are kidding, right?

All of these questions were answered long ago by the vast majority of Americans. Have we totally forgotten our history?

Radicalize it by calling it your dreaded "income redistribution" all you want, Americans want taxes to be progressive. It never seemed to harm us when they were even more progressive. No one here wants anything as radical as Cain's get richer scheme for the rich.

Americans have also decided that competition in the free marketplace is the way prices should be set. Why would you assume anyone disagrees with that?

Ah...Republicans call the opposition "communists" so you people start to believe it?

But the marketplace must be "free" and that requires your dreaded "government intervention" or disaster would strike even the rich. I guess you want to eliminate costly government regulation of the free marketplace? Things like the safety drugs, meat, bridges, etc., should be left to the marketplace? Study your history. The world learned long ago that you don't leave the fox guarding the henhouse!

We all know these things. There is no reason to rehash this stuff. THESE ARE NOT THE ISSUES! Where are the jobs your currently low, low taxes on the rich and business were supposed to produce???? That's the question we should be asking. I don't mind a simpler tax system, as long as it approximately preserves the progressive tax structure that led us to greatness...before the Regan and Bush tax cuts, before greed took the wheel in America, before a formerly great political party decided to try to balance the budget on the backs of the poor while allowing the rich to get even more filthy rich. (My Mom used to love that term, "filthy rich".)

Let me also inform you that the poor are not working. Much of the middle class is not working. How would it be possible to get enough blood from that turnip to balance this war-torn budget that Bush essentially gave us? Prove it.

20111017-04	10:07	SteveG	"The 99%, the 53%, and Distributive Justice"
-------------	-------	--------	--

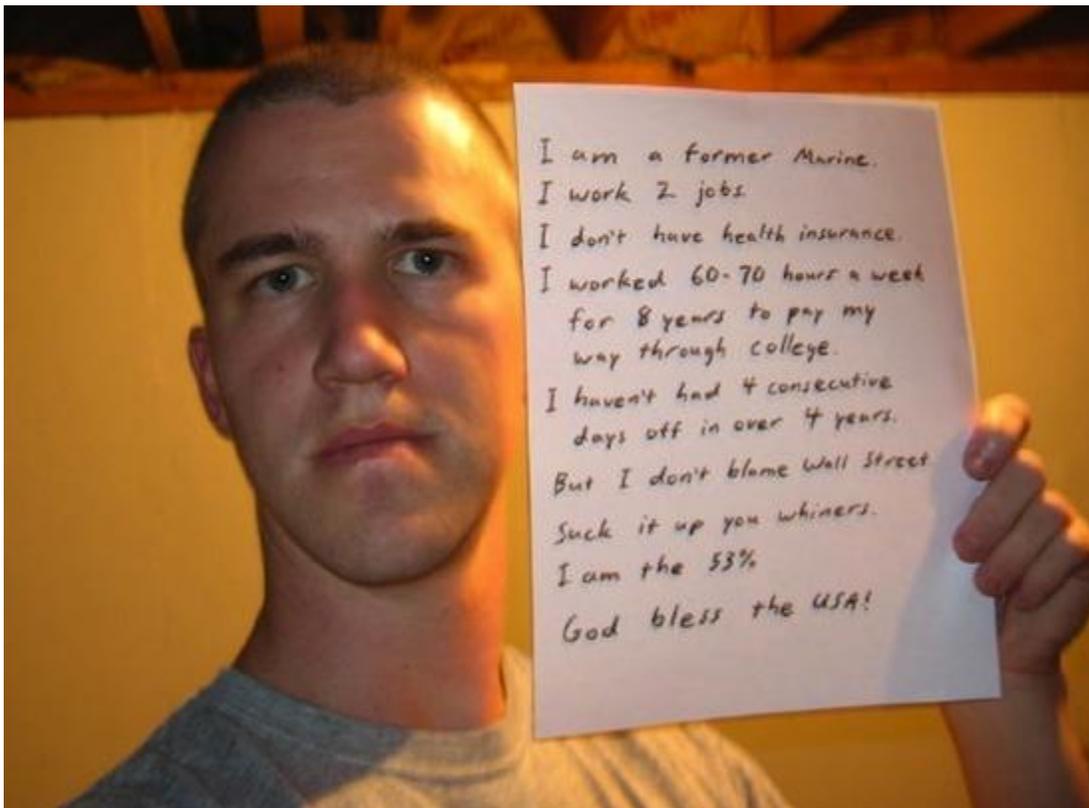

"The 99%, the 53%, and Distributive Justice" posted by Ben at Occupy Philosophy

Oct. 15, 2011, (<http://occupyphilosophy.blogspot.com/2011/10/99-53-and-distributive-justice.html?spref=fb>)

The battle cry of the movement that's occupied Wall Street and spread around the country and the world in recent weeks is "We Are The 99%."

The appeal to intuitive principles of economic justice implicit in highlighting the grotesque imbalance between the wealth, power and privileges of a tiny minority of the population and those of the other 99% seems clear enough. Given the large amounts of human suffering caused by the distribution of wealth and power in America and other contemporary capitalist societies, the prima facie injustice is certainly clear enough. Utilitarians, Rawlsians, Marxists (of both Hegelian and G.A. Cohen-style "analytic" stripes) and so on can all quite easily make the case that this distribution is massively unjust.

What, then, about the perspective of this fellow?

His use of the phrase "the 53%" is a reference to the bizarre right-wing myth that only 53% of the population pays taxes. (Apparently the payroll taxes still paid by those working people too broke to afford to pay federal income taxes don't...um...count, for some reason?) That bit of silliness aside, though, what should we say about him?

Max Udargo makes some reasonable points here about ways that the fellow in the picture might plausibly change his mind later. (What if he gets sick?, etc.) Imagine, though, that he sticks to his convictions through thick and thin. No matter how bad things get, he won't "blame Wall Street."

Who he does blame isn't clear. Given the emphasis on his own hard work and dedication, it's unlikely that he's taking Herman Cain's advice and blaming himself for his own negligence in not having the good sense to be born into a rich family. Nor, given the enthusiastic reference to "God" at the bottom of the sign, does it seem likely that he's blaming the deity for that particular bit of natural evil.

Perhaps the question of "blame" doesn't arise for him. He could tell two sorts of stories according to which "blame" would be a non-issue.

First, it could be that no one is to blame because he's perfectly content with his lot.

He was happy to work 60-70 hours a week while the rich kids had all the time they needed to study.

He doesn't need as many as four consecutive days off in four years since he can have all the fun he'd ever want in three.

He doesn't mind his lack of health insurance. If he gets cancer, he's happy to stay home from the hospital and hope for the best. Or he'll accept that the God who he invokes as blessing American capitalism in the last line of his sign wouldn't give him cancer without a good reason, and he thinks it would be inappropriate for him to interfere with God's will. Perhaps he thinks that doctors won't be necessary—he'll just grit his teeth and hum the Marines' Hymn over and over again until his cancer chickens out and goes into remission.

(From the halls of Montezuma....)

Of course, even if so, all of this would be morally irrelevant, and certainly wouldn't justify his charge that everybody else is just whinin'.

By analogy, the fact that many Saudi women would voluntarily wear veils hardly justifies the rest of them being legally forced to. The fact that many slaves in ancient Rome were content with their lot—some accepting their servitude, for example, as the will of various Gods—doesn't add up to a terribly convincing moral objection to other slaves joining Spartacus in revolt.

Hardly anyone chooses to live in poverty. The tens of millions of Americans who, like our friend the Marine, can't afford health insurance, aren't choosing to forgo it. (Maybe the sign-holder would refuse socialized medicine on principle—it would be interesting to find out if he takes advantage of the services of the Veteran's Administration—but, pretty clearly, most would not.) If circumstances of those even at the bottom rung of current casino-capitalist realities aren't even close to as bad, in many obvious ways, as those of Saudi women or Roman slaves, it remains the case that they have legitimate grievances, and despite the sociologically-illiterate babble of the Herman Cains of the world, it's impossible to seriously argue that the difference between their circumstances and those of the Wall Street profiteers are entirely, or even mostly, under their control.

Of course, somewhat more charitably, we could assume that the 53-percenter in the picture doesn't think in terms of blame, not because he thinks that if he doesn't mind his economic circumstances, it somehow follows that no one else has a legitimate complaint about those conditions, but because he regards the situation as morally just.

And, to be fair to him, "morally just" is quite compatible with "unfortunate and depressing." By analogy, if your wife or boyfriend or girlfriend or husband or whatever leaves you, and you loved them very much, it might make perfect sense for you to be (a) utterly devastated by that turn of events, without (b) going crazy and forming the belief that your partner should have been forced to stay with you, or that they didn't have a moral right to decide to end the relationship. Perhaps the Marine in the picture thinks his economic situation is like that—the natural result of consensual economic activity everyone involved had every right to engage in.

Robert Nozick thought that this would be sufficient to justify any economic outcome. In Anarchy, State and Utopia, he argued that even the most extreme end-state inequalities could be morally justified if they'd come about the right way. He had many interesting, challenging arguments for this view. Others have poked interesting holes in them—like G.A. Cohen's point that Nozick's most famous thought experiment shows only that historical considerations are relevant to the justice or injustice of end-states, while Nozick insisted on treating them as if they were decisive—but there's a much simpler and more important reason why Nozickian considerations are not, and could not, even be relevant to the justice of the complaints of the 99%, rising up in all corners of the country, and now the world, to demand justice from the Wall Street profiteers.

To see why, consider Nozick's two conditions for a given distribution of resources being just:

First of all, we have to start with just acts of original acquisition, so that at the beginning of the story, everyone clearly has a right to their possessions. (For example, we imagine starting by people claiming bits of un-owned land, clearing them off to start farms, and so on.) Then, as long as all changes in distribution since then result from what Nozick calls "capitalistic acts between consenting adults" (i.e. transfers in which force and fraud are not used), whatever final distribution we end up with, even one far worse than the one we have, even one that involved 1% of the population living in opulence and the other 99% living in the conditions memorably described by Louie CK in the clip below—living just long enough to be hungry, then starving to death immediately thereafter—it would be just, because of its immaculate origins.

The argument between Nozick and people like Cohen about whether this hypothetical, immaculately-conceived version of capitalism would be morally just, is a fascinating philosophical debate, and it's the sort of complex question about which intelligent people can reasonably disagree. It could not, however, possibly be less relevant to the current real-life struggle between the actual 99% and the actual Wall Street aristocracy, for the simple reason that, whatever one thinks of hypothetical, immaculately-conceived capitalism, that's not what happened here.

Anyone who's ever cracked a history book and at least skimmed through it for fifteen or twenty minutes knows that the just-original-acquisitions-followed-by-consensual-transfers story could hardly be further from the real origins of our system. American capitalism was built on the back of slaves taken to the New World in chains. The fields where those slaves were forced to work were, far from having been claimed from some sort of state of nature, part of lands taken by force and genocidal violence from the native population of the continent. When we turn from America to the rest of the world—capitalism, after all, having always been a globally-interconnected system—we see capitalism emerging from feudalism, aristocrats becoming industrialists. Turning to the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, we see a trail of corpses in Europe and America, as trade union organizers, radical agitators and others who threatened those industrialists' profits were often murdered by thugs or locked up on trumped-up charges or using blatantly oppressive laws. As a 19th-century German guy who, like Robert Nozick, was a Philosophy major in college, but who, unlike Nozick, was as interested in empirical data about economic history as he was in philosophy, put it in one memorable passage, capitalism came into the world "dripping from head to foot, from every pore, with blood and dirt."

Turning to 2011, we see conditions exactly that brutal still in force in many of the third world countries whose sweat shops are integral to the high profit margins of the American 1%. (See the death squads employed by Coca Cola in Colombia as a case in point. You have to ignore an awful lot of recent history, in Latin America and elsewhere, to will yourself to believe the case to be entirely out-of-character for American corporate behavior in those regions.) And, here in America, the 1% successfully lobbied for the reversal of regulations that had prevented financial institutions from becoming "too big to fail", committed a thousand varieties of mathematically inventive fraud as they rode high on exploiting the housing bubble, and, when it all came crashing down around them, far from comporting themselves as Nozickian rugged individualists, they successfully directed their bribed political representatives to bail them out using tax money collected from the rest of us. Since getting back on their feet, they've cautiously hoarded their wealth while things have gotten worse and worse for everyone else.

Whether one focuses on origins or outcomes, the injustice of this situation—and the legitimacy of the 99%'s complaint—is overwhelming and undeniable.

And the guy clutching that sign proudly proclaiming his refusal to blame, or to whine, as if this refusal on his part was just supremely virtuous?

He's like someone who refuses to help his neighbors put out a fire coursing through the neighborhood, even knowing perfectly well that, if left unchecked it will consume his house as well, because he thinks working together is a kind of communism.

There are a lot of things you could say about that attitude.

"Virtuous" is not one of them.

20111017-05 08:52 SteveG Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Dale,

In terms of agriculture, the marketplace is not free as we continue to subsidize farmers and milk producers—tobacco, corn, peanuts, sugar cane, rice—all protected.

Companies used to have a social conscience, be concerned with—profits/shareholders, employees, communities, and country. Now it seems companies are interested in profit and the shareholders. When the CEO of Bank of America stated as a matter of fact there is an inherent right to make a profit after being bailed out, after the CEO of GE in discussing the movement of their research and development to Brazil and stated he owes it to the shareholders to make a profit. Chase in the process of being bailed out: sold their buildings; took the equity to profits; leased the buildings back; and outsourced 10,000 jobs to decrease their payroll. Back to Bank of America decreasing their workforce by 30,000 employees this fall and then complaining that they need to make money.

20111017-06 20:52 Pam Re: "Prison or Deportation..."

Dear SteveB,

I don't believe it! We're actually working toward a consensus. I love this group! (And it's all thanks to you.)

Yes, we should control our borders. I have no problem with that. I just don't want us to act like the Gestapo toward the people who are already here. When we got kicked out of Canada, we were given some time (a week or two) to get ourselves together. Nobody was arrested. They came knocking; we left. Traumatic at the time, but not as traumatic as going to jail.

I like the idea of some sort of amnesty. Clear the books and start over. I wouldn't put a quota on how many illegals would have to leave; I'd let them all stay, if they're here already and aren't committing crimes. I'd also let them apply for a green card from within the U.S.—if they're here already. Maybe if they've been here for a year or something. Children born here—no question. We could have applied for landed immigrant status in Canada, but we had to do that from outside the country, and it would take time (a year or two, I think). We couldn't do that, so we just left and moved in with my parents. That was just an awful time. This was actually the second time we'd had to do that (long story, well, not long, but sad), and I was miserable about it. My parents were very gracious about having us, but now that I'm older, I realize what an imposition we were. It was also humiliating. Oh well, that was a long time ago.

I agree that immigration is a problem that might actually have some solutions. That's rather nice, sort of like hating Nixon. The scandal was delicious, but no one died. Keep up the good fight!

20111017-07 09:35 Jim How Can We Frame the Debate?

I read somewhere on the net a few weeks ago about how the tea party and others "frame the debate" to set the playing field against letting the facts or scientific research or any logic interfere with their agenda.

For example all medical questions or insurance or welfare programs have to be antiabortion or they are just intolerable.

Taxes are "stealing from those who earned their money" instead of the price we pay to live in a civilized world.

Taxes are "redistributing the wealth" instead of setting up a more progressive way to pay for the infrastructure and education we need to have a healthy and productive educated workforce.

Tax cuts for the rich are to encourage them to spend a bit of their huge share of the pie to create some jobs and let the profits trickle down to the poor like the scraps from the rich man's table in the Bible instead of a greedy way for them to enrich themselves even more at the expense of the rest of the citizens.

Some senator claimed the Senate should take over doing the EPA's job so they could ignore the science when it suited their sponsors' needs no matter what it does to the air we breathe or the water we drink.

Building the XL Pipeline from Canada to the Gulf is extolled to "reduce our dependence on foreign oil" when the plan for that oil is to be able to export it from the U.S. to countries that will pay even more for it than we will.

Letting Medicare use the size of its purchasing power to negotiate lower drug prices was prevented by Congress to make sure the big drug companies could keep their prices high on patented drugs.

Where is the concern for the direct and side effects of these attitudes for both the short and long term?

How can we re-set the frames to get around the roadblocks of the know-nothings/do-nothings Teapublicans?

20111017-08 09:36 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Dale,

Now the government is totally broken by these dogmatic, thick-skulled teabaggers and that doesn't help.

20111017-09 10:26 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear SteveG,

I don't think I agree. Corporations were invented and are constructed to do one thing—make money! This are what they should do. And I believe a lot of the "bad corporation" behavior you are talking about has been taken by corporations, who by law must place their stockholders first, because of the currently vast uncertainties in the marketplace. This is why companies are sitting on so much money and banks aren't making loans. They're scared to death! Our government, especially in the last 10 years, has created a disaster. Now the government is totally broken by these dogmatic, thick-skulled teabaggers and that doesn't help.

Think about it. These corporations, the "people" of Mitt Romney's, are without morals, even if they used to have some, which I doubt. That's OK too. But they are more like autonomous robots from Terminator loose in our world than they are like people. They will eat people alive if given the chance and care not one whit.

Just as with government, just as with the tyranny the Founding Fathers feared, the corporations, driven by nothing but greed, just as our politicians driven by nothing but greed for power, can be a source of tyranny more powerful and dark than any single government. Ask anyone out of job right now.

Why were corporations allowed to ship the jobs elsewhere? That never happened before in American history, even under roughly the same conditions. Why didn't we keep protecting our markets like we always did? Now it's a little late.

And Republicans think the answers lie in further deregulation, more free trade, and even lower corporate taxes? My-o-my! Just what has worked so well for us!

CORPORATIONS (& UNIONS, WHICH ALREADY ARE) MUST BE CONTROLLED BY THE RULE OF LAW WHICH CREATES A FAIR SOCIETY FOR ALL.

But, I agree with SteveG, that it is such a slap in the face of America every year to see what taxes GE paid.

20111017-10 10:31 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

And the turnip at the bottom ain't gonna take much more squeezing!

20111017-11 10:45 Mark Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

from SteveB:

Now the government is totally broken by these dogmatic, thick-skulled teabaggers and that doesn't help.

Dear SteveB,

Gee, it certainly didn't take long for the teabaggers to ruin the government....

Are you talking about the originals in Boston or the recent ones that popped up during the 2008 presidential campaign???

I'd expect you to say that GWB ruined it much earlier.

20111017-12 11:00 Mary Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

from SteveB:

Now the government is totally broken by these dogmatic, thick-skulled teabaggers and that doesn't help.

Dear SteveB,

You know (and you're still living out of the country??), I really don't give a rat's booty what your opinion is, just suggesting that you NOT generalize and lump people together as "thick-skulled" because you disagree w/ them: shows ignorance. Guessing you wouldn't have joined the group in Boston, huh? Wondering where we'd be now w/o that protest? No doubt they were "thick-skulled", too, according to you. Just saying'.....

20111017-13 11:15 SteveB Things Americans Agree On

I have been thinking about Dale's last comments in the "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth" thread, which raise several of the key points in this debate.

It got me thinking, since, as I wrote, I thought many of these issues were settled long ago. I know I have read of times and can remember times when Americans did not have to question wars or the tax code and social values. People agreed about many goals—like the "American dream" Dale has mentioned or a good education, unions, or progressive taxes. What's to argue? Study history when those things did not exist. Is that where the Tea Party wants to take us?

Anyway, I put together a list of things that I firmly believe Americans still believe in and want enough to pay for. I don't know what the surveys say, or what you guys think, but I'd love to know.

It turns out that there is one common thread that runs through all these things, and that is freedom. (And you thought I was a communist!) The freedom is so important that I will discuss it as I go. And, gee, some of these things cost money.

WHAT MOST AMERICANS WANT (not necessarily in order)

1. A decent job. Winning the lottery or having a rich uncle would be nice, but a job that can completely support at least one person would seem to be a necessity. And I believe people want to work, not take government handouts. Those few who prefer to live contrary to this must be re-educated. :-) The freedom here is easy, though not guaranteed by the Constitution—freedom from want. I don't know about you, but I want all my countrymen to be in this boat together. These jobs are also necessary for our freedom. Our freedom from angry, hungry mobs roving the streets looking for victims.

2. Security. National and local. The job government's were created for. Why we put up with the compromises imposed by government. The freedom from worry. The freedom to make plans. Freedom from crime and bombs. Perhaps the right to a stable country. The entities created by this need, the police and army, must be controlled by the people, so as not to turn against the people, or even be able to turn against the people, or even one person. Fair?

3. A good, fair educational system. Almost all Americans used to agree with this one, now it's just most of us. Freedom from want. Freedom from ignorance. Freedom from lies and tyranny. The American dream. Freedom from a bleak future. Freedom to hope. Maybe freedom from mobs in the street again. I want us all to have that, as much as we can.

4. Competent, affordable healthcare. Freedom from pain. Freedom from unnecessary suffering and death. And most Americans want some form of "socialized medicine". We love our Medicare and Medicaid, despite their flaws. They might need to be fixed or improved, but Republicans will commit political suicide to try to eliminate too much. Pandora's magic box has been opened.

5. A way to retire sometime. People also love Social Security, as a whole. Tamper too much at your peril. And, without thievery by Congress, the system (like the Post Office) would be working pretty well, thank you. Freedom from want and suffering. The American dream. Fairness. Partly the responsibility of families too.

6. A fair society. To have freedom, we must have freedom to fail. It seems like even God gave us that. Like some businesses which are started with great hope, but which ultimately fail and go bankrupt, some people, given the freedom to try, will fail. But despite what Mitt Romney says, people are different than corporations. When a person fails, and it may not even be their fault, just as it is not necessarily the business's, great suffering can result. And I believe, where at all possible and where else but in the greatest country on Earth, these people fulfilled their part of the social contract when they tried. I believe society must step in and help. That's all.

7. Privacy. If the government doesn't have the right to take away my gun, it doesn't have the right to invade my privacy and tell me what to do with my own body. I reserve the freedom to be me. No government knows better than me for me, so has no right to interfere unless I could hurt others in some way. The majority of us want abortion left alone, whether we think abortions are good or bad, moral or immoral. The government needs to say out of the bedroom. This was decided long ago.

Which of these things do Republicans not want, and do not want us all, as a society, to pay for? To me, these points of agreement seem somehow like the antithesis of what I imagine the Republican platform to be.

Do you think this reveals a disconnect with most Americans?

20111017-14 11:31 SteveG Re: Things Americans Agree On

It all sounds like the values when we grew up and very similar to the life style that is available in the Scandinavian countries. Yes their taxes are high, but they are happy, have access to health care, education, jobs, retirement, etc. If you check back into the 50's, 60's, 70's the U.S. had similar federal tax rates for certain income levels but we never had the educational & health care benefits.

20111017-15 11:33 Charis Re: Things Americans Agree On

Dear SteveB,

I'd say most of us want these things, yes. But many people are not willing to work for them. They want it handed out. They want jobs to come easy without making an effort to get the education they need, they want free education and healthcare but avoid paying as many taxes as possible, they want to retire but overspend and don't plan their retirement or save when they do have the possibility to do so, some want security and safety but aren't willing to do service, pay our police and military enough to recruit the best, or want someone else's kid to do service but not their own, etc. etc. etc.

There is a big difference between wanting something and being willing to take the steps to obtain what you want.

For example, I really wanted to be a pilot, however I decided I really wasn't up to the effort it would take with all the math involved. I really wanted to be a police officer and I attended training, then found I really didn't want to ever have to shoot someone, I really would love to eat three pounds of chocolate a day, but I know if I do I'll get sick.

You see, people forget that freedom is about both right AND duties. Most people just focus on their rights but aren't really all that committed to the duties involved.

20111017-16 11:58 Pam Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Mark,

He didn't do it by himself.

20111017-17 12:11 Pam Re: Things Americans Agree On

I can't argue with any of this. In SteveB's defense, let me say that here he presents his arguments in a reasonable tone and with sound logic. He's got it in him. But his tirades, nerve-jangling as they might be to some, are, to me, a letting off of steam. I often feel like ranting and raving too, but I try not to let myself do that. Sometimes it's kind of therapeutic to have someone else do it for me.

That said, I do hope those of you who disagree with those of us on the left side of the spectrum will not give up on the conversation. As they say, it's all good.

20111017-18 12:13 Pam Re: Things Americans Agree On

Dear Charis,

Will you concede that at least some of the time people fall into difficulties that are not of their own making? Yes, we are all responsible for ourselves, but it would be a cold world where it was every man for himself. Responsibilities and duties include offering a helping hand as well.

20111017-19 12:16 Pam Re: Things Americans Agree On

My mother always used to say, You get what you pay for. If we don't want to pay for health care for all or public education or security for old people, where does that leave us? We ALL have to pay if we all want to live peaceably together. You can't throw people to the wolves and expect them not to tear each other apart.

20111017-20 12:17 Art Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear SteveB,

Thanks for the welcome and like you, I enjoy a healthy discussion. Almost everything I have heretofore been getting from my right wing friends is just passed along hate mail. Where does all this stuff come from? It used to be they would claim some fact, "President Obama doesn't display the flag". SNOPEs takes most of those apart and, of course, I send them back, so now I notice a shift. Just hateful accusations, "President Obama is a secret communist", that there is no reply to. At least this group tries to justify its positions with some thought behind it.

As I think you know, I am a Greencastle product "61. Spent 28 years in the Army, then worked here in Washington for another 18 years. We live in Fairfax Station, VA just outside the beltway.

I used to be a Republican but simply cannot abide the politics of this new group. I don't think they care anything about the country except in their own twisted idea of what it should be. To many accusations of Nazism being thrown about these days but, as a historian, the tea party does remind me of the early days of the Nazi SA Brownshirts.

Thanks again for the welcome.

20111017-21 12:35 SteveB Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Mary,

If I referred to a real person, then I would apologize. If I referred to a politician or politicians in general or politicians of some party (which I did), then I reserve my right to criticize the government, as do we all.

Surely you don't always refer to President Obama in the kindest of terms, based on what I've read here? And I will defend your right to do so to the very death. I mean that.

And, yes, I live out of the country a good part of the time, but that's more my wife's choice than mine, though I don't mind. You should try it.

20111017-22 12:36 Art Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Mary,

Just as a point to consider, the American colonists in the late 18th century were collectively the richest society in the world at that time. So the original tea party participants were not a bunch of poor bedraggled economically downtrodden peons but rather folks from a very well off society. The British of the time knew that well and were simply asking the colonists help pay for defending the western approaches against the deprivations of Indians and the French and Spanish who were still in the south. The colonists very much wanted that protection, they just didn't want to pay for it.

Sound vaguely familiar?

20111017-23 12:50 Art Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear SteveG,

Take a close look at Mr. Cain's pizza transactions. Lots of money made by the high ranking staff in consolidation at the expense of the rest of the workforce. It's all there in the records.

As a lowly share holder, I also no longer believe big corporations are doing much for me, the shareholder either. As I review proposals a company recommends for the annual meetings, all it seems to do is benefit the senior management. Unfortunately I don't own in the 10,000 and up share category for most of them, so I realize my little protest doesn't do much but as a regular practice if they recommend it I vote against it. I also use an arbitrary standard of $1M for total annual compensation. If it is more, I try to vote the CEO out.

Anyone ever look at what the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff makes or the salary of U.S. Army Division Commander with 20,000 troops and billions of dollars of equipment? Our corporate salaries are a joke.

20111017-24 12:54 Art Re: Things Americans Agree On

Dear SteveB,

Good thoughts. Pam sent along an article about happiness and the Danes that struck a note about faith in one another and that includes the government. I think a good point. I don't care if you have more than me, as long as there is a reasonable fair shake at achieving some level of happiness, pretty well cover below. Sadly that does not exist today.

20111017-25 13:47 SteveB "Unsettled Times"

I like this guy's thoughts. He seems to speak for average citizens—the middle class. I believe these issues (jobs and the greed of the rich) will be the biggest factor in the 2012 elections. Mark my words. I have to say that the Republicans do not exactly seem poised to take advantage of this, do they?

If you are a Republican or a Teabagger, and you not one of the top 1% of the wealthiest people in America, definitely if you are not in the top 10%, aren't you really on the wrong side in your struggle to achieve your dreams and those of your children and grandchildren? :-)

If only the top 1% or 10% are helped, are you getting that help or paying for it? I know I'm paying! And I further say that I believe the top 1% or 10% is sticking it to the rest of us!

"Unsettled Times" posted by Ron Indiana, MSB blog

Oct. 17, 2011, (<http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/10/17/8363392-first-thoughts-defining-romney#c59052918>)

On Oct. 3, 2011, I first commented on Occupy Wall Street (OWS) protesters. With the advances of the internet the movement has now become worldwide. There are simply too many marches and demonstrations to list them all. It is not surprising that the austerity movement in European countries like Greece, Italy, France and England have found common ground with the OWS protesters. But, in fact, the OWS movement has spread beyond Europe and is now global.

There has been some change in the Republican response to OWS. Fewer Republicans are describing the movement in derogatory terms. Even Eric Cantor has dropped the word "Mob". Being the political animal he is, he sees the political implications as more and more people are willing to step forward and say, "I'm one of the 99%". But the harsh reality is that none—not one of the Republicans in office or running for office—are willing modify their conservative thinking to help Main Street Americans who are out of work, or being taxed to protect the riches of the wealthy.

It may have been Nixon who coined the term "silent majority"; but today's silent majority is frustrated and angry. They are angry that those in Congress cannot craft a jobs bill while politicians put themselves or their party first and not the country. And now the silent majority is not so silent. Not only are 99% of Americans angry at government, they are outraged by the bank bailouts and the banks demonstrating their greed by adding monthly charges on their debit cards. They are outraged by the banks unwillingness to work with customers and their continuing policy of foreclosing homes. They are outraged by the huge bonuses given to top executives.

As long as middle class Americans continue to get the short end of the stick, this movement will continue to grow and it will play a significant role in the 2012 election. If corporate CEOs, Boehner and Cantor don't come to grips with this reality, their picture can be hung along side of Alfred E. Neumann with the caption, "What, me worry?"

20111017-26	13:53	Charis	Re: "Unsettled Times"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

Dear SteveB,

It's not that I disagree with you about today's Republicans and the new teabuddies. However, I'm not of the opinion that Demos are doing any better. So where does that leave us? Should we start a new party?

20111017-27	14:27	SteveB	Re: "Unsettled Times"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

from the same blog...not a media personality or some famous pundit, but just a regular person, one of us... [Not "average". One of "we the people". —SteveB]

from "Defining Romney" Comments, posted by Hunter, First Read, MSNBC

Oct. 17, 2011, (<http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/news/2011/10/17/8363392-first-thoughts-definingromney>)

Both of my children are in college and are now very motivated by the OWS. Frankly, I feel the message is undisciplined and hard to follow but my son said it best:

"Something is not right; as if the last decade was a fake...we don't have a central message because people want us to define ourselves based on what they know and are comfortable with. It's like we don't know ourselves because what was comfortable and familiar to some [including our generation], was a lie; to go back to the way it was is a lie."

He goes on to talk about how people are sharing stories, venting, releasing energy (he's his mother's child) and connecting. What strikes me most though is he doesn't want "our" help. He wants to reinvent, create new ideas, find the motivation to "do something good" for his place in the world.

He's so energetic, much more than I've seen him and I can't help but find it refreshing. That is the underlying depth of American culture. We're never really down and out, we just reinvent ourselves and draw new energy. It is his future and, from the generation that is given a first place trophy even when they come in last, I like that they want to find their own way. I say go for it...

20111017-28	14:41	Charis	"First Person: My Biggest Money Secret"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

This is why I really don't pity Americans all that much.

[Ya, but in country of more than 300 million people, there are bound to be all kinds of stories like these, even in good economic times, which these aren't. They are just saying that these are bad things that happen to people or that they did to themselves. Yes, bad things, but rare. Are they as rare as they should be? Probably not, but...this is not what is bringing the country to its knees. —SteveB]

"First Person: My Biggest Money Secret" by Tim Sprinkle, Yahoo! Contributor Network

Oct. 31, 2011, (<http://finance.yahoo.com/news/first-person-biggest-money-secret-183000348.html>)

As with most things, financial hindsight is 20/20.

We all have those money secrets — that big debt, that low credit score, that bankruptcy filing — that we'd rather our friends and family not find out about, if for no other reason than to save face and prove that we've moved beyond our youthful indiscretions. But where's the fun in that?

So, in the spirit of learning from others' mistakes, we asked our Yahoo! contributors to come clean and share their own personal money secrets with the world. Their stories are below.

I Filed for Bankruptcy (Jimmy Collins)

As a former financial adviser and someone who is often looked upon as one who makes good financial decisions, I am also only human and have been harboring a money secret from my past for some time now. Almost 15 years ago I had to file for bankruptcy.

This was well before I was a financial adviser and it was also during my first marriage. Now, I'm not going to say it was all my ex-wife's fault or all my fault, but I will say that between the two of us we racked up over $45,000 in debt. At that point in my life I was only waiting tables and barely making enough to pay all the minimums.

After I lost my job and couldn't find another one, I saw no other alternative. However, I have more than rebounded from that awful financial nightmare and have learned from it as well. Now I don't buy anything unless I have the cash for it and I now pride myself for practicing what I preach.

I Had a Weakness for Credit Cards (Bex Barker)

My husband didn't realize he had married somebody who was addicted to shopping. Even though I knew that our policy of 'cash only' was a smart one, and I claimed to give up the use of credit cards, all I really managed to do was relinquish my most used ones. Unbeknownst to my husband, I squirreled away a card with a small balance and a decent sized limit.

Several months and $2,000 later, my husband found out about my compulsive spending. At first I tried to deny anything was amiss, but it was obvious I had used the card often. The worst part about it was that I couldn't really account for all $2,000. I knew I had bought clothes, but I can't remember what else was purchased.

My husband's discovery of my addiction was important not only to our financial health but also to our relationship. Since then he has monitored our finances more closely. Additionally, we sat down and cut up each one of our credit cards so as to make it impossible for me to abuse them again. Our new lifestyle is a challenge at times, and thanks to my regression we've added several thousand dollars to our journey to being debt free, but we are back on the path again, and I've made sure our financial GPS doesn't take us anywhere near a mall.

I'm Still Making Minimum Wage (Jesse Schmitt)

I have been out of work for the better part of four years. I have been pursuing my writing career, but still I like to try and raise my contribution level whenever I am able. So when the opportunity came about for me to get some holiday work at a popular retail department store, I figured "why not?" ... The woman who made me the offer slid it across the table. She could not even speak the words; she had to write it down for me to read. $8.25 an hour.

I accepted, and then quickly rescinded my acceptance of the offer. As a 32-year-old man I should not be accepting the same rate I was offered at my first suburban retail store almost 20 years ago.

I Was a Timeshare Junkie (Gerry Even)

I was likely an easy mark when I attended the timeshare presentation and walked out the proud owner of a piece of paper for what was promised to be a very nice condo that I could use for a week every year. I say 'promised' because at the time I signed my name, there was a drawing and a hole in the sand, and nothing more.

Two years later I returned, enjoyed my stay at my now newly built property, and again attended another sales presentation. Once again, I must have been an easy mark because I upgraded from a one-bedroom to a two-bedroom condo in what was probably record time.

It wasn't until after I'd signed my name on a $27,000 piece of property (the two-bedroom) that I started to research what that condo was actually worth. Hello, eBay! My giddy investment was available to me at a fraction of the price I'd paid from other people that had fallen for the same bright shiny object sales pitch.

We Had to Shut Down Our Spending ... Completely (A.C. Haury)

The key to keeping a financially strapped family's head above water? Stop spending. I am not just talking about cutting luxuries, here. When I say I stopped spending, it meant I only got new things at Christmas and my birthday. My husband and I got our financial house in order by limiting all spending. Our children's needs came first, and the only time we purchased new clothes for ourselves was when our current wardrobe was falling into disrepair. Frivolous spending came to a complete halt. Our money went to bills, food and the needs of our children.

I Was Upside Down on a Car Loan (Marie Dubuque)

I was so proud of the brand new Mazda RX7 that I bought in 1989. It had a rotary engine that was as smooth as silk. Forget about the fact that it blew through gas like you wouldn't believe. I didn't believe it until I moved to Florida and took my new set of wheels on a 45-minute commute every day. Needless to say, between the toll roads and the gas guzzler I was driving, I went broke pretty fast. So, instead of trading the thing in for a more practical vehicle, I went to the car dealer armed with ... well, nothing. Not a penny to my name.

You see, I was upside down. I had taken out a loan and now owed more than the car was worth. No problem, according to the finance manager at the slick Mazda dealership. He could put me into a fire engine red Mazda Miata. The hottest thing going that year. The trick? I had to lease it.

Come to find out, that was a really bad idea when it came time to trade it in. I was over on my miles and, you guessed it, once again I had to pay money to get out of the thing. Only this time I made the right move. I traded it in for a no-frills blue Toyota (I paid cash). I'll never forget that car either ... because I hated it so much. It was the most boring car imaginable. But I did learn my lesson. I never again leased a car or borrowed money for one either.

That Time My Car Got Repossessed (Laura Cone)

It started with a bad financial move in 1994 when I literally gave away one of our two cars before making a rash decision to quit my job and move to California. We only made it as far as Tucson, deterred by the 1994 California earthquake. Without my well-paying job, we had trouble making the payment on our remaining car. We took our car in to be repaired and couldn't pay the repair bill. They repossessed the car while it was at the repair shop.

20111017-29 14:42 GaryC Re: "Unsettled Times"

Dear SteveB,

I have never considered you AVERAGE and I know I am not AVERAGE.

Please adjust your standards.

20111017-30 14:57 Mary Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"

Dear Pam,

This is why I enjoy your emails.....I may not always agree, but I respect you for seeing the whole picture, not name calling, backing up what you say, and not blaming just one person or party or movement.

20111017-31 15:01 Pam Re: "Unsettled Times"

This is terrific. You know, I think I'm beginning to feel less hopeless. It seems as if a tide is turning. It's hard for me to see how anyone could disagree with what the OWS is calling for. Some say, Get a job. Or why should we help lazy people? But these young people are not lazy; they are motivated and committed. They are our future, and I'm beginning to feel they just might turn things around.

20111017-32 16:00 Art Re: "Unsettled Times"

Ain't just young people either.

20111017-33 18:26 SteveG Re: "Unsettled Times" & "Is #OWS the Revolution the Beatles Were Singing About?" (continued under heading: Health Care)

from: The Daily Share (moveon-help@list.moveon.org):

Hello! Here are the three hottest progressive videos and graphics that we found on the web today, Oct. 17, 2011:

"Is OWS the Revolution the Beatles Were Singing About?"

<http://front.moveon.org/is-ows-the-revolution-the-beatles-were-singing-about-2/?rc=daily.share&id=32078-18997482-Er%3DZDyx>

"Why Occupy Wall Street Will Win the War of Ideas"

<http://front.moveon.org/why-occupywallstreet-will-win-the-war-of-ideas/?rc=daily.share&id=32078-18997482-Er%3DZDyx>

Gay Marriage, Straight Marriage—What's The Diff?

<http://front.moveon.org/gay-marriage-straight-marriage-whats-the-diff/?rc=daily.share&id=32078-18997482-Er%3DZDyx>

Powered by MoveOn Civic Action

20111017-34 22:32 SteveG Censorship

<http://www.activistpost.com/2011/05/governments-orders-youtube-to-censor.html>

20111017-35 23:03 Dale Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)

Dear SteveB ref: [20111017-27],

Now this is what framing is all about. Nice job of distorting the reality of the last election and most of the interim elections the last two years, where the voters overwhelmingly have sent a message they have no confidence in Obama and the policies he espouses. He has given up trying to lead the country and is now in full campaign mode. Travel at taxpayer expense is a pretense for fund raising. Poll after poll show the independents who voted for Obama have discovered just how unprepared he was and what a failure his economic, social and foreign policies are. Now the Democrats are stuck with him for the next election. Of course they are also saddled with Reed and Pelosi, whose arrogance in forcing an unpopular health plan resulted in alienating all but the most liberal.

Speaking of which, for those of you who think Obamacare is a good idea, or that it doesn't go far enough, how do you explain why polls show that a clear majority of Americans don't want it?

By ignoring the polls, do you think the issue will go away. It's been said in these exchanges that Obamacare hasn't cost us anything, because no money has been spent so far, but I believe that misses what THE EFFECT of the passage has had. By coming into office with a chip on his shoulder (Obama) and their shoulders (Democratic Congress) towards business and expressing how "we're going to show them," they sent a clear anti-business signal. Well, threaten a lot of environmental rules and enforcement, and not give businesses a chance to plan....what do you expect? They sit on their hands and don't invest in equipment or hire people. Forcing Obamacare through in the darkness of night, a bill even the Democratic lawmakers didn't understand and were afraid to show to anyone until it was passed, is not the way to build confidence. Now as more details emerge and the horrendous cost on businesses and the American public who will pay for a huge new bureaucracy are clearer, the impetus to repeal is growing, not slackening.

Pretend you are a sole proprietor running a small machine shop or a even a printing shop, a business you built up by risking your savings to buy equipment, advertise and by working long, hard hours. There is no way to plan what the costs will be for employee health insurance, for adding people to fill out forms, etc. You hope the whole thing will go away and something more rational will take its place.....so you wait. You don't hire. You don't buy new equipment. You try to keep up with technology, but that's about it. Passage of Obamacare is just one more unknown and it has cost us all by slowing the time it takes to recover our economy. It's easy to conjure an image of "business" or "rich owners" as heartless and greedy, but most jobs in the U.S. are with small businesses and small business owners. These owners have the same issues as their employees and neighbors, just trying to make their way and have something left when they are too old to work. They have children and parents and siblings who are like you and me, just trying to make something out of their lives. Unfortunately, lots of laws, rules, orders and unchecked enforcement is much harder on small businesses than large companies. They can be nimble when there are opportunities but their margin of financial safety is slimmer. People like "community organizer" Obama and career politicians don't understand this. They don't get that when you send signals you are going to "crack down," "make business pay more," and pick which industries to favor (automotive, solar) and which to attack (banks, which unfortunately also means small banks) you scare people. It's these scared people who are sitting on their hands and their investment $$$. Something as simple as taking away some of the unknowns will go a long ways towards building confidence among small business owners. Even if their costs go up, at least they can plan.

Frame away, SteveB, but the sentiment numbers don't support your pipe dream.

20111018-01 09:41 Dale Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)

Dear SteveB,

I want you to know I don't really believe any of this stuff I wrote. I just like picturing you whirling around the room like a Tasmanian Devil after you've read it. :-)

Have a great day!

20111018-02 09:44 GaryC Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)

Dear Dale,

But it's so easy to irritate a socialist!

20111018-03 11:11 Pam Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)

Dear Dale ref: [20111017-35],

Shoot. I was all geared up to respond. Well, I think I'll respond anyway, at least a little bit. People are not upset about small or even medium-sized businesses. It's the huge corporate profits and corporate manipulations that make everyone crazy. No one wants to hurt the small businessman.

We hear a lot about regulations, but we're never told what they are and why particular ones are bad. This is argument without evidence. It sounds good, but it means nothing unless it's backed up with specifics. I'm going on what people I trust say about regulations: things like full disclosure on loans, clean water and air, safe drugs, etc. Water and air are so obvious. No one wants to breathe fumes. The financial regulations are trickier because they're opaque and obscure. We need to shine a light on that. When corporations get all worked up about Elizabeth Warren, who is trying to protect the consumer (us), you know they have something to hide.

The only thing wrong with Obamacare is that it doesn't go far enough. Single payer and universal care should be standard. When I lived in Canada, I didn't have to be a citizen or show my birth certificate or anything. We were enrolled in OHIP (Ontario Health Insurance Plan) automatically. An amount was deducted from my husband's paycheck to pay into it, and it was based on the size of our income. We never wrote a check. Overhead and bureaucracy were kept to a minimum, and the care we received was equal to or better than what we'd get here. You can see from the name, OHIP, that health care was managed by provinces individually. There are, what, nine provinces? (I should know, but I hate to admit I'm not sure.) I don't know how the whole thing was structured; I didn't need to. I just know that everyone was very satisfied with it. If the U.S. is too big for one single system, why not divide the country up into regions, grouping rich states and poorer states together, so as to spread the cost fairly? We could have four or five—or six, whatever—areas of coverage.

What we have now leaves no one satisfied, except perhaps big pharma and insurance companies. All this tinkering around the edges, which is about all Obama, or anyone, can do in this political climate is next to pointless. Too bad we don't have a parliamentary system, where the government in power actually has the power to do things. Once elected, members don't have to seduce their constituents; they go into govt. with a mandate firmly in place. I know we're never going to adopt a parliamentary system, but I wish we could. I'm not a political scientist, so don't everyone jump down my throat for not being a red-blooded, democratic (with a little d) American. Canada and Britain are democracies too. And nothing is perfect. But what we've got now is a disaster.

I don't think Henry Reid or Nancy Pelosi are any more annoying than Mitch McConnell or Newt Gingrich. It's never a good idea for the pot to call the kettle black.

I know you don't actually believe Obama has a chip on his shoulder when it comes to big business. He's in bed with them, haven't you noticed? The only group trying to sabotage the country for personal gain is the Republican extremists. I'd exclude the mainstream GOP, except they're in thrall to the Tea Party.

Finally, I'd like to say, we have a surfeit of "How Our Country Was Destroyed" books. I'd like to see more concrete ideas and less bombast. Americans must be pretty stupid if they're swayed by campaign ads that do nothing but sling mud or show the candidate on the beach in front of a sunset. You can draw your own conclusions about that. I wish I knew more history. I'd like to know how the National Health was implemented after WW II.

Final finally, I'd sure like to see SteveB in Tasmanian devil mode. :-)

With regard to this chain mail: it has a grain of truth, but that small truth (a very alarming small truth, to be sure) is wrapped in frantic layers of bull offal.

<http://www.snopes.com/politics/taxes/debtfree.asp>

There IS such a bill, of course. Whether it has a snowball's chance in heck of going anywhere is questionable. And it appears that a lot of the verbiage in the email is whole cloth.

It's been introduced into both houses. It was introduced to the House by Rep. Peter Fazio (D-Oregon) and Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa). So, yes, by golly, it was introduced by—Democrats. (As are roughly half the bills in any congressional session.)

However, according to Snopes (whom I've never caught in an inaccuracy), our President has not expressed any particular interest in it. The bill is without doubt very unpopular, attested by a complete lack of co-sponsors.

Every session, many bills are introduced whose sponsors know will never pass. Often, this is done just to appease special interest groups. Members of all three parties regularly offer up this ridiculous, no-hope bills so that they have "delivered the goods" for ... you name it. It's too bad stuff like this happens, 'cause it takes attention and congressional time. Most importantly, though: you are being used. This is not "from the Man Who". It's from a couple of congressmen who undoubtedly realize it's doomed to die, moribund.

The major message of this email seems to me to be "Obama is destroying your future by lying to you." It's a very familiar message, shouted shrilly across the Web, always in the form of "tell ALL your friends, if you value your future." There was a ton of this about gun laws in the six months before, and the two years following, our President's inauguration. It was all BS. He's a constitutionalist. Absolutely nothing has changed about the gun laws. Even when (most) Democrats introduce gun legislation, in many cases it's well understood that a bill won't pass, and often never even comes to a vote. But the larger anti-gun lobbies ARE Democrats, and so, the representatives must be seen to represent. The lobby pushes, the congressman sighs, shoves the pen, and we have a bill that won't happen.

Don't get me started on Hilary, though. Fortunately, she is in a position where she can't do anything as insane as, say, putting individual serial numbers on every bullet. It's possible she might really be the person who cooked that idea up. I don't know.

I wouldn't vote for her, or support such a bill. But it would never pass, so I am not losing sleep that someone might introduce such a bill, or even if they did. I like my guns, and I like that the U.S. is such a whacked-out place that I can own them, virtually without limit. It IS an expression of freedom. It is NOT something that would stop the U.S. military from controlling the U.S. public, if it ever came to that. It probably would make a large power hesitate to send in ground troops, but... ya know, we just don't see that as a sole vehicle of war all that much anymore. Ever try and hit a drone with a rifle? There are soooo many guns loose in the U.S. that the idea of controlling them is exactly what the NRA promotes: you know, the old line about if criminals were outlawed, only guns would have criminals. (Whatever) It's obviously true. It's a definition.

My biggest concerns in politics, if we are going partisan here, is the steadfast manner in which Republican-sponsored bills have pecked away at public education, and promoted the obviously flawed concept of privatization. (Just how do we expect adding an additional layer of profit-taking to cut costs or raise efficiency? Each such layer has inbound and outbound auditors, lawyers, executives, and a required profit margin. Give it just a moment, please.)

I would do a lot to defeat this bill if there was any reason to think it was anything but dead in the water. But I cannot pass on propaganda to others, and that's what the wrapper of this message is.

"Don't be trapped by dogma, which is living with the results of other peoples' thinking." — Steve Jobs

Dear Dale [ref 20111017-35],

Well...of course this is the email I don't believe. ;-) [From Dale, ID:

And the longer email I don't really find much to disagree with. And I think Dale stated the case very well.

I have been a small businessman, I've been getting the stuff from the IRS on PPACA ("Obamacare"). I sympathize with this most important of all economic segments. But I recall surveys for years before Obamacare where time after time small businessmen themselves said overwhelmingly that their number one problem was the rising cost of health care and, hence, insurance. Many had dropped insurance. Many worried about how to insure their own families. Something had to be done. It was the wrong time. The Democrat controlled Congress in late 2010 should have passed a budget instead of this bill.

Republicans should have taken part in a spirit of cooperation instead of standing aside and doing nothing. In the end, both parties—being totally corrupted by big money—sold out to the medical and insurance industries and dropped the single payer system. Dropped anything meaningful, in my estimation. Once again, I didn't see the President there leading, either. he sold out early and left the table, just as he did in the budget fight.

You are correct that the uncertainty introduced has a negative impact on hiring. But there was and is so much other uncertainty there too, and adequate credit is still difficult for many to get. And there are tax credits available to many businesses that should help rather than hinder their process. Also, I can remember the same kind of grumbling by doctors and hospitals about how all the Medicare paperwork was going to put them out of business. Ya, right. And I don't think there is any hard evidence yet that Obamacare is affecting the economy at this time. Dale's guess may well be right, though, in which case Mark has a point there too.

But, no the law should not have been passed. Instead, I agree with Pam that we need true socialized medicine and I'd be glad to discuss that subject at length sometime.

The Republicans have offered nothing to solve the healthcare problem except to bow to their moneyed masters in the industry. What's their solution? Same as the economy and taxes and wars and jobs? The same old?

You know what I think should have been done instead of the big elaborate behemoth of Obamacare? A little simple regulation. I can buy car or home insurance, even business or professional liability insurance, at a good price, as if I'm their best customer (almost). Normally, I don't get a much better price if I insure 10 cars or homes. But when it comes to health insurance, my rate is determined by how large a group I am with. Why can't it be the law that everyone is just automatically in the largest group, as with other insurance? This change would make a huge difference to many small businesses. But it would increase costs to big businesses, and the big money always controls things, doesn't it, even in the business world? If the government had extra money at the end of a year, they could simply chip into the pot, all without any huge bureaucracy. What do you think?

An aside: one thing I'll never understand is the hatred that the right seems to feel for Pelosi and "Reed" [sic]. They are a couple of bumbling idiots (excuse me, Mary) who are so totally ineffectual they've never gotten off the launch pad. They seem to have been the best friends the Republicans could have had. They made absolutely sure that absolutely nothing got done the first two years of Obamacacy (or Obamacracy?). (I just made that up. I rather like it.) Then the only thing that got done, instead of the budget, was Obamacare.

Why the extreme animosity toward President Obama and Obamacare, so out of place in an Obamacracy?

20111018-06	12:39	GaryF	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
-------------	-------	-------	---

This is really good, the only one I disagree with is #5. I'd rather see the congressional health plan opened up to everyone. [That's a good idea! —SteveB]

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Warren Buffett, in a recent interview with CNBC, offers one of the best quotes about the debt ceiling:

"I could end the deficit in 5 minutes," he told CNBC. "You just pass a law that says that anytime there is a deficit of more than 3% of GDP, all sitting members of Congress are ineligible for re-election.

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified!

Why? Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971—before computers, e-mail, cell phones, etc.

Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven (7) took one (1) year or less to become the law of the land—all because of public pressure.

Warren Buffet is asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise.

In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. No Tenure / No Pension. A Congressman/woman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they're out of office.
2. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, and Congress participates with the American people. It may not be used for any other purpose.
3. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.
4. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.
5. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.
6. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.
7. All contracts with past and present Congressmen/women are void effective 1/1/12. The American people did not make this contract with Congressmen/women. Congressmen/women made all these contracts for themselves. Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

20111018-07	14:22	Clark	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
-------------	-------	-------	---

Dear SteveB,

Steve, I got a kick out of what you wrote about Pelosi and Reid. I once interviewed Pelosi for a magazine piece when she was first elected to Congress and came away with the distinct impression that she was a total airhead—I may have gotten one usable quote out of her, but I'm not even sure I got that. I guess she keeps her caucus in line but how she ever got to where she is today, I'm dumbfounded. And I've heard other journalists I know say the same. Whenever she appears on TV, I cringe.

And Harry Reid, well, enough said. Take it from me and many others on the D side of the aisle, we don't like these bozos either. But mainly because they seem so ineffectual and such bad reps for Democrats. I guess the R's attack them because they're such easy targets; they certainly aren't threats. Any dissenters on this? Am I missing something?

20111018-08	16:46	Jim	"We Are the One Percent"
-------------	-------	-----	--------------------------

Look at this...where these people did not say these things directly but they would if they were truthful... the author is a columnist.

"We Are the One Percent" posted by Michael Kindt, The Cagle Post

Oct. 18, 2011, (<http://blog.cagle.com/2011/10/we-are-the-one-percent/>)

Individually, we each have so much money it would take four whole lifetimes to spend it all. Since we only have one lifetime, we use the rest to set the policies of the United States so that they are favorable to us in every single way. We must ensure that things continue pretty much as they are, for times are very, very good. If it ain't broke, don't fix it, we say. Lately, some have demonized us, but unfairly. We are not the bad guys.

Please, take a few moments to get to know a few of our members and see for yourself:

Hello. I am Brian Roberts, the CEO of Comcast, and I was paid 31 million dollars last year. My company has probably the worst customer service record in the nation. Ask the millions of people who have no choice but to use us. You'll find that we are, almost universally, reviled. Over the last decade, we have spent more than 10 million dollars on Congress to make sure we have absolutely no competition. This is, after all, a "capitalist" country. Haha.

I am Jeffrey Immelt, CEO of GE. Last year, we had profits of 14 billion, but paid absolutely no taxes on it. Not only did we not pay any taxes on our astounding profits, we were actually given an additional 3.2 billion dollars of your tax dollars by the government. President Obama selected little ol' me to advise him on creating jobs, most likely because I fed his campaign beaucoup bucks back in '08. I'm good at creating jobs, too. As head of a vast international corporation, I helped transfer almost 2 million American jobs to China and other Asian countries. This helped China become the economic powerhouse that fuels our debt. If I hadn't done this, where would the people of the U.S. have gotten my company's 3.2 billion dollar bonus?

I am William Swanson, the CEO of Raytheon. I only made 7 million dollars last year, a tiny fraction of what most American CEOs are paid. My company, however, made a mind-numbing profit of over 25 billion bucks, mainly by building things for the military. Thank you, tax payers! Anyway, it is very important that we keep fighting the war in Afghanistan. Very, very important. Also, I understand that North Korea is lovely this time of year.

I am Al-Waleed bin Talal, Prince of Saudi Arabia. Using our incredible wealth, we will buy some 60 billion dollars worth of your finest military technology. I would like to thank you for spending so many of your tax dollars dropping bombs on our oil competitors. The only thing cooler than having all your neat military gear is not having to use it ourselves. Thanks again!

We are Mitt Romney, Herman Cain, Michele Bachmann, etc. We're here to make it seem like you have a real choice for the presidency. We all believe the exact same things, otherwise we wouldn't be considered "legitimate" candidates. Although we'd like to take credit for it, we have to give kudos to our speechwriters, handlers, and marketers for making it seem like we're different people with different ideas. God bless America and yadda yadda so forth.

I am Ron Paul. Some of my ideas are genuinely unique. Many would say that when it comes to politics I actually think outside of the box. I don't have a snowball's chance in hell.

I am Barack Obama, President of the United States of America. I use words and rhetoric to make it seem like I'm on your side, even though I've filled my staff with bankers and corporate lobbyists. Me and my buddy, the Federal Reserve, cut the largest check in the history of mankind and gave it to the very people who caused the worldwide economic crash. Thank you for blaming it all on the white guys.

Yes, we are the 1% and despite having all the money, power, and influence, the Occupy Wall Street movement has us worried. We have even told the corporate media, which we own, to ignore, denigrate, and mock the movement in the hopes that it will go away—this includes both brands of media, the openly right-wing media and the right-wing media pretending to be left-wing media to give the illusion of diversity of opinion. We have done this to no avail, apparently.

Republican Congressman Peter King sums it up well: "We have to be careful not to allow this [Occupy Wall Street movement] to get any legitimacy. I'm old enough to remember what happened in the 1960s when the [genuine] left wing took to the streets and somehow the media glorified them and it ended up shaping policy. We can't allow that to happen."

Max Stirner wrote that "the poor are to blame for there being rich men", and it's looking like the poor are beginning to realize this. They are waking up to the fact that we exist at their leisure.

How terrifying.

(Michael Kindt is writer living in South Dakota whose work has appeared in College Times, Midwest Lit Review and in the poetry anthology It's Dark and Scary in Here. He's the author of Early Onset of Night, Volume One and blogs at <http://Early-Onset-of-Night.tumblr.com>.)

20111018-09	18:17	Art	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---

Dear Clark,

Interesting comments. Thanks for the insight. I consider Bonehead (I named Boehner that after he said the U.S. had the best health care system in the world) and McConnell (my main goal is to make the President a one term guy—not how can we work together to help the country) probably two of the slimiest and outright stupid elected officials I have ever seen in politics. Every time I hear of their latest comments they just reinforce my initial impression.

How can it be that we have such poor representatives for the public on both sides of their aisle? Some wit, maybe it was Mark Twain but I think it was someone else, once said eventually the elected officials of any democracy will come to be a direct intellectual reflection of the electorate. Hmmm????

20111018-10	18:24	Art	Re: How Can We Frame the Debate?
-----------------------------	-------	-----	----------------------------------

Dear Jim,

Good thinking and this needs some serious further thought. Let's hope they are some really smart folks who are mulling this over. I think many of us feel like this is an absolutely target rich environment with all the opportunities we are being given (latest from Cain, "Jesus was a right wing conservative tried by a liberal jury" Huh????). As is evident from the debates, not even sure that word quite describes the fumbling going on, even the most diehard tea baggers are having problems swallowing much of this. Of course I used to say the only way Bush could win a second term was if the Democrats ran Bozo the Clown—guess what?

20111018-11	18:55	Art	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---

Dear SteveB,

If I could reframe this a bit I would ask your and others' thoughts on this idea. By way of background I have never been a small businessman. I am a retired U.S. Army Combat Arms Officer (really qualified me for the transition to the commercial world) and then the financial manager for the U.S. Foreign Military Sales Program. Created lots of U.S. jobs at no tax payer expense but not the same thing as a commercial entity.

At any rate, I think we are in the middle of a global economic transition very similar to that which Great Britain underwent at the turn of the last century. I once read that in the late 50s early 60s 1 in 4 jobs in the U.S. was related directly or indirectly to the automobile industry. Even if only partially true, we all know what has happened to the automobile industry and that has been going on for 40 plus years now. Industry long ago saw the writing on the wall and has been shifting jobs overseas for many years. We all know the rust belt for manufacturing jobs but even things like call centers etc are also overseas.

No one at the top of government for the past 40 years has really thought through or tried to make adjustments for what this means at the national level. As a nation, we've been living off our previously accumulated wealth and the fact that today 90% of our jobs are now service related has masked the impact of the consequences of these changes until recently. President Obama had the unfortunate experience of stepping into a nightmare, as Captain of the U.S. ship, just as it was going over the falls. What is happening isn't his fault nor Bush's, nor particularly either political party. It just is.

The key is what do we do? We can't change what is happening directly, but we can recognize what is happening and make adjustments. I'll spare you my thoughts on adjustments for the moment but the question now is, assuming I have even partially right, which political philosophy will best recognize what is happening and began to take steps to lead the nation into necessary adjustments. In my opinion also, just as it took a long time to happen, it will take some time to effect adjustments.

20111018-12	20:07	Larry	Fw: Where Are Obama's Girlfriends?
-------------	-------	-------	------------------------------------

[Source of original email seems to be Rush Limbaugh. —SteveB]

WHERE ARE THE OBAMA GIRLFRIENDS?

Think about this e-mail and see if there's anything here you don't believe.

I hadn't thought about this—but where are Obama's past girlfriends—surely he had at least one? No past girl friends popping up anywhere? Strange—strange to the point of being downright weird!

OK, this is just plain old common sense, no political agendas for either side. Just common knowledge for citizens of a country, especially American citizens, who know every little tidbit about every other president (and their wives) that even know that Andrew Jackson's wife smoked a corn cob pipe and was accused of adultery, or that Lincoln never went to school or Kennedy wore a back brace, or Truman played the piano.

We are Americans! Our media vets these things out! We are known for our humanitarian interests and caring for our 'fellow man.' We care, but none of us know one single humanizing fact about the history of our own president.

Honestly, and this is a personal thing... but it's bugged me for years that no one who ever dated him ever showed up. Taken his charisma, which caused the women to be drawn to him so obviously during his campaign, looks like some lady would not have missed the opportunity.

We all know about JFK's magnetism, McCain was no monk, Palin's courtship and even her athletic prowess were probed. Biden's aneurisms are no secret. Look at Cheney and Clinton, we all know about their heart problems. How could I have left out Wild Bill before or during the White House?

Nope... not one lady has stepped up and said, "He was soooo shy," or "What a great dancer!" Now look at the rest of what we know... no classmates, not even the recorder for the Columbia class notes ever heard of him.

Who was the best man at his wedding? Start there. Check for groomsmen. Then get the footage of the graduation ceremony. Has anyone talked to the professors? Isn't it odd that no one is bragging that they knew him or taught him or lived with him.

When did he meet Michele and how? Are there photos? Every president provides the public with all their photos, etc. for their library. What has he released? Nada—other than what was in this so-called biography! And experts who study writing styles etc. claim it was not O's own words or typical of his speech patterns, etc.

Does this make any of you wonder?

Ever wonder why no one ever came forward from Obama's past, saying they knew him, attended school with him, was his friend, etc? Not one person has ever come forward from his past.

This should really be a cause for great concern. Did you see the movie titled, The Manchurian Candidate?

Let's face it. As insignificant as we all are... someone whom we went to school with remembers our name or face... someone remembers we were the clown or the dork or the brain or the quiet one or the bully or something about us.

George Stephanopoulos, ABC News said the same thing during the 2008 campaign. Even George questions why no one has acknowledged that the president was in their classroom or ate in the same cafeteria or made impromptu speeches on campus. Stephanopoulos was a classmate of Obama at Columbia-class of 1984. He says he never had a single class with him. Since he is such a great orator, why doesn't anyone in Obama's college class remember him? And, why won't he allow Columbia to release his records? Do you like millions of others, simply assume all this is explainable—even though no one can?

NOBODY REMEMBERS OBAMA AT COLUMBIA!

Looking for evidence of Obama's past, Fox News contacted 400 Columbia University students from the period when Obama claims to have been there, but not one remembers him.

For example, Wayne Allyn Root was (like Obama) a political science major at Columbia , who graduated in 1983. In 2008, Root says of Obama, "I don't know a single person at Columbia that knew him, and they all know me. I don't have a single classmate who ever knew Barack Obama at Columbia ... EVER!

Nobody recalls him.

Root adds that he was, "Class of '83 political science, pre-law" and says, "You don't get more exact or closer than that.. Never met him in my life, don't know anyone who ever met him. At our 20th class reunion five years ago, who was asked to be the speaker of the class? Me. No one ever heard of Barack! And five years ago, nobody even knew who he was. The guy who writes the class notes, who's kind of the, as we say in New York , 'the macha' who knows everybody, has yet to find a person, a human who ever met him."

Obama's photograph does not appear in the school's yearbook, and Obama consistently declines requests to talk about his years at Columbia , provide school records, or provide the name of any former classmates or friends while at Columbia. How can this be?

NOTE: Wayne Allyn Root can easily be verified. He graduated valedictorian from his high school, Thornton- Donovan School , then graduated from Columbia University in 1983 as a Political Science major in the same '83 class in which Barack Hussein Obama states he was.

Some other interesting questions:

Why was Obama's law license inactivated in 2002? Why was Michelle's law license inactivated by court order? According to the U.S. Census, there is only one Barack Obama—but 27 Social Security numbers and over 80 aliases..

WHAT!?! The Social Security number he uses now originated in Connecticut where he is never reported to have lived. No wonder all his records are sealed!

Please continue sending this out to everyone. Somewhere, someone had to know him in school... before he "reorganized" Chicago and burst upon the scene at the 2004 Democratic Convention and made us swoon with his charm, poise, and speaking pizzazz.

One of the biggest CONS this country has ever seen, and getting away with it. This is scary on many levels! He's the most dishonest deceiving liar to ever darken the White House.

20111018-13 20:24 Dick Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear Steve,

How could we ever get this into law especially when the fox is watching the hen house. This never comes up in the media. It just confirms my opinion that they are all in the tank together and anyone can be bought for the right price.

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says only the quote is Buffett's, not the rest. —SteveB]

Warren Buffett, in a recent interview with CNBC, offers one of the best quotes about the debt ceiling:

"I could end the deficit in 5 minutes," he told CNBC. "You just pass a law that says that anytime there is a deficit of more than 3% of GDP, all sitting members of Congress are ineligible for re-election."

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified! Why? Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971...before computers, e-mail, cell phones, etc.

Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven (7) took 1 year or less to become the law of the land...all because of public pressure. [But #27 took more 203 years! —SteveB]

Warren Buffet [NO —SteveB] is asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise. In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. No Tenure / No Pension. A Congressman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.
2. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, and Congress participates with the American people. This money may not be used for any other purpose.
3. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.
4. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.
5. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.
6. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.
7. All contracts with past and present Congressmen are void effective 1/1/12. The American people did not make this contract with Congressmen. Congressmen made all these contracts for themselves.

Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

If each person contacts a minimum of twenty people then it will only take three days for most people (in the U.S.) to receive the message. Maybe it is time. THIS IS HOW YOU FIX CONGRESS!!!! If you agree with the above, pass it on. If not, just delete. You are one of my 20+. Please keep it going.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011—28th Amendment (from Snopes.com)

1. TERM LIMITS—12 years only, one of the possible options below.
 - A. Two Six-year Senate terms.
 - B. Six Two-year House terms.
 - C. One Six-year Senate term and three Two-Year House terms.
2. NO TENURE/NO PENSION—A Congressman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.
3. CONGRESS (past, present & future) PARTICIPATES in SOCIAL SECURITY—All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system and Congress participates with the American people.
4. CONGRESS CAN PURCHASE THEIR OWN RETIREMENT PLAN—Just like each and every other American.
5. CONGRESS WILL NO LONGER VOTE THEMSELVES PAY RAISES—Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 2.5%.
6. CONGRESS LOSES THEIR CURRENT HEALTH CARE SYSTEM—Congress will participate in the same health care system as the American people.
7. CONGRESS MUST EQUALLY OBEY ALL LAWS—No special exemptions or treatment.
8. ALL CONTRACTS WITH PAST AND PRESENT CONGRESSMEN ARE VOID—Effective 1/1/12.

20111018-14	22:23	SteveB	"What Wall St. Protesters Have Right"
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------------

"What Wall St. Protesters Have Right" by Michael Brush, MSN Money

Oct. 18, 2011, (<http://money.msn.com/investing/what-wall-street-protesters-have-right-brush.aspx?page=0>)

If you can look past the hippie overtones, what the protests are really saying is that we need good jobs, honest banks and fair-and-square politics. It's hard to disagree with any of that.

Forget the wildest images, the ones that make Occupy Wall Street look like a Phish concert in the middle of Manhattan. What's really troubling about this growing protest movement is that the politicians and pundits continue to get it so wrong. OWS protesters are too often written off as commies or miscreants, playing drums and having sex under blankets, with no focused demands that make any sense at all.

But I recently spent a fair amount of time in occupied Zuccotti Park in New York, talking with OWS protesters and supporters, and I can tell you this: They have several crystal-clear messages about what's wrong with our system and what needs to be fixed.

Indeed, the substantial support being shown for Occupy Wall Street—protests have gone global, and organizers have raised $300,000 in donations—shows that this group has touched powerful undercurrents of concern that are shared by many. In fact, several of the chief complaints you hear from protesters are shared by the commentators on the right and members of the Tea Party that preceded Occupy movement—even if the solutions offered are often very different.

To be sure, the protests have also attracted plenty of oddballs, as would any large gathering in New York City. They attract the fringe from the left just as Tea Party gatherings bring in oddballs from the right. But the core Occupy Wall Street demands, some found on the Web as well as in the park, reflect fairly mainstream worries that should be front and center as the nation debates what's wrong with our economy and our politics.

Message No. 1: Growing income disparities threaten everyone

This isn't about "resenting the rich for being wealthy" or declaring "class warfare," though many observers, particularly conservatives, twist the message to discredit the protesters.

Rather, Occupy Wall Street is highlighting a real economic trend that's not good for our country. While the superrich keep getting richer, "living standards for the median household have declined more or less steadily since the late 1990s," says Mark Zandi, the chief economist and a co-founder of Moody's Analytics. Here are some stats that back this up:

Between 1993 and 2008, the top 1% of families raked in more than half the gains in overall income, according to Emmanuel Saez of the University of California, Berkeley. And from 2002 to 2007, the top 1% of U.S. earners got two-thirds of all income gains. Their income grew by more than 10% a year after inflation, while the rest, the 99%, saw more-modest income gains of just 1.3% a year.

In 2010, median household income, $49,500, fell back to levels last seen in 1996.

The 2010 poverty rate was the highest since 1993, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. And the number of people in poverty, 46.2 million, was the largest in the 52 years of tracking poverty estimates.

CEOs, on the other hand, earned much more than they did several decades ago on average.

Unemployment remains stubbornly high, more or less stuck in the 9%-plus range since May 2009. Unemployment hasn't been this high since 1982-83. OK, so we all know the rich are getting richer and the rest of us not so much. But is this a real problem or just jealousy? "When people think they deserve to be in middle class but fall out, it is not healthy in terms of social order," says Dorian Warren, a professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs. "It builds resentment. There's this sense that the American Dream is not longer a reality."

In fact, much of the post-World War II period saw a rising tide lift all boats. The rich got richer and the middle class did, too. Now, that doesn't seem to be the case. The results? Many people simply stop spending—which, in our consumer economy, hurts the rich, poor and everyone in between. Some permanently drop out of the economic system altogether. Others lose faith in the country. A few take to the streets as social unrest grows.

The OWS protests and those they've inspired could be the beginning of this trend. "People sense there is fundamental injustice because there is such a disparity in income," Karanja Gacuca, a spokesman for OWS, told me last week. "People sense that there is something broken."

Students just out of college, for example, find their paychecks can't cover both student loan payments and rent, "and that was the basic promise of a good education," says Gacuca.

A recent International Monetary Fund study backs up Warren's view that these trends are not good for the health of our country. The IMF study found that countries with more-equal income distribution see more economic growth, partly because inequality can foster political instability, which discourages investment. Does that remind you at all of the economic slowdown that hit this summer, after the U.S. got a credit rating downgrade, following a political squabble over entitlements intended to offset income declines?

Message No. 2: We need real bank reform

Bank sector reform sounds pretty wonky coming from a bunch of hippies sleeping out under blankets in a park, right? But it's actually near the top of the list of things protesters are concerned about. And they're right to be.

Three years after a financial meltdown that nearly took out our economy, we've really done very little to change the rules governing financial institutions, to make sure a meltdown like we saw in 2008-2009 doesn't happen again.

These protesters aren't the only ones to think that the Dodd-Frank financial sector reform law will fall short—even if it's eventually implemented in full. Many analysts, even on the right, share this view. "The principal elements of Dodd-Frank turn out to be useless as a defense against a future crisis," said Peter Wallison, of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

William Isaac, a former bank regulator who was the chairman the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. from Aug., 1981 to Oct., 1985, agrees that bank reform efforts have fallen short. "The Dodd-Frank law would not have prevented the last crisis, did not fix what went wrong and will make it more difficult to resolve the next crisis," says Isaac, now head of financial institutions at FTI Consulting.

In fact, Dodd-Frank may be worse than no reform at all. It creates the illusion of regulation and carries the downside of the wrong government rules without locking in the right rules, says Joseph Mason, a Louisiana State University finance professor. And Mason should know about banking regulation—he used to work as an economist for the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, one of our main banking regulators.

OWS gets into quite a bit of detailed analysis on banking reform. One big problem, says Gacuca, was that Washington missed an opportunity to break up the big banks while bailing them out, to prevent the "too big to fail" problem from biting us again.

"Too big to fail" means that megabanks like Citigroup (C 0.00%, news) and Bank of America (BAC 0.00%, news) remain so large that we'll have little choice but to bail them out again when they get into trouble the next time. Because bankers know this, they take greater risks than they should. Instead of letting banks fail or making them downsize, we bailed them out and encouraged some to merge and grow. "We made the too-big-to-fail problem even worse," agrees Kent Smetters, a professor of business and public policy at the Wharton School at the University of Pennsylvania. "We've encouraged larger banks. We should have allowed more failure."

Another complaint of OWS is that there's still too much "counterparty risk" in the financial system, one of the problems that caused the credit market meltdown. By this, OWS means that banks create and own so many derivatives that they're too exposed to each other.

Derivatives are complex financial creations, but they're basically "bets" banks and others make to balance their risks or gamble on trends in all kinds of markets. The fear here is that players won't be able to pay off if they lose.

No less an institution than the IMF sees the risk, concluding in recent research that too many derivatives have insufficient collateral backing them. IMF researchers believe outstanding derivatives may be under collateralized by as much as $2 trillion.

One solution, says OWS, would be to have more derivatives trade through clearinghouses or exchanges, which would add transparency and reduce risk. This is an approach that many mainstream analysts, like Smetters, agree would help.

Message No. 3: Political cronyism ruins democracy

Another core complaint of OWS, says Gacuca, is that corporate contributions to political campaigns lead to crony capitalism, which is bad for democracy.

This is hardly a fringe issue. And despite being painted as a "leftist" group, OWS faults the Obama administration for being too closely aligned with Wall Street. It cites campaign contributions to Obama from banks, as well as the appointment of William Daley, who has a banking background, as White House chief of staff. OWS also likes to cite the bank bailouts as examples of crony capitalism, another OWS position held by many on the right. Banks got help with mortgage trouble; homeowners much less so.

"We definitely share the same moral outrage at what happened," says Daniel Mitchell, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute. "Even if the banks paid the money back, they got breathing room for their own bad financial decisions, courtesy of the taxpayer."

Bank shareholders, bondholders and executives should have been allowed to take their losses in bank reorganizations that saved the good assets in the system, say many bank reform critics on the right. Instead, "the risks were socialized and the gains were privatized," says Warren. "It's not so much that people are upset around the top 1% getting rich. I think what angers people is the notion of crony capitalism. The hard-earned money of taxpayers was used to make a few people richer."

Is OWS so wrong in concluding that our democracy is broken because economic elites in banks with political connections were bailed out, while regular folks are still hurting? Warren doesn't think so.

Dear Steve,

This is a no brainer to implement. Common sense prevails, I hope.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

HOORAY FOR FLORIDA

UNITED WE STAND, DIVIDED WE FALL

Great going, Florida. You set the stage for the other 49 States to join! Kudos to Republican Governor Rick Scott for having the correctness and guts to move forward on this critical issue!

I-95 will be jammed for the next month or so.....Druggies and deadbeats heading North out of Florida.

Florida is the first state requiring drug testing to receive welfare!

In signing the new law, Republican Gov. Rick Scott said, "If Floridians want welfare, they better make sure they are drug-free.

Applicants who test positive for illicit substances won't be eligible for the funds for a year, or until they undergo treatment.

Those who fail a second time would be banned from receiving funds for three years!

Naturally, a few people are crying this is unconstitutional.

How is this unconstitutional?

It's completely legal that every other working people have to pass drug tests in order to get a J-O-B which supports those on welfare! Forward if you agree!

Let's get Welfare back to the ones who NEED it, not those who WON'T get a JOB!

20111019-02 09:15 GaryF Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear SteveB,

How to fix Congress...

I just realized something has been left out of the 2011 Congressional Reform Act.

TERM LIMITS & LOBBYING REFORM.

Revisions I propose:

8. ALL Senators and Congressmen are limited to a TOTAL of six (6) years in office. The 6 years can be served in any combination; 2 years in the senate and 4 in congress. 2 years in congress, 5 years in private sector (not lobbying I'll address that in #9) the 4 in Senate. BUT after a total of 6 years they're done.

9. No Senator, Congressman, or any staff or aide to a senator or congressman can work for any lobbying organization for at least 6 years AFTER leaving office for the last time. (I'd rather just outlaw lobbying all together as the French do). The 6 year lobbying clause should also apply to retired military.

20111019-03 09:23 SteveB No More Pretending: The Republican Candidates

The Republican candidates' debate was interesting last night. Perry self-destructed.

Mitt fared pretty well, Cain lied about his 9-9-9 plan, bye bye Michelle, and Santorum, and probably Newt. I'm not sure if Ron Paul is in or out, or the guy who pulled a Palin and didn't show.

I was struck by three things:

1. Some of the Republicans are sounding very much like the liberals in this forum. Some Republicans, in general, seem to be recognizing that the current imbalances in society will destroy us if not corrected. That the banks raped us. I even heard calls against regressive taxes and against more taxes on the poor, even from teabagger Bachmann. I heard calls against war (not just from Ron Paul).

So I do not expect the Right-Wingers in this forum to pretend any longer that increasing taxes on the rich, to even the current disparities, help balance the budget, and make ours a fairer nation is some kind of communist, socialist, or anti-American plot. Even Warren Buffett and conservative pundits agree. See below article for lots of hard evidence on the subject.

2. The Republican candidates are much more discourteous than anyone in our forum. I heard a lot of "stupid" people described as such. In one of the most amazing moments in political history that I can remember, Perry called Romney a "hypocrite" in a menacing manner reminiscent of a fistfight.

Most strange, but let us keep that in mind next time someone uses such terms here to describe politicians...especially someone who has himself, personally, been called a socialist, communist, and (I guess) druggie in this forum. All in error. All without retraction.

LET US RAISE THE DISCOURSE TO A LEVEL ABOVE THAT OF THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES.

3. FLASH! Read today's news for yourself. It has now been proven by independent parties that Herman Cain's 9-9-9 plan would do nothing but lower taxes on the rich and raise taxes on the middle class and poor. Nice try, pizza dude. (Unless his plan is s-o-o-o simple...that no one can understand it?)

20111019-04	08:39	SteveG	"The 99% Declaration"
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

"The 99% Declaration" by the-99-declaration.org

Oct. 17, 2011, (<https://sites.google.com/site/the99percentdeclaration/>)

WHEREAS THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION PROVIDES THAT:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

BE IT RESOLVED THAT WE, THE NINETY-NINE PERCENT OF THE PEOPLE of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in order to form a more perfect Union, by, for and of the People, shall elect and convene a NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY the week of July 4, 2012 in the City Of Philadelphia to prepare and ratify a PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES on behalf of the Ninety-Nine Percent of the People of the United States to be served upon the United States Congress, United States Supreme Court and President of the United States prior to November 6, 2012.

I. Voter Qualifications and Election of Delegates.

In the Spring of 2012, the People, consisting of all United States citizens and lawful permanent residents who have reached the age of 18, regardless of party affiliation and voter registration status, shall elect two Delegates, one identifying as male and one identifying as female, by direct democratic vote, from each of the existing 435 Congressional Districts, to represent the People at a NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The office of Delegate shall be open to all United States citizens and lawful permanent residents who have attained the age of 18 years. No candidate for Delegate to the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY will be permitted to run on a party line or use any party label while running for or serving as a Delegate. No candidate or Delegate may take private money from any source except for reasonable gifts to fund his or her trip to the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY in Philadelphia. No politician holding elected or appointed office at the time of the Delegate election, including members of Congress, are eligible to run for or sit as a Delegate to the National General Assembly.

The 99% Declaration Working Group and its committees shall organize, coordinate and transparently fund the election of Delegates. The Delegates shall be free from the corrupting influence of corporate money and all funds raised by the 99% Declaration Working Group shall be used for the purpose of funding the election of Delegates and providing a venue for the Delegates to meet in Philadelphia. Should sufficient funds be available, the 99% Working Group will assist in defraying the transportation and accommodation costs of the Delegates.

II. Meeting of the National General Assembly and Drafting of a Petition for a Redress of Grievances.

In addition to ensuring a free and fair election of the Delegates to the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY, the 99% Declaration Working Group shall be responsible for raising sufficient funds to secure a venue wherein the 876* Delegates may convene, deliberate and ratify a PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES. The ratified PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES will be signed by the Delegates during a ceremony at Independence Hall the afternoon of July 4, 2012 and subsequently presented to all 535 members of Congress, the 9 members of the Supreme Court, the President of the United States and each of the political candidates seeking federal public office in the November 2012 general election.

Because the time to deliberate in Philadelphia will be limited, between the Spring 2012 and July 2012, the newly elected Delegates shall meet electronically, or in person if possible, to confer and write the PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES. The Delegates alone, in consultation with their constituents will be responsible for the content of the final petition. Moreover, the Delegates to the National General Assembly shall implement their own rules, procedures, agenda, code of conduct, internal elections and/or appointments of committee members and officers to efficiently and expeditiously accomplish the People's mandate to present a PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES to all three branches of the government of the United States of America, and political candidates, before the 2012 general election.

III. Content of the Petition for a Redress of Grievances.

The PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES, ratified by the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY, shall be non-partisan and specifically address the critical issues now confronting the People of the United States of America including the corrupting influence of exorbitant political campaign contributions. However, the final petition no matter how long or how short shall be the exclusive work-product of the 876 elected Delegates engaged in direct consultation with the People they represent. The Delegates shall debate and vote upon a specific set of grievances and solutions to be included in the PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES and, if necessary, adjourn for further consultation with the American People as our founding ancestors did during the meetings of the Continental Congresses over 235 years ago. Upon ratification of the petition, all of the Delegates, regardless of the margin of the vote, shall affix their signatures to the final PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.

IV. Suggested Content of the Petition for a Redress of Grievances.

In order to facilitate the timely election of the 876 Delegates to the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY by July 4, 2012 and submission of the PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES before the 2012 general election, the 99% Declaration Working Group, shall include in this Declaration a suggested list of grievances to be submitted to the Delegates of the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY no later than April 30, 2012. The final version of the PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES, are to be written and ratified solely by the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY, and may or may not include the following issues currently suggested by the 99% Declaration Working Group:

1. Elimination of the Corporate State.

The merger of the American political system of republican democracy with the economic system of capitalism has resulted in the establishment of a corporate government of, by and for the benefit of domestic and multinational corporations. Therefore, the 99% of the American People demand an immediate ban on all direct and indirect private contributions of anything of value, to all politicians serving in or running for federal office in the United States. This ban shall extend to all individuals, corporations, "political action committees," "super political action committees," lobbyists, unions and all other sources of private money or things of value, including but not limited to, direct or indirect gifts and/or promises of employment. Private funding of political campaigns by concentrated sources of wealth such as corporations have completely corrupted our political system. Therefore, all private funding of political campaigns shall be replaced by the fair, equal and TOTAL public financing of all federal political campaigns.

We, the 99% of the American People, categorically REJECT the concepts that corporations are persons and that money is equivalent to free speech because if that were so, then only the wealthiest people, corporations and entities possessing concentrated wealth would have a meaningful voice in our society. We demand the immediate and complete elimination of all private political contributions through the enactment of new campaign finance laws and amendment of the Constitutional if necessary (see suggested grievance 2). It has become clear that politicians in the United States cannot or will not regulate themselves and have become the exclusive representatives of corporations, unions and the very wealthy who indirectly and directly spend vast sums of money on political campaigns to influence the candidates' decisions when they attain office. This cycle of legalized bribery ensures the reelection of the same corrupt politicians year after year despite historically low approval ratings.

2. Overturning the Citizens United Case.

The immediate abrogation, even if it requires a Constitutional Amendment, of the outrageous and anti-democratic Supreme Court holding in Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission and its progeny. This heinous decision proclaimed in 2010, equates the direct and indirect payment of money to politicians by political action committees, corporations, wealthy individuals and unions with the exercise of protected free speech. We, the 99% of the American People are outraged and demand that this judicially sanctioned bribery of politicians be reversed and never be deemed protected free speech again.

3. Elimination of All Private Benefits to Public Servants.

The 99% of the American People demand the immediate prohibition of private benefits to all federal elected officials, public employees, officers, public servants, officials or their immediate family members. This prohibition includes an end to the corrupt "revolving door" in and out of our government. Elected and unelected public officials and their immediate families shall be banned from ever being employed by any corporation, lobbying firm, individual or business that the public official specifically regulated while in office. No public employee, officer, official or their immediate family members shall own or hold any stock or shares in any corporation or other entity that the elected or unelected public official specifically regulated while in office until a full 5 years after their term or employment is completed. There shall be a complete lifetime ban on the acceptance of all gifts, services, money or thing of value, directly or indirectly, by any elected or appointed public official or their immediate family members, from any person, corporation, union or any other entity that the public official was charged to specifically regulate while he or she was in office.

The term "specifically regulate" shall mean service on or employment with a committee or sub-committee or service within any agency or department of the federal government responsible for the regulation of the person, union, corporation or entity seeking to offer a private benefit. To root out corruption and restore integrity to our political system, all elected politicians and public employees must ONLY collect their salary, generous federal healthcare benefits and pension. To enforce these policies, Congress shall immediately pass new criminal laws banning the aforementioned private benefits to politicians and public officials. Any person, including individuals connected directly or indirectly to corporations, lobbyists, or unions who violate these new criminal laws shall be sentenced to a term of mandatory imprisonment of no less than two years and not more than ten years. Private benefits shall include the use of any insider information as defined by existing laws, by elected and unelected public officials who attempt to profit in financial markets or investments.

4. Term Limits.

Members of the United States House of Representatives shall be limited to serving no more than four two-year terms in their lifetime. Members of the United States Senate shall be limited to serving no more than two six-year terms in their lifetime. The two-term limit for President shall remain unchanged. Serving as a member of Congress or as the President of the United States is one of the highest honors and privileges our culture can bestow. These positions of prominence in our society should be sought to serve one's country and not provide a lifetime career designed to increase personal wealth and accumulate power for the sake of vanity and hubris.

5. A Fair Tax Code.

A complete reformation and simplification of the United States Tax Code to require ALL individuals and corporations to pay a fair share of a progressive, graduated income tax by eliminating loopholes, unfair tax breaks, exemptions and unfair deductions, subsidies and ending all other methods of evading income taxes. The current system of taxation unjustly favors the wealthiest Americans, many of who pay fewer taxes to the United States Treasury than citizens who earn much less and pay a much higher percentage of their incomes in taxes. Any corporation or entity that does business in the United States and generates income from that business in the United States shall be fully taxed on that income regardless of corporate domicile or they will be barred from earning their profits in the United States. This will allow honest companies and individuals who pay their fair share in income taxes to take over those markets in the United States economy formerly held by income tax cheats. Businesses and individuals that pay taxes in other countries will no longer be permitted to use that excuse to justify their failure to pay federal income tax in the United States if they obtain benefits from doing business in the United States.

6. Healthcare for All.

Medicare for all or adoption of a universal single-payer healthcare system. The broken Medicaid program will be eliminated as redundant. Affordable healthcare for all shall be a human right.

7. Protection of the Planet.

Human greed, exponentially magnified by corporations partnered with corrupt governments, is destroying the only habitable planet known to humanity. Multinational corporations have purchased so much influence in Congress (and other governments in the world) that they can secure the passage or blockage of regulations to maximize profits and minimize conservation of the environment. The evidence of climate change due to human activity can no longer be denied by rational people and species are becoming extinct at an alarming rate. Humans have caused the extinction of hundreds, if not thousands of species through overharvesting, pollution, habitat destruction, introduction of new predators and food competitors, overhunting, and other influences. Unsustainable human population growth is an essential cause of the extinction crisis. New comprehensive laws and regulations must be immediately enacted to give the Environmental Protection Agency, and other environmental protection regulators around the world, expanded powers and resources to shut down corporations, businesses or any entities that intentionally or recklessly damage the environment, and to criminally prosecute individuals who intentionally or recklessly damage the environment. No "corporate veil" should protect any employee, officer or director of a corporation who is directly or indirectly engaged in the intentional or reckless decimation of the planet for profit. The amount of profit a corporation can make must be balanced by conflict-free regulators with the inevitable damage that human activity inflicts on the environment. The 99% of the American People demand the immediate implementation of new and existing programs to rapidly transition away from fossil fuels to reusable or carbon neutral sources of energy and higher greenhouse gas emission standards so that something will be left for our children and grandchildren. The rights to clean air, water, and conservation of the planet for future generations shall no longer be infringed by greed-driven corporations and selfish individuals.

8. Debt Reduction.

Adoption of a plan to reduce the national debt to a sustainable percentage of GDP by 2020. Reduction of the $15 trillion national debt to be achieved by BOTH fair progressive taxation and cuts in spending that benefit corporations engaged in perpetual war for profit, inefficient healthcare, pharmaceutical exploitation, over-prescribing medications for profit, the communications industry, outsourcing jobs, the prison and military industrial complexes, criminal banking, securities and finance schemes, the oil and gas industry, and all other corrupt entities and individuals that have used the federal budget as a private income stream for decades. This "pay to play" racket run by Congress and the top income earners has resulted in a $15 trillion debt and questionable future for our nation.

9. Jobs for All Americans.

Passage of a comprehensive job and job-training act like the American Jobs Act to employ our citizens in jobs that are available with specialized training. The American People must be put to work now by repairing America's crumbling infrastructure and building other needed public works projects. In conjunction with a new jobs retraining act, reinstatement of the Works Progress Administration, Civilian Conservation Corps and similar emergency governmental agencies tasked with creating new projects to provide jobs to the 46 million People living in poverty, the 8.6% unemployed and 16.2% who are underemployed. Re-training will focus on science and mathematics necessary for 21st century technologies, green energy, and new sources of American manufacturing to reduce reliance on imported goods.

10. Student Loan Debt Refinancing.

Our students and former students are more than $1 trillion in debt from education loans. These young people have far fewer employment prospects due to the financial collapse directly caused by the unbridled and unregulated greed of Wall Street. Ensuring a higher education, particularly in the fields of science, engineering, technology, green energy and mathematics, is no longer a luxury for the few and must now be viewed as a national security issue. Banks receive virtually interest free loans from the Federal Reserve Bank and then charge upwards of 6% interest to our students for profit. Because education is the only way to secure our future success as a nation, interest on student debts must be immediately reduced to 2% or less and repayments deferred for periods of unemployment. Subject to the provisions of grievance five, the tax code will be amended so that employers will receive a student loan repayment tax deduction for paying off the loans of their employees. Outright federal grants should be provided to those students who pursue and obtain degrees in the sciences, green energy, mathematics, technology and engineering. Moreover, to reduce the principal on all outstanding student loans, a financial transaction surcharge, similar to those fees charged by banks on consumers, will be introduced to banks and securities firms. The current economic crisis, the worst since the Great Depression, resulted in the $1.5 trillion dollar bail out of Wall Street, secret Federal Reserve loans, and unknown losses of trillions of dollars to the economy.

11. Ending Perpetual War for Profit.

Recalling all military personnel at all non-essential bases including but not limited to the Cold War era deployments in Europe, South Korea, Japan, Australia and Cuba and refocusing national defense goals to address threats posed by the geopolitics of the 21st century. Congress shall pass new legislation to reinvigorate the War Powers Resolution to limit the deployment of military forces to those instances where Congressional approval has been granted. New laws must be enacted to counter the Military Industrial Complex's mission of perpetual war for profit. The United States has engaged in war after war only to later discover that the pretexts relied upon to enter these wars were false or exaggerated. The goal of war in a corporate controlled state is to generate profit for the Military Industrial Complex and other industries and individuals who benefit directly and indirectly when humans kill one another. The annual savings created by updating our military posture and ending perpetual war for profit will be applied to the social programs outlined herein.

12. Emergency Reform of Public Education.

The public education system in the United States is a resounding failure. New educational goals to train the American people to perform jobs in a 21st century economy, particularly in the areas of technology, infrastructure repair, water and resource conservation and green energy must be mandated as a national security issue. These reforms must be accomplished by taking into consideration the redundancy caused by technology and the inexpensive cost of labor in China, India and other developing countries. Scientists and other professionals should be recruited from all over the world to teach our students to be competitive in a global economy. Bonuses must be granted for merit performance and enticing the best people available to teach our children. Teachers are the key component to a new American renaissance and they must be paid a competitive salary commensurate with salaries in the private sector. Teacher salaries in public education must be based upon similar skills and education levels found in the private sector because without highly-skilled teachers, there will never be a highly-skilled workforce and the United States will fall further and further behind its competitors.

13. End Outsourcing and Currency Manipulation.

Subject to the elimination of corporate tax loopholes and exploited exemptions and deductions as stated in grievance five, limited tax incentives will be permitted to entice businesses to hire our citizens rather than outsource jobs. Conversely, an "outsourcing tax" should be introduced to discourage businesses from sending jobs overseas and tax incentives should be offered to companies that invest in reconstructing the manufacturing capacity of the United States. This country must again competitively produce everyday products in the United States rather than importing them from countries like China and India. To do business in the United States, corporations must make slightly less profit by hiring American workers and paying them a living wage rather than maximizing every penny of profit to the detriment of our society. Congress must implement legislation (see e.g. H.R. 639) to encourage China (which undervalues its currency by an estimated 25% to 40%) and our other trading partners to end currency manipulation and reduce the massive trade deficit.

14. Banking and Securities Reform.

Immediate reenactment of the Glass-Steagall Act and increased regulation of Wall Street firms by the SEC, FINRA, CFTC, the Justice Department and the other financial regulators including the recently established Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. We further demand an immediate investigation by the Justice Department into the potential criminal practices of the Securities and Banking industry that directly led to the collapse of markets, foreclosure crisis, bank bail-out and firm failures in 2007-2008. As discussed in grievance ten, to facilitate the aforementioned student loan debt relief, banks and securities firms shall pay a financial transaction fee, also known as the "Robin Hood Tax", on each and every stock trade and other financial transactions without passing the costs onto consumers. Uniform regulations will be enacted to specifically limit what banks may charge consumers for ATM fees and/or the use of debit cards and other so-called miscellaneous fees. There will be an end to the $4 billion a year "hedge fund loophole" which permits certain individuals engaged in financial transactions to evade graduated income tax rates by treating their income as long-term capital gains which are taxed at a much lower rate (approximately 15%) than income tax.

15. Foreclosure Moratorium and Mortgage Refinancing.

Adoption of an immediate emergency plan to end the mortgage crisis. The privately owned Federal Reserve Bank shall not continue to lower interest rates for loans to banks that are refusing to loan to small businesses and consumers. Instead, the federal government shall buy all mortgages in foreclosure and refinance these debts at an interest rate of 1% or less because that is the approximate current interest rate the Federal Reserve charges the banks who hoard the cash despite ample liquidity. These re-financed debts will be managed by the newly established Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and an independent foreclosure task force appointed and overseen by Congress and the Executive Branch to determine, on a case-by-case basis, whether foreclosure proceedings should continue based on the circumstances of each homeowner and the conduct of the financial institution when originating the loan.

16. Ending the Federal Reserve.

The immediate formation of a non-partisan commission, overseen by Congress, to audit and investigate the short-term and long-term economic risks in eliminating the privately-owned Federal Reserve Bank and transferring all its functions to the United States Treasury Department. It is widely believed that the housing bubble and collapse of financial markets in 2007 and 2008 was proximately caused by the mismanagement, incompetence and blind eye of the Federal Reserve Bank.

17. Ending the Electoral College and Enactment of Uniform Federal Election Rules.

The 99% demand the abolishment of the Electoral College in favor of the Popular Vote in presidential elections to avoid situations where the Electoral College elects a candidate who does not receive a majority of the popular vote. Congress shall immediately enact electoral reforms requiring total equal public campaign financing to all candidates who obtain sufficient petition signatures and/or votes to get on the ballot and participate in the primaries and/or general election. All funds used for the election of federal politicians will be drawn from a trust specifically created for this purpose and managed by the Federal Elections Commission and the United States Treasury. Individuals, unions, corporations or other groups or entities that wish to contribute to the campaign trust may do so without knowledge of where the funds will be applied. Instead, all private funds contributed to the trust will be commingled with taxpayer monies budgeted to the trust. Politicians will no longer be required or permitted to ask for campaign contributions of any kind. To reduce voter fraud and voter discrimination, Congress will utilize the commerce clause to implement nationwide uniform election rules applied to all voting districts requiring equal access of third parties to appear on ballots; abolition of "gerrymandering" by utilizing non-partisan public commissions so that third parties may fairly compete in elections; allowing voting on weekends and holidays to increase voter access to the polls; issuance of free voter registration cards to all citizens who are eligible to vote so that they cannot be turned away at a polling station because they do not have a driver's license or other form of identification; a review of the exclusion of voters with non-violent criminal records provided by corporations to eliminate voters from the rolls, outlawing the tactics currently used by certain states to limit and obstruct voter access to the polls by requiring additional forms of identification and/or passing "tests" to vote; and expanding the option of mail-in ballots and secure verifiable internet voting for those citizens who cannot attend the polls to vote in-person due to disability or absence from the country.

18. Ending the War in Afghanistan and Care of Veterans.

An immediate withdrawal of all combat troops from Afghanistan and a substantial increase in the amount of funding for veteran job training and placement. The enactment of new comprehensive programs dedicated to the treatment of the emotional and physical injuries sustained by veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan. Our veterans, who have sacrificed everything for this country, are committing suicide at an unprecedented rate of one person every 80 minutes. The 99% of the American People care and demand assistance to these veterans now.

19. No Censorship of the Internet.

In 1983 approximately 50 corporations controlled all news media outlets in the United States. Today, ownership of the news media has been concentrated in the hands of about six powerful media corporations. The free Internet and its related technologies foster free speech, innovation, and a global human consciousness. We believe that the Internet and its related technologies are the joint property and work-product of humanity, and as such, it must not be censored or regulated in any manner without the consent of the people who utilize and contribute to its vitality. We therefore demand the immediate withdrawal or repeal on passage of the Stop Online Piracy Act or "SOPA" (H.R. 3261) and the Protect IP Act (S. 968). These bills, if enacted into law, will grant the government broad new powers to curtail speech on the Internet, block domain names, track internet protocol ("IP") addresses, dramatically increase the cost of using content on the internet, chill innovation and creativity of web entrepreneurs in favor of a few media corporations that already own or control most online content. Furthermore, any future action by the government to censor, dismantle or interfere with, any other future technology that promotes communication between human beings, will be deemed by the people as a violation of the First Amendment and the universal human right to free speech and assembly. We also call upon the United States government to vociferously condemn any country that currently represses the speech of its people including the censorship of the Internet and related technologies.

20. Reinstitution of Civil Rights Including the Repeal of the NDAA.

Since the tragic events of September 11, 2001, legislation has been enacted to curtail the privacy and civil rights of American citizens. Foremost among these laws is the Patriot Act of 2001 and more recently, portions of the National Defense Authorization Act wherein the government may or may not require the indefinite detention of U.S. citizens suspected of planning or assisting "belligerent" acts against the United States. Under this law, civilian citizens of the United States may be indefinitely held in military detention and tried before a military tribunal without access to family, friends or an attorney. This terrifying law could be easily be abused in a time of crisis to make people "disappear." The law effectively repeals the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, The Bail Reform Act, suspends the Writ of Habeas Corpus at the discretion of the CIA or military and will violate at least the First, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The Patriot Act has allowed for the increased surveillance of American citizens and CIA access to confidential credit reports, school records, communication records, Internet activity, and other personal information, without consent or notification. We call upon the United States government to repeal those portions of the Patriot Act that limit the civil rights of American citizens, repeal the National Defense Authorization Act and immediately stop any and all abuses of the Foreign Surveillance Intelligence Act which allows for "Star Chamber" proceedings and extrajudicial eavesdropping on U.S. citizens without sufficient oversight.

(NOTE: All of the twenty grievances mentioned in the 99% Declaration are merely SUGGESTIONS. Only the elected delegates will select which issues will be included in the Petition for Redress of Grievances voted on in July)

V. BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that IF the PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES, ratified by the 876 Delegates of the NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY, is not redressed and acted upon within a reasonable time and to the satisfaction of the Delegates, said Delegates shall reconvene to organize and fund political grassroots campaigns for candidates in every available Congressional seat in the mid-term election of 2014 and again in 2016 and again in 2018 until all vestiges of the corrupt corporate state are eradicated and the grievances of the National General Assembly redressed. Only candidates who publicly pledge to redress all of the grievances contained in the final petition will be supported.

All of the twenty grievances mentioned in the 99% Declaration are merely SUGGESTIONS. Only the elected delegates will select which issues will be included in the Petition for Redress of Grievances voted on in July.

*FN. In addition to the 870 delegates elected from the 435 Congressional districts, American Samoa, District of Columbia, Guam, The Northern Mariana Islands, Puerto Rico and the United States Virgin Islands shall each elect one delegate, irrespective of gender, to represent them at the National General Assembly. This will increase the total number of delegates to 876.

20111019-05 10:41 Charis Re: No More Pretending

Dear SteveB,

I'd be interested to know your opinion on responsibility. For example, when you say "the banks raped us" does this imply that the people who took out loans (many knowing they were not credit-worthy of said loans) are not responsible for their decision to do so? I mean, sure... many banks offered loans to people who definitely did not qualify and were way too lax—but should those people have taken out those loans? Or is it unreasonable these days to expect people to have some sense of responsibility and not take out loans they can't repay? I'm not generalizing here or including people who truly were credit worthy at the time they took out a loan and then ran into trouble due to unforeseen circumstances (loss of jobs. etc.) I'm talking about people who knew they were not credit worthy—who knew the banks were making offers they could not refuse—and still entered into said contracts. Same with credit cards. Are only the banks at fault here? Are normal ordinary citizens not responsible for their own actions anymore? I don't know, to me it's just way too simplistic to blame the government, banks or Republicans for everything.

20111019-06 10:44 Ben Re: No More Pretending

Dear SteveB,

Perry also said "that study's had a third party took a look at it."

Idiot.

Pretty soon, folks are going to recognize that intelligence and erudition are not running rampant among the Deciders in Texas politics. Once again, my immediate reaction is "My God! What will the Queen of England think?" if this idiot gets elected? I want it to be impossible. Probability is waning, but... yaaaaghh!

Perry is obviously not a man who embraces complexity.

20111019-07 10:45 GaryC Re: No More Pretending

Dear Charis,

In SteveB's world, it always starts with a problem being George Bush's fault and then it is the fault of Corporations or Republicans. It is NEVER the fault of the individuals who performed the act. They have NO responsibility. Please do not confuse the facts with ideology!

20111019-08 11:33 Pam Re: "The 99% Declaration"

Dear SteveG,

This is fantastic. I agree with almost everything in it. My only caveat would be that the "grievance" language be removed or moderated. Some of the comments are so specific to today's circumstances that in five or ten years (or less) they will seem hopelessly outdated. The suggestions themselves, however, are right on target. This should put to rest any complaints about the OWS not having any specific goals.

I agree that we should get our troops out of the middle east asap, but account needs to be taken of how complicated this will be in actual fact. Also, we should spell out (as best we can without knowing everything) under what circumstances we will send troops somewhere. Calling the military a "military-industrial complex" (even if Ike said it first) is inflammatory and doesn't really need saying. Accusing institutions, groups, or individuals of bad faith, even if they're guilty, is not the best way to gain sympathy. I know the Founding Fathers were p*ssed off at King George, but their issues are not our issues, and our issues will not be relevant in 100 years. The principles, though, will remain the same.

I completely support the Occupy movement, but I must confess I do find many of those folks in the park over the top. It looks in the videos I've seen as if every crazy in New York has crawled out from under a rock with the sole purpose of offending as many middle-class people as possible. It's the middle-class that's up in arms (so to speak); annoying the hell out of them is not good strategy. Correct me if I'm wrong, but I don't believe the protesters in Tiannamen Square dressed or acted like demented clowns.

20111019-09 11:51 Pam Re: "The 99% Declaration"

Dear SteveG,

P.S. I'm not particularly offended by the shenanigans in Z. park. At least these kids are DOING something. Maybe the media just focuses on the weirdos because they make better copy. Or maybe they're helping perpetuate the idea that the protesters really are hippie communists. Why don't they ever interview some of the more sober citizens, old and young, who are protesting too?

20111019-10 13:40 Art Re: "The 99% Declaration"

Agree this pretty well thought out. Couple of areas I'd personally tweak a bit but overall very good in my opinion.

20111019-11 13:57 Clark Re: "The 99% Declaration"

Dear Art,

Just to add a little note: When I was in NYC 10 days ago, I happened upon an OWS demonstration in Washington Square Park on a Saturday afternoon. Didn't really see any crazies that day—at least, no more than usual in Washington Square. But one sign did catch my attention: "The economic system could be more fair." Talk about understated!

20111019-12 15:26 Pam Re: No More Pretending

Dear Charis,

Look at the Petition of Grievances put out by OWS and their plan for a "people's party." I think we are on the brink of something new here, a new party, coalition, call it what you will, that will be inclusive, reasonable, tolerant, and truly democratic (with a little "d"). I'm very excited by the idea of a National Assembly that includes all generations and has as its goal fairness for all.

20111019-13 15:27 SteveB The End of the GOP?

Do Republicans really think people are so stupid that they will vote to elect a party that wants to raise their taxes and lower taxes on the rich below already record low (in modern times) levels? Especially when 10-40 years of the same policies have nearly bankrupted us and everyone now knows it?

20111019-14 15:57 SteveB Re: No More Pretending

Dear GaryC,

"Taking every opposing argument or position to some arbitrary extreme of your own choosing does not make that argument or position false."

Kinda like the communistic and evil redistribution of wealth, or the unspeakable evil of Obamacare, Pelosi, Reid, or the half-black guy. Or, in this case, some ridiculous idea that people somehow can't be responsible for themselves and their own actions unless they are completely and solely responsible for their state in life. As if society or individual or circumstance do not matter at all. Utterly, ridiculous, excuse me.

Or maybe more like your golden age of American prosperity following upon 40 years of low taxes, free trade, a government for sale to the highest bidder, and deregulation...to be ushered in when, exactly?

20111019-15 16:12 Charis Re: No More Pretending

Dear SteveB,

Did you read the message? Because it doesn't say AT ALL what you are saying. No one—not a single solitary one of us is EVER ALWAYS AND FULLY completely and solely responsible for our state in life and no one ever said that. Nor does that in any way, shape or fashion even remotely suggest that the individual does not matter. Maybe read my question again? This doesn't answer it.

20111019-16 16:27 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

We know now that Herman Cain's magic pizza formula for the economy would raise taxes on the poor and middle class, while lowering taxes still further for the rich. Today, this is what Mr. Stuttering Feisty, Rick Perry, had to say when he presented his own plan:

"It starts with ... scrapping the three million words of the current tax code, starting over with something simple: A flat tax," he told an audience at the Western Republican Leadership Conference. "I am not the candidate of the establishment," Perry said. "You won't hear a lot of shape-shifting nuance from me."

That's for sure, Rick. I'm surprised you could even use the word, "nuance". That must have taken a lot of practice. And "shape-shifting"! Wow! A tongue twister too! Good boy! Now go get your reward of a bundle of cash from the nice CEO over there.

Do Republicans really think people are so stupid that they will vote to elect a party that wants to raise their taxes and lower taxes on the rich below already record low (in modern times) levels? Especially when 10-40 years of the same policies have nearly bankrupted us and everyone now know it?

This is what Republicans have been talked into staking the future of their party on by the teabaggers?

Balancing the budget on the backs of the unemployed and homeless in a time of economic catastrophe for the poor and middle class? (for GaryC!) Wow! Adios, GOP!

20111019-17 16:32 SteveB Re: No More Pretending

Dear Charis,

No, this was in reply to Gary's comment. Not yours. I'm sorry. You were only stating that there is that element to the problem, which I can't disagree with, though I guess I attach different weight than you do.

Sorry again! I should have pointed my arrow a little more carefully, that's for sure. I value you point of view and input to our little circle of people who care. Thank you.

20111019-18 16:50 Ben Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB,

Yes, they do. And demonstrably, they have been right about the apathy and ignorance of the Voter before. After all, GW got elected (well, sort of) didn't he?

20111019-19 17:04 Phil Re: The End of the GOP?

Does anyone remember Animal Farm by George Orwell? You can paint the pigs red, or you can paint the pigs blue. Or you can paint some red and some blue. But no matter which color you paint them, they just don't really care about the rest of the animals!

So until we are represented by ones that care about all of us, don't expect much from either color.

20111019-20 17:09 SteveB Obamacare & Obamacracy

Dear Art,

I really appreciate your comments, Art, and those of all of you! I'm learning a lot. I think you're definitely right, Art, about this major transition the world has been going through. Someday, historians will have a better perspective on it and some kind of clever name. It is a major thing! A shift to post-industrialism?

Dennis put up a reference to a good article on this very subject before you came onboard. And I completely agree that we have been like a train with no engineer for a long time. Like so many cities in the U.S. that just sprawled in ugly, wasteful, gobbles of land, with no planning, no awareness of future consequences.

But, you know, I don't feel this transition or whatever it is some act of nature or something inevitable, at least in the short run. I think we caused it. I don't believe in some big conspiracy theory like Ron Paul does, but I think the policies of our corrupt, misguided, and manipulated politicians sold the American people down the river, and it didn't have to happen. Or, say it had to happen, maybe we could have done better not asleep at the wheel?

At this point in time, as you say, it took us a long time to spiral down this far, recovery will not be rapid. I just hope it's fast enough that we avert a disaster of some kind.

Oh, I remembered one more simple law that would have helped the healthcare of Americans tremendously—a law to limit the medical lawsuits to reasonable amounts for the salvation of all. Would lower insurance rates and medical bills. But politicians corrupted by the insurance industry can't do anything with said industry except bail them out with taxpayer billions. Cool!

20111019-21 17:13 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Phil,

Does this mean you're becoming a Democrat? Hope you're having a great fall there!

20111019-22 17:33 Charis Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB and Phil,

I read Animal Farm. I wouldn't liken anything about it to being a Democrat. Maybe the problem with Democrats is they think too highly of themselves. and by this I'm not saying I'm Republican. The problem with U.S. politics is you really only have two visible parties—so where does that leave people when, like so many of us, we can't see ourselves siding with either? The U.S. system of only two parties suddenly doesn't look so Democratic.

20111019-23 17:50 SteveB Re: Where Are Obama's Girlfriends?

Dear Larry,

Hilarious!

20111019-24 18:17 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Phil,

I agree with your sentiments which is why I have long advocated a viable third party in the center which would make all of these clowns pay attention. There are many reasons for not favoring a parliamentary system but multiple parties with votes of confidence keeps everyone on their toes. If WE really want to change this corrupt system, WE have to propose Constitutional Amendments to take the power away from the clowns in charge.

20111019-25 19:10 Art Re: The End of the GOP?

Does anyone remember reading about the William Jennings Bryant and the Cross of Gold and the Granger Movement?

Just askin'.

20111019-26 19:34 Mark Re: No More Pretending

I'm beginning to realize how much SteveB likes standing on the tallest soapbox.....geeze!

20111020-01 05:56 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

A two-party system has given us a stability that multi-party systems often lack. A huge change like this is probably not something we need right now, but I think it might happen soon. Teabaggers won't support Obama (haha) and maybe not Romney...so what they gonna do?

And I'd be very careful with messing with the Constitution too much. More danger, though I have some ideas along these lines myself. But why not just eliminate the corruption? A few simple laws...just like could have solved the healthcare problem.

Nothing radical.

Why would a Republican who can't face the danger of Obama want to face the danger of a multi-party system and big constitutional experiments? Wow, more radical than any socialists I know.

20111020-02 06:00 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

Except...if we end up splitting the Democratic party, we're all doomed (except maybe the uber rich). Better to let the teabaggers split off from the Republicans. We just need to take control of the Democratic party (easier than building a new party), and for them to take control of the country, then we can take control of the millionaires' money. Arrrr! :-)

20111020-03 06:17 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP? & William Jennings Bryan's 'Cross of Gold' Speech

Dear Art,

Good idea! I remembered the painting, but had forgotten the speech. Very pertinent. Notice how little things have changed since these times, we're still subject to the same tyranny. (But I don't think we want to go back to the gold standard.) I love this quote:

The income tax is a just law. It simply intends to put the burdens of government justly upon the backs of the people. I am in favor of an income tax. When I find a man who is not willing to pay his share of the burden of the government which protects him, I find a man who is unworthy to enjoy the blessings of a government like ours.

For those who are interested:

Bryan's "Cross of Gold" Speech: Mesmerizing the Masses, (<http://historymatters.gmu.edu/d/5354/>)

The most famous speech in American political history was delivered by William Jennings Bryan on July 9, 1896, at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago. The issue was whether to endorse the free coinage of silver at a ratio of silver to gold of 16 to 1. (This inflationary measure would have increased the amount of money in circulation and aided cash-poor and debt-burdened farmers.) After speeches on the subject by several U.S. Senators, Bryan rose to speak. The thirty-six-year-old former Congressman from Nebraska aspired to be the Democratic nominee for president, and he had been skillfully, but quietly, building support for himself among the delegates. His dramatic speaking style and rhetoric roused the crowd to a frenzy. The response, wrote one reporter, "came like one great burst of artillery." Men and women screamed and waved their hats and canes. "Some," wrote another reporter, "like demented things, divested themselves of their coats and flung them high in the air." The next day the convention nominated Bryan for President on the fifth ballot. The full text of William Jennings Bryan's famous "Cross of Gold" speech appears below. The audio portion is an excerpt. [Note on the recording: In 1896 recording technology was in its infancy, and recording a political convention would have been impossible. But in the early 20th century, the fame of Bryan's "Cross of Gold" speech led him to repeat it numerous times on the Chautauqua lecture circuit where he was an enormously popular speaker. In 1921 (25 years after the original speech), he recorded portions of the speech for Gennett Records in Richmond, Indiana. Although the recording does not capture the power and drama of the original address, it does allow us to hear Bryan delivering this famous speech:

I would be presumptuous, indeed, to present myself against the distinguished gentlemen to whom you have listened if this were but a measuring of ability; but this is not a contest among persons. The humblest citizen in all the land when clad in the armor of a righteous cause is stronger than all the whole hosts of error that they can bring. I come to speak to you in defense of a cause as holy as the cause of liberty—the cause of humanity. When this debate is concluded, a motion will be made to lay upon the table the resolution offered in commendation of the administration and also the resolution in condemnation of the administration. I shall object to bringing this question down to a level of persons. The individual is but an atom; he is born, he acts, he dies; but principles are eternal; and this has been a contest of principle.

Never before in the history of this country has there been witnessed such a contest as that through which we have passed. Never before in the history of American politics has a great issue been fought out as this issue has been by the voters themselves.

On the 4th of March, 1895, a few Democrats, most of them members of Congress, issued an address to the Democrats of the nation asserting that the money question was the paramount issue of the hour; asserting also the right of a majority of the Democratic Party to control the position of the party on this paramount issue; concluding with the request that all believers in free coinage of silver in the Democratic Party should organize and take charge of and control the policy of the Democratic Party. Three months later, at Memphis, an organization was perfected, and the silver Democrats went forth openly and boldly and courageously proclaiming their belief and declaring that if successful they would crystallize in a platform the declaration which they had made; and then began the conflict with a zeal approaching the zeal which inspired the crusaders who followed Peter the Hermit. Our silver Democrats went forth from victory unto victory, until they are assembled now, not to discuss, not to debate, but to enter up the judgment rendered by the plain people of this country.

But in this contest, brother has been arrayed against brother, and father against son. The warmest ties of love and acquaintance and association have been disregarded. Old leaders have been cast aside when they refused to give expression to the sentiments of those whom they would lead, and new leaders have sprung up to give direction to this cause of freedom. Thus has the contest been waged, and we have assembled here under as binding and solemn instructions as were ever fastened upon the representatives of a people.

We do not come as individuals. Why, as individuals we might have been glad to compliment the gentleman from New York [Senator Hill], but we knew that the people for whom we speak would never be willing to put him in a position where he could thwart the will of the Democratic Party. I say it was not a question of persons; it was a question of principle; and it is not with gladness, my friends, that we find ourselves brought into conflict with those who are now arrayed on the other side.

The gentleman who just preceded me [Governor Russell] spoke of the old state of Massachusetts. Let me assure him that not one person in all this convention entertains the least hostility to the people of the state of Massachusetts.

But we stand here representing people who are the equals before the law of the largest cities in the state of Massachusetts. When you come before us and tell us that we shall disturb your business interests, we reply that you have disturbed our business interests by your action. We say to you that you have made too limited in its application the definition of a businessman. The man who is employed for wages is as much a businessman as his employer. The attorney in a country town is as much a businessman as the corporation counsel in a great metropolis. The merchant at the crossroads store is as much a businessman as the merchant of New York. The farmer who goes forth in the morning and toils all day, begins in the spring and toils all summer, and by the application of brain and muscle to the natural resources of this country creates wealth, is as much a businessman as the man who goes upon the Board of Trade and bets upon the price of grain. The miners who go 1,000 feet into the earth or climb 2,000 feet upon the cliffs and bring forth from their hiding places the precious metals to be poured in the channels of trade are as much businessmen as the few financial magnates who in a backroom corner the money of the world.

We come to speak for this broader class of businessmen. Ah, my friends, we say not one word against those who live upon the Atlantic Coast; but those hardy pioneers who braved all the dangers of the wilderness, who have made the desert to blossom as the rose—those pioneers away out there, rearing their children near to nature's heart, where they can mingle their voices with the voices of the birds—out there where they have erected schoolhouses for the education of their children and churches where they praise their Creator, and the cemeteries where sleep the ashes of their dead—are as deserving of the consideration of this party as any people in this country.

It is for these that we speak. We do not come as aggressors. Our war is not a war of conquest. We are fighting in the defense of our homes, our families, and posterity. We have petitioned, and our petitions have been scorned. We have entreated, and our entreaties have been disregarded. We have begged, and they have mocked when our calamity came.

We beg no longer; we entreat no more; we petition no more. We defy them! The gentleman from Wisconsin has said he fears a Robespierre. My friend, in this land of the free you need fear no tyrant who will spring up from among the people. What we need is an Andrew Jackson to stand as Jackson stood, against the encroachments of aggregated wealth.

They tell us that this platform was made to catch votes. We reply to them that changing conditions make new issues; that the principles upon which rest Democracy are as everlasting as the hills; but that they must be applied to new conditions as they arise. Conditions have arisen and we are attempting to meet those conditions. They tell us that the income tax ought not to be brought in here; that is not a new idea. They criticize us for our criticism of the Supreme Court of the United States. My friends, we have made no criticism. We have simply called attention to what you know. If you want criticisms, read the dissenting opinions of the Court. That will give you criticisms.

They say we passed an unconstitutional law. I deny it. The income tax was not unconstitutional when it was passed. It was not unconstitutional when it went before the Supreme Court for the first time. It did not become unconstitutional until one judge changed his mind; and we cannot be expected to know when a judge will change his mind.

The income tax is a just law. It simply intends to put the burdens of government justly upon the backs of the people. I am in favor of an income tax. When I find a man who is not willing to pay his share of the burden of the government which protects him, I find a man who is unworthy to enjoy the blessings of a government like ours.

He says that we are opposing the national bank currency. It is true. If you will read what Thomas Benton said, you will find that he said that in searching history he could find but one parallel to Andrew Jackson. That was Cicero, who destroyed the conspiracies of Cataline and saved Rome. He did for Rome what Jackson did when he destroyed the bank conspiracy and saved America.

We say in our platform that we believe that the right to coin money and issue money is a function of government. We believe it. We believe it is a part of sovereignty and can no more with safety be delegated to private individuals than can the power to make penal statutes or levy laws for taxation.

Mr. Jefferson, who was once regarded as good Democratic authority, seems to have a different opinion from the gentleman who has addressed us on the part of the minority. Those who are opposed to this proposition tell us that the issue of paper money is a function of the bank and that the government ought to go out of the banking business. I stand with Jefferson rather than with them, and tell them, as he did, that the issue of money is a function of the government and that the banks should go out of the governing business.

They complain about the plank which declares against the life tenure in office. They have tried to strain it to mean that which it does not mean. What we oppose in that plank is the life tenure that is being built up in Washington which establishes an office-holding class and excludes from participation in the benefits the humbler members of our society.

Let me call attention to two or three great things. The gentleman from New York says that he will propose an amendment providing that this change in our law shall not affect contracts which, according to the present laws, are made payable in gold. But if he means to say that we cannot change our monetary system without protecting those who have loaned money before the change was made, I want to ask him where, in law or in morals, he can find authority for not protecting the debtors when the act of 1873 was passed when he now insists that we must protect the creditor. He says he also wants to amend this platform so as to provide that if we fail to maintain the parity within a year that we will then suspend the coinage of silver. We reply that when we advocate a thing which we believe will be successful we are not compelled to raise a doubt as to our own sincerity by trying to show what we will do if we are wrong.

I ask him, if he will apply his logic to us, why he does not apply it to himself. He says that he wants this country to try to secure an international agreement. Why doesn't he tell us what he is going to do if they fail to secure an international agreement. There is more reason for him to do that than for us to expect to fail to maintain the parity. They have tried for thirty years—thirty years—to secure an international agreement, and those are waiting for it most patiently who don't want it at all.

Now, my friends, let me come to the great paramount issue. If they ask us here why it is we say more on the money question than we say upon the tariff question, I reply that if protection has slain its thousands the gold standard has slain its tens of thousands. If they ask us why we did not embody all these things in our platform which we believe, we reply to them that when we have restored the money of the Constitution, all other necessary reforms will be possible, and that until that is done there is no reform that can be accomplished.

Why is it that within three months such a change has come over the sentiments of the country? Three months ago, when it was confidently asserted that those who believed in the gold standard would frame our platforms and nominate our candidates, even the advocates of the gold standard did not think that we could elect a President; but they had good reasons for the suspicion, because there is scarcely a state here today asking for the gold standard that is not within the absolute control of the Republican Party.

But note the change. Mr. McKinley was nominated at St. Louis upon a platform that declared for the maintenance of the gold standard until it should be changed into bimetallism by an international agreement. Mr. McKinley was the most popular man among the Republicans ; and everybody three months ago in the Republican Party prophesied his election. How is it today? Why, that man who used to boast that he looked like Napoleon, that man shudders today when he thinks that he was nominated on the anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo. Not only that, but as he listens he can hear with ever increasing distinctness the sound of the waves as they beat upon the lonely shores of St. Helena.

Why this change? Ah, my friends. is not the change evident to anyone who will look at the matter? It is because no private character, however pure, no personal popularity, however great, can protect from the avenging wrath of an indignant people the man who will either declare that he is in favor of fastening the gold standard upon this people, or who is willing to surrender the right of self-government and place legislative control in the hands of foreign potentates and powers.

We go forth confident that we shall win. Why? Because upon the paramount issue in this campaign there is not a spot of ground upon which the enemy will dare to challenge battle. Why, if they tell us that the gold standard is a good thing, we point to their platform and tell them that their platform pledges the party to get rid of a gold standard and substitute bimetallism. If the gold standard is a good thing, why try to get rid of it? If the gold standard, and I might call your attention to the fact that some of the very people who are in this convention today and who tell you that we ought to declare in favor of international bimetallism and thereby declare that the gold standard is wrong and that the principles of bimetallism are better—these very people four months ago were open and avowed advocates of the gold standard and telling us that we could not legislate two metals together even with all the world.

I want to suggest this truth, that if the gold standard is a good thing we ought to declare in favor of its retention and not in favor of abandoning it; and if the gold standard is a bad thing, why should we wait until some other nations are willing to help us to let it go?

Here is the line of battle. We care not upon which issue they force the fight. We are prepared to meet them on either issue or on both. If they tell us that the gold standard is the standard of civilization, we reply to them that this, the most enlightened of all nations of the earth, has never declared for a gold standard, and both the parties this year are declaring against it. If the gold standard is the standard of civilization, why, my friends, should we not have it? So if they come to meet us on that, we can present the history of our nation. More than that, we can tell them this, that they will search the pages of history in vain to find a single instance in which the common people of any land ever declared themselves in favor of a gold standard. They can find where the holders of fixed investments have.

Mr. Carlisle said in 1878 that this was a struggle between the idle holders of idle capital and the struggling masses who produce the wealth and pay the taxes of the country; and my friends, it is simply a question that we shall decide upon which side shall the Democratic Party fight. Upon the side of the idle holders of idle capital, or upon the side of the struggling masses? That is the question that the party must answer first; and then it must be answered by each individual hereafter. The sympathies of the Democratic Party, as described by the platform, are on the side of the struggling masses, who have ever been the foundation of the Democratic Party.

There are two ideas of government. There are those who believe that if you just legislate to make the well-to-do prosperous, that their prosperity will leak through on those below. The Democratic idea has been that if you legislate to make the masses prosperous their prosperity will find its way up and through every class that rests upon it.

You come to us and tell us that the great cities are in favor of the gold standard. I tell you that the great cities rest upon these broad and fertile prairies. Burn down your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again as if by magic. But destroy our farms and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in the country.

My friends, we shall declare that this nation is able to legislate for its own people on every question without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation on earth, and upon that issue we expect to carry every single state in the Union.

I shall not slander the fair state of Massachusetts nor the state of New York by saying that when citizens are confronted with the proposition, "Is this nation able to attend to its own business?"—I will not slander either one by saying that the people of those states will declare our helpless impotency as a nation to attend to our own business. It is the issue of 1776 over again. Our ancestors, when but 3 million, had the courage to declare their political independence of every other nation upon earth.

Shall we, their descendants, when we have grown to 70 million, declare that we are less independent than our forefathers? No, my friends, it will never be the judgment of this people. Therefore, we care not upon what lines the battle is fought. If they say bimetallism is good but we cannot have it till some nation helps us, we reply that, instead of having a gold standard because England has, we shall restore bimetallism, and then let England have bimetallism because the United States have. If they dare to come out in the open field and defend the gold standard as a good thing, we shall fight them to the uttermost, having behind us the producing masses of the nation and the world. Having behind us the commercial interests and the laboring interests and all the toiling masses, we shall answer their demands for a gold standard by saying to them, you shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns. You shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.

(Source: Official Proceedings of the Democratic National Convention Held in Chicago, Illinois, July 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, 1896, (Logansport, Indiana, 1896), 226—234. Reprinted in The Annals of America, Vol. 12, 1895—1904: Populism, Imperialism, and Reform (Chicago: Encyclopedia Britannica, Inc., 1968), 100—105.)

20111020-04 06:20 SteveB Re: No More Pretending

Dear Mark,

:-) Except this has got to be the shortest soapbox in the world! It just happens to be in the midst of my friends and family, whom I thank greatly for listening and climbing up here on this little soapbox with me!

20111020-05 07:34 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Ben,

I guess then we have no choice but to try to wake the suckers up!

20111020-06 08:25 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB,

What? there are no fellow travelers in Bolivia that share your anarchic tendencies. You should consider moving next door and spending some quality time with Cesar.

20111020-07 08:32 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB,

In case you haven't noticed in Bolivia, the socialists have taken over the democrat establishment. That is the best thing that could happen to Democracy in the U.S. The right wing religious nuts are ready to take over the republican party. That gives us in the middle (fiscal conservative, social liberal) a chance.

20111020-08 08:43 Charis Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

If you'd ever truly lived in a socialist country (as I have in Cuba) you'd be very, VERY careful about saying this... the loss of liberties and dire poverty you would experience are far worse than anything you've ever seen in Bolivia. Bolivia is heading that way and I am more and more frightened every day for this country. I don't say this because I'm an American with socialist-phobia, but because I've lived under true and pure socialism—and it is nothing to joke about. I thought I'd seen dire poverty growing up for over 30 years in Bolivia. Then I lived in Cuba and I returned to Bolivia truly thankful for how wealthy we really are here—and, for the most part, still free.

20111020-09 08:47 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Charis,

Sorry, my writing skills are not as good as SteveB's or most on this board. I meant to say that since SteveB is living in Bolivia, he may not have noticed what is going on in the U.S. I have spent a lot of time in communist and socialist countries and it is not a good thing. Which is why I fear for the U.S. with the nuts in charge of the Democrat party. Of course, I feel the same fear for the fascists on the right with their religious ideals.

And, yes, I know where Bolivia is headed as I read a lot about world issues.

20111020-10 09:08 Art Re: The End of the GOP?

I think the right wing nuts have taken over the Republican party—note I left out religious.

20111020-11 09:13 Clark Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

OK, I know this is going to sound schoolmarmish, but I hope those on this forum will stop referring to the "Democrat" Party. It's the "Democratic" Party. "Democrat" is a noun, not an adjective. Calling it the "Democrat" Party is something the Republicans dreamed up a while back as a way, I guess, of not giving Democrats credit for being "democratic," and now they all say it. That doesn't make it correct, any more than "Republic" Party would be correct. It's just annoying. Thanks.

Now that I've got that off my chest, I would throw out a question: what would be a good name for a third party, featuring candidates that somehow weren't bought and paid for, signed and delivered to special interests? People's Party has been mentioned. Any other thoughts?

20111020-12 09:14 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB,

Surely you know a lot of radical socialists in Bolivia.

20111020-13 09:15 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

What?

20111020-14 09:19 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

I'm sure everyone has noticed that I don't keep up on "what is going on in the U.S." Haha! Gadhafi is dead! (Oops, not in U.S. yet?) Long live freedom! Yeh, ra, Obama, again! He must be a true Republican! Socialist? LOL!!!

20111020-15 09:23 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

... :-) [Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20111020-16 09:27 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Clark,

Clark: Thanks for understanding the "purposed" nuance as I don't believe the Democratic party is really democratic. Special interests run it like they do the Republican party. I'm glad you feel better now. Hope the meds are working for you!

I don't like the People's Party as it sounds socialistic like something SteveB would worship. I prefer Common Sense Fiscally Responsible Socially Enlightened Party, but that might be too much.

OK, I'm off the discussion for a while to go create jobs. Added 3 this month already and trying to create a new entity that will employ about 175. Of course, I'm shipping them all to Bolivia so they can experience the benefits of socialist living. I do hear the women are beautiful there (obviously SteveB has benefited from that luxury in Bolivia).

20111020-17 09:30 Art Re: The End of the GOP?

Everyone please remember as we compare Libya with Iraq the costs—a few hundred billion dollars less and not one U.S. soldier's life. Hmmmm? But this guy is really incompetent. However, after the terrible Libya mistake, now he's getting us involved in Africa, oh wait, where is Libya again?

20111020-18 09:32 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB,

Actually, I do know quite a few of them in high places. [Personal content removed. —SteveB] 20111020-19 09:35 Jim A Middle Way?

But if we could create a common sense group in the middle either by election of more independents or by gathering a group of existing Democrats and Republicans who are disgusted with extremist just say "no" gridlock that would be big enough to deny a majority to either right or left without their cooperation we might be able to force compromise to occur.

How many would that take to prevent filibuster in the senate? Say 20? and leave 40 on the right and left who could not pass anything by themselves.

20111020-20 09:38 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Art,

I had the pleasure of spending some time in Uganda for a few years after "President for Life" Idi Amin quickly left Kampala for Saudi Arabia. I was traveling around the country with the equivalent of their CIA and Minister of Agriculture (the most powerful guy in the country next to the President—he controlled the coffee trade). The genocide I saw was appalling. Bodies in the streets, in the rivers, mass marches etc.. If any country needs help now it is Uganda and I think Obama is right to try to reach out to these people. There are 7 major tribes in Uganda and for years they have tried to kill each other off. I don't think this will be a short term adventure like Libya but I can only hope we are doing something to stop the genocide

20111020-21 09:38 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Clark,

I agree with you, Clark, and I am one of the guilty ones. But, you know, I honestly have trouble getting that whole "Democratic" thing to roll off my tongue. It's no more Democratic and no less corrupted by money, as you point out, than the "Republic party" (I like that, though "Empire" party might be better). In an Obamocracy, it's gotta be the Democrat party that (sort of) rules (if you can call it that). Or I could invoke conciseness? :-). Aw heck, I'll do it your way!

I'm a conservative guy. I'm afraid of what a third party could bring. And I thought our Republic friends were so deathly afraid of a little uncertainty in the marketplace caused by Obamacare? I would think they would hesitate before endorsing the vast uncertainty of a true multi-party system. We might even need a prime minister...maybe not a bad thing...though government that works that well is not what the framers of the Constitution had in mind. A new Constitution? Frightening! I thought Republicans loved the old one so much, now they want to throw it out?

Business-wise in this world? This is probably not a good time for radical solutions, as appealing as they might be. Though I guess I can see where they're coming from. A third party on the left = Republic victory! A third party on the right = Democrat victory. Let's get those teabaggers moving!

But, if it could actually happen? If the corruption and greed could actually be controlled? I love the name, THE PEOPLE'S PARTY!

20111020-22 09:55 SteveB Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC and Art,

I'm not sure if this is a first, and I don't really want the U.S. in five wars at once (though that is not quite the reality), nor do I want to see a lot of money spent, but I am in complete agreement with, gulp, GaryC.

And I hope Democrat and Republic alike are proud of Obama for what he achieved in Libya at little cost to U.S. taxpayers. But, of course, Republics will never admit anything good about him...

And if we are going to try to maintain our position in the world, it is going to require more taxes from people who can afford to pay them, not the unemployed millions, Mr. Cain and Mr. Perry. Or do we give-up and become isolationist as the U.S. used to be, simply because the most belligerent among us don't want to pay to support the aggression they desire, and want the rest of us to pay instead?

Iraq—Afghanistan—Libya—Yemen—Uganda (but you can't really count Iraq or Libya any more).

20111020-23 10:01 SteveB Re: A Middle Way?

Dear Jim,

I like this idea a lot, Jim. But I would like some kind of assurances that these politicians would not be like all the rest...full of lies and corruption.

Maybe they could sign a pledge to take no large campaign donations? Otherwise, if they take these donations, they're corrupt, by definition and in fact.

But which politician is going to do such a thing, and which one of them could win when huge amounts of money are arrayed against them?

Oh, maybe we could just trust them...

I know I don't see these current jokers reforming the campaign money problem, because it is their life's blood.

20111020-24 10:12 Charis Re: A Middle Way?

Dear Jim & SteveB,

I personally don't believe, Steve, that a 2-party system has brought us stability. If anything, the country is more unstable now than it has been in 70 years and it's because you only have two parties decided the nation's fate and rather than looking for answers they're spending their time, our time, and our money, looking for who's to blame. I like Jim's idea. I'd totally go political to do something like this.

20111020-25 10:32 Pam Re: The End of the GOP?

Ooh, I think I'm pulling ahead of SteveB in the radicalism race. My thinking is either evolving or degenerating, but I'm considering things I never ever did before—like a third party. I always thought I believed in gradual change, so that the risk of uncontrollable disruption could be contained. Now I'm beginning to think that we need to just cut through the Gordian knot, get rid of all the layers of political bullsh*t, and bring some simplicity and clarity to our democratic process. The Republicans are hopeless. I don't believe even they believe what they say, unless they are incredibly uninformed or totally corrupted. The Democrats are running in circles, trying to play a fair game (more or less), while the goalpost keeps moving.

I really like the Petition of Grievances the OWS put out, minus some of the inflammatory language. That is the platform for a third party; I'd call it the People's Party, since that's what it would be. I know we don't want a multi-party like Italy, where corruption is endemic, but even in the U.S. political parties have evolved and even had different names. I have been close to despair in recent years, because it seemed this country had come under the malign influence of greed and ultra-conservatism. Back in the 'sixties, there was a sense (at least I felt it) that the nation was moving inexorably in a progressive direction, and it did for a while. I had a good feeling about politics and our system, but I can understand how Christian fundamentalists and fiscal reactionaries felt beleaguered. They must have felt a surge of renewed optimism when Sarah Palin was the country's darling (NOT mine) and we kicked butt after 9/11. Now it's their turn to be on the ropes, at least I hope that's what's happening. I don't see the protest movement—that is going global— fading away, any more than the starving housewives of Paris were going to stop petitioning the King for bread.

When times are dire, people can do and believe some crazy things. In the Middle Ages it was witches and self-flagellation. For centuries it's been the Jews. Fear can all too easily become paranoia, and even formerly sensible people can be persuaded that the moon landing never happened or that without the certainties of Christianity morality is impossible. The best thing about America is that, so far, we have managed to weather the storms of Tea Pot Dome, Reconstruction, and a Great Depression, et. al. I've been afraid this time we were going to go under—we still might. But today I have Hope with a capital H, just like Obama promised. I don't know how all this is going to play out, and I worry that this movement might be high jacked by the "dark side," but so long as we all keep pushing in a progressive direction, I think there might be a chance.

20111020-26 10:40 Charis Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear Pam,

I've always admired one thing the most about Americans: their intense self-analysis. If America has one saving grace, it's that Americans are always doing evaluations on themselves, looking at what mistakes were made, how to avoid making them again, and how to improve in the future. It's why a young country like the U.S. is what it is today—and if we can take the time to analyze (but not so much time or so much over analysis that we don't do anything at all) then we still have a chance as a country.

20111020-27 10:50 Mark Re: A Middle Way?

Here's a third party!

The GOP could face a revolt from within its tea party grassroots base if it nominates an establishment candidate without true conservative, anti-big government values, one of America's leading conservative pundits tells Newsmax.TV in an exclusive interview. Specifically, columnist and former Republican presidential candidate Pat Buchanan told Newsmax that the nomination of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, the architect of a state insurance plan that many say inspired Obamacare, could prompt the tea party movement to form a third party.

I would say the Democrats would love to see that happen! Certainly it would lead to another 4 years of Obamacracy.

20111020-28 11:02 Pam Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear GaryC,

Jon Stewart showed a clip of Rush Limbaugh railing against Obama (that Muslim socialist!) fighting the Lord's Resistance Army. Why, Obama is killing Christians! How dreadful! Oh, wait, I was just told that the LRA does some pretty horrible things (rape and child mutilation among them). Maybe I'd better do my due diligence. I'll get back to you on this. If you heard Rush fulminating, then having to back up without apology, then you know how preposterous he and his ilk are.

20111020-29 12:14 GaryC Re: The End of the GOP?

The last time SteveB agreed with me was the fall of 1965 and it involved the physique of a young lady. We were both admirers.

20111020-30 15:03 SteveB "The Bible Has Some Shocking 'Family Values'"

"The Bible Has Some Shocking 'Family Values'" by Michael Coogan, CNN

Oct. 26, 2010, (http://articles.cnn.com/2010-10-26/opinion/coogan.bible.family.values_1_biblical-writers-family-values-slavery?_s=PM:OPINION)

(Editor's note: Michael Coogan is a lecturer on Hebrew Bible-Old Testament at Harvard Divinity School, professor of religious studies at Stonehill College, and director of publications for the Harvard Semitic Museum. Editor of The New Oxford Annotated Bible, his most recent book is God and Sex: What the Bible Really Says (Twelve).)

When talking about so-called family values, pastors, popes, and politicians routinely quote the Bible as if it were an unassailable divine authority — after all, they assume, God wrote the Bible, and therefore it is absolutely and literally true.

But that is a misconception. As the Bible itself makes clear, its authors were human beings, many of whom are named: David, Isaiah, Luke, and Paul. These human writers wrote over the course of more than a thousand years, and their writings reflect their own views and the values they shared with their contemporaries. So it's not surprising that inconsistencies are frequent in the Bible, both trivial and profound.

Although Jews and Christians, individually and collectively, have for the last 2,000 years accepted the Bible as authoritative in principle, in practice many of its values have been rejected. On issues such as slavery, no one today would maintain that slavery is acceptable, even though, according to the Bible, it was a divinely sanctioned institution. In the debates about slavery in the 19th century those opposed to its abolition cited the Bible in support of their position, but despite such biblical warrant, their views were renounced.

According to biblical law, a father could sell his daughter as a slave, and the last of the Ten Commandments lists as off-limits a neighbor's possessions — his house, wife, slaves, and livestock. But the majority of modern Jews and Christians no longer accept the biblical view of women as men's property and hence subordinate to them, as they have also abandoned the biblical practice of polygamy.

According to biblical law, a father could sell his daughter as a slave.

In current debates about family values, most of which have to do with sex, opponents of abortion and advocates of a woman's right to choose both cite the Bible in support of their conflicting views, even though the Bible in fact says nothing specifically about the issue. And with regard to same-sex marriage, although the few biblical writers who mention same-sex relationships, especially between men, were unequivocally opposed to them, many contemporary believers would argue that, as with slavery and the status of women, it is time to recognize that the values of the biblical writers are no longer necessarily our own.

Opponents of same-sex marriage cite Leviticus, which says that when a man sleeps with a man as with a woman it is an abomination. They're right: It does say that. But it later calls for the death penalty for such activity, which only the most rabid opponents would insist on. The Bible also calls eating pork and a woman wearing a man's clothes abominations, yet many would no longer enforce such prohibitions.

Individual biblical texts should not be appealed to selectively: Such cherry-picking is all too easy because of the nature of the Bible as a multi-authored book. Rather, as with another formative text, the Constitution, one needs first to understand it historically — what did its words mean when they were written — and then attempt to determine what its underlying values are, not just what it says in a specific passage. Only in this sense can the Bible be considered to have timeless relevance that transcends the historical particularities of its authors.

What are those underlying values? I would argue that they are rooted in love of neighbor, which Jewish and Christian commentators over the ages have identified as the essential and enduring message of the Bible.

Here are three of them. The great Rabbi Hillel, who when asked what the basic principle of the Torah was, replied: "What is hateful to you do not do to your neighbor: That is the whole Torah; the rest is commentary." His words are echoed both by his near-contemporary, another rabbi, Jesus of Nazareth, who put it this way: "Whatever you wish people to do to you, so you should do to them: for this is the Law and the Prophets," and by an early leader in the movement that Jesus started, the rabbinically trained Paul, who pronounced that "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

So, I suggest, the essence of the Bible — its ultimate authority — is not in its individual pronouncements, but in its underlying message: equal, even loving, treatment of all persons, regardless of their age, gender, socio-economic status, ethnicity, or sexual orientation.

20111020-31 16:59 Pam Nation of Change

Do you all get the postings from Nation of Change that come out every day? I keep posting things to Facebook, but I don't know if all of you are on that. What you get are editorial- and op-ed-type essays about all the stuff we've been talking about. I highly recommend it. I think it was SteveG who alerted me to it; I'm so glad he did:

<http://www.NationofChange.org>.

20111020-32 18:55 Art Re: A Middle Way?

While I like the idea of the tea baggers being placed out to rot, they so hate President Obama that they would vote for anyone, if they think he will go down. To my way of thinking the entire approach of the republicans has been "say no to anything that might make the President look good and the country and people be damned". McConnell said as much in JAN of this year and they've lived up to it ever since. Bonehead and his lap dog Cantor are as slimy a politicians as we have seen in quite a while.

I cannot imagine being President and trying to run an operation with that kind of baggage. Maybe Lenin had the right idea.

20111020-33 20:48 Charis Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Warren Buffet's brilliant answer to our troubles with Congress...

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

makes sense to me...

Warren Buffett, in a recent interview with CNBC, offers one of the best quotes about the debt ceiling:

"I could end the deficit in 5 minutes," he told CNBC. "You just pass a law that says that anytime there is a deficit of more than 3% of GDP, all sitting members of Congress are ineligible for re-election."

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified! Why? Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971—before computers, e-mail, cell phones, etc. Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven (7) took one (1) year or less to become the law of the land—all because of public pressure.

Warren Buffet is asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise. In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. No Tenure / No Pension. A Congressman/woman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they're out of office.
2. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, and Congress participates with the American people. It may not be used for any other purpose.
3. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.
4. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.
5. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.
6. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.
7. All contracts with past and present Congressmen/women are void effective 1/1/12. The American people did not make this contract with Congressmen/women. Congressmen/women made all these contracts for themselves.

Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

If each person contacts a minimum of twenty people then it will only take three days for most people (in the U.S.) to receive the message. Don't you think it's time? THIS IS HOW YOU FIX CONGRESS! If you agree with the above, pass it on. If not, just delete. You are one of my 20+—Please keep it going, and thanks.

20111021-01	05:47	Pam	Re: A Middle Way?
-----------------------------	-------	-----	-------------------

Dear SteveB,

You must have been listening to a different John McCain than the one I heard. The one I saw on TV credited the English and the French and played down our role. Someone must have gotten to him. I think the poor guy is losing it. The other day he said the Democrats have killed (or lost) BILLIONS and BILLIONS OF JOBS. That's more people than we have in the whole country.

20111021-02	06:15	SteveB	Re: A Middle Way?
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------------

Dear Art,

I think you have it exactly right. We have actually seen two phases during our golden age of Obamocracy:

1. Democrats in control tried to get Republican cooperation but got none, so they did nothing except the half-a*s health care bill. I guess they were essentially too shy to offend Republicans. And Republicans hate it that Democrats acted like that and hate the one little thing Democrats got done.

2. Republicans take the House—total obstructionism to the detriment of the country. Republican leadership had to go around its own do-nothing members and depend upon Democrats just to keep the country solvent. The Republicans are not a functioning party, so they didn't want the country to function. I suspect they still don't. Maybe they think they can pull a coup if things get desperate?

The better I get to know any member of Congress, the slimier they seem. I want them all gone, every one. We need fresh blood controlled by the boss—the people!

Lenin? I think he works better for the teabaggers:

Attention must be devoted principally to raising the workers to the level of revolutionaries; it is not at all our task to descend to the level of the "working masses."

I guess Lenin was really a Republican...he thought the "working masses" were too slimy for him.

20111021-03 06:46 SteveB Re: A Middle Way?

Dear Pam,

But...I have to tip my hat today to one John McCain! Because he is so involved in war-stuff, he is the only Republican I have seen place reality above dogma and partisanship and actually congratulate the President for a job well done in Libya. To admit the President might actually have done something right.

What is it? They can't say one nice thing about the guy or help him save the country. Why?

Because he's black? I honestly don't know and I've never seen anything quite like it in American politics in my lifetime, so that's all I can come up with. That seems to be the key difference that I can see.

Why isn't it transparent to all the people how evil to the republic this Republican dogmatic attitude is? Isn't it time to get real or become Greece?

20111021-04 07:04 SteveB Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act

Dear Charis,

I think it could work.

But nothing will work as long as even honest men can be bought because corrupt campaign financing is permitted by law. This needs to be stopped one way or the other.

I like that this doesn't include term limits, which I consider to be a Tea Party red herring that, if it were to happen, would keep Congress full of people who don't know anything and have no experience in government. They would be completely at the mercy of special interests, big money, and lobbyists, which is, I guess, the goal—a government controlled completely by greed for power and money.

20111021-05 07:10 Clark Re: The End of the GOP?

Dear SteveB,

As entertaining as that might be, I think it will be a much more boring race of Obama-Biden vs. Romney-Portman (Rob, of Ohio) or an equally dull GOP veep (Romney doesn't want to be outshone). Cain took himself out of it when he told Piers Morgan on CNN last night that he was, in effect, pro-choice (later, of course, he tried to backtrack but pro-lifers don't overlook these things) and Marco Rubio probably screwed his veep chances by lying about or at least misleading about when his parents were "exiled" from Cuba (turns out it was 2½ years before Castro took over, not exactly boat people). It's possible Biden will drop out due to foot in mouth disease, true, but I think for now it's unlikely.

20111021-06 07:44 GaryC Re: A Middle Way?

Dear SteveB,

In case you haven't noticed, he's not black. In fact, he's in trouble with the real blacks because he hasn't done enough for them in their opinion.

20111021-07 08:52 Pam Re: A Middle Way?

Wouldn't it be great if we didn't have an ethnic litmus test? Some African-Americans aren't light enough to get into exclusive clubs (the paper bag test), while others aren't black enough to be "authentic." Piffle. You may not much like Al Sharpton, but he sharply :-) criticized Condoleeza Rice, Colin Powell, and Herman Cain. So did Larry Wilmore (the black comedian). I think it's real progress when African-Americans don't see themselves as one block. White Americans certainly don't. Identity politics is the last vestige of tribalism.

20111021-08 09:24 GaryC Re: A Middle Way?

Dear Pam,

I agree with your sentiments. However, when a conservative black calls out a liberal black, the conservative is always branded as a house N_____. There is a big double standard. My opinion is that the democrat party treats the black vote as if they are plantation slaves. Why do 93% of blacks keep voting for the same tired race rhetoric? I have always believed that race relations would tend to be a far smaller problem in the U.S. if blacks were not so blindly beholden to democrat politicians and their black minister plantation owners.

20111021-09 09:32 SteveB Re: A Middle Way?

Dear GaryC,

You're right, but at least he said something! None of the candidates gave him any credit. No honesty. And Obama is really the Republicans' man, if you ask me, he has caved-in to them at every turn, seemingly as if not even trying.

As for McCain's senility, well, yes, that's why I didn't vote for him, though I kind of like him. He's not exactly your usual politician, sort of a throw-back.

But last election, instead of all this reasonable discourse :-) I put out a daily "Senile Act of the Day" for McCain, and every single day there was something amazing in the news that he had done or said...like there being no economic problem (let alone a monster crisis), or when he then suspended his campaign to "solve" it, then sat there and said nothing, etc., etc. Mostly, all I had to do for lots of laughs was quote some article. I think he had a few cobwebs even then, though I hope I'm as sharp as he is at his advanced age. What is he, 111 now?

20111021-10 09:35 GaryC Re: A Middle Way?

Dear SteveB,

Well said. I assume you could start a balanced commentary on Biden now. The guy is younger than McCain but is loonier and somewhat scary. I personally dream of a ticket with Biden and Palin.

What fun!

20111021-11 09:44 SteveB Un-Elect Congress in 2012

Is there really a need for potentially dangerous, maybe radical, solutions? If that's what it really takes, so be it, but I would rather first try what I'll call diplomacy, instead of all out nuclear war.

If the "silent 99%" (it might actually be a little less than that) would, instead, expend their energy, votes, and available money and simply DIS-ELECT (UN-ELECT?) EVERY SINGLE SITTING MEMBER OF CONGRESS!, they would instantly prove themselves to be the most powerful force in the history of American politics.

Maybe then the corrupt politicians and the 1% would listen. That might get their attention! Maybe this "diplomacy" would work? We try to reason with them first, in the only language they seem to understand, power and money!

And, if that doesn't work, I'm open to the dangerous stuff.

20111021-12 09:58 SteveB Re: A Middle Way?

Dear GaryC,

Ya, except Joe is funnier! I love the guy, but he scares me every time he goes out in public, especially if he talks to anyone. I'd love for them both to take a senility test and see which one would do better.

But, forget your dream ticket, buddy, it's gonna be:

CAIN & PALIN vs. OBAMA & H.CLINTON!

Shake 'n Bake vs. Rock 'n Roll!

Now that's a matchup made in heaven, and if we do what I suggested in my last email, we don't even care who wins—they'll be powerless to do anything except serve the will of the people.

I'm ready for a little more democracy...like, maybe, Egypt, at least.

20111021-13 10:16 GaryC "Charters & Minority Progress"

Dear Pam,

You might enjoy this article:

"Charters and Minority Progress" by The Wall Street Journal

Oct. 20, 2011, (<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052970204485304576643461600325694.html>)

(New evidence on school reform and black student performance.)

A tragedy of American politics is that civil rights groups like the NAACP oppose education reform, even as reform's main beneficiaries are poor and minority students in places like Harlem and New Orleans. The latest evidence comes in a study showing that black students in charter schools outperform their peers in traditional public schools.

The California Charter Schools Association looked at the state's Academic Performance Index (API), which runs on a scale from 200 to 1000, and found that the average black charter student outscored the average black traditional school student by an average of 18 points over the last four years of publicly available data.

In reform hubs like Los Angeles, the charter advantage was 22 points, in Sacramento 48 points, in Oakland 51 and in San Francisco 150. In San Diego, the other major urban center, traditional schools outscored charters by an average of eight points.

The report also found that charters are disproportionately among California's best schools in educating black students. Though charters account for only 9% of California schools, they represent 39% of those in which African-American API scores exceed 800 and English and math proficiency exceed 65%. Charters serving African-American students are also less likely than traditional public schools to have low academic status coupled with low academic progress.

Crucially, the data show that charters' success isn't attributable to attracting students who are better equipped to learn from the start. "The African American populations in charter public and traditional public schools are very similar," notes the report, with the same level of parental education, similar household income and nearly identical attrition rates. The real difference is that charter schools are free of the traditional school system's union contracts and bureaucratic rules, which shorten the school day, stifle innovation and protect ineffective teachers. This autonomy doesn't guarantee charter success, but it allows the schools—and their students—to benefit from creativity, competition and accountability.

Minority parents increasingly understand this, which is why they work so hard to get their kids into charters. The report finds that 9% of California charter school students are African-American, compared to 6% of students in traditional schools.

Believe it or not, some people read this data not as an endorsement of better schools but as an indictment of reform and a sign of cultural imperialism. "We are concerned about the overrepresentation of charter schools in low-income and predominantly minority communities," wrote the NAACP, the National Action Network, the National Urban League, the Rainbow PUSH Coalition and others in a statement last year. So more good schools in poor neighborhoods are a problem? Such statements show that the NAACP is still fighting the last civil-rights war, refusing to break with its teachers union allies from the 1960s even as another generation of black children is doomed to less equal educational opportunity.

The education achievement gap remains enormous—even in charter schools, black kids in California are almost 150 API points behind their white peers. But the gap won't get any narrower as long as civil-rights leaders oppose the reforms that are doing the most to bridge it.

20111021-14 11:08 SteveG Re: A Middle Way?

If congress/administration could do something positive towards getting the economy moving, creating an atmosphere for job creation maybe we wouldn't be focusing so much on foot in the mouth diseases and gaffes.

20111021-15 13:54 Pam Re: Good-Bye

Dear DaveY,

[Reply to DaveY, who was dropping out of the group because his inbox was always full and his time limited. —SteveB]

Bye, bye, David. But before you go, let me tell you why I like this group and our conversation. I'm retired too, and suddenly my life is a lot less populated than it was. I no longer have unexpected conversations with colleagues as I walk across campus; I no longer attend university social events because all the students I taught have graduated. I worried before I retired that I'd disappear down a rabbit hole and lose contact with the world, to say nothing of reducing the number of stimulating conversations I had in an average week. But this group has my little gray cells (to quote Poirot) sparking again. I think it's great fun. Yes, the things we discuss are serious mostly, but thinking about them and talking about them is, for me anyway, fun.

20111021-16 14:04 SteveB The Defeated Obama?

I just witnessed a little live press announcement made by President Obama. I was amazed!

He was there basically to announce victory (again) in Libya and victory in Iraq (bringing the troops home by year's end). You would think he might have been jubilant, enthusiastic, proud. You'd think he might have wanted to (what a verb tense!) sound a few patriotic notes, stir the voters a little.

Instead, he read the announcement as if he were announcing the biggest defeat in American history. Either that, or when did being the President and "leader of the free world" become so utterly boring?

To me, just getting troops home, saving lives and money, is a big victory! A big deal! Why not proclaim such?

You're going to have to do better than that, Mr. President, or Obamocracy is going to end after just four years, I fear.

20111021-17 14:17 Pam Diplomacy

We need radical change (reform), but I don't want a revolution either. I doubt very much that the 99% would ever do anything violent; maybe a few extremists will throw garbage on some CEO's lawn, but I can't see burning cars and looting stores. The only source of dangerous behavior I see is the Right wing nuts. How far will they go to hold onto power?

20111021-18 14:21 Charis Re: Diplomacy

I'd say just as far as the left-side wingnuts. Hahahaha.

20111021-19 14:25 Clark Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear SteveB,

I think he's got mission-accomplished-avoidance-itis to the max. I don't know if this is good or bad, though. I thought it was a pretty dignified statement and appropriate to ending this disaster of a war that most all of us would just like to see in the rear view mirror.

20111021-20 14:26 GaryC Re: Diplomacy

Dear Charis,

Please understand, the bad people are always right wing nuts. Liberal people are never extreme and never do anything to retain their power. Please do not confuse the facts with your opinions.

20111021-21 14:44 Pam Re: "Charters & Minority Progress" (w/ reply from GaryC)

Pam: Where is this article from?

GaryC ref: [20111021-33, below]: The article is from today's WSJ.

Pam: I used to be opposed to charter schools because I thought they undercut the public schools, but I've changed my mind. Whoever can do the best job is who should be doing it. I like labor unions in general, but you're right about the teachers' union. Protecting tenured teachers shouldn't be more important than educating children.

GaryC: You got that right sister!

Pam: Unfortunately, some people's jobs depend on the very things that hurt, or don't help, education. This is the 21st c., and we need innovation and creativity in the classroom. Teachers need to brainstorm and collaborate, and they need to be free to try new things. No Child Left Behind is a disaster. I guess the people who make up the tests like it.

GaryC: OK, SteveB is right on this one, blame George Bush!

Pam: We need to get away from the 19th c. model of educating children to be docile factory workers. We need kids who can think and solve problems and be self-reliant. If the most important thing is being quiet and staying in your seat, and if a kid gets good at that, he will undoubtedly be a passive follower rather than an autonomous learner.

GaryC: I have always told everyone that what I learned best at Purdue in Engineering and Economics was to be a critical thinker and problem solver. Going to law school also helped as it made me understand that sometimes facts are black, or white or grey or some of each. My wife taught at a private school for 30 years and their whole concept was to teach critical thinking in all areas—math, science, literature, music, art etc. BTW, she got paid about 70% of public school teachers but she loved the experience and kids she had 30 years ago still call her or write her as she was such an influence on so many lives. [Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Pam: Here's an example of what I'm talking about. I may have already told SteveB about this. When I was teaching, I stumbled upon a new pedagogy developed by a history professor at Barnard, called "Reacting to the Past." You can google it for more info., but take it from me, it's a great way to teach history. Students are assigned a role (maybe historical, maybe fictional). They then stay in character during the whole class, which is run like a game, with the students in charge. There are lots of games, and probably more in development, but the first one I did was the French Revolution. I did this with college freshmen. The class WAS the revolution in 1791. There was a King, a group of Jacobins, Girondins, Loyalists, and street crowd. We had a Danton, a Robespierre, but as I recall the rest of the characters were based on a type: a merchant, a clergyman, etc. Each student is part of a faction, and each faction has its own goals. Also, each student has a list of individual goals that remain secret until the very end. This builds in lots of competition, strategizing, forming alliances, etc. The whole thing is run with the same rules as the original National Assembly. They elect a leader, who runs the whole show. The students give speeches arguing for their position and against their opponents'. They put out a newspaper, much like the pamphlets published during the Revolution. They could stage riots. They could leave the room to talk in private. I sat in the back of the room and answered questions about the rules of the game and I kept score (points for speaking, for responding, etc.), but I didn't actually "teach." They did tons of research and studied up on what they needed to know to push their side, which included knowing what the opposition was up to as well. They did the work, because if they didn't and they tried to give a speech, the rest of the class would challenge them or they'd be obviously failing—sort of like the Republican debates. :-). There's more, but this gives you an idea.

Students are active, not passive. They depend on themselves, not an authority figure, i.e. the professor. No one goes to sleep, and no one is bored. It's so exciting the students met on their own outside of class to collaborate with their factions. It got pretty heated sometimes, as they really got into character. I could write about this all day, but my point is, there are exciting new ways to teach that produce a different kind of student than those of yore, more self-motivated, more engaged, more creative. That's what we need in the 21st. c. Politicians brought up in the old ways (like we were) don't know jack sh*t about what schools should be doing.

GaryC: Very cool. Of course, I am sure you broke a lot of union rules doing this. And, why weren't you teaching them the answers to the standardized tests? Did you have anyone acting as an anarchist like Stevie?

Pam: As you can see, education is an issue that really gets my blood pumping. I'll stop now.

20111021-22	14:45	GaryC	Responsibility
-----------------------------	-------	-------	----------------

Dear SteveB,

Several of the socialists in this group have long advocated that the RICH are not paying their fair share and that the government should TAX 150% of their earnings over $200,000 annually.

When considering this confiscation of earnings, I often look at the consequences of such action and the responsibility of other parties in this action. I have asked this question before to the foremost exalted observer in this forum but surprising never received a response. Therefore, I would like to pose this question for serious discussion:

What is the responsibility of the poor to society?

20111021-23	14:52	Pam	Re: The Defeated Obama?
-----------------------------	-------	-----	-------------------------

I agree with Clark. I don't think a lot of chest-thumping is what we need at this juncture. I'm always a bit dismayed when people dance in the streets when a government falls or a dictator is killed. I understand the feeling of relief and celebration, but somehow jubilation seems trivializing. I don't know. But SteveB is right too. Obama needs to be more inspiring. He used to be famous for that. What happened?

20111021-24 14:54 Pam Re: Diplomacy

Dear GaryC,

One of my Facebook friends posted a nifty comment yesterday: "Sarcasm is what you use when what you really want to do is beat the cr*p out of people." You say some crazy stuff, GaryC, (at least in my humble opinion), but you always make me laugh.

20111021-25 15:03 Clark Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Pam,

He has a real disconnect between his stump speeches and his "presidential" pronouncements. I agree he could use more inspirational language in the latter, but he's either made a conscious decision not to go that route or he's incapable of it. Maybe he's beaten down and only gets fired up on the stump, but I suspect he just thinks low-key pronouncements are better for official policy statements. Politically, I think that's a losing proposition.

20111021-26 15:04 Pam Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC,

This is a better question than might at first appear.

Every citizen has responsibilities to the whole social entity that is the nation, whether it be by simply obeying the law, paying fair taxes, keeping litter off the streets. We hear so much about "trickle down" economics and a rising tide floating all boats, as if showering the top layer of society with lots of goodies will somehow translate into benefits for all. We have seen, surely by now we have seen, that this doesn't work. Let's look at it the other way around. How about a "trickle up" economy. Boost the bottom layers of society so there are more jobs, more people with money to spend, more demand to increase production, which would all lead to nice profits for the very top.

I believe it is the moral thing to do for the richest among us to shoulder more of the financial burden—not to an extreme, but something more reasonable than what we have now—but if that isn't convincing, let's consider a more pragmatic view. A healthy, stable, large, confident, secure middle class is good for the whole society, rich and poor alike. The middle class is one of the great inventions of the modern world. The more wealth is shared, the more wealth there will be to share. A rising tide can't raise boats when there's a hole in the bottom of the ocean.

20111021-27 15:07 Pam Re: The Defeated Obama?

There's "low key" and then there's flat. These new trade agreements are apparently the biggest thing since NAFTA. Obama needs to explain, with vigor, how these agreements will help Americans. I know we'll be able to sell more abroad, but as I recall it, NAFTA drained away a lot of American jobs. What's the difference between then and now? Or do I have it all wrong?

20111021-28 15:08 Charis Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC,

Well, I do think the founders of our nation did believe that the more wealthy have a certain responsibility to care for the lesser-advantaged. Our nation was, after all, founded (primarily) on Christian principles whether we like it or not. which is why Americans are so well-known for their volunteerism too. However, I don't think they thought the poor would take on the attitude that they were ENTITLED to be carried through life by the wealthy without making any effort of their own to improve their condition.

I say this having grown up very poor myself and I realize not all people of the underprivileged classes do this. But we are seeing it much more often now. The U.S. actually has NO EXCUSE to have poverty. There are thousands and thousands of programs and options for aid. I've seen people take too much advantage of these options (to the point of attempting to get out of working altogether) and I've seen people not want to take advantage of the aid available to them because it required a little effort on their part, or because they considered it humiliating.

I guess my personal response to this would be that we ALL have a responsibility to society, no matter what our background or current circumstances are. Poverty is not an excuse to ignore our moral duties—to ourselves, our families, or others. I remit to my previous message in which I asked a similar question: is no one responsible for themselves and their own actions anymore?

I am American but I was brought up overseas. My mom is a (legal) immigrant. She always taught me that the phrases "the American dream" and "the U.S. is a land of equal opportunity" are not meant in the socialist/communist way. They do not mean we MUST or WILL all have exactly the same amount of anything. They do not mean the government or anyone else has any obligation to GIVE us the same as everyone else has.

They simply mean we should ideally all have equal opportunity to work hard and make effort to achieve something (defined as: whatever your own "American dream"—personal goals for yourself—might be).

20111021-29 15:11 Charis Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Pam,

Not to mention that NAFTA is now what most of Latin America is using to blame America for the entire world's economic woes.

20111021-30 15:15 Pam Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Charis,

I need to know more about this.

20111021-31 15:22 Pam Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC and SteveB,

I've got to go make dinner, but I want to say one more thing. WHY do the very poor have to pay at least some tax, just to "have some skin in the game."? When I was a struggling grad student with no husband and three kids, I got money back from the govt.—the earned income credit. I still had to pay state and sales taxes, but that earned income credit sure came in handy, especially at the end of the month.

20111021-32 15:24 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC,

Good question. But since I'm answering the very same question for the THIRD time, I grow weary of it. I also answered it on Feb. 24 ([20110224-02) and on Mar. 29 (20110329-02), also see below (20111021-35). Surely these represent a pretty conscientious attempt to answer the, for some reason, oft-repeated question. —SteveB]

I did answer that question before and can prove it. I said it is to work (vital for society, even the rich). It is to consume (vital for society, even the rich).

And I will add to that now that their responsibility is also to lick the boots of the rich and feed their egos by consuming Rupert Murdoch publications and watching Fox News.

But what is their responsibility to society when society has destroyed the lives of the lower classes? When there are no jobs to make work and consumption possible for huge numbers of people? (All the more reason why I don't want unhappy illegal aliens here.) Then, i.e., now, I am afraid you (will) see that their responsibility is to revolutionize that society and establish a new order, such as we see being done in many places in the world today.

Arab Spring Egypt had about the same unemployment rate as the U.S. does now. They were only slightly more unhappy, according to the polls. I kept pointing this out before the Occupy Wall Street movement started. Listen to Pam, fer cryin' out loud! :-)

Do you suppose their responsibility is to pay the taxes of the rich? Though I do agree with, I think it was Charis, that all citizens should pay at least a tiny bit of federal taxes, unless destitute. just as I think everyone who wants to see a doctor or go to a hospital should have a small co-pay, unless destitute.

Maybe their responsibility is to "get out of Dodge" or go back to Africa. What the hell is it you could possibly want them to do? Re-educate themselves? Sell themselves into slavery? I don't exactly get it. Should they turn themselves in and go to debtors' prison? Declare bankruptcy? Suicide? What?

20111021-33 15:29 GaryC Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"

Dear Pam ref: [20111021-21, above],

OMG A reasoned answer from one of the liberals. See my comments [above] in your text.

BTW, the reason I think public schools are such a failure is that poor kids are hurt the most by the fact that the unions and the NAACP are adamantly opposed to reform. They state it's all about the kids but, it's all about protecting incompetent teachers and antiquated rules.

20111021-34 15:32 Charis Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

I don't think that was GaryC's point, at least I didn't understand it that way. I think everyone has some responsibility to themselves and others no matter how much or little they have. Even the destitute have TIME (it's what they have the most of, actually). I should know, I've lived near destitute most of my childhood (yes, we're talking kneeling down and praying desperately for food), but we always had time and a way to help others somehow. We never turned anyone away.

I don't really understand your statement that "society has destroyed the lives of the lower classes". As a member of the lower class (not even the middle class) most of my life, it never occurred to me to blame the wealthy for my condition. I'm not exonerating the ruling party powers for the poor decisions they've made but in the U.S. everyone has a voice and a vote no matter who wealthy or poor they are. Now, if people chose not to VOICE their dissent until recently, wasn't that also of their own volition?

20111021-35 15:41 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC,

The question only makes sense to me in terms of economics. I agree even the poor should help others and always try to get up one more time. They should also obey the laws, unlike the Wall Street bankers.

What I mean by lives being destroyed by society is all the jobs that are now missing. Not actually the workers fault. It just costs more to be poor in America than most places on Earth, or to be rich. Millions of good manufacturing jobs have left the U.S. to China, NAFTA countries, etc. All the free trade has been a terrible thing for American workers.

So what I take it Gary is asking about is, OK, we have people who are poor. They exist. Maybe they have jobs, maybe not, but they are at least below the poverty line. Now, what should they be doing for society.

I think he wants to bleed them for more money. Am I wrong? If so, what does he want with them? Ahh....military service! Indentured servitude in India! Let's get them poor folks crackin', by gum!

20111021-36 15:42 Pam Re: Responsibility

And don't forget, it's not just the poor, uneducated, lazy types who are in trouble. I know quite a few middle-aged, formerly employed, formerly middle-class people who are struggling to find work or to make it on a part-time salary with no benefits. These people, who are my friends, are not lazy or trying to game the system. They are desperate and afraid. There are five applicants for every job opening in America. I know that in academic, there are usually HUNDREDS of applicants for a single faculty position, usually one without tenure or a large salary. Unless you're a famous literary critic or something, choosing a life in academia is middle-middle-class at best. And there are LOTS of adjunct and part-time teachers who barely get by working at several schools at the same time. I've done that, and believe me, a lazy person couldn't do it. You may not think so, but I think it is tragic that a young person can spend four to ten years getting an advanced degree and go into crippling debt in the process only to be told there might be a one-year position in Podunk, SD, if they're lucky enough to get it.

I don't know enough about the truly impoverished to be able to say whether the drain on society caused by the underclass is substantial. I would never defend a healthy person who simply refused to work. (I could talk about that too if I were in a confessional mood.) But a 55-yr. old, who has worked for the same company for twenty years, then gets let go, breaks my heart.

20111021-37 15:44 Charis Re: The Defeated Obama?

Pam, basically word from Mexico to Argentina is that capitalism is to blame for all the economic woes of the world, that the U.S. is an evil giant that purposely used agreements such as NAFTA to suck other countries dry, that NAFTA benefited ONLY Americans, and that Americans purposely used agreements such as NAFTA to purposely cheat South Americans out of their natural resources, money, and livelihoods. Today, the same South Americans that willfully entered into these agreements blame their past non-socialist governments (i.e. their past capitalist governments) for entering into trade agreements with the U.S. that gave the U.S. all the advantage and left none of the benefits in South America.

This is the current wildly-popular rhetoric of presidents such as Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, Evo Morales of Bolivia, Humala of Perú, Christina of Argentina, Correa of Ecuador, Brazil's new president, the president of Honduras, the president of Nicaragua, and others, all of whom are left-wing, some of whom are very near to installing themselves as dictators. It all began with big-daddy Fidel Castro of Cuba and spread like wildfire. It's why in the past 8 years more and more South American countries are electing left-wing socialist leaders now. The typical rhetoric of these leaders is that the U.S. is evil, that the U.S. is to completely and fully responsible for all the poverty in South America, and that the U.S. is the Enemy Numero Uno. The general belief throughout South America today, is that the U.S. uses it's "democracy" and "capitalism" and "power" disguised as "U.S. aid" to stick its nose in everyone's business and start wars all over the world, and that it does this for one reason and one reason only—to take over other nation's natural resources. Americans are seen as such as excessive consumer of any and all the world's resources, that America today is also being blamed for the entire planet's pollution and climate change. Now, on the one hand, it's easy to see why people believe this so readily. Americans are the world's biggest consumers, and are the most wasteful people on the planet (sorry don't take offense, I'm American too, let's just be real and admit it). But on the other, these countries are sort of like what some of the people on this forum want us to believe—they feel they have absolutely NO responsibility for their own circumstances.

20111021-38 15:48 GaryC Re: The Defeated Obama?

Ladies and gents: Obama CANNOT be enthusiastic about these trade agreements because it will p*ss off his union masters. This is not rocket science.

20111021-39 15:52 Pam Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"

Dear GaryC,

You're right. Most of life falls in the grey zone, I find. It's the young who see things in black and white. Once you're been around a while, you know nothing is ever quite as simple as it appears to be.

I was teaching in a university in an Honors Program, so experimentation was encouraged. This was unique within the larger university, where things go on pretty much as usual. Which a lot of the time is just fine. There was no standardized test, but the truth is the students learned so much more through "Reacting" than they ever would reading a textbook and memorizing dates. We had no textbook, rather a collection of primary sources. The kids read the actual articles Danton or whoever in fact wrote. They also read Edmund Burke's essay on the French Revolution; he was against it, even though he supported the American one.

I don't dismiss the importance of tests, but I see their main purpose as a reason/excuse to study hard and really bore in on the material. I've always thought it strange that I could teach a class, then test the kids on what I was pretty sure they would know. If I had really taught them well, they should be able to do well on ANY test on the same material. But that's in an ideal world. The GRE and comprehensive exams at the end of graduate study come close.

I can relate to your wife. I LOVED teaching.

20111021-40 15:53 GaryC Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Charis,

Well played. And, now China is going into these countries and making the same deal with the socialists and its ok.

20111021-41 15:57 Charis Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

But you see, that's exactly my point. I grew up poor most of my life but I never felt there was nothing I could do—there was always something. As long as my tongue and lips work I can speak out for myself and others. As long as my hands are healthy I can voice my dissent in writing. I just see a lot of people getting immediately defeated and not doing ANYTHING about their condition. Sheesh, if I had just sat there waiting for someone to pluck me out of my misery, I'd still be there too. You have to be willing to make SOME effort for yourself. I just think sometimes that maybe our definition of poverty in the U.S. is so different from other countries. I mean when I think "poverty" in South American or African terms, I suddenly don't feel like I was ever impoverished.

I can't speak for GaryC, but when I think about responsibility I don't only think about our present circumstances. I also think about what put us into those circumstances. Some people never had it better, but for those who did and now see their economies being reduces, I'd have to ask: Did we save while we could? Did we consume more than we needed to when we did have money? Did we make wise choices while we could? Did we do anything to change the laws to favor the poor before we also became poor? Or are we only voicing our dissent now that we've lost our non-poverty status? Hmmmm?

20111021-42 15:58 GaryC Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"

Dear Pam,

You must have been a damn good teacher. When I was teaching at Purdue I had three fraternity brothers in class and several pretty young things to impress. I taught introductory economics but tried to use common everyday experiences to teach the law of supply and demand or diminishing returns. For example, the 12th beer you pounded has less affect than the first beer you pounded. Out of 13 sections, I had the highest two. I think it was because I made it fun. BTW I was a democrat liberal at the time.

20111021-43 16:02 Charis Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear GaryC,

Right you are. That is exactly what formerly-socialist and now full-blast capitalist China is doing. It's taking advantage of the hate toward Americans to gallop in on a white horse and "save the day". Unfortunately, these same socialist dicta—sorry "presidents" are signing the same types of agreements with China that they signed with the U.S.—and are even forming organizations like MERCOSUR and UNASUR (not unlike the European Union) to enter into NAFTA-style agreements all over again. But you see it's not the U.S.—it's CHINA and China still "bills itself" as a socialist country—so there is no way China would rip them off like the U.S. did—right? That's the reasoning, anyway. Pfffffffffff.

20111021-44 16:05 Pam Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Charis and GaryC,

I've never been to Latin America, and I don't claim to know much about it, but it seems inevitable that our western hemisphere could/should band together more than we do—not like the Eurozone maybe, but something less antagonistic.

I'm not sure I quite understand your point of view here. You don't like all the socialists who are in power in So. America, but the capitalists that cooperated/collaborated with the Americans are bad too? I agree that America has exploited the resources of poorer nations in South America, Asia, and Africa. I always used to talk to my students about the workers in Mexican factories who make the tee shirts that we buy so cheaply at the GAP. Our ten- or twenty-dollar shirts are possible because Mexican workers are paid a pittance. This is a huge subject, and I think I won't dig any deeper for the moment. But any enlightenment anyone can send my way will be greatly appreciated.

20111021-45 16:07 Charis Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Pam,

No, I'm not saying that is my opinion. I'm explaining that that's the twisted incongruent reasoning of South Americans today.

20111021-46 16:14 SteveB Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Charis,

I love my circumstances and I am completely responsible! :-)

20111021-47 16:22 Art Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers

I think maybe Cain is a plant by the Koch brothers to try to take some presume off the obvious racist nature of the tea baggers and now the Republican party. We know he has been in bed with them for years. All he is really doing is traveling on a book selling tour. He has done zero study on foreign affairs and his tax plan is really just a pizza ad.

But, horror of horrors, suddenly he has leaped ahead and might possibly actually win the nomination. HOW DID THAT HAPPEN???? I can see the Koch brothers rolling over in the coffins that they climb into every morning. They'll find a way to get him out of the picture. How's that for a conspiracy theory?

20111021-48 16:28 Clark Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers

Dear Art,

Makes as much or more sense than anything Cain has ever said.

20111021-49 16:28 Art Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear SteveB and Clark,

Maybe he should fly out to an aircraft carrier and wear a flight jacket? Iraq was a senseless tragedy and Libya by contrast a masterful act of diplomacy but no heroic military act. I don't feel much like chest thumping either.

20111021-50 16:33 Art Re: The Defeated Obama?

Trouble is he's an intelligent man and he keeps forgetting what he's dealing with. Like you Pam I cannot see celebrating the death of anyone. I can see killing them easily but never being happy about it.

20111021-51 16:37 GaryC Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

Well said!

20111021-52 16:42 GaryC Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

How do you know I was talking about you?

Now that you have spewed your venom and the hatred of anyone successful, please use your critical thinking skills and wonderful writing skills to give a reasoned answer.

20111021-53 16:44 Pam Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"

Dear GaryC,

Oh, my God, what happened? And you got off to such a good start! ;-)

20111021-54 16:45 Charis Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

I'm sort of wondering what you think of Winston Churchill? I mean, not that you knew him personally, but what is your general opinion of the guy?

20111021-55 16:47 DaveY Good-Bye

You guys have too much free time on your hands. I am retired living in Tucson, but don't have time to spend every hour of every day on the internet. I am way too busy for that.

20111021-56 16:48 Art Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

I'll be glad to help you, if you need it, with some historical references—think fat alcoholic. Good writer though.

Winston Churchill did once say the biggest argument against a democracy is a five minute conversation with the average voter.

20111021-57 16:48 Pam Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers

Dear Art,

I'd say you're right on target.

20111021-58 16:55 Pam Re: Responsibility

Dear Art and Charis,

Love it! Didn't he also say that democracy is messy and inefficient, but it's the best system mankind has yet devised?

20111021-59 17:00 DaveY Re: Good-Bye

Dear Pam,

First of all, if you enjoy this type of diatribe, then by all means continue. Everyone should be able to choose how they occupy their retirement years. I am also a retired college professor but I prefer to occupy my time by playing tennis, enjoying the Arizona sunshine, partying with my neighbors, and traveling this beautiful country of ours. I do maintain contact with former colleagues and a few students, but since my subject was Human Sexuality, we don't discuss academic subjects much, just personal lives and goals. I certainly do not miss the faculty meetings and university socials. Regarding the "fun" banter in these emails, I don't believe the name-calling I have observed in some is necessary to make a point. But again, if this is something you enjoy, then by all means continue. I am just opting out.

20111021-60 17:02 Charis Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

I work—about 18 hours a day. But I'm taking little moments of time between other stuff cuz this is very stimulating—I was about to give up on Americans being politically involved—I've always seen them so apathetic—but these conversations are actually giving me some hope for our country. See the thing I like about SteveB is we can have these heated debates and a week from now we'll be seated at an expat dinner thoroughly enjoying ourselves—probably discussing other things like, what the heck is that stuff floating around in our pipían de gallina... (SteveB that's a hint on next week's menu by the way) k-k-k-k-k 20111021-61 17:53 SteveB Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear Clark and Art,

Ya, I guess I didn't mean so much that attitude (the Bush thing was yukkie), humble is OK, and maybe that's all he was trying for. And war is a serious, not a gleeful, business.

But maybe because we wanted to leave more troops longer but Iraq wouldn't agree to our terms (?), he seemed so...well, defeated...bored...try to watch a little of it if you can.

But no big deal, really...just wish he'd stand up and lead!

20111021-62 17:59 GaryC Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear SteveB,

He was leading alright, from behind. just like a good community organizer is trained to do.

20111021-63 18:05 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC,

And why would I direct those things toward myself? I'm actually not really in the group of people I seek to protect and in whose interest we should all take an interest or this country ain't gonna work.

None of this is venom. I flat out don't get the question.

If we're talking about the economics of the rich paying more taxes ("their fair share")—which we were—and we're talking about the debt the rich owe to society...to our schools, culture, government, etc., and their responsibilities to that society which essentially allowed them to get rich.

Rightfully so! More power to them! But they cannot be without responsibility (especially toward the poor, especially if they have helped create those poor by closing factories, etc.) and that was the subject.

So you turned it around and asked what was the responsibility of the poor. I don't know what you could possibly have been getting at both times you asked it. I can only assume we're talking about economics and that is the basis on which I answered the question.

I've already said all citizens should pay at least a little tax, just to give them a little ownership of the process.

So end the mystery already! If the responsibility of the poor is not as I have stated it (see below, maybe minus the boot licking), then what is this mysterious economic responsibility of the poor to society? I'm at a total loss.

20111021-64 18:09 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Dear Pam,

Pam I had a (for me) brilliant idea today to solve this problem and also expand our horizons a little. I think you're going to love it. I'll write the long email tonight or tomorrow morning. You are a wonderful friend! I'm treasuring what we've discovered too.

20111021-65 18:14 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Charis,

That is so nice of you. You are a good friend. Thank you so much for your participation!

Today I got an idea that will cut our email traffic, expand our circle, and make everything easier and better for our little group.

I'll write the long email and send it to you tonight or tomorrow morning. Thanks again. I'm enjoying reading your stuff and really learning a lot from everyone. A lot of smart people, I think. I like having all sides too, a lot!

P.S. Winston Churchill is one of my heroes.

20111021-66 18:16 Charis Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

Looking forward to hearing your idea. I like Winston Churchill cuz he said "The pessimist sees difficulty in every opportunity. The optimist sees the opportunity in every difficulty." :-) See you later!

20111021-67 18:19 Pam Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

Yaaaay!

20111021-68 18:23 SteveB Re: Good-Bye

Dear DaveY,

No problem. Happy you listened for a while. I'll get you off the list, but emails will take a while to stop.

Thinking about this problem today...there do get to be a lot of emails, but I think the issues, the discussion, and the ideas are important. We're in deep trouble in America and it needs our help. And you know a lot of the people in the group. But I'm thinking of gathering all the input from the group, compiling it by thread and sending out just email per day to everyone who wants it. That should work better. It's also something that could be easily forwarded and allow the group to grow...maybe into a movement...haha.

But I won't put you on that list unless you want.

How's the weather there now? I was lucky enough several years ago to work in Phoenix on a project for about 6 months. I loved it! And had an opportunity to explore a lot of the countryside. Seems like I ran into more than my fair share of rattlers, but never had a real problem, as long as you don't count attacks of fear. :-)

But Sedona, the Grand Canyon, Spirit Valley, the gold mines, Frank Lloyd Wright, the desert itself. Loved it!

20111021-69 18:26 SteveB Re: The Defeated Obama?

Dear GaryC,

I have to admit it seems sometimes like he never did leave that behind. I thought that, having been in Congress, he would know a little about actually dealing with Congress, but like Clinton, he has gotten better cooperation from the Republicans than he has his own party. (Just a bit of an exaggeration, not much.)

20111021-70 18:32 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC and Pam,

It seems like a small price to pay in a compromise to extract a tax increase from the rich, as they kick and scream all the way to their yachts and summer homes.

Maybe we want everyone to pay at least a dollar so they can see who the real boss man is, because the government can make them do it? There, take that, you lackey.

20111021-71 20:55 SteveB Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear "Group" (for want of a better name, see below),

Don't try to duck your head. You know who you are. You are the folks who have taken the trouble to make at least my life more interesting lately. You are the writers of our forum. I have an idea that I wanted y'all to think about and let me know if you're willing to try an experiment to improve things, if not in the world, at least right here and now.

My idea concerns this format we have been sort of forced to use...my idea...and my apologies for its limitations. Pam and I have discussed turning it into a blog (she writes a very interesting one), but I have my doubts. One thing I like about the emails is the same thing internet businesses like about them, they're harder to avoid than a webpage or a blog. You don't have to go to it. It comes to you. This can be both powerful and annoying. But if it's from someone you know, at least a little, even if it's just a forwarded message, you're inclined to look at it. Since I want to affect opinions and actions, just as the merchants do, I like the sort of in-your-face nature of emails. Plus you have the huge tradition of everyone on the internet forwarding interesting emails they receive. You can forward someone a link too, but they might never open it.

Your jobs would be to just keep doing what you've been doing—contribute witty, even brilliant, op-ed pieces concerning our topics (more on that in a minute). Your emails could include links to articles, etc., or articles themselves, or quotes. Please attribute or I won't be able to include in the publication. You would still send these pieces or whatever you want to anyone you want, including people in this existing group. We already have a lot of auxiliary traffic going one-on-one beside the main stream. This is good and can be kept going.

But instead of sending what you want "published" to the entire group, you would just send it to me or copy me, at this email address or, probably, one based on the name and purpose of the group (more in a minute). Once a day, I will cut and paste everything that has been sent into one new email organized by threads, with fresh contributions followed by reader comments on previous contributions. If your email is a reply to someone else and you copy me, I'll know what it's in reply to, in most cases, and will make those kinds of things clear in the "publication" (I hope). Then I'll send that out to everyone in this group and to additional people who request to be on the mailing list or already are—our dear readers.

This way everyone who wants will receive just one email per day and everyone will be happy(ier). When you send me your first contribution or comment, you will grant me permission to publish it in the email newsletter (for want of a better term), until you might choose to rescind it anytime in the future. You will need to choose a user name, because your real name and your email address will not show up in the publication. Only your user name. I will send the emails to the group using blind copy. This will reduce the number of emails for all.

Actually for this charter group, we could take the best user names for ourselves because we're early birds, founding members—SteveB, SteveG, Pam, Dale, GaryC, GaryF, Mark, Mary, Larry, Jim, Dennis, Clark, Dick, Bill, Ben, Art, Charis. These names would make it simple for all of us to easily discern the writer when we read their stuff, or if you prefer something special, just let me know.

At the same time, anyone in the group can keep sending and receiving as many emails as they want to/from other group members. If you want these exchanges in the FottM Newsletter, and you probably do, just copy me too.

Another huge advantage, is that this our Newsletter will be something that could easily be forwarded to other people you think would want to read it. I will always have instructions for getting on the list. People will join. More will contribute. More will send it to other people they know, etc., etc., until it gets to Kevin Bacon.

If we could reach more and more people with a rational discussion of how to arrive at practical solutions to our problems, directed especially toward the next elections (for now), we might be able to make some kind of difference. At least, it might be worth a try. At least we might all keep learning stuff while we entertain each other. I'm willing. What do you think?

Now, the big question. What would be our exact purpose and our name. Forget anything with "change", Obomacracry messed that up for us.

First, our issues, our topics, our cause(s), our raison d'être. Below are the ones I remember coming up in our discussions. Maybe you have some more. Do we tackle all of them or just some or find the best common element? I'm sure I'm forgetting some or not stating some so well. It seems like we would be more effective the more focused we could be on one thing. But I really want to keep discussing all these things and they all have to do with the state of America in 2011 and forward.

Our angle on things would be that we are a growing group of fairly ordinary citizens (except GaryC) from the practical middle, seeking solutions to Americas problems, particularly via the 2012 elections and beyond.

I want us to be practical and bipartisan, as much as possible, but we need to focus on consensus building and finding real answers and solutions, even if that is something as simple as the truth or falsehood of some politician's utterance. Hopefully, it could be something as grand as how to get the government functioning again.

We don't have to make these decisions right away. We can change immediately to the email newsletter format, then continue to work on causes and names. In fact, if you start sending stuff to me, I'll get the first issue out Sunday. Normally I'll send them out the night of the same day, but I want to allow a little extra time at first.

Here are the issues I remember best. What am I missing you'd like to see? (I wonder if almost all these things are really about restoring the American Dream as a real possibility?)

1. Campaign finance reform (my favorite)
2. Un-elect all members of Congress (my second favorite)
3. "Free" trade
4. Taxes
5. Education (at all levels)
6. Amending the Constitution
7. The influence of big money on politics
8. Term limits
9. Lobbying & lobbyists
10. Regulation (by government)
11. Jobs—their loss & how to regain
12. A third party
13. The 2012 candidates (one I think needs to be in there)
14. Present and recent Administrations
15. Affordable healthcare (incl. insurance, rising costs, socialization, Medicare, Obamacare)
16. Class vs. class in America
17. Energy
18. Social Security & retirement in general
19. Welfare
20. Immigration, legal and illegal
21. Deficit spending and budget cuts
22. War, the wars
23. Voting and election issues (will come up next year)
24. Capitalism
25. American small business
26. World markets, the housing bubble, and bailout
27. China, Europe, etc.

The following are group names I have toyed with. I'm sure you'll come up with better ones. (For the most part, google does not show these as taken already, just thinking out loud here.)

1. THE ALLIANCE OF THE MIDDLE
2. HAVE YOUR SAY
3. THE ALLIANCE TO RESTORE THE AMERICAN DREAM (maybe close to what I'm trying to get at)
4. THE ALLIANCE SEEKING AGREEMENT IN AMERICA
5. THE ALLIANCE SEEKING SOLUTIONS
6. ALLIANCE TO PROMOTE GOOD GOVERNMENT (similar to existing group, no pizzazz)
7. ALLIANCE FOR BETTER GOVERNANCE
8. ORGANIZATION FOR A FUTURE AMERICA
9. PEOPLE FOR AMERICA'S FUTURE
10. THE WORRIED CITIZENS ALLIANCE
11. THE PEOPLE'S ALLIANCE
12. JUST ASK HOOSIERS (because of many connections to Indiana)
13. RETAKE AMERICA
14. THE ALLIANCE TO RETAKE AMERICA

15. CITIZENS OF THE MIDDLE
16. CITIZENS TO REMAKE AMERICA
17. CITIZENS FOR PRACTICAL POLITICS
18. THE ALLIANCE FOR PRACTICAL POLITICS

What do you think? For both topics and a name of our group (soon to be a powerful PAC). Early next year I would like to put all the Newsletters on a website and see what else might be possible.

Remember, you can start "publishing" your comments the new way effective immediately. Just send to me only or copy me if it has to do with our group's issues. I'll get everything published the new way, starting on Sunday, so we can immediately reduce everyone's email. Thank you for all your thoughts and contributions.

20111021-72 22:15 GaryC Re: Responsibility

Dear SteveB,

Really? I hope you are kidding because I am offended by this remark. You know nothing of the charity I give, the work I do for charities or family members, the jobs I have given to students, or the jobs I have created for the poor. Just because I am RICH does not mean I am not generous. In fact, the RICH are far more generous with their time and money than are the effete liberals you champion. Those are the facts!

Steve: I appreciate your comments, however unfounded, because it makes me consider my position on certain items. I even agree with many of your positions. After all, for the most part, we both want less government and better government. But never ever call into question a person's feeling for the disadvantaged just because they have a different way of helping instead of having the government steal money from them to make politicians look better. I will respond to the group in a different email as this is private.

See "from SteveB" [20111021-35 and 20111021-70, I guess. —SteveB]

20111021-73 22:38 Charis Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear SteveB,

I can make this easy for you. I can set up a "blog-style discussion page" on my website for you. It can be a password protected private page just for our group. You can use the form to start your discussions on each subject listed below. Each time a person writes in a response or comment they have the option to "be notified" by email when someone else has responded to their comments—they can also choose to simply not be notified, therefore not receiving any emails and they can just visit the page if and when they want to. No one else on my site would know about this page. It would not be connected to any of my site pages.

20111021-74 22:41 Charis Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear SteveB,

It would look something like this: www.boliviabella.com/bolivia-travel-forum.html.

See all the blue links below the form? Each is a new subject.

20111021-75 22:45 Charis Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear SteveB,

I like "have your say"—it's simple, direct, and not motivated by either left or right political inclinations—also leaves your group open to anything else you'd like to discuss in the future...

20111022-01 01:45 Ben Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear SteveB,

You really should move this to a publicly accessible website. That would enable the Group to access it any time but would avoid the increasingly awesome volume of email. It would also allow your forum to grow, and perhaps for its ideas and feelings to be viewed by others who might be interested. Many, many others. There is a lot of good material here, and many good ideas, but to try and go back and find any of it would be a mess.

Steve: you need a BLOG. There are many free blog packages available; I'd suggest Linux as a platform. Or OSX, of course; it's tightened down pretty well, is reasonably well documented, very standardized, largely open-source, and there are many forums—as there are with Linux. Windows on an open internet socket is getting to be just a big f*cking bulls eye these days. Of course, you have more free time than most, so if Windows is comfy, well, there is certainly plenty of support and documentation available there, too. But you really need a real blog, and more visibility.

This blog idea is weird, though, because I saw that 50% of my email traffic on this account was from you, directly from you, and while I love to read them all... well, I had hit reply and written the first three paragraphs above BEFORE I read the body of that to which I was replying, and realized that your subject was the very idea I had—truly independently—crystallize in my own mind before I knew it had in yours just a few hours before. That's real.

Here's new elaboration, AFTER realizing our common train of thought: what you are doing now is a serial broadcast. What you COULD be doing is giving your group DMA. And new folks can quickly scan MUCH more content MUCH faster in a good blog format; dealing with emails is really, really cumbersome, if you are actually interested in a very long thread.

There are even free blogs available, probably more than I know about. My daughter has a fun blog on blogspot.com where she chronicles, with good wit, her adventures at school in London and the Old World at large.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Blogspot's layout and capabilities may not be suitable for a more conversational and interactive group, but there are many free ones, and there are open source programs if you want to roll your own.

I really think you could have quite a following, and even real impact. Your fans seem to be fairly diverse. Tom _____, by the way, is my good buddy here in Austin that fanned my interest in shooting and now, reloading; he's about my age, a very bright, kind, thoughtful guy, Masters in biology, did some real interesting field work, and then went into the army. He was a Green Beret in the Viet Nam conflict, and Special Operations of one flavor or another thereafter. You know: days in a hole, waiting, eating bugs, many firefights and parachute drops... I suppose he generally votes Republican, but he is a bright sucker who really understands issues on many more levels than your average Joe. He's not a frequent contributor, but he seems always to be up on what your thread is doing.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Blog, SteveB. Blog!

20111022-02 05:23 Pam Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear SteveB,

Gosh, you're really taking it up a notch. I can't believe you want to do all this extra work—it seems like work to me. I appreciate your enthusiasm, truly.

You're waiting for the "but," so here it is. I LIKE getting lots of emails. I also like it that we can respond to something right away, not have to wait a day for a response or for the conversation to continue. I like our spontaneity. What we have now also allows for private side comments in more or less real time. If you could somehow keep a record of our conversations for "publication" in, say, a monthly digest, along with what we have now, I think that would be great. I've been thinking about what a shame it is that all this good discussion is getting lost in the cyber sphere. If we could keep the spontaneity and also have a record to share more widely, I think that would be great. I don't want just one email a day. I like stringing them out as they come in. I can choose when to jump in or jump out. Also, re. the name. I like "Have Your Say." It's completely neutral, and I think that's what we're going for, so as to be as inclusive as possible. I, for one, think we really have something good going here. I just hope it continues and doesn't poop out. There are so many things we could talk about. I feel like I have a whole new group of friends—even GaryC.

20111022-03 08:03 SteveB Re: Responsibility

Dear GaryC,

No insult intended at all, my comments are obviously sarcasm to match yours, my friend, nor do I think of you as part of the rich, nor am I talking about your feelings for the poor, except maybe in this one way of taxes.

Funny you place me in the poor group in your previous email... They are my brothers, but so are the misguided rich, but I never think in terms of classes really. It just doesn't really occur to me at any gut level. That's one reason why I'm upset by all this class strife going on now. I don't like to see it.

Maybe it's because we see the facts differently. To me, it's a fact that one of the reasons America is in trouble is because taxes are too low. I know you don't believe this, but there is enough evidence and enough serious people who believe this that it does not work to simply try to joke and name call it away. At least at this moment, we need to find additional tax revenue without sinking the economy.

Since the government needs money and the rich don't want to pay more taxes (Who does? But the country's in trouble.) , somebody would have to. Who else? The middle class and the poor. This is the position you have actively supported. I believe it is a position that would hurt the poor and middle classes at a time it cannot be allowed to happen or there goes the economy over the Bush cliff. And lo and behold, the proposals from the Republican candidates are perfectly consistent with this and with what you've been arguing for a long time now.

You still, after three answers from me have not been able to tell what this economic responsibility of the poor is other than what I've mentioned. It is still a mystery to me and, based on all your previous comments, since even ultra conservative Republicans admit we need more money from somewhere and are actively seeking it, I assumed that you must want more taxes from this group just as your fellow party members do. So they have an obligation to pay taxes and to vote, which I mentioned the first time around. You never responded so I had to keep guessing. :-)

Tell me how I have the responsibilities of the poor wrong. I know nothing of you and the poor other than there it touches this one issue of your question and taxes. Just as I don't place you in a class, I would never presume to know your relationships or aid. I'm sorry if I implied that.

Maybe all the communist, socialist, druggie name calling doesn't help, to be perfectly honest.

You and Mary get it wrong because of your passion for the right. I insult politicians and political forces only, not private individuals, though private individuals can take offense. That is never my intent. My intent is always, quite honestly, to find the truth and help it spread and prevail.

I really appreciate your great help on this road!

20111022-04 08:48 SteveB Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear Group,

It would mainly be cutting and pasting. Charis and Ben are helping me already. They have more of a traditional Blog in mind, which would also satisfy what Pam has talked about..a log or record. I still have everything going back to the run up to the 2008 election. I've got some really wild, radical right wing stuff from those days that makes very interesting reading. So we should have a website or blog page.

But I, as Pam, like the email idea too. Personally, I like the idea of one a day and I know we'll keep more readers if we do that. But I don't want to limit in any way the conversational advantages we enjoy now. So keep doing that all you want, just not published to the whole group. Copy me on what you send. Once a day I'll add these to the Blog and concoct the email.

So far, Charis and Pam both like "Have Your Say". The BBC has a "Have Your Say" on the radio or TV, but that's completely different, so it should work.

Other ideas? Names. We do all topics or specialize? One topic from the news today that I didn't include is "Global Warming". I left off "Abortion" because I'm not sure we can have a productive conversation on that subject. Our goal is bipartisan consensus from all sides of the middle... Think hard, mi colegas.

20111022-05 09:56 SteveG Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear SteveB,

I like the idea of the emails going to a monthly digest.

There are some folks who have not participated, so maybe an effort to see who wants to continue might be in order.

20111022-06 10:17 Dale "The Employee Rights Act"

Here is some responsible legislation for workers rights. This must be what OWS is seeking.

"The Employee Rights Act" by Sen. Orin Hatch and Rep. Tim Scott, TownHall.com

Sept. 13, 2011 (http://townhall.com/columnists/orrinhatch/2011/09/13/the_employee_rights_act)

(Aug. 2, 2011, S. 1507, in Senate Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions Committee)

America's laws have long recognized the need to protect workers from abuse. In 1935, Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), which ensured that employees would have the right join a union or to refrain from doing so—free of harassment or intimidation.

In 1959, after a numerous hearings examining corruption within the labor movement, Congress passed the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA) in an effort to bolster self-governance, transparency, and democracy within unions.

But, since that time, progress for workers' rights has stalled.

As Big Labor and employers continue their ongoing power struggles, the rights of individual workers are far too often lost in the shuffle. And, as we've seen under the Obama Administration, legal protections for workers who may oppose unionization can be easily swept aside by ideological bureaucrats.

For these reasons, we've introduced the Employee Rights Act, a bicameral, pro-worker piece of legislation to bolster democracy in the workplace.

First, the Employee Rights Act will require a secret ballot vote in all union elections.

According to the National Labor Relations Board, nearly 40 percent of all unions certified in 2009 did not have to go through an election. Presumably, most of these unions were certified through a combination of card checks and decisions by employers to accept the union without demanding a vote.

Over the years, we've all heard the troubling accounts of unions obtaining signatures through deception and intimidation. And, we've all heard about union organizing campaigns and boycotts that have all but forced employers to give up their right to demand a secret ballot vote. Under the Employee Rights Act, that right will belong to the employees, and it will be guaranteed.

While requiring these votes is important, it is only the first step in restoring democracy in America's workforce. The vast majority of current union members more than 90 percent according to some estimates never had an opportunity to vote for their union, neither by card nor by ballot. They simply accepted jobs at workplaces that were already unionized and, in many cases, they were forced to begin paying dues as a condition of employment.

The Employee Rights Act will give millions of workers their first opportunity to vote on whether to be part of a union. Under the bill, instead of a one-time vote followed by mandatory union representation in near-perpetuity, unions will stand for reelection by secret ballot every three years.

In addition, the Employee Rights Act will prevent any union from ordering a strike unless it first obtains the consent of a majority of employees through a secret ballot vote. If we're serious about ensuring democracy in the workplace, we must allow employees to have a say before their union can force them into unemployment and possible replacement.

Furthermore, the bill would give employees more control over how their union dues are spent. Exit polls continually show that union members are almost evenly divided among Democrats and Republicans at the ballot box. Yet, more than 90 percent of Big Labor's political contributions go to Democrats.

Under the Employee Rights Act, a union will have to obtain an employee's written consent before using their dues for any purpose unrelated to the union's collective bargaining functions, including political contributions or expenditures.

These are not radical ideas, they are simply common sense. And, not surprisingly, they are very popular with the public. According to a poll conducted earlier this year by the Opinion Research Corporation, these and other proposals contained in the Employee Rights Act are supported by no less than 60 percent of Americans and most of them by more than 75 percent.

America is in the midst of a fierce debate over the role of labor unions in our economy. While this debate is important, it should not stop us from working together to take affirmative steps to protect the rights of individual workers. The Employee Rights Act would do just that.

20111022-07	10:26	SteveG	Fw: UUSC Action: Sign Letter of Support for OWS
-------------	-------	--------	---

from UUSC:

Open Letter of Support for the Occupy Movement

I stand with people around the country and the world who are calling for economic justice.

My values affirm that each person has inherent worth and dignity; that justice, equity, and compassion should be the guiding principles for human relationships; and that all people deserve access to the democratic process.

My recognition of the inherent worth of every person compels me to speak out against policies that privilege the demands of corporations over the human rights of people. I support the Occupy movement in its affirmation that protecting workers' rights and ensuring that basic human needs are met must take precedence. All people have a fundamental right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of themselves and their families.

I also join the Occupy movement in decrying the wealth disparity that leaves millions struggling for economic security. Policies and legislation that promote economic marginalization are morally unacceptable. Everyone is entitled to a government that recognizes and promotes basic economic rights. Justice, equity, and compassion should be foremost in our government's decision making.

Economic oppression is not only a violation of fundamental human rights, it is also a blow to democracy. When economic power is concentrated in the hands of a few and when corporations are awarded the same status as actual human beings, the democratic process is fundamentally compromised. Basic fairness requires that all people have equal opportunity to participate in political debate and to be represented in government.

I envision a powerful and radically inclusive movement for economic justice. I recognize economic justice as a right that is due to all people, regardless of race, ethnicity, gender, sexual orientation, language, religion, political or other opinion, immigration status, national or social origin, property, birth, or other status or distinction.

I sign this letter as an expression of gratitude to all who are working for economic justice in the United States and around the world, as an affirmation of my hope for fair and compassionate economic reforms, and as a renewal of my commitment to help make it so. Sign letter here:

http://actnow.uusc.org/site/PageNavigator/occupy_open_letter.html.

20111022-08	11:31	Pam	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
-------------	-------	-----	----------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Maybe I'm being selfish in continuing to articulate my preferences, but this is an open discussion, right? I don't want to get just one email a day, because then I'd have to devote an hour—or two or three?—to getting through all of it. As it is now, when I have a few minutes, I can check to see what's here and get through it and be ready for the next batch. I have snatches of free time, but not any big chunks. Besides, I like the tennis-match quality of our exchanges. Just my 2 cents' worth.

20111022-09	11:39	SteveG	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

Snatches of time is right - emails need to continue - a blog would be nice to look up a history of certain thoughts.

20111022-10	11:58	Pam	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
-------------	-------	-----	----------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Maybe seeing who wants to remain on the list is a good idea. Some of us are more active than others, but that doesn't mean the silent ones don't follow the discussion. We've lost a few recently, so maybe some self-selection is going on already. My friend Kim (new addition) has been following but has yet to write anything. I know it took me a while to get comfortable with this, and I know she's enjoying it. How about a general request for those who want out to let us know?

Also, I like not having a specific focus. I really am an anarchist in disguise. Ha. My whole life I have hated organizations, meetings, agendas, formalities, rules, regulations, and bullsh*t. When someone starts saying, let's do it THIS way, I want to throw something. We're all about freedom, no?, and the current format seems wide open to me. I do like the idea of a digest though. Maybe at the end of each year (should we last so long), you could publish a "book." Maybe at some point you'll want to write a book about this whole enterprise. The one thing I do like that sounds restrictive is that I assume we're all a similar age. Kim is 47, so maybe she's the youngest—except for your kids. I'm not against the young-'uns, I just like feeling I'm among my peers. I also love the diversity of the group. It's good for academics to find kindred spirits in law or medicine or business or whatever—and vice versa.

You should feel good about this, SteveB. It was all your idea, and it's working.

Last fall Mark and I went to his Stanford class reunion, where I met a man who was starting something sort of like this. He wanted to "change the world" and was going to invite people to join a website with a view toward writing a book eventually. He wanted me to help edit it. I was all excited about it at first, but when I looked into it more, I found it to be too focused, too slick (fancy website etc.), and far too organized. I never did anything with it. I wonder if it's still operating or if it ever got off the ground. I like things that grow from the ground up and keep improving, so long as things don't get too codified. I like the idea of our being like a really good local restaurant that people hear about and want to visit. Places like that always decline in quality once they become a chain.

Sometimes good ideas are best left spontaneous. Example: as a teacher, I had students over the years that I got particularly close to. I became a mentor of sorts. A few of them have become friends, and we're still part of each other's lives. Facebook helps too. But these relationships formed because we liked each other. As simple as that. A kid would start dropping by my office, we'd talk, I'd be encouraging and talk to them like a human being, and if they got into that, we'd gradually form a friendship. Then the university, in its wisdom, decided to have a mentorship program where they would assign a faculty member to a student and encourage them to do stuff together. I did this several times. I'd have a student assigned to me, then I'd dream up things for us to do at least once a month. I usually ended up taking them for ice cream or coffee. It was stilted and awkward. We were, after all, strangers to each other, and our get-togethers were more like an onerous social obligation than a true relationship.

I feel as if I'm getting to know some of the people in this group in a natural, easy way. We don't have to write if we have nothing to say—no small talk. We can cut right to the serious conversation (with some jokes) without all the extra baggage of a meeting or a class or even a party. I love going out for dinner, say, with friends, but even if we've known them a long time, the conversations tend to remain rather superficial. That's OK, nothing wrong with it. But this group gives me something much more substantial.

20111022-11	14:35	Jim	Re: Responsibility
-----------------------------	-------	-----	--------------------

I substituted yesterday in a high school Personal Finance course where they were viewing one of Dave Ramsey's programs on family budgeting and money and kids. He quoted Warren Buffet as saying you should give your kids enough money that they can do something but not enough that they can do nothing.

I think that has to be a part of helping the poor that avoids despair but avoids the "free-lunch" syndrome that allows them to just do nothing.

The program also recounted what he had done with his own kids. from the time they were very young (like 3) they had a posted list of five jobs that they could do that week and earn commission. they had other things that they were expected to do just because they were part of the family but they had a way to earn money. They also had some of it to spend and some of it to save and some of it to give to others.

He wanted them to make the mental and emotional connection between work and money instead of an allowance like welfare that did not separate having money to spend from having to work. It seems to have worked for his kids well.

He had told them at an early age that the parents were not going to buy a car for the kids but that he would match what they saved up themselves for a car. One of the daughters had $8000 by the time she was 16 and got a $16000 car of her own that she paid cash for.

20111022-12	14:38	Art	Rich and Poor
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---------------

<http://imgur.com/a/U4FR4>

Some interesting stats here. I don't think anyone can argue that the disparity of wealth is growing. I guess the fundamental question is:

1. Is the growing disparity of wealth a problem?
2. Do we care?
3. Assuming we get past 1 and 2, what can/should we do about it?
4. What is the outcome goal?

I think sometimes a lot of our discussion go past one another because some of us are on 2 or 3, and other can't get past 1. I am one of those who came up very poor, I can out country shuck Perry dirt farm and all I think, and who has done very well economically, all without any help other than what I made for myself. I also was a Republican for all of my life until just recently.

To me the problems of wealth distribution, political honesty, intelligence in government and the current economic challenges are blindingly obvious, and yet I know that lots of very bright people don't even think we have an economic problem to began with. What I keep trying to grasp is what am I missing. I understand the logic string of the so called liberals or, as some have labeled some of us, socialist, (by the way, nothing could be further from an accurate description of me at least) but I cannot follow the logic train of tea party types, most of the current republican contenders, and in general the republicans as a whole these days. I tend to oversimplify sometimes and label most of the tea party types as racists who just won't publicly admit it and I suspect that is still true in many cases, but I keep thinking there has to be more than that. So, for any who would care to enlighten me and maybe a few more of us, starting with 1 above, do we have a problem?

20111022-13 14:39 Jim Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers

I wonder if it would affect fundamentalist support if we point out that his 9-9-9 plan signs turned upside down to reveal 666 the number of the beast?

20111022-14 15:30 GaryF No Wonder People Are Taking to the Streets

I just read an interesting news item. It seems a bank just up the road in Brunswick, Ga. failed, the FDIC took it over, shut it down, and fired the bank's president, NOW, the bank's ex-president is suing the FDIC for $711,000+ for severance pay.

What's wrong with this picture? No wonder people are taking to the streets.

20111022-15 15:48 Charis Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers

Dear Jim,

hahahaha.

20111022-16 16:19 Clark Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers

Dear Charis,

Actually Michele Bachmann already pointed that out in a debate, or at least strongly hinted at it. I'm sure she believes it.

20111022-17 17:06 Pam Re: Responsibility

Dear Jim,

This makes wonderful sense. I forwarded it to my daughter, who has two little boys.

20111022-18 18:55 Dale Re: No Wonder... & "Lawsuit Filed Against FDIC"

Dear GaryF,

I'm not sure what is so hard to understand here. She, the bank president, had a contract specifying under which conditions she was entitled to compensation. The courts will decide if the suit is valid.

"Lawsuit Filed Against FDIC" by Louie Brogdon The Brunswick News, Ga.

Oct. 22, 2011, (<http://www.istockanalyst.com/business/news/5493859/lawsuit-filed-against-fdic>)

A former Glynn County bank president is suing the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. for not paying her severance after state and federal regulators closed and sold her failed bank in January. Former Oglethorpe Bank President Laura Cross-McKinley filed suit Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Brunswick requesting $711,466 in damages from the FDIC.

She claims the federal bank regulator did not honor a severance clause in her employment contract after she was fired when the FDIC became receiver of the bank.

According to the five-page complaint, Cross-McKinley was to be paid two years salary if she was terminated within two years of a "change of control of the bank," as per her employment agreement with Oglethorpe Bank, which she entered into Oct. 1, 2002.

On Jan. 14, Oglethorpe was closed by the Georgia Department of Banking and Finance, and the FDIC was named receiver of the bank, according to the complaint.

By becoming the receiver of Oglethorpe Bank, the FDIC took ownership of all of the bank's accounts, credits, debts and contracts.

Bank employees were called into the lobby at 5 p.m. Jan. 14 by regulators and informed they would still have their jobs with Bank of the Ozarks, the company which regulators brokered with to buy the bank. Cross-McKinley was told not to return until FDIC staff finished going through her files.

Before she was notified by FDIC, a Bank of the Ozarks official fired her, according to the complaint. Cross-McKinley reportedly received a letter Mar. 8 from FDIC telling her to file a claim with the corporation by Apr. 23 to receive her contractual payments.

She filed the claim Apr. 21, according to the complaint.

The regulator first reportedly told her she had missed the deadline, but after Cross-McKinley faxed staff a copy of its own Mar. 8 letter setting Apr. 23 as the cut-off date, the regulator told her Sept. 2, "the proof of claim fails to state a provable claim against the FDIC as the receiver for Oglethorpe Bank..."

Citing a previous federal case with allegedly identical facts, Cross-McKinley is asking for $711,466 in damages from the FDIC and is asking that the regulator pay her attorney and court fees.

A hearing date has been set.

20111022-19 19:03 Charis Re: No Wonder...

Dear GaryF,

I realize it may be hard to swallow, being as she was the president of the bank and therefore ultimately responsible for ensuring it remained feasibly operational; however, if her contract states she is entitled to severance pay then the FDIC is going to have to pay up. It may be difficult for us to imagine paying someone an amount like that for NOT doing their job well, but that is, after all, the very definition of severance pay—it's for people who get fired or laid off. It doesn't bother me that she'll get severance pay. We all do when we get fired. The amount is, however, very hard to swallow isn't it.

20111022-20 21:17 SteveG "Is Bank of America Headed for the Glue Factory?"

The End of BoA?

"Is Bank of America Headed for the Glue Factory?" by Mike Whitney, CounterPunch

Oct. 22, 2011, (<http://www.readersupportednews.org/opinion2/279-82/8033-is-bank-of-america-headed-for-the-gluefactory>)

Why is Bank of America moving derivatives from Merrill Lynch to an insured subsidiary? Is it because the derivatives could blow up at any time leaving Merrill with gigantic, unsustainable losses? If that's the case, then it would make perfect sense to shift them into a depository institution that's covered by the FDIC. That way, the taxpayers would wind up paying for the damage and no one would be the wiser. It's like a stealth bailout, right? The only problem is that Bloomberg let the cat out of the bag, so now everyone knows what's going on. And that's going to be a very big problem for B Of A. Here's a clip from the Bloomberg article:

Bank of America Corp. (BAC), hit by a credit downgrade last month, has moved derivatives from its Merrill Lynch unit to a subsidiary flush with insured deposits, according to people with direct knowledge of the situation.

The Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. disagree over the transfers, which are being requested by counterparties, said the people, who asked to remain anonymous because they weren't authorized to speak publicly. The Fed has signaled that it favors moving the derivatives to give relief to the bank holding company, while the FDIC, which would have to pay off depositors in the event of a bank failure, is objecting, said the people. The bank doesn't believe regulatory approval is needed, said people with knowledge of its position.

Three years after taxpayers rescued some of the biggest U.S. lenders, regulators are grappling with how to protect FDIC-insured bank accounts from risks generated by investment-banking operations. Bank of America, which got a $45 billion bailout during the financial crisis, had $1.04 trillion in deposits as of midyear, ranking it second among U.S. firms. ("BofA Said to Split Regulators Over Moving Merrill Derivatives to Bank Unit", Bloomberg)

There are two things worth noting in this article. First, according to Bloomberg, "the transfers (of derivatives) are being requested by counterparties." Well, how do you like that? In other words, the investors on the other side of these contracts want Merrill to put them under an insurance umbrella provided by the FDIC.

Now, why would that be? The only reason I can come up with, is that they know that a lot of these complex instruments are undercapitalized and ready to implode, so they want to make sure they get their money back any way possible. That means they need to latch on to Uncle Sam without anyone knowing about it. But, like we said, the cat is out of the bag.

The other thing worth noting is that the Fed and the FDIC are at loggerheads over the matter. ("The Fed has signaled that it favors moving the derivatives to give relief to the bank holding company, while the FDIC, which would have to pay off depositors in the event of a bank failure, is objecting.") Now, that's not good at all, in fact, it's a big red flag that suggests the Fed trying to pull a fast one on the American people. One does not have to look too far for other examples of Fed misbehavior; the endless bailouts (TARP, QE1 and 2, Operation Twist, ZIRP, etc) In fact, the Fed's history is a tedious chronicle of one shifty deal after another. This is just more of the same; another gift to big finance at the public's expense.

It's ironic that the B Of A flap is taking place at the same time the non-partisan Government Accountability Office (GAO) just released its report on conflicts of interest in the Fed. It helps to put the Fed's dubious behavior into context. This is a summary of the report from Washington's Blog:

The GAO detailed instance after instance of top executives of corporations and financial institutions using their influence as Federal Reserve directors to financially benefit their firms, and, in at least one instance, themselves...

The corporate affiliations of Fed directors from such banking and industry giants as General Electric, JP Morgan Chase, and Lehman Brothers pose 'reputational risks' to the Federal Reserve System, the report said. Giving the banking industry the power to both elect and serve as Fed directors creates 'an appearance of a conflict of interest,' the report added...

Joseph Stiglitz — former head economist at the World Bank and a Nobel-prize winner — said yesterday that the very structure of the Federal Reserve system is so fraught with conflicts that it is 'corrupt' and undermines democracy.

Stiglitz said, 'If we [i.e. the World Bank] had seen a governance structure that corresponds to our Federal Reserve system, we would have been yelling and screaming and saying that country does not deserve any assistance, this is a corrupt governing structure.' ("Non-Partisan Government Report: Federal Reserve Is Riddled with Corruption and Conflicts of Interest," Washington's Blog)

So, no one should be surprised that the Fed is involved in another sketchy deal. Even so, this particular maneuver really seems to have hit a nerve with some prominent and usually even-tempered, financial bloggers, like Yves Smith over at Naked Capitalism. Here's Smith's take on the Fed's subterfuge:

This move reflects either criminal incompetence or abject corruption by the Fed. Even though I've expressed my doubts as to whether Dodd Frank resolutions will work, dumping derivatives into depositories pretty much guarantees a Dodd Frank resolution will fail. Remember the effect of the 2005 bankruptcy law revisions:

derivatives counterparties are first in line, they get to grab assets first and leave everyone else to scramble for crumbs. So this move amounts to a direct transfer from derivatives counterparties of Merrill to the taxpayer, via the FDIC, which would have to make depositors whole after derivatives counterparties grabbed collateral. It's well nigh impossible to have an orderly wind down in this scenario....This move paves the way for another TARP-style shakedown of taxpayers, this time to save depositors. No Congressman would dare vote against that. This move is Machiavellian, and just plain evil. (Naked Capitalism)

"Just plain evil." Maybe that should be the Fed's byline?

Anyway, Smith is not alone in her contempt for the Fed, but there are those who feel she may be off-base in her assessment of what is going on vis-à-vis the derivatives dump. Bank analyst Christopher Whalen at Reuters thinks that the transfer could be a sign that B of A is getting ready to throw in the towel. Here's an excerpt from the article:

...the move to put the derivatives exposures of Merrill Lynch under the lead bank could be preparatory to a Chapter 11 filing by the parent company. The move by Fannie Mae to take a large junk of loans out of BAC, the efforts to integrate parts of Merrill Lynch into the bank units earlier this year, and now the wholesale shift of derivatives exposure all suggest a larger agenda.

I don't have any access to inside skinny, but what I see suggests to this investment banker that a restructuring may impend at Bank of America. ("Is Bank of America planning for a Chapter 11?", Reuters)

"Restructuring"? So is B of A headed for the glue factory?

No one knows for sure, but the banking behemoth has been laying off workers by the thousands, slashing expenses, and raising fees while its stock has dropped 49 per cent in a year. These are hardly signs of a thriving business.

So, consider this: If you were in Fed chairman Ben Bernanke's shoes, what would you do?

Let's say the second biggest bank in the country is starting to teeter because it's loaded with all manner of dodgy (toxic?) derivatives that could blow up at any minute and take down the entire global financial system. Would you:

(a) Wait until the bombshell exploded knowing that the only choice you would then have would be to further expand the Fed's balance sheet by another couple trillion dollars, or

(b) Try to sleaze the whole thing off on Uncle Sam and let the taxpayers pick up the tab?

I'm not sure, but I think Bernanke may have chosen (b).

20111023-01	07:19	SteveB	"LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"
-------------	-------	--------	---

The subject of the article below—8000 homeless vets in LA, alone—makes me very angry. At least maybe they are finally doing something about it (a new VA project), but funds will probably be cut after the Super Committee deadlocks, the U.S. suffers further credit rating cuts, and, as I understand it, across the board cuts will be made to "discretionary spending"...

I know Bill Gates does a lot, and so do many other of the now famous 1%, but despite their increases in wealth, they don't seem to be taking care of these problems, even though most of them seem to support the wars, or at least did support them. I don't necessarily blame these folks, though. It just isn't getting done. A lot of us help the veterans and veterans organizations, especially we veterans, I hope. But it must not be nearly enough. Right? If not now, when? The rich are richer and the poor are poorer and need help more than at other times. Taxes are low. Why not now? We help even our enemies, like Pakistan?

I know the problems are big, but we are told we can cut all this money for the poor and charitable donations will pick up the slack. It doesn't seem to be happening and I, myself, wouldn't expect it to. This is, unfortunately, the legitimate role of the government and it is not fulfilling its obligations to its own most cherished.

But, I don't know, maybe the plight of these veterans is their own fault. What's wrong with them that they can't just try harder? Why don't they get off their lazy butts and look for jobs? Maybe they'd be better off if they paid more taxes? Why don't they fulfill their mysterious responsibility to society? I rest my case.

More lies: Michelle Bachmann (paraphrase), "My NH campaign staff has not resigned en masse. The other candidates are spreading false rumors to try to destroy me." The truth: it looks like all 5 quit and at some have gone to work for other campaigns. The chief said he called the national organization at least the day before the above response she gave to a questioning reporter. Even if she and her staff didn't lie, how could they be so ignorant as to what was going on in their own campaign? How can a person like this be POTUS?

"LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus" by Dr. Sanjay Gupta and Caleb Hellerman, CNN

Oct. 24, 2011, (<http://edition.cnn.com/2011/10/22/health/homeless-veterans/index.html>)

(Programming note: With an estimated 107,000 homeless vets in the U.S., Dr. Sanjay Gupta explores their daily struggles and the legal battle over a plan to help them. Watch "CNN Presents" Sunday night at 8 p.m. ET/PT.)

(Los Angeles) The connection seems obvious: nearly 400 acres of land set aside to house veterans and thousands of veterans who need a place to call home.

But Los Angeles' estimated 8,000 homeless vets have been barred from living at the sprawling campus for decades. The West Los Angeles property—some of the most valuable in the nation—was donated in 1888 to "establish, construct and permanently maintain" a branch of a national home for veterans, according to the original deed.

And for nearly a century, that's what happened: permanent veterans facilities sprang up, including a post office, a trolley system and housing for as many as 4,000 vets, said American Civil Liberties Union lawyer Mark Rosenbaum.

But "beginning with the Vietnam War era, vets were kicked out," said Rosenbaum, who's leading a class-action suit over the property against the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Now, a generation after Vietnam, the facility's abandoned buildings are off limits to the veterans they were intended to serve.

"It's a shame," said Carolina Barrie, a descendant of the heiress who donated the land. Veterans should be "given every single opportunity to rehab their lives—and if they have no place to live, a place to live."

The VA saw fit to lease parts of the property to several businesses. In September, the VA canceled three leases after rising criticism. But other entities remain on the property including a public golf course, a college baseball stadium, a theater and practice fields for the exclusive private Brentwood School.

CNN's initial requests to the VA for its side of the lawsuit were referred to the Justice Department, which said it wouldn't comment while the case is still pending.

Vet: 'I just wanted to die or go to prison'

Iraq war veteran Robert Rissman, 22, isn't part of the lawsuit, but he has spent years battling addiction, post-traumatic-stress disorder and homelessness. As an 18-year-old high school senior, Rissman signed up with the Army intending to "go to college and make something of myself," he said. "And the Army said they'd pay for it." He was deployed to Iraq for a year as part of a quick response unit that saw constant action. Upon his return to Colorado's Fort Carson, Rissman was diagnosed with PTSD. Nightmares and paranoia haunted him.

It got worse. According to Army papers, he once spent a day drinking and sitting on his bed pointing with the barrel of an illegal sawed-off shotgun in his mouth. "I just wanted to die or go to prison," he said. "And that was where I was headed and I knew that was where I was going and I was OK with that." After leaving the Army, Rissman ended up homeless in Arizona and later Los Angeles, where he "was doing a lot of methamphetamines" and "smoking a lot of dope."

Study: PTSD signals long-term health problems.

Accurate figures are hard to come by, but the VA in its most recent report estimates about 107,000 veterans find themselves homeless on any given night. Mental illness plagues 45% of homeless vets and 70% suffer from some kind of substance abuse, according to the VA.

Washington has OK'd $35.5 million to renovate various buildings on the campus including "Building 209 for housing facilities for homeless veterans," according to a bill signed by President Obama this month.

The facility would provide vets with 70 permanent housing units, far short of the living space needed to house LA's homeless vets.

The VA has launched an aggressive national plan with an ambitious goal: eliminating homelessness among veterans by 2015.

Under the joint program with the Department of Housing and Urban Development, homeless veterans get federal vouchers to help them pay rent.

This summer the VA granted nearly $60 million to nonprofit groups that help veterans, including more than $7 million to aid an estimated 1,800 vets in California. The money aims to prevent veterans and their families from slipping into homelessness by helping with basic expenses such as rent, utilities security deposits and moving costs.

Occupy the park?

Ron Kovic, whose story was made famous in the 1989 Tom Cruise film "Born on the Fourth of July," said the $35.5 million isn't enough.

Paralyzed in the Vietnam War, the former Marine has been working to improve VA treatment of returning troops since his own homecoming in the late 1960s. Kovic is calling for an occupation protest of the West LA property, not unlike the current Occupy Wall Street movement.

"If that land was given to veterans and if we were able to put at least a small percentage of what we're spending on these wars in Iraq and Afghanistan toward building a facility for homeless and disabled veterans," Kovic told CNN, "I think it would be one of the most honorable things we could do as citizens and one of the most honorable things that the VA could do to make up for the mistakes of the past."

U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, told CNN via an email statement that she's concerned about the rising number of homeless vets in Los Angeles and believes that "updated and new facilities are needed at the West LA VA."

"I intend keep working to make sure that Congress doesn't stop" with the latest improvements, she said. VA Secretary Eric Shinseki "has told me he is committed to renovating two additional buildings on the campus, and we intend to hold him and the administration to that commitment."

Meanwhile, VA attorneys have asked a federal judge to throw the ACLU lawsuit out of court.

"In fact, according to Rosenbaum the Justice Department attorney said, 'We don't believe that the VA has any authority or any responsibility to provide housing.' But Dr. Dean Norman, chief of staff of Los Angeles' VA health care system seemed to contradict that. "I think we have the resources with the community to end homelessness for veterans in Los Angeles," Norman said.

Norman said new housing is being created for homeless vets and those who need help should call 1-877-4AIDVET (1-877-424-3838) to start the process that will put them in safe housing.

As for Rissman, he's currently living at a halfway house in hopes of leaving his homeless life behind. He thinks the West Los Angeles property could help many more homeless vets win their personal battles. "It would get a number of people in off the street and get them doing what they need to be doing to get their life together," said Rissman.

Meanwhile, the judge has refused to throw out the case and has appointed a mediator to try and resolve the situation beginning this week. "I promise you that these gates will be open," said Rosenbaum. "We will win this case."

(CNN's Danielle Dellorto, Thom Patterson and Curt Merrill contributed to this report.)

20111023-02 07:54 Charis Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"

Dear SteveB,

I think vets have a special place in our society. They are upstanding citizens who put their lives on the line for us and make sacrifices (along with their families) for us in manners unlike any others. They secure for our country what no one else can—our freedom. In my book, freedom is so priceless we cannot even put a true dollar value on it so I personally have trouble relating this subject to others we've discussed concerning taxes, jobs and responsibility. The way I see it, they've more than paid any dues our society could possibly expect from them. I'm personally upset that Obama has decided their benefits should be slashed and I'm p*ssed off that Congress is voting on that now. I think this kind of sarcasm is unnecessary:

But, I don't know, maybe the plight of these veterans is their own fault. What's wrong with them that they can't just try harder? Why don't they get off their lazy butts and look for jobs? Maybe they'd be better off if they paid more taxes? Why don't they fulfill their mysterious responsibility to society? I rest my case.

20111023-03 09:26 SteveB Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"

Dear Charis,

You are probably right about the sarcasm. I guess I just don't know any better way to express my frustration at how things are going in our country.

And, the entire time this forum has been in existence, though I and others on the left have repeatedly offered real criticism of the left, its politicians, and even its policies and goals, I have yet to hear one person from the right (I consider you to be firmly from the middle, Charis. I think you see both sides.) admit that there is a part of society that we the people, via the hated government owes an obligation to.

If not these vets, then I guess no human in dire straits should ever be helped? Right? Sure would be cheaper government.

But maybe with such an admission of an actual responsibility, we could move the discussion forward to the plight of the middle class, the jobless, etc. But, of course, that is why the admission is not made, right? It might be a slippery slope down the path to spending their tax dollars on helping people who need it.

Maybe a little of the dreaded "redistribution of wealth" might be necessary!!! OMG! I haven't even heard any Republican admit any kind of equality as even a goal. I find that so extreme.

Does it ever happen in America that people need and deserve help (even from the government)? I think this article points to an answer.

20111023-04 09:52 SteveB Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

OK. Going forward, I want everyone to keep doing exactly as you have been doing, even if the group gets a little larger. You will keep fighting for your positions and beliefs and explaining your reason and citing evidence to back it up and offering possible solutions on a large range of topics, especially those with a political dimension.

The only difference will be that it will be better, I think, if you don't send emails to the entire group. Let me do that once a day or so. Send to whomever you want and also send a copy to me. I will compile and publish.

I was thinking about doing it this way...every day, usually very early in morning (I love madrugada!), I will publish the daily email. It will consist of one lead opinion or piece of writing. I will leave the floor open for comments on this subject or any other you desire...the same freedom we've always had. Every day, some of you comment of what I've said, others on what others have said, others present original topics which get other discussions going. I like that! Let's keep it!

So the second part of the email newsletter will be the lead article from the day before, including all the comments I've received that day. I will try to identify thread names, even if I don't necessarily organize by threads. Every day, you will have a pithy publication in your inbox, that you maybe contributed to, that you can pass on to people on your list, then they can do the same. The email newsletter will also give those readers an opportunity to subscribe.

This lead piece might be something I write or it might be something a group member wrote that previous day.

This would keep up the email to people who like it (Pam and I) while cutting down on email to more marginal but still very valuable group members.

We can start this immediately. But at any time, feel free to email anyone at the top of this email (our charter members) or anyone else in the group who carries on a conversation with you individually. But copy me if it's something pertinent to the group and let me do the mailing of everything to the whole group.

At the same time, with Charis, Pam, and Ben's help, I will get all our past and future content (edited only very slightly) on a website of some kind.

Website visitors will be able to sign up for the email newsletter (and contribute, haha).

Today I have taken the liberty (because it was available) to register the domain name:

<http://www.FriendsOfTheMiddle.org>

I also liked the "Our Say" and related names too, but the OWS group seems to have taken them. We don't have to use the above name, but it's there if you want to.

Now, who knows how to become a PAC? :-)

And let me know (via your normal emails or whatever) the user name you would like me to use for you.

And, if you prefer, you can think of all this as business as usual, I hope.

20111023-05 10:14 Charis Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"

Dear SteveB,

I guess I don't understand why people hate the government so much. It's not like Americans live under a dictatorship. The people in our "hated government" are there because Americans put them there. I don't believe that just because someone is poor they should be given everything. I'm more of a "teach to fish" rather than a "give them a free fish" kind of person. As to vets, they've done and sacrificed more than anyone else. They've done their duty. Should they be given a free ride for the rest of their lives? No, I don't think so. But are they in a league all of their own? Definitely. Like police and firefighters. A league no one else comes near to. Anyone willing to give their LIFE for us is. You simply CANNOT give more to someone than your LIFE. You simply can't compare that to anything else.

20111023-06 10:43 SteveB Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"

Dear Charis,

I don't think hardly anybody gets a real "free ride" from the government. I don't think any of us want that for anyone. Of course we want to make productive citizens of anyone we can. Unfortunately, some people are mentally deficient or have serious mental problems and can't be productive, or not very. We take the middle way here. Should people get a "free ride"? No one here has ever said that. Are there people we must help? Surely! But I'm having a devil of a time getting that admitted. I don't understand how we cannot all be on the same page on this one issue to help those "willing to give their LIFE for us."

These vets were good enough for the Army, though. But the right doesn't seem to think they are deserving. The left does, but has a lot of trouble getting the funding passed. Same old story. Of course we're not talking about everyone, or those who can but don't (largely eliminated from the rolls in the 1990's, so why the big deal now?). But we are talking about real people who really exist. Don't we owe them something? Can't it be admitted government has a place in this? No alternative is working, as I pointed out yesterday.

I use "hated government" satirically because Republicans don't seem to think the government has a place in these matters that involve redistribution of wealth. I disagree. I don't hate the government myself. I just hate corruption and greed.

20111023-07	10:48	SteveG	Fw: UUSC Action: Letter of Support for the Occupy Movement
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

from UUSC:

Sign the Open Letter of Support for the Occupy Movement:

http://actnow.uusc.org/site/PageNavigator/occupy_open_letter.html.

I stand with people around the country and the world who are calling for economic justice.

My values affirm that each person has inherent worth and dignity; that justice, equity, and compassion should be the guiding principles for human relationships; and that all people deserve access to the democratic process.

My recognition of the inherent worth of every person compels me to speak out against policies that privilege the demands of corporations over the human rights of people. I support the Occupy movement in its affirmation that protecting workers' rights and ensuring that basic human needs are met must take precedence. All people have a fundamental right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of themselves and their families.

I also join the Occupy movement in decrying the wealth disparity that leaves millions struggling for economic security. Policies and legislation that promote economic marginalization are morally unacceptable. Everyone is entitled to a government that recognizes and promotes basic economic rights. Justice, equity, and compassion should be foremost in our government's decision making.

Economic oppression is not only a violation of fundamental human rights, it is also a blow to democracy. When economic power is concentrated in the hands of a few and when corporations are awarded the same status as actual human beings, the democratic process is fundamentally compromised. Basic fairness requires that all people have equal opportunity to participate in political debate and to be represented in government.

I envision a powerful and radically inclusive movement for economic justice. I recognize economic justice as a right that is due to all people, regardless of race, ethnicity, gender, sexual orientation, language, religion, political or other opinion, immigration status, national or social origin, property, birth, or other status or distinction.

I sign this letter as an expression of gratitude to all who are working for economic justice in the United States and around the world, as an affirmation of my hope for fair and compassionate economic reforms, and as a renewal of my commitment to help make it so.

20111023-08	10:58	Art	Re: UUSC Action: Letter of Support for the Occupy Movement
-----------------------------	-------	-----	--

Dear SteveG,

Good stuff, thanks.

20111023-09	10:59	SteveB	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

Dear Group,

OK, charter members. Please use the above updated addresses for our core group. SteveG has a different one.

My wife, Marcela, suggested that people who have too many emails in their inbox could get another address just for these emails. She also likes the immediacy of the emails, but better than chat. Just a thought. Do that if you want, but I still will do the compilation thing, starting tomorrow, of today's stuff, even though I'm still sending my replies out to everyone. Tomorrow, my part will be different. If you only write to me, I may answer just to you, but I will publish to the group. If you write to others and copy me, everything will look the same, pretty much.

Thank you, all!!!!

20111023-10 11:12 SteveB Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear Group,

Tomorrow you will receive the first email newsletter (write bunches of stuff today to be in it!).

One copy will be from : FriendsOfTheMiddle@hotmail.com.

A second copy, tomorrow only, will be from my normal email address, just in case the above newsletter gets in your Junk box.

Be sure to add the above address to your safe list or add the address to your contact list. It is what you will want to use from me from now on. Thank you.

20111023-11 11:27 SteveB Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

Dear Group,

Here's the same email with my new political-only email address. After tomorrow, unless you specifically ask, I will only bother all of you once a day. Pam and GaryC, I'm gonna bother you all the time!

20111023-12 11:55 Pam Re: No Wonder...

Nothing is ever simple. It helps to have all the facts, which this group is good at ferreting out.

20111023-13 12:00 Pam Re: No Wonder...

Dear Dale,

I'm glad to know about this.

20111023-14 17:32 Dennis "Nine Policies Conservatives Were For Long Before They Were Against Them"

Why would you trust proven lying hypocrites?

"Nine Policies Conservatives Were For Long Before They Were Against Them" by Joshua Holland, AlterNet

Sept. 23, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/152447/>)

In 2001, the GOP's budget guru, Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wisconsin, was excited for the opportunity to vote for Bush's "temporary" tax cuts. "I think we ought to have this income tax cut fast ... to make sure we get a good punch into the economy, juice the economy to make sure that we can avoid a hard landing," he said at a committee hearing. "The economy has soured," he continued. "And it is my concern that if we keep waiting and seeing we won't give the economy the boost it needs right now."

Fast forward 10 years, to this August. President Obama was poised to call for an extension of a payroll tax break—and an additional break for businesses—and Ryan began singing a very different tune. "Those things are all temporary," he told Fox News. "They are demand-sided. And they are proven not to work and they still facilitate uncertainty for businesses." Suddenly, tax cuts—the GOP's answer to every economic issue of the past four decades—were "proven not to work."

"What's plaguing our economy today," he said, is "the amount of uncertainty as to what the future holds for them on regulations, on taxes, on interest rates and all of those things." He said that the temporary nature of the cuts "exactly exacerbates those problems."

Obama had made a point of the fact that the proposals contained in his jobs package had all been embraced by Republicans in the past, but that didn't prevent them from bashing it, just as they had decried many other erstwhile conservative ideas as so much misguided "socialism" when proposed by Democrats.

Before the memory-hole swallows them up, consider nine other ideas that Republicans had long championed, and were then picked up by Democrats and became toxic within the GOP caucus. They tell us not only how serious Republicans are about undermining the administration, but also how far both parties have lurched to the right—the Democrats are offering inherently conservative proposals to deal with the problems we face, and today's Right considers those policies to be way out in left field.

1. The Healthcare Mandate

Late last year, when a federal judge ruled against the mandate (two other courts disagreed, and the Supreme Court will end up deciding the question), Senator Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, rejoiced. "Today is a great day for liberty," he said. "Congress must obey the Constitution rather than make it up as we go along." It was an odd testament to freedom, given that Hatch himself co-sponsored a healthcare reform bill built around an individual mandate in the late 1990s.

Journalist Steve Benen noted that while "the record here may be inconvenient for the right ... it's also unambiguous: the mandate Republicans currently hate was their idea."

It was championed by the Heritage Foundation ... Nixon embraced it in the 1970s, and George H.W. Bush kept it going in the 1980s. For years, it was touted by the likes of John McCain, Mitt Romney, Scott Brown, Chuck Grassley, Bob Bennett, Tommy Thompson, Lamar Alexander, Lindsey Graham, John Thune, Judd Gregg, and many other ... notable GOP officials.

According to NPR, the mandate was the Right's response to progressive proposals to establish a single-payer system. Mark Pauly, the conservative economist widely credited with the idea, explained that "a group of economists and health policy people, market-oriented, sat down and said, 'Let's see if we can come up with a health reform proposal that would preserve a role for markets but would also achieve universal coverage.'"

2. Cap and Trade

A central tenet of traditionally conservative economic thinking is that you tax activities you want to deter as an alternative to regulating them out of existence. This was the thinking behind "cap and trade" policies to control pollution—it was the "free market" approach.

The ideas had been floating around for some time in broad terms, but it was the Reagan White House that developed the first proposals for a cap and trade program. It gained momentum during the first Bush administration when, according to a history of the concept in Smithsonian Magazine, George H. W. Bush decided that "cap-and-trade still beats command-and-control regulation." Cap and trade is decidedly business-friendly, as Smithsonian noted:

The cap-and-trade system continues to let polluters figure out the least expensive way to reduce their acid rain emissions. As a result, the law costs utilities just $3 billion annually, not $25 billion, according to a recent study in the Journal of Environmental Management; by cutting acid rain in half, it also generates an estimated $122 billion a year in benefits from avoided death and illness, healthier lakes and forests, and improved visibility on the Eastern Seaboard.

Today, some 20 years later, this signature, market-based, business-friendly alternative to "Big Government" regulations is just another "job-killing tax" according to a significant majority of Republicans.

The "Pledge to America: the 2010 Republican Agenda" promised to "oppose attempts to impose a national 'cap and trade' energy tax."

3. Small Business Tax Credits

Perhaps the most blatant flip-flop on policy was Republicans' sudden concerns that a bill that would have provided $30 billion to encourage banks to lend to small businesses and another $12 billion in tax credits targeted directly at them was a form of "government overreach." But last July, Reuters reported that "some Republicans have cast the small-business proposal as part of what they consider government overreach by the Obama administration." They ended up blocking passage of the proposal because they were angry that "Democrats shut them out from amending the package."

4. Infrastructure Bank

In the not-at-all-distant past, this was another idea for a market-based, "public-private" partnership that virtually everyone could get behind. "A national infrastructure bank is a great place to start securing the funding we need to increase our mobility, create jobs and enhance our global competitiveness," said Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue—not known as a socialist—last year. "With a modest initial investment of $10 billion, a national infrastructure bank could leverage up to $600 billion in private investments to repair, modernize and expand our ailing infrastructure system."

Kay Bailey Hutchinson, a conservative senator from Texas, and senator James Inhofe, R-Oklahoma, among the most conservative members of Congress, have each co-sponsored legislation to set up an infrastructure bank in just the past two years. A recent study found that 85 percent of Republicans, 84 percent of self-identified conservatives and 80 percent of Tea Party fans favored more public/private partnerships to tackle the nation's problems, and two-thirds of voters "say that making improvements in infrastructure is very important."

But now that it's a centerpiece of Obama's jobs plan, conservatives have come to view an infrastructure bank as, in the words of the Heritage Foundation, "one idea that...progressives have been flogging for the past few years... [that] would do little to spur the economic recovery—and nothing to create new jobs."

5. Supplier-Side Cuts to Medicare

For two years, the GOP has made a big issue of $500 billion in "Medicare cuts" contained in the Dems' healthcare reform bill—a claim that is "misleading" at best. The cuts come from reforms in the way Medicare providers are compensated, not out of beneficiaries' hides.

The GOP-controlled House then passed a budget along party lines with those very same cuts, but they nonetheless continue to blast them. During a recent GOP presidential debate, Michele Bachmann, R-Minnesota, said that seniors "know in Obamacare the president of the United States took away $500 billion—a half-trillion dollars—out of Medicare, shifted it to Obamacare to pay for younger people."

But as Jill Lawrence noted, the rhetoric represents "a dizzying role reversal from the days when Republicans used to recommend the same types of reductions in future Medicare spending." In 1995, for instance, Republicans proposed cutting $270 billion over seven years. In 1997, McConnell and McCain were among the Republicans voting for a Balanced Budget Act that cut Medicare by $115 billion over five years. And in his 2008 presidential campaign, McCain proposed combined Medicare and Medicaid cuts of $1.3 trillion over 10 years.

Lawrence notes that McCain later, "led the fight against the Democrats' plans to trim Medicare."

6. Financial Disclosure Laws

Lawrence also noted that "prominent Republicans have often made the case that transparency—not limits on campaign spending or contributions—is the best antidote to corruption."

"Republicans are in favor of disclosure," Sen. Mitch McConnell said on NBC's "Meet the Press" in 2000. Seven years later, on the same program, House GOP leader John Boehner declared: "Sunlight is the best disinfectant."

But, she adds, those same Republicans voted against the DISCLOSE Act last year. According to the current GOP line, requiring companies to disclose their contributions "is a punitive measure for associations of persons who choose to exercise their right to free political speech as guaranteed by the Constitution, and affirmed in the Citizens United v. FEC case."

7. Encouraging Low-income Home Ownership

As I noted last year, perhaps the most pernicious right-wing lie of late is that the Wall Street hustlers who came close to bringing the global economy to its knees in 2008 were just innocent victims of government-sponsored programs that forced them to lower lending standards in a misguided effort to increase home ownership among the poor (read: dark-skinned).

It's an alluring story line for those who are ideologically predisposed to blame "inner city" people instead of MBAs in suits roaming the executive suite. It's also patent nonsense—a Big Lie that has nonetheless become an object of almost religious belief for some on the Right.

But it's not just that the story isn't in any way grounded in objective reality. What makes it even more disgraceful is that conservatives have long argued that efforts to increase home ownership among low-income families and communities of color was the "free market" thing to do (and have, to some degree, negated the need for a decent social safety net). It was George W. Bush, not Vladimir Lenin, who said in a 2002 speech, "We have a problem here in America...a homeownership gap," and added, "We've got to work together to close [the gap] for the good of our country."

The New York Times reported, "From his earliest days in office, Bush paired his belief that Americans do best when they own their own homes with his conviction that markets do best when left alone."

Bush pushed hard to expand home ownership, especially among minority groups, an initiative that dovetailed with both his ambition to expand Republican appeal and the business interests of some of his biggest donors. But his housing policies and hands-off approach to regulation encouraged lax lending standards.

This stuff was standard American Enterprise Institute-quality conservative fare until it became a handy way of diverting blame away from the titans of Wall Street. Then it became the root cause of the Great Recession.

8. The Fairness Doctrine

Beginning in the 1970s, deep-pocketed conservative donors started investing in their own dedicated, ideologically driven media to counteract what they perceived as "liberal bias" in the corporate media. In the 1980s, those efforts began to bear fruit, and at about the same time, right-wingers came to dominate the talk-radio airwaves.

The Fairness Doctrine, which required broadcasters taking advantage of public airwaves to present both sides of political controversies, was abandoned in 1987, but that didn't stop the GOP from freaking out about it when Obama was elected. "Freedom of speech is under attack in this country," said Sen. Jim DeMint, R-South Carolina. "I am just committing today to use every rule, every tactic that we have at our disposal to keep the Fairness Doctrine from moving in Congress or to overrule it if it is implemented by the FCC."

"Bringing back the Fairness Doctrine today would amount to government control over political views expressed on the airwaves," said Rep. Mike Pence, R-Indiana.

But as First Amendment attorney Robert Corn Revere notes, with so much hostility toward the fairness doctrine coming from the Right, "it is easy to forget that many prominent conservatives championed the doctrine before its demise."

Phyllis Schlafly was a vocal proponent of the Fairness Doctrine because of what she described as "the outrageous and blatant anti-Reagan bias of the TV network newscasts," and she testified at the FCC in the 1980s in support of the policy "to serve as a small restraint on the monopoly power wielded by Big TV Media."

Senator Jesse Helms was another long-time advocate of the Fairness Doctrine, and conservative groups Accuracy in Media and the American Legal Foundation actively pursued fairness complaints at the FCC against network newscasts.

More recently, a Republican controlled FCC under Kevin Martin has advocated far more extensive controls over broadcast and cable programming, including news and public affairs. These proposed regulations include requirements governing local programming, restrictions on the use of video news releases, and other new rules that would extend content controls beyond broadcasting.

9. Judicial Restraint

It wouldn't be fair to say that conservatives were before judicial activism before they were against it. More accurately, most people don't grasp what the term means, and they've come to use it as a euphemism for "court rulings we really don't like."

But it is true that they constantly rail against judges "legislating from the bench." And it's also true that it is far more common for right-leaning jurists to do so than those of a liberal bent. The charge is pure projection.

That is what several studies have concluded. Media Matters offered a run-down of a couple of prominent ones:

A 2005 study by Yale University law professor Paul Gewirtz and Yale Law School graduate Chad Golder showed that among Supreme Court justices at that time, those most frequently labeled "conservative" were among the most frequent practitioners of at least one brand of judicial activism—the tendency to strike down statutes passed by Congress. Those most frequently labeled "liberal" were the least likely to strike down statutes passed by Congress.

A 2007 study published by University of Chicago law professor Thomas J. Miles and Cass R. Sunstein... used a different measurement of judicial activism: the tendency of judges to strike down decisions by federal regulatory agencies. Sunstein and Miles found that by this definition, the Supreme Court's "conservative" justices were the most likely to engage in "judicial activism" while the "liberal" justices were most likely to exercise "judicial restraint."

There you have it: from eschewing the "magic" of market-based solutions to opposing tax credits for businesses, we see in the conservative coalition an almost perfect ideological flexibility. The only constant is that whatever policies Democrats propose—even those conservatives previously championed—are foreign and beyond the pale.

20111023-15	20:30	SteveG	"The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)
-------------	-------	--------	--

http://www.fdrheritage.org/bill_of_rights.htm

On Jan. 11, 1944, in the midst of World War II, President Roosevelt spoke forcefully and eloquently about the greater meaning and higher purpose of American security in a post-war America. The principles and ideas conveyed by FDR's words matter as much now as they did over sixty years ago, and the Franklin D. Roosevelt American Heritage Center is proud to reprint a selection of FDR's vision for the security and economic liberty of the American people in war and peace.

"The Economic Bill of Rights"

Excerpt from President Roosevelt's Jan. 11, 1944 message to the Congress of the United States on the State of the Union

It is our duty now to begin to lay the plans and determine the strategy for the winning of a lasting peace and the establishment of an American standard of living higher than ever before known. We cannot be content, no matter how high that general standard of living may be, if some fraction of our people—whether it be one-third or one-fifth or one-tenth—is ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-housed, and insecure.

This Republic had its beginning, and grew to its present strength, under the protection of certain inalienable political rights—among them the right of free speech, free press, free worship, trial by jury, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. They were our rights to life and liberty.

As our nation has grown in size and stature, however—as our industrial economy expanded—these political rights proved inadequate to assure us equality in the pursuit of happiness.

We have come to a clear realization of the fact that true individual freedom cannot exist without economic security and independence. "Necessitous men are not free men." People who are hungry and out of a job are the stuff of which dictatorships are made.

In our day these economic truths have become accepted as self-evident. We have accepted, so to speak, a second Bill of Rights under which a new basis of security and prosperity can be established for all—regardless of station, race, or creed.

Among these are:

1. The right to a useful and remunerative job in the industries or shops or farms or mines of the nation.
2. The right to earn enough to provide adequate food and clothing and recreation.
3. The right of every farmer to raise and sell his products at a return which will give him and his family a decent living.
4. The right of every businessman, large and small, to trade in an atmosphere of freedom from unfair competition and domination by monopolies at home or abroad.
5. The right of every family to a decent home.
6. The right to adequate medical care and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health.
7. The right to adequate protection from the economic fears of old age, sickness, accident, and unemployment.
8. The right to a good education.

All of these rights spell security. And after this war is won we must be prepared to move forward, in the implementation of these rights, to new goals of human happiness and well-being.

America's own rightful place in the world depends in large part upon how fully these and similar rights have been carried into practice for our citizens.

Source: The Public Papers & Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt (Samuel Rosenman, ed.), Vol. XIII (NY: Harper, 1950), 40-42

"Necessitous men," says the Lord Chancellor, in Vernon v Bethell, 2 (1762), "are not, truly speaking, free men; but, to answer a present emergency, will submit to any terms that the crafty may impose on them."

20111024-01	06:34	SteveB	Re: "The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveG,

Good 'ole FDR! Now there was a good socialist President. :-)

I wish these things were rights, but I guess they aren't because we can't afford them anymore. It's strange that during the depths of the Great Depression, they were able to imagine that we, as a nation, could fulfill our collective dreams. Now, in the midst of the great lies, dreams are destroyed and lie strewn across the jobless landscape. We don't even have the will to dream any more. Geez! I'd give a prize to anyone who can put it more dramatically than that.

OK, I'm at work on "Friends of the Middle Newsletter #1". Thanks for the article!

20111024-02 07:33 SteveG Re: "The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)

Dear SteveB,

If they become our priorities they are achievable, but as we know none of these issues are really our country's priorities in 2011. As a nation you are right, we do not dream anymore.

20111024-03 10:55 SteveB Re: "The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)

Yes, we went to the moon didn't we? Now we're hitching rides on Virgin and the Chinese will own the moon.

Things are so much more difficult after you have given away your manufacturing base. Only three things actually create real wealth in a given society:

1. mining, drilling, etc. (w/ some other energy production—atomic, solar, wind, etc.)
2. farming
3. manufacturing

Notice that importing, banking, engineering, medicine, lawyering, teaching, cooking, and many other worthy professions don't make the list. All fields except the three listed simply move money around, usually from the bottom to the top, more seldom the other way around.

- #1—mining—is declining in our country and that's the way most of us want it for now
- #2—farming—is stationary or declining, though I think we want it reversed
- #3—manufacturing—because of #1 & #2 not performing that well, losing any of #3 really hurts, and we've lost mucho!

20120112-01 07:19 SteveB Re: WMDs—"Yellowcake Uranium Found In Iraq, Bush Was Right! Well, Not So Much"

"Yellowcake Uranium Found In Iraq, Bush Was Right! Well, Not So Much" by Logan Murphy, C&L

July 5, 2008, (<http://crooksandliars.com/2008/07/06/yellowcake-uranium-found-in-iraq-bush-was-right-well-not-so-much>)

This article from the AP was posted yesterday, reporting the sale and transport of 550 metric tons of yellowcake uranium from Iraq to Canada. Some of the leading right wing blogs were quick to hail the find as a significant victory for the Bush administration and proof of Saddam's WMD program, but as Daniel De Groot at Open Left Points out, their celebrations may be a bit premature, if not dishonest:

I noted last night that a supply of uranium from Iraq had been successfully moved to Montreal in secrecy.

If you check into this, you'll quickly find that the uranium:

1. Was not weapons grade.
2. Was well known to the UN and IAEA and was being stored legally by Saddam's government. It was legally in Iraq according to international law.

I wondered if the right wing echo chamber would use this as "proof" that the WMD claims were true after all. I got even better than I hoped, as not only do they use it that way, but they reveal how dishonest they are by the way they have done this. Top recommended post at Redstate:

"Yellowcake uranium found in Iraq, Saddam's legacy, Bush was right!"

Well...not so much.

original material ©2012 Steven W. Baker, all rights reserved