

FRIENDS OF THE MIDDLE

FORUM ARCHIVE — 2007-2011

Political Inbox:

2007-2011

Edited by Steven W. Baker for FRIENDS OF THE MIDDLE original material ©2012 Steven W. Baker, all rights reserved

Dedicated to my incredible daughters,
Laurel Elizabeth
and Marissa Susan, and to all my worthy friends at FotM.

Introduction and Excuses

This is a project I embarked upon six months ago, and that's just the editing part—an average of probably 15-20 hours a week. I wanted to do justice to special writing that comes from the hearts of friends, and I guess I'm just slow sometimes. :-)

The project has certainly been no chore. Instead, it has been fun and interesting, communication usually is. I have learned more than in the original moments of the emails because I've had time to reread and rethink things. I've appreciated that time.

I want to thank everyone who has contributed to this effort. To my wife, Marcela, who has brought me coffee, coca tea, and grilled cheese sandwiches at odd hours, so I could keep working, I offer you the love of our first kiss, which continues and grows, and I thank you for your help in all things.

The most important group of people for me to thank are the members of Friends of the Middle who have contributed their thoughts and feelings and a little part of their lives to this effort. Not that anyone knew, until maybe the very end of these emails, that they were doing anything remotely like contributing to some future ebook project. No, they were engaged in a higher purpose, simply trying to communicate with a friend. These are special people, also smart, knowledgeable, successful people, and that's why this project is so special. This compilation resulted from these people doing something to try to make the world a little better place, a world that might find the answers to its problems if led by people who care as much.

Thank you all, my friends! Thank you Pam, who has probably written the most words of any of us and they are thoughtful, well-written words, indeed; SteveM, who essentially ended my apolitical years by sending me emails that pi*sed me off, our argument continues, but we can't forget the great times we had traveling coast-to-coast when we were young enough to need to learn everything; Dennis, who kept sending me things that almost always made sense, even though I began thinking of him as a conspiracy theorist, but I finally concluded in the end at last that it's way past the conspiracy stage; SteveG, who has probably introduced us all to more good sources, information, and causes than anyone; GaryC, who wrote more interestingly from a conservative perspective than most of us have seen anywhere, he can make the Right seem almost logical, I swear; Charis, who welcomed me as a friend to a new and strange land and loves writing almost as much as I do; India, who took me around the world with her.

Thank you all so much for the words you have written and the treasures you have led us all to: AliceMarie, Art, Ben, Bill, Bob, BobK, BrentR, Charlie, Clark, Dale, DaveY, David, Dick, GaryF, Jim, Larry, Lianne, Marci, Marissa, Mark, Mary, Mike, SteveBA, Pat, PamB, Patti, Paul, Paula, Phil, RickF, Robert, Sandy, Susette, Tom, and Trudy.

The other group to whom we all owe a debt of gratitude is our F0tM Newsletter subscribers and readers, who now number almost 400 and growing. Everyone, please keep forwarding the FotM Newsletters to everyone in your Contacts List and, now, the link to this free FotM ebook!

Someone might ask: Why would anyone want to read 1856 emails and articles in 44 categories, consisting of about 977,000 words (roughly half from FotM members and half from sources), in a 1550 page, 20 Mb., PDF ebook? Simple! Because, for most of us, this was the first opportunity we had to describe a sort of philosophy of life for ourselves. It's all here. Who we are. What we value. What we want to change. What we fear. What our hopes and dreams of the future are. What we believe in and do not believe in. For those who know any of us or will, for our grandchildren and the future, I wish I had something like this from my parents...maybe as good as a video. For everyone else, the subject matter is one that will, I believe, prove to be a crucial time in American history, from 2007 through 2011 and into 2012 with the FotM Newsletters. Frankly, many of us hope this will prove to be the beginning of the transition away from the failed policies of both major political parties during most of our lifetimes.

And, as I have often told people as I have worked on this project, the end result is an undergraduate education in the inner workings of the Current Events of this important four year period. Few on the Right or the Left could read it cover-to-cover and not come away with an altered view of what's going on in America this century.

Political Inbox: 2007-2011 contains many valuable little treasures: President Obama's birth certificate and Inaugural Address, "William Jennings Bryan's "Cross of Gold" speech, The Treaty of Tripoli, which answers the question of whether the U.S. was founded as a Christian nation. Articles by famous people like Mitt Romney, Robert Reich, Alan Grayson, Noam Chomsky, Bill Moyers, Oliver North, Christopher Hitchens, and many, many more. The short period covered encompasses a lot of history: two important elections, the election of our first black president, the formation of the Tea Party, the Housing Bubble Crash of 2008, the Bail-Out, the passage of Obamacare, the transfer of power from the Republicans to the Democrats, then back to the Tea Party Republicans in the House, the stalemate, gridlock, and near default of the government, coming out of Recession, and, at last, the beginnings of a slow Recovery.

Lest I continue on and overstate my case, instead, please allow me to apologize for many lost emails, especially from the early period, many that I simply deleted, not having imagined this compilation or FotM. But, even then, if I or a friend wrote very much on any non-personal subject, or sent something very interesting, I tended to keep them. Much of the stuff I deleted was redundant material, most of the rest was personal. I probably received every one of the Obama attack emails from the Right at least a dozen times and tried to reflect a little of that in these pages. In very few cases does anything missing affect that which remains. Where that was the case, I have usually provided a few notes to compensate: [This is a note. —SteveB].

As time passed and the vision became clearer, I started saving just about everything, though most communications of an entirely personal nature do not appear in this compilation and, obviously, except in my own case, User Names protect the identities of FotM Members and Subscribers.

I can't explain the strange lull in email activity about and around the 2010 elections, other than to say we must have all felt a collective sense of dread that suppressed communications in that direction. Maybe we all knew, so nothing needed to be said, maybe I got discouraged and tossed it all, but I can't remember doing any such thing, nor would that be like me.

A Few Technical Things About Political Inbox: 2007-2011

1. To read this ebook online: http://www.FriendsOfTheMiddle.org/Political_Inbox_2007-2011.pdf.
2. To download this ebook: <http://www.FriendsOfTheMiddle.org/>. <right-click> on the picture of the ebook and, depending on which browser you use, select "Save target as..." or "Save Link as..." Then you can change the name of the file and determine where to store it on your computer. Also, if you open the PDF file in your browser (#1, above) or using the Adobe Acrobat Reader, you can select the picture of a disk to save the file.
3. Email: FriendsOfTheMiddle@hotmail.com.
4. There are two hyperlinked indexes. The first contains only the 44 subject matter categories and links to the main index of all emails segregated by category and arranged mainly by date, oldest first, but also by logical thread. All related links go back and forth. After you jump to an email, clicking that date code will take you back to that entry in the index.
5. In the body of the compilation, all emails appear strictly by date and time, oldest through news.
6. To navigate, click on Category Headings (back and forth between the two indexes) and Date Codes (back and forth between the main index and the emails. Red links are internal to this document, blue links connect to the internet.
7. Here is how the date codes work: DATE-ID = YYYYMMDD-##.
8. Training Link: 20120504-01. Try it, then jump back here. (If you're computer savvy, please excuse.)
9. See? It's very easy to get around and not get lost. Alternately, it can be enjoyable to skip the index and simply read the emails and articles in any order you like.
10. Many of the SUBJECT lines of the original emails have been changed to unify and better represent the contents of the particular THREADS of conversation.
11. Organizing the Categories and their emails is as much a work or art as a science. The largest categories ended-up being, basically, Economics and Taxes. I left these Categories broad because it's too often a toss-up, since many related subjects can be touched upon in any one email or article. Some Categories are very small, but they have very distinctive subject matter, so I tried to accommodate. I hope you will find the index easy to use. These same categories, approximately, will be used when the daily FotM Newsletter indexes are combined and organized into the monthly compilations.

12. As usual, please try to inform me of errors, inconsistencies, confusions, or any other problems that you find.

Salud! And, as Alan Grayson says, Courage!

--Steven W. Baker (SteveB)

FotM Editor/Moderator

FriendsOfTheMiddle@hotmail.com

<http://www.FriendsOfTheMiddle.org>

Conviction's Lies

To enter the realm of truth
Certainty must be left behind
With all the other forgotten
And lost things of this world
Neither hope nor love among them
Though bright beyond all imagining
Remember conviction's lies.

©1997,2012 Steven W. Baker

FRIENDS OF THE MIDDLE — FORUM ARCHIVE

Jan. 4, 2007 thru Oct. 24, 2011

 HEIRARCHICAL HYPERLINKED INDEX ******

POLITICS (Training Link: 20120504-01)
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — BARACK OBAMA
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — BARACK OBAMA CAMPAIGN CORRESPONDENCE
2008 PRIMARIES — HILLARY & BILL CLINTON
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — JOE BIDEN
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — JOHN McCAIN
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — SARAH PALIN
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — MISC.
2008 ELECTION — THE EXPERIENCE LIE: JOHN McCAIN vs. BARACK OBAMA
2008 ELECTION — SERIES: JOHN McCAIN'S FAMOUS SENILE MOMENTS OF THE DAY
2012 PRIMARIES & ELECTION
ATTACKS DIRECTED AT BARACK OBAMA
CONSERVATISM, GOP, TEA PARTY, ETC.
CORRESPONDENCE TO/FROM POLITICIANS, MISC.
LIBERALISM, DEMOCRATS, ETC.
MISC., POLITICS
THE RIGHT'S "LIBERAL" MEDIA SMEAR CAMPAIGN
THE NATION & GOVERNMENT
BARACK OBAMA, POTUS
CONGRESS
CORRUPTION, ELECTION REFORM & AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION
ECONOMICS, FINANCE, BANKING, BUSINESS, MARKETS, BUBBLES, THE DEFICIT, DECLINE & CRASH EDUCATION
ENERGY, OIL, GASOLINE, TRANSPORTATION & WATER
FOREIGN RELATIONS, TRADE, TREATIES & THE WORLD (OTHER THAN WAR)
GEORGE W. BUSH, POTUS
GUNS, INSURRECTION, ETC.
HEALTH CARE
IMMIGRATION REFORM
JOBS, MANUFACTURING & UNIONS
MISC., THE NATION & GOVERNMENT
NEWS MEDIA & FREEDOM OF THE PRESS
TAXES, RICH & POOR, CLASS WARFARE
THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
WAR ON TERROR, AFGHANISTAN WAR & IRAQ WAR II
WOMEN'S RIGHTS, ABORTION, BIRTH CONTROL, MASTURBATION & LGBT
OTHER
CAUSES, PETITIONS, ACTIONS, ETC.
FRIENDS OF THE MIDDLE FUN & DIVERSION
INTRODUCTION & EXCUSES
MISC., OTHER
OCCUPY WALL ST.
PHILOSOPHY, LIFE, ADVENTURE & ART
PHYSICS & COSMOLOGY
SCIENCE & TECHNOLOGY, MISC.
SERIES: THE "CHURCH" (CHILD ABUSE)
SPIRITUALITY & RELIGION

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — BARACK OBAMA
20080923-03	18:14	Ben	Fw: "A Conservative for Obama"
20081014-01	12:11	SteveB	Fw: "Sorry, Dad, I'm Voting for Obama"
20081021-02	17:00	SteveB	"In Endgame, Metrics Are Adding Up for Obama"
20081022-05	14:01	SteveB	Editorial Endorsement: "Barack Obama for President"
20081025-01	10:29	SteveB	Why Are So Many Republicans Endorsing Obama?
20081026-01	20:44	SteveB	Barack Obama Quote: "The Real America"
20081027-08	21:45	SteveB	Republicans for Obama
20081028-07	18:34	Mike	What Do You Like About Obama?
20081029-01	11:00	SteveB	Re: What Do You Like About Obama?
20091010-02	18:33	SteveB	Re: What Do You Like About Obama?
20081030-02	20:31	SteveB	"Raising Arizona"
20081030-03	20:50	SteveB	"Obama the Unruffled"
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — BARACK OBAMA CAMPAIGN CORRESPONDENCE
20080128-01	13:05	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries & Election
20080128-02	14:08	SteveB	To: Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries & Election
20080311-01	10:47	B. Obama	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Hillary Clinton
20080312-03	17:52	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Hillary Clinton
20080318-01	18:00	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Video of Speech
20080319-02	20:18	B. Obama	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Iraq War
20080320-01	18:31	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Hillary Clinton
20080324-02	17:46	G. Cohen	Barack Obama; 2008 Montana Primary
20080415-01	18:20	B. Obama	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries
20080507-02	18:50	C. Glenn	2008 Montana Democratic Primary
20080611-01	09:56	J. Carson	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Are you up to the challenge?
20080620-01	16:47	B. Obama	Declaring Our Independence
20080814-01	10:19	H. Dean	Fw A Book of Lies—your action urgently needed
20080815-03	10:02	SteveM	Re: A Book of Lies
20080921-14	18:01	SteveB	Re: A Book of Lies
20080822-04	18:58	D. Plouffe	Keeping Track
20080822-06	23:04	S. Schale	10 New Offices: Florida Campaign for Change
20080831-02	16:39	J. Fornof	Senator Obama's Campaign for Change in Hamilton, Montana
20080918-01	14:30	B. Obama	Solving Our Financial Crisis
20081006-04	19:03	D. Plouffe	Just Released: Full McCain/Keating Video
2008 PRIMARIES — HILLARY & BILL CLINTON
20080121-01	12:19	SteveB	Hillary Clinton's Lack of Experience
20080207-01	08:32	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080207-02	13:53	David	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080207-05	15:14	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080207-03	14:06	Bill	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080207-06	15:23	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080207-04	14:23	Mark	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080207-07	15:33	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080217-01	13:57	SteveB	"Hillary Hopes You've Forgotten—Have You?"
20080310-01	11:28	SteveB	"Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager"
20080310-02	11:35	Bill	Re: "Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager"
20080310-03	12:10	SteveB	Re: "Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager"
20080318-02	18:24	SteveM	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
20080319-01	09:19	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
20080324-01	21:00	SteveM	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
20080401-01	19:50	SteveB	"The Tall Tale of Tuzla" Hillary Clinton
20080402-01	09:21	Ben	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Bolivia

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080403-01	14:58	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Bolivia
20080413-01	09:02	SteveB	"The Hillary Deathwatch: Bill Clinton Opens the Old Bosnia Wound"
20080413-02	09:12	SteveB	"Do They Want Us to Hate Them?" Hillary & Bill Clinton
20080413-03	09:14	SteveB	Video: Hillary Clinton Laughs Off Question
20080426-01	12:20	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
20080501-01	09:56	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Evan Bayh & Hillary Clinton
20080510-01	18:04	H. Clinton	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
20080524-02	14:07	SteveB	To: Hillary Clinton; 2008 Primaries
20080602-01	12:05	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton, Bill Clinton in Stevensville, MT
20080605-01	14:58	SteveB	"Five Reasons Why Clinton Lost"
20080605-02	12:39	David	"How We Haven't Seen the Back of the Clintons Yet"
20080605-03	13:05	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton, John McCain
20080605-04	13:10	SteveM	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton, John McCain
20080607-02	14:40	SteveB	"The Comeback Id" 2008 Primaries, Bill Clinton
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — JOE BIDEN
20081022-01	09:55	SteveM	Joe Biden Gaffe: "Obama Will Be Tested by Russia"
20081022-04	13:37	SteveB	Re: Joe Biden Gaffe
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — JOHN McCAIN
20080516-09	12:32	SteveM	John McCain
20080516-11	14:38	SteveB	Re: John McCain
20080516-12	14:58	SteveB	John McCain; War
20080516-13	15:46	SteveB	Re: John McCain; Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton
20080523-01	13:56	SteveB	John McCain; VP Pick Pointers
20080605-05	14:29	SteveB	Re: John McCain Can't Win
20080605-06	15:03	SteveM	Re: John McCain (defense)
20080605-07	19:04	SteveB	Re: John McCain, Energy
20080611-02	13:59	SteveM	Re: John McCain; 2008 Primaries & Election
20080611-03	16:20	SteveB	Re: John McCain; 2008 Primaries & Election
20080611-04	21:00	SteveB	Re: John McCain; 2008 Primaries & Election, Barack Obama
20080802-02	15:21	SteveB	"McCain: The Most Reprehensible of the Keating Five"
20080803-08	15:17	SteveB	Re: John McCain, Keating Five
20080804-01	10:31	SteveB	Re: John McCain, Keating Five
20080808-02	20:00	SteveB	"McCain Madness"
20080810-01	15:54	SteveB	"John McCain's Skeleton Closet"
20080810-02	16:03	SteveB	"John McCain and Adultery"
20080810-03	16:18	SteveB	"Is John McCain Stupid?"
20080814-06	18:13	SteveB	Colin Powell on John McCain
20080818-06	21:07	SteveB	To: Keith Olbermann; "John McCain, Grow up!"
20080819-07	19:37	SteveM	1999 Arizona Republic Articles on John McCain (Chapts. 1-7), incl. The Keating Five
20080820-01	11:25	SteveM	Re: The Keating Five
20080902-05	19:53	SteveB	Fw: P.O.W.
20080909-01	10:20	Ben	Fw: McCain-Pain Bumper Sticker
20080912-01	07:12	SteveG	Fw: Candidates' Educational Backgrounds
20080916-01	08:28	SteveM	"Spotting a New Leader"
20080916-04	13:04	SteveB	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080916-05	14:08	SteveM	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080916-06	15:48	SteveB	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080916-07	19:08	SteveM	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080917-01	09:03	SteveB	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080917-02	10:07	SteveM	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080917-03	10:23	SteveB	Re: "Spotting a New Leader"
20080919-05	19:07	SteveB	This Is the Week McCain Lost the Election
20080924-12	17:29	SteveB	The Wounded POW Hero Ploy
20080924-13	17:52	SteveB	Panic!!

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080925-02	14:41	SteveB	"I Am a Republican..."
20081005-01	17:57	SteveB	"The Dumbing Down of the GOP" (Palin), "Guess Who's Not Coming to Dinner" (McCain)
20081010-04	21:10	SteveB	McCain-Palin Ticket Sinks in the Polls
20081011-02	09:33	SteveB	Overheard Conversation: John McCain & Rush Limbaugh
20081015-01	09:29	SteveB	"McCain's Mission Impossible"
20081015-02	09:45	SteveB	Say Something Positive, John McCain
20081019-03	13:10	SteveB	Overheard Conversation: John McCain & Rush Limbaugh, Part 2
20081024-02	16:32	SteveB	"McCain's Hero: More Socialist Than Obama!"
20081025-02	10:52	SteveB	McCain's Message of Change
20081027-07	18:19	SteveB	I Read the News Today, Oh Boy!
20081028-03	08:19	SteveB	Redistributing the Wealth Is a Bipartisan Activity
20081030-01	12:27	SteveB	"McCain Camp Trying to Scapegoat Palin"
20081031-01	16:15	SteveB	"The Low Road Don't Lead to Nowhere"
20081105-01	08:55	SteveB	"Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election"
20081105-02	11:47	Dennis	Re: "Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election"
20081108-01	08:55	SteveB	Re: "Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election"
20081106-01	08:33	SteveB	"Rifts Divided McCain, Palin Camps"
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — SARAH PALIN
20080830-04	11:37	SteveM	"Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values"
20080830-05	12:46	SteveB	Re: "Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values"
20080830-06	13:17	SteveB	Re: "Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values"
20080830-07	16:08	SteveB	Fw (from MoveOn): Who Is Sarah Palin?
20080903-03	17:06	Clark	"Noonan, Murphy Trash Palin on Hot Mike: 'It's Over'"
20080903-06	19:45	SteveB	To: Pat Buchanan; About Sarah Palin?
20080908-01	10:25	David	Fw: Photo: Patriotic & Likes Guns
20080917-06	17:55	SteveM	Fw: "Sarah Palin is the U.S.'s Answer to Margaret Thatcher!"
20080921-02	09:59	SteveB	Fw: Donate to Planned Parenthood in Sarah Palin's Name
20080924-03	10:18	SteveB	"The Twelve Lies of Sarah Palin"
20081002-01	10:07	SteveB	"Skepticism of Palin Growing, Poll Finds"
20081020-01	18:14	SteveB	Fw: Sarah Palin Debate Flow Chart
20081022-02	10:19	SteveB	"Sarah Palin Flunks a 3rd Grader's Question"
20081031-04	20:57	SteveB	"Palin Misreads First Amendment; Eagleburger: 'Palin's not ready!'"
20081117-01	09:58	Bill	"The Wild Wordsmith of Wasilla"
20081206-02	10:21	SteveB	"Despite Earlier Furor, Palin Shopping Continued"
2008 PRIMARIES & ELECTION — MISC.
20080215-01	16:08	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Barack Obama
20080215-02	18:06	Dick	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Barack Obama
20080215-03	19:11	Marissa	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Barack Obama
20080418-01	13:49	SteveB	Graph: Barack Obama vs. Hillary Clinton
20080422-01	09:38	SteveM	Fw: Election? 2008 Primaries
20080423-01	10:00	SteveB	Re: Election? 2008 Primaries
20080507-01	11:16	SteveB	2008 Indiana Democratic Primary
20080818-01	10:13	SteveM	Fw: "I'm Voting Democrat"
20080818-02	10:40	SteveB	Re: "I'm Voting Democrat"
20080826-02	11:33	SteveB	"The Election from Hell" 2008 Election
20080905-03	15:54	SteveB	The End of Two Political Dynasties?
20080917-05	17:53	SteveM	Fw: Presidential Candidate Comparison
20081010-02	13:43	SteveB	The Great Awakening
20081027-09	12:12	SteveB	Needed: A Populist Party of the Center
20081029-10	14:39	Charlie	Re: Needed: A Populist Party of the Center
20081029-13	16:00	SteveB	Re: Needed: A Populist Party of the Center
20081102-01	08:04	SteveB	"Sheepish, Proud or Set to Flip a Coin, They're Still Undecided"

2008 ELECTION — THE EXPERIENCE LIE: JOHN McCAIN vs. BARACK OBAMA

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080630-01	18:33	SteveM	John McCain's Military Experience
20080630-02	20:08	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Military Experience
20080701-01	15:45	SteveM	Re: John McCain's Military Experience
20080701-02	17:52	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Military Experience & Other Problems
20080701-03	18:37	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Other Problems
20080701-04	18:59	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Military Experience
20080701-05	19:14	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Military Experience
20080721-01	12:28	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Military Experience
20080801-01	11:03	SteveM	Fw: Executive Summary; McCain vs. Obama
20080801-02	16:31	SteveB	Re: Executive Summary; McCain vs. Obama
20080801-03	19:27	SteveB	To: Glenn Beck; Obama Radio Point 08/01/08 @ 18:45, Experience
20080801-04	20:19	SteveM	Re: Glenn Beck; Obama Radio Point, Experience
20080802-01	10:10	SteveB	Re: Glenn Beck; Obama Radio Point, Experience
20080921-07	14:58	Trudy	Fw: "143 Days of Experience"
20080921-12	17:21	SteveB	Re: "143 Days of Experience"
20081024-03	16:44	SteveB	"This Is Not a Test"
2008 ELECTION — SERIES: JOHN MCCAIN'S FAMOUS SENILE MOMENTS OF THE DAY
20080721-02	09:19	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08
20080722-01	10:21	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08
20080723-01	17:22	SteveM	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08
20080723-02	20:11	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08
20080724-01	10:27	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08
20080723-03	08:11	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/23/08
20080724-02	20:53	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/24/08
20080802-03	15:48	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/02/08
20080805-01	23:08	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/05/08 & Bonus: "Cindy McCain as Miss Buffalo Chip?"
20080806-01	20:56	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/06/08
20080806-02	21:06	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/06/08—Bonus
20080807-01	19:31	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/07/08
20080808-01	18:12	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/08/08; "John McCain: Profile in Courage? Older Than God?"
20080811-01	20:46	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/11/08 & Bonus
20080812-01	20:57	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080812-02	21:46	SteveM	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080813-01	08:29	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080813-02	08:54	SteveM	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080813-03	09:09	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080813-04	09:39	SteveM	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080813-05	12:00	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08
20080813-07	13:23	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08; "Rice Told Georgia to Avoid Conflict with Russia"
20080813-10	21:20	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/13/08
20080814-03	17:56	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/14/08
20080815-01	06:50	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/15/08
20080816-01	06:56	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/16/08
20080818-04	07:34	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/18/08
20080818-05	08:48	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/18/08—Part 2; "The McCain Doctrines"
20080819-08	21:08	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/19/08; "John Lewis: John McCain's Wise Man?"
20080821-02	11:29	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/20/08; "McCain Unsure How Many Houses He Owns"
20080821-09	19:44	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08
20080821-10	20:22	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08—Bonus
20080821-13	23:47	Dennis	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08—Bonus

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080822-01	09:52	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08—Bonus
20080822-05	19:44	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/22/08
20080825-01	21:15	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/25/08
20080826-01	10:13	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/26/08
20080827-01	00:32	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/27/08
20080828-01	15:03	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/28/08
20080829-01	06:55	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/29/08
20080829-02	07:40	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/29/08—Addendum
20080830-01	06:41	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/30/08
20080830-02	07:43	SteveM	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/30/08
20080830-03	11:07	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/30/08
20080901-01	16:58	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/01/08; "Palin Flipped on Alaska's 'Bridge to Nowhere'"
20080902-06	21:28	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/02/08; "Bushies Come to Palin's Aid"
20080903-02	16:06	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/03/08; "Obama hits Davis on 'Issues'"
20080903-04	18:33	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/03/08—Bonus
20080903-05	18:53	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/03/08—Bonus—Addendum
20080905-01	09:47	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/05/08
20080905-02	11:07	Mike	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/05/08
20080905-04	19:11	Mike	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/05/08
20080910-01	19:53	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/05/08
20080915-01	20:40	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/15/08
20080916-02	12:38	SteveG	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/15/08
20080916-03	13:01	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/15/08
20080916-08	20:31	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/16/08
20080916-09	22:01	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/16/08—Addendum
20080918-02	20:50	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/18/08
20080919-01	10:03	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/18/08
20080919-06	20:25	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/19/08
20080922-05	22:41	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/22/08
20080923-01	15:37	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/23/08; "McCain Loses His Head"
20080924-09	15:07	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/24/08
20080924-10	15:54	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/24/08—Bonus
20080924-11	16:17	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/24/08—Bonus
20080925-03	20:28	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/25/08
20080925-04	21:14	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/25/08
20081001-01	11:37	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/01/08
20081023-01	12:27	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08; "My Friends, That's Change That We Can't Not Believe in Disagreeing With"
20081023-02	12:36	SteveG	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08
20081023-04	14:38	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08
20081023-03	13:07	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08—Bonus; "McCain Says Obama Will 'Say Anything' to Win"
20081024-01	09:06	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/24/08
2012 PRIMARIES & ELECTION
20110516-02	15:33	GaryC	2012 Primaries/Election; President Obama
20110516-03	15:49	SteveB	Re: 2012 Primaries/Election; Republicans
20110516-04	15:53	GaryC	Re: 2012 Primaries/Election; Mitch Daniels Not a Socialist
20110516-06	16:21	SteveB	Re: 2012 Primaries/Election; Mitch Daniels Not Running
20110518-02	19:32	SteveB	"Horrifying: Newt Gingrich Wants to Make America 'Like Texas'"
20110523-01	08:38	SteveB	2012 Republican Candidates
20110523-02	09:06	SteveB	"AP Exclusive: Former Palin Aide Pens Tell-All"
20110524-01	13:04	SteveB	2012 Election & Fw: Alan Grayson

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110604-01	08:08	SteveB	"Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110605-01	18:08	Lianne	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110605-04	20:23	SteveB	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110606-01	07:29	Lianne	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110606-02	08:53	SteveB	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110606-03	09:18	Ben	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110606-13	18:59	GaryC	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride" President Obama
20110606-17	19:37	SteveB	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride" President Obama
20110606-18	19:44	GaryC	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110606-19	19:53	SteveB	Re: "Sarah Palin Revises History of Paul Revere's Ride"
20110606-07	11:19	SteveB	"Palin Defends Her Grasp of History"
20110610-01	09:29	SteveB	"Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse"
20110610-02	09:32	GaryC	Re: "Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse" President Obama
20110610-03	09:56	SteveB	Re: "Senior Gingrich Aides Resign Campaign en Masse" Sarah Palin
20110610-04	10:02	SteveB	The Beginning of the End for Sarah Palin
20110612-01	15:50	Dale	"Palin Emails Show Engaged Leader Who Sought VP Nod"
20110612-02	16:05	SteveB	Re: "Palin Emails Show Engaged Leader Who Sought VP Nod"
20110726-02	07:26	SteveB	"God Urges Rick Perry Not to Run for President"
20110808-01	10:30	Ben	Rick Perry's Texas A&M Transcript
20110808-04	21:05	GaryF	"Poll: Will Anti-Congress Mood Cause Another 'Wave' Election?"
20110816-01	08:37	SteveB	Rick Perry
20110826-02	16:58	Jim	Electile Dysfunction
20110929-01	08:36	Pam	Hillary Clinton in 2012?
20110929-02	12:49	Clark	Re: Hillary Clinton in 2012?
20110930-01	10:44	SteveB	Re: Hillary Clinton in 2012?
20111007-01	06:38	SteveB	"Romney: God Wants U.S. to Lead, Not Follow"
20111013-24	14:14	SteveB	Democratic VP Candidate?
20111015-01	09:28	SteveG	"Rick Perry Makes Post-Debate Gaffe: 'We Fought the Revolution in the 16th Century'"
20111016-01	06:01	SteveB	Re: "Rick Perry Makes Post-Debate Gaffe..."
20111017-07	09:35	Jim	How Can We Frame the Debate?
20111018-10	18:24	Art	Re: How Can We Frame the Debate?
20111019-03	09:23	SteveB	No More Pretending: The Republican Candidates
20111019-06	10:44	Ben	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-05	10:41	Charis	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-07	10:45	GaryC	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-12	15:26	Pam	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-14	15:57	SteveB	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-15	16:12	Charis	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-17	16:32	SteveB	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-26	19:34	Mark	Re: No More Pretending
20111020-04	06:20	SteveB	Re: No More Pretending
20111019-13	15:27	SteveB	The End of the GOP?
20111019-16	16:27	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111019-18	16:50	Ben	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111019-19	17:04	Phil	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111019-21	17:13	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111019-22	17:33	Charis	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111019-24	18:17	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111019-25	19:10	Art	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-01	05:56	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-02	06:00	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-03	06:17	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP? & William Jennings Bryan's 'Cross of Gold' Speech
20111020-05	07:34	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-06	08:25	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-07	08:32	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-08	08:43	Charis	Re: The End of the GOP?

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111020-09	08:47	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-10	09:08	Art	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-11	09:13	Clark	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-16	09:27	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-21	09:38	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-12	09:14	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-13	09:15	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-14	09:19	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-15	09:23	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-18	09:32	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-17	09:30	Art	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-20	09:38	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-22	09:55	SteveB	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-25	10:32	Pam	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-26	10:40	Charis	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-28	11:02	Pam	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-29	12:14	GaryC	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111021-05	07:10	Clark	Re: The End of the GOP?
20111020-19	09:35	Jim	A Middle Way?
20111020-23	10:01	SteveB	Re: A Middle Way?
20111020-24	10:12	Charis	Re: A Middle Way?
20111020-27	10:50	Mark	Re: A Middle Way?
20111020-32	18:55	Art	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-02	06:15	SteveB	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-01	05:47	Pam	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-03	06:46	SteveB	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-06	07:44	GaryC	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-07	08:52	Pam	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-08	09:24	GaryC	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-09	09:32	SteveB	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-10	09:35	GaryC	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-12	09:58	SteveB	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-14	11:08	SteveG	Re: A Middle Way?
20111021-47	16:22	Art	Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers
20111021-48	16:28	Clark	Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers
20111021-57	16:48	Pam	Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers
20111022-13	14:39	Jim	Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers
20111022-15	15:48	Charis	Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers
20111022-16	16:19	Clark	Re: Herman Cain & the Koch Brothers
ATTACKS DIRECTED AT BARACK OBAMA
20080312-02	23:51	SteveM	Fw: "Say What, Barrack?"
20080606-01	13:47	Mark	Fw: "Obama Explains National Anthem Stance" Debunked
20080607-03	14:57	SteveB	Re: "Obama Explains National Anthem Stance" McCain
20080607-01	12:52	SteveM	"Obama and McCain"
20080607-04	16:53	SteveB	Re: "Obama and McCain"
20080628-01	21:29	SteveM	Fw: Can Obama Legally Serve?
20080629-01	09:20	SteveB	Re: Can Obama Legally Serve?
20080713-01	13:38	SteveB	"Finding His Faith" Barack Obama's Religion [defense]
20080713-02	17:52	SteveM	Obama Says No to English as National Language
20080714-01	12:04	SteveB	Re: Obama Says No to English as National Language
20080721-03	09:29	SteveM	Fw: Obama's Gaffes
20080813-09	17:53	SteveM	Fw: The Obama Tidal Wave
20080817-01	15:33	Mary	Fw: No "Change" for Him!
20080817-04	17:36	Dennis	Re: No "Change" for Him!
20081006-02	05:16	SteveB	Re: No "Change" for Him! [to 10/5 duplicate]
20081022-06	15:14	SteveB	Re: No "Change" for Him! [to 10/22 duplicate]

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080823-03	12:43	SteveB	Barack Obama's Birth Certificate: The Evidence
20080823-04	12:45	SteveB	Re: Barack Obama's Birth Certificate: The Evidence & Other Smears
20080829-03	07:59	SteveM	"Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"
20080829-04	10:02	SteveB	Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"
20080829-05	11:16	SteveM	Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"
20080829-06	12:00	SteveB	Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"
20080829-07	12:39	SteveM	Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"
20080829-08	15:21	SteveB	Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"
20080902-01	13:15	Phil	Fw: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..." Colombo/Birther, etc. [& see 09/25/10, below]
20080902-02	15:35	SteveB	Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..." Palin
20080902-03	16:02	Phil	Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."
20080902-04	16:29	SteveB	Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."
20080917-04	15:31	SteveB	Fw: Defending Against the Republican Lies
20080917-07	18:05	SteveM	Fw: "Obama's Not Exactlys"
20080921-04	12:11	SteveM	Fw: Chicago Information
20080922-03	13:47	SteveB	Re: Chicago Information
20080921-08	15:22	Trudy	Fw: Change???
20080921-13	17:25	SteveB	Re: Change???
20080924-01	07:30	SteveM	Fw: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20080924-04	11:13	SteveB	Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20080924-05	12:23	SteveM	Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20080924-06	13:15	SteveB	Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20080924-07	13:35	SteveM	Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20080924-08	14:39	SteveB	Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20081006-01	05:06	SteveB	Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
20081002-02	10:24	Trudy	Fw: "Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street"
20081002-03	11:07	SteveB	Re: "Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street"
20081006-03	05:29	SteveB	Re: "Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street" [to 10/5 duplicate]
20081010-05	21:36	SteveB	"Anti-Obama Anger Erupts at McCain Events"
20081011-01	09:13	SteveB	Re: "Anti-Obama Anger Erupts at McCain Events"
20081013-01	13:21	SteveB	"The Man Behind the Whispers About Obama"
20081018-01	19:28	SteveB	"Cracking the ACORN Case"
20081019-01	08:25	SteveB	Fw: "What If the Candidates Lives Were Reversed?" [defense]
20081019-02	10:32	SteveM	Re: "What If the Candidates Lives Were Reversed?"
20081019-04	13:24	SteveB	Re: "What If the Candidates Lives Were Reversed?"
20081104-01	07:17	SteveB	"If Obama Had Campaigned Like McCain..." [defense]
20081020-02	18:16	SteveB	Fw: Joe the Plumber / Obama the Muslim [defense]
20081021-01	14:36	Phil	Fw: Illinois Politics
20081022-03	11:56	SteveB	Re: Illinois Politics
20081027-02	10:12	Phil	Re: Illinois Politics
20081027-03	10:20	SteveB	Re: Illinois Politics
20081026-02	21:34	Larry	Fw: "Straight Talk" to Republicans & Democrats
20081027-01	10:00	SteveB	Re: "Straight Talk"
20081027-04	13:07	SteveM	"Investors: Obama Rise Is Tanking the Stock Market"
20081027-05	13:33	SteveB	Re: "Investors: Obama Rise Is Tanking the Stock Market"
20081028-01	06:45	SteveM	"W Ketchup Exhorts Americans to Defend the Constitution"
20081028-04	10:02	SteveB	Re: "W Ketchup Exhorts Americans to Defend the Constitution"
20081028-02	08:08	SteveB	Lies & Damned Lies [defense]
20081028-08	19:01	Mike	Fw: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081028-09	20:30	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-02	11:14	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081028-10	21:59	Bob	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081028-11	22:54	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-03	11:20	Bob	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-04	11:27	Dennis	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-05	11:34	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20081029-08	13:11	Bob	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-09	13:39	Dennis	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-12	15:03	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-14	19:53	Bob	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081029-15	21:24	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081031-02	16:32	SteveG	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081031-03	17:37	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081116-01	06:03	Bob	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
20081103-01	07:59	SteveM	Fw: "The Standard Obama Response: 'I Didn't Know'"
20081103-02	12:20	SteveB	Re: "The Standard Obama Response: 'I Didn't Know'"
20081111-02	11:57	SteveM	"White Guilt Is Dead"
20081111-04	16:20	SteveB	Re: "White Guilt Is Dead"
20081120-02	16:02	SteveM	"Not the End of the World"
20081124-01	10:04	SteveB	Re: "Not the End of the World"
20081126-01	16:53	SteveM	Re: "Not the End of the World"
20081126-02	17:47	SteveB	Re: "Not the End of the World"
20081127-01	09:46	SteveB	Re: "Not the End of the World"
20081209-01	13:59	SteveB	"Obama Derangement Syndrome"
20081212-01	10:50	SteveB	Fw: Letter from John McCain to John Hinkley
20081213-01	04:25	BrentR	Re: Letter from John McCain to John Hinkley
20081214-03	11:28	SteveB	Re: Letter from John McCain to John Hinkley
20081214-01	10:46	SteveB	"Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors"
20081214-02	10:56	SteveM	Re: "Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors"
20081214-04	12:45	SteveB	Re: "Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors"
20090825-01	10:25	SteveB	"Attack on Obama Riles Beck's Advertisers"
20100526-01	13:17	Paula	Fw: Video: Fog Cutter
20100526-02	15:07	SteveB	Re: Fog Cutter
20100526-03	17:03	Pam	Re: Fog Cutter
20100527-05	23:29	Tom	"President's Socialist Takeover Must Be Stopped"
20100622-01	09:19	Phil	Fw: "Overwhelm the System"
20100622-02	10:07	SteveB	Re: "Overwhelm the System"
20100622-03	12:47	Dennis	Re: "Overwhelm the System"
20100622-04	13:01	SteveB	Re: "Overwhelm the System"
20100704-01	19:27	GaryF	Fw: "Happy 4th!"
20100705-01	19:15	SteveB	Re: "Happy 4th!"
20100803-01	09:08	Ben	"Why Some Republicans Want to 'Restore' the 13th Amendment"
20100804-02	09:44	SteveB	Re: "Why Some Republicans Want to 'Restore' the 13th Amendment"
20100908-03	19:37	Tom	"President's Socialist Takeover Must be Stopped"
20100909-01	07:10	SteveB	Re: "President's Socialist Takeover Must be Stopped"
20100910-01	07:59	Laurel	Fw: The Photos Say It All
20100924-03	12:06	SteveB	Re: The Photos Say It All
20100923-01	02:10	SteveBA	Fw: Motivational Poster: A Finger for President Obama
20100923-02	07:07	SteveB	Re: Motivational Poster: A Finger for President Obama
20100923-06	19:43	SteveB	Re: Motivational Poster: A Finger for President Obama
20100924-04	12:24	SteveB	Fw: "Stupid is, as Stupid Does....."
20100925-02	15:55	Dennis	Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..." [see 09/02/08, above]
20100926-01	07:44	SteveB	Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."
20110216-05	17:37	Dick	Fw: Are You Better Off after Two Tears of Obama?
20110225-01	19:09	Dennis	"Obama's Secret Plot to Bring 100 Million Muslims to the U.S." & "The Plutocrat's Coup d'Etat, Their Republican Allies & Their Democratic Enablers"
20110322-07	18:14	SteveB	To: Ron Paul: Impeachable, Imschmeechable! [defense]
20110513-01	18:55	SteveB	To: Ron Paul: Impeachable, Imschmeechable! Part 2 [defense]
20110606-10	15:44	Dick	Fw: President Obama's Expensive Visit to London
20110606-11	18:05	SteveB	Re: President Obama's Expensive Visit to London
20110615-01	09:31	Dale	Fw: What Charles Krauthammer Didn't Say
20110618-01	06:16	SteveB	Re: What Charles Krauthammer Didn't Say

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110701-03	17:55	SteveBA	Fw: A Short Quiz
20110914-03	21:05	Dick	Fw: 1% Tax on All Bank Transactions—HR-4646
20111018-04	11:06	Ben	Re: 1% Tax on All Bank Transactions—HR-4646
20111018-12	20:07	Larry	Fw: Where Are Obama's Girlfriends?
20111019-23	17:50	SteveB	Re: Where Are Obama's Girlfriends?
CONSERVATISM, GOP, TEA PARTY, ETC.
20080218-03	12:08	SteveB	"The 'Angry White Man'" 2008 Election
20080919-02	10:25	SteveB	Party Ideology
20080919-03	12:42	SteveM	Re: Party Ideology
20080921-06	14:17	SteveB	Republican Party Loyalty
20080921-09	15:42	Trudy	Fw: "Bad American"
20080921-10	16:37	SteveB	Re: "Bad American"
20080921-11	17:14	Trudy	Re: "Bad American"
20080922-02	11:12	SteveB	Re: "Bad American"
20081028-06	17:00	SteveB	Fw: Disunited States—Red & Blue
20081130-01	08:35	SteveB	The GOP: Hijacked by Evangelicals
20090107-01	19:05	SteveB	To Glenn Beck: Doom
20090117-01	10:53	SteveB	To Glenn Beck: Fired from CNN
20090119-01	12:56	G. Beck	Re: Fired from CNN
20090120-01	10:41	SteveB	Re: Fired from CNN
20090214-01	12:25	SteveM	Fw: Jimmy Carter: The Worst President in American History
20090214-02	15:02	SteveB	Re: Jimmy Carter; "The Violent Language of Right-Wing Pundits Poisons Our Democracy" Etc.
20090214-03	20:19	SteveM	Re: Jimmy Carter; Etc.
20090215-01	06:07	SteveB	Re: Jimmy Carter; Etc.
20090616-02	13:38	SteveB	To: KLYQ AM Radio; Rush Limbaugh & Glenn Beck
20090727-01	13:18	DaveM	Fw: "We the People Are Coming"
20090727-02	16:11	SteveB	Re: "We the People Are Coming"
20100113-01	11:36	Dick	Fw: Andy Rooney
20100215-01	22:57	Dick	Fw: Quotes: Thomas Jefferson
20100623-01	15:23	SteveB	Fw: "The Plan"
20100727-02	13:23	SteveB	"Right-Wing America: Rascism and Religion"
20100903-01	14:06	Dennis	"5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
20100904-01	01:01	Mary	Re: "5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
20100904-02	07:24	SteveB	Re: "5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
20100916-01	20:48	Mary	Re: "5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
20100917-01	11:42	Dennis	"This Country Just Can't Deal with Reality Any More"
20100922-02	12:46	Dennis	"Socialism in America? You Ain't Just Whistlin' Dixie"
20100923-05	15:47	Dennis	"GOP's New 'Pledge to America': A Pathetic, Destructive Sham"
20100924-02	08:22	SteveB	Re: "GOP's New 'Pledge to America': A Pathetic, Destructive Sham"
20100930-07	21:21	SteveG	"The Tea Party's Tension: Religion's Role in Politics" & Treaty of Tripoli
20101001-01	07:31	SteveB	Re: "The Tea Party's Tension: Religion's Role in Politics" & Treaty of Tripoli
20101008-02	17:17	Dennis	"White America Has Lost Its Mind"
20101009-02	08:25	SteveB	Re: "White America Has Lost Its Mind"
20101012-05	11:03	GaryC	"Revolt of the Accountants"
20101012-07	16:24	SteveB	Re: "Revolt of the Accountants"
20101017-01	07:49	GaryF	Fw: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?
20101025-03	08:39	SteveB	Re: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?
20101025-05	10:01	Charis	Re: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?
20101025-06	10:18	SteveB	Re: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?
20101022-01	17:23	Dennis	Tea Party Training Video
20101025-09	16:16	Dennis	"Tea Party Inc.: The Big Money & Powerful Elites Behind the Right Wing's Latest Uprising"
20101130-01	17:21	Dennis	"5 Right-Wing Scumbags Bankrolling Dangerous (& Plain Weird) Conservative Causes"
20101130-02	17:53	GaryC	Re: "5 Right-Wing Scumbags

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20101202-03	20:49	SteveB	"Anti-Earmark Tea Party Caucus Takes $1 Billion in Earmarks"
20101220-01	11:38	Dennis	"Glenn Beck Book Tour Makes Bizarre Visit to Heartland America"
20110212-01	16:06	Dennis	Joe, the Self-Made Republican
20110212-02	16:21	SteveB	Re: Joe, the Self-Made Republican
20110221-03	21:53	Tom	Video: "Rewriting Black History Month"
20110222-01	08:26	SteveB	Re: "Rewriting Black History Month"
20110226-01	11:10	Robert	Fw: Divorce Agreement
20110226-02	14:49	Robert	Fw: This Should Be Posted in Every School
20110227-01	07:28	Skimantom2000	Re: This Should Be Posted in Every School; Healthcare
20110227-02	17:58	SteveB	Re: This Should Be Posted in Every School
20110315-05	19:09	SteveB	"Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-01	05:43	Charis	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-04	15:22	SteveB	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-05	15:32	Charis	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-08	17:45	SteveB	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-02	12:17	Larry	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-03	15:10	SteveB	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus" Japanese Disasters
20110316-06	16:31	Larry	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110316-07	17:30	SteveB	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
20110323-10	12:09	Dennis	"3/4ths of Senate GOP Doesn't Believe in Science—When Did Republicans Go Completely Off the Deep End?"
20110323-11	12:20	Dennis	"Kochs Profit from Canadian Eco-Nightmare"
20110328-08	21:02	Dick	Fw: What Has America Become?
20110329-08	19:35	SteveB	Re: What Has America Become?
20110331-01	13:02	Dennis	"Will Republican Voters Believe Anything? The Right's Hyperbolic, Dysfunctional World"
20110420-01	08:59	SteveB	"The Donald Trumped on Abortion Question?"
20110422-02	17:16	SteveB	"Why Glenn Beck Lost It"
20110503-01	10:45	B. Miller	Friends of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Blog
20110527-02	17:25	Ben	Let's Just Call Them 'Fascists'
20110527-03	18:36	SteveB	Re: Let's Just Call Them 'Fascists'
20110606-16	19:23	SteveB	"New York Congressman: 'The Picture Was of Me, I Sent It.'"
20110701-02	12:39	Dennis	"If Ayn Rand & the Free Market Fetishists Were Right, We'd Be Living in a Golden Age—Does This Look Like a Golden Age to You?"
20110702-02	13:00	Dennis	"New American Socialism" & "An American Tragedy Brewing" & "One of the Most Obvious Frauds Ever Foisted on the American People"
20110702-03	15:26	Dennis	"14 Propaganda Techniques Fox 'News' Uses to Brainwash Americans"
20110704-01	08:02	GaryC	Re: "14 Propaganda Techniques..."
20110723-10	17:55	Dennis	"What Our Declaration Really Said"
20110723-11	18:47	SteveB	Re: "What Our Declaration Really Said"
20110724-01	23:04	Ben	Re: "What Our Declaration Really Said"
20110807-01	09:37	SteveB	"The Question Conservatives Can't Answer"
20110816-02	11:53	Mark	Fw: Quote from Cicero
20110823-02	16:13	Jim	Fw: Now You're Mad?
20110930-02	13:00	Pam	Re: Now You're Mad?
20110930-08	16:06	SteveB	Re: Now You're Mad?
20110930-09	16:14	Pam	Re: Now You're Mad?
20110826-01	09:13	Dennis	Tea Party Republicans
20110916-01	19:54	Dennis	excerpt from Between Race and Reason: Anti-Intellectualism in American Life
20110925-01	17:32	Dennis	Stephen Colbert Quote: A Christian Nation
20110927-01	17:47	Dennis	"Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"
20110930-03	14:58	SteveB	Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"
20110930-04	15:07	GaryC	Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"
20110930-05	15:14	SteveB	Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"
20110930-06	15:39	GaryC	Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"
20110930-07	15:51	SteveB	Re: "Rep. Paul Ryan's Class War"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110928-01	19:02	Dennis	Quote: Remember When...
20111004-05	13:02	Dennis	"The Big Picture: A 40-Year Scan of the Right-Wing Corporate Takeover of America"
20111004-06	16:26	SteveB	Re: "The Big Picture..."
20111011-04	12:17	Pam	Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich Exposing 7 GOP Lies?"
20111012-02	06:12	SteveB	Re: Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich..."
20111012-03	06:18	SteveB	Re: Video: "What If Everyone Saw This Clip of Robert Reich..."
20111019-01	07:50	Dick	Fw: Drug Testing Welfare Recipients in Florida
20111020-30	15:03	SteveB	"The Bible Has Some Shocking 'Family Values'"
20111023-14	17:32	Dennis	"Nine Policies Conservatives Were For Long Before They Were Against Them"
CORRESPONDENCE TO/FROM POLITICIANS, MISC.
20070711-01	08:30	M. Martinez	Sen. Martinez Newsletter
20070717-01	09:01	M. Martinez	Sen. Martinez Newsletter
20070725-01	08:13	M. Martinez	Sen. Martinez Newsletter
20070801-01	12:50	M. Martinez	Sen. Martinez Newsletter
20070725-02	10:18	S. Smith Jr.	Indiana Partnership for Prescription Assistance (PPA)
20070917-01	09:47	S. Smith Jr.	Indiana Education Standards
LIBERALISM, DEMOCRATS, ETC.
20081114-01	13:34	Charlie	"The New Liberal Order"
20100623-02	17:32	SteveG	Fw: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-01	12:12	Bill	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-02	14:39	Ben	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-03	15:19	SteveB	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-04	15:31	SteveB	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-05	15:57	Ben	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-06	16:05	SteveB	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-07	15:15	SteveB	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-08	17:18	Dennis	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20100624-09	17:32	SteveB	Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"
20110216-03	13:35	Dennis	"Sleepwalking Toward Plutocracy"
20110305-01	08:30	SteveB	Coffee Party
20110310-01	19:20	SteveB	"The Greatest Country on Earth?"
20110317-01	15:30	SteveB	"Get Up, Stand Up: Do Americans Have What It Takes to Stand Up to Corporate Power and Does Wisconsin Offer Hope?"
20110407-01	11:20	Dennis	"New American Socialism" & "An American Tragedy Brewing" & "One of the Most Obvious Frauds Ever Foisted on the American People"
20110826-04	19:45	Dennis	"Why Conservatives Should Be Heard at the Enough Rally"
20111017-13	11:15	SteveB	Things Americans Agree On
20111017-17	12:11	Pam	Re: Things Americans Agree On
20111017-24	12:54	Art	Re: Things Americans Agree On
20111017-14	11:31	SteveG	Re: Things Americans Agree On
20111017-19	12:16	Pam	Re: Things Americans Agree On
20111017-15	11:33	Charis	Re: Things Americans Agree On
20111017-18	12:13	Pam	Re: Things Americans Agree On
20111021-17	14:17	Pam	Diplomacy
20111021-18	14:21	Charis	Re: Diplomacy
20111021-20	14:26	GaryC	Re: Diplomacy
20111021-24	14:54	Pam	Re: Diplomacy
MISC., POLITICS
20100922-01	07:54	SteveB	"Jimmy Carter Hasn't Been Mincing Many Words of Late"
THE RIGHT'S "LIBERAL" MEDIA SMEAR CAMPAIGN

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080523-02	21:36	Dick	Fw: Media, Democrats, 2008 Primaries
20080524-01	10:10	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries
20080716-01	10:27	SteveM	Fw: Navy Petty Officer Mike Monsoor
20080803-01	10:53	SteveM	The John Edwards Story; Media
20080803-04	14:02	SteveB	Re: The John Edwards Story; Edwards & McCain Affairs, Media
20080803-05	14:35	SteveM	Re: Edwards & McCain Affairs, Media
20080803-06	14:42	Trudy	Fw: Bad American; Media
20080803-07	15:00	SteveB	Re: Media, McCain, Obama
20080823-01	08:21	SteveM	Fw: Did You Know About This? Iraq, Media
20080823-02	12:23	SteveB	Re: Did You Know About This? Iraq, Media
20080924-14	19:53	SteveB	Media Bias
20110216-04	17:23	Mark	Fw: A Reminder in History; Viet Nam
BARACK OBAMA, POTUS
20081105-03	12:54	Charlie	"Living History"
20081110-01	12:45	Ben	Cartoon: Emancipation Proclamation, Part II
20081111-01	10:31	SteveM	Re: Cartoon: Emancipation Proclamation, Part II
20081111-03	16:17	SteveB	Re: Cartoon: Emancipation Proclamation, Part II
20081208-01	12:29	SteveB	"Liberals Voice Concerns About President-Elect Obama"
20090111-01	01:43	Charlie	"Inaugurate This: Waiting for Barack Obama"
20090120-02	14:10	SteveB	"Text of Obama's Speech for His Inauguration as 44th President"
20100827-01	13:02	SteveB	"Obama Will Triumph—So Will America"
20110725-06	15:27	Mark	Americans Deserve Better
20110725-07	16:04	SteveB	"Obama's 5 Big Mistakes"
20110729-01	11:40	Dick	"President Obama Is No Longer Tethered to Reality"
20111003-01	14:00	SteveB	"The Word Obama Won't Dare Say"
20111008-01	08:06	GaryC	"Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-03	09:45	Pam	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-04	10:16	GaryC	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-05	10:58	Pam	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-06	14:11	SteveB	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-07	14:54	Pam	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-08	15:15	SteveB	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-09	15:28	GaryC	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-10	15:34	SteveB	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-11	15:58	GaryC	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-12	16:23	GaryF	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-13	16:31	SteveB	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-14	16:58	Dennis	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111008-16	18:17	SteveG	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111009-02	06:31	SteveB	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111009-03	07:50	SteveG	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111009-04	08:47	Pam	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111009-07	09:36	Mary	Re: "Feds Announce Obama Flip-Flop"
20111011-01	06:26	SteveB	"America Is Getting Soft"
20111013-02	07:45	SteveB	Why Democrats Don't Like Obama
20111021-16	14:04	SteveB	The Defeated Obama?
20111021-19	14:25	Clark	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-23	14:52	Pam	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-25	15:03	Clark	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-27	15:07	Pam	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-29	15:11	Charis	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-30	15:15	Pam	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-37	15:44	Charis	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-38	15:48	GaryC	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-40	15:53	GaryC	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-43	16:02	Charis	Re: The Defeated Obama?

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111021-44	16:05	Pam	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-45	16:07	Charis	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-46	16:14	SteveB	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-49	16:28	Art	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-50	16:33	Art	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-61	17:53	SteveB	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-62	17:59	GaryC	Re: The Defeated Obama?
20111021-69	18:26	SteveB	Re: The Defeated Obama?
CONGRESS
20070614-04	20:50	Dick	Fw: Shocking Senatorial Votes
20090116-01	08:07	SteveG	Fw: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-02	08:26	SteveB	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-03	08:46	SteveG	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-04	09:03	SteveB	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-05	09:17	SteveG	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-06	09:46	SteveB	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-07	10:10	SteveG	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20090116-08	10:25	SteveB	Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
20101009-01	07:26	SteveB	Fw: Heaven or Hell?
20110302-01	10:38	Phil	Fw: Letter to Sen. Alan Simpson About Social Security
20110313-02	18:15	SteveB	Re: Letter to Sen. Alan Simpson About Social Security
20110303-01	12:03	Marci	Fw: And God Created Montana
20110425-01	11:37	SteveB	Fw: Photo: Congressmen Playing on the Job
20110510-01	08:54	SteveB	Fw: 'Entitlement' My A*s!
20110605-02	19:53	SteveB	Fw: Corporate Sponsors
20110725-05	14:02	SteveG	Fw: "Why Boehner Cries"
20110726-01	06:58	SteveB	"Congress Continues Debate Over Whether or Not Nation Should Be Economically Ruined"
20110727-01	09:21	SteveB	Republicants
20110727-03	12:10	Dennis	Re: Republicants
20110728-01	10:34	SteveB	Democrats "In Retreat"
20110730-01	12:17	SteveB	"First Thoughts: A Game of Leverage"
20110824-01	11:28	Bob	"Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"
20110911-03	11:03	SteveB	Re: "Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"
20110911-04	21:32	Bob	Re: "Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"
20110912-01	06:00	SteveB	Re: "Congresswoman Makes a Slip—Whoops!"
20110908-01	11:51	Jim	Fw: A Group of Baboons?
20110912-02	21:03	Dick	Fw: Reportedly Dumb Traveling Congressmen
20110913-01	08:21	SteveB	Re: Reportedly Dumb Traveling Congressmen
20111007-13	18:52	SteveB	"Twisted Government Accounting Behind Postal Service Woes"
20111007-14	20:41	Ben	Re: "Twisted Government Accounting Behind Postal Service Woes"
CORRUPTION, ELECTION REFORM & AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION
20080813-06	12:24	Dennis	Fw: Lee Iacocca: Throw the Bums Out!
20080824-01	01:04	Dennis	"545 People"
20080824-02	11:41	SteveB	Re: "545 People"
20110808-02	20:47	Dick	Fw: "545 vs. 300,000,000 People"
20080925-01	09:55	SteveB	"Lobbyists in 'Feeding Frenzy'"
20091230-01	07:20	SteveB	Fw: Congressional Reform Act
20100201-01	16:32	SteveB	"Constitutional Amendment Picks Up Speed, Sort Of"
20100308-02	18:40	SteveG	Fw: Un-Elect Congress & Congressional Reform Act
20100310-01	07:14	SteveB	Re: Un-Elect Congress & Congressional Reform Act
20100401-01	08:16	SteveB	How Elections Work in Bolivia
20100401-02	09:55	GaryF	Re: How Elections Work in Bolivia
20100401-05	15:05	SteveB	Re: How Elections Work in Bolivia
20100707-01	09:14	SteveB	Fw: Constitutional Amendment Idea

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20100707-02	13:01	SteveG	Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea
20100707-03	13:23	SteveB	Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea
20100707-04	14:26	SteveG	Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea
20100708-01	16:55	SteveB	Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea
20100919-07	09:06	SteveB	Solutions
20100920-03	16:51	Pam	"Speak, Money"
20100920-04	17:35	GaryC	Re: "Speak, Money"
20100923-03	11:05	SteveB	Re: "Speak, Money"
20100923-04	12:03	SteveB	Re: "Speak, Money"
20100924-01	08:18	SteveB	"Hidden Under Tax-Exempt Cloak, Political Dollars Flow"
20100926-05	23:09	SteveG	Election Reform / Term Limits
20100927-01	08:32	SteveB	Re: Election Reform / Term Limits
20100927-02	13:37	Dennis	Re: Election Reform / Term Limits
20100927-03	16:08	SteveB	Re: Election Reform / Term Limits
20100927-04	16:11	Dennis	Re: Election Reform / Term Limits
20100927-05	16:21	SteveB	Re: Election Reform / Term Limits
20101015-03	12:01	SteveB	"Show Me the Donors"
20101026-01	15:46	Dennis	"The Supreme Court Sold Out Our Democracy—How to Fight the Corporate Takeover of Our Elections"
20101108-01	08:44	Dennis	"Obama's Biggest Mistake: Selling Out to the Bankers"
20101108-02	13:05	SteveG	Re: "Obama's Biggest Mistake: Selling Out to the Bankers"
20101220-03	19:12	Dennis	Excerpt: Make Members of Congress Wear NASCAR Patches
20110829-01	15:03	Mark	Fw: Congressmen Should Wear Uniforms Like NASCAR Drivers
20110309-01	10:42	Ben	Video: Republicans Attack Voters' Rights in 22 States & "Wisconsin Republicans Really Don't Want Me to Vote" & "Texas Attorney General's Wild Goose Chase"
20110327-06	17:02	SteveB	Re: Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110426-02	11:56	Ben	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110426-03	15:28	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110426-04	17:23	Ben	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110426-06	17:41	Ben	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110427-01	07:49	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110427-02	09:54	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110428-01	19:49	Dick	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110509-02	14:26	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110508-01	07:45	SteveB	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110509-01	10:17	Ben	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110509-03	14:32	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110607-01	09:05	SteveG	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110629-02	09:50	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act; Term Limits
20111016-03	08:28	SteveG	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20111018-06	12:39	GaryF	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20111019-02	09:15	GaryF	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20111018-13	20:24	Dick	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20111020-33	20:48	Charis	Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20111021-04	07:04	SteveB	Re: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
20110515-01	18:06	SteveB	To: Fareed Zakaria, CNN; U.S. Corruption
20110518-05	20:09	SteveB	"How Political Corruption Works in the U.S. of A."
20110525-01	18:36	Dennis	"Ways to Stand Up to Bullying and Corruption"
20110526-01	18:29	Dennis	Insider Trading by Corrupt Congressmen
20110806-01	18:06	GaryF	Quotes About Voters
20111013-23	14:11	Dennis	From The Post-Corporate World, Life After Capitalism : Corporations as Persons
20111013-30	16:41	Pam	Re: Corporations as Persons
20111019-04	08:39	SteveG	"The 99% Declaration"
20111019-08	11:33	Pam	Re: "The 99% Declaration"
20111019-09	11:51	Pam	Re: "The 99% Declaration"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111019-10	13:40	Art	Re: "The 99% Declaration"
20111019-11	13:57	Clark	Re: "The 99% Declaration"
20111021-11	09:44	SteveB	Un-Elect Congress in 2012
ECONOMICS, FINANCE, BANKING, BUSINESS, MARKETS, BUBBLES, THE DEFICIT, DECLINE & CRASH
20080516-01	10:35	SteveB	The Decline; Economics, Rich and Poor
20080516-02	10:57	SteveM	Re: The Decline; Illegal Immigration, Defense, The Border
20080516-03	10:58	SteveG	Re: The Decline; Eisenhower's Military-Industrial Complex
20080516-04	11:01	Dennis	Re: The Decline; China, Trade
20080516-07	11:30	SteveB	Re: The Decline; China, Trade
20080516-08	12:26	Dennis	Re: The Decline; China, Trade
20080516-10	13:11	SteveB	Re: The Decline; China, Trade
20080516-05	11:02	SteveG	Re: The Decline; Economics
20080516-06	11:15	SteveB	Re: The Decline; Economics
20080519-01	11:59	David	Re: The Decline; Libertarianism, "Nothing Gold Can Stay"
20080520-01	11:57	SteveB	Re: The Decline; Libertarianism, Weather
20080728-03	13:09	Dennis	"Lovable, Moronic Capitalists" Economics, Greed
20080920-01	09:48	SteveB	Republican Socialists: Bush & McCain
20081010-01	13:29	Dennis	Fw: "How Wall Street Works"
20081011-03	17:47	SteveB	"IMF Warns of Global Financial Meltdown"
20081015-03	10:58	SteveB	Fw: "The Party's Over"
20081202-04	15:32	SteveB	"An Interview with Paul O'Neill"
20081203-02	18:16	Charlie	"Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"
20081204-01	13:00	SteveB	Re: "Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"
20081204-02	18:16	SteveG	Re: "Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"
20081206-01	09:46	SteveB	Re: "Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"
20081212-02	10:51	SteveB	"Financial forecast: 11 bets for '09"
20081212-03	16:14	Ben	Re: "Financial forecast: 11 bets for '09"
20081219-01	12:54	Dennis	"Change You Won't Believe"
20081223-01	18:03	SteveB	To: Pat Buchanan; Free Trade vs. Jobs
20090211-01	14:45	SteveB	"Geithner's First Test Is a Disaster"
20090217-01	09:58	SteveB	"Metrics of National Decline"
20090303-01	11:17	Dennis	Fw: The Current Economic Crisis According to the Three Stooges
20090304-01	10:02	Ben	Video: "Shift Happens"
20090304-02	18:49	SteveB	Re: "Shift Happens"
20090305-01	08:22	Ben	Re: "Shift Happens"
20090305-02	10:44	SteveB	Re: "Shift Happens"
20100528-02	10:38	SteveB	An Economy of Smoke & Mirrors
20100528-03	11:38	Pam	Re: An Economy of Smoke & Mirrors
20100609-02	17:41	SteveB	"Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth & Apple Finally Becomes Microsoft" Infrastructure Decline
20100610-01	08:59	Ben	Re: "Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth"
20100610-04	10:06	SteveB	Re: "Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth"
20100724-01	12:26	SteveB	"22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
20100724-02	12:31	Pam	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
20100724-03	13:06	Dennis	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
20100725-01	07:21	SteveB	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
20100725-02	08:05	SteveB	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" & Corruption
20100725-03	11:18	Pam	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" & Corruption, Words
20100727-01	11:07	SteveB	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" & Corruption, Words

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20100824-01	08:40	SteveB	"China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks"
20100824-02	09:25	Ben	Re: "China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks"
20100824-03	12:53	SteveB	Re: "China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks"
20100908-02	14:57	Dennis	"The Great American Stickup: How the Political Class Mugged America & Handed the Money Over to Wall St."
20100909-02	07:27	SteveB	Re: "The Great American Stickup..."
20100928-03	16:54	SteveB	"Free" Trade
20100928-04	19:02	SteveG	Re: "Free" Trade
20100928-05	19:43	SteveBA	Re: "Free" Trade
20100928-06	20:33	Charis	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-03	07:53	SteveB	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-01	07:24	Pam	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-02	07:41	Pam	Re: "Free" Trade
20100930-05	08:57	SteveB	Re: "Free" Trade
20100930-06	15:55	SteveB	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-05	09:04	Bill	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-06	09:25	GaryC	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-07	09:44	SteveB	Re: "Free" Trade
20100929-09	21:50	SteveB	Re: "Free" Trade
20100930-02	01:12	Pam	Re: "Free" Trade, NAFTA
20100930-03	07:38	SteveB	Re: "Free" Trade, NAFTA
20101008-03	19:12	Patti	Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia
20101008-04	19:25	Charis	Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia
20101008-05	22:29	Patti	Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia
20101008-06	23:45	Charis	Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia
20100929-08	20:24	SteveG	House OKs Bill Targeting China's Currency Manipulation
20100930-01	00:58	SteveBA	Re: House OKs Bill Targeting China's Currency Manipulation
20100930-04	07:57	SteveB	Re: House OKs Bill Targeting China's Currency Manipulation
20101002-01	08:45	SteveB	"How Obama Can Fix the U.S. Economy"
20101012-06	15:26	Dennis	"Poor People"
20101012-10	16:40	SteveB	More Lies: 'Housing Bubble Caused by the Poor'
20101012-12	17:18	Dennis	"Axelrod Is Wrong: Obama Must Protect American Families from Wall Street Fraud"
20101014-01	17:25	Dennis	"Why Germany Has It So Good & Why America Is Going Down the Drain"
20101015-01	07:27	Pam	Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
20101015-02	09:11	SteveB	Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
20101015-04	12:25	SteveB	Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
20101015-05	13:27	Pam	Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
20101027-01	15:14	Dennis	Excerpt: The Great American Stick-Up: How Reagan Republicans & Clinton Democrats Enriched Wall Street While Mugging Main Street
20101028-02	13:34	SteveB	Re: The Great American Stick-Up
20101028-01	08:10	SteveB	"The Perils of Privatizing Government" & "The Glenn Beck School of Investing" & "Don't Blame Obama for This Mess"
20101101-01	14:19	Dennis	"The Scary Actual U.S. Government Debt"
20101120-04	14:00	SteveB	"China's Surprise Rate Hike: What It Means"
20101202-02	17:21	Dennis	"The Big Economic Story & Why Obama Isn't Telling It"
20101206-02	15:04	Dennis	"4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire"
20101206-04	21:16	SteveG	Re: "4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire"
20101207-01	06:07	SteveB	Re: "4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire"
20101212-02	14:36	Dennis	"Free Trade Doesn't Work: Interview with Economist Ian Fletcher"
20101214-01	07:29	SteveB	Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"
20101214-03	08:52	Charis	Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"
20101216-02	10:29	SteveB	Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"
20101214-02	07:37	GaryC	Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work" Travel
20101214-05	18:45	SteveB	Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work" Travel
20110307-05	18:29	Dennis	"This Time We're Taking the Whole World With Us"
20110308-02	08:58	SteveB	Re: "This Time We're Taking the Whole World With Us"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110330-01	17:46	SteveB	"5 Can-Do Companies Made in America"
20110413-01	18:44	SteveB	from the "Economic Crisis" topic at Spengler's Forum
20110416-01	09:51	SteveB	"Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-02	11:49	Dale	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-03	12:01	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-04	12:22	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-05	13:26	Dale	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-06	14:18	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-08	15:27	Bill	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-09	16:49	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-10	16:51	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-11	16:54	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-12	16:56	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-13	17:08	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-14	18:07	Charis	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-15	18:45	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110416-16	20:50	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110417-02	16:50	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110418-01	08:35	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110418-02	08:59	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110418-03	11:19	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110419-01	07:56	Dale	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110419-02	08:24	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110419-03	09:17	GaryC	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110419-04	10:47	SteveB	Re: "Senate Report Details Elaborate Wall Street Mortgage Fraud"
20110524-02	19:23	SteveB	"FSC Republicans Vote to Prohibit Implementation of Derivatives Rules Until Late 2012"
20110527-01	15:34	SteveB	"Tax Cuts, Wars Account for Nearly Half of Public Debt by 2019"
20110528-01	09:00	SteveG	Re: "Tax Cuts, Wars Account for Nearly Half of Public Debt by 2019"
20110601-01	20:30	SteveB	U.S. Economic Status — June, 1, 2011
20110602-01	09:59	Ben	Re: U.S. Economic Status — June, 1, 2011
20110602-02	11:27	SteveB	Re: U.S. Economic Status — June, 1, 2011
20110613-01	09:54	SteveB	Fw: We Want Elizabeth Warren
20110712-01	18:12	Dennis	"Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?"
20110723-02	15:59	SteveB	Re: "Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?"
20110723-07	15:22	RickF	Re: Re: "Why is the Most Wasteful Government Agency Not Part of the Deficit Discussion?"
20110723-05	16:05	SteveB	A Thought on the National Debt
20110727-02	11:08	Dick	U.S. Debt Visualization
20110808-03	20:49	Dick	Video: Marco Rubio vs. John Kerry on the Debt Crisis
20110825-01	13:14	SteveG	"Big Government? Obama Has 273,000 Fewer Federal Employees Than Reagan"
20110826-03	19:06	Dennis	"The Cost of Corporate Communism"
20110830-01	17:50	Jim	"Three Charts to Email to Your Right-Wing Brother-In-Law"
20110914-01	11:08	Phil	Fw: Why S&P Downgraded the U.S.
20110914-02	13:57	Dennis	Re: Why S&P Downgraded the U.S.
20111010-01	06:41	Pam	"Where's Your $50,000?"
20111010-05	11:44	SteveG	The Sluggish Economy
20111010-06	11:53	Bill	Re: The Sluggish Economy
20111010-07	12:12	GaryC	Re: The Sluggish Economy
20111010-08	12:48	Dennis	Re: The Sluggish Economy
20111010-10	16:06	Pam	Re: The Sluggish Economy
20111010-12	17:08	SteveG	Re: The Sluggish Economy
20111011-09	18:28	Dennis	The End of Loser Liberalism: Making Markets Progressive
20111012-04	06:26	SteveB	Re: The End of Loser Liberalism...

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111012-17	15:28	Pam	Re: The End of Loser Liberalism... "
20111012-13	13:19	Dennis	"Something's Happening Here"
20111013-03	08:18	SteveB	"What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-07	09:02	GaryC	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-05	08:51	Pam	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-08	09:15	Bill	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-11	09:44	GaryC	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-09	09:21	Charis	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-10	09:40	GaryC	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-12	09:51	Pam	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-13	10:16	GaryC	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-14	11:25	Pam	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-15	12:03	GaryC	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!" & "The Return of Rational Expectations" & "Economists Win Nobel for Focus on Real World"
20111013-16	12:55	Pam	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-17	13:05	Dennis	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-18	13:32	SteveG	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-19	13:33	Dennis	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-20	13:36	GaryC	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-21	13:52	Dennis	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-26	14:36	SteveB	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-27	14:44	SteveB	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-28	14:57	Dennis	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-29	15:59	Pam	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-31	16:49	SteveB	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111013-33	17:24	SteveG	Re: "What Should the White House Do? Panic!"
20111022-20	21:17	SteveG	"Is Bank of America Headed for the Glue Factory?"
EDUCATION
20081111-05	19:19	Charlie	"America the Illiterate"
20100319-01	10:58	Ben	"Texas Textbook Massacre: 'Ultraconservatives' Approve Radical Changes to State Education Curriculum" & "Dear Texas: Please Shut Up. Sincerely, History"
20100321-01	14:01	SteveB	Re: Texas, Texas Education, Etc.
20100322-01	09:42	Ben	Re: Texas, Texas Education, Etc.
20100322-02	11:15	SteveB	Re: Texas, Texas Education, Etc.
20100323-01	09:11	Ben	Re: Texas, Texas Education, New Mexico, Etc.
20110304-03	23:47	Jim	Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-02	12:03	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-03	12:55	AliceMarie	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110306-04	08:44	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110306-06	12:25	AliceMarie	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-04	12:56	DaveY	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-05	13:00	Bill	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-06	14:37	SteveBA	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-07	17:53	SteveG	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110305-08	20:23	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110306-01	06:54	Susette	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110306-02	08:05	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110306-03	08:20	Jim	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110306-05	11:05	Bill	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110308-04	09:44	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110307-01	12:40	Dale	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools & "Public vs. Private—Two Entirely Different Animals" & "Time to Restore Voter Control: End the Government-Union Monopoly"
20110307-02	13:46	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110307-03	16:21	GaryC	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110308-03	09:19	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110307-04	17:48	Sandy	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110308-06	12:55	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110312-01	04:32	Sandy	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110312-03	09:32	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
20110314-04	21:22	Dick	"A Speech Every American High School Principal Should Give"
20110315-03	13:44	Phil	Fw: Bill Gates' Rules for Students
20111008-15	17:45	Jim	Collective Bargaining
20111009-01	06:11	SteveB	Re: Collective Bargaining
20111009-05	09:14	Pam	Re: Collective Bargaining
20111009-08	10:22	GaryC	Re: Collective Bargaining
20111009-09	10:50	SteveB	Re: Collective Bargaining
20111021-13	10:16	GaryC	"Charters & Minority Progress"
20111021-21	14:44	Pam	Re: "Charters & Minority Progress" (w/ reply from GaryC)
20111021-33	15:29	GaryC	Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"
20111021-39	15:52	Pam	Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"
20111021-42	15:58	GaryC	Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"
20111021-53	16:44	Pam	Re: "Charters & Minority Progress"
ENERGY, OIL, GASOLINE, TRANSPORTATION & WATER
20080312-01	19:24	India	Fw: AVAAZ Petition: Stop Using Food for Fuel; Energy
20080519-02	21:39	SteveB, others	Energy, Oil, Water
20080618-01	17:44	India	Fw: Tips on Pumping Gas; Energy
20080708-02	14:43	SteveB	Video: "Who Killed the Electric Car?" Energy
20080710-01	14:33	SteveB	Fw: Stop Energy Market Speculation Now!
20080725-01	10:10	Dennis	Re: Stop Energy Market Speculation Now!
20080722-02	20:24	SteveB	BP: Food for Fuel; Energy
20080725-02	19:02	Dennis	"The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" Energy
20080725-03	21:05	SteveB	Re: "The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" Energy Speculation
20080726-01	09:09	Dennis	Re: "The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" Energy Speculation
20080726-02	09:16	Dennis	"After 20 Years of Ignoring This Investment, It's Finally Time to Buy" Wind Energy
20080728-01	11:01	SteveB	Re: "After 20 Years of Ignoring This Investment, It's Finally Time to Buy"
20080728-02	12:23	Dennis	Re: Energy Speculation
20080728-04	15:37	SteveB	Re: Energy Speculation, Gasoline
20080729-01	11:05	J. Tester	Energy, Gasoline
20080814-02	12:52	SteveB	To: Rush Limbaugh; Oil, Energy
20080817-02	16:13	SteveB	"$65 Oil Is Coming (Maybe)" Energy, Speculation
20080817-03	16:35	Dennis	Re: "$65 Oil Is Coming (Maybe)" Energy, Speculation
20080819-04	17:05	Dick	Fw: The Bakken Formation; Oil, Energy
20080903-01	11:50	SteveB	Oil Market Speculation; Energy
20081128-01	21:20	SteveB	"Mysterious Super Battery to Power Electric Cars This Year"
20081206-03	11:09	SteveB	Alternative Energy Sources
20090616-01	15:53	SteveB	"Let's Get Real About Alternative Energy"
20090625-01	11:52	SteveG	Fw: The Bakken Formation: "U. S. Oil Discovery—Largest Reserve in the World!"
20090625-02	12:59	SteveB	Re: The Bakken Formation / Photo: Trapper Peak, Bitterroots, Montana
20090625-03	13:06	SteveG	Re: The Bakken Formation; Electric Cars
20090625-04	13:59	SteveB	Re: The Bakken Formation; Electric Cars
20090701-01	08:21	SteveG	Alternative Energy: Algae
20090701-02	10:35	SteveB	Re: Alternative Energy: Algae
20090703-01	12:02	SteveB	"Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" Speculation
20090703-02	13:53	Dennis	Re: "Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" Speculation
20090704-01	09:47	SteveB	Re: "Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" Speculation
20090709-01	19:08	SteveB	Fw: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now
20090709-02	19:12	Dennis	Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now
20090710-01	08:37	SteveB	Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20090710-02	08:50	Bill	Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now
20090710-03	09:10	SteveB	Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now
20090710-04	21:14	Bill	Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now
20090726-01	13:57	SteveB	"Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-01	09:33	Ben	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-02	11:32	SteveB	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-03	11:56	SteveB	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-04	12:32	SteveB	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-05	12:49	Ben	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-06	13:16	SteveB	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-07	13:21	Ben	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090914-08	14:40	SteveB	Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"
20090903-01	11:40	SteveB	"Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"
20090903-02	12:31	SteveG	Re: "Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"
20090903-03	12:35	SteveB	Re: "Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"
20090903-04	12:43	SteveG	Re: "Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"
20100401-03	10:44	Ben	"Burning Salt Water"
20100401-04	12:30	Allan	Re: "Burning Salt Water"
20100403-01	07:08	SteveB	Re: "Burning Salt Water"
20100421-03	12:32	Jim	Re: "Burning Salt Water"
20100505-09	08:41	Mark	Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power
20100507-03	09:36	Ben	Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power
20100507-06	11:01	SteveB	Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power & from the "Manifesto of the Church of Steve"
20100507-16	12:55	BobK	Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power
20100507-17	13:07	SteveB	Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power
20100507-18	13:22	Ben	Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power
20100507-20	18:27	India	"GM Biofuels: Another Planned Disaster"
20100507-21	19:30	SteveB	Re: "GM Biofuels: Another Planned Disaster" & "5 Companies Making Fuel from Algae Now"
20100605-01	14:52	SteveB	BP Gulf Oil Spill
20100619-01	08:31	SteveB	"Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"
20100620-01	08:39	Mark	Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"
20100620-02	13:03	SteveB	Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"
20100620-03	21:44	Mark	Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"
20100621-01	08:57	SteveB	Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"
20101025-04	09:30	SteveB	Fw: How Government Works—The Department of Energy
20101025-07	10:31	Clark	Re: How Government Works
20101025-08	10:42	SteveB	Re: How Government Works
20101124-01	10:35	Pam	"Dirty Coal, Clean Future"
20101126-01	08:08	SteveB	Re: "Dirty Coal, Clean Future"
20110323-01	08:57	Bill	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
20110323-02	09:04	SteveB	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
20110323-03	09:19	Bill	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
20110323-04	10:58	SteveB	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
20110323-06	11:20	Bill	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
20110323-07	11:49	SteveB	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
20110328-07	17:14	SteveB	Alternative Vehicle Fuels, Hydrogen
20110401-01	12:43	Dennis	"What's Behind the Oil Spike to $107 (and Counting...)"
20110403-01	10:28	SteveB	Alternative Vehicle Fuels, Hydrogen
20110411-01	14:41	SteveB	"Tsunami-Hit Towns Forgot Warnings from Ancestors"
20110422-01	08:51	SteveB	To: Ali Velshi; Market Speculation
20110426-01	10:56	SteveB	"Henry Ford, Charles Kettering and the 'Fuel of the Future'" Alcohol
20110426-05	17:30	SteveB	How to Stop Oil Market Speculation
20110510-05	18:23	SteveB	Great Time for a Water Diversion
20110515-02	20:34	Jim	Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?)
20110516-01	15:24	SteveB	Re: Tata Air-Powered Car (of the Future?)

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110518-01	09:16	SteveB	Fw: CredoAction Petition: End Big Oil Tax Subsidies
20110519-02	18:42	Pam	Re: End Big Oil Tax Subsidies
20110521-03	09:30	SteveB	Re: End Big Oil Tax Subsidies
20110518-03	19:45	SteveB	Thorium Reactor
20110518-04	20:06	Ben	Frakking
20110518-06	21:15	SteveB	Re: Frakking
20110519-03	21:38	Ben	Re: Frakking
20110711-01	13:49	Dennis	"The 'Fracking' Issue & a Question About Morocco"
20110608-01	11:13	SteveB	"New Battery Design Could Give Electric Vehicles a Jolt"
20110926-01	09:41	Jim	Video: "Recycled Water Bottles Act Like Electricity"
20111014-01	08:49	Pam	Re: "The Third Industrial Revolution..."
20111014-02	13:52	Dennis	"The Third Industrial Revolution: Leading the Way to a Green Energy Era & a Hydrogen Economy"
20111015-02	17:00	SteveB	Re: "The Third Industrial Revolution..."
20111016-05	10:02	Pam	Re: "The Third Industrial Revolution..."
FOREIGN RELATIONS, TRADE, TREATIES & THE WORLD (OTHER THAN WAR)
20070614-02	14:49	SteveB	"Bush's European Disaster"
20080819-02	16:20	SteveB	"Reality Bites Again"
20080819-03	16:54	SteveM	Re: "Reality Bites Again"
20080819-06	17:27	SteveB	Re: "Reality Bites Again"
20091005-01	19:53	SteveB	2009 UN List of Best Countries to Live In
20100407-03	20:05	SteveB	"Getting Around in Santa Cruz de la Sierra, Bolivia"
20100531-02	15:39	Pam	Expatriate Life
20100614-01	15:15	SteveB	Re: Expatriate Life
20100601-01	10:21	Ben	"Flotillas and the Wars of Public Opinion"
20100602-01	07:46	SteveB	Re: "Flotillas and the Wars of Public Opinion"
20100908-01	00:49	Dick	Fw: What You Won't Hear from President Obama on Foreign Policy
20100928-02	16:15	SteveB	"10 Signs the U.S. Is Losing Its Influence in the Western Hemisphere"
20110210-01	09:14	SteveB	Arab Spring
20110507-01	03:16	Charis	"We Did Something Wrong"
20110507-02	07:28	SteveB	Re: "We Did Something Wrong"
20110508-02	09:31	SteveB	America is #31, but Happy Day, Moms!
20110520-01	13:27	Dennis	"South Africa's New 'New World'"
20110520-02	17:46	SteveB	Re: "South Africa's New 'New World'"
20110521-02	09:08	SteveB	"Coca-Crazed Concept"
20110521-10	15:58	SteveB	To: President Obama about Israel
20110521-11	15:58	B. Obama	Re: Israel
20110521-12	16:21	GaryF	Re: Israel
20110522-01	09:53	SteveB	Re: Israel
20110618-02	16:41	Dennis	"9 Countries That Do It Better: Why Does Europe Take Better Care of Its People Than America?"
20110723-01	14:47	SteveB	"China vs. U.S.: Who Will Win the 21st Century?" & "China's New Parochialism"
20110723-03	15:30	Charis	Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats
20110723-04	15:46	SteveB	Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats
20110723-06	16:12	GaryC	Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats
20110723-08	17:00	Dennis	Re: "China vs. U.S." Republicans & Democrats
20111004-01	07:54	SteveB	"Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected"
20111004-02	07:59	GaryC	Re: "Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected"
20111004-03	08:14	SteveB	Re: "Flood of Food Imported to U.S., But Only 2 Percent Inspected"
20111007-03	11:00	GaryC	"Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
20111007-04	14:57	SteveB	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
20111007-06	15:20	Pam	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
20111007-05	15:14	Dennis	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
20111007-07	16:02	Dale	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
20111007-08	16:32	SteveB	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111007-09	16:50	SteveB	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive"
20111007-10	18:31	Dale	Re: "Buck Up, America: China Is Getting Too Expensive" & "Corporate Profits Surge to Record High in Q2"
20111013-22	14:01	SteveB	"Free" Trade & Where the Jobs Went
20111013-35	17:31	SteveG	Re: "Free" Trade & Where the Jobs Went
20111013-36	17:53	Pam	Re: "Free" Trade & Where the Jobs Went
GEORGE W. BUSH, POTUS
20080217-02	14:56	GaryF	The Bush Administration
20080217-03	19:48	SteveB	Re: The Bush Administration
20080218-01	07:20	GaryF	Re: The Bush Administration
20080218-02	11:58	SteveB	Re: The Bush Administration
20080218-04	14:27	GaryF	Re: The Bush Administration
20080219-01	16:12	SteveB	Re: The Bush Administration
20080919-07	21:40	SteveB	Fw: George W. Bush's Resume
20080922-04	20:32	SteveB	Fw: "Don't Let Them Know..."
20081202-01	09:47	SteveB	"Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"
20081202-02	14:55	SteveG	Re: "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"
20081202-03	15:17	SteveB	Re: "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"
20081203-01	12:41	SteveG	Re: "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"
20081211-03	10:06	SteveB	"The Truth About Idiot Bush (What a Legacy!)"
GUNS, INSURRECTION, ETC.
20080704-01	14:55	SteveB	Guns, Deconstucting Firecrackers
20080707-01	15:09	Bill	Re: Deconstucting Firecrackers
20080708-01	11:06	SteveB	Re: Deconstucting Firecrackers
20080716-02	12:01	SteveB	Fw: Guns, as the Right Sees Them
20080819-01	14:41	SteveB	2nd Amendment
20080819-05	17:17	Pat	Re: 2nd Amendment
20080819-09	21:19	SteveB	Re: 2nd Amendment
20081210-01	19:14	SteveM	Gun Rights
20081211-01	09:53	SteveB	Re: Gun Rights
20081211-02	10:03	SteveM	Re: Gun Rights
20081211-04	10:11	SteveB	Re: Gun Rights
20091104-01	10:19	Ben	"Gun Control and the 2nd Amendment, from the Vermont Perspective"
20100216-01	05:22	SteveB	Guns in the Ghetto
20100216-02	10:41	Ben	Re: Guns in the Ghetto
20100216-03	17:54	SteveB	Re: Guns in the Ghetto
20100609-01	17:18	Charlie	Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat
20100610-02	09:42	Ben	Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat
20100610-03	10:00	SteveB	Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat
20100610-05	10:19	Ben	Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat
20100610-06	10:34	SteveB	Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat
20110218-01	19:17	Tom	Fw: Who will Protect You & Your Family?
20110219-01	11:18	SteveB	Re: Who will Protect You & Your Family?
20111006-03	11:03	SteveB	N'ifttt'y!
20111006-04	11:30	Pam	Re: N'ifttt'y!
20111006-05	12:48	SteveB	Re: N'ifttt'y!
20111006-06	13:37	Pam	Re: N'ifttt'y!
20111006-08	17:26	SteveB	Re: N'ifttt'y!
HEALTH CARE
20081015-04	18:52	SteveB	"The Risk of McCain's Health Plan"
20090723-01	13:44	Phil	Fw: The Health Care Question
20090723-02	14:09	SteveB	Re: The Health Care Question
20101110-02	21:27	SteveB	"Pelosi's Triumph"
20101128-01	08:38	SteveB	Reasonable Cost Health Care

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20101128-02	10:18	GaryC	Re: Reasonable Cost Health Care
20110331-02	18:51	Robert	Fw: Obamacare
20110511-01	18:41	SteveB	Fw: CredoAction Petition: Tell John Boehner to Keep His Hands Off Medicare
20110610-05	10:10	SteveB	Fw: Republican Attacks on Medicare
20110723-09	17:23	SteveB	"Health Care Debate: It's Time to Get Outraged"
20111010-15	18:21	Mark	Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111010-17	21:24	Dennis	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111010-18	22:15	SteveB	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111011-02	06:47	SteveB	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111011-03	12:00	Pam	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111011-05	12:19	Dennis	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy & "Doctors Avoid Penalties in Suits Against Medical Firms"
20111011-06	14:31	Pam	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-01	06:05	SteveB	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-06	08:02	GaryC	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-07	09:26	Clark	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-08	09:50	Pam	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-10	11:32	Mark	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-12	11:44	Clark	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111012-18	17:34	GaryF	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111013-04	08:50	SteveB	Re: Obamacare Helped Destroy the Economy
20111017-35	23:03	Dale	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-01	09:41	Dale	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-02	09:44	GaryC	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-03	11:11	Pam	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-05	12:13	SteveB	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-07	14:22	Clark	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-09	18:17	Art	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111018-11	18:55	Art	Re: "Unsettled Times" & Health Care (cont. from heading: OWS)
20111019-20	17:09	SteveB	Obamacare & Obamacracy
IMMIGRATION REFORM
20070515-01	11:45	SteveB	To: George Bush; Immigration Reform Bill
20070530-01	18:42	G. Bush	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070605-01	02:23	D. Rehberg	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070605-02	20:19	M. Martinez	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070607-01	16:19	B. Nelson	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070608-01	13:53	SteveB	To: Senator _____; Immigration Reform Bill
20070608-02	14:19	H. Clinton	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070611-01	09:43	G. Bush	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070611-02	16:09	B. Obama	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070612-01	10:32	M. Martinez	Re: Immigration Reform Bill, Etc.
20070612-02	13:46	M. Martinez	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070612-03	14:24	SteveB	"El Hacendado"
20070614-01	14:16	A. Specter	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070614-05	21:00	E. Kennedy	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070618-01	11:59	M. Baucus	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070618-02	15:47	J. Tester	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070620-01	11:36	H. Reid	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070711-02	14:22	J. Lieberman	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20070807-01	12:43	H. Clinton	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
20080201-01	14:17	SteveB	Fw: Illegal Aliens in California
20080326-01	10:18	V. Buchanan	Illegal Immigration Survey
20080522-01	09:10	V. Buchanan	Illegal Immigration
20080703-01	14:49	M. Martinez	Immigration Reform Amendment
20080821-01	11:12	SteveM	Fw: "Just One State" [California]; Illegal Immigration
20080821-04	12:18	SteveM	Fw: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20080821-05	13:26	SteveB	Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration
20080821-06	15:06	SteveM	Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration
20080821-08	19:12	SteveB	Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration
20080821-12	23:44	SteveM	Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration
20080822-03	09:58	SteveB	Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration
20081029-06	11:34	SteveM	"Iowa Meatpacker Fined $10M after Immigration Raid"
20081029-11	14:49	SteveB	Re: "Iowa Meatpacker Fined $10M after Immigration Raid"
20091229-01	21:36	Dick	Fw: "Salute the Danish Flag—It's a Symbol of Western Freedom"
20100504-01	08:22	SteveB	The U.S. of A.
20100504-04	13:39	BrentR	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-05	13:58	GaryF	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-06	14:50	BrentR	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-07	15:22	Charis	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-08	16:30	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A. & "Two Arizona City Councils Vote to Sue Over New Law"
20100504-09	17:08	Dick	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-10	17:16	Charis	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-11	17:18	Charis	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-12	17:43	SteveG	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-13	17:55	Brent R	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-14	18:34	GaryF	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-15	18:35	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-16	19:27	BrentR	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100504-17	20:00	BrentR	Re: The U.S. of A. & Fw: If You Cross the Border Illegally...
20100505-01	00:24	BrentR	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100505-02	01:06	Marci	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100505-03	07:39	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100505-04	07:45	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A. & "I Want to Explain Why Arizona SB1070 Is Needed"
20100505-05	07:53	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.: "2009 UN 'Human Development' Report"
20100505-06	07:55	Charis	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100505-07	08:46	Bill	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100505-08	09:13	Mark	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-01	01:04	Marissa	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-02	02:03	Charis	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-04	09:39	Clark	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-05	10:50	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-07	11:06	Clark	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-08	11:27	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-09	11:32	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-10	11:36	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-11	11:46	Clark	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-12	11:52	Ben	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-13	12:41	Dennis	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-14	12:45	SteveB	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-15	12:49	Ben	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-19	13:35	Bill	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100507-22	23:48	BrentR	Re: The U.S. of A.
20100508-02	13:19	Dick	Fw: Illegal Border Crossings
20100527-01	09:04	SteveB	Fw: Mexico's Immigration Laws
20100527-02	13:45	Marci	Re: Mexico's Immigration Laws
20100527-03	14:03	SteveB	Re: Mexico's Immigration Laws
20100530-01	14:15	SteveB	"Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen"
20100530-02	18:33	SteveG	Re: "Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen"
20100531-01	20:47	SteveB	Re: "Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen"
20100618-01	06:59	SteveB	Fw: Legal Joe vs. Illegal José
20100715-01	09:15	SteveB	"'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
20100715-02	12:54	Pam	Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
20100716-01	08:04	SteveB	Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20100716-03	08:43	Pam	Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
20100716-04	08:55	SteveB	Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
20100716-05	09:06	SteveB	Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
20100722-01	07:23	Pam	Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
20100728-01	08:05	SteveB	Fw: Let's Say I Break into Your House
20100826-01	16:57	Dick	Fw: Countries with Birthright Citizenship
20100828-01	06:19	SteveB	Re: Countries with Birthright Citizenship
20110224-03	23:08	Tom	"Missouri Ahead of the Game in Dealing with Illegal Immigration"
20110510-03	11:34	Charis	Path to Citizenship
20110510-04	18:19	SteveB	Re: Path to Citizenship
20110511-02	20:12	SteveB	To: President Obama; El Paso Speech on Immigration
20110511-03	10:43	Charis	Re: To: President Obama; El Paso Speech on Immigration
20110512-01	09:02	SteveB	Re: To: President Obama; El Paso Speech on Immigration
20110707-01	07:29	GaryC	Illegal immigration Produces "Two Californias"
20111011-07	16:18	SteveG	Illegal Immigration
20111011-08	16:25	GaryC	Re: Illegal Immigration
20111011-10	19:41	Mary	Re: Illegal Immigration
20111014-05	20:44	Pam	"Prison or Deportation: What Choices Are Immigrants Given?"
20111014-06	22:06	SteveB	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
20111016-04	09:17	Pam	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
20111016-12	14:16	SteveB	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
20111016-13	14:40	Pam	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
20111016-18	20:52	SteveB	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
20111017-06	20:57	Pam	Re: "Prison or Deportation..."
JOBS, MANUFACTURING & UNIONS
20081010-03	20:20	SteveB	"Can General Motors & Ford Survive?"
20081119-01	22:21	Dick	Fw: "A Letter to My Employees"
20081120-01	10:35	Paul	Re: "A Letter to My Employees"
20081121-01	09:22	SteveB	Re: "A Letter to My Employees"
20081121-02	22:41	Dick	Re: "A Letter to My Employees"
20100909-03	07:37	SteveB	"Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"
20100909-04	08:23	SteveB	Re: "Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"
20100909-05	18:25	Dennis	Re: "Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"
20100909-06	18:40	SteveB	Re: "Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"
20100921-04	07:53	SteveB	"For the Unemployed Over 50, Fears of Never Working Again"
20101010-02	10:06	SteveB	"China Emerges as Scapegoat in Campaign Ads"
20101207-02	10:21	Jim	Fw: Changes Are Coming & "19 Facts About the De-industrialization of America That Will Blow Your Mind"
20101216-01	06:26	SteveB	"A Few Things You Should Know About Minimum Wage"
20110308-05	09:51	SteveB	Unions & the Middle Class
20110312-02	07:10	A. Grayson	Did They Die in Vain?
20110313-03	18:21	SteveB	Re: Did They Die in Vain?
20110314-01	17:29	Pam	Re: Did They Die in Vain?
20110314-03	08:47	SteveB	Re: Did They Die in Vain?
20110315-01	07:23	Pam	Re: Did They Die in Vain? Japanese Disasters
20110315-02	11:53	SteveB	Re: Did They Die in Vain? Japanese Disasters, Energy
20110315-04	15:50	SteveB	"Power Concedes Nothing Without a Demand"
20110323-05	11:17	Dennis	"May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions"
20110323-08	11:54	SteveB	Fw: "May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions"
20110323-09	12:06	SteveB	Re: "May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions"
20110417-01	11:37	SteveB	"Governor Walker: Collective-Bargaining Law Doesn't Save Money"
20110607-03	19:51	SteveB	Fw: Buy Americ-CAN!
20110609-01	10:35	Barbara	Re: Buy Americ-CAN!
20110807-02	11:00	SteveG	"30 Years Ago Today: The Day the Middle Class Died"
20111022-06	10:17	Dale	"The Employee Rights Act"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
MISC., THE NATION & GOVERNMENT
NEWS MEDIA & FREEDOM OF THE PRESS
20101120-05	14:03	SteveB	"Olbermann, O'Reilly & the Death of Real News"
20101211-01	16:09	Dennis	"Don't Shoot the Messenger for Revealing Uncomfortable Truths"
20101214-04	18:00	SteveB	Re: "Don't Shoot the Messenger for Revealing Uncomfortable Truths"
20111017-34	22:32	SteveG	Censorship
TAXES, RICH & POOR, CLASS WARFARE
20080821-03	12:12	SteveM	Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton
20080821-07	16:16	SteveB	Re: Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton
20080821-11	22:55	SteveM	Re: Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton
20080822-02	09:56	SteveB	Re: Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton
20081028-05	16:40	SteveM	Redistributing Obama's Wealth
20081029-07	12:43	SteveB	Re: Redistributing Obama's Wealth
20081102-02	08:34	SteveB	"Spread It Around"
20100810-01	21:06	Dick	Fw: Current European Tax Rates
20100813-01	12:53	SteveB	Re: Current European Tax Rates & "Think Your Taxes Are Bad?"
20100919-05	14:25	SteveB	Redistribution of Wealth
20100922-03	17:02	Dennis	"Poverty Is Through the Roof & Billionaires Are Getting Pu*s*y About Not Enough Profits"
20100925-01	12:34	Dennis	"New Rule: Rich People Who Complain About Being Vilified Should Be Vilified"
20100926-02	08:09	SteveB	Re: "New Rule..."
20100926-03	12:55	Mary	Re: "New Rule..."
20100926-04	14:34	SteveB	Re: "New Rule..."
20100927-06	10:31	GaryC	My Income Taxes
20100928-01	07:37	SteveB	Re: My Income Taxes
20101006-01	13:21	Dennis	"The Undeserving Rich: Did Warren Buffet Really Earn His $50 Billion?"
20101007-01	07:38	SteveB	Re: "The Undeserving Rich" & "The Rich Are Hogging Our Common Inheritance—We Must Take It Back"
20101007-02	09:28	Pam	Re: "The Undeserving Rich"
20101008-01	16:04	SteveB	Re: "The Undeserving Rich"
20101010-01	08:59	SteveB	"Note to Tea Partiers: They Lied—You Don't Live in a Rich Country"
20101012-01	07:26	SteveB	"Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
20101012-02	07:40	GaryC	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
20101012-03	09:55	SteveB	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze" & "Top 10 Facts About Social Security"
20101012-04	10:04	GaryC	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
20101012-09	16:40	SteveB	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze" & "Wall Street to Break Pay Record in This Economy"
20101012-11	16:57	GaryC	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
20101025-02	07:55	SteveB	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
20101012-08	16:37	GaryC	My Experience with Taxes
20101025-01	07:38	SteveB	Re: My Experience with Taxes
20101120-01	08:58	SteveB	"The Poor Is Getting Poorer"
20101120-02	12:55	Bill	Re: "The Poor Is Getting Poorer"
20101120-03	13:47	SteveB	Re: "The Poor Is Getting Poorer"
20101202-01	12:48	Dennis	"Welcome to the Plutocracy!"
20101205-02	18:24	SteveB	Re: "Welcome to the Plutocracy!"
20101203-02	19:30	Dennis	The Bush Tax Cuts
20101205-01	13:51	SteveB	Re: The Bush Tax Cuts
20101206-01	10:50	Ben	Re: The Bush Tax Cuts
20101206-03	16:55	SteveB	Re: The Bush Tax Cuts
20101215-02	17:48	Dennis	"Tax Cuts Simply Do Not Create Jobs"
20101220-02	12:09	Dennis	"Getting to the Truth About Taxes and Public Spending"

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110215-01	19:17	Tom	15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110216-01	11:23	SteveB	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110216-02	11:46	GaryC	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110222-02	11:04	SteveB	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110223-01	15:18	GaryC	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110222-03	18:50	SteveB	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget; Gasoline Tax
20110222-04	20:06	GaryC	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget; Gasoline Tax
20110223-02	17:17	SteveB	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110224-01	12:08	GaryC	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110224-02	21:40	SteveB	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
20110322-08	18:26	SteveB	"What People Earn—2011"
20110323-12	12:33	Dennis	"Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"
20110325-01	08:31	SteveB	Fw: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"
20110325-02	09:34	GaryC	Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"
20110325-03	11:32	SteveB	Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"
20110325-04	11:39	GaryC	Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"
20110325-05	13:57	SteveB	Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"
20110328-03	11:14	GaryC	"The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110328-04	16:30	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110328-05	16:33	GaryC	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110328-06	17:14	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110329-01	15:15	Pam	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110329-02	15:57	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110329-03	16:14	GaryC	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110329-05	19:03	GaryC	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110329-06	20:14	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110329-07	20:20	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
20110403-02	17:38	SteveB	"Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%"
20110403-03	18:10	Charis	Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%"
20110403-04	18:32	SteveB	Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%"
20110404-01	08:24	SteveB	Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" America
20110404-02	08:52	Charis	Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" America
20110404-03	10:19	SteveB	Re: "Of the 1%, By the 1%, For the 1%" America
20110506-01	06:13	SteveB	"U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958"
20110506-02	14:10	SteveG	Re: "U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958"
20110506-03	17:37	SteveB	Re: "U.S. Tax Burden at Lowest Level Since 1958"
20110506-04	19:17	SteveB	"CEOs See Pay Rise 24% on Average"
20110506-05	22:33	Jim	"Too Many Federal Workers?"
20110507-03	10:46	SteveB	Re: "Too Many Federal Workers?"
20110528-02	14:42	SteveB	Fw: Social Security Is Insurance, Not an 'Entitlement'
20110529-01	09:36	Pam	Re: Social Security Is Insurance, Not an 'Entitlement'
20110529-02	16:29	SteveB	Re: Social Security Is Insurance, Not an 'Entitlement'
20110607-02	09:31	SteveB	Fw: CredoAction Petition: Tell Congress to Tax the Rich
20110629-03	20:38	SteveB	Fw: Balancing the Budget at the Expense of American Jobs
20110726-03	08:05	Dick	Fw: Social Security: An Entitlement?
20110726-04	10:19	SteveB	Re: Social Security: An Entitlement?
20110802-01	11:05	Mark	Fw: Bernie Madoff & Social Security
20110810-01	09:40	Phil	Fw: Social Security 'Information'
20110823-03	18:09	Jim	"Why Is President Obama So Anxious to Cut Social Security?"
20110906-01	18:06	Dennis	How to Think About Taxes
20110907-03	16:45	Mary	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110908-02	11:22	Dennis	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110907-01	10:31	Phil	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110907-02	15:51	Pam	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110907-04	20:45	Mary	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110909-01	13:22	Pam	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110911-02	09:29	SteveB	Re: How to Think About Taxes

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110911-01	09:00	SteveB	Re: How to Think About Taxes
20110918-01	17:07	Jim	"A Riddle That Brings Joy to Mega-Rich Hearts"
20110920-01	16:46	Dennis	"Misconceptions & Realities About Who Pays Taxes"
20110920-02	17:57	Pam	Re: "Misconceptions & Realities About Who Pays Taxes"
20111006-01	06:31	SteveB	"5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1% of Americans"
20111006-02	09:19	Pam	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
20111006-09	17:30	Mary	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%" & "The Problem with 'Tax the Rich': It Won't Work"
20111006-10	17:37	Dennis	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
20111006-11	17:48	SteveB	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
20111006-12	18:07	SteveB	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
20111006-13	18:30	Mark	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
20111007-02	09:43	Pam	Re: "5 Facts You Should Know About the Wealthiest 1%"
20111010-14	18:07	SteveB	Quotes: Aristotle & William Shatner
20111010-16	18:47	GaryC	Quotes: Aristotle & William Shatner
20111013-01	07:25	SteveG	Why Republicans Like Cain's 9-9-9 Plan
20111013-06	08:52	Pam	Re: Why Republicans Like Cain's 9-9-9 Plan
20111013-34	17:25	SteveG	Graphics: What 99% Means
20111016-02	06:31	SteveB	"Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-06	12:14	Susette	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-08	12:30	Pam	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-07	12:28	GaryC	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-10	13:54	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-09	12:52	Pam	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-11	14:15	Dale	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-14	14:57	Mary	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-03	06:38	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-08	09:36	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-12	11:00	Mary	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-21	12:35	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-22	12:36	Art	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-15	15:29	Pam	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-16	15:49	Pam	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-17	18:27	Art	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111016-19	21:01	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-20	12:17	Art	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-01	06:23	Mark	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-02	06:37	Pam	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-11	10:45	Mark	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-16	11:58	Pam	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-30	14:57	Mary	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-05	08:52	SteveG	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-09	10:26	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-10	10:31	SteveB	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-23	12:50	Art	Re: "Why U.S. Should Spread the Wealth"
20111017-28	14:41	Charis	"First Person: My Biggest Money Secret"
20111018-08	16:46	Jim	"We Are the One Percent"
20111021-22	14:45	GaryC	Responsibility
20111021-26	15:04	Pam	Re: Responsibility
20111021-28	15:08	Charis	Re: Responsibility
20111021-31	15:22	Pam	Re: Responsibility
20111021-32	15:24	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111021-34	15:32	Charis	Re: Responsibility
20111021-35	15:41	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111021-36	15:42	Pam	Re: Responsibility
20111021-41	15:57	Charis	Re: Responsibility
20111021-51	16:37	GaryC	Re: Responsibility

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111021-52	16:42	GaryC	Re: Responsibility
20111021-54	16:45	Charis	Re: Responsibility
20111021-56	16:48	Art	Re: Responsibility
20111021-58	16:55	Pam	Re: Responsibility
20111021-60	17:02	Charis	Re: Responsibility
20111021-63	18:05	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111021-64	18:09	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111021-65	18:14	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111021-66	18:16	Charis	Re: Responsibility
20111021-67	18:19	Pam	Re: Responsibility
20111021-70	18:32	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111021-72	22:15	GaryC	Re: Responsibility
20111022-03	08:03	SteveB	Re: Responsibility
20111022-11	14:35	Jim	Re: Responsibility
20111022-17	17:06	Pam	Re: Responsibility
20111022-12	14:38	Art	Rich and Poor
20111023-15	20:30	SteveG	"The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)
20111024-01	06:34	SteveB	Re: "The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)
20111024-02	07:33	SteveG	Re: "The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)
20111024-03	10:55	SteveB	Re: "The Economic Bill of Rights" (of FDR)
THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
20100726-01	08:25	SteveB	"Ten Best Beach Towns in America"
20100726-02	09:24	Ben	Re: "Ten Best Beach Towns in America"
20100726-03	12:13	SteveB	Re: "Ten Best Beach Towns in America"
20100804-01	09:15	SteveB	North & South
20101215-01	06:38	SteveB	Re: U.S. Photos: 1935-1939
20110328-02	11:29	SteveB	"The Best Retirement Places"
20110510-02	9:00	SteveB	Fw: Memorial Day
20110605-03	20:16	SteveB	"U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-04	10:03	Bill	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-05	10:04	DaveY	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-06	11:10	SteveB	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-08	12:06	SteveG	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-09	14:05	Dennis	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-12	18:11	SteveB	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List"
20110606-14	19:02	GaryC	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List" Taxes
20110606-15	19:08	SteveB	Re: "U.S. Doesn't Make Cut for Happiest Nations List" Taxes
20110701-01	06:26	SteveB	U.S. Citizenship Test
20110701-04	22:32	PamB	Re: U.S. Citizenship Test
20110702-01	06:00	SteveB	Re: U.S. Citizenship Test
20110805-01	19:11	GaryF	Fw: 1911
WAR ON TERROR, AFGHANISTAN WAR & IRAQ WAR II
20080813-08	13:39	SteveM	Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMDs)
20120112-01	07:19	SteveB	Re: WMDs—"Yellowcake Uranium Found In Iraq, Bush Was Right! Well, Not So Much."
20070821-01	13:28	E. Bayh	Reclaiming Our Legacy; Iraq War, Afghanistan War
20090130-01	13:42	Dennis	"The Good War" (on Terror)
20100708-02	16:18	SteveG	Corruption in Iraq; TV
20100709-01	06:53	SteveB	Re: Corruption in Iraq; TV
20100709-02	06:56	SteveG	Re: Corruption in Iraq; TV
20100907-01	14:18	Dennis	"America's Empire & Endless Wars Are Destroying the World & Ruining Our Great Country"
20100928-07	21:36	Ben	"Pakistan and the U.S. Exit from Afghanistan"
20100929-04	08:40	SteveB	Re: "Pakistan and the U.S. Exit from Afghanistan"
20110221-01	14:43	Phil	Fw: Joys of a Muslim Woman

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110221-02	19:29	SteveB	Re: Joys of a Muslim Woman
20110303-02	18:12	Dennis	"Fighting Over Crumbs Left from Military Spending"
20110304-01	09:45	SteveB	Re: "Fighting Over Crumbs Left from Military Spending"
20110629-01	07:39	SteveB	"The Cost of War at Least $3.7 trillion and Counting"
20110823-01	12:20	Dennis	from The Empire at Dusk & "Has Our Bloated Security Budget Made Us Safer?"
20110913-02	20:39	Dick	Fw: Letter from an Airman About Military Pay
20110930-10	17:24	SteveB	"Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"
20110930-11	18:17	Pam	Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"
20111001-01	07:31	SteveB	Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"
20111001-02	08:39	Pam	Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"
20111001-03	11:29	SteveB	Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"
20111001-04	14:40	Bill	Re: "Awlaqi Killing Reignites U.S. Debate on Rights"
20111005-01	03:11	SteveB	"Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes"
20111005-02	08:44	SteveG	Re: "Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes"
20111005-03	12:49	SteveB	Re: "Poll: 1 in 3 Vets See Iraq, Afghan Wars as Wastes"
WOMEN'S RIGHTS, ABORTION, BIRTH CONTROL, MASTURBATION & LGBT
20080814-04	18:08	SteveB	Abortion & Christian Fundamentalists
20080814-05	18:11	SteveM	Re: Abortion & Christian Fundamentalists
20080814-08	19:24	SteveB	Re: Abortion & Christian Fundamentalists
20100918-02	13:10	Dennis	"Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell: Largest Pro-wanking Demonstration in History"
20100919-01	07:37	SteveB	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20100919-02	07:56	GaryC	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20100919-03	07:59	SteveB	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20100919-04	09:23	Pam	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20100919-06	20:01	GaryC	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20100920-01	13:36	Mary	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20100920-02	13:55	SteveB	Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"
20110219-02	18:17	SteveB	Fw: Have Republicans Declared War on Women?
20110219-03	18:20	Charis	Re: Have Republicans Declared War on Women?
20110219-04	18:51	SteveB	Re: Have Republicans Declared War on Women?
20110425-02	19:10	SteveB	"Five Myths About Planned Parenthood"
CAUSES, PETITIONS, ACTIONS, ETC.
20111012-19	18:23	SteveG	Fw: DCCC Petition: Call for an Immediate Investigation into Koch Industries' Business Dealings with Iran
FRIENDS OF THE MIDDLE
20080919-04	18:48	Charlie	Hello from Houston; Blogs
20080920-02	11:06	SteveB	Re: Hello from Houston; Blogs
20080921-01	00:37	Charlie	Re: Hello from Houston; Blogs
20080923-02	17:16	SteveB	Re: Hello from Houston; Blogs
20100423-01	05:01	SteveB	Friendship
20100423-05	11:54	SteveG	Re: Friendship
20100423-06	13:06	SteveB	Re: Friendship
20100504-02	10:23	Jim	Curiosity & Reincarnation
20100504-03	11:52	SteveB	Re: Curiosity & Reincarnation
20100918-01	11:20	Pam	So...?
20101011-02	12:32	Pam	Responses
20101101-02	16:15	Pam	Trip to Stanford Reunion
20101119-01	16:42	SteveB	Re: Trip to Stanford Reunion
20101203-01	07:49	Pam	My Blog
20101210-01	17:09	SteveB	Re: My Blog
20101212-01	14:09	Pam	Re: My Blog
20110203-01	06:51	SteveB	Gasparilla

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20110203-02	07:54	Pam	Re: Gasparilla
20110204-01	10:45	SteveB	Re: Gasparilla
20110204-02	11:46	Pam	Re: Gasparilla
20110205-01	10:48	SteveB	Re: Gasparilla
20110205-02	16:14	Pam	Re: Gasparilla
20110205-03	22:48	SteveB	Re: Gasparilla
20110208-01	10:36	Pam	Re: Gasparilla
20110308-01	08:17	Pam	Common Dreams
20110308-07	15:51	SteveB	Re: Common Dreams
20110407-03	15:42	SteveB	Lucky! SteveB and Marci
20110416-07	14:22	SteveB	Friends of the Middle
20110427-03	18:01	Paula	Re: Photos of Trees
20110430-01	11:18	SteveB	Re: Photos of Trees
20110519-01	01:57	SteveG	Boyhood Adventures
20110521-01	06:36	SteveB	Re: Boyhood Adventures
20110521-08	14:05	SteveG	Re: Boyhood Adventures
20110521-09	15:08	SteveB	Re: Boyhood Adventures
20110521-13	18:00	SteveG	Re: Boyhood Adventures
20110521-14	18:08	SteveB	Re: Boyhood Adventures
20110628-01	22:05	Pam	Re: Aging Stars; The Economy, President Obama
20111008-02	09:15	Pam	Our Group
20111009-06	09:21	Lianne	Re: Our Group
20111009-10	10:58	SteveB	Re: Our Group
20111009-11	16:26	Mary	Re: Our Group
20111009-12	23:14	Mary	Re: Our Group
20111010-02	06:45	SteveB	Re: Our Group
20111010-03	07:16	SteveB	Re: Our Group
20111010-04	08:30	GaryC	Re: Our Group
20111010-09	15:37	Pam	Re: Our Group
20111010-11	16:23	Pam	Re: Our Group
20111010-13	17:32	GaryC	Re: Our Group
20111012-05	06:27	Pam	Re: Our Group
20111012-09	11:21	Pam	Re: Our Group
20111012-11	11:35	Pam	Re: Our Group
20111012-14	14:07	Jim	Re: Our Group
20111012-15	14:17	SteveB	Re: Our Group
20111012-16	14:24	Jim	Re: Our Group
20111013-25	14:23	Ben	I Find Myself Reading This Stuff Even When I Don't Have Time
20111013-32	16:51	SteveB	Re: I Find Myself Reading This Stuff...
20111020-31	16:59	Pam	Nation of Change
20111021-55	16:47	DaveY	Good-Bye
20111021-15	13:54	Pam	Re: Good-Bye
20111021-59	17:00	DaveY	Re: Good-Bye
20111021-68	18:23	SteveB	Re: Good-Bye
20111021-71	20:55	SteveB	Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111021-73	22:38	Charis	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111021-74	22:41	Charis	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111021-75	22:45	Charis	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-01	01:45	Ben	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-02	05:23	Pam	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-04	08:48	SteveB	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-05	09:56	SteveG	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-08	11:31	Pam	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-09	11:39	SteveG	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111022-10	11:58	Pam	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111023-04	09:52	SteveB	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111023-09	10:59	SteveB	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111023-10	11:12	SteveB	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
20111023-11	11:27	SteveB	Re: Big, New Plans for Our Group
FUN & DIVERSION
20080501-02	11:44	SteveB	Fw: Political Science for Dummies
20080521-01	19:07	Dick	Fw: AllMyFaves.com
20080521-02	20:49	SteveB	Re: AllMyFaves.com; Edward Kennedy R.I.P.
20090718-01	20:28	SteveB	Movie: Public Enemies
20100527-04	11:29	Tom	Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100528-01	10:32	Ben	Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100528-04	11:55	SteveB	Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100528-05	12:33	Pam	Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100528-06	14:39	Ben	Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100528-07	15:42	SteveB	Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100528-08	15:54	SteveB	Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore
20100602-02	15:30	Pam	Humor, TED, Etc.
20100921-01	06:54	SteveB	Fw: Larry the Cable Guy
20100921-02	07:11	Lianne	Re: Larry the Cable Guy
20100921-03	07:34	SteveB	Re: Larry the Cable Guy
20110220-01	09:57	SteveB	Movie Recommendations
20110220-02	13:16	Pam	Re: Movie Recommendations
20110520-03	18:03	GaryF	Video: "The Scariest Path In The World"
20110521-04	10:10	Bill	Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"
20110521-05	11:00	SteveB	Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"
20110521-06	11:32	Bill	Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"
20110521-07	12:10	SteveB	Re: "The Scariest Path In The World"
20111007-11	18:42	Dale	Trend Hunter
20111007-12	18:46	GaryC	Re: Trend Hunter
MISC., OTHER
20080316-01	09:55	SteveB	"Drug Trade Tyranny on the Border" Drug Wars
20080425-01	15:04	SteveB	To: Bill O'Reilly; 911 Operators
OCCUPY WALL ST.
20111002-01	14:49	SteveG	Fw: Occupy Wall St.
20111003-02	06:02	Pam	Re: Occupy Wall St.
20111003-04	06:56	SteveB	Re: Occupy Wall St.
20111003-03	06:04	Dennis	Video: "Occupy Wall Street Protester Lectures Fox News Reporter"
20111004-04	12:53	Pam	Re: Occupy Wall St.
20111004-07	18:14	Dennis	"Top Five Reasons Why the Occupy Wall Street Protests Embody Values of the Real Boston Tea Party"
20111017-04	10:07	SteveG	"The 99%, the 53%, and Distributive Justice"
20111017-25	13:47	SteveB	"Unsettled Times"
20111017-26	13:53	Charis	Re: "Unsettled Times"
20111017-27	14:27	SteveB	Re: "Unsettled Times"
20111017-29	14:42	GaryC	Re: "Unsettled Times"
20111017-31	15:01	Pam	Re: "Unsettled Times"
20111017-32	16:00	Art	Re: "Unsettled Times"
20111017-33	18:26	SteveG	Re: "Unsettled Times" & "Is #OWS the Revolution the Beatles Were Singing About?" (continued under heading: Health Care)
20111018-14	22:23	SteveB	"What Wall St. Protesters Have Right"
20111022-07	10:26	SteveG	Fw: UUSC Action: Sign Letter of Support for OWS
20111022-14	15:30	GaryF	No Wonder People Are Taking to the Streets
20111022-18	18:55	Dale	Re: No Wonder... & "Lawsuit Filed Against FDIC"
20111022-19	19:03	Charis	Re: No Wonder...
20111023-12	11:55	Pam	Re: No Wonder...
20111023-13	12:00	Pam	Re: No Wonder...

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20111023-01	07:19	SteveB	"LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"
20111023-02	07:54	Charis	Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"
20111023-03	09:26	SteveB	Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"
20111023-05	10:14	Charis	Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"
20111023-06	10:43	SteveB	Re: "LA Vets Demand Housing at Giant VA Campus"
20111023-07	10:48	SteveG	Fw: UUSC Action: Letter of Support for the Occupy Movement
20111023-08	10:58	Art	Re: UUSC Action: Letter of Support for the Occupy Movement
PHILOSOPHY, LIFE, ADVENTURE & ART
20070105-01	16:34	SteveB	Philosophy Pages
20070614-03	15:16	SteveB	"What Is the Meaning of Life?" Philosophy, Spirituality
20071003-01	17:17	SteveB	Life 101
20080803-02	11:13	G. Haselhurst	On Truth & Reality; Philosophy, Science
20080803-03	11:50	SteveB	Re: On Truth & Reality; Philosophy, Science
20080816-02	10:36	SteveM	Fw: Instructions for Life
20100419-02	02:36	SteveB	Quotes: Responsibility
20100420-02	15:59	SteveB	Quotes: Mothers
20100513-01	11:00	Phil	Fw: Coming Changes
20100513-02	12:42	SteveB	Re: Coming Changes
20100611-01	11:44	Pam	The Pregnant Widow by Martin Amis
20101110-01	21:07	SteveB	"Please Allow Me to Correct a Few Things"
20110128-01	16:27	SteveB	Cenesthetic Hallucination
20110322-02	15:54	SteveB	Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride
20110322-03	16:47	GaryC	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride; Socialist!
20110322-04	16:51	SteveB	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride; Elitist Fascist!
20110322-05	17:40	SteveB	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride; Not a Socialist!
20110322-06	17:59	GaryC	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride
20110322-09	21:14	GaryC	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride; Not a Fascist!
20110407-02	11:20	SteveB	"Sailor, 85, Crosses Atlantic on Raft with Friends" Let's Go!
20111006-07	14:43	SteveB	"Does Evil Exist? Neuroscientists Say No"
20111014-03	16:37	SteveB	"Steve Jobs, in His Own Words"
20111014-04	17:24	GaryC	Re: "Steve Jobs, in His Own Words"
PHYSICS & COSMOLOGY
20070529-01	15:09	SteveB	Z Pinch Machine; Sci-Fi, Physics, Energy
20070814-01	11:45	P. Marshall	"Where Did the Universe Come From?" Cosmology
20080814-07	19:12	SteveB	To: Dave Spurgel; The Big Bang, Cosmology
20080815-02	09:07	D. Spurgel	Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
20080818-03	14:35	SteveB	To: Neil deGrasse Tyson; The Big Bang, Cosmology
20080921-03	11:53	KE Saavick Ford	Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
20080921-05	12:55	SteveB	Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
20080922-01	10:21	KE Saavick Ford	Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
20090920-01	12:50	SteveB	Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
20091217-01	12:44	KE Saavick Ford	Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
20080909-02	20:11	SteveB	"Super-Smasher Targets Massive Mystery"
20090712-01	19:14	SteveB	Tesseract: 3-Dimensional Projections of Higher Dimensions
20091010-01	09:50	SteveB	"Electron Band Structure In Germanium, My A*s"
20091012-01	10:59	Ben	Re: "Electron Band Structure In Germanium, My A*s"
20100308-01	16:51	SteveB	"The Last Question"
20100621-02	13:09	Ben	"The Higgs Boson May Have 'Five Faces'"
20100621-03	14:31	SteveB	Re: "The Higgs Boson May Have 'Five Faces'"
20110329-04	16:55	SteveB	"Genius at Work: 12-Year-Old is Studying at IUPUI"
SCIENCE & TECHNOLOGY, MISC.
20070104-01	12:17	SteveB	from Language and Mind ; Linguistics
20080831-01	10:04	SteveB	"Brazil Admits Amazon Deforestation on the Rise" Environment
20081027-06	16:26	SteveB	"Sand Stolen Across Caribbean for Construction" Environment

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20081116-02	06:37	India	First Hologram on CNN
20090722-01	09:20	Ben	Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?
20090722-02	09:34	SteveB	Re: Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?
20090722-03	12:10	Ben	Re: Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?
20090722-04	13:28	SteveB	Re: Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?
20100423-02	09:50	SteveB	Photos: Eyjafjallajokull Volcano, Iceland
20100423-03	10:37	Bill	Re: Photos: Eyjafjallajokull Volcano, Iceland
20100423-04	11:21	SteveB	Re: Photos: Eyjafjallajokull Volcano, Iceland
20100521-01	15:13	SteveB	"A Step to Artificial Life: Manmade DNA Powers Cell"
20110117-01	15:21	Ben	Giant 1956 5MB IBM Hard Drive
20110119-01	09:59	SteveB	Re: Giant 1956 5MB IBM Hard Drive
20110304-02	10:52	SteveB	Apple iPad 2
20110905-01	12:06	Jim	"Humankind's Most Ambitious Science Projects"
SERIES: THE "CHURCH" (CHILD ABUSE)
20100330-01	08:35	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 1: "Losing Their Religion? Catholicism in Turmoil" & "Abuse Victims to Vatican: 'Stop Attacking Us!'"
20100330-02	08:46	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 2
20100330-03	09:20	Lianne	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 2
20100330-04	09:30	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 2
20100330-05	12:19	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100330-06	12:32	Ben	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100330-07	12:38	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100330-08	22:37	Jim	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100331-01	06:52	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100331-02	11:15	Jim	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100331-03	12:51	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3
20100404-01	07:11	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 4: "Vatican Priest Likens Criticism of Church on Abuse to Anti-Semitism"
20100404-02	08:44	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 5
20100404-03	08:56	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 6: "Cardinal Condemns 'Gossip' at Easter Mass"
20100404-04	09:52	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 7
20100405-01	09:11	Charis	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 7
20100405-02	13:17	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 7
20100406-01	22:00	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 8: "Vatican Says Pope Target of 'Hate' Campaign"
20100406-02	23:24	Larry	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 8
20100407-01	09:40	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 8
20100407-02	12:48	Larry	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 8
20100409-01	14:58	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 9: "Future Pope Stalled Pedophile Case"
20100409-02	16:58	Charis	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 9
20100410-01	18:58	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 9
20100412-01	15:00	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 10: "Vatican to Bishops: Follow Law, Report Sex Abuse"
20100412-02	16:20	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 11: "Vatican Makes Peace with Beatles after 40 Years"
20100413-01	08:58	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 12: "European Abuse Hot Lines Log Jump in Calls"
20100413-02	20:26	Marci	The "Church"—Chpt. 13: "The Pope Should Stand Trial"
20100413-03	22:01	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 14: "The Great Catholic Cover-Up"
20100415-01	14:11	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 15: "Pope Notes Attacks on Church, Urges Repentance"
20100418-01	09:36	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 16: "Pope: Church Will Protect Young from Abuse"
20100419-01	02:25	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 17: "Convento da Arrábida"
20100420-01	10:39	Lianne	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 17
20100421-01	08:00	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 18: "Pope Asleep? Benedict XVI Appears To Sleep During Malta Mass"
20100421-02	11:16	Lianne	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 18
20100421-04	12:48	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 18

DATE-ID	TIME	FROM	SUBJECT/TITLE
20100508-01	04:22	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 19: "Catholics Sent Predator Priest to Remote Village" & "Pope Accepts Resignation of German Bishop Accused of Abuse"
20100510-01	09:12	Ben	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19
20100510-02	10:47	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19
20100510-03	11:46	Ben	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19
20100510-04	12:15	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19
20100627-01	13:26	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 20: "Pope Deplores Belgian Sex Raids, Stresses Autonomy"
20100627-02	14:16	Ben	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20
20100627-03	14:21	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20
20100715-03	13:05	Pam	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20
20100716-02	08:25	SteveB	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20
20100715-04	15:11	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 21: "Vatican Issues Sex Abuse Guidelines after Crisis" & "UN: Vatican Child Rights Report 13 Years Overdue"
20110516-05	16:01	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 22 (One Chapter Too Many): "Vatican Tells Bishops to Root Out Sexual Abuse"
SPIRITUALITY & RELIGION
20070111-01	14:54	SteveB	The Bible Is Hard
20070119-01	18:27	SteveB	"Buddha on the Brain"
20070301-01	15:57	SteveB	"Decoding The Secret "
20070524-01	17:57	SteveB	"Gospel According to Judas"
20080522-02	13:01	SteveB	Fw: "Islam Is Not a Religion, Nor Is It a Cult. It Is a Complete System."
20081126-03	20:03	SteveM	Fw: Would You Run?
20081127-02	23:01	SteveB	Re: Would You Run?
20081227-01	11:12	SteveB	Reply to Some Jesus Email
20081229-01	13:01	SteveB	"Happy Birthday, Dear Yeshua, Happy Birthday to You!"
20090109-01	12:09	SteveB	Christmas
20090117-02	14:31	SteveB	The Truth, with Love
20090118-01	09:13	SteveB	"Republicans, Democrats Differ on Creationism"
20090504-01	11:03	SteveB	"Holy Pancakes! Virgin Mary Seen on Griddle"
20090806-01	02:56	Charlie	"Flying Spaghetti Monster"
20090806-02	11:05	SteveB	Re: "Flying Spaghetti Monster"
20100417-01	10:23	India	Buddhist Blog
20100417-02	11:58	SteveB	Re: Buddhist Blog
20101011-01	08:11	SteveB	"Animals Said to Have Spiritual Experiences"
20101103-01	07:16	SteveB	Our Highest Nature
20110313-01	11:53	SteveB	The Church of Steve
20110314-02	06:09	Larry	Re: The Church of Steve
20110322-01	08:49	SteveB	"Meet the Boy Who Says He Visited Heaven and Saw Jesus"
20110326-01	18:08	Larry	Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110327-01	10:37	SteveB	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110327-02	10:51	Charis	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110327-03	10:57	SteveB	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110327-04	11:09	Charis	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110327-05	16:13	SteveB	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110327-07	21:09	Larry	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110328-01	21:36	SteveB	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
20110725-01	07:47	SteveB	"Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation"
20110725-03	10:52	GaryC	Re: "Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation"
20110725-04	16:24	SteveB	Re: "Why the U.S. Is Not a Christian Nation"
20110725-02	10:09	SteveG	"Little-Known U.S. Document Signed by President Adams Proclaims America's Government Is Secular"

"Linguistic Contributions to the Study of Mind (Future)" from Language and Mind, by Noam Chomsky, 1968

(Source: Language and Mind publ. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Inc., 1968. One of the six lectures is reproduced here. Transcribed: in 1998 by Andy Blunden, proofed and corrected Feb., 2005.)

In discussing the past, I referred to two major traditions that have enriched the study of language in their separate and very different ways; and in my last lecture, I tried to give some indication of the topics that seem on the immediate horizon today, as a kind of synthesis of philosophical grammar and structural linguistics begins to take shape. Each of the major traditions of study and speculation that I have been using as a point of reference was associated with a certain characteristic approach to the problems of mind; we might say, without distortion, that each evolved as a specific branch of the psychology of its time, to which it made a distinctive contribution.

It may seem a bit paradoxical to speak of structural linguistics in this way, given its militant anti-psychologism. But the paradox is lessened when we take note of the fact that this militant anti-psychologism is no less true of much of contemporary psychology itself, particularly of those branches that until a few years ago monopolised the study of use and acquisition of language. We live, after all, in the age of "behavioural science," not of "the science of mind." I do not want to read too much into a terminological innovation, but I think that there is some significance in the ease and willingness with which modern thinking about man and society accepts the designation "behavioural science." No sane person has ever doubted that behaviour provides much of the evidence for this study — all of the evidence, if we interpret "behaviour" in a sufficiently loose sense. But the term "behavioural science" suggests a not-so-subtle shift of emphasis toward the evidence itself and away from the deeper underlying principles and abstract mental structures that might be illuminated by the evidence of behaviour. It is as if natural science were to be designated "the science of meter readings." What, in fact, would we expect of natural science in a culture that was satisfied to accept this designation for its activities?

Behavioural science has been much preoccupied with data and organisation of data, and it has even seen itself as a kind of technology of control of behaviour. Anti-mentalism in linguistics and in philosophy of language conforms to this shift of orientation. As I mentioned in my first lecture, I think that one major indirect contribution of modern structural linguistics results from its success in making explicit the assumptions of an anti-mentalistic, thoroughly operational and behaviourist approach to the phenomena of language. By extending this approach to its natural limits, it laid the groundwork for a fairly conclusive demonstration of the inadequacy of any such approach to the problems of mind.

More generally, I think that the long-range significance of the study of language lies in the fact that in this study it is possible to give a relatively sharp and clear formulation of some of the central questions of psychology and to bring a mass of evidence to bear on them. What is more, the study of language is, for the moment, unique in the combination it affords of richness of data and susceptibility to sharp formulation of basic issues.

It would, of course, be silly to try to predict the future of research, and it will be understood that I do not intend the subtitle of this lecture to be taken very seriously. Nevertheless, it is fair to suppose that the major contribution of the study of language will lie in the understanding it can provide as to the character of mental processes and the structures they form and manipulate. Therefore, instead of speculating on the likely course of research into the problems that are coming into focus today, I will concentrate here on some of the issues that arise when we try to develop the study of linguistic structure as a chapter of human psychology.

It is quite natural to expect that a concern for language will remain central to the study of human nature, as it has been in the past. Anyone concerned with the study of human nature and human capacities must somehow come to grips with the fact that all normal humans acquire language, whereas acquisition of even its barest rudiments is quite beyond the capacities of an otherwise intelligent ape — a fact that was emphasised, quite correctly, in Cartesian philosophy. It is widely thought that the extensive modern studies of animal communication challenge this classical view; and it is almost universally taken for granted that there exists a problem of explaining the "evolution" of human language from systems of animal communication. However, a careful look at recent studies of animal communication seems to me to provide little support for these assumptions. Rather, these studies simply bring out even more clearly the extent to which human language appears to be a unique phenomenon, without significant analogue in the animal world. If this is so, it is quite senseless to raise the problem of explaining the evolution of human language from more primitive systems of communication that appear at lower levels of intellectual capacity. The issue is important, and I would like to dwell on it for a moment.

The assumption that human language evolved from more primitive systems is developed in an interesting way by Karl Popper in his recently published Arthur Compton Lecture, "Clouds and Clocks." He tries to show how problems of freedom of will and Cartesian dualism can be solved by the analysis of this "evolution." I am not concerned now with the philosophical conclusions that he draws from this analysis, but with the basic assumption that there is an evolutionary development of language from simpler systems of the sort that one discovers in other organisms. Popper argues that the evolution of language passed through several stages, in particular a "lower stage" in which vocal gestures are used for expression of emotional state, for example, and a "higher stage" in which articulated sound is used for expression of thought — in Popper's terms, for description and critical argument. His discussion of stages of evolution of language suggests a kind of continuity, but in fact he establishes no relation between the lower and higher stages and does not suggest a mechanism whereby transition can take place from one stage to the next. In short, he gives no argument to show that the stages belong to a single evolutionary process. In fact, it is difficult to see what links these stages at all (except for the metaphorical use of the term "language"). There is no reason to suppose that the "gaps" are bridgeable. There is no more of a basis for assuming an evolutionary development of "higher" from "lower" stages, in this case, than there is for assuming an evolutionary development from breathing to walking; the stages have no significant analogy, it appears, and seem to involve entirely different processes and principles.

A more explicit discussion of the relation between human language and animal communication systems appears in a recent discussion by the comparative ethologist W. H. Thorpe. He points out that mammals other than man appear to lack the human ability to imitate sounds, and that one might therefore have expected birds (many of which have this ability to a remarkable extent) to be "the group which ought to have been able to evolve language in the true sense, and not the mammals." Thorpe does not suggest that human language "evolved" in any strict sense from simpler systems, but he does argue that the characteristic properties of human language can be found in animal communication systems, although "we cannot at the moment say definitely that they are all present in one particular animal." The characteristics shared by human and animal language are the properties of being "purposive," "syntactic," and "propositional." Language is purposive "in that there is nearly always in human speech a definite intention of getting something over to somebody else, altering his behaviour, his thoughts, or his general attitude toward a situation." Human language is "Syntactic" in that an utterance is a performance with an internal organisation, with structure and coherence. It is "propositional" in that it transmits information. In this sense, then, both human language and animal communication are purposive, syntactic, and propositional.

All this may be true, but it establishes very little, since when we move to the level of abstraction at which human language and animal communication fall together, almost all other behaviour is included as well. Consider walking: Clearly, walking is purposive behaviour, in the most general sense of "purposive." Walking is also "syntactic" in the sense just defined, as, in fact, Karl Lashley pointed out a long time ago in his important discussion of serial order in behaviour, to which I referred in the first lecture. Furthermore, it can certainly be informative; for example, I can signal my interest in reaching a certain goal by the speed or intensity with which I walk.

It is, incidentally, precisely in this manner that the examples of animal communication that Thorpe presents are "propositional." He cites as an example the song of the European robin, in which the rate of alternation of high and low pitch signals the intention of the bird to defend its territory; the higher the rate of alternation, the greater the intention to defend the territory. The example is interesting, but it seems to me to show very clearly the hopelessness of the attempt to relate human language to animal communication. Every animal communication system that is known (if we disregard some science fiction about dolphins) uses one of two basic principles: Either it consists of a fixed, finite number of signals, each associated with a specific range of behaviour or emotional state, as is illustrated in the extensive primate studies that have been carried out by Japanese scientists for the past several years; or it makes use of a fixed, finite number of linguistic dimensions, each of which is associated with a particular nonlinguistic dimension in such a way that selection of a point along the linguistic dimension determines and signals a certain point along the associated nonlinguistic dimension. The latter is the principle realised in Thorpe's bird-song example. Rate of alternation of high and low pitch is a linguistic dimension correlated with the nonlinguistic dimension of intention to defend a territory. The bird signals its intention to defend a territory by selecting a correlated point along the linguistic dimension of pitch alternation — I use the word "select" loosely, of course. The linguistic dimension is abstract, but the principle is clear. A communication system of the second type has an indefinitely large range of potential signals, as does human language. The mechanism and principle, however, are entirely different from those employed by human language to express indefinitely many new thoughts, intentions, feelings, and so on. It is not correct to speak of a "deficiency" of the animal system, in terms of range of potential signals; rather the opposite, since the animal system admits in principle of continuous variation along the linguistic dimension (insofar as it makes sense to speak of "continuity" in such a case), whereas human language is discrete. Hence, the issue is not one of "more" or "less," but rather of an entirely different principle of organisation. When I make some arbitrary statement in a human language — say, that "the rise of supranational corporations poses new dangers for human freedom" — I am not selecting a point along some linguistic dimension that signals a corresponding point along an associated nonlinguistic dimension, nor am I selecting a signal from a finite behavioural repertoire, innate or learned.

Furthermore, it is wrong to think of human use of language as characteristically informative, in fact or in intention. Human language can be used to inform or mislead, to clarify one's own thoughts or to display one's cleverness, or simply for play. If I speak with no concern for modifying your behaviour or thoughts, I am not using language any less than if I say exactly the same things with such intention. If we hope to understand human language and the psychological capacities on which it rests, we must first ask what it is, not how or for what purposes it is used. When we ask what human language is, we find no striking similarity to animal communication systems. There is nothing useful to be said about behaviour or thought at the level of abstraction at which animal and human communication fall together. The examples of animal communication that have been examined to date do share many of the properties of human gestural systems, and it might be reasonable to explore the possibility of direct connection in this case. But human language, it appears, is based on entirely different principles. This, I think, is an important point, often overlooked by those who approach human language as a natural, biological phenomenon; in particular, it seems rather pointless, for these reasons, to speculate about the evolution of human language from simpler systems — perhaps as absurd as it would be to speculate about the "evolution" of atoms from clouds of elementary particles.

As far as we know, possession of human language is associated with a specific type of mental organisation, not simply a higher degree of intelligence. There seems to be no substance to the view that human language is simply a more complex instance of something to be found elsewhere in the animal world. This poses a problem for the biologist, since, if true, it is an example of true "emergence" — the appearance of a qualitatively different phenomenon at a specific stage of complexity of organisation. Recognition of this fact, though formulated in entirely different terms, is what motivated much of the classical study of language by those whose primary concern was the nature of mind. And it seems to me that today there is no better or more promising way to explore the essential and distinctive properties of human intelligence than through the detailed investigation of the structure of this unique human possession. A reasonable guess, then, is that if empirically adequate generative grammars can be constructed and the universal principles that govern their structure and organisation determined, then this will be an important contribution to human psychology, in ways to which I will turn directly, in detail.

In the course of these lectures I have mentioned some of the classical ideas regarding language structure and contemporary efforts to deepen and extend them. It seems clear that we must regard linguistic competence — knowledge of a language — as an abstract system underlying behaviour, a system constituted by rules that interact to determine the form and intrinsic meaning of a potentially infinite number of sentences. Such a system — a generative grammar — provides an explication of the Humboldtian idea of "form of language," which in an obscure but suggestive remark in his great posthumous work, Über die Verschiedenheit des Menschlichen Sprachbaues, Humboldt defines as "that constant and unvarying system of processes underlying the mental act of raising articulated structurally organised signals to an expression of thought." Such a grammar defines a language in the Humboldtian sense, namely as "a recursively generated system, where the laws of generation are fixed and invariant, but the scope and the specific manner in which they are applied remain entirely unspecified."

In each such grammar there are particular, idiosyncratic elements, selection of which determines one specific human language; and there are general universal elements, conditions on the form and organisation of any human language, that form the subject matter for the study of "universal grammar." Among the principles of universal grammar are those I discussed in the preceding lecture — for example, the principles that distinguish deep and surface structure and that constrain the class of transformational operations that relate them. Notice, incidentally, that the existence of definite principles of universal grammar makes possible the rise of the new field of mathematical linguistics, a field that submits to abstract study the class of generative systems meeting the conditions set forth in universal grammar. This inquiry aims to elaborate the formal properties of any possible human language. The field is in its infancy; it is only in the last decade that the possibility of such an enterprise has been envisioned. It has some promising initial results, and it suggests one possible direction for future research that might prove to be of great importance. Thus, mathematical linguistics seems for the moment to be in a uniquely favourable position, among mathematical approaches in the social and psychological sciences, to develop not simply as a theory of data, but as the study of highly abstract principles and structures that determine the character of human mental processes. In this case, the mental processes in question are those involved in the organisation of one specific domain of human knowledge, namely knowledge of language.

The theory of generative grammar, both particular and universal, points to a conceptual lacuna in psychological theory that I believe is worth mentioning. Psychology conceived as "behavioural science" has been concerned with behaviour and acquisition or control of behaviour. It has no concept corresponding to "competence," in the sense in which competence is characterised by a generative grammar. The theory of learning has limited itself to a narrow and surely inadequate concept of what is learned — namely a system of stimulus-response connections, a network of associations, a repertoire of behavioural items, a habit hierarchy, or a system of dispositions to respond in a particular way under specifiable stimulus conditions. Insofar as behavioural psychology has been applied to education or therapy, it has correspondingly limited itself to this concept of "what is learned." But a generative grammar cannot be characterised in these terms. What is necessary, in addition to the concept of behaviour and learning, is a concept of what is learned — a notion of competence — that lies beyond the conceptual limits of behaviourist psychological theory. Like much of modern linguistics and modern philosophy of language, behaviourist psychology has quite consciously accepted methodological restrictions that do not permit the study of systems of the necessary complexity and abstractness. One important future contribution of the study of language to general psychology may be to focus attention on this conceptual gap and to demonstrate how it may be filled by the elaboration of a system of underlying competence in one domain of human intelligence.

There is an obvious sense in which any aspect of psychology is based ultimately on the observation of behaviour. But it is not at all obvious that the study of learning should proceed directly to the investigation of factors that control behaviour or of conditions under which a "behavioural repertoire" is established. It is first necessary to determine the significant characteristics of this behavioural repertoire, the principles on which it is organised. A meaningful study of learning can proceed only after this preliminary task has been carried out and has led to a reasonably well-confirmed theory of underlying competence — in the case of language, to the formulation of the generative grammar that underlies the observed use of language. Such a study will concern itself with the relation between the data available to the organism and the competence that it acquires; only to the extent that the abstraction to competence has been successful — in the case of language, to the extent that the postulated grammar is "descriptively adequate" in the sense described in Lecture 2 — can the investigation of learning hope to achieve meaningful results. If, in some domain, the organisation of the behavioural repertoire is quite trivial and elementary, then there will be little harm in avoiding the intermediate stage of theory construction, in which we attempt to characterise accurately the competence that is acquired. But one cannot count on this being the case, and in the study of language it surely is not the case. With a richer and more adequate characterisation of "what is learned" — of the underlying competence that constitutes the "final state" of the organism being studied — it may be possible to approach the task of constructing a theory of learning that will be much less restricted in scope than modern behavioural psychology has proved to be. Surely it is pointless to accept methodological strictures that preclude such an approach to problems of learning.

Are there other areas of human competence where one might hope to develop a fruitful theory, analogous to generative grammar? Although this is a very important question, there is very little that can be said about it today. One might, for example, consider the problem of how a person comes to acquire a certain concept of three-dimensional space, or an implicit "theory of human action," in similar terms. Such a study would begin with the attempt to characterise the implicit theory that underlies actual performance and would then turn to the question of how this theory develops under the given conditions of time and access to data, that is, in what way the resulting system of beliefs is determined by the interplay of available data, "heuristic procedures," and the innate schematism that restricts and conditions the form of the acquired system. At the moment, this is nothing more than a sketch of a program of research.

There have been some attempts to study the structure of other, language-like systems — the study of kinship systems and folk taxonomies comes to mind, for example. But so far, at least, nothing has been discovered that is even roughly comparable to language in these domains. No one, to my knowledge, has devoted more thought to this problem than Lévi-Strauss. For example, his recent book on the categories of primitive mentality is a serious and thoughtful attempt to come to grips with this problem. Nevertheless, I do not see what conclusions can be reached from a study of his materials beyond the fact that the savage mind attempts to impose some organisation on the physical world — that humans classify, if they perform any mental acts at all. Specifically, Lévi-Strauss's well-known critique of totemism seems to reduce to little more than this conclusion.

Lévi-Strauss models his investigations quite consciously on structural linguistics, particularly on the work of Troubetzkoy and Jakobson. He repeatedly and quite correctly emphasises that one cannot simply apply procedures analogous to those of phonemic analysis to subsystems of society and culture. Rather, he is concerned with structures "where they may be found ... in the kinship system, political ideology, mythology, ritual, art," and so on, and he wishes to examine the formal properties of these structures in their own terms. But several reservations are necessary when structural linguistics is used as a model in this way. For one thing, the structure of a phonological system is of very little interest as a formal object; there is nothing of significance to be said, from a formal point of view, about a set of forty-odd elements cross-classified in terms of eight or ten features. The significance of structuralist phonology, as developed by Troubetzkoy, Jakobson, and others, lies not in the formal properties of phonemic systems but in the fact that a fairly small number of features that can be specified in absolute, language-independent terms appear to provide the basis for the organisation of all phonological systems. The achievement of structuralist phonology was to show that the phonological rules of a great variety of languages apply to classes of elements that can be simply characterised in terms of these features; that historical change affects such classes in a uniform way; and that the organisation of features plays a basic role in the use and acquisition of language. This was a discovery of the greatest importance, and it provides the groundwork for much of contemporary linguistics. But if we abstract away from the specific universal set of features and the rule systems in which they function, little of any significance remains.

Furthermore, to a greater and greater extent, current work in phonology is demonstrating that the real richness of phonological systems lies not in the structural patterns of phonemes but rather in the intricate systems of rules by which these patterns are formed, modified, and elaborated. The structural patterns that arise at various stages of derivation are a kind of epiphenomenon. The system of phonological rules makes use of the universal features in a fundamental way, but it is the properties of the systems of rules, it seems to me, that really shed light on the specific nature of the organisation of language. For example, there appear to be very general conditions, such as the principle of cyclic ordering (discussed in the preceding lecture) and others that are still more abstract, that govern the application of these rules, and there are many interesting and unsolved questions as to how the choice of rules is determined by intrinsic, universal relations among features. Furthermore, the idea of a mathematical investigation of language structures, to which Lévi-Strauss occasionally alludes, becomes meaningful only when one considers systems of rules with infinite generative capacity. There is nothing to be said about the abstract structure of the various patterns that appear at various stages of derivation. If this is correct, then one cannot expect structuralist phonology, in itself, to provide a useful model for investigation of other cultural and social systems.

In general, the problem of extending concepts of linguistic structure to other cognitive systems seems to me, for the moment, in not too promising a state, although it is no doubt too early for pessimism.

Before turning to the general implications of the study of linguistic competence and, more specifically, to the conclusions of universal grammar, it is well to make sure of the status of these conclusions in the light of current knowledge of the possible diversity of language. In my first lecture, I quoted the remarks of William Dwight Whitney about what he referred to as "the infinite diversity of human speech," the boundless variety that, he maintained, undermines the claims of philosophical grammar to psychological relevance.

Philosophical grammarians had typically maintained that languages vary little in their deep structures, though there may be wide variability in surface manifestations. Thus there is, in this view, an underlying structure of grammatical relations and categories, and certain aspects of human thought and mentality are essentially invariant across languages, although languages may differ as to whether they express the grammatical relations formally by inflection or word order, for example. Furthermore, an investigation of their work indicates that the underlying recursive principles that generate deep structure were assumed to be restricted in certain ways — for example, by the condition that new structures are formed only by the insertion of new "propositional content," new structures that themselves correspond to actual simple sentences, in fixed positions in already formed structures. Similarly, the grammatical transformations that form surface structures through reordering, ellipsis, and other formal operations must themselves meet certain fixed general conditions, such as those discussed in the preceding lecture. In short, the theories of philosophical grammar, and the more recent elaborations of these theories, make the assumption that languages will differ very little, despite considerable diversity in superficial realisation, when we discover their deeper structures and unearth their fundamental mechanisms and principles.

It is interesting to observe that this assumption persisted even through the period of German romanticism, which was, of course, much preoccupied with the diversity of cultures and with the many rich possibilities for human intellectual development. Thus, Wilhelm von Humboldt, who is now best remembered for his ideas concerning the variety of languages and the association of diverse language structures with divergent "world-views," nevertheless held firmly that underlying any human language we will find a system that is universal, that simply expresses man's unique intellectual attributes. For this reason, it was possible for him to maintain the rationalist view that language is not really learned — certainly not taught — but rather develops "from within," in an essentially predetermined way, when the appropriate environmental conditions exist. One cannot really teach a first language, he argued, but can only "provide the thread along which it will develop of its own accord," by processes more like maturation than learning. This Platonistic element in Humboldt's thought is a pervasive one; for Humboldt, it was as natural to propose an essentially Platonistic theory of "learning" as it was for Rousseau to found his critique of repressive social institutions on a conception of human freedom that derives from strictly Cartesian assumptions regarding the limitations of mechanical explanation. And in general it seems appropriate to construe both the psychology and the linguistics of the romantic period as in large part a natural outgrowth of rationalist conceptions.

The issue raised by Whitney against Humboldt and philosophical grammar in general is of great significance with respect to the implications of linguistics for general human psychology. Evidently, these implications can be truly far-reaching only if the rationalist view is essentially correct, in which case the structure of language can truly serve as a "mirror of mind," in both its particular and its universal aspects. It is widely believed that modern anthropology has established the falsity of the assumptions of the rationalist universal grammarians by demonstrating through empirical study that languages may, in fact, exhibit the widest diversity. Whitney's claims regarding the diversity of languages are reiterated throughout the modern period; Martin Joos, for example, is simply expressing the conventional wisdom when he takes the basic conclusion of modern anthropological linguistics to be that "languages can differ without limit as to either extent or direction."

The belief that anthropological linguistics has demolished the assumptions of universal grammar seems to me to be quite false in two important respects. First, it misinterprets the views of classical rationalist grammar, which held that languages are similar only at the deeper level, the level at which grammatical relations are expressed and at which the processes that provide for the creative aspect of language use are to be found. Second, this belief seriously misinterprets the findings of anthropological linguistics, which has, in fact, restricted itself almost completely to fairly superficial aspects of language structure.

To say this is not to criticise anthropological linguistics, a field that is faced with compelling problems of its own — in particular, the problem of obtaining at least some record of the rapidly vanishing languages of the primitive world. Nevertheless, it is important to bear in mind this fundamental limitation on its achievements in considering the light it can shed on the theses of universal grammar. Anthropological studies (like structural linguistic studies in general) do not attempt to reveal the underlying core of generative processes in language — that is, the processes that determine the deeper levels of structure and that constitute the systematic means for creating ever novel sentence types. Therefore, they obviously cannot have any real bearing on the classical assumption that these underlying generative processes vary only slightly from language to language. In fact, what evidence is now available suggests that if universal grammar has serious defects, as indeed it does from a modern point of view, then these defects lie in the failure to recognise the abstract nature of linguistic structure and to impose sufficiently strong and restrictive conditions on the form of any human language. And a characteristic feature of current work in linguistics is its concern for linguistic universals of a sort that can only be detected through a detailed investigation of particular languages, universals governing properties of language that are simply not accessible to investigation within the restricted framework that has been adopted, often for very good reasons, within anthropological linguistics.

I think that if we contemplate the classical problem of psychology, that of accounting for human knowledge, we cannot avoid being struck by the enormous disparity between knowledge and experience — in the case of language, between the generative grammar that expresses the linguistic competence of the native speaker and the meagre and degenerate data on the basis of which he has constructed this grammar for himself. In principle the theory of learning should deal with this problem; but in fact it bypasses the problem, because of the conceptual gap that I mentioned earlier. The problem cannot even be formulated in any sensible way until we develop the concept of competence, alongside the concepts of learning and behaviour, and apply this concept in some domain. The fact is that this concept has so far been extensively developed and applied only in the study of human language. It is only in this domain that we have at least the first steps toward an account of competence, namely the fragmentary generative grammars that have been constructed for particular languages. As the study of language progresses, we can expect with some confidence that these grammars will be extended in scope and depth, although it will hardly come as a surprise if the first proposals are found to be mistaken in fundamental ways.

Insofar as we have a tentative first approximation to a generative grammar for some language, we can for the first time formulate in a useful way the problem of origin of knowledge. In other words, we can ask the question, What initial structure must be attributed to the mind that enables it to construct such a grammar from the data of sense? Some of the empirical conditions that must be met by any such assumption about innate structure are moderately clear. Thus, it appears to be a species-specific capacity that is essentially independent of intelligence, and we can make a fairly good estimate of the amount of data that is necessary for the task to be successfully accomplished. We know that the grammars that are in fact constructed vary only slightly among speakers of the same language, despite wide variations not only in intelligence but also in the conditions under which language is acquired. As participants in a certain culture, we are naturally aware of the great differences in ability to use language, in knowledge of vocabulary, and so on that result from differences in native ability and from differences in conditions of acquisition; we naturally pay much less attention to the similarities and to common knowledge, which we take for granted. But if we manage to establish the requisite psychic distance, if we actually compare the generative grammars that must be postulated for different speakers of the same language, we find that the similarities that we take for granted are quite marked and that the divergences are few and marginal. What is more, it seems that dialects that are superficially quite remote, even barely intelligible on first contact, share a vast central core of common rules and processes and differ very slightly in underlying structures, which seem to remain invariant through long historical eras. Furthermore, we discover a substantial system of principles that do not vary among languages that are, as far as we know, entirely unrelated.

The central problems in this domain are empirical ones that are, in principle at least, quite straightforward, difficult as they may be to solve in a satisfactory way. We must postulate an innate structure that is rich enough to account for the disparity between experience and knowledge, one that can account for the construction of the empirically justified generative grammars within the given limitations of time and access to data. At the same time, this postulated innate mental structure must not be so rich and restrictive as to exclude certain known languages. There is, in other words, an upper bound and a lower bound on the degree and exact character of the complexity that can be postulated as innate mental structure. The factual situation is obscure enough to leave room for much difference of opinion over the true nature of this innate mental structure that makes acquisition of language possible. However, there seems to me to be no doubt that this is an empirical issue, one that can be resolved by proceeding along the lines that I have just roughly outlined.

My own estimate of the situation is that the real problem for tomorrow is that of discovering an assumption regarding innate structure that is sufficiently rich, not that of finding one that is simple or elementary enough to be "plausible." There is, as far as I can see, no reasonable notion of "plausibility," no a priori insight into what innate structures are permissible, that can guide the search for a "sufficiently elementary assumption." It would be mere dogmatism to maintain without argument or evidence that the mind is simpler in its innate structure than other biological systems, just as it would be mere dogmatism to insist that the mind's organisation must necessarily follow certain set principles, determined in advance of investigation and maintained in defiance of any empirical findings. I think that the study of problems of mind has been very definitely hampered by a kind of apriorism with which these problems are generally approached. In particular, the empiricist assumptions that have dominated the study of acquisition of knowledge for many years seem to me to have been adopted quite without warrant and to have no special status among the many possibilities that one might imagine as to how the mind functions.

In this connection, it is illuminating to follow the debate that has arisen since the views I have just sketched were advanced a few years ago as a program of research — I should say, since this position was resurrected, because to a significant extent it is the traditional rationalist approach, now amplified and sharpened and made far more explicit in terms of the tentative conclusions that have been reached in the recent study of linguistic competence. Two outstanding American philosophers, Nelson Goodman and Hilary Putnam, have made recent contributions to this discussion — both misconceived, in my opinion, but instructive in the misconceptions that they reveal.

Goodman's treatment of the question suffers first from an historical misunderstanding and second from a failure to formulate correctly the exact nature of the problem of acquisition of knowledge. His historical misunderstanding has to do with the issue between Locke and whomever Locke thought he was criticising in his discussion of innate ideas. According to Goodman, "Locke made ... acutely clear" that the doctrine of innate ideas is "false or meaningless." In fact, however, Locke's critique had little relevance to any familiar doctrine of the seventeenth century. The arguments that Locke gave were considered and dealt with in quite a satisfactory way in the earliest seventeenth-century discussions of innate ideas, for example those of Lord Herbert and Descartes, both of whom took for granted that the system of innate ideas and principles would not function unless appropriate stimulation took place. For this reason, Locke's arguments, none of which took cognisance of this condition, are without force; for some reason, he avoided the issues that had been discussed in the preceding half-century. Furthermore, as Leibnitz observed, Locke's willingness to make use of a principle of "reflection" makes it almost impossible to distinguish his approach from that of the rationalists, except for his failure to take even those steps suggested by his predecessors toward specifying the character of this principle.

But, historical issues aside, I think that Goodman misconstrues the substantive problem as well. He argues that first-language learning poses no real problem, because prior to first-language learning the child has already acquired the rudiments of a symbolic system in his ordinary dealings with the environment. Hence, first-language learning is analogous to second-language learning in that the fundamental step has already been taken, and details can be elaborated within an already existing framework. This argument might have some force if it were possible to show that the specific properties of grammar — say, the distinction of deep and surface structure, the specific properties of grammatical transformations, the principles of rule ordering, and so on — were present in some form in these already acquired prelinguistic "symbolic systems." But since there is not the slightest reason to believe that this is so, the argument collapses. It is based on an equivocation similar to that discussed earlier in connection with the argument that language evolved from animal communication. In that case, as we observed, the argument turned on a metaphorical use of the term "language." In Goodman's case, the argument is based entirely on a vague use of the term "symbolic system," and it collapses as soon as we attempt to give this term a precise meaning. If it were possible to show that these prelinguistic symbolic systems share certain significant properties with natural language, we could then argue that these properties of natural language are acquired by analogy. Of course, we would then face the problem of explaining how the prelinguistic symbolic systems developed these properties. But since no one has succeeded in showing that the fundamental properties of natural language — those discussed in Lecture 2, for example — appear in prelinguistic symbolic systems or any others, the latter problem does not arise.

According to Goodman, the reason why the problem of second-language learning is different from that of first-language learning is that "once one language is available," it "can be used for giving explanation and instruction." He then goes on to argue that "acquisition of an initial language is acquisition of a secondary symbolic system" and is quite on a par with normal second-language acquisition. The primary symbolic systems to which he refers are "rudimentary-prelinguistic symbolic systems in which gestures and sensory and perceptual occurrences of all sorts function as signs." But evidently these prelinguistic symbolic systems cannot be "used for giving explanation and instruction" in the way a first language can be used in second-language instruction. Therefore, even on his own grounds, Goodman's argument is incoherent.

Goodman maintains that "the claim we are discussing cannot be experimentally tested even when we have an acknowledged example of a 'bad' language" and that "the claim has not even been formulated to the extent of citation of a single general property of 'bad' languages." The first of these conclusions is correct, in his sense of "experimental test," namely a test in which we "take an infant at birth, isolate it from all the influences of our language-bound culture, and attempt to inculcate it with one of the 'bad' artificial languages." Obviously this is not feasible. But there is no reason why we should be dismayed by the impossibility of carrying out such a test as this. There are many other ways, for example, those discussed in Lecture 2 and the references cited there — in which evidence can be obtained concerning the properties of grammars and conclusions regarding the general properties of such grammars can be put to empirical test. Any such conclusion immediately specifies, correctly or incorrectly, certain properties of "bad" languages. Since there are dozens of papers and books that attempt to formulate such properties, his second claim, that not "a single general property of 'bad' languages" has been formulated, is rather surprising. One might try to show that these attempts are misguided or questionable, but one can hardly maintain seriously that they do not exist. Any formulation of a principle of universal grammar makes a strong empirical claim, which can be falsified by finding counter-instances in some human language, along the lines of the discussion in Lecture 2. In linguistics, as in any other field, it is only in such indirect ways as this that one can hope to find evidence bearing on non-trivial hypotheses. Direct experimental tests of the sort that Goodman mentions are rarely possible, a matter that may be unfortunate but is nevertheless characteristic of most research.

At one point Goodman remarks, correctly, that even though "for certain remarkable facts I have no alternative explanation ... that alone does not dictate acceptance of whatever theory may be offered; for the theory might be worse than none. Inability to explain a fact does not condemn me to accept an intrinsically repugnant and incomprehensible theory." But now consider the theory of innate ideas that Goodman regards as "intrinsically repugnant and incomprehensible." Notice, first, that the theory is obviously not "incomprehensible," on his terms. Thus he appears to be willing, in this article, to accept the view that in some sense the mature mind contains ideas; it is obviously not "incomprehensible," then, that some of these ideas are "implanted in the mind as original equipment," to use his phraseology. And if we turn to the actual doctrine as developed in rationalist philosophy, rather than Locke's caricature, the theory becomes even more obviously comprehensible. There is nothing incomprehensible in the view that stimulation provides the occasion for the mind to apply certain innate interpretive principles, certain concepts that proceed from "the power of understanding" itself, from the faculty of thinking rather than from external objects directly. To take an example from Descartes (Reply to Objections, V):

When first in infancy we see a triangular figure depicted on paper, this figure cannot show us how a real triangle ought to be conceived in the way in which geometers consider it, because the true triangle is contained in this figure, just as the statue of Mercury is contained in a rough block of wood. But because we already possess within us the idea of a true triangle, and it can be more easily conceived by our mind than the more complex figure of the triangle drawn on paper, we, therefore, when we see the composite figure, apprehend not it itself, but rather the authentic triangle.

In this sense the idea of a triangle is innate. Surely the notion is comprehensible; there would be no difficulty, for example, in programming a computer to react to stimuli along these lines (though this would not satisfy Descartes, for other reasons). Similarly, there is no difficulty in principle in programming a computer with a schematism that sharply restricts the form of a generative grammar, with an evaluation procedure for grammars of the given form, with a technique for determining whether given data are compatible with a grammar of the given form, with a fixed substructure of entities (such as distinctive features), rules, and principles, and so on — in short, with a universal grammar of the sort that has been proposed in recent years. For reasons that I have already mentioned, I believe that these proposals can be properly regarded as a further development of classical rationalist doctrine, as an elaboration of some of its main ideas regarding language and mind. Of course, such a theory will be "repugnant" to one who accepts empiricist doctrine and regards it as immune to question or challenge. It seems to me that this is the heart of the matter.

Putnam's paper deals more directly with the points at issue, but it seems to me that his arguments are also inconclusive, because of certain incorrect assumptions that he makes about the nature of the acquired grammars. Putnam assumes that on the level of phonetics the only property proposed in universal grammar is that a language has "a short list of phonemes." This, he argues, is not a similarity among languages that requires elaborate explanatory hypotheses. The conclusion is correct; the assumption is quite wrong. In fact, as I have now pointed out several times, very strong empirical hypotheses have been proposed regarding the specific choice of universal features, conditions on the form and organisation of phonological rules, conditions on rule application, and so on. If these proposals are correct or near correct, then "similarities among languages" at the level of sound structure are indeed remarkable and cannot be accounted for simply by assumptions about memory capacity, as Putnam suggests.

Above the level of sound structure, Putnam assumes that the only significant properties of language are that they have proper names, that the grammar contains a phrase structure component, and that there are rules "abbreviating" sentences generated by the phrase structure component. He argues that the nature of the phrase structure component is determined by the existence of proper names; that the existence of a phrase structure component is explained by the fact that "all the natural measures of complexity of an algorithm — size of the machine table, length of computations, time, and space required for the computation — lead to the ... result"; that phrase structure systems provide the "algorithms which are 'simplest' for virtually any computing system," hence also "for naturally evolved 'computing systems'"; and that there is nothing surprising in the fact that languages contain rules of abbreviation.

Each of the three conclusions involves a false assumption. From the fact that a phrase structure system contains proper names one can conclude almost nothing about its other categories. In fact, there is much dispute at the moment about the general properties of the underlying phrase structure system for natural languages; the dispute is not in the least resolved by the existence of proper names.

As to the second point, it is simply untrue that all measures of complexity and speed of computation lead to phrase structure rules as the "simplest possible algorithm." The only existing results that are even indirectly relevant show that context-free phrase structure grammars (a reasonable model for rules generating deep structures, when we exclude the lexical items and the distributional conditions they meet) receive an automata-theoretic interpretation as non-deterministic push-down storage automata, but the latter is hardly a "natural" notion from the point of view of "simplicity of algorithms" and so forth. In fact, it can be argued that the somewhat similar but not formally related concept of real-time deterministic automation is far more "natural" in terms of time and space conditions on computation.

However, it is pointless to pursue this topic, because what is at stake is not the "simplicity" of phrase structure grammars but rather of transformational grammars with a phrase structure component that plays a role in generating deep structures. And there is absolutely no mathematical concept of "ease of computation" or "simplicity of algorithm" that even vaguely suggests that such systems may have some advantage over the kinds of automata that have been seriously investigated from this point of view — for example, finite state automata, linear bounded automata, and so on. The basic concept of "structure-dependent operation" has never even been considered in a strictly mathematical concept. The source of this confusion is a misconception on Putnam's part as to the nature of grammatical transformations. They are not rules that "abbreviate" sentences; rather, they are operations that form surface structures from underlying deep structures, in such ways as are illustrated in the preceding lecture and the references there cited. Hence, to show that transformational grammars are the "simplest possible" one would have to demonstrate that the "optimal" computing system would take a string of symbols as input and determine its surface structure, its underlying deep structure, and the sequence of transformational operations that relates them. Nothing of the sort has been shown; in fact, the question has never even been raised.

Putnam argues that even if significant uniformities among languages were to be discovered, there would be a simpler explanation than the hypothesis of an innate universal grammar, namely their common origin. But this proposal involves a serious misunderstanding of the problem at issue. The grammar of a language must be discovered by the child from the data presented to him. As noted earlier, the empirical problem is to find a hypothesis about initial structure rich enough to account for the fact that a specific grammar is constructed by the child, but not so rich as to be falsified by the known diversity of language.

Questions of common origin are of potential relevance to this empirical issue in only one respect: If the existing languages are not a "fair sample" of the "possible languages," we may be led mistakenly to propose too narrow a schema for universal grammar. However, as I mentioned earlier, the empirical problem that we face today is that no one has been able to devise an initial hypothesis rich enough to account for the acquisition by the child of the grammar that we are, apparently, led to attribute to him when we try to account for his ability to use the language in the normal way. The assumption of common origin contributes nothing to explaining how this achievement is possible. In short, the language is "reinvented" each time it is learned, and the empirical problem to be faced by the theory of learning is how this invention of grammar can take place.

Putnam does face this problem and suggests that there might be "general multipurpose learning strategies" that account for this achievement. It is, of course, an empirical question whether the properties of the "language faculty" are specific to language or are merely a particular case of much more general mental faculties (or learning strategies).

This is a problem that has been discussed earlier in this lecture, inconclusively and in a slightly different context. Putnam takes for granted that it is only general "learning strategies" that are innate but suggests no grounds for this empirical assumption. As I have argued earlier, a non-dogmatic approach to this problem can be pursued, without reliance on unargued assumptions of this sort — that is, through the investigation of specific areas of human competence, such as language, followed by the attempt to devise a hypothesis that will account for the development of this competence. If we discover through such investigation that the same "learning strategies" are sufficient to account for the development of competence in various domains, we will have reason to believe that Putnam's assumption is correct. If we discover that the postulated innate structures differ from case to case, the only rational conclusion would be that a model of mind must involve separate "faculties," with unique or partially unique properties. I cannot see how anyone can resolutely insist on one or the other conclusion in the light of the evidence now available to us. But one thing is quite clear: Putnam has no justification for his final conclusion, that "invoking 'Innateness' only postpones the problem of learning; it does not solve it." Invoking an innate representation of universal grammar does solve the problem of learning, if it is true that this is the basis for language acquisition, as it well may be. If, on the other hand, there are general learning strategies that account for the acquisition of grammatical knowledge, then postulation of an innate universal grammar will not "postpone" the problem of learning, but will rather offer an incorrect solution to this problem. The issue is an empirical one of truth or falsity, not a methodological one of states of investigation.

To summarise, it seems to me that neither Goodman nor Putnam offers a serious counter-argument to the proposals concerning innate mental structure that have been advanced (tentatively, of course, as befits empirical hypotheses) or suggests a plausible alternative approach, with empirical content, to the problem of acquisition of knowledge.

Assuming the rough accuracy of conclusions that seem tenable today, it is reasonable to suppose that a generative grammar is a system of many hundreds of rules of several different types, organised in accordance with certain fixed principles of ordering and applicability and containing a certain fixed substructure which, along with the general principles of organisation, is common to all languages. There is no a priori "naturalness" to such a system, any more than there is to the detailed structure of the visual cortex. No one who has given any serious thought to the problem of formalising inductive procedures or "heuristic methods" is likely to set much store by the hope that such a system as a generative grammar can be constructed by methods of any generality.

To my knowledge, the only substantive proposal to deal with the problem of acquisition of knowledge of language is the rationalist conception that I have outlined. To repeat: Suppose that we assign to the mind, as an innate property, the general theory of language that we have called "universal grammar." This theory encompasses the principles that I discussed in the preceding lecture and many others of the same sort, and it specifies a certain subsystem of rules that provides a skeletal structure for any language and a variety of conditions, formal and substantive, that any further elaboration of the grammar must meet. The theory of universal grammar, then, provides a schema to which any particular grammar must conform. Suppose, furthermore, that we can make this schema sufficiently restrictive so that very few possible grammars conforming to the schema will be consistent with the meagre and degenerate data actually available to the language learner. His task, then, is to search among the possible grammars and select one that is not definitely rejected by the data available to him. What faces the language learner, under these assumptions, is not the impossible task of inventing a highly abstract and intricately structured theory on the basis of degenerate data, but rather the much more manageable task of determining whether these data belong to one or another of a fairly restricted set of potential languages.

The tasks of the psychologist, then, divide into several sub-tasks. The first is to discover the innate schema that characterises the class of potential languages — that defines the "essence" of human language. This sub-task falls to that branch of human psychology known as linguistics; it is the problem of traditional universal grammar, of contemporary linguistic theory. The second sub-task is the detailed study of the actual character of the stimulation and the organism-environment interaction that sets the innate cognitive mechanism into operation. This is a study now being undertaken by a few psychologists, and it is particularly active right here in Berkeley. It has already led to interesting and suggestive conclusions. One might hope that such study will reveal a succession of maturational stages leading finally to a full generative grammar.

A third task is that of determining just what it means for a hypothesis about the generative grammar of a language to be "consistent" with the data of sense. Notice that it is a great oversimplification to suppose that a child must discover a generative grammar that accounts for all the linguistic data that has been presented to him and that "projects" such data to an infinite range of potential sound-meaning relations. In addition to achieving this, he must also differentiate the data of sense into those utterances that give direct evidence as to the character of the underlying grammar and those that must be rejected by the hypothesis he selects as ill-formed, deviant, fragmentary, and so on. Clearly, everyone succeeds in carrying out this task of differentiation — we all know, within tolerable limits of consistency, which sentences are well formed and literally interpretable, and which must be interpreted as metaphorical, fragmentary, and deviant along many possible dimensions. I doubt that it has been fully appreciated to what extent this complicates the problem of accounting for language acquisition. Formally speaking, the learner must select a hypothesis regarding the language to which he is exposed that rejects a good part of the data on which this hypothesis must rest. Again, it is reasonable to suppose this is possible only if the range of tenable hypotheses is quite limited — if the innate schema of universal grammar is highly restrictive. The third sub-task, then, is to study what we might think of as the problem of "confirmation" — in this context, the problem of what relation must hold between a potential grammar and a set of data for this grammar to be confirmed as the actual theory of the language in question.

I have been describing the problem of acquisition of knowledge of language in terms that are more familiar in an epistemological than a psychological context, but I think that this is quite appropriate. Formally speaking, acquisition of "common-sense knowledge" — knowledge of a language, for example — is not unlike theory construction of the most abstract sort. Speculating about the future development of the subject, it seems to me not unlikely, for the reasons I have mentioned, that learning theory will progress by establishing the innately determined set of possible hypotheses, determining the conditions of interaction that lead the mind to put forth hypotheses from this set, and fixing the conditions under which such a hypothesis is confirmed — and, perhaps, under which much of the data is rejected as irrelevant for one reason or another.

Such a way of describing the situation should not be too surprising to those familiar with the history of psychology at Berkeley, where, after all, Edward Tolman has given his name to the psychology building; but I want to stress that the hypotheses I am discussing are qualitatively different in complexity and intricacy from anything that was considered in the classical discussions of learning. As I have now emphasised several times, there seems to be little useful analogy between the theory of grammar that a person has internalised and that provides the basis for his normal, creative use of language, and any other cognitive system that has so far been isolated and described; similarly, there is little useful analogy between the schema of universal grammar that we must, I believe, assign to the mind as an innate character, and any other known system of mental organisation. It is quite possible that the lack of analogy testifies to our ignorance of other aspects of mental function, rather than to the absolute uniqueness of linguistic structure; but the fact is that we have, for the moment, no objective reason for supposing this to be true.

The way in which I have been describing acquisition of knowledge of language calls to mind a very interesting and rather neglected lecture given by Charles Sanders Peirce more than fifty years ago, in which he developed some rather similar notions about acquisition of knowledge in general. Peirce argued that the general limits of human intelligence are much more narrow than might be suggested by romantic assumptions about the limitless perfectibility of man (or, for that matter, than are suggested by his own "pragmatist" conceptions of the course of scientific progress in his better-known philosophical studies). He held that innate limitations on admissible hypotheses are a precondition for successful theory construction, and that the "guessing instinct" that provides hypotheses makes use of inductive procedures only for "corrective action," Peirce maintained in this lecture that the history of early science shows that something approximating a correct theory was discovered with remarkable ease and rapidity, on the basis of highly inadequate data, as soon as certain problems were faced; he noted "how few were the guesses that men of surpassing genius had to make before they rightly guessed the laws of nature." And, he asked, "How was it that man was ever led to entertain that true theory? You cannot say that it happened by chance, because the chances are too overwhelmingly against the single true theory in the twenty or thirty thousand years during which man has been a thinking animal, ever having come into any man's head." A fortiori, the chances are even more overwhelmingly against the true theory of each language ever having come into the head of every four-year-old child. Continuing with Peirce: "Man's mind has a natural adaptation to imagining correct theories of some kinds.... If man had not the gift of a mind adapted to his requirements, he could not have acquired any knowledge." Correspondingly, in our present case, it seems that knowledge of a language's grammar — can be acquired only by an organism that is "preset" with a severe restriction on the form of grammar. This innate restriction is a precondition, in the Kantian sense, for linguistic experience, and it appears to be the critical factor in determining the course and result of language learning. The child cannot know at birth which language he is to learn, but he must know that its grammar must be of a predetermined form that excludes many imaginable languages. Having selected a permissible hypothesis, he can use inductive evidence for corrective action, confirming or disconfirming his choice. Once the hypothesis is sufficiently well confirmed, the child knows the language defined by this hypothesis; consequently, his knowledge extends enormously beyond his experience and, in fact, leads him to characterise much of the data of experience as defective and deviant.

Peirce regarded inductive processes as rather marginal to the acquisition of knowledge; in his words, "Induction has no originality in it, but only tests a suggestion already made." To understand how knowledge is acquired, in the rationalist view that Peirce outlined, we must penetrate the mysteries of what he called "abduction," and we must discover that which "gives a rule to abduction and so puts a limit upon admissible hypotheses." Peirce maintained that the search for principles of abduction leads us to the study of innate ideas, which provide the instinctive structure of human intelligence. But Peirce was no dualist in the Cartesian sense; he argued (not very persuasively, in my opinion) that there is a significant analogy between human intelligence, with its abductive restrictions, and animal instinct. Thus, he maintained that man discovered certain true theories only because his "instincts must have involved from the beginning certain tendencies to think truly" about certain specific matters; similarly, "You cannot seriously think that every little chicken that is hatched, has to rummage through all possible theories until it lights upon the good idea of picking up something and eating it. On the contrary, you think that the chicken has an innate idea of doing this; that is to say, that it can think of this, but has no faculty of thinking anything else.... But if you are going to think every poor chicken endowed with an innate tendency towards a positive truth, why should you think to man alone this gift is denied?"

No one took up Peirce's challenge to develop a theory of abduction, to determine those principles that limit the admissible hypotheses or present them in a certain order. Even today, this remains a task for the future. It is a task that need not be undertaken if empiricist psychological doctrine can be substantiated; therefore, it is of great importance to subject this doctrine to rational analysis, as has been done, in part, in the study of language. I would like to repeat that it was the great merit of structural linguistics, as of Hullian learning theory in its early stages and of several other modern developments, to have given precise form to certain empiricist assumptions." Where this step has been taken, the inadequacy of the postulated mechanisms has been clearly demonstrated, and, in the case of language at least, we can even begin to see just why any methods of this sort must fail — for example, because they cannot, in principle, provide for the properties of deep structures and the abstract operations of formal grammar. Speculating about the future, I think it is not unlikely that the dogmatic character of the general empiricist framework and its inadequacy to human and animal intelligence will gradually become more evident as specific realisations, such as taxonomic linguistics, behaviourist learning theory, and the perception models," heuristic methods, and "general problem solvers" of the early enthusiasts of "artificial intelligence," are successively rejected on empirical grounds when they are made precise and on grounds of vacuity when they are left vague. And — assuming this projection to be accurate — it will then be possible to undertake a general study of the limits and capacities of human intelligence, to develop a Peircean logic of abduction.

Modern psychology is not devoid of such initiatives. The contemporary study of generative grammar and its universal substructure and governing principles is one such manifestation. Closely related is the study of the biological bases of human language, an investigation to which Eric Lenneberg has made substantial contributions." It is tempting to see a parallel development in the very important work of Piaget and others interested in "genetic epistemology," but I am not sure that this is accurate. It is not clear to me, for example, what Piaget takes to be the basis for the transition from one of the stages that he discusses to the next, higher stage. There is, furthermore, a possibility, suggested by recent work of Mehler and Bever," that the deservedly well-known results on conservation, in particular, may not demonstrate successive stages of intellectual development in the sense discussed by Piaget and his coworkers, but something rather different. If the preliminary results of Mehler and Bever are correct, then it would follow that the "final stage," in which conservation is properly understood, was already realised at a very early period of development. Later, the child develops a heuristic technique that is largely adequate but that fails under the conditions of the conservation experiment. Still later, he adjusts this technique successfully and once again makes the correct judgments in the conservation experiment. If this analysis is correct, then what we are observing is not a succession of stages of intellectual development, in Piaget's sense, but rather slow progress in bringing heuristic techniques into line with general concepts that have always been present. These are interesting alternatives; either way, the results may bear in important ways on the topics we are considering.

Still more clearly to the point, I think, are the developments in comparative ethology over the past thirty years, and certain current work in experimental and physiological psychology. One can cite many examples: for example, in the latter category, the work of Bower, suggesting an innate basis for the perceptual constancies; studies in the Wisconsin primate laboratory on complex innate releasing mechanisms in rhesus monkeys; the work of Hubel, Barlow, and others on highly specific analysing mechanisms in the lower cortical centers of mammals; and a number of comparable studies of lower organisms (for example, the beautiful work of Lettvin and his associates on frog vision). There is now good evidence from such investigations that perception of line, angle, motion, and other complex properties of the physical world is based on innate organisation of the neural system.

In some cases at least, these built-in structures will degenerate unless appropriate stimulation takes place at an early stage in life, but although such experience is necessary to permit the innate mechanisms to function, there is no reason to believe that it has more than a marginal effect on determining how they function to organise experience. Furthermore, there is nothing to suggest that what has so far been discovered is anywhere near the limit of complexity of innate structures. The basic techniques for exploring the neural mechanisms are only a few years old, and it is impossible to predict what order of specificity and complexity will be demonstrated when they come to be extensively applied. For the present, it seems that most complex organisms have highly specific forms of sensory and perceptual organisation that are associated with the Umwelt and the manner of life of the organism. There is little reason to doubt that what is true of lower organisms is true of humans as well. Particularly in the case of language, it is natural to expect a close relation between innate properties of the mind and features of linguistic structure; for language, after all, has no existence apart from its mental representation. Whatever properties it has must be those that are given to it by the innate mental processes of the organism that has invented it and that invents it anew with each succeeding generation, along with whatever properties are associated with the conditions of its use. Once again, it seems that language should be, for this reason, a most illuminating probe with which to explore the organisation of mental processes.

Turning to comparative ethology, it is interesting to note that one of its earliest motivations was the hope that through the "investigation of the a priori, of the innate working hypotheses present in subhuman organisms," it would be possible to shed light on the a priori forms of human thought. This formulation of intent is quoted from an early and little-known paper by Konrad Lorenz." Lorenz goes on to express views very much like those Peirce had expressed a generation earlier. He maintains:

One familiar with the innate modes of reaction of subhuman organisms can readily hypothesise that the a priori is due to hereditary differentiations of the central nervous system which have become characteristic of the species, producing hereditary dispositions to think in certain forms.... Most certainly Hume was wrong when he wanted to derive all that is a priori from that which the senses supply to experience, just as wrong as Wundt or Helmholtz who simply explain it as an abstraction from preceding experience. Adaptation of the a priori to the real world has no more originated from "experience" than adaptation of the fin of the fish to the properties of water. just as the form of the fin is given a priori, prior to any individual negotiation of the young fish with the water, and just as it is this form that makes possible this negotiation, so it is also the case with our forms of perception and categories in their relationship to our negotiation with the real external world through experience. In the case of animals, we find limitations specific to the forms of experience possible for them. We believe we can demonstrate the closest functional and probably genetic relationship between these animal a priori's and our human a priori. Contrary to Hume, we believe, just as did Kant, that a "pure" science of innate forms of human thought, independent of all experience, is possible.

Peirce, to my knowledge, is original and unique in stressing the problem of studying the rules that limit the class of possible theories. Of course, his concept of abduction, like Lorenz's biological a priori, has a strongly Kantian flavour, and all derive from the rationalist psychology that concerned itself with the forms, the limits, and the principles that provide "the sinews and connections" for human thought, that underlie "that infinite amount of knowledge of which we are not always conscious," of which Leibnitz spoke. It is therefore quite natural that we should link these developments to the revival of philosophical grammar, which grew from the same soil as an attempt, quite fruitful and legitimate, to explore one basic facet of human intelligence.

In recent discussion, models and observations derived from ethology have frequently been cited as providing biological support, or at least analogue, to new approaches to the study of human intelligence. I cite these comments of Lorenz's mainly in order to show that this reference does not distort the outlook of at least some of the founders of this domain of comparative psychology.

One word of caution is necessary in referring to Lorenz, now that he has been discovered by Robert Ardrey and Joseph Alsop and popularised as a prophet of doom. It seems to me that Lorenz's views on human aggression have been extended to near absurdity by some of his expositors. It is no doubt true that there are innate tendencies in the human psychic constitution that lead to aggressiveness under specific social and cultural conditions. But there is little reason to suppose that these tendencies are so dominant as to leave us forever tottering on the brink of a Hobbesian war of all against all — as, incidentally, Lorenz at least is fully aware, if I read him rightly. Scepticism is certainly in order when a doctrine of man's "inherent aggressiveness" comes to the surface in a society that glorifies competitiveness, in a civilisation that has been distinguished by the brutality of the attack that it has mounted against less fortunate peoples. It is fair to ask to what extent the enthusiasm for this curious view of man's nature is attributable to fact and logic and to what extent it merely reflects the limited extent to which the general cultural level has advanced since the days when Clive and the Portuguese explorers taught the meaning of true savagery to the inferior races that stood in their way.

In any event, I would not want what I am saying to be confused with other, entirely different attempts to revive a theory of human instinct. What seems to me important in ethology is its attempt to explore the innate properties that determine how knowledge is acquired and the character of this knowledge. Returning to this theme, we must consider a further question: How did the human mind come to acquire the innate structure that we are led to attribute to it? Not too surprisingly, Lorenz takes the position that this is simply a matter of natural selection. Peirce offers a rather different speculation, arguing that "nature fecundates the mind of man with ideas which, when these ideas grow up, will resemble their father, Nature." Man is "provided with certain natural beliefs that are true" because "certain uniformities ... prevail throughout the universe, and the reasoning mind is [it]self a product of this universe. These same laws are thus, by logical necessity, incorporated in his own being." Here, it seems clear that Peirce's argument is entirely without force and that it offers little improvement over the pre-established harmony that it was presumably intended to replace. The fact that the mind is a product of natural laws does not imply that it is equipped to understand these laws or to arrive at them by "abduction." There would be no difficulty in designing a device (say, programming a computer) that is a product of natural law, but that, given data, will arrive at any arbitrary absurd theory to "explain" these data.

In fact, the processes by which the human mind achieved its present stage of complexity and its particular form of innate organisation are a total mystery, as much so as the analogous questions about the physical or mental organisation of any other complex organism. It is perfectly safe to attribute this development to "natural selection," so long as we realise that there is no substance to this assertion, that it amounts to nothing more than a belief that there is some naturalistic explanation for these phenomena. The problem of accounting for evolutionary development is, in some ways, rather like that of explaining successful abduction. The laws that determine possible successful mutation and the nature of complex organisms are as unknown as the laws that determine the choice of hypotheses." With no knowledge of the laws that determine the organisation and structure of complex biological systems, it is just as senseless to ask what the "probability" is for the human mind to have reached its present state as it is to inquire into the "probability" that a particular physical theory will be devised. And, as we have noted, it is idle to speculate about laws of learning until we have some indication of what kind of knowledge is attainable — in the case of language, some indication of the constraints on the set of potential grammars.

In studying the evolution of mind, we cannot guess to what extent there are physically possible alternatives to, say, transformational generative grammar, for an organism meeting certain other physical conditions characteristic of humans. Conceivably, there are none — or very few in which case talk about evolution of the language capacity is beside the point. The vacuity of such speculation, however, has no bearing one way or another on those aspects of the problem of mind that can be sensibly pursued. It seems to me that these aspects are, for the moment, the problems illustrated in the case of language by the study of the nature, the use, and the acquisition of linguistic competence.

There is one final issue that deserves a word of comment. I have been using mentalistic terminology quite freely, but entirely without prejudice as to the question of what may be the physical realisation of the abstract mechanisms postulated to account for the phenomena of behaviour or the acquisition of knowledge. We are not constrained, as was Descartes, to postulate a second substance when we deal with phenomena that are not expressible in terms of matter in motion, in his sense. Nor is there much point in pursuing the question of psychophysical parallelism, in this connection. It is an interesting question whether the functioning and evolution of human mentality can be accommodated within the framework of physical explanation, as presently conceived, or whether there are new principles, now unknown, that must be invoked, perhaps principles that emerge only at higher levels of organisation than can now be submitted to physical investigation. We can, however, be fairly sure that there will be a physical explanation for the phenomena in question, if they can be explained at all, for an uninteresting terminological reason, namely that the concept of "physical explanation" will no doubt be extended to incorporate whatever is discovered in this domain, exactly as it was extended to accommodate gravitational and electromagnetic force, massless particles, and numerous other entities and processes that would have offended the common sense of earlier generations. But it seems clear that this issue need not delay the study of the topics that are now open to investigation, and it seems futile to speculate about matters so remote from present understanding.

I have tried to suggest that the study of language may very well, as was traditionally supposed, provide a remarkably favourable perspective for the study of human mental processes. The creative aspect of language use, when investigated with care and respect for the facts, shows that current notions of habit and generalisation, as determinants of behaviour or knowledge, are quite inadequate. The abstractness of linguistic structure reinforces this conclusion, and it suggests further that in both perception and learning the mind plays an active role in determining the character of the acquired knowledge. The empirical study of linguistic universals has led to the formulation of highly restrictive and, I believe, quite plausible hypotheses concerning the possible variety of human languages, hypotheses that contribute to the attempt to develop a theory of acquisition of knowledge that gives due place to intrinsic mental activity. It seems to me, then, that the study of language should occupy a central place in general psychology.

Surely the classical questions of language and mind receive no final solution, or even the hint of a final solution, from the work that is being actively pursued today. Nevertheless, these problems can be formulated in new ways and seen in a new light. For the first time in many years, it seems to me, there is some real opportunity for substantial progress in the study of the contribution of the mind to perception and the innate basis for acquisition of knowledge. Still, in many respects, we have not made the first approach to a real answer to the classical problems. For example, the central problems relating to the creative aspect of language use remain as inaccessible as they have always been. And the study of universal semantics, surely crucial to the full investigation of language structure, has barely advanced since the medieval period. Many other critical areas might be mentioned where progress has been slow or nonexistent. Real progress has been made in the study of the mechanisms of language, the formal principles that make possible the creative aspect of language use and that determine the phonetic form and semantic content of utterances. Our understanding of these mechanisms, though only fragmentary, does seem to me to have real implications for the study of human psychology. By pursuing the kinds of research that now seem feasible and by focusing attention on certain problems that are now accessible to study, we may be able to spell out in some detail the elaborate and abstract computations that determine, in part, the nature of percepts and the character of the knowledge that we can acquire the highly specific ways of interpreting phenomena that are, in large measure, beyond our consciousness and control and that may be unique to man.

20070105-01	16:34	SteveB	Philosophy Pages
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------

Dear Garth Kemerling:

I have greatly enjoyed "going back to college" reading your online materials. They have been most helpful in my research for a novel I am working on. Thank you so much! Good job!

<http://www.philosophypages.com/>

I am an American writer living in Bolivia, where I've found the perfect writing environment, though I am about ready to come back to the States for a while.

I found quite a few errors in your History and have done my best to correct them in the attached Word document (turn on "track changes" to get a better view of them). I have also included questions and comments mainly for my own use, but some are directed to you...if you have time...

I'm especially interested in later twentieth century developments that I believe greatly impact philosophy but don't know of anyone writing philosophically on these subjects. These are: 1) the promise of discovering more about the nature of perception and reality that psychotropic substances seem to offer; 2) the rise of computers and what the implications are of artificial intelligence (Did you see the Matrix?), but more from the perspective of possible A.I entities themselves. Maybe that's what we are!

Take care and, again, thank you very much!

20070111-01	14:54	SteveB	The Bible Is Hard
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------------

Dear Marci,

An interesting Biblical story that illustrates how dangerous it is to take the Bible literally:

The story of the "three kings" or "magi" who visited the Christ child by following the star has some interesting facets.

It turns out that they probably weren't kings at all. I guess "magus" is the ancient Arabic word for astrologer or sorcerer. This is probably what they were, though they may have followed a star. There is no corroborating history of any kings visiting, and it is pretty unbelievable that a king of that time would travel a large distance, essentially by himself, without his "people". You know?

The word was passed to Hebrew, then to Greek, then to French, and then to English. It is the root of the English words "magic" and "magician".

I think almost every Bible story has at least one hidden and/or symbolic/allegorical side to it.

20070119-01	18:27	SteveB	"Buddha on the Brain"
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

"Buddha on the Brain" by Steve Paulson, Salon

Nov. 27, 2006, (http://www.salon.com/2006/11/27/wallace_11/)

(Ex-monk B. Alan Wallace explains what Buddhism can teach Western scientists, why reincarnation should be taken seriously and what it's like to study meditation with the Dalai Lama.)

The debate between science and religion typically gets stuck on the thorny question of God's existence. How do you reconcile an all-powerful God with the mechanistic slog of evolution? Can a rationalist do anything but sneer at the Bible's miracles? But what if another religion — a nontheistic one — offered a way out of this impasse? That's the promise that some people hold out for in Buddhism. The Dalai Lama himself is deeply invested in reconciling science and spirituality. He meets regularly with Western scientists, looking for links between Buddhism and the latest research in physics and neuroscience. In his book The Universe in a Single Atom, he wrote, "If scientific analysis were conclusively to demonstrate certain claims in Buddhism to be false, then we must accept the findings of science and abandon those claims."

B. Alan Wallace may be the American Buddhist most committed to finding connections between Buddhism and science. An ex-Buddhist monk who went on to get a doctorate in religious studies at Stanford, he once studied under the Dalai Lama, and has acted as one of the Tibetan leader's translators. Wallace, now president of the Santa Barbara Institute for Consciousness Studies, has written and edited many books, often challenging the conventions of modern science. "The sacred object of its reverence, awe and devotion is not God or spiritual enlightenment but the material universe," he writes. He accuses prominent scientists like E.O. Wilson and Richard Dawkins of practicing "a modern kind of nature religion."

In his new book, Contemplative Science: Where Buddhism and Neuroscience Converge, Wallace takes on the loaded subject of consciousness. He argues that the long tradition of Buddhist meditation, with its rigorous investigation of the mind, has in effect pioneered a science of consciousness, and that it has much to teach Western scientists. "Subjectivity is the central taboo of scientific materialism," he writes. He considers the Buddhist examination of interior mental states far preferable to what he calls the Western "idolatry of the brain." And he says the modern obsession with brain chemistry has created a false sense of well-being: "It is natural then to view psychopharmaceutical and psychotropic drugs as primary sources of happiness and relief from suffering." Wallace also chastises cognitive psychologists and neuroscientists for assuming the mind is merely the product of the physical mechanics of the brain. And he talks openly about ideas that most scientists would consider laughable, including reincarnation and a transcendent consciousness.

In conversation, Wallace is a fast talker who laughs easily and often gets carried away with his enthusiasm. I spoke with him by phone about the Buddhist theory of consciousness, his critique of both science and Christianity, and why he thinks reincarnation should be studied by scientists.

Why do you think Buddhism has an important perspective to add to the science and religion debate?

Buddhism has a lot to add for a number of reasons. Some are simply historical. Especially since the time of Galileo, there has been a sense of unease, if not outright hot war, between religion and science in the West. And Buddhism is coming in as a complete outsider. It's not theistic, as is Christianity. At the same time, it's not just science, as is physics or biology. And there's another reason why Buddhism may bring a fresh perspective. While there's no question that Buddhism has very religious elements to it — with monks and temples, rituals and prayers — it does have a broad range of empirical methods for investigating the nature of the mind, for raising hypotheses and putting them to the test.

There's a common assumption that science and religion are entirely separate domains. Science covers the empirical realm of facts and theories about the observable world, while religion deals with ultimate meaning and moral value. But you don't accept that dichotomy, do you?

Not at all. In fact, most religious people don't. This is a notion that's been brought up by Stephen Jay Gould with his whole notion of "non-overlapping magisteria." But it's never been true. All of the great pioneers of the scientific revolution — Copernicus, Galileo, Kepler, Newton, and on into the 19th century with Gregor Mendel — they were all Christians. And their whole approach to science was deeply influenced by Christianity. Religion, whether we like it or not, is making many truth claims about the natural world, as well as the transcendent world. And now that science is honing in on the nature of the mind and questions of free will, it is definitely invading the turf that used to belong to religion and philosophy.

Many people would acknowledge that Buddhism has some profound insights into the human mind — why we get depressed, what makes us happy and how we become slaves to our attachments. But what does this have to do with science?

In Buddhism, the very root of suffering and all our mental distress — what Buddhists call mental afflictions — is ignorance. The path to liberation, or enlightenment, is knowledge. It's knowing reality as it is. So despite many differences in methodology, both science and Buddhism are after knowledge of the natural world. But what defines the natural world? In modern science, the natural world is often equated with the physical world, and mental phenomena and subjective experiences are regarded as emergent phenomena or simply functions of the brain. But there are many other domains of reality that the physical instruments of science have not yet been able to detect.

But science is as much about method as anything. The scientific method posits hypotheses and theories that can be tested. Is that something Buddhism does as well?

Not in the same way. I wouldn't want to overplay the case that Buddhism has always been a science, with clear hypotheses and complete skepticism. It's too much of a religion, and so there's a lot of vested interest in the Buddhist community not to challenge the statements made by the Buddha and other great patriarchs in the Buddhist tradition. So there are some fundamental differences. At the same time, science is not just science. This very notion that the mind must simply be an emergent property of the brain — consisting only of physical phenomena and nothing more — is not a testable hypothesis. Science is based upon a very profound metaphysical foundation. Can you test the statement that there is nothing else going on apart from physical phenomena and their emergent properties? The answer is no.

You're saying we don't know for sure that the physical functions of the brain — the neural circuits, the electrochemical surges — are what produce our rich inner lives, what we call the mind?

Cognitive science has plenty of hypotheses that are testable. For instance, is Alzheimer's related to a particular malfunctioning of the brain? More and more, scientists are able to identify the parts and functions of the brain that are necessary to generate specific mental states. So these are scientific issues. But now let's tap into what the philosopher David Chalmers has called "the hard problem" — the relationship between the physical brain and consciousness. What is it about the brain — this mass of chemicals and electromagnetic fields — that enables it to generate any state of subjective experience? If your sole access to the mind is by way of physical phenomena, then you have no way of testing whether all dimensions of the mind are necessarily contingent upon the brain.

But that is certainly the paradigm of the vast majority of neuroscientists and psychologists. The mind is nothing more than the brain, and what happens in the mind is strictly because of the physical mechanics of the brain. I'm sure most of these scientists would say it's absurd to talk about the mind functioning independently of the brain.

Well, when you have no possible means of investigating the mind as it might operate independently of the brain, then to even raise it as an issue is indeed absurd. But there is one avenue of inquiry that's been largely left out or simply repudiated. Right now, you and I have an ability to monitor our own mental states. Can we generate a mental image of an apple? Can we remember our mother's face? Can we recite the opening lines of the Gettysburg Address or some favorite poem? Are these mental images that you generate nothing other than brain states or parts of the brain? At this point, those are not even scientific questions because nobody knows how to tackle them.

You have called for a new field of study, what you call "contemplative science." What would that involve?

Contemplative science must live up to the rigorous standards that neuroscience, cognitive psychology, chemistry and physics have set for us. They've set the bar very high. So I'm a great admirer of the rigor and skepticism of science at its best. But William James, who's one of my intellectual heroes, suggested we have a triadic approach. We should study the mind by way of behavior and brain studies, but, first and foremost, he said, we should study the mind by observing mental phenomena directly. But what he didn't have, and neither did any of his contemporaries, was a rigorous methodology.

Is that what Buddhism offers — a rigorous methodology?

Yes. I'm not saying we should fuse religion with science. Rather, we should select very specific methodologies from Buddhism and other contemplative traditions where the ability to monitor the mind has been honed over thousands of years — beginning with the training of attention and then using sophisticated methods for investigating the nature of the mind, feelings and the very nature of consciousness itself during the waking state, the dream state, even during deep sleep. Now, because of the great advances in transportation and communications, we have easy access to the Taoist tradition of China, the Sufi tradition of the Near East, the Buddhist tradition of Tibet and Southeast Asia. I'm convinced this would add much greater depth and breadth to the types of questions that are raised in modern cognitive science.

In science, you have a hypothesis that's tested, and it can be disproved. Does that happen in Buddhism?

On its home turf, frequently not. But I'm also waiting for a neuroscientist to tell me how the hypothesis that mental states are nothing more than neural states will be repudiated. I don't see that as a testable hypothesis. So there's a fair amount of dogma, not in science per se but in the minds of scientists. Likewise, there's plenty of dogma in the minds of Buddhists. But Buddhism at its best — and we go right back to the teachings of the Buddha himself — encourages a spirit of skepticism. He said, "Do not take my statements to be true simply out of reverence for me. But rather, put them to the test." Well, if you do that, you should be able to repudiate them as well as confirm them.

Well, let me ask you about that. I know there is a tradition, particularly among advanced contemplatives, that you have your meditative experience, and then you talk about it, you analyze it, and your peers critique it. Does that really happen? When someone comes out of meditation, would someone else say, "Sorry. You didn't do it right"?

Absolutely. You know, Buddhism, like any other tradition, is subject to degeneration. So if you and I headed off to India or Nepal or Tibet, we'd find plenty of Buddhist meditators who are simply going through rote ritual, who are just trying to come up with the right answers at the end of the book. But when Buddhism is really thriving, it's exactly what you described. You go into a three-year retreat, where you are meditating eight to 12 hours a day. You're training the mind. You're investigating the nature of the mind. But you're probably not doing that in entire isolation. You're in consultation with a mentor who's going to review your experience and help you deepen your experience. You'll be questioning your insights. So [your] relationship with your mentor is analogous to working on your Ph.D. with a mentor. If at any point your research becomes flaky or not up to snuff, the mentor is there to say, "No, that's a dead end. This is not good research." This happens frequently in the Buddhist contemplative tradition when it's really robust and healthy.

Has that happened to you? You've meditated for decades. And you were a Buddhist monk for 14 years. Did you have your meditative practice analyzed and critiqued?

Definitely.

I can imagine that might be kind of humiliating.

[Laughs] No. Take the first long retreat I did in 1980. I was a monk at the time. I'd just spent the last 10 years in very rigorous theoretical and practical training in India and in a monastery in Switzerland. And then all I wanted to do was go to the lab — basically, go into a meditation hut and spend eight, 10, 12 hours a day meditating. Well, I had the tremendously good fortune to have the Dalai Lama as my personal mentor. So he guided me in the meditation. I would meet with him every few weeks. I would discuss the practice and he'd give me feedback. I was living in a little hut in the mountains above Dharamsala, India. I went into a five-month solitary retreat. Somebody brought me food once a week. I was meditating 10 hours a day. I was honing my attention skills. And I would consult with the Dalai Lama. I would consult with other yogis up there on the hill about technique and problems that were arising. They would draw from their decades of experience to help me. And I started to adapt some of these methods for myself as a Westerner who grew up in America and Europe, rather than as a nomad at 14,000 [feet] up on the Tibetan plateau.

Did you have profound mystical experiences? Did you have moments of what might be called enlightenment?

Well, the word "enlightenment" has been used in so many different ways, I won't tread on that mine field. Eighteenth century Europe itself went through an Enlightenment, but I'm not sure that would be an enlightenment in my category. So for me to make any claims about enlightenment would be counterproductive. Did I find any transformation of consciousness? Did I find attention skills honed? Did I experience states of consciousness that I'd never experienced before such sustained meditative training? The answer is yes, yes, yes. But what a mature meditator is even more concerned with than those epiphanies — those moments of revelation or breakthrough — is the overall impact on the quality of your life, your way of engaging with other people and dealing with adversity. Is it helpful? Does it give you a clearer sense of reality? If it doesn't, then I say meditation is merely a hobby. If it does, then meditation can be something very central to developing greater mental health and clear engagement with reality itself.

I've heard that your father was a Protestant theologian. It does raise the question of why you became a Buddhist. Why has Buddhism resonated with you in a way that Christianity has not?

Well, it's a personal issue. You're quite right. My father was — and is — a Christian theologian. We have a loving and very trusting relationship. The fact that he is a Christian theologian definitely had a profound impact on the course my life has taken. As I was growing up, from the age of 13, I had a very clear sense that I wanted to dedicate my life to science. And so I immersed myself in chemistry, biology, physics and calculus. At the same time, my religious background had made a very deep impact on my life. But what really struck me very painfully — I would say existentially — was the profound incompatibility between science and the whole worldview of Christianity, with God being the creator, responding to prayer, and human identity being that of an immortal soul. Basically, everything was God saturated in this Judeo-Christian view. On the other hand, in the scientific worldview I was simply a body, an animal. There was no creator. There was no ethics in nature. It was just Darwin. It was a great big machine. And I looked at these two worldviews and said, "Wow, these are incompatible."

So I basically went AWOL from Western civilization for 14 years. I picked up one book on Buddhism when I was 20. It was like a starving man picking up some fragrance of hot baked bread. So I spent a year studying the Tibetan language in Germany, where I was spending a year abroad. And then I bought myself, literally and metaphorically, a one-way ticket to India. I wanted to go live with Tibetans and explore as deeply as I could this Buddhist worldview. It's not just a religion. It's not theistic. It doesn't posit the existence of God as standing outside of creation, governing it, ruling it, punishing the wicked and rewarding the virtuous. It doesn't have any of that. Nor is it materialistic, flattening my very existence to being an epiphenomenon of my brain.

You've suggested that there might be certain functions of the mind, certain aspects of consciousness, that don't have a material foundation.

Yes.

Advanced contemplatives in the Buddhist tradition have talked about tapping into something called the "substrate consciousness." What is that?

Just for a clarification of terms, I've demarcated three whole dimensions of consciousness. There's the psyche. It's the human mind — the functioning of memory, attention, emotions and so forth. The psyche is contingent upon the brain, the nervous system, and our various sensory faculties. It starts sometime at or following conception, certainly during gestation, and it ends at death. So the psyche has pretty clear bookends. This is what cognitive neuroscientists and psychologists study. They don't study anything more. And they quite reasonably assume that that's all there is to it. But as long as you study the mind only by way of brain states and behavior, you're never going to know whether there's any other dimension because of the limitations of your own methodologies. So here's a hypothesis: The psyche does not emerge from the brain. Mental phenomena do not actually emerge from neuronal configurations. Nobody's ever seen that they do.

So your hypothesis is just the reverse from what all the neuroscientists think.

Precisely. The psyche is not emerging from the brain, conditioned by the environment. The human psyche is in fact emerging from an individual continuum of consciousness that is conjoined with the brain during the development of the fetus. It can be very hampered if the brain malfunctions or becomes damaged.

But you're saying there are also two other aspects of consciousness?

Yeah. All I'm presenting here is the Buddhist hypothesis. There's another dimension of consciousness, which is called the substrate consciousness. This is not mystical. It's not transcendent in the sense of being divine. The human psyche is emerging from an ongoing continuum of consciousness — the substrate consciousness — which kind of looks like a soul. But in the Buddhist view, it is more like an ongoing vacuum state of consciousness. Or here's a good metaphor: Just as we speak of a stem cell, which is not differentiated until it comes into the liver and becomes a liver cell, or into bone marrow and becomes a bone marrow cell, the substrate consciousness is stem consciousness. And at death, the human psyche dissolves back into this continuum.

So this consciousness is not made of any stuff. It's not matter. Is it just unattached and floating through the universe?

Well, this raises such interesting questions about the nature of matter. In the 19th century, you could think of matter as something good and chunky out there. You could count on it as having location and specific momentum and mass and all of that. Frankly, I think the backdrop of this whole conversation has to be 21st century physics, not 19th century physics. And virtually all of neuroscience and all of psychology is based on 19th century physics, which is about as up-to-date as the horse and buggy.

So not everything in the universe can be reducible to matter, to particles?

According to quantum field theory, string theory and quantum cosmology — cutting-edge fields of 21st century physics — matter itself is not reducible to matter. And Richard Feynman, the great Nobel laureate in physics, commented very emphatically, "We don't know what energy is." He said it's not stuff out there that has a specific location. It's more like a mathematical abstraction. So matter has been reduced to formations of space. Energy is configurations of space. Space itself is rather mysterious. And so when I introduce this theme of a substrate consciousness, it's not something ethereal that's opposed to matter. Matter is about as ethereal as anything gets. But could there be this continuum of substrate consciousness that's not contingent upon molecules? From the Buddhist perspective, yes. But again, this frankly sounds like one more system of belief.

I have to say, you could put a religious spin on all of this. What you're describing as substrate consciousness sounds a lot like how people talk about God. There is some kind of divine presence that's outside the material world but somehow intervenes in our material lives.

I think we're jumping the gun there. In the Buddhist perspective, the substrate consciousness is individual. It's not some great collective unconscious like Jung talked about. In the Buddhist view, it's an individual continuum of consciousness that carries on from lifetime to lifetime. That's not God. Beyond that is this whole third dimension, the deepest dimension, called "primordial consciousness." This has certain commonalities with Christian mystical notions of God beyond the trinity. It has a thoroughly and deeply transcendent quality to it. And that's way beyond the pale of scientific inquiry. But when I speak of substrate consciousness, I think it would simply be a mistake to say that's God. If you want to relate this to something in Western religions, you might say it's the immortal soul. Christianity really has nothing to say about the existence of your continuum of consciousness prior to your conception. There's nothing in the Bible that says, where was Steve Paulson 70 years ago? Where did your stream of consciousness, your identity, your soul, come from? But Buddhism has a lot to say about this.

Here in the West, we have on the table three large hypotheses about the nature of human consciousness. One of these looks really good from a scientific perspective. Your consciousness is a product of the brain. Damage the brain and your consciousness evaporates into nothing. Now what's the experiment by which you repudiate that hypothesis? Well, all the mental states you're studying are by way of the brain, so the answer is nada. So it's not scientific and it's not testable, at least not yet. We have another major hypothesis. You die and your soul carries on to heaven or hell in the Protestant tradition. You go there and it's forever. Or in the Roman Catholic tradition, you have another couple of options — limbo and purgatory. But these are all one-way tickets. You can't say, I didn't like it in purgatory and then come back. My point here is the Christian hypothesis is not testable scientifically. It may be true, but it's not a scientific hypothesis.

Of course, the Tibetan Buddhist tradition has reincarnation. Is that testable scientifically?

Well, here's the hypothesis. Your psyche emerged some time while you were in your mother's womb. It's continuing to evolve, and eventually it's going to implode back into the substrate, carry on as a disembodied continuum of consciousness and then reincarnate. There's the theory in a nutshell. Is that one testable? My short answer is yes, I think this is a testable hypothesis, and in principle it really should be able to be repudiated. But we're also looking for positive evidence.

There are two types of studies being done at the University of Virginia. One is by Bruce Greyson. He's got a very good track record of doing rigorous, objective scientific studies of alleged — I'm choosing my words carefully here — alleged out-of-body experiences and near-death experiences of patients undergoing surgery. Does it ever happen that a person, while being under general anesthetic, has an out-of-body experience and can actually perceive something, as they hover above, that only the surgeons see? That's an empirically testable question. And Greyson is studying this scientifically.

So basically, the premise here is that consciousness can exist outside the body. I've heard that Greyson has started these tests but so far hasn't come up with any results.

Quite so. As you can imagine, the National Science Foundation is not exactly jumping over itself to fund this type of research. Nor is the NIH [National Institutes of Health]. This is outside the paradigm. They're not interested in providing funding for things that challenge the foundations of materialism. So basically, it's like asking the Catholic Church to pay for research to show that Jesus never lived.

OK, that's one test for out-of-body experiences. What about reincarnation?

Well, lo and behold, at the same university — they have some chutzpah over there — the University of Virginia, Ian Stevenson is now retired from the psych department. He's not a Buddhist, he wasn't a Hindu, and he didn't believe in reincarnation. Forty years ago he heard anecdotes of children maintaining that this wasn't their first life and giving detailed accounts of their alleged memories of past life experiences. So he started studying it. On a shoestring budget, he and a team of researchers did this for about 40 years. And about halfway through, he wrote a book called Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation. He scanned thousands of accounts of children, throwing out most of them because they were either false or the child could have heard about it from parents, relatives, television and so forth. He then selected 20 cases where the accounts given by the child wound up being true when they were subjected to objective corroboration. He couldn't see any way the child could have known this information. But he also said in that book, "I don't believe in reincarnation. But I don't know what else to do with these twenty cases because I can't see any other way to explain them."

And then he did another 20 years of research and wrote another book, Where Biology and Reincarnation Intersect. It showed the empirical findings of more cases of children giving these very detailed accounts of past life experiences. And usually they were not glorified, like I was Cleopatra or Einstein or somebody spectacular. No, [it was like,] I was a philanderer, and one of the husbands of the wives I had sex with shot me dead because I cuckolded him. So that's not very glamorous, but that was the recollection of one of these children. This is empirical evidence. It should be scrutinized rigorously, but not thrown out dogmatically.

This raises some interesting questions about Buddhism. Is Buddhism a religion or is it something else? Because there are some people in the West who say we should strip Buddhism of any vestiges of the religious or the transcendental. For instance, Stephen Batchelor, in his book "Buddhism Without Beliefs," writes, "The Buddha was not a mystic. His awakening was not a shattering insight into a transcendental truth that revealed to him the mysteries of God. He did not claim to have had an experience that granted him privileged, esoteric knowledge of how the universe ticks." Is Stephen Batchelor right?

[Laughs] I've known Stephen Batchelor for almost 35 years. We were monks together for years, both in India and in Switzerland. To come up with this picture of the Buddha, you have to bring out a carving knife and chop off great sections of the most authentic accounts we have of the Buddha's own teachings. You simply have to ignore and pretend he never said an enormous number of things he did say. I think Stephen, my dear friend, has recast the Buddha in his own image as an English skeptic who was raised in an agnostic background, who really doesn't believe in anything nonphysical.

So we should forget trying to strip Buddhism of its transcendentalism. You haven't quite come out and said it, but you're suggesting we should stop saying Buddhism is not a religion.

Well, we have to be very cautious when we take these Western categories — religion, science, philosophy — which are deeply and inextricably embedded in our Judeo-Christian and Greco-Roman heritage. But I have to add a footnote to our conversation about reincarnation research. The Buddhists have been looking at this critically and empirically for 2,500 years. They're not waiting with bated breath to see what the people at the University of Virginia come up with. They, unlike psychologists and neuroscientists, have been exploring mental phenomena directly. And they have specific strategies for going into a deep meditative state, directing your attention backward beyond the scope of this lifetime, directing it back to past lifetimes and coming up with memories. So you have a template here.

This could be studied, together with skeptics. Train very advanced contemplatives to tap into this substrate consciousness — this storehouse of memories from past lives, if it in fact exists — and do this in conjunction with neuroscientists and psychologists. If I had unlimited funds, I'd say this is one of the most important questions we can ask. Make this a 20-year research project, well funded, with all the skepticism of science. Make sure you have some hardcore atheists involved, but ones who are open-minded and not just knee-jerk dogmatists. And then put it to the test. In 20 years, I think you could come up with something that could repudiate or validate a startling, truly astonishing hypothesis that there is such a substrate consciousness.

20070301-01	15:57	SteveB	"Decoding The Secret "
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------

"Decoding The Secret" by Jerry Adler, Newsweek

Mar. 5, 2007 issue, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/2007/03/04/decoding-the-secret.html>)

(Oprah lives by it. Millions are reading it. The latest self-help sensation claims we can change our lives by thinking. But this 'new thought' may just be new marketing.)

If you're a woman trying to lose weight, you had your choice of two pieces of advice last week. One, from the American Heart Association, was to eat more vegetables and exercise an hour a day. The other was from a woman named Rhonda Byrne, a former television producer who has written what could be the fastest-selling book of its kind in the history of publishing with 1.75 million copies projected to be in print by March 2, just over three months since it came out, plus 1.5 million DVDs sold. Byrne's recommendation was to avoid looking at fat people. Based on what she calls the "law of attraction"—that thoughts, good or bad, "attract" more of whatever they're about—she writes: "If you see people who are overweight, do not observe them, but immediately switch your mind to the picture of you in your perfect body and feel it." So if you're having trouble giving up ice cream, maybe you could just cut back on "The Sopranos" instead.

You'd think the last thing Americans need is more excuses for self-absorption and acquisitiveness. But our inexhaustible appetite for "affirmation" and "inspiration" and "motivation" has finally outstripped the combined efforts of Wayne Dyer, Anthony Robbins, Dr. Phil and Mitch Albom. We have actually begun importing self-help—and from Australia, of all places, that citadel of tough-minded individualism, where just a couple of years ago Byrne was a divorced mother in her 50s who had hit a rocky patch in her business and personal lives. It was in that moment of despair, when she "wept and wept and wept" (as she recounted to Oprah on the first of two broadcasts devoted to her work), that she discovered a long-neglected book dating from 1910 called The Science of Getting Rich. In it she found how to let your thoughts and feelings get you everything you want, and determined to share it with the world. She called it The Secret.

And it was that stroke of marketing genius that turned what might have been a blip on the Times's "Advice, How-To, Miscellaneous" best-seller list into a publishing phenomenon that Sara Nelson, editor of Publishers Weekly, says "could become this decade's Tuesdays With Morrie." "Nobody," she adds, "ever went broke overestimating the desperate unhappiness of the American public." Self-help books roll off the presses with the regularity of politicians' biographies, and sell much better; Wayne Dyer all by himself has written 29 of them with sales estimated at 50 million. But Byrne had something else going for her. "It was an incredibly savvy move to call it The Secret," says Donavin Bennes, a buyer who specializes in metaphysics for Borders Books. "We all want to be in on a secret. But to present it as the secret, that was brilliant."

To a tired genre full of earnest bullet points and windy exhortations, The Secret brings breathless pizzazz and a market-proven gimmick, an evocation of ancient wisdom and hidden conspiracies that calls to mind The Da Vinci Code. Torchlights flicker on the 90-minute DVD and the soundtrack throbs portentously before it gets down to giving you the secret for getting your hands on that new BMW. The book is a miracle of cover art, a jacket suggestive of a medieval manuscript punctuated by a crimson seal. "It evokes the film, with the secret scrolls and all," says Judith Curr, executive vice president of Atria Books, a division of Simon & Schuster that brought out the book in partnership with Portland, Ore.-based Beyond Words Publishing. Its very size, small enough to hide, adds to its aura. "It feels special, like it contains really important information."

What it doesn't contain, though, is a secret. That should be self-evident to anyone who has ever been in an airport bookstore. The film and book are built around 24 "teachers," mostly motivational speakers and writers (dressed up by Byrne with titles like "philosopher" or "visionary") who have been selling the same message for years. Jack Canfield is probably the best-known of them. Is it really true that a cabal of elites has conspired to keep the rabble from getting their hands on Chicken Soup for the Soul?

The "secret" is the law of attraction, which holds that you create your own reality through your thoughts. You can, if you wish, take this figuratively, to mean that by changing your thoughts you can feel better about your situation in life. Or you can view it as a source of inspiration—that by believing you will succeed, you will perform better in the race or the test or your relationships.

But that's not what The Secret is saying. Its explicit claim is that you can manipulate objective physical reality—the numbers in a lottery drawing, the actions of other people who may not even know you exist—through your thoughts and feelings. In the words of "author and personal empowerment advocate" Lisa Nichols: "When you think of the things you want, and you focus on them with all of your intention, then the law of attraction will give you exactly what you want, every time." Every time! Byrne emphasizes that this is a law inherent in "the universe," an inexhaustible storehouse of goodies from which you can command whatever you desire from the comfort of your own living room by following three simple steps: Ask, Believe, Receive.

In a dramatized interlude in the film, a young woman ogles a necklace in a window, and the next thing you know, it's around her neck. A child imagines himself with a new bike, and it appears outside his door. No need to do a lot of boring chores or get a newspaper route: the universe provides. Contrariwise, a worrywart who obsessively checks the locks on his bicycle returns to find it stolen; the law of attraction has called down on him just the predicament he hoped to avoid. A financial consultant reliably finds parking, just by visualizing an empty spot—which implies, by another law of the universe, the one about two objects occupying the same space, that he believes his thoughts can induce someone else to leave. Is this someone you'd trust with your investments?

Perhaps this proposition has not been analyzed closely enough by fans of The Secret, including Oprah, who exuberantly told her audience that she'd been living her whole life according to the law of attraction, without even knowing it.

On an ethical level, The Secret appears deplorable. It concerns itself almost entirely with a narrow range of middle-class concerns—houses, cars and vacations, followed by health and relationships, with the rest of humanity a very distant sixth. Even some of the major figures in the film confess to uneasiness with its relentless materialism. "I love The Secret but I also think it's missing a couple things," says "metaphysician" Joe Vitale. "If I were producing it, I would have added something more about serving others." Vitale defends the dream homes and sports cars as baubles to draw people in, in hopes they will employ the law of attraction for higher purposes. Not that the law has any bias toward higher purposes. On the contrary, Byrne writes, it is totally impersonal and "it does not see good things or bad things." In the film, the Rev. Michael Bernard Beckwith compares it to the law of gravity: "If you fall off a building it doesn't matter if you're a good person or a bad person, you're going to hit the ground."

Which is equally true if someone pushes you off a building—or, let's say, beats your brains in with a club during a bout of ethnic cleansing. The law of attraction implies that you brought that fate down on yourself as well. "The law of attraction is that each one of us is determining the frequency that we're on by what we're thinking and feeling," Byrne said in a telephone interview, in response to a question about the massacre in Rwanda. "If we are in fear, if we're feeling in our lives that we're victims and feeling powerless, then we are on a frequency of attracting those things to us ... totally unconsciously, totally innocently, totally all of those words that are so important."

She has seen evidence of this in her own life, she says, where "many tough things" happened to her. The Secret devotes several pages to the weight she gained after her pregnancies. Unaware of the law of attraction, she mistakenly believed that eating made her fat. She now recognizes her error: "Food is not responsible for putting on weight. It is your thought that food is responsible for putting on weight that actually has food put on weight."

And today, she maintains an ideal weight of 116 while eating anything she wants. A woman in the film claims to cure her breast cancer in three months, without chemotherapy or radiation, by visualizing herself well and watching funny movies on television. Whatever you think of that as medical advice—Byrne insists she's not telling people to avoid doctors—it makes psychologist John Norcross, a professor at the University of Scranton who is an authority on self-help books, wonder: what about the people whose cancers don't get cured? "It's pseudoscientific, psychospiritual babble," says Norcross. "We find about 10 percent of self-help books are rated by mental-health professionals as damaging. This is probably one of them. The problem is the propensity for self-blame when it doesn't work."

On a scientific level, the law of attraction is preposterous. Two of the "teachers" in the film are identified as quantum physicists, which they are, although on the fringes of mainstream science. One, Fred Alan Wolf, is mostly an author of science books with a quasi-mystical bent, and the other, John Hagelin (who has run for President on the Natural Law ticket), is affiliated with Maharishi University of Management, in Fairfield, Iowa, which does research on transcendental meditation. Both of them, contacted by NEWSWEEK, distanced themselves from the idea of a physical law that attracts necklaces to people who wish for them. "I don't think it works that way," says Wolf dryly. "It hasn't worked that way in my life." Hagelin acknowledges the larger point, that "the coherence and effectiveness of our thinking is crucial to our success in life." But, he adds, "this is not, principally, the result of magic."

Wolf said he used his time in front of the camera to talk about the relationship between quantum mechanics and consciousness, but all that evidently wound up on the cutting-room floor. What he might have said is something like this: modern physics says that atomic particles influence one another in ways that violate our ordinary understanding of space and time, a phenomenon called "quantum entanglement." The question is whether quantum signals can be perceived on the scale of something like a neuron, a brain or a human being. Overwhelmingly, physicists dismiss this idea. A minority, very much out of the mainstream, think it's worth investigating, and a few claim to have experimental evidence that thoughts can influence physical objects, such as the circuitry in a random-number generator. But the effects are tiny, on the order of a few hundredths of 1 percent. And there's no evidence you can use it to move a BMW into your driveway.

But modern physics has reinvigorated a long tradition in American philosophy, one in which The Secret stands squarely. "I can show you books written 100 years ago that say the exact same thing," says Beryl Satter, a professor of history at Rutgers. Long before there was a "New Age," Satter says, there was "New Thought"—a self-help movement that drew on 19th-century Americans' suspicion of elites and on the Protestant tradition of looking for the "inner light." You don't need doctors to heal you, priests to save you or professors to instruct you: the secrets to health, success and salvation are within you. A best seller in 1869 called The Mental Cure unleashed a flood of imitators, which increasingly evoked "science" in their titles, hoping to capitalize on the fascination with inventions like the telephone. "It was a short leap from 'You can use the telephone to send messages' to 'You can use your mind'," Satter says.

It was one of those books, The Science of Getting Rich, by the long-forgotten Wallace D. Wattles, that Byrne's daughter handed her one day in 2004, when she was struggling with her various setbacks—the recent death of her father and a budget overrun on a series, "Sensing Murder," she was producing for Australian television. (She was a longtime producer on an Australian version of "The Tonight Show," and her company was behind a reality series about marriage proposals called "Marry Me.") Wattles's book struck such a chord with Byrne that she plunged into a crash course in Western, Eastern, ancient and modern thought, devouring "hundreds" of books and articles in just two and a half weeks. "That was in December," she told NEWSWEEK. "In January I told my team we were going to make the greatest film in history to date. They thought I'd gone mad." Inspired, she flew to the States in July 2005 and began lining up people to interview; the film was finished six months later and she began trying to find an Australian network to air it. The top-rated Nine Network was intrigued by her proposal, but the finished film struck Len Downs, the program manager, as just "a whole range of talking heads giving their basis of the secret of life." (It eventually ran in Australia just a few weeks ago, and, says Downs, it didn't do all that well.)

But armed with the law of attraction, Byrne was confident things would work out. A Web company just blocks from her office in Melbourne had a technology for distributing streaming video over the Internet. Last March, her site (<http://thesecret.tv>) began selling downloads and DVDs, one of which found its way to Cynthia Black, president of the New Age-oriented publishing house Beyond Words. Black, who had recently entered into a relationship with Atria, saw its potential; by late November the book was in the stores and soon after got its first break when Ellen DeGeneres featured it on her show. By the time Oprah ran her first segment on it, on Feb. 8, it was already a huge success.

Byrne herself seems nonplused by her success, and remains a somewhat elusive figure; she is sparing with interviews and didn't even appear on the second of the two hours Oprah devoted to The Secret. Her family in Australia said they were told by Rhonda not to talk to reporters, although her mother, Irene Izon, did offer this assessment to NEWSWEEK: "The thing is that Rhonda just wants to bring happiness to everybody. That's the reason it all began. She just wants everybody to be happy."

And to give her her due, she might actually be achieving some of that. There is nothing, in principle, wrong with thinking about what makes you happy. Here is someone she did make happy: Cheryl Cornell-Powers, 59, a Chicago training consultant, who saw Byrne on "Oprah" and then watched the film. She discounted the idea of curing one's own cancer, but liked the segments that emphasize gratitude over resentment. "We look at our money and say, 'What fun it would be to go out to dinner to places that are on our budget,' not, 'We can't do this because we're on a budget.'" Even a serious academic like Harvard psychologist Carol Kauffman is willing to credit the idea that you can change your life by consciously directing your thoughts in a positive direction. "Basically, it's chaos theory," she says. "I don't think you can actually attract things to you. But if you're profoundly open to opportunity, then when ambiguous events occur, you notice them. I think what positive thinking does is raise your consciousness to possibilities so they can snag your attention. We're starting to see some empirical studies on that now."

Of course, that's a long way from the simple model of Ask-Believe-Receive. In most people's lives, positive thought leads to success only through the transforming medium of action. For obvious reasons, this is a much less popular message. The Secret dubiously appropriates a number of historical figures to illustrate the law of attraction. Beethoven was probably bipolar; Newton ruminated obsessively over personal salvation; Einstein derided quantum entanglement as "spooky action at a distance." Martin Luther King Jr. is enlisted as author of an epigram about taking a staircase one step at a time. King certainly could visualize. But he also knew better than to sit back and wait for the law of attraction to send down justice; he went out and worked for it. And there's no secret to that.

(With Matthew Philips in New York, Mary Carmichael in Boston, Karen Springen in Chicago and Kendall Hill in Sydney)

20070515-01	11:45	SteveB	To: George Bush; Immigration Reform Bill
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear President Bush:

HOW DISAPPOINTING!!!!

I read this morning that you want to resurrect the defunct Immigration Reform Bill that died in the Senate last week.

Speaking on behalf of myself and absolutely everyone I know, we Americans DO NOT WANT this bill. We want, instead, for our government to enforce existing immigration laws, build the authorized fence along the Mexican border, crack-down on employers who hire illegal aliens and deny government benefits to illegal aliens. If these things are done, the best of all amnesties will occur—the illegals will go back home where they are needed in their own countries.

We are thinking only of the future of our children. We feel you have completely sold-out to special interests.

Please support America...it's history, it's children, and it's future...not your own or your party's short-term financial goals, Mr. President.

Thank you. By the way, I am not prejudiced...my wife is a LEGAL alien from Bolivia and, believe me, that process of becoming legal is not easy, nor should it be. Why should it be easier for the criminals who have come illegally?

—SteveB

20070524-01	17:57	SteveB	"Gospel According to Judas"
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------

"Gospel According to Judas", by Steve Paulson, Salon

Apr. 2, 2007, (http://www.salon.com/2007/04/02/elaine_pagels/)

(The recently unearthed Gospel of Judas "contradicts everything we know about Christianity," says religious historian Elaine Pagels.)

As almost every child knows, Judas was the disciple who betrayed Jesus, selling his life for 30 pieces of silver. If there's an arch villain in the story of Jesus, it's Judas Iscariot. Or is it? The newly discovered Gospel of Judas suggests that Judas was, in fact, the favorite disciple, the only one Jesus trusted to carry out his final command to hand him over to the Romans.

Rumors about the gospel have circulated for centuries. Early church fathers called it a "very dangerous, blasphemous, horrendous gospel," according to historian Elaine Pagels. We now know that the manuscript was passed around the shadowy world of antiquities dealers, at one point sitting in a safe deposit box in a small town in New York for 17 years. Pagels herself was once asked by a dealer in Cleveland to examine it, but he only showed her the last few pages, which revealed little more than the title page. She assumed there was nothing of significance. Finally, the manuscript was acquired by the National Geographic Society, which hired Pagels as a consultant to study it.

More than any other scholar, Pagels has brought the lost texts of early Christianity to public attention. A Princeton historian of religion, she wrote the 1979 bestseller "The Gnostic Gospels" — the book that launched the popular fascination with the Nag Hammadi manuscripts found by Egyptian peasants in 1945. That book, which won both the National Book Award and the National Book Critics Circle Award, was later chosen by the Modern Library as one of the 100 best nonfiction books of the 20th century. Pagels went on to write a series of acclaimed books about early Christianity and, along the way, recounted her own personal tragedies — her young son's death after a long illness and, just a year later, her first husband's death in a hiking accident. It's no surprise that Pagels has felt compelled to wrestle with some of religion's thorniest subjects, like how to make sense of suffering and evil.

For much of her career, Pagels has straddled two worlds — the academic and the popular. She's often the go-to expert when a magazine needs a comment on the latest theory about Mary Magdalene or some other bit of revisionist Christian history. But her standing among the scholars who study early Christianity is more complicated. Conservative scholars tend to dismiss the Gnostic texts as a footnote in Christian history, hardly worth all the hype that's been generated by The Da Vinci Code and other racy stories. Not surprisingly, these scholars have questioned Pagels' interpretations of early Christian texts.

With Harvard historian Karen L. King, Pagels has written a new book, Reading Judas: The Gospel of Judas and the Shaping of Christianity. The authors argue that this recently discovered gospel offers a new understanding of the death of Jesus. I spoke with Pagels by phone about the bitter quarrels among early Christians, why it's a bad idea to read the Bible literally, and the importance of this new discovery.

When was the Gospel of Judas written?

As far as we can tell, probably at the end of the first or early second century.

So it's clearly not written by Judas himself, or even dictated by Judas.

That's right. And most New Testament scholars would say the gospels in the New Testament — all of them attributed to disciples or followers of disciples — were probably not written by the people whose names are on them. If you say, "the Gospel according to Matthew," you might not be pretending to be Matthew if you wrote it. You might be saying, this is the gospel the way Matthew taught it, and he was my teacher. So these are certain followers of Jesus who collected and transmitted his teaching.

Does this Gospel of Judas reveal something new about early Christianity?

Yes, the Gospel of Judas really has been a surprise in many ways. For one thing, there's no other text that suggests that Judas Iscariot was an intimate, trusted disciple, one to whom Jesus revealed the secrets of the kingdom, and that conversely, the other disciples were misunderstanding what he meant by the gospel. So that's quite startling.

It's shocking to suggest that Judas wasn't just one of the disciples but was actually the favorite disciple of Jesus.

That's right. And also the idea that he handed over Jesus to be arrested at the orders of Jesus himself. This wasn't a betrayal at all. In fact, it was obedience to a command or request that Jesus had made.

But how do we reconcile this with all the other stories we've ever heard about Judas? He's the symbol of treachery and betrayal.

Well, he has become the symbol of treachery and betrayal. But once you start to look at the gospels one by one, you realize that followers of Jesus were trying to understand what had happened after he was arrested and killed. They knew Judas had handed him over to the people who arrested him. The earliest gospel, Mark, says Judas handed him over, but it doesn't give any motive at all. The people who wrote after Mark — Matthew's and Luke's gospels — apparently felt that what was wrong with the Gospel of Mark was that there was no motive. So Matthew adds a motive. Matthew says Judas went to the chief priests who were Jesus' enemies, and said, "What will you give me if I hand him over to you?" And they agree on a certain sum of money. So in Matthew's view, the motive was greed. In Luke's gospel, it's entirely different. It says the power of evil took over Judas. Satan entered into him.

I think Luke is struggling with the question, If Jesus is the son of God, how could he be taken by a mere trick, by a human being? And Luke is trying to show that all evil power was concentrated in Judas. So they are very different stories. However, other gospels, like John's, suggest that Jesus not only anticipated what was going to happen but initiated it.

The Gospel of John says that he told Judas to go out and do what he had to do, which Jesus knew was to betray him. So the Gospel of Judas just takes the suggestion one step further. Jesus not only knew what was going to happen but initiated the action.

There's something else that's striking about the Gospel of Judas. The writer is very angry, and he's especially angry at the other disciples.

Yes, that's where we realized that it's not just a story about Jesus and the disciples. It's a story about this follower of Jesus — the Christian who's writing this story, maybe 60 years after the death of Jesus. Even using the name of Judas is a slap in the face to the tradition. You realize that whoever wrote it was a very angry person. And we were asking, What's going on here? Why is he so angry? And we discovered that it's very dangerous to be a follower of Jesus in the generations after his death. You know, they say his disciple Peter was crucified upside down. And Paul was probably beheaded by the Romans. James was lynched by a crowd, and so were Stephen and other followers. So leaders of this movement were in great danger. And other Christians were also in danger of being arrested and killed because they followed Jesus. The question for many of them was, What do you do if you're arrested?

And to acknowledge that you were a Christian would probably kill you.

Exactly. All you had to do is say no. Or you can try to escape or bribe the people persecuting you. And many did. The only answer that most Christians agreed was right was to say, "Yes, I'm a Christian." You defy them and you go heroically into the lions. So we've always thought of Christianity as a religion that glorifies martyrdom. Now we realize that we've had that impression because the people who weren't in favor of martyrdom had their writings buried and burned and trashed and ridiculed. And they were called cowards and heretics.

So the Gospel of Judas is a kind of protest literature. It's challenging leaders of the church. Here the leaders are personified as disciples who are encouraging people to get killed, to "die for God," as they called martyrdom. This gospel is challenging them and saying, when you encourage young people to die for God, you're really complicit in murder.

Are there also theological issues at stake? This gets at the meaning of suffering, and the nature of evil as well.

It does. This was at a time when all followers of Jesus were struggling with the question, Why did Jesus die? What does it all mean? In the New Testament, the gospels say he died as a sacrifice. Paul says Christ, our Passover lamb, was sacrificed for us. Why? Well, to save us from sin.

But this author is saying, wait a minute. If you think God wants his son to be tortured and killed before he'll forgive people their sins, what kind of God do you have in mind? Is this the God who didn't want animals to be sacrificed in the temple anymore? So this author's asking, isn't God a loving father? Isn't that what Jesus taught? Why are we saying that God requires his son to die for the sins of the world? So it's a challenge to the whole idea of atonement, and the idea that Christians — when they worship — eat bread and drink wine as if it were the body and blood of Christ. This person sees that whole thing as a celebration of violence.

You can see why some early Christians would have attacked this gospel. This is very threatening to other Christian accounts of why Jesus died.

It contradicts everything we know about Christianity. But there's a lot we don't know about Christianity. There are different ways of understanding the death of Jesus that have been buried and suppressed. This author suggests that God does not require sacrifice to forgive sin, and that the message of Jesus is that we come from God and we go back to God, that we all live in God. It's not about bloody sacrifice for forgiveness of sins. It suggests that Jesus' death demonstrates that, essentially and spiritually, we're not our bodies. Even when our bodies die, we go to live in God.

Does this raise questions about how we should think about the Resurrection? In orthodox Christian accounts, this is considered a resurrection of the flesh.

That's right. The idea that Jesus rose in the flesh is very important for a lot of Christians. And certainly for the martyrs. When people were going to get themselves killed, some of them were asked, Do you believe that you're going to be raised from the dead in your body? And many of them said yes, of course we do. That's why we're doing this. So those promises of bodily resurrection and heavenly rewards were very important for many Christians.

Some of the things we're talking about would seem to have great resonance in the Islamic world. Do you see any parallels between this Christian history and what we're seeing among Muslim martyrs today?

I do. The author of the Gospel of Judas wasn't against martyrdom, and he didn't ever insult the martyrs. He said it's one thing to die for God if you have to do that. But it's another thing to say that's what God wants, that this is a glorification of God. I think he would have spoken in the way that an imam might today, saying those who encourage young people to go out and supposedly die for God as martyrs are complicit in murder. The question of the uses of violence is very much at the heart of the Gospel of Judas. If you have to die as a martyr, you do because you don't deny Christ. But you don't go around encouraging people to do it as though they would get higher rewards in heaven.

Can you put the Gospel of Judas in perspective, alongside some of the other Gnostic texts that have come to light in recent decades — the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Mary Magdalene? Do these really change our understanding of early Christianity?

Before, we had a puzzle with just a few pieces. Now we have many more pieces. We begin to see that in the early Christian movement, people discussed and struggled with all the issues that we now think of as normative Christianity, like, What does the death of Jesus mean? There wasn't one kind of understanding of Jesus in the early Christian movement. Actually, there were many.

In recent years, there's been a huge debate over what to make of the Gnostic Gospels. And plenty of Christian scholars and theologians say there's good reason they were not admitted into the Christian canon. They say the Bible presents the most reliable story of Jesus based on eyewitness accounts. For instance, Ben Witherington has written, "The four canonical gospels have stood the test of time and other apocryphal gospels and texts have not ... This is because the canonical gospels are our earliest gospels and have actual historical substance, while the later gospels have none."

Well, Witherington has a particular point of view to prove. I would say it's very hard to date these other texts. Some of them are as early as the gospels of the New Testament, like the Gospel of John. But what's different is the emphasis. Let me give you an example. The Gospel of Thomas says that all who recognize that they come from God are also children of God, instead of teaching that Jesus is the only son of God through whom one must be saved. It's a teaching that is akin to what the Quakers and some other Christian groups teach, including some Greek and Russian Orthodox groups. The divine is to be found in everyone, and we can discover, at some level, that we're like Christ. It's not a complete contradiction, but it is somewhat different.

But aren't there crucial doctrinal issues at stake in terms of what it means to be a Christian? For instance, was Jesus the son of God? Was the return of Jesus an actual resurrection of the flesh?

In the fourth century, the Council of Nicaea established certain doctrines about what it means to be orthodox: belief in one God, maker of heaven and earth, and one Jesus Christ, his only son and Lord. So Jesus Christ is the only one who brings salvation to the whole world. There are, of course, Christians who believe in Jesus but also wonder whether people can't find God in other religions — if they're Jews or Muslims or Buddhists and so forth. There's nothing Jesus himself said that contradicts that, as far as I can see. But fourth-century Christian orthodoxy did set out the doctrines you're talking about.

Some people say the historical study of early Christianity really doesn't matter to a person's faith. Being a Christian means you believe in certain things, like the Resurrection, like the Virgin Birth. These are matters of faith, not of historical research. You can choose not to believe those things, but then you're not part of the Christian creed. How do you respond to that argument?

Well, it's absolutely true that the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection can't be verified historically. On the other hand, if you start to look at it historically, you find out that there are plenty of people who call themselves Christians who see those very things differently. There have been Christians from the beginning — St. Paul is one of them — who say the Resurrection is not a matter of this kind of body. Paul talks about resurrection as a matter of being transformed. Yes, it's about the body, he said, but it's more like a body of the stars or the moon or the sun — a body of light. So there are many ways that people have understood themselves to be Christians.

This has huge implications for so many people today, especially those who simply can't accept these kinds of miracles. It does raise the question of whether you can be a Christian if you don't believe any of the Bible's supernatural stories.

I don't think you have to discard all the supernatural stories. The Bible is really about what is beyond the natural. But there are other ways of understanding. For example, the Gospel of Philip, which some people called a heretical text, actually says Jesus had human parents as you and I do. His parents were Mary and Joseph. But when he was born of the spirit, he became the son of the Heavenly Father and the Holy Spirit. In Syriac and Hebrew, the spirit is spoken of in feminine forms, so metaphorically, one could speak of her as a divine mother, just as one speaks of God as a divine father. So there are Christians who didn't reject the Virgin Birth, but said wait a minute, why would you take it literally? Why don't you take it as an image for spiritual reality?

You have spent decades studying early Christian history. Do you consider yourself a Christian?

Yes, I do. And the reason I can is that I understand that there are countless people who've been Christians for 2,000 years, in many different ways. It's not a matter of one version, you must believe this exactly the way I tell it to you. Christian theologians have always said that the truth of God is beyond our understanding. And so we speak in metaphors. Paul said we see through a glass darkly.

I've heard that you didn't grow up in a religious family.

Well, it was a Protestant family, nominally. We went to church, but my father had rejected the Bible for Darwin. He decided the Bible was a bunch of old fables and that evolution was right. So I was brought up to think the Bible was just kind of irrelevant. I grew up and became deeply and passionately interested in it and went to a church and was born again. I was 14 or 15. It was quite wonderful, and I loved what I found there.

Even though your father was a confirmed atheist.

It did shock him, yes. Of course, that's one way adolescents like to shock their parents. I didn't do it for that reason, but it had that effect. The power and the passion of that kind of evangelical Christianity was very real for me. And it was a discovery of something very important — a spiritual dimension in life that I was not able to ignore. On the other hand, after a year of living in that church, one of my friends in high school was killed in an automobile accident. The people at the church asked, was he born again? And I said, no, he wasn't. And they said, well, then he's in hell. And I thought to myself, I don't believe that. That doesn't match up with what I'd heard about God. So at that point, I decided I had to find out for myself what I could about the early Christian movement, what I believe about it, and what is being said in the name of Jesus that I found not true.

That's fascinating. Basically, it was because you couldn't buy into that fundamentalist version of Christianity that you launched your career as a historian of Christianity.

That's the truth, yes.

Well, this does raise the question of what we mean by God and what we mean by transcendence, and whether there is a transcendent reality out there. Is that discussion of transcendence meaningful to you?

Oh, certainly it is. If we don't understand how important spiritual life is to people, I don't think we're going to understand human beings or the 21st century. There are many people who said religion is essentially over now, and everyone will become rational. They don't understand that the way humans are has a lot to do with religious experience.

Your late husband, the eminent physicist Heinz Pagels, wrote very eloquently about the mysteries of science. Did he influence your thinking about this intersection between science and religion?

Oh yes, he was deeply interested in philosophy and religion and science, and understood how profound and complicated those issues are. When you're dealing with science, for example, you're dealing all the time with metaphors. So to assume that religious language isn't metaphor doesn't make sense to me.

There's a big debate right now over whether religion and science are two totally different domains, as Stephen Jay Gould once said, or whether they overlap. Where do you come down on that?

That's a very tough question. I think religion and science both have a lot to do with understanding and imagination, but they certainly explore the world in very different ways. For example, when the eminent physicist Stephen Weinberg wrote in his book "The First Three Minutes," "the more we know about the universe, the more we know it's pointless and meaningless," my late husband said, "That doesn't make any sense." Einstein thought the more we knew about the universe, the more we knew about the divine intelligence. There are many ways to make inferences from physics. And inferences like that are not scientific at all; they're philosophic.

Of course, there's still a huge debate about whether Einstein was religious or not. The atheists want to claim him for their camp, but religious people say he was actually quite open to religious ideas.

Part of the problem is that Einstein used the language about God as a metaphor. When he said, "God does not play dice with the universe," he meant the universe is not put together in an accidental way. It does show a kind of intelligent process in it. Einstein was speaking about God in the way that physicists would — aware that language like that is always going to be metaphorical, speaking beyond our understanding. But many people took him literally and said he's a religious man. Scientists said he was just using language carelessly.

Isn't that part of the problem that we get into when we talk about metaphor and the religious imagination? If you don't take scripture literally, how do you take it?

You can take scripture seriously without taking it literally. If you speak about the Resurrection of Christ, all we know historically is that after Jesus died, his followers became convinced that he was alive again. Now, what does that mean? They told many stories. Some of them said, I saw him with my own eyes, I touched him, he actually ate food, he was not a ghost. That's in Luke's gospel. And others said, I saw him for a moment and then he faded — the way many people say they've seen people they knew who died. What I'm saying is there are many ways that people who believe in the Resurrection speak about Christ being alive after his death without meaning that his body got out of the grave and walked.

It sounds like you're saying that it's perfectly possible to take the Bible very seriously, to be a Christian, and yet not to believe in the supernatural miracles that so many people simply cannot accept.

Well, that may be. I don't dismiss all supernatural miracles, like a healing that can't be explained. Those do happen sometimes.

You've been studying these texts for decades. Has your scholarly work deepened your own faith?

Yes. And the scholarly work is part of the spiritual quest. Opening ourselves to exploring as much as we can about this can be, in fact, an act of faith. At Princeton, there's a course in the study of New Testament that some evangelical students were warned not to take. They called it "Faith Busters 101." And some of them come just to flex their muscles and see if they can sit there and stand it while somebody teaches them about how the gospels were written. But what they usually discover is that learning about those things doesn't change the fundamental questions about faith.

Does faith necessarily involve some leap into mystery, into something that can't be explained?

I think it does. Earlier this year, I was asked to do an interview with somebody who had written a book to demonstrate that Jesus had been raised bodily from the dead. And they expected me to say that was impossible. But I can't say it's impossible. From a historical point of view, there's no way you can comment on that. It's just not susceptible to that kind of analysis. So there's a lot that history can't answer and that science can't answer. I mean, there's a lot about all of our lives that we have no rational understanding of. And so faith comes into our relationships with the people we love, and our relationship to our life and our death.

There seems to be a rather vigorous movement among scientists to try to explain the origins of religion. I'm struck by how often these theories come from atheists. And I think the underlying impulse is to demystify the divine. But can religion really be explained from the outside, by people who are not themselves religious?

Probably not. For example, suppose you found the basic brain chemistry that explains religious perceptions. In fact, there are neurologists in New York trying very hard to understand precisely that. And you find that when people who've clinically died say they've had a near-death experience, they've gone into a brilliant light and then they've come back from some place. This is the flashes of light on the brain as it expires. Well, it may be. And it may not be. Is this a trick that our brain plays on us? Or is this intimations of some other kind of reality? I don't think science is going to answer that question.

Isn't there an inherent limitation to any of those brain-imaging studies? Because there's the whole question, Are we just imagining this? Or is there really some contact with the divine?

Exactly. For example, there's a study now at New York University about epilepsy. We know that epileptics often have an experience of seeing an aura. They can have an epileptic convulsion and they have a kind of vision. It was understood in ancient times to be demonic possession. So if people then say, epilepsy has a certain relationship to electrical activity in the brain, and that's what precipitates these experiences, does that mean that they are not real? I don't think that answers the question.

What do you make of the recent claim by the atheist Richard Dawkins that the existence of God is itself a scientific question? If you accept the idea that God intervenes in the physical world, don't there have to be physical mechanisms for that to happen? Therefore, doesn't this become a question for science?

Well, Dawkins loves to play village atheist. He's such a rationalist that the God that he's debunking is not one that most of the people I study would recognize. I mean, is there some great big person up there who made the universe out of dirt? Probably not.

Are you saying that part of the problem here is the notion of a personal God? Has that become an old-fashioned view of religion?

I'm not so sure of that. I think the sense of actual contact with God is one that many people have experienced. But I guess it's a question of what kind of God one has in mind.

So when you think about the God that you believe in, how would you describe that God?

Well, I've learned from the texts I work on that there really aren't words to describe God. You spoke earlier about a transcendent reality. I think it's certainly true that these are not just fictions that we arbitrarily invent.

Certainly many people talk about God as an ineffable presence. But if you try to explain what transcendence is, can you put that into words and explain what it means?

People have put it into words, but the words are usually metaphors or poems or hymns. Even the word "God" is a metaphor, or "the son of God," or "Father." They're all simply images for some other order of reality.

There's one aspect of the Bible that's especially troubling. What do you make of the many passages that condone violence? Killing infidels seems to be what God wants.

You mean in the Hebrew Bible?

Yes, I'm particularly thinking about the Hebrew Bible.

Well, yes. When you read the discussion of holy war in the Hebrew Bible, it's violent, definitely. This was a war god, identified with a particular tribe, with particular kinds of religious war. Christians often don't read that now. But when I talk with Jewish leaders, they say, yes, we remember that very well because we remember the Crusades. And the Muslims of course say the same. They say, why are you talking to us about violence? Christians have done violence in the name of Christ for nearly 2,000 years.

So how should we read those passages that are so violent?

That gets us back to the question, Can you read the Bible seriously without reading it literally? There are parts of the New Testament which encourage slaves to remain slaves. Do we take that literally? Those were fighting words during the Civil War when some Christians said slavery was part of God's plan and some people should live and die as slaves. I think few would agree with that now. But it was a position that one could seriously take on the basis of many biblical passages.

You're saying that we have to understand context.

I think we do. You were saying that some people believe faith has nothing to do with history. The fact is, somebody wrote those texts. They wrote them in a world in which slavery was taken for granted. That's a different world. So if we don't understand that, well, it says, Slaves, obey your masters, for this is right.

Z Pinch Machine: High voltage buildup at the Z Machine at Sandia National Laboratory

Dear SteveB:

On behalf of President Bush, thank you for your correspondence.

We appreciate hearing your views and welcome your suggestions.

Due to the large volume of e-mail received, the White House cannot respond to every message.

Thank you again for taking the time to write.

comments@whitehouse.gov

20070605-01	02:23	D. Rehberg	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
-------------	-------	------------	-----------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me regarding immigration. It's good to hear from you.

The vitality and strength of our nation largely comes from its ethnic diversity. The vast majority of today's legal immigrants are no different than the Pilgrims who sailed from England in search of a better life. America has always been a haven for those seeking freedom and economic opportunity.

I believe Americans should encourage legal immigration. Immigrants provide vital labor skills and are often the creators of small businesses. They also enrich our nation culturally.

I also believe government should enforce the law and prosecute illegal immigrants who are in violation of federal law. Because the federal government has not fully enforced immigration statutes, the level of illegal immigration has grown dramatically. This has drastically overburdened the welfare programs and school systems of certain states. In light of this, I support greater resources for the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and for border patrol and police to prosecute violators of immigration laws.

Please be assured that I will keep your views in mind as Congress considers immigration legislation.

Thanks again for contacting me. For more information and to sign up for my e-newsletter, please visit my website at <http://www.house.gov/rehberg>. Keep in touch.

—Congressman Denny Rehberg

20070605-02	20:19	M. Martinez	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
-------------	-------	-------------	-----------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Senator Martinez recently discussed his hopes for the Border Security and Immigration Reform bill that is currently being debated in the U.S. Senate. The Senate continues debating the bill this week. "First and foremost, the bill we are debating will make our borders more secure. It calls for the completion of several specific border-security measures before any other aspect of the bill is implemented. "...As a nation of immigrants, we must arrive at a humane policy that is aligned with the rule of law. Those who play by the rules are rewarded; those who break our laws will pay penalties."

Monday, Senator Martinez welcomed the announcement by the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Florida Long-Term Recovery Office that Florida will receive $386 million in additional funding for the 2005 hurricane season. "This is very good news for Florida. Significant portions of our state are still recovering from the 2005 storms and this funding will enable communities to receive additional assistance," said Martinez.

Senator Martinez condemned the Government of Venezuela for their decision not to renew the broadcast license for Radio Caracas Television. Senator Martinez was an original co-sponsor of Senate Resolution 211, approved by the Senate on Thursday, May 24th, expressing concerns over the transgressions being carried out against freedom of thought and expression in Venezuela.

Upcoming Community Office Hours For Southwest Florida: June 14th & 15th, caseworkers from the Office of Senator Martinez will visit Hendry, Glades, DeSoto, and Highlands counties. Caseworkers will be available to assist constituents with concerns and issues ranging from Veterans issues to Healthcare, Social Security, Medicare, and other services provided by the federal government. Click here to view the locations and times.

2007 Hurricane Season

Now that the 2007 hurricane season is here, thorough preparation is critical to protecting your family and belongings. Please browse the following links for useful information during this hurricane season:

<http://www.ready.gov/>—Provides helpful information to best prepare you, your family, and businesses in the event of a disaster;

http://www.fema.gov/hazard/hurricane/hu_season.shtm—Comprehensive site with helpful links such as applying for disaster assistance, building a safe room in your home, and common weather terms used during hurricane season;

www.bt.cdc.gov/disasters/hurricanes—Key facts about hurricane readiness and recovery including whether ! or not water is safe for drinking, and how best to prevent injuries during and after a storm;

www.floridahurricane.net—Up-to-date maps and projections of hurricanes;

www.weather.gov/alerts/fl.html—County-specific warning and weather alerts (throughout Florida);

www.srh.noaa.gov/mfl/newpage/hurricanes.html—Thorough preparation checklist (i.e. What to know before a storm, and what to know once one hits).

Casework Corner*

Mr. Connors was trying to gain TRICARE certification for his healthcare business. Upon certification, his clinics would be able to provide services for TRICARE beneficiaries. For several months after his application was filed, Mr. Connors received conflicting information as to the status of his company's request.

A caseworker submitted a Congressional inquiry on behalf of Mr. Connors and his business. Shortly thereafter a letter was received from TRICARE confirming that his company's application had been completed and approved. Within one week of the inquiry, his company was able to treat TRICARE beneficiaries.

*Casework Corner is a real account of assistance provided to constituents. The names of those involved are changed to protect the privacy of the constituent.

If you have questions about a federal agency, please contact the Orlando Regional Office by calling (407) 254-2573 to speak with a member of the Casework Department. The toll-free number for Florida residents is (866) 630-7106. To find out more about how my Office can help you, go to <http://martinez.senate.gov> or stop by one of our scheduled Community Office Hours in your area.

—Sen. Mel Martinez

20070607-01	16:19	B. Nelson	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
-----------------------------	-------	-----------	-----------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me regarding immigration reform. I appreciate your taking the time to share your thoughts with me.

Like you, I believe our immigration system is broken and needs to be fixed. But I'm reserving judgment on a bipartisan deal developing in the Senate. While it's still very uncertain what the final details of the measure will look like, I'm opposed to amnesty, and will insist that the bill strengthens our borders.

Please be assured that I will keep your thoughts in mind during the Senate's debate on immigration reform.

P.S. From time to time, I compile electronic news briefs highlighting key issues and hot topics of particular importance to Floridians. If you'd like to receive these ebriefs, visit my Web site and sign up for them at <http://billnelson.senate.gov/news/ebriefs.cfm>.

Contact: <http://billnelson.senate.gov/contact/index.cfm#email>

—Sen. Bill Nelson

20070608-01 13:53 SteveB To: Senator _____; Immigration Reform Bill

Dear Senator _____:

I am happy that the proposed Immigration Bill has apparently gone down to defeat. How awful and unfair to our citizens, children, and legal immigrants to attempt to grant amnesty of any kind to law-breaking illegal immigrants—again! And how awful and unfair not to enforce the laws already passed, not to prevent employers from hiring illegal aliens, and not to protect our borders even to the extent of building a fence!

You should be ashamed and not be able to sleep at night for trying to sell our great country down the river in the name of cheap votes or cheap labor or whatever cockeyed reason someone might have.

I beg you, please work to do everything possible to see that our laws are enforced. Deny jobs, rights, and privileges to illegal aliens and they will go back home of their own accord. Please protect our children and their futures!

Thank you.

20070608-02 14:19 H. Clinton Re: Immigration Reform Bill

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for your e-mail. It is very important to me to know the issues that are of concern to you. A growing number of my constituents are now choosing to communicate with me via e-mail. I hope you will understand that, because of the volume and range of e-mails I receive, it can take some time to send a response that specifically addresses the subject raised in your message. I do, however, want to let you know immediately that your message has been received. Hearing from you and others through e-mail helps me to quickly learn the views and interests of New Yorkers and others, which is very helpful to me in my work in the United States Senate.

Sincerely, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton

20070611-01 09:43 G. Bush Re: Immigration Reform Bill

On behalf of President Bush, thank you for your correspondence. We appreciate hearing your views and welcome your suggestions. Due to the large volume of e-mail received, the White House cannot respond to every message. Thank you again for taking the time to write.

—comments@whitehouse.gov

20070611-02 16:09 B. Obama Re: Immigration Reform Bill

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me about the immigration reform debate. I appreciate having the benefit of your perspective and can report that the Senate's failure on June 7 to cut off debate on immigration reform legislation means that the bill is likely dead for the remainder of this Congress.

The Senate immigration reform bill was authored by Senators Ted Kennedy (D-MA) and Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and supported by President Bush. This compromise bill attacks the immigration problem in a comprehensive fashion by tightening border security, increasing enforcement against employers who hire illegal workers, and establishes a process by which undocumented workers and their families can earn citizenship after paying fines and learning English. Further, the bill would create a temporary program for foreign workers who must return to their homeland after a specified period. The most contentious elements of the Kennedy/Kyl bill appear to be its path to citizenship, the new point system it proposes for future immigration and its guest worker program. The Senate considered a number of amendments to the bill.

For example, I supported an amendment to reduce the number of temporary workers permitted to enter the country annually from 400,000 to 200,000 as well as an amendment to end the temporary worker program after five years. Both of these amendments passed and became part of the bill. In the final analysis, however, the Senate refused to cut off debate on the bill, thereby likely killing it for the remainder of this Congress.

I fully understand the strong feelings many in Illinois and across the United States hold regarding the adverse effects of illegal immigration. Indeed, illegal immigration causes significant consequences that affect American workers as well as health and education infrastructure. Many people understandably believe that undocumented immigrants should not be rewarded for flouting U.S. law and suggest we should just seal our borders and deport undocumented workers currently living in the country.

On the other hand, it is significant that the Department of Homeland Security recognizes that identifying and deporting 12 million undocumented workers currently working in this country would be both difficult logistically and disruptive to the American economy.

Ultimately, this dilemma about how to treat undocumented aliens currently in the country proved too tough to resolve. Although the Senate has now moved on to consider other legislation, you may be certain that I will remember your perspective should similar legislation come before the Senate in the future. Again, thank you for writing. Please stay in touch in the future.

Sincerely,
Barack Obama, United States Senator

20070612-01	10:32	M. Martinez	Re: Immigration Reform Bill, Etc.
-------------	-------	-------------	-----------------------------------

Dear SteveB:

On Thursday, Senator Martinez called for solutions to the border security and immigration policy problems facing America. Speaking on the Senate floor, Senator Martinez stated, "This is a challenge I will not shrink from and I will continue to do all I can to see that we tackle this very difficult problem that our nation faces. I remain committed because we owe it to the American people," said Martinez.

Senator Martinez met with U.S.F. College of Marine Science graduate students and staff who were attending Capitol Hill Oceans Week in Washington, D.C. Senator Martinez discussed with them their hopes of advancing U.S. ocean policy and the status of legislation pending before Congress.

Wednesday, Senator Martinez spoke on the Senate floor in memory of former NASCAR president and Floridian, Bill France, Jr. Senator Martinez said: "I know I speak for the hundreds of thousands of fans, the drivers, the pit crews, and anyone and everyone who enjoys NASCAR, as well as Floridians and Daytona Beach residents, when I say a well deserved 'thank you' to Bill France, Jr.—for making our weekends a lot more exciting, more enjoyable, and a lot faster. Florida thanks you for your vision, Bill. We will miss you, but you leave behind a legacy that we will never forget."

Reminder: Community Office Hours For Southwest Florida June 14th & 15th, caseworkers from the Office of Senator Martinez will visit Hendry, Glades, DeSoto, and Highlands counties. Caseworkers will be available to assist constituents with concerns and issues ranging from Veterans issues to Healthcare, Social Security, Medicare, and other services provided by the federal government.

Summer Travel Reminder: Passport Rules have changed for U.S. citizens traveling to certain countries.

In the face of record-breaking demand for passports, there have been longer than expected processing times of passport applications. As a result, the United States Government recently announced an accommodation for air travel. U.S. citizens traveling to Canada, Mexico, the Caribbean, and Bermuda who have applied for, but not yet received, passports can temporarily enter and depart from the United States by air with a government-issued photo identification and Department of State official proof of application for a passport through Sept. 30, 2007.

For more detailed information, do not hesitate to contact our Office or visit the relevant U.S. Department of State Web page at www.travel.state.gov.

Casework Corner*

Mr. West lost medals he earned during WWII and contacted the U.S. Air Force Awards Branch to have them replaced. The Awards Branch was unable to find records of his service in the Air Force during the War. Mr. West contacted the Office of Senator Martinez for assistance in obtaining his medals.

A caseworker contacted the U.S. Air Force, provided specific information which allowed the Awards Branch to perform a more detailed search of the war records, and within thirty days, the Air Force verified Mr. West's eligibility for multiple campaign and service awards. He is currently scheduled to receive those medals that were lost.

*Casework Corner is a real account of assistance provided to constituents. The names of those involved are changed to protect the privacy of the constituent.

If you have questions about a federal agency, please contact the Orlando Regional Office by calling (407) 254-2573 to speak with a member of the Casework Department. The toll-free number for Florida residents is (866) 630-7106. To find out more about how my Office can help you, go to <http://martinez.senate.gov> or stop by one of our scheduled Community Office Hours in your area.

This Newsletter Page is maintained by the Office of U.S. Senator Mel Martinez.

20070612-02	13:46	M. Martinez	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
-----------------------------	-------	-------------	-----------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for taking the time to contact me. I appreciate hearing from you regarding comprehensive immigration reform and would like to respond to your concerns.

As you may know, on June 7, 2007, the Senate was unable to reach an agreement on the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act (S. 1348) and the Senate Majority Leader has set aside S. 1348, for the time being. Delaying comprehensive reform does a disservice to America. I remain committed to working together with my colleagues to produce a tough but fair and workable piece of legislation that President Bush can sign into law during this Congress.

To do this, we must secure the border first. The first section of S. 1348 mandates that border security and worksite-enforcement benchmarks must be met before other elements of the legislation are implemented. This legislation will direct the Department of Homeland Security to complete construction of hundreds of miles of additional double layered fencing and create 200 miles of vehicle barriers on our border with Mexico. The department will hire and train 18,000 border patrol agents. In addition, this bill provides for surveillance technologies to enhance our ability to monitor the border, such as, 70 ground —based radar and camera towers on the southern border and 4 unmanned aerial vehicles. However, physically securing the border will not solve the entire problem. Employers will be required to verify the work eligibility of all employees using an employment eligibility verification system, while all workers will be required to present stronger and more verifiable identification documents. Tough new anti-fraud measures will be implemented and stiff penalties imposed on employers who break the law.

After the border has been certified secure by the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security and the employment verification system is in place, the remaining provisions of the bill will go into effect. To address the labor shortage in industries with a demonstrated need such as, the Florida Citrus and Hospitality Industries, a guest worker program will be implemented. The purpose of this program is to relieve pressure on the border and provide a lawful way to meet the needs of our economy. The proposal creates a temporary worker program to fill jobs Americans are not doing. To ensure this program is truly temporary, workers will be limited to three two-year terms, with at least a year spent outside the United States between each term. A small percentage of temporary workers will be allowed to bring immediate family members only if they have the financial ability to support them and they are covered by health insurance.

Additionally, this legislation does away with a relative- based immigration system or "Chain Migration" and establishes a new merit-based system to select future immigrants based on the skills and attributes they will bring to the United States. Under the merit-based system, future immigrants applying for permanent residency in the U.S. will be assigned points for skills, education, and other attributes that further our national interest including: ability to speak English; level of schooling, including added points for training in science, math, and technology; employment in a specialty or high-demand field; employer endorsement; and certain family ties to the U.S. This merit- based system will enhance and ensure American competitiveness for the future and put American immigration policies in line with other industrialized nations.

It is my firm belief that addressing border security and cracking down on unscrupulous employers while doing nothing to address those already living here illegally would amount to de facto amnesty for those 12 million. Further, it is in the United States' national security interest to learn the identity of these individuals. Illegal immigrants who come out of the shadows will be given probationary status.

Once the border security and enforcement benchmarks are met, they must pass a background check, remain employed, maintain a clean criminal record, pay an initial fine, determined by the size of their household as well as a state impact fee, and receive a counterfeit-proof biometric card to apply for a work visa or "Z visa." Some years later, these Z visa holders will be eligible to apply for limited permanent residency, but only after paying an additional $4,000 fine; completing accelerated English requirements and demonstrating knowledge of American civics; going to the back of the line while the current green card backlog clears; returning to their home country to file their application; and demonstrating merit under the merit-based system. It is important to note that a petitioner for or holder of a Z visa can be deported at any time if a disqualifying factor is identified during background checks, such factors include but are not limited to—a criminal conviction, gang affiliation or terrorist activity.

With my full support, this bill declares that English is the national language of the United States and calls on the United States Government to preserve and enhance it, as well as enacting accelerated English requirements for many immigrants.

Please know that I will keep your concerns in mind as the Senate debates S.1348. I am aware that Congress has failed to oversee the enforcement of immigration law in the past. I believe that S. 1348 provides the Executive Branch, American employers and people aspiring to work in America or become Americans with a clear and workable policy that is efficient and fair. This is an important national security, economic, and humanitarian challenge, and I know the American people are looking to Congress for action and oversight.

Again, thank you for sharing your views with me. If you have any additional comments, please contact me. For more information about issues and activities important to Florida, please sign up for my weekly newsletter at <http://martinez.senate.gov>.

Sincerely, Mel Martinez, United States Senator, <http://martinez.senate.gov>.

20070612-03 14:24 SteveB "El Hacendado" Immigration Reform
--

"El Hacendado" by Howard Fineman, Newsweek

June 11, 2007, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/2007/06/11/the-hacendado.html>)

(Why is President Bush risking a nasty battle within his own party over immigration reform?)

Though I've never heard him use the term, my guess is that George W. Bush sees himself as a hacendado, an estate owner in Old Mexico.

That would give him a sense of Southwestern noblesse, duty-bound not just to work "his" people, but to protect them as well.

His advisor, Carl Rove, has explained that a system called "democracy" now gives peasants something called "the vote." It would be shrewd, Rove said, for hacendados to grant their workers' citizenship.

That's the best explanation I have for why Bush is in the midst of what may be a suicide mission on immigration policy—embarrassing for him and ruinous for his party.

An ungrateful base

Long ago, when he was running for governor, Bush told me that he was a "southwestern" Republican, not a "southern" one. As a son of the southwest, he wants employers to have access to all of that cheap labor, but wants to make the system more orderly, at least not cruel. He hopes (as he did as governor) to get credit for wisdom.

It infuriates Bush when people—in his own party, no less—are not grateful for what he sees as an act of heartfelt, enlightened generosity and foresighted management.

So he sounded like the Texas gunslinger he pretended to be as a kid when he squared off against GOP foes of his sweeping immigration proposal. His timing was perfect, as in wrong, just as he was preparing to attend the Senate Republicans' weekly luncheon on the Hill. "I'll see you at the bill signing," he said, chestier than usual.

He might live to regret such playground bravado. If you are president, the only thing worse than issuing a public threat to your own party is failing to make it stick.

It really is quite extraordinary. Here he is, an unpopular leader fighting an unpopular war. His two-term presidency is clattering to a conclusion, besieged on all sides, taking hits on everything from his attorney general to his general incompetence. And so he decides to do what? Climb into the ring for an ultimate fighting bout with the base of the very Republicans who got him to the White House.

Outrage and concern

As always, conservatives, who thrive on alienation, are spoiling for a fight. Now they have found it. Among the branch of conservatism fixed on "Us v Them" thinking, the enemy for decades was Communism. After the fall of The Wall, the "neocons" found a replacement Them in jihadist Islam. The old America-Firsters—what we used to call "isolationists," who distrust foreign commitments—now have a homeland Them, in the form of 12-20 million illegal immigrants, most from Mexico.

The domestic neocons want a fence, a big and real one; they want illegals sent packing to the extent possible. Mostly they want leaders to express outrage and concern. And they aren't a fringe; they form the core of the GOP. That is especially true in the South and parts of the Rustbelt, where the threat of being inundated by immigrants is less immediate, but the sense of estrangement from metropolitan, bi-coastal America great.

Of the more than 100 members of Rep. Tom Tancredo's Immigration Reform Caucus—which favors a tough, enforcement-oriented policy—only six are from the southwestern swing states at political ground zero: Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Nevada.

Overwhelming campaign opposition

Responding to the GOP base as it is, not as Bush hopes it is, nine of the ten Republican presidential contenders are ardently against Bush's plan to give a "path to citizenship" to illegals. The 11th—soon-to-be candidate Fred Dalton Thompson—is almost as adamant as Tancredo on the topic. If there is a 12th GOP candidate, that would be Newt Gingrich. He adds a Churchillian sense of urgency and doom to the debate.

As for Bush, he has the Business Roundtable types (with a smattering of fitful union allies) and party strategists—Rove among them—who argue that the GOP has no choice but to hit the reset button on an immigration "system" that was overwhelmed from the moment it was last "reformed" in 1986. The CEO types are no match, in what amounts to a GOP primary, for angry grassroots activists on a crusade.

And they shouldn't be dismissed as crazies. Bush's own dark view of post 9/11 clashes with his relatively benign attitude toward illegal immigration. Here is the question that clash begs:

Do borders mean anything?

20070614-01 14:16 A. Specter Re: Immigration Reform Bill

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting my office regarding immigration. Our immigration system is broken and must be reformed. As the Ranking Member on the Senate Judiciary Committee in the 110th Congress, I have worked tirelessly with my fellow Senators and both the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Homeland Security to develop a "grand compromise" on the subject of comprehensive immigration reform. This compromise will ensure that our borders are secure while providing practical solutions regarding the millions of undocumented immigrants that already reside within the United States .

This legislation makes border security a top priority by providing for 18,000 border patrol agents and requiring 370 miles of new fencing along the border. It will also provide for the resources to detain up to 27,500 aliens per day on an annual basis, effectively ending the old "catch and release" program. Importantly, this bill requires that all of these "triggers" designed to secure our borders be implemented before we begin any other step in this comprehensive legislation. The legislation also mandates the development of an effective electronic employment verification system, which will ensure that employers are able to verify the legal status of those they consider hiring.

In addition to the strong approach this bill will take towards border security, it also includes a firm but reasonable approach towards those individuals who are here illegally. Currently, there are more than 12 million people living in the United States without proper documentation. This legislation requires undocumented immigrants to go on "probationary" status and to go through extensive background checks. Once an individual has passed the necessary security checks, paid substantial fines and demonstrated proficiency in English, the individual may "earn" a right to remain in the United States . In order for an individual to be eligible to earn the right, the individual must return to their home country and apply through a consulate or an embassy. By requiring immigrants to earn their right to permanent legal status, this bill provides a reasonable solution to the country's immigration problems that is both tough and fair.

It is also very important for our economy that we create an effective temporary worker program that allows an employer to find a temporary worker when no willing U.S. worker can be found. Those desiring temporary employment in the United States would be issued a "Y" visa, which would be good for two years. The migrant worker would be required to return to his or her home country for a period of one year before they are allowed to return back to the United States.

Another important aspect of this bill is the creation of a merit based system for allocating green cards. This new system will focus on attracting the immigrants who will make the biggest contribution to our society. The system is designed to reward those who demonstrate a proficiency in English, have received higher forms of education and other training, and have employment opportunities in the United States . Not only will this practice strengthen the economy of the United States , but it will also end the practice of "chain migration," a practice that allows people to immigrate simply by virtue of being related to those who are already here legally.

Again, I thank you for contacting my office. Although the bill has suffered recent setbacks, I am pleased that leaders on both sides of the aisle are determined to produce a viable immigration bill. I believe we will return to this matter shortly and produce a comprehensive bill. I will keep in mind your input as we continue to debate immigration. If you have any additional questions on this or any other issue, please do not hesitate to contact my office or visit my website at www.specter.senate.gov.

Sincerely, Sen. Arlen Specter

20070614-02 14:49 SteveB "Bush's European Disaster" Trade

"Bush's European Disaster" by Sidney Blumenthal, Salon

June 14, 2007, (http://www.salon.com/2007/06/14/bush_foreign_policy_2/)

(The President's trip was a pageant of disdain, delusion and provocation masquerading as a respite from his troubles at home.)

I returned from Europe a week before President Bush departed for the G8 summit in Germany. In Rome and Paris I met with Cabinet ministers who uniformly said the chief issue in transatlantic relations is somehow making it through the last 18 months of the Bush administration without further major disaster. None of the nonpartisan think tanks in Washington can organize seminars on this overriding reality, but within the European councils of state the trepidation about the last days of Bush is the No. 1 issue in foreign affairs.

One of the ministers with whom I met, who had supported the invasion of Iraq and had been an admirer of outgoing British Prime Minister Tony Blair's, ruefully cited Blair's remark about Iraq at his joint press conference with Bush on May 17 at the White House: "This is a fight we cannot afford to lose." "Cannot? Cannot lose?" mocked the minister. "Should not have lost."

High officials of European governments describe U.S. influence as squandered and swiftly eroding (one minister went down a list of Bush administration officials, rating them according to their stupidity), the country's moral authority nil. Lethal power vacuums are emerging from Lebanon to Pakistan, and Europeans are incapable on their own of quelling the fires that burn far closer to them than to the United States through their growing Muslim populations and proximity to the Middle East. They have no illusions that they will be treated seriously as real allies or that there will be a sudden about-face by the Bush administration. Their faint hope — and it is only a hope — is that they have already seen the worst and that it is not yet to come. Even worse than Bush, from their perspective, would be another Republican president who continued Bush policies and also appointed neoconservatives. That would toll, if not the end of days, then the decline and fall of the Western alliance except in name only, and an even more rapid acceleration of chaos in the world order.

Bush's procession through Europe was a pageant of contempt, disdain, delusion, provocation and vanity masquerading as a welcome respite from his troubles at home. In Albania he landed at last in a place where he was hailed as a conquering hero. His demolition derby of U.S. influence was presented as a series of bold moves, but it confirmed the fears of the other world leaders at the G8 summit (and elsewhere) that the rest of Bush's presidency will be an erratic series of crashes. His performance ranged from King Nod, issuing proclamations oblivious to and even proud of their negative effect, to King Zog (the last king of Albania). No president has had a more disastrous European trip since President Reagan placed a wreath on the graves of SS soldiers in the Bitburg cemetery. Yet Reagan's mistake was unintentional and symbolic, a temporary and superficial setback, doing no real damage to U.S. foreign relations, while Bush's blunders not only reinforced counterproductive policies but also created a new one with Russia that has the potential of profoundly undermining U.S. national security interests for years to come.

Bush's foreign policy has descended into a fugue state. Dissociated and unaware, the president and his administration are still capable of expressing themselves as if it all makes complete sense, only contributing to their bewilderment. A fugue state should not be confused with cognitive dissonance, the tension produced when irreconcilable ideas are held at the same time and their incompatibility is overcome by denial. In a fugue state, a trauma creates a kind of amnesia in which the sufferer is incapable of connecting to his past. The impairment of judgment comes in great part from a denial of distress. Bush's fugue state involves the reiteration of a failed formula as though nothing has happened. So he proudly reasserts the essence of his Bush doctrine: Our acts are independent of other countries' interests. And he adds new corollaries: Other nations must forgive our unacknowledged mistakes even if we threaten their national security. To this, Bush overlays cognitive dissonance: Our policy is working; it just needs more time. Thus the incoherent becomes coherent.

Bush's amusing gaffes should not divert attention from the gravity of his underlying decline. Though his verbal hilariousness has been present since the beginning, his miscues, misstatements and mistakes now highlight a foreign policy in utter disarray. Upon meeting Pope Benedict XVI at the Vatican last weekend, Bush presented him with a gift of a wooden cane carved with English words. When the pope asked the president what they were, Bush told His Holiness, "The Ten Commandments, sir." To si? With love?

In Rome, on June 9, a reporter asked Bush about setting a deadline for Kosovo independence. "What? Say that again?" "Deadline for the Kosovo independence?" "A decline?" "Deadline, deadline." "Deadline. Beg your pardon. My English isn't very good." Bush then declared, "In terms of the deadline, there needs to be one. This needs to come — this needs to happen." The next day, asked when he would set a deadline, he replied, "I don't think I called for a deadline." Reminded of his previous statement, Bush said: "I did? What exactly did I say? I said, 'Deadline'? OK, yes, then I meant what I said."

Before offering that tongue twister, Bush quite deliberately upset German Chancellor Angela Merkel's proposal for climate change at the G8. She put before the summit a program for carbon limits and an emissions trading system supported by, among others, Tony Blair, as his final gesture to burnish his reputation before he leaves office on June 27. Bush countered with a proposal for voluntary limits that would have to be approved by China, India and other major industrial countries that would not agree. In short, Bush's program was no program at all, except as a gambit to push aside Merkel's. With that, Bush demolished the possibility of any positive plan emerging from the summit. He also deprived Blair of a last achievement. Were it not for his relationship with Bush and support for his Iraq policy, Blair would not be leaving Downing Street. He has sacrificed his career to Bush's fiasco. His advice on the reconstruction of Iraq ignored, his advocacy grew more passionate. From whom much has been asked, nothing has been given.

While Bush was undermining traditional allies, Russian President Vladimir Putin was making child's play of him. Bush's proposal to put tracking stations for a missile defense system in Poland and the Czech Republic gave Putin his opening. In response, he offered a radar site in Azerbaijan to be jointly operated by the United States and Russia. Bush had deployed the wrong tactic on behalf of the wrong strategy. Bush's missile shield has not been proved to work, has cost hundreds of billions of dollars, and has an uncertain purpose. Is the plan meant to reassure eastern European nations of the former Warsaw Pact, Donald Rumsfeld's "new Europe," against Russia, or is it a short-term ploy to rally support in the one region in the world that still likes Bush because of deep residual pro-Americanism? If Bush intended to persuade Putin to temper his authoritarianism, he only succeeded in antagonizing the Russian leader. As Bush's "freedom" agenda has collapsed, he has reverted to a Plan B for a new ersatz Cold War. His ham-handed move allowed the adroit Putin to change the subject and corner him. Meanwhile, the engagement of Russia in areas of mutual interest — containing Iran — languishes.

In Iraq, Bush's policy is now to arm all sides in the sectarian civil war between Shiites and Sunnis. He claims to be devoted to nation building, which he previously dismissed, while he presides over a mass exodus of 2 million Iraqis, upholds law and order while holding tens of thousands of prisoners without due process, and conducts a "surge" of troops to secure the capital city of Baghdad whose main effect has been to facilitate its ethnic cleansing. The Iraqi government, for its part, has not met any of the benchmarks in reforming its laws demanded by the United States as the sine qua non of continuing support.

And where in the world is Condoleezza Rice? While Bush was in Europe, the secretary of state was at home. Instead of attending the summit, she delivered a speech at the Economic Club of New York, announcing that the new doctrine of the administration henceforth should be called "American realism." Until that moment, we were supposed to refer to it as "transformational diplomacy." Rice, the former realist turned neoconservative fellow traveler, seemed to have come full circle. But what was it exactly that she was doing with her rhetorical adjustment? Rice's frenetic but feckless diplomacy in the Middle East has been fruitless. She is unwilling or unable to break beyond the bounds that Bush establishes, forbidding relations with Syria, for example, and thus guaranteeing her failure.

As she shuttles endlessly and meaninglessly, neoconservatives within the White House undermine her foredoomed initiatives. Elliott Abrams, the deputy national security advisor for policy, in briefing a meeting of Jewish Republicans, said that Rice's "talks are sometimes not more than 'process for the sake of process,'" the Israeli newspaper Haaretz reported on May 14. According to Haaretz, "Those attending the meeting of Jewish Republicans understood Abrams' comments as an assurance that the peace initiative promoted by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice doesn't have the full backing of President George W. Bush." As she engages in an academic exercise to rebrand empty rhetoric with new empty rhetoric, the neocons continue to create a parallel foreign policy.

Rice contradicts herself but forgets that she has. Bush continues to prattle about "freedom" but cannot remember his benchmarks. Only Dick Cheney remains consistent. The new mission statement is the old mission statement. The new scenarios are the old delusions. Time marches on.

(Sidney Blumenthal, a former assistant and senior advisor to President Clinton, writes a column for Salon and the Guardian of London. His new book is titled How Bush Rules: Chronicles of a Radical Regime. He is a senior fellow at the New York University Center on Law and Security.)

20070614-03	15:16	SteveB	"What Is the Meaning of Life?" Philosophy, Spirituality
-------------	-------	--------	---

"What Is the Meaning of Life?" by Laura Miller, Salon

June 14, 2007, (<http://www.salon.com/2007/06/14/eagleton/>)

(Terry Eagleton, the man who introduced millions to literary theory, tells us why George Bush is the ultimate postmodernist, how torture is wrong, and what "meaning" really means.)

The British academic Terry Eagleton has the unusual — possibly unique — distinction of having written a bestselling book about late-20th-century literary theory. The book, Literary Theory: An Introduction, is reputed to have sold 1 million copies, chiefly on the strength of Eagleton's extraordinarily lucid prose. He may well be the only writer capable of making some of that stuff comprehensible to the intelligent lay reader, and so the news that he has tackled a bigger problem — the meaning of life — in a book of a mere 185 pages shouldn't raise any eyebrows. If anyone can pull it off, it's probably Eagleton.

The Meaning of Life is more a long essay than a full-length book, and its publishers probably hope it'll hit the same sweet spot as Harry G. Frankfurt's surprise success, *On Bullsh*t*, another slim volume of intellectual nonfiction. That's unlikely; The Meaning of Life intends to challenge its readers — not, like the Frankfurt, to provide them with the opportunity to sneer at other people (because who reads *On Bullsh*t* thinking it's about them?). Eagleton, unsurprisingly, has written an elegant, literate, cogent consideration of a maddeningly slippery topic, one whose conclusions run contrary to conventional wisdom, especially in this country. To be sure, The Meaning of Life is also occasionally waspish, condescending and even a little unfair, though always enjoyably so. It's saucy too; it takes cheek to suggest that George W. Bush is the ultimate postmodernist.

Two primary tributaries feed into the body of Eagleton's thought: Marxism and the tradition of Catholic intellectualism in which he was educated as a boy. Although no longer a member of the church, Eagleton retains much respect for religious ideals, a respect that lies behind his recent, scalding review of Richard Dawkins' The God Delusion in the London Review of Books. These two influences might seem incompatible today, but in the 1970s, when Eagleton was coming up as a working-class boy turned Oxbridge scholar, liberation theology and other exhilarating currents of social change combining faith with socialism were in the air. However much his work may have changed on the surface since then, Eagleton's underlying values remain much the same.

In essence, The Meaning of Life is a brief against postmodernism, a movement Eagleton calls "superficially radical" but "secretly in cahoots with a Western ideology for which what matters is the meanings we stamp on the world and others for our own ends." Them's fightin' words in an academic climate where accusing someone of wanting to oppress anyone (let alone the whole world) is the ultimate insult. But before Eagleton delivers this coup de grâce, he takes his readers on a short, illuminating journey through the knottier aspects of the question "What is the meaning of life?"

Being a literary critic, Eagleton must interrogate nearly every word in that question — beginning with "is," in a manner vaguely reminiscent of Bill Clinton's famous testimony before Ken Starr. A presiding spirit here is Ludwig Wittgenstein, who, as Eagleton explains, was highly suspicious of such questions and many other philosophical preoccupations he dismissed as mere "language games." "I am not myself a philosopher," Eagleton remarks on the first page of The Meaning of Life, "a fact of which I am sure some of my reviewers will point out in any case." Not being a philosopher myself, I won't attempt to evaluate his interpretation of Wittgenstein's ideas — some of the most difficult and gnomic in an inherently hard-to-crack field. It may not matter much; Wittgenstein mostly just pops in now and then, like the ghosts in "Topper," to offer a few words of advice that might actually be jokes, and vice versa.

The answer to the question "What is the meaning of life?" used to be fairly clear to most Western thinkers: The meaning of life was God, and his will, and his plan for the human beings who lived the lives he gave to them. Only when the bedrock faith in that particular answer began to erode did the question become a source of anxiety and even torment. The movement called modernism followed from, as Eagleton puts it, "the belief that human existence is contingent — that it has no ground, goal, direction or necessity, and that our species might quite easily never have emerged on the planet. This possibility then hollows out our actual presence, casting across it the perpetual shadow of loss and death. ... There is no unimpeachable foundation to what we are and what we do."

For those who don't believe in God, or at least in a God with a plan for the human race, the question "What is the meaning of life?" seethes with puzzles. Can existence mean anything at all without someone (i.e., God) to mean it? Those famous 100 monkeys, pounding away on 100 typewriters for eternity, might eventually produce the exact text of Hamlet, but they won't mean Hamlet the way that the man who intentionally wrote it did.

Eagleton brings contemporary linguistics-based theory to bear on the idea of "meaning," pointing out that it takes several forms. I might mean (that is, intend) to say the word "poisson" ("fish") to a French waiter, but I might actually say "poison," which in turn means (that is, signifies) something else entirely. ("Poison" has the same meaning in French, actually, as it has in English.) There's what I intend to signify or communicate when I speak, and then there's what my words mean in a larger system, such as a language. For linguists, the first kind of meaning is an "act" and the second is a "structure."

If this distinction is making your eyes cross or is conjuring up ancient, bleary memories of trying to fathom Ferdinand de Saussure at a 3:30 p.m. study section, take heart. Eagleton has more in mind than just a technical discussion of the workings of language. But language is central to any discussion of the meaning of life, because language is what meaning is made of. Meaning is a human artifact, Eagleton points out; material objects — a tomato, a hammer, ink on a page in the shape of the letter "I" — have no meaning in and of themselves, only the meanings we human beings assign to them, and the main tool we use to make those meanings is language.

Here is where the postmodernists come into it, specifically those thinkers (Eagleton doesn't name them) who argue that nothing has a fixed or deep meaning. Meanings, they insist, are the creations of human culture, not properties of reality itself, so things, experiences and people can mean whatever we damned well please. This philosophy is intended to be liberatory; theorists who claim that certain identities — "male," "female," "homosexual," "black," and so on — are culturally "constructed" believe themselves to be freeing people from the straitjacket of social roles that have been falsely presented as bedrock facts of nature.

This "constructivism" is a form of the "relativism" that cultural conservatives in this county love to denounce, so some might be surprised to see the left-wing Eagleton condemning it, too. (In fact, Eagleton has been criticizing deconstructionism and its spinoffs for decades.) Eagleton strenuously objects to the constructivist rejection of absolute or inherent meanings. "Nobody actually believes this," he remarks of constructivism, and he's right about that in more ways than he realizes. Outside of academia, hardly anyone even pretends to believe in this stuff, so seeing it eviscerated isn't as important to the civilian reader as Eagleton seems to think. Of course we all realize that, to use Eagleton's example, "it just would not work for us to 'construct' tigers as coy and cuddly"; that's idiotic. Complicated identities like gender roles are another matter; we know they're at least partly configurable because they've changed in the course of history.

Eagleton goes on to cite the scholar Frank Farrell, who has linked the postmodern insistence on an infinitely malleable reality to roots in early Protestantism. The old Catholic idea that things have "essences" or "determinate natures" could not be reconciled philosophically with the doctrine of an all-powerful God; any given thing's inherent nature would limit what God could do with it. "God's arbitrary will," as Eagleton puts it, cannot be constrained, so things can only be what they are "because of his say-so, not because of themselves." In this belief Eagleton sees the seeds of the 20th century's "cult of the will."

Eagleton never details how the Catholic conception of an all-powerful God handles this dilemma, an omission that makes this particular bit of the book sound suspiciously like special pleading. Nevertheless, he draws a provocative comparison between the anti-essentialist "cult of the will" and some modern political figures. Still not naming names, he writes:

Torture is morally wrong because God's will has determined it to be so, not because it is wrong in itself. In fact, nothing is right or wrong in itself. God could easily have decided to make failing to torture each other a punishable offence. There can be no reason for his decisions, since reasons would hamper his absolute freedom of action. ... He is the source of his own law and reason, which are there to serve his power. Torture could well be permissible if it suited his purposes. It is not difficult to identify the inheritors of these doctrines in our own political world.

To Eagleton, postmodernism, with its repudiation of inherent or "deep" meanings, is, for all its revolutionary rhetoric, a variation on the same theme. To get back to the question driving his book, the motto "Life is what you make it" may sound banal, but it reeks of a similar hubris. It "reflects an individualist bias common to the modern age" by insisting that we all find our own meaning of life in a personal, private realm. But if meaning has its own roots in language, then claiming this, Eagleton argues, is like claiming that everyone gets to make up their own personal meanings for words.

While the words I've used to write this piece reflect a meaning of my own individual making, they'd be nonsense if I decided to make up all their meanings from scratch. I could, like Humpty Dumpty in Through the Looking Glass, insist that "glory" really means "there's a nice knockdown argument for you," but then my words would become useless as a form of communication — in other words, they'd be meaningless. To judge by the way language works, says Eagleton, meaning is always at least partly shared and collaborative. "We are woven through and through with the meanings of others — meanings which we never got to choose, yet which provide the matrix with which we come to make sense of ourselves and the world." While Humpty Dumpty's absurd unilateralism maintains that when it comes to handling words, "the question is, which is to be master, that's all," Eagleton insists that "meaning is in fact the product of a transaction between us and reality."

According to Eagleton, people who cherish the notion of a purely private, interior and individually constructed meaning of life are indulging in a delusion fostered by late capitalism. As long as citizens believe meaning can best be found in, say, studying the kabala or concentrating on nuclear-family relations, they won't demand more from public life than the empty utilitarianism of the free market. Eagleton prefers Aristotle's practical version of the good — that is, the fulfilled — life (even as he registers some caveats about the inequities of ancient Greek society). "The meaning of life is not a solution to a problem," he writes, "but a matter of living in a certain way." It is not an idea but a behavior, "not metaphysical, but ethical." And the ethics involved are not a lot of mystical mumbo jumbo but "an embarrassingly prosaic affair — a matter of feeding the hungry, giving drink to the thirsty, welcoming the stranger and visiting the imprisoned." He might add, working to change the social order so that more people have the ability to live according to this ethos.

These are, of course, the classic directives of Christian charity, but Eagleton isn't making a religious argument on their behalf. The need to do these things, to live this life, he says, arises not from God but from the nature of human beings themselves. We can't get away from it; it's our essence. We are social animals who thrive on love; not just love for our kith and kin, but the kind of love, called "agape" — caring for our fellow man — that is "a practice or a way of life, not a state of mind." The more this type of love circulates in our community, the more meaning we find in life itself and the happier we become.

Outside of the academy, essentialism— usually in the form of evolutionary psychology — is almost always used to justify a conservative or libertarian, dog-eat-dog view of human nature, so it's a treat to see it recruited here for the leftist cause. Perhaps, irony of ironies, Eagleton has demonstrated that essentialism is what you make of it? Maybe so, but having seen him make mincemeat out of his ideological opponents in The Meaning of Life, I wouldn't want to be the one to tell him that. I'd sooner try to scratch a tiger under the chin.

20070614-04	20:50	Dick	Fw: Shocking Senatorial Votes
-------------	-------	------	-------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says the claims are "mostly false"
(<http://www.snopes.com/politics/immigration/socialsecurity.asp>) —SteveB]

"Never argue with an idiot; they'll drag you down to their level and beat you with experience."—anonymous

The following senators voted against making English the official language of America:

Akaka (D-HI), Bayh (D-IN), Biden (D-DE), Bingaman (D-NM), Boxer (D-CA), Cantwell (D-WA), Clinton (D-NY), Dayton (D-MN), Dodd (D-CT), Domenici (R-NM), Durbin (D-IL), Feingold (D-WI), Feinstein (D-CA), Harkin (D-IA), Inouye (D-HI), Jeffords (I-VT), Kennedy (D-MA), Kerry (D-MA), Kohl (D-WI), Lautenberg (D-NJ), Leahy (D-VT), Levin (D-MI), Lieberman (D-CT), Menendez (D-NJ), Mikulski (D-MD), Murray (D-WA), Obama (D-IL), Reed (D-RI), Reid (D-NV), Salazar (D-CO), Sarbanes (D-MD), Schumer (D-NY), Stabenow (D-MI), Wyden (D-OR).

Now, the following are the senators who voted to give illegal aliens Social Security benefits. They are grouped by home state. If a state is not listed, there was no voting representative.

Alaska: Stevens (R), Arizona: McCain (R), Arkansas: Lincoln (D) Pryor (D), California: Boxer (D) Feinstein (D), Colorado: Salazar (D), Connecticut: Dodd (D) Lieberman, (D), Delaware: Biden (D) Carper (D), Florida: Martinez (R), Hawaii: Akaka (D) Inouye (D), Illinois: Durbin (D) Obama (D), Indiana: Bayh (D) Lugar (R), Iowa: Harkin (D), Kansas: Brownback (R), Louisiana: Landrieu (D), Maryland: Mikulski (D) Sarbanes (D), Massachusetts: Kennedy (D) Kerry (D), Montana: Baucus (D), Nebraska: Hagel (R), Nevada: Reid (D), New Jersey: Lautenberg (D) Menendez (D), New Mexico: Bingaman (D), New York: Clinton (D) Schumer (D), North Dakota: Dorgan (D), Ohio: DeWine (R) Voinovich(R), Oregon: Wyden (D), Pennsylvania: Specter (R), Rhode Island: Chafee (R) Reed (D), South Carolina: Graham (R), South Dakota: Johnson (D), Vermont: Jeffords (I) Leahy (D), Washington: Cantwell (D) Murray (D), West Virginia: Rockefeller (D). By not Voting: Wisconsin: Feingold (D) Kohl (D).

SEND THIS TO ALL YOU KNOW. THE ENTIRE POPULATION OF THE UNITED STATES NEEDS TO KNOW THIS INFORMATION, UNLESS THEY DON'T MIND SHARING THEIR SOCIAL SECURITY WITH FOREIGN WORKERS who didn't pay in a dime.

What is this COUNTRY Coming to?????????????????

When senators stand up to defend important programs, they deserve our thanks.

20070614-05 21:00 E. Kennedy Re: Immigration Reform Bill

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me about immigration reform. This is a complex issue, with many important aspects, and it requires a comprehensive solution. 12 million undocumented workers are currently living in the United States. They're working, paying taxes, and raising children who are U.S. citizens. They contribute to our economy, and it is time to bring them out of the shadows and end their unfair exploitation by unscrupulous employers in communities across the country. Funds for border enforcement have increased dramatically over the years. The budget for the Border Patrol has increased from $263 million in 1990 to $1.6 billion today—a six-fold increase. Yet during this period, hundreds of thousands of undocumented immigrants have entered the U.S. each year. Our immigration system is broken, and it is clear that border enforcement alone will not fix it.

After long and thorough negotiations with the White House and fellow Senators, Republican and Democrat, we have developed a comprehensive immigration reform bill. The bill strengthens border security by increasing the number of border agents, building a border fence, using new technologies to monitor and enforce the border, and imposing higher penalties for workplaces that employ undocumented immigrants. The bill also contains a temporary worker program to help American businesses meet their employment. It addresses the millions of undocumented immigrants living in the United States by providing a means to obtain legal status after undergoing background checks, paying a fine, and going to the back of the line for green cards.

The bill is a realistic and comprehensive solution that will not only protect our borders, but also enable needed temporary workers to enter the country legally, and allow workers already here to earn legal status. It has already been discussed in the Senate once, and despite some setbacks, I hope we will be able to bring it back before the Senate for further debate and passage.

By heritage and history, America is a nation of immigrants, and we must preserve this tradition. Making necessary changes in our immigration laws will ensure that immigrant families today, as in the past, can continue to live the American dream and contribute to our prosperity, our security, and our values.

Again, thank you for writing to me about this important issue.

Sincerely, Edward M. Kennedy

20070618-01 11:59 M. Baucus Re: Immigration Reform Bill

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for getting in touch regarding our nation's immigration policies. I appreciate hearing from you on this important issue.

Immigration is a complex issue that involves both our national and economic security. Many illegal immigrants come to America to work for businesses that cannot find U.S. workers in sectors of the U.S. economy like agriculture, tourism and landscaping. It is vitally important that we tackle the problem of illegal immigration. At the same time, we must beef up enforcement efforts on the border.

As you may know, on May 26, 2006, the Senate passed S. 2611, the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act of 2006. I voted for this bill because it strengthens our borders by adding border patrol agents, and also requires immigrants to pay taxes and learn English. S. 2611 isn't perfect, and a lot of compromises were made. However, I support legislation that provides border security, while not giving amnesty to illegal immigrants.

Meanwhile, Montana's vast border with Canada presents a unique challenge for border security. The threat from potential terrorists and drug runners is even more of a concern along Montana's high line precisely because all eyes are on the southern border.

During the 2006 immigration debate, I expressed concern that the Nation's northern border (of which Montana and Canada share 500 miles) was being neglected, since most of the debate was focused on the southern border. I was pleased to see that the Senate included my measure to test unmanned aerial vehicles (UAV's) in the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act. This measure requires the Department of Homeland Security to conduct a one year pilot program for using UAV's to patrol the northern border.

In short, finding a way to help direct a manageable flow of legal migrant workers to the sectors of our economy that can't find willing American workers will benefit our small businesses in Montana and elsewhere. Bringing these migrants into a legal, enforceable system will allow border and law enforcement personnel to turn their attention to stopping individuals who wish to do us harm from crossing our borders.

As you may know, Congress is currently considering legislation which may make major changes to our nation's immigration policies. Please rest assured that I take this immigration debate very seriously. Nothing is more important than our nation's security. I will keep your thoughts in mind should this issue come before me in the United States Senate.

Thanks again for getting in touch, and please don't hesitate to contact me in the future with additional questions or concerns.

With best personal regards, I am,
Senator Max Baucus, <http://baucus.senate.gov>

20070618-02	15:47	J. Tester	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
-----------------------------	-------	-----------	-----------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for taking the time to contact me about our nation's immigration policy and the Comprehensive Immigration Reform legislation before the Senate in May and June (S. 1348). Your suggestions and opinions are important as we address the complex issues of immigration policy.

Many people come to the United States today with the same dream that our ancestors had—to build a better future for their families. While many wait in line and follow the rules to become legal citizens of the United States, others seeking to immigrate to our country choose to sidestep the processes in place and have entered our country illegally. I'm opposed to amnesty for these people.

From a policy standpoint, securing our ports and borders must be our top priority.

Tougher border and port security will help cut down on the incoming flow of illegal immigrants. We must get serious about enforcing laws on the employers who hire illegal immigrants. We also need to put a stop to unfair trade agreements that reward other countries for treating their workers poorly. These trade agreements create the incentive for people to cross the border, and therefore must be addressed as a part of any comprehensive solution to this issue.

In early June, I voted against proceeding with S. 1348 because it was flawed on a number of levels. I, along with many Montanans, didn't agree with the path to legalization that was a fundamental part of the bill. Additionally, the bill did not focus enough on beefing up border protection or employer-based enforcement. I voted to require that employers certify that they tried to hire Americans first before offering the jobs to any foreign workers and to cap the number of guest worker visas at 200,000 per year instead of the 400,000 cap proposed by the bill.

The bill also included references to REAL ID. As you know, the Montana Legislature overwhelmingly voted against implementation of the REAL ID Act. The REAL ID Act would put a financial burden on the State without offering any real security gains and it would threaten our individual privacy rights. I am proud, along with Senator Baucus, to have introduced an amendment to strike all the REAL ID requirements put forth in S. 1348.

Your input is a critical part of making sure the laws we pass in the Senate reflect Montana priorities. Please don't hesitate to contact me again in the future if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely, Jon Tester, United States Senator, Montana, <http://tester.senate.gov/contact>

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me to express your views about Senate legislation to reform our immigration system. I appreciate hearing from you, and understand your concerns about this complicated issue.

Our current immigration system is broken and in need of repair. Nearly everyone agrees that immigration is one of the most pressing issues facing our nation, but we are often divided on the most appropriate way to address this problem. In forming my opinions on this issue, I have traveled to the border and had extensive conversations with many of the leading experts in the field. I have also met with state and local officials in Nevada to hear their ideas on the best way to reform our immigration system.

Based upon this work, I believe reform must be comprehensive. It should not only strengthen our borders, but should also make our laws more realistic so that they can be more effectively enforced. Immigration reform must be tough, fair to taxpayers, and practical to implement. Most experts agree that it would be impractical and prohibitively expensive to deport the millions of illegal immigrants who are already in our country. Many immigrants who have come to our country legally have expressed concern that the current bureaucracy, which can lead to delays and backlogs of up to 20 years, presents a serious disincentive to follow legal channels for immigration.

Recently, a group of Senators crafted a bipartisan immigration reform compromise (S. 1348). Their legislation would enhance border security by adding 20,000 new Border Patrol agents, 370 miles of fence and 200 miles of vehicle barriers. It would provide for a reliable and efficient employment verification system, along with tougher penalties for employers who hire illegal workers; a temporary worker program to shift the illegal flow over the border into legal channels; and a path to legalization for those who pay steep fines and penalties, learn English, pay back taxes, work for several years, and pass background checks. I am committed to moving this bill forward, even though I do not support every aspect of this proposal.

After consideration of more than 40 amendments, opponents of the measure blocked the bill from coming up for a vote. Despite this setback, I remain committed to working in a bipartisan fashion to fix our country's broken immigration system. This bill may return to the Senate floor for further consideration soon. If it does, I plan to add $ 4.4 billion in guaranteed funding for border security, to be funded through the fees and penalties established by the new programs in this bill. I am committed to regaining control of our broken borders and restoring the rule of law.

As I continue my work on this issue, I hope you will continue to share your thoughts with me on how best to address this problem.

Again, thank you for taking the time to share your thoughts with me. For more information about my work for Nevada, my role in the United States Senate Leadership, or to subscribe to regular e-mail updates on the issues that interest you, please visit my Web site at:

<http://reid.senate.gov>

I look forward to hearing from you in the near future.
Sincerely, Harry Reid

Dear SteveB:

Monday, Senator Martinez addressed the St. Johns County Chamber of Commerce and Economic Development Council in Jacksonville, FL. Topics discussed included Social Security, health care, veterans services, tax policy, as well as the current war in Iraq.

On the Fourth of July, Senator Martinez delivered the keynote address during a naturalization ceremony at Walt Disney World Resort's Magic Kingdom. Senator Martinez spoke to more than 1,000 people before they took their oaths to become naturalized citizens.

Senator Martinez commented on the staff changes at NOAA's National Hurricane Center. "At the end of the day, the Center's mission is about saving lives. I believe we have a very dedicated team of highly qualified forecasters and I remain confident in their abilities," said Martinez.

Senator Martinez announced more than $600,000 in grants will be distributed to the city of Jacksonville and to two Volunteers of America of Florida groups. The grants will support and enhance job training programs for veterans.

Senator Martinez talked with reporters at the Kennedy Space Center Visitor Complex about his visit to NASA. Senator Martinez met with agency officials regarding the future of NASA's Space Shuttle Program, the transition to the Orion and Ares programs, and ways to prevent potentially severe funding shortages.

July 17th & 18th, caseworkers from the Office of Senator Martinez will visit Gadsden, Leon, Wakulla, Jefferson, Madison, and Hamilton counties. Caseworkers will be available to assist constituents with concerns and issues ranging from Veterans issues to Healthcare, Social Security, Medicare, and other services provided by the federal government.

Casework Corner*

Mr. Anderson owns a storage company near an Air Force Base, where a majority of his business is with service members stationed at the base. Unfortunately, the Air Force had failed to pay him for multiple invoices, some dating back to 2004. Mr. Anderson contacted the Office of Senator Martinez for assistance.

A caseworker contacted the Air Force and inquired about the status of payment for Mr. Anderson's storage invoices. The Air Force investigated and found the total amount that Mr. Anderson was owed and promptly began payment. They apologized for the inconvenience.

*Casework Corner is a real account of assistance provided to constituents. The names of those involved are changed to protect the privacy of the constituent.

If you have questions about a federal agency, please contact the Orlando Regional Office by calling (407) 254-2573 to speak with a member of the Casework Department. The toll-free number for Florida residents is (866) 630-7106. To find out more about how my Office can help you, go to <http://martinez.senate.gov> or stop by one of our scheduled Community Office Hours in your area.

This Newsletter Page is maintained by the Office of U.S. Senator Mel Martinez.

20070711-02 14:22 J. Lieberman Re: Immigration Reform Bill
--

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me regarding the comprehensive immigration reform legislation recently considered in the Senate. I am pleased to hear from you on this issue.

As you may know, I have always supported bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform legislation. This year the Senate considered bipartisan legislation, (S. 1639). The legislation was introduced by Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) and Senator Arlen Specter (R-PA) and was supported by the Administration and many Senators from both parties.

Nevertheless, after weeks of debate, on June 28 an attempt to move to a vote on final passage was defeated 46-53. I voted in favor of moving to a vote on final passage, and I was disappointed that the Senate was blocked from a vote on the merits of the legislation. This year's legislation had some significant differences from the version that passed the Senate last year. For example it moved our current system basing immigration on family ties or employment-sponsored visas in the direction of a merit-based point system that takes into account a variety of factors including employability and education levels. It provided for a temporary worker program, as did last year's bill, but without offering a path to legal permanent residency. And it delayed implementation of the reform provisions until we have achieved border security and immigration enforcement benchmarks.

It is long past time that we reform our immigration system in order to secure our borders, enforce our immigration laws, and provide a path to earned legalization for the millions of immigrants who have lived in the U.S. for years, held jobs, paid taxes, and contributed to our communities. The bill also promoted economic opportunity, and Connecticut and the nation would have benefited in particular from legislative provisions which would have provided more access for employers to workers who are needed to fuel economic growth.

I hope that the Senate will have the opportunity to again take up and consider comprehensive immigration reform legislation. You may be assured that I will keep your views in mind if any such legislation is considered on the Senate floor. To keep track of future actions on this legislation, you can go to the "Bill Tracking" service at:

<http://lieberman.senate.gov/issues/resources>.

My official Senate web site is designed to be an on-line office that provides access to constituent services, Connecticut-specific information, and an abundance of information about what I am working on in the Senate on behalf of Connecticut and the nation. I am also pleased to let you know that I have launched an email news update service through my web site. You can sign up for that service by visiting <http://lieberman.senate.gov> and clicking on the "Subscribe Email News Updates" button at the bottom of the home page. I hope these are informative and useful. Thank you again for letting me know your views and concerns. Please contact me if you have any additional questions or comments about our work in Congress.

Sincerely, Joseph I. Lieberman

20070717-01 09:01 M. Martinez Sen. Martinez Newsletter
--

Dear SteveB:

Senator Martinez is a co-sponsor of the Improved Hurricane Tracking and Forecasting Act of 2007. The legislation would fund a replacement of the QuikSCAT, a satellite used by the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to better predict and track hurricanes.

Senator Martinez commended the reduction of the federal deficit. "The deficit is going down because of our economy's strength. Our economy is so strong is because we have tax cuts that have provided the nourishment it needs; Americans are keeping more of their money rather than having government take more taxes. That spurs economic growth," said Martinez.

Friday, Senator Martinez announced that more than $8.35 million has been awarded to the Florida Department of Transportation to fund the engineering development of the Central Florida Commuter Rail Transit. "This funding brings us one step closer to providing better transportation options for the people of Central Florida," Martinez said.

Senator Martinez announced a $1,030,038 grant for the Palm Beach International Airport in West Palm Beach. The funding will assist with the second phase of the Palm Beach International Airport expansion project.

Senator Martinez announced a $284,637 grant for the Fish and Wildlife Research Institute in St. Petersburg. "This money will help the Fish & Wildlife Research Institute monitor Florida's waters, collecting the data necessary to maintain the health and supply of our commercial and recreational fisheries," said Martinez.

Reminder: Community Office Hours for North Florida July 17th & 18th, caseworkers from the Office of Senator Martinez will visit Gadsden, Leon, Wakulla, Jefferson, Madison, and Hamilton counties. Caseworkers will be available to assist constituents with concerns and issues ranging from Veterans issues to Healthcare, Social Security, Medicare, and other services provided by the federal government.

If you have questions about a federal agency, please contact the Orlando Regional Office by calling (407) 254-2573 to speak with a member of the Casework Department. The toll-free number for Florida residents is (866) 630-7106. To find out more about how my Office can help you, go to <http://martinez.senate.gov> or stop by one of our scheduled Community Office Hours in your area.

This Newsletter Page is maintained by the Office of U.S. Senator Mel Martinez.

20070725-01 08:13 M. Martinez Sen. Martinez Newsletter
--

Dear SteveB:

This week, Senator Martinez marked the 20th anniversary of the McKinney-Vento Homeless Assistance Program by calling for expanded emphasis on eradicating homelessness. Originally signed into law by President Ronald Reagan in 1987, this program began by providing the homeless with emergency relief provisions for shelter, food, mobile health care, and transitional housing.

Tuesday, Senator Martinez commended Ambassador Jim Nicholson for his service as Secretary of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). Nicholson announced he will step down from his post by October. "I thank Secretary Nicholson for the great service he has provided the Veterans of our nation," said Martinez.

Senator Martinez met with Florida members of the group, "Vets for Freedom" who encouraged the senator to continue supporting efforts in Iraq, and to wait for General David Petraeus' September report to make a judgment on the effectiveness of the new surge strategy.

This week, Senator Martinez made several grant announcements for Florida including:

- Nearly $85 million as part of the Fiscal Year (FY) 2007 Homeland Security Grant Program (HSGP), a program dedicated to strengthening the security of cities nationally.
- $7.8 million for Miami-Dade's runway construction and relocation project at Miami International Airport.
- $2,340,445 for Florida A&M University (FAMU) in Tallahassee to provide financial assistance for research and training in environmental sciences.
- $814,174 to Mote Marine Laboratory in Sarasota for research. This funding will be used to research the biology of sharks, skates, and rays that live in the Gulf of Mexico.

Casework Corner*

Last month Mrs. Smith visited her doctor for a routine procedure.

When she went to pay her bill, she was surprised to discover that she was no longer enrolled in traditional Medicare. After some investigation she discovered that she had been switched to a Medicare Advantage Plan with a private insurance company. Without her knowledge, she was fraudulently switched to the other plan by an insurance agent.

A caseworker from Senator Martinez's office contacted the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and they researched the matter. She has now been un-enrolled from the Advantage Plan and has been re-enrolled in traditional Medicare.

*Casework Corner is a real account of assistance provided to constituents. The names of those involved are changed to protect the privacy of the constituent.

If you have questions about a federal agency, please contact the Orlando Regional Office by calling (407) 254-2573 to speak with a member of the Casework Department. The toll-free number for Florida residents is (866) 630-7106. To find out more about how my Office can help you, go to <http://martinez.senate.gov> or stop by one of our scheduled Community Office Hours in your area.

This Newsletter Page is maintained by the Office of U.S. Senator Mel Martinez.

20070725-02	10:18	S. Smith Jr.	Indiana Partnership for Prescription Assistance (PPA)
-----------------------------	-------	--------------	---

"Help Is Here Express" Bus Tour Coming to East Chicago To Help Patients in Need Access Prescription Medicines

East Chicago, Ind. (July 23, 2007)—The "Help is Here Express" bus tour will be in East Chicago on Monday, July 30, stopping at St. Catherine Hospital to help uninsured Americans find programs that provide prescription medicines for free or nearly free. The bus tour is part of the Partnership for Prescription Assistance (PPA), a national effort sponsored by America's pharmaceutical research companies.

Lake County residents, and those from surrounding communities, are encouraged to attend the July 30 event scheduled for 9-11 a.m. at St. Catherine Hospital, 4321 Fir Street, East Chicago. The event is free to the community and a Spanish-language translator will be on-site.

Nationally, the PPA has helped nearly 4 million patients, including nearly 200,000 Hoosiers through its Indiana chapter—Rx for Indiana. Since its launch in 2005, the PPA bus tour has visited all 50 states and more than 1,200 cities to raise awareness about patient assistance programs.

The "Help is Here Express" is staffed by trained specialists able to quickly help low-income, uninsured or underinsured patients access more than 475 patient assistance programs, including over 180 programs offered by pharmaceutical companies. When the "Help is Here Express" moves on, patients in need can visit PPA's easy-to-use Web site.

Through the PPA, parents, guardians, healthcare providers and others can learn about public and private patient assistance programs—including the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP)—that are available to help children in need. America's pharmaceutical research companies support the reauthorization of SCHIP, and more than 40 of the assistance programs through the PPA focus on the medication and healthcare needs of children. Through SCHIP, more than six million uninsured, low-income children today receive a wide range of health services, including regular checkups, immunizations, prescription drugs, laboratory tests, x-rays, hospital visits and more. To help make it easier for parents to learn about these efforts, including SCHIP, the PPA has dedicated a new Web site:

<http://kids.pparx.org>.

"The Partnership for Prescription Assistance is changing thousands of lives every day," said Ken Johnson, Senior Vice President of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA). "No one's helped by a medicine that sits on the shelf and is out of reach financially. We will keep coming back to Indiana as long as there are people who need our help."

On a national level, the Partnership for Prescription Assistance is represented by Emmy-winning syndicated talk show host Montel Williams, named PPA's national spokesman in Jan. 2006. In addition, nationally recognized Telemundo talk show host and author Mayte Prida leads the PPA's Hispanic outreach effort. More than 1,300 national, state and local partners, including the Indiana Hospital & Health Association and the Indiana State Medical Association, are working with America's pharmaceutical companies to spread the word about the program. Trained specialists work with doctors, pharmacists, healthcare providers and community groups, educating them on the process and use of the PPA's easy-access Web site and toll-free number.

Over 2,500 different brand-name and generic prescription medicines are available through participating patient assistance programs. In addition, the PPA provides information on nearly 10,000 free healthcare clinics and has connected more than 135,000 patients with clinics and health care providers in their communities. "We're excited that the 'Help is Here Express' is coming to East Chicago," said Kelly Kernagis, manager of marketing and communications at St. Catherine Hospital. "Now even more people will see how easy it is to get help by calling PPA's toll-free number, using the Web site, or by visiting the bus. And that translates to more people getting the help they need."

—Jenny Henderson for Indiana State Senator Samuel Smith, Jr.

20070801-01	12:50	M. Martinez	Sen. Martinez Newsletter
-------------	-------	-------------	--------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Thursday, Senator Martinez praised the passage of the "Border Security First Act of 2007" as an amendment to the Fiscal Year (FY) 2008 Department of Homeland Security Appropriations bill. The legislation, which Martinez helped to negotiate, provides $3 billion in emergency funding in the continued efforts to secure our nation's borders.

Friday, Senator Martinez announced the U.S. Senate approved the creation of an International Registered Traveler program. The program would help the Department of Homeland Security verify the risk level of frequent travelers to the United States.

Senator Martinez joined senators Burr, Coburn, Corker, and Dole in introducing the "Every American Insured Health Act," a bill to provide all Americans access to affordable, high-quality health insurance through the free market. "It's time for a major debate on health care insurance. Not enough people have access to affordable healthcare, and the Congress has not done enough about this crisis," Martinez said.

This week, Senator Martinez announced the Senate's passage of the "Dignified Treatment of Wounded Warriors Act." The bill requires the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to better coordinate the care, management, and transition of severely wounded military personnel to the Department of Veterans Affairs or civilian life.

Senator Martinez met with students interning in Florida Congressional offices during the Florida House Summer Intern Series Seminar on Capitol Hill.

Senators Mel Martinez and Bill Nelson called for immediate action by the federal government to find and remove any remaining explosive devices or harmful chemicals from an area surrounding an Orlando middle school. The two senators are working with the Army Corps of Engineers to expedite site cleanup efforts.

Senator Martinez announced that NASA has selected Ivey's Construction Inc. of Merritt Island, Fla., to build a new lightning protection system for Launch Pad 39B at the Kennedy Space Center. The system will support launches of the Constellation Program's Ares I rockets.

Casework Corner*

Ms. King was diagnosed with a unique form of cancer that required specialized care. Her Tricare insurance provider referred her to a doctor with no experience in the field. This doctor referred her to an out-of-state hospital in the Northeast that could treat her form of cancer. After her arrival at the hospital, she was told that her insurance would not cover the chemotherapy treatment.

A caseworker from Senator Martinez's office contacted several Tricare representatives and was assured that Ms. King would receive the care required, but because Ms. King was from a different part of the U.S., her treatment would be delayed until appropriate paperwork could be filed. After a conference call with additional Tricare representatives, they stated Ms. King would receive her chemotherapy and would be able to receive it in the Southeast without delay.

*Casework Corner is a real account of assistance provided to constituents. The names of those involved are changed to protect the privacy of the constituent.

If you have questions about a federal agency, please contact the Orlando Regional Office by calling (407) 254-2573 to speak with a member of the Casework Department. The toll-free number for Florida residents is (866) 630-7106. To find out more about how my Office can help you, go to <http://martinez.senate.gov> or stop by one of our scheduled Community Office Hours in your area.

This Newsletter Page is maintained by the Office of U.S. Senator Mel Martinez.

20070807-01	12:43	H. Clinton	Re: Immigration Reform Bill
-----------------------------	-------	------------	-----------------------------

Statements & Releases—Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York

Thank you for sharing with me your thoughts and concerns regarding immigration reform. This is an important issue, and I appreciate hearing from my New York constituents on this critical matter.

Our immigration system is in crisis, and we need to find a thoughtful and effective solution that combines a number of reforms. A comprehensive reform to our immigration laws must have, as essential ingredients: a strengthening of our borders, greater cross-cooperation with our neighbors, strict but fair enforcement of our laws, federal assistance to our state and local governments, strict penalties for those who exploit undocumented workers, and a path to earned legal status for those who are here, working hard, paying taxes, respecting the law, and willing to meet a high bar.

Along with these changes, it is imperative that we repair those broken portions of our immigration system that irrevocably damage families and force citizens and lawful immigrants to live apart from their spouses and children overseas. This is why I introduced an amendment during consideration of the immigration reform bill that would have taken steps to protect the sanctity of families. Our American values demand no less.

I am deeply disappointed that we still have not solved our nation's immigration crisis. We need comprehensive immigration reform, and I hope that we can achieve legislation that secures our borders, respects the rule of law, and honors both our history as a nation of immigrants and our core American values of respect and compassion. Balancing all of these interests is not easy, but it is a debate we must take on. That is why I voted for cloture on the immigration bill, a procedure that would have kept the immigration reform process moving forward in the Senate. Unfortunately, the bill failed to achieve the 60 votes necessary to continue.

The thoughts and concerns of my constituents are very important to me and I thank you for taking the time to write.

—Senator_Clinton@clinton.senate.gov

20070814-01 11:45 P. Marshall "Where Did the Universe Come From?" Cosmology

[Veracity of parts of email questionable, but a starting point for discussion. —SteveB]

from Perry Marshall, Cosmic Fingerprints, 67 East Algonquin Road, S. Barrington IL 60010 U.S., <http://www.cosmicfingerprints.com/>:

Part 1: Einstein's Big Blunder

100 years ago this year, Albert Einstein published three papers that rocked the world. These papers proved the existence of the atom, introduced the theory of relativity, and described quantum mechanics.

Pretty good debut for a 26 year old scientist, huh?

His equations for relativity indicated that the universe was expanding. This bothered him, because if it was expanding, it must have had a beginning and a beginner.

Since neither of these appealed to him, Einstein introduced a 'fudge factor' that ensured a 'steady state' universe, one that had no beginning or end.

But in 1929, Edwin Hubble showed that the furthest galaxies were fleeing away from each other, just as the Big Bang model predicted. So in 1931, Einstein embraced what would later be known as the Big Bang theory, saying, "This is the most beautiful and satisfactory explanation of creation to which I have ever listened." He referred to the 'fudge factor' to achieve a steady-state universe as the biggest blunder of his career.

As I'll explain during the next couple of days, Einstein's theories have been thoroughly proved and verified by experiments and measurements. But there's an even more important implication of Einstein's discovery. Not only does the universe have a beginning, but time itself, our own dimension of cause and effect, began with the Big Bang.

That's right — time itself does not exist before then. The very line of time begins with that creation event. Matter, energy, time and space were created in an instant by an intelligence outside of space and time.

About this intelligence, Albert Einstein wrote in his book "The World As I See It" that the harmony of natural law "Reveals an intelligence of such superiority that, compared with it, all the systematic thinking and acting of human beings is an utterly insignificant reflection."

Pretty significant statement, wouldn't you say?

Part 2: "Bird Droppings on my Telescope"

The Big Bang theory was totally rejected at first.

But those who supported it had predicted that the ignition of the Big Bang would have left behind a sort of 'hot flash' of radiation.

If a big black wood stove produces heat that you can feel, then in a similar manner, the Big Bang should produce its own kind of heat that would echo throughout the universe.

In 1965, without looking for it, two physicists at Bell Labs in New Jersey found it. At first, Arno Penzias and Robert Wilson were bothered because, while trying to refine the world's most sensitive radio antenna, they couldn't eliminate a bothersome source of noise.

They picked up this noise everywhere they pointed the antenna.

At first they thought it was bird droppings. The antenna was so sensitive it could pick up the heat of bird droppings (which certainly are warm when they're brand new) but even after cleaning it off, they still picked up this noise.

This noise had actually been predicted in detail by other astronomers, and after a year of checking and re-checking the data, they arrived at a conclusion: This crazy Big Bang theory really was correct.

In an interview, Penzias was asked why there was so much resistance to the Big Bang theory. He said, "Most physicists would rather attempt to describe the universe in ways which require no explanation.

And since science can't explain anything - it can only describe things - that's perfectly sensible. If you have a universe which has always been there, you don't explain it, right?

"Somebody asks you, 'How come all the secretaries in your company are women?' You can say, 'Well, it's always been that way.' That's a way of not having to explain it. So in the same way, theories which don't require explanation tend to be the ones accepted by science, which is perfectly acceptable and the best way to make science work."

But on the older theory that the universe was eternal, he explains: "It turned out to be so ugly that people dismissed it. What we find - the simplest theory - is a creation out of nothing, the appearance out of nothing of the universe."

Penzias and his partner, Robert Wilson, won the Nobel Prize for their discovery of this radiation. The Big Bang theory is now one of the most thoroughly validated theories in all of science.

Robert Wilson was asked by journalist Fred Heeren if the Big Bang indicated a creator.

Wilson said, "Certainly there was something that set it all off. Certainly, if you are religious, I can't think of a better theory of the origin of the universe to match with Genesis."

For further reading: "A Day Without Yesterday" - Albert Einstein, Georges Lemaitre and the Big Bang"
<http://clicks.aweber.com/z/ct/?9V5S2V2R2zGgQSulRMVf6Q>.

Part 3: Why the Big Bang was the most precisely planned event in all of history

In your kitchen cabinet, you've probably got a spray bottle with an adjustable nozzle. If you twist the nozzle one way, it sprays a fine mist into the air. You twist the nozzle the other way, it squirts a jet of water in a straight line. You turn that nozzle to the exact position you want so you can wash a mirror, clean up a spill, or whatever.

If the universe had expanded a little faster, the matter would have sprayed out into space like fine mist from a water bottle - so fast that a gazillion particles of dust would speed into infinity and never even form a single star.

If the universe had expanded just a little slower, the material would have dribbled out like big drops of water, then collapsed back where it came from by the force of gravity.

A little too fast, and you get a meaningless spray of fine dust. A little too slow, and the whole universe collapses back into one big black hole.

The surprising thing is just how narrow the difference is. To strike the perfect balance between too fast and too slow, the force, something that physicists call "the Dark Energy Term" had to be accurate to one part in ten with 120 zeros.

If you wrote this as a decimal, the number would look like this:

OK, so what does this have to do with God?

It's very simple. Messages, languages, and coded information ONLY come from a mind. A mind that agrees on an alphabet and a meaning of words and sentences. A mind that expresses both desire and intent. Whether I use the simplest possible explanation, such as the one I'm giving you here, or if we analyze language with advanced mathematics and engineering communication theory, I can say this with total confidence:

Messages, languages and coded information never, ever come from anything else besides a mind. No one has ever produced a single example of a message that did not come from a mind.

Nature can create fascinating patterns - snowflakes, sand dunes, crystals, stalagmites, and stalactites. Tornados and turbulence and cloud formations. But non-living things cannot create language. They cannot create codes. Rocks cannot think and they cannot talk. And they cannot create information.

It is believed by some that life on planet earth arose naturally from the "primordial soup," the early ocean which produced enzymes and eventually RNA, DNA, and primitive cells. But there is still a problem with this theory: It fails to answer the question, 'Where did the information come from?'

DNA is not merely a molecule. Nor is it simply a "pattern." Yes, it contains chemicals and proteins, but those chemicals are arranged to form an intricate language, in the exact same way that English and Chinese and HTML are languages. DNA has a four-letter alphabet, and structures very similar to words, sentences and paragraphs. With very precise instructions.

To the person who says that life arose naturally, you need only ask: "Where did the information come from? Show me just ONE example of a language that didn't come from a mind."

As simple as this question is, I've personally presented it to many hundreds of people who say that life arose without the assistance of God. But to a person, none of them have ever been able to explain where the information came from. This riddle is "So simple any child can understand, yet so complex, no atheist can solve."

You can hear or read my full presentation on this topic at <http://www.cosmicfingerprints.com/ifyoucanreadthis.htm>

For a high-school level, layman's version, go here: <http://www.cosmicfingerprints.com/information.htm>.

Matter and energy have to come from somewhere. Everyone can agree on that. But information has to come from somewhere, too! Information is separate entity, fully on par with matter and energy. And information can only come from a mind. If books and poems and TV shows come from human intelligence, then all living things inevitably came from a super intelligence.

Every word you hear, every sentence you speak, every dog that barks, every song you sing, every email you read, every packet of information that zings across the Internet, is proof of the existence of God. Because information and language always originate in a mind.

In the beginning were words and language. In the Beginning was Information.

When we consider the mystery of life - where it came from and how it was possible - do we not at the same time ask the question where it is going, and what its purpose is?

"OK, so then who made God?" and other questions about information and origins:
<http://cosmicfingerprints.com/infotheoryqa.htm>.

20070821-01	13:28	E. Bayh	Reclaiming Our Legacy; Iraq War, Afghanistan War
-------------	-------	---------	--

Dear SteveB:

Today, as the President continues to confuse the war on terror with a civil war between Sunnis and Shiites, I am working with my fellow Democrats and a few courageous Republicans like Senator Richard Lugar to get our eye back on the ball.

As I reminded Chris Wallace recently on Fox News Sunday, Iraq today is not the central front in the war on terror—Afghanistan and Pakistan are. We were attacked from Afghanistan, and Pakistan is where the al Qaeda leadership is reconstituting itself today. Our attention and resources ought to be refocused on capturing Osama bin Laden and rooting out al Qaeda's enclaves across the region.

We also need a tough and smart approach to dealing with Iran, which continues its defiant march to nuclear weapons. According to the State Department, Iran is the No. 1 state sponsor of terror. We cannot afford to allow the world's most dangerous regime to acquire the world's deadliest weapons. But the Bush administration, obsessed with Iraq, has failed to rally our allies to effectively address this menace.

Before the summer recess, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved my nuclear safeguards legislation to prevent countries like Iran from walking up to the atomic threshold under the flimsy pretense of seeking civilian nuclear power. When Congress reconvenes after Labor Day, I will work to see that this crucial bill becomes law.

We also must redouble our efforts to honor the brave Americans who are sacrificing so much to keep us safe. The Senate recently approved comprehensive legislation to make sure our wounded warriors have access to the care they deserve when they return from battle. I was proud of my contribution to that bill—a provision that helps ensure that soldiers with traumatic brain injuries have access to the cutting-edge cognitive therapies that will allow them to recuperate and live full and productive lives.

I will continue to fight for more support for our military personnel, including pressing for enactment of my plan to relieve the financial strain on soldiers with school debt by suspending the accrual of interest on their federal student loans.

My fall agenda will continue to work on refocusing our national security policy as the Senate evaluates two September reports on the political and military outlook in Iraq. I also will continue to pursue an aggressive domestic agenda in the areas of innovation, education, and fiscal responsibility to make America more competitive in the global economy. Earlier this month, I introduced legislation to double research and development funding for small business innovators, and the Senate Judiciary Committee soon will consider my bill to protect U.S. companies that are losing profits and employees as a result of intellectual property theft (Wall Street Journal article).

It is well past time for the United States to reassert global leadership and to address the many challenges undermining our strength at home. As we turn the page on the Karl Rove era and the White House loses its Svengali of national security politics, I pledge to continue my work in Washington to insist on smarter domestic and foreign policies to keep America safe, prosperous and strong.

—Sen. Evan Bayh

Paid for by the All America PAC: <http://www.allamericapac.com>, info@allamericapac.com.

20070917-01 09:47 S. Smith Jr. Indiana Education Standards
--

New high school diploma requirements will better prepare Indiana's youth

The Indiana State Board of Education adopted new course and credit requirements for earning a high school diploma last year. With these changes, students now have the option of earning four different diploma types: General; Core 40; Core 40 with Academic Honors; or Core 40 with Technical Honors. Core 40 is the academic foundation all students need to succeed in college, apprenticeship programs, military training and the workforce. Students who take strong academic courses in high school are more likely to enroll in college and earn a degree.

The Indiana General Assembly approved legislation two years ago which makes Core 40 a graduation requirement for all students entering high school this year. These students will be expected to complete Core 40 as a graduation requirement. Core 40 will become the minimum college admission requirement for the state's public four-year universities beginning in the fall of 2011. While the Core 40 curriculum is now the preferred standard, an opt-out provision is available that will award a General Diploma.

According to the Indiana Department of Education, on average, college graduates earn more than one million dollars more over a lifetime than those with only a high school education. High school graduates earn 42 percent more than high school dropouts.

In addition, the Core 40 diploma can help students earn money for college. Indiana students who complete a Core 40 diploma and meet other financial aid and grade requirements can receive up to 90 percent of approved tuition and fees at eligible colleges. High school graduates who have earned a Core 40 with Academic Honors diploma can receive up to 100 percent. Some colleges also offer their own scholarships specifically for students who earn this diploma.

— Indiana Senator Samuel Smith, Jr.

20071003-01	17:17	SteveB	Life 101
-------------	-------	--------	----------

Dear Saul,

There are some important principles that I feel we have not discussed enough. Hopefully, by now, we have started to discuss them, but I wanted to remind you of them and how I feel about them one more time, just in case. I hope this doesn't bore you.

1. I am very proud of so many things that I have seen you do (as is your mother). You are doing well in school and getting to know people here in America. That is so very important! You are an honest, intelligent, good-looking, funny (sometimes), sensible young man. You have been willing to pitch-in and give much appreciated help around the house and to your family. I've been proud of the discipline you showed in getting into better shape. Now you have started going out more into the world around you. I think you have a very good future in front of you, if you play your cards right and can defeat the enemies that lie within all of us.
2. One important thing to remember...you are building your life, your future, every single day. The habits you develop now, the things you learn and remember, the times and fun and adventures you have or don't have will all remain with you, probably, for your entire life.
3. You are not really ready for that life yet. If you don't believe me, try to imagine yourself (right now, at fourteen) with a job and an apartment and a car and a life of your own. Wouldn't that really be impossible? Think to yourself as fully as you can, why?
4. The life of an adult is not a simple nor an easy thing. For almost all of us (and it is almost certain that you will become one of "us"), money is very difficult to come-by. And it takes a lot of money to live any kind of decent life. In your lifetime, it will become even more difficult, not easier.
5. So you are building your future life with your real and important life right now. And, the way life works, you only have one chance to do it right! You simply must strive to be the best that you can be and not be defeated in that effort. You must do your best! Nothing less will ultimately do. That is the truth.
6. That is why it is so important to work as hard as you can in school and to learn—truly learn—all you can. It's your life! Many of your classmates will never realize this and they will waste a golden opportunity. While play and relaxation are important, it is more important to skip a lot of play and study, read books, explore your surroundings, get to really know, understand, and even help other people, develop hobbies and interests, formulate lofty goals and strive to reach them, plan what you want to do with your future and with your life's work. These are the tools that help you learn and understand and grow. That is so much more important than play! And the single most important thing to learn is how to learn!
7. There are four powerful enemies that stand in the way of your growth toward the person you were meant to be. I know this because they are the enemies of us all, and death is not among them.
8. Laziness. I don't know why the rules of existence are the way they are, or the way God made them to be. You must realize by now that, though we are certainly something more, we are descended, basically, from animals. Yet we somehow lack their valuable instincts. It seems to us like it would be nice to be able to just lie around and have all our needs taken care of—to be like pets. In fact, this is exactly the way our lives begin, when we are children and all our needs are cared for with no effort on our part. This can easily make it seem like this is the natural order of things, but it is not! We must overcome this beast within ourselves and learn to work, really work, and I mean work hard. Of course, work is easiest if it is something we have come to love, but even this is not inbred. Today, I feel so lucky because I had to work as a child and as an adolescent. I thank my parents for teaching me the value of hard work and helping me learn how to work hard. That lesson took a long time for me to learn.

9. Fear. You have already learned to overcome some of your fears. The dark is not the problem now that it was to most of us as little children. Scary movies don't give you nightmares the way they used to. Mountains and rollercoasters have become fun, not fearsome. But so many other fears stand in our way. The fear of failure. The fear of what could possibly happen. The fear of death. That fear of what other people think of us. The fear that we might not always be right. The fear of the unknown, what lies ahead but hidden. The fear of pain. Each of these fears requires time, patience, cunning, and experience to defeat. Don't expect to overcome them all at once. But, if you keep growing in the right direction, if you keep trying, you will find that one-by-one the powerful fearful fears will fall away from you, just as the childish ones did. But never forget that all of this takes effort, energy, and mindfulness.

10. Self (selfishness and arrogance). It's funny. We can all more-or-less tolerate people who are smarter than we are, or richer, or more powerful, or better-looking, or know more than we do. But we all have trouble liking people who think they are better than we are. And this is only one of the many ways that the "self" can lead us astray. We never truly know enough to be able to judge what is good, or better, or best. Not really. If we deceive ourselves into thinking we "know it all" or that other people don't know anything, we miss-out on our very lives.

We spend our entire childhoods (at least) creating the "self", our alleged identity, from nothing. It can seem like it's all we have and without it we would return to nothing. But this is not the case. It is good and important for each of us to think that we are someone special, a human being with true worth, but it is easy to carry this too far. It is equally important to remember that we are also truly nothing.

Yet we are more than what we commonly call our "selves." We are our hearts and our souls and our values and whatever there is of God that lies within us, and the "self" is much less than the sum of these parts and so much less than the infinity, the absolute, we can sometimes touch. If you believe that "you" are your thoughts, try this experiment: Mentally, try to sort of stand back and watch yourself do what you are now doing. "Watch" your thoughts march through your brain. "Watch" your breath and your beating heart. Watch your emotions ebb and flow. Try to stop your thoughts. If "you" are simply your thoughts, then who is this "watcher?"

11. Unlove. I use an unusual word here because I do not merely mean "hate." I mean all feelings toward ourselves, others, and even our world that are not loving. Not to develop and hold love and forgiveness in our hearts, for anything, is a poison that can destroy us. Don't be afraid to let yourself love. And I do not, of course, mean simply physical or even romantic love. I mean the feeling that we are part of this world and that it is good and deserving of our best, of our unabiding love. Every human, every mountain, every ocean, every good act, every bug is deserving of our love. Learn to let it flow and learn to recognize and eliminate those negative emotions which are unloving. Love is the very purpose of life and what makes life worthwhile. Forgiveness, as Jesus taught us, is divine...not so much for whom or what we forgive, but for ourselves.

12. One of the most important things I wish for you, my step-son, is to learn and practice respect and appreciation. Of all the people in the world, the one person most deserving of respect is your mother. You would not exist without her. She has sacrificed more for you than you can know. She has cared for you, nurtured you, worried about you, carried you on her back. At all moments and in every way, she deserves and should receive, your unwavering love and respect. Doing this is the very way that you learn respect and appreciation for all things. Do not ever think that this act on your part is not important. No matter what, your mother deserves no less from you. I have lost my own mother and I can't tell you how much I regret each moment in our brief lives together that I has not letting her know how much I loved and appreciated and honored her. Don't wait until your own mother is gone to know this.

13. I would also advise you to continue to do your best to make friends. This is something you already know and know how to do. If we follow the teaching of Jesus to "do unto others as we would have others do unto us," we will be guided to those actions which cultivate friendship and make it flourish. For most of us, friends are one of the most important things in life. Strive to be a good one and you shall have them.

Lastly, remember that your life will be over before you know it. I understand that, right now, it seems to drag a bit. This is an illusion. We never know when the end will come, so we must appreciate the gift of each moment as it comes and not take life for granted. You are really only alive for those moments you can later remember. Cultivate them. Appreciate them. Love them, because, ultimately, they are what you are and we never ever know for sure that we will not ultimately be judged or judge ourselves on that basis.

20080121-01 12:19 SteveB Hillary Clinton's Lack of Experience

The biggest mystery to me in this entire political campaign is why no one seems to be willing to challenge Hillary Clinton's BIG LIE about how her vast experience entitles her to be President. One can only guess that she must be referring to her HUSBAND'S experience, which is not her own. She has almost zero executive experience. Let's face it, she's essentially a one-term junior Senator with less actual experience that might be useful to a President than any other candidate.

I've been following the campaigns closely and I have never heard or seen another candidate or, especially, anyone in the press challenge her on this lie. Why don't we start keeping them honest?

20080128-01 13:05 D. Plouffe Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries & Election

Dear SteveB:

The Biggest Day of the Campaign

Barack Obama won an overwhelming victory in South Carolina on Saturday. People came out in record numbers and voted for change. Now, after four early state contests, Barack has the most votes, the most delegates, and the most diverse coalition of supporters we've seen in a long time.

But this is no time to rest—the stakes will be even higher one week from tomorrow. On Feb. 5th, 22 states will hold primaries and caucuses. We have exactly one week to prepare. Make a donation of $50 right now to help Barack compete on the biggest day of the campaign:

<https://donate.barackobama.com/page/contribute/o2012-donate-main>

Here are a few details about our victory in South Carolina. According to the official results and CNN exit polls, Barack won:

- 55% of the total vote, more than twice as many votes as any other candidate
- 57% of voters who had never voted in a primary
- 66% of voters who had never voted before at all
- Every type of community—urban, suburban, and rural
- 58% of voters between ages 18 and 64
- 67% of voters between ages 18 and 29

The clear lesson from South Carolina is that voters are ready to bring this country together and solve the problems that matter to ordinary Americans. This election isn't about race or gender, income level or education level. It's about the past and the future. The moment to act is now. We're campaigning from Alaska to Georgia, from California to New York. Your donation right now is more important

—David Plouffe, Campaign Manager, Obama for America

20080128-02 14:08 SteveB To: Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries & Election

Dear Mr. Obama:

I would certainly like to see someone in the press or Barack's campaign point out what a GIGANTIC evil lie it is for Hillary to keep harping on her vast EXPERIENCE! Does she mean her husband's experience? That is not her own. She's just essentially a do-nothing one-term Senator. She has no business experience. No executive experience to speak of. Her Rose Law Firm experience was so crooked that she certainly doesn't want to speak of it. It was riddled with shady deals and conflict of interest scandals. What about her Health Care Plan experience? What a wonderful opportunity squandered, wasted, and lost because of her vast ambition and ego!

I can't understand why no one, especially in the press, seems to be willing to challenge her BIG LIE. This strategy is so typical of the Clintons...tell a lie and keep telling it and sooner or later, people seem to forget that it is a lie.

Congratulation so far and Good Luck! Take care. Watch your back!

—SteveB

20080201-01 14:17 SteveB Fw: Illegal Aliens in California

[Source of original email unknown. Information unconfirmed. —SteveB]

from the L.A. Times:

1. 40% of all workers in L. A. County (L. A. County has 10. 2 million people) are working for cash and not paying taxes. This is because they are predominantly illegal immigrants working without a green card.
2. 95% of warrants for murder in Los Angeles are for illegal aliens.
3. 75% of people on the most wanted list in Los Angeles are illegal aliens.
4. Over 2/3 of all births in Los Angeles County are to illegal alien Mexicans on Medi-Cal , whose births were paid for by taxpayers.
5. Nearly 35% of all inmates in California detention centers are Mexican nationals here illegally.
6. Over 300,000 illegal aliens in Los Angeles County are living in garages.
7. The FBI reports half of all gang members in Los Angeles are most likely illegal aliens from south of the border.
8. Nearly 60% of all occupants of HUD properties are illegal.
9. 21 radio stations in L. A. are Spanish speaking.
10. In L. A. County 5.1 million people speak English, 3.9 million speak Spanish. (There are 10.2 million people in L. A. County.)

Less than 2% of illegal aliens are picking our crops, but 29% are on welfare. Over 70% of the United States ' annual population growth (and over 90% of California , Florida , and New York) results from illegal immigration. 29% of inmates in federal prisons are illegal aliens. We are a bunch of fools for letting this continue.

HOW CAN YOU HELP? Send copies of this letter to at least two other people 100 would be even better.

20080207-01 08:32 SteveB 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

I'm so happy today!!! It is snowing like crazy and has been for some time! Plus I won the big Powerball lottery...well only $3, but that's good, huh?

Plus, Billary had to borrow $5,000,000 from herself/himself to campaign on. That prompted me to give money to Obama. Plus, we haven't had to listen to Bill flap his big, lying mouth since he lost South Carolina for the double-Presidency. Hey Bill, how are Monica Lewinsky, Gennifer Flowers, Paula Jones, Kathleen Willey, and Juanita Broaddrick doing? I'm sure they were all lying and confused about what sex is when they said you had sex with them. Huh, Billy Boy?

How soon we forget. From Wikipedia:

In a separate case, Clinton was disbarred from his Arkansas law license for five years and ordered to pay $25,000 in fines to that state's bar officials. The agreement came on the condition that Whitewater prosecutors would not pursue federal perjury charges against him. In October 2001, Clinton was suspended by the Supreme Court and, facing disbarment from the high court as well, Clinton resigned from the Supreme Court bar in November."

On his last day in office (January 20, 2001), Clinton issued 141 pardons and 36 commutations. Most of the controversy surrounded Marc Rich and allegations that Hillary Clinton's brother, Hugh Rodham, accepted payments in return for influencing the president's decision-making regarding the pardons. Some of Clinton's pardons remain a point of controversy.

The 1996 United States campaign finance controversy was an alleged effort by the People's Republic of China (PRC) to influence the domestic policies of the United States, prior to and during the Clinton administration and also involved the fundraising practices of the administration itself.

And this, of course, is just the tippy tip-top of the iceberg.

You know one thing I like a lot about Montana? People still have the old-fashioned Western ethic of being independent, rugged, and doing things for themselves. It's pretty cool really. And nobody even cares about other people's business. If you want to be eccentric, this is the place...just ask Ted Kaczynski.

One of the Montana things I've noticed here is that school NEVER gets out because of snow...no matter how much, no matter what the timing. I guess if those kids can't take it, too bad!

20080207-02 13:53 David Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

Dear SteveB,

It's snowing here...again...still. That, coupled with my lingering Patriots grief, has thrown me into a black and foul mood.

But then I get your Clinton rant and I am suddenly cheery. :-D (Don't you hate these?)

Watching Bubba in SC, standing on stage, clutching the microphone, rambling on while Hillary waited and waited with this rictus of smiling rage on her face, I realized how narcissistic, immature, self-absorbed and unaware he is. Great political theater.

I like Obama just fine. Likable guy, good speaker. But he says stuff like, "We live in the greatest country on earth, the greatest country in history; and I want you to work with me to change that." Or something. Then there's this:

<http://youtube.com/watch?v=jjXyqcx-mYY>.

20080207-03 14:06 Bill Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

Dear SteveB,

He deserved to be disbarred, no question. At the same time, I maintain he wasn't such a bad President. He didn't run the country off the rails into an immensely wasteful foreign adventure with almost zero chance of satisfactory resolution and that has left the populace with an obscene debt. The pardon of Marc Rich was inexcusable and, to add to its outrageousness, was probably bought via a campaign contribution from Rich's ex-wife. Among the list of Clinton concubines, I had forgotten about Kathleen Willey (although she may never have confirmed that she was involved with him) and am not sure I ever knew about Juanita Broaddrick. He was, in any event, a serial womanizer. He even had, when governor in Arkansas, a state policeman occasionally procuring for him and watching his back. He seems in this respect, though, small time in comparison to JFK, who, bad back and all, seems to have had an assignation at least once day.

What is amazing is why Bill and Hillary weren't honest (there's that word) enough to call off the marriage. I assume that their calculation was that they could cop the greatest amount of wealth and power for the long run if they stayed together. Someday, someone will write a book explaining this.

Do you, then, plan to vote for Obama, if he triumphs? The opponent, presumably, would be McCain. I distrust both of them with respect to spending. Give me a politician who has guts enough to balance the budget against all the hue and cry and earmark-connivance of the Congress. I suppose I'll have to hold my nose and vote, but I'm not sure for which one. In some of my prior grumblings I may have mentioned McCain having been the largest single cause of the need for the Resolution Trust Corporation, which bailed out the thrift industry to the tune of $400 billion. And Obama tends to vote for every handout anyone in Congress contemplates.

20080207-04 14:23 Mark Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

Dear SteveB,

Nice to hear from you in Big Sky country! Hey man, you're preachin' to the choir.....If Billary gets elected I have promised to put an extremely politically incorrect bumper sticker on my truck, with the word c*nt!!!!!!!!!!!!!!.....I have read Bay Buchanan's book about Hillary, but I have hated her ever since her nationalized health care debacle.....and it friggin' feels good to hate her.....I really have to try not to vomit when I watch her talk on the campaign trail.....she talks out the side of her mouth and I can just see the f#*kin' spit flying out her mouth, as she salivates in anticipation of being the "leader of the most powerful country in the world".....I wanna puke!

20080207-05 15:14 SteveB Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

Dear David,

Ya, that was too bad about the Pats! And it couldn't even be Indianapolis, it had to be the Giants!

I don't know about voting for Obama, and I wonder, if nominated, if he would survive until the election. It seems though—and this is weird to me—a light Negra, like Obama, is not as hated as the really dark Negras like Jesse Jackson, ML King, etc. I'm sure I'm being "politically incorrect" to bring something like that up, but don't you think it's true? Still, in this country, if you're just a hair black, you're still black to a lot of people.

Jesus, are we really ready for a woman (surrogate?) or light-brown President? Seems a little weird even to someone as open-minded as myself. I hope we are and I hope we do it. You raise a couple of good points about Billary, though. I dislike those two at least as much as I do/did Nixon.

I guess I'd vote for McCain if he could just waffle a little more on the illegal alien issue (oh my, there I go again, being PI). What are we supposed to be calling these people who are taking all the jobs away from our kids and grandkids...Mexicans who accidentally find themselves in our country? Why is the law enforced on me if I just sneeze, but not on these "accidental" f*ckers or the, dare I say, "illegal" f*ckers who give them jobs?

Take care. Hope you're enjoying your snow as much as I am ours.

20080207-06 15:23 SteveB Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

Dear Bill,

I don't trust any of them enough to vote for them. McCain is awful on immigration and money and, what are even more wars to him, except more glory and not having to live long enough to see the end and pay the price? He is a warrior. And a frustrated one at that. That's good and bad.

What a sorry country we have become. At least it still snows. Do you remember an English-class story you once wrote about Shorty ice-skating on the roof of GHS?

20080207-07 15:33 SteveB Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton

Dear Mark,

I agree completely. It's funny, I've watched a lot of the political cr*p going on and all I've heard Billary talk about is her vast experience that nobody calls her down on. Does she mean Bill's experience? She's just a junior Senator (like Obama), with NO executive experience whatsoever. And, as you so aptly point out, she also constantly talks about her stupendous fantasy of walking into the Whitehouse, sitting in that beloved Oval Office on "Day One", and...well the rest becomes completely vague. She doesn't want to serve the country, she wants to RULE the country. So I guess her next order of business, since she's so turned-on by power, would be to rub herself IN the Oval Office, like she always used to do when Bill and Monica weren't in there.

20080215-01	16:08	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Barack Obama
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Democratic Super-Delegates:

I am backing Barack Obama's candidacy for President because he seems to be the only candidate focused on the future and solving our problems, instead of the past.

The biggest mystery to me in this entire political campaign is why no one seems to be willing to challenge Hillary Clinton's BIG LIE about how her vast experience entitles her to be President. One can only guess that she must be referring to her HUSBAND'S experience, which is not her own. She has almost zero executive experience.

Let's face it, she's essentially a one-term junior Senator with less actual experience that might be useful to a President than any other candidate.

I've been following the campaigns closely and I have never heard or seen another candidate or, especially, anyone in the press, challenge her on this lie. Why don't we start keeping them honest? Just because Hillary has a strong fantasy of being in the Whitehouse and sitting in the Oval Office on her famous "Day One!", I don't believe for one instant that she has any vision of the future, as does Mr. Obama, or that she has any idea of what to do with the power that she so mightily craves. Her vast ambition is no reason to cast votes for her.

And I, for one, do not want to see Bill Clinton back in the Whitehouse!!!!

Perhaps people should start asking, "Hey Bill, how are Monica Lewinsky, Gennifer Flowers, Paula Jones, Kathleen Willey, and Juanita Broadrick doing? I'm sure they were all lying and confused about what sex is when they said you had sex with them. Huh, Billy Boy?" The Republicans will certainly be asking these questions. And if Hillary could not even keep an eye on her husband, right in front of her, how exactly is she going to keep an eye on our country? Don't you think Americans want to know the answer to that questions the Republicans will ask over and over?

How soon we forget. From Wikipedia:

In a separate case, Clinton was disbarred from his Arkansas law license for five years and ordered to pay $25,000 in fines to that state's bar officials. The agreement came on the condition that Whitewater prosecutors would not pursue federal perjury charges against him. In Oct., 2001, Clinton was suspended by the Supreme Court and, facing disbarment from the high court as well, Clinton resigned from the Supreme Court bar in November.

On his last day in office (Jan. 20, 2001), Clinton issued 141 pardons and 36 commutations. Most of the controversy surrounded Marc Rich and allegations that Hillary Clinton's brother, Hugh Rodham, accepted payments in return for influencing the president's decision-making regarding the pardons. Some of Clinton's pardons remain a point of controversy.

The 1996 United States campaign finance controversy was an alleged effort by the People's Republic of China (PRC) to influence the domestic policies of the United States, prior to and during the Clinton administration and also involved the fundraising practices of the administration itself.

And this, of course, is just the tippy tip-top of the iceberg. Hillary, of course, was involved in her own set of scandals

I believe Barack Obama will bring a new measure of honesty and responsibility to the office of President of the United States of America. Thank you.

20080215-02 18:06 Dick Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Barack Obama

Dear SteveB,

I totally agree!

20080215-03 19:11 Marissa Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Barack Obama

Dear SteveB,

I am glad to see that u are on the Obama train...I wanted Kucinich to win but since that was nearly impossible I will happily settle with Obama...I have not opened all of your e-mails yet...but your friend [Dennis. —SteveB] is very talented...does he need an apprentice?

20080217-01 13:57 SteveB "Hillary Hopes You've Forgotten—Have You?"

"Hillary Hopes You've Forgotten—Have You?" by Diane Rigali, Rense.com

Feb. 6, 2008, (<http://www.rense.com/general80/hopes.htm>) (<http://www.illuminati-news.com/0/PoliticalWhoreAlert.htm>)

Hillary hopes you have forgotten. Have you????

Hillary Clinton has been telling America that she is the most qualified candidate for president based on her "record," which she says includes her eight years in the White House as First Lady—or "co-president"—and her seven years in the Senate. Here is a reminder of what that record includes:

1. As First Lady, Hillary assumed authority over Health Care Reform, a process that cost the taxpayers over $13 million. She told both Bill Bradley and Pat Moynahan, key votes needed to pass her legislation, that she would "demonize" anyone who opposed it. But it was opposed; she couldn't even get it to a vote in a Congress controlled by her own party. (And in the next election, her party lost control of both the House and Senate.)
2. Hillary assumed authority over selecting a female Attorney General. Her first two recommendations (Zoe Baird and Kimba Wood) were forced to withdraw their names from consideration, and then she chose Janet Reno. Janet Reno has since been described by Bill himself as "my worst mistake."
3. Hillary recommended Lani Guanier for head of the Civil Rights Commission. When Guanier's radical views became known, her name had to be withdrawn.
4. Hillary recommended her former law partners, Web Hubbell, Vince Foster, and William Kennedy for positions in the Justice Department, White House staff, and the Treasury, respectively. Hubbell was later imprisoned, Foster committed suicide, and Kennedy was forced to resign.
5. Hillary also recommended a close friend of the Clintons, Craig Livingstone, for the position of director of White House security. When Livingstone was investigated for the improper access of up to 900 FBI files of Clinton enemies (Filegate) and the widespread use of drugs by White House staff, both Hillary and her husband denied knowing him. (FBI agent Dennis Sculimbrene confirmed in a Senate Judiciary Committee in 1996 both the drug use and Hillary's involvement in hiring Livingstone. After that, the FBI closed its White House Liaison Office, after serving seven presidents for over thirty years.)
6. In order to open "slots" in the White House for her friends the Harry Thomasons (to whom millions of dollars in travel contracts could be awarded), Hillary had the entire staff of the White House Travel Office fired; they were reported to the FBI for "gross mismanagement" and their reputations ruined. After a thirty-month investigation, only one, Billy Dale, was charged with a crime—mixing personal money with White House funds when he cashed checks. The jury acquitted him in less than two hours.
7. Another of Hillary's assumed duties was directing the "bimbo eruption squad" and scandal defense:

- a. She urged her husband not to settle the Paula Jones lawsuit.
- b. She refused to release the Whitewater documents, which led to the appointment of Ken Starr as Special Prosecutor. After $80 million dollars of taxpayer money was spent, Starr's investigation led to Monica Lewinsky, which led to Bill lying about and later admitting his affairs.
- c. Then they had to settle with Paula Jones after all.
- d. And Bill lost his law license for lying to the grand jury.
- e. And Bill was impeached by the House.
- f. And Hillary almost got herself indicted for perjury and obstruction of justice (she avoided it mostly because she repeated, "I do not recall," "I have no recollection," and "I don't know" 56 times under oath).

8. Hillary accepted the traditional First Lady's role of decorator of the White House at Christmas, but in a unique Hillary way. In 1994, for example, The First Lady's Tree in the Blue Room (the focal point each year) was all decorated with drug paraphernalia, sex toys, and pornographic ornaments, all personally approved by Hillary as the invited artists' depictions of the theme, "The Twelve Days of Christmas." [I thought this was kind of funny. What's the matter with bawdy humor? —SteveB]

9. Hillary wrote It Takes a Village, demonstrating her Socialist viewpoint. [Boy, that's questionable, Bub. — SteveB]

10. Hillary decided to seek election to the Senate in a state she had never lived in. Her husband pardoned FALN terrorists in order to get Latino support and the New Square Hassidim to get Jewish support. Hillary also had Bill pardon her brother's clients, for a small fee, to get financial support.

11. Then Hillary left the White House, but later had to return $200,000 in White House furniture, china, and artwork she had stolen.

12. In the campaign for the Senate, Hillary played the "woman card" by portraying her opponent (Lazio) as a bully picking on her.

13. Hillary's husband further protected her by asking the National Archives to withhold from the public until 2012 many records of their time in the White House, including much of Hillary's correspondence and her calendars. (There are ongoing lawsuits to force the release of those records.)

14. As the junior Senator from New York, Hillary has passed no major legislation. She has deferred to the senior Senator (Schumer) to tend to the needs of New Yorkers, even on the hot issue of medical problems of workers involved in the cleanup of Ground Zero after 9/11.

15. Hillary's one notable vote, supporting the plan to invade Iraq, she has since disavowed.

Quite a resume, isn't it? Sounds more like an organized crime family...

20080217-02	14:56	GaryF	The Bush Administration
-------------	-------	-------	-------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Sounds as if it could be almost anyone in the Republican party, at least in this administration. Iraq? $1,000,000,000,000 and counting, based on fudged and handpicked intelligence, how many indictments should there be, government out of our lives, yeah sure, PATRIOT ACT, what books do you get from the library, no bid contracts HALIBURTON (Dick Chaney's old company) lower taxes yeah right, DEFICITS, every time the f*ckin Right runs they talk smaller government BULLSH*T. The government has grown under every Republican Administration since Dwight Eisenhower, who in my opinion was the last real Republican that tried to do it right. The Right Wing of this country always runs on the same sh*t LIES, and who gets f*cked, US.

20080217-03 19:48 SteveB Re: The Bush Administration

Dear GaryF,

Well...Bush has been a disappointment...especially fiscally, but he always had a corrupt Congress bought and sold by their campaign contributors, and I think he deserves credit for taking the war to the a*s-holes and for being 100% successful in preventing another attack on our soil, even with our porous borders. This is an achievement that I think we will look back to wistfully if a Democrat is elected, as I expect will happen. But Iraq? No.

20080218-01 07:20 GaryF Re: The Bush Administration

Dear SteveB,

Don't you think Bush and Chaney were also bought by their contributors? Remember the energy summit with Chaney and the heads of the oil companies locked in some basement room in the Whitehouse? They refused to release the minutes, and Lo and Behold, every quarter since then the oil companies have made RECORD PROFITS. And taking the fight to the enemy, yeah we'll fix them. It was Iraqi's who attacked us, OH WAIT, they were SAUDIS! This administration will go down in history as the worst in the last 100 years. It will take at least 2 generations to repair the damage they've done to the U.S.'s reputation in the rest of the world. After 911, the U.S. had the support of basically the entire world to go into Afghanistan, and rightly so, but the personal agendas of Bush and the oil companies came into play to invade Iraq. Anyone who doesn't think this war was about oil and money is a fool. Do you really think 130,000 U.S. troops, 5000 British troops, and between 5 and 50 troops from a half a dozen other insignificant countries is a coalition?

20080218-02 11:58 SteveB Re: The Bush Administration

Dear GaryF,

I'm telling you, they are ALL bought and sold! That's the system the politicians will not fix—least of all the Democrats And I don't care if the war is about oil, it feels good to kick Arab a*s. We are in a war to the death with the f*cking followers of that bastard Mohammed and the sooner we engage them the better. Maybe they will at least learn to leave us alone or suffer the consequences. None of their leaders want to end up like Saddam, no matter how they posture in public. And who cares if there's a coalition. I have no respect for those pu*s*y, lazy Europeans anyway. F*ck them and the horses they rode in on. Next time they all get conquered, we should just look the other way. What a bunch of selfish, self-centered, pu*s*y b*stards! Oh my, am I being politically incorrect?

Yet, ultimately, Iraq was a mistake.

20080218-03 12:08 SteveB "The 'Angry White Man'" 2008 Election

I'll present the explanation first:

"The 'Angry White Man?'" posted by Jeff Musall, Yahoo! Voices

Feb. 13, 2008, (<http://voices.yahoo.com/the-angry-white-man-1374359.html?cat=9>)

I first saw this when someone sent it to me in an email. I sourced it and sure enough it was written as a column back on February 9th in the Aspen (Colorado) Times Weekly. But alas, it took Rush Limbaugh to get the ditto-heads all around the country fired up. Those who think FOX really is a news channel and the Republican Party is actually concerned with their interests. The column has taken on a life of its own thanks to remarks by Barack Obama about the bitterness in some.

What the article does (very well) is to highlight just how correct his comments were. As Obama said, he could have phrased it better. But the message is true. It is oh so refreshing to hear a politician speak frankly. The so-called "Angry White Man" as portrayed by Gary Hubbell in the original column is the epitome of the kind of misplaced anger that Obama seeks to address. Below is the original column that is circulating in email land, with my comments following.

"In Election 2008, Don't Forget Angry White Man" by Gary Hubbell, Aspen Times Weekly

Feb. 9, 2008, (<http://www.aspentimes.com/article/20080209/ASPENWEEKLY06/198091324>)

There is a great amount of interest in this year's presidential elections, as everybody seems to recognize that our next president has to be a lot better than George Bush. The Democrats are riding high with two groundbreaking candidates - a woman and an African-American - while the conservative Republicans are in a quandary about their party's nod to a quasi-liberal maverick, John McCain.

Each candidate is carefully pandering to a smorgasbord of special-interest groups, ranging from gay, lesbian and transgender people to children of illegal immigrants to working mothers to evangelical Christians.

There is one group no one has recognized, and it is the group that will decide the election: the Angry White Man. The Angry White Man comes from all economic backgrounds, from dirt-poor to filthy rich. He represents all geographic areas in America, from urban sophisticate to rural redneck, deep South to mountain West, left Coast to Eastern Seaboard.

His common traits are that he isn't looking for anything from anyone - just the promise to be able to make his own way on a level playing field. In many cases, he is an independent businessman and employs several people. He pays more than his share of taxes and works hard.

The victimhood syndrome buzzwords - "disenfranchised," "marginalized" and "voiceless" - don't resonate with him. "Press 'one' for English" is a curse-word to him. He's used to picking up the tab, whether it's the company Christmas party, three sets of braces, three college educations or a beautiful wedding.

He believes the Constitution is to be interpreted literally, not as a "living document" open to the whims and vagaries of a panel of judges who have never worked an honest day in their lives.

The Angry White Man owns firearms, and he's willing to pick up a gun to defend his home and his country. He is willing to lay down his life to defend the freedom and safety of others, and the thought of killing someone who needs killing really doesn't bother him.

The Angry White Man is not a metrosexual, a homosexual or a victim. Nobody like him drowned in Hurricane Katrina - he got his people together and got the hell out, then went back in to rescue those too helpless and stupid to help themselves, often as a police officer, a National Guard soldier or a volunteer firefighter.

His last name and religion don't matter. His background might be Italian, English, Polish, German, Slavic, Irish, or Russian, and he might have Cherokee, Mexican, or Puerto Rican mixed in, but he considers himself a white American.

He's a man's man, the kind of guy who likes to play poker, watch football, hunt white-tailed deer, call turkeys, play golf, spend a few bucks at a strip club once in a blue moon, change his own oil and build things. He coaches baseball, soccer and football teams and doesn't ask for a penny. He's the kind of guy who can put an addition on his house with a couple of friends, drill an oil well, weld a new bumper for his truck, design a factory and publish books. He can fill a train with 100,000 tons of coal and get it to the power plant on time so that you keep the lights on and never know what it took to flip that light switch.

Women either love him or hate him, but they know he's a man, not a dishrag. If they're looking for someone to walk all over, they've got the wrong guy. He stands up straight, opens doors for women and says "Yes, sir" and "No, ma'am."

He might be a Republican and he might be a Democrat; he might be a Libertarian or a Green. He knows that his wife is more emotional than rational, and he guides the family in a rational manner.

He's not a racist, but he is annoyed and disappointed when people of certain backgrounds exhibit behavior that typifies the worst stereotypes of their race. He's willing to give everybody a fair chance if they work hard, play by the rules and learn English.

Most important, the Angry White Man is pi*sed off. When his job site becomes flooded with illegal workers who don't pay taxes and his wages drop like a stone, he gets righteously angry. When his job gets shipped overseas, and he has to speak to some incomprehensible idiot in India for tech support, he simmers. When Al Sharpton comes on TV, leading some rally for reparations for slavery or some such nonsense, he bites his tongue and he remembers. When a child gets charged with carrying a concealed weapon for mistakenly bringing a penknife to school, he takes note of who the local idiots are in education and law enforcement.

He also votes, and the Angry White Man loathes Hillary Clinton. Her voice reminds him of a shovel scraping a rock. He recoils at the mere sight of her on television. Her very image disgusts him, and he cannot fathom why anyone would want her as their leader. It's not that she is a woman. It's that she is who she is. It's the liberal victim groups she panders to, the "poor me" attitude that she represents, her inability to give a straight answer to an honest question, his tax dollars that she wants to give to people who refuse to do anything for themselves.

There are many millions of Angry White Men. Four million Angry White Men are members of the National Rifle Association, and all of them will vote against Hillary Clinton, just as the great majority of them voted for George Bush.

He hopes that she will be the Democratic nominee for president in 2008, and he will make sure that she gets beaten like a drum.

Comments by the author (Jeff Musall):

1. John McCain is not a "quasi-liberal maverick." There was a time when he had a slight independent streak, but of late he is right down the neo-conservative line. More war, more deficits, more tax giveaways to the rich...in short, increasing the myriad problems.

2. The "Angry White Man" isn't nearly as widely represented as Hubbell suggests. And he is a racist. But even more so, he is a misogynist. He cannot fathom the thought of a woman as president. That's why the article expressly attacks Hillary Clinton even though Obama has very similar positions. He is right to say that his "Angry White Man" can be from any race. He is from many backgrounds too. But he is always is racist, he always is misogynist, and he is always easy to manipulate along those lines.

3. Most important, he is just plain wrong. He decries welfare (the old "black woman in a Cadillac" that goes back to Reagan) even though welfare is not even close to what is busting the budget. America has over 800 military bases worldwide and a floundering economy as a direct result of the policies put in place in the Reagan years and followed (even under Bill Clinton, to a large degree) ever since. The two Democratic candidates (especially Barack Obama) see the folly and want to reverse it. The "Angry White Man" has seen his real earnings decrease by an average of one percent a year since Reagan. Do the math, that's over 25 percent. And he is duped into blaming the brown man. The Mexicans did it to him, not the economic policies that forced (and allowed) millions to try to feed their families. He is duped into thinking it must be Hillary Clinton's fault, even though the biggest growth in illegals came under Reagan and Bush.

4. Last, I am an angry white man. Not in any way like Hubbell describes, of course. I am white, I am a man, and I am angry. I also like to hunt and hike, and a little sport now and then. But I am able to think for myself and to see the world through an open mind. Why am I angry?

I am angry that some closed-minded individuals choose to allow their insecurities and ignorance to be warped into a political movement. I am angry that thugs masquerading as members of the executive branch are allowed to run amok because they have distracted and scared enough people. It isn't the black person, the brown, the woman, the immigrant - or any of the other imagined threats to the "Angry White Man." It is his own ignorance, his own misguided belief system. He doesn't realize that every time he votes in favor of modern conservatives he is voting against his own self-interests, and those of his family. The "Angry White Man" needs to refocus his anger where it belongs.

Dear SteveB,

Christ! When you moved to Montana did you join a militia?

If you're talking about WWII, don't think the U.S. went to Europe to save Europe, if that was the case we'd have gone in 1939 not after the Jap's attacked Pearl Harbor. Almost sounds like you should have been born in the 1500's, you could have joined the Crusades. And speaking of self-centered bastards, just what in the fuck do you think the majority of the world thinks about the U.S.. Oh, and by the way, we may be better prepared to deal with terrorist threats today than we were pre 911, but you better believe this. GWB and his imperialist policies have created the greatest tool for Al Qaeda recruitment since the Jews declared the state of Israel. So are more secure, sure, but because the assholes in power today, we need to be.

Dear GaryF,

One of the standing jokes Marci and I have is that we often say to each other, 'Just don't pi*s me off!'

So...don't pi*s me off.

Maybe there's too big a gap here to bridge, but I love ya, so I will just try to clarify my thinking, not try to convince you. But, believe me, I refuse to follow any party-generated, media-generated, or Bush-Cheney-generated party line. For me, this goes back much further than that, as I'm sure it does for you.

I don't think we're here as a country to be nice or to please other countries. I believe we are here to do our own thing and to survive and, hopefully, to thrive. So far, I think we've done pretty well at that, maybe better than any country that has ever existed. That argument can certainly be made and is hard to refute.

What has Germany ever done for any other country or to please any other country? What has England ever done for any other country or to please any other country? What has Russia ever done for any other country or to please any other country? What has Spain ever done for any other country or to please any other country? What has France (ha!) ever done for any other country or to please any other country? What have the Arabs ever done for any other country or to please any other country? Why would anyone expect us to be any different? And I think it is especially naive to think that we have to be nice and please any other countries in the world when we have been attacked, and attacked in a very serious and dire manner.

And just like in World Wars I and II, we are always willing to just sit over here and pretty much leave the rest of the world alone if they will just leave us alone. As they say, if you don't want pain, let a sleeping tiger lie. The awoken tiger's actions may not even be logical (but who says they have to be?), and, believe me, you will feel pain.

I don't give a damn if Osama bin MF'er gets converts! Didn't he have plenty already? Do you really think he'd have none if we hadn't fought back? And who says we have to fight back perfectly, with perfect logic? That is not how war works. The only thing these Muslims understand is strength and violence, so I say, for everyone who raises his ugly head, we rain down as much violence as possible and f*ck the alleged consequences. Who cares what France thinks, for instance? The Muslims started this chain of consequences just as Stalin and Hitler did. And much more than our honor or how we might appear to, who?, France?, are at stake here. Surely, it is our very existence and way of life. Do you seriously doubt that? Even if, which I do not agree with, it is only oil, do you seriously doubt that it is our existence and way of life at stake?

Frankly, I'm sick and tired of the bleeding-heart liberals whining that we're the bad guys. You tell me, then, who are these supposed good guys, who don't act in their own self-interest? In my lifetime and during the history that I've witnessed, though we are certainly not perfect (no country is), we are the only country on earth that I have ever seen act in anyone's interest but their own. That's the truth. Illegal immigration and WW II in Europe are perfect examples.

We are at war, and so much of war is will. Vietnam may seem on the surface like a waste, but it was part of the demonstration of our will during the Cold War, even if that war was wrong in many ways. Another part of that will was the vast spending, all of which eventually led to the utter defeat of the Soviet Union. That collapse would maybe never have happened in a vacuum. Without that demonstration of will, the U.S.S.A. would probably still stand and rule with its evil, stupid iron hand. It didn't fall alone.

So even if, like in Vietnam, our will is a little misdirected or inefficient or imperfect, I say tough f*ckin' luck! It is the demonstration of our will which makes the point and will either eventually prevail or our will will falter and our civilization will be done for. Rome fell not when they became weaker than their enemies, but when their will became weaker.

I say, if the f*ckers want to attack us, we act like the sleeping tiger and attack them back, and I don't expect it to be perfectly. And if the little cry-baby bastards don't like it, they can take their marbles and go back to their stinking deserts and leave us alone. If sissy, effeminate, gay-boy, she-male Europe (see the movies of Spain's Pedro Almodóvar) doesn't like it, tough luck!

I think it is such a shame that the Democrats have forgotten the lessons of history, have forgotten the greatest generation, have lost their appreciation for our way of life, and have no balls. Believe me, America's sworn enemies—who actually have no reason to be our enemies (Israel? What a joke?)—DO HAVE BALLS!

They have sworn to destroy us and to destroy our civilization, and they will, unless we fight for our lives and demonstrate our will to survive. Power is all they (most especially Arabs) understand. This is the truth and surely you know it. All else, any little mistakes, like perhaps (who knows?) Vietnam or Iraq, pale in comparison.

But George Bush did not conduct the wars or security the way he should have. War must be all-out and relentless, or not at all. Not like Viet Nam.

Whew!

from a recent email:

My husband is a liar and a cheat. He has cheated on me from the beginning, and, when I confront him, he denies everything. What's worse, everyone knows that he cheats on me. It is so humiliating.

Also, since he lost his job six years ago, he hasn't even looked for a new one. All he does all day is smoke cigars, cruise around and shoot the breeze with his buddies while I have to work to pay the bills.

Since our daughter went away to college he doesn't even pretend to like me and hints that I may be a lesbian. What should I do?

Signed: Clueless

Dear Clueless:

Grow up and dump him. Good grief, woman. You don't need him anymore! You're a United States Senator from New York running for President of the United States . Act like one!

20080310-01	11:28	SteveB	"Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager"
-------------	-------	--------	---

So I guess, on that now famous "DAY O-N-E!!!" (with reverb.))))) , Hillary will turn to her time-worn staff and say, "OK, guys, run the country for me, while I look and act queenly and important, and figure out ways to say nasty, evil lies about people in such a way that I can deny it or distance myself in some way, or even re-define "is" if I have to."

Gee, you would think that her "vast 35-years of executive political experience" would have taught her a thing or two about managing a mere staff...whoops...no, it's all just EGO!

Or maybe this is just an Obama or McCain-planted article? OK, Slick-Willy, whatever you say!

"Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager" by Adam Nagourney, Patrick Healy and Kate Zernike, New York Times

Mar. 10, 2008, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2008/03/10/us/politics/10clinton.html?ref=haroldmickes>)

(Feuding between aides shines spotlight on candidate's management style.)

(WASHINGTON) The morning after Senator Barack Obama shook the Clinton campaign by winning five states in one weekend, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's new campaign manager—Maggie Williams, who had taken over in a shake-up the night before— assembled the curious if demoralized staff.

"You may not like the person next to you," Ms. Williams told dozens of aides who ringed the conference room at the campaign's Virginia headquarters last month, according to participants. "But you're going to respect them. And we're going to work together." Ms. Williams's demand was dismissed as wishful thinking by some in her weary audience. But in the view of many Clinton supporters, it accurately reflected the urgent need to overhaul a campaign that at that point had set itself apart for its level of disorder and dysfunction.

The divisions in her campaign over strategy and communications—and the dislike many of her advisers had for one another—poured out into public as Mrs. Clinton struggled in February to hold off Mr. Obama in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination. But even as Mrs. Clinton revived her fortunes last week with victories in Ohio, Rhode Island and Texas, the questions lingered about how she managed her campaign, with the internal sniping and second-guessing undermining her well-cultivated image as a steady-at-the-wheel chief executive surrounded by a phalanx of loyal and efficient aides.

"She hasn't managed anything as complex as this before; that's the problem with senators," said James A. Thurber, a professor of government at American University who is an expert on presidential management. "She wasn't as decisive as she should have been. And it's a legitimate question to ask: Under great pressure from two different factions, can she make some hard decisions and move ahead? It seems to just fester. She doesn't seem to know how to stop it or want to stop it."

Insular management style

Over the last month, Mrs. Clinton, of New York, has become much more involved in the day-to-day operation of her campaign. In addition to Ms. Williams, she brought in two experienced political hands from her husband's White House—Doug Sosnik, who was a political director, and Steve Ricchetti, a deputy chief of staff.

And Ms. Williams has sought to calm tensions in the headquarters through steps like opening the morning conference call to more aides to foster a greater sense of teamwork. One of her first acts, aides said, was to instruct Mark Penn—Mrs. Clinton's chief strategist and a polarizing figure in the campaign—to stay off television.

Still, interviews with campaign aides, associates and friends suggest that Mrs. Clinton, at least until February, was a detached manager. Juggling the demands of being a candidate, she paid little attention to detail, delegated decisions large and small and deferred to advisers on critical questions. Mrs. Clinton accepted—or seemed unaware of—the intense factionalism and feuding that often paralyzed her campaign and that prevented her aides from reaching consensus on basic questions like what states to fight in and how to go after Mr. Obama, of Illinois.

Mrs. Clinton showed a tendency toward an insular management style, relying on a coterie of aides who have worked for her for years, her aides and associates said. Her choice of lieutenants—and her insistence on staying with them even when friends urged her to shake things up—was blamed by some associates for the campaign's woes. Again and again, the senator was portrayed as a manager who valued loyalty and familiarity over experience and expertise.

Mrs. Clinton stood by Mr. Penn and Patti Solis Doyle, who was until last month her campaign manager, even as her campaign was at risk of letting Mr. Obama sew up the nomination. When some of her closest supporters pressed her to replace them—arguing that the two were clearly struggling with their jobs and had become divisive figures in the campaign—she responded by saying she would "think about it."

From one friend to another

When Mrs. Clinton finally pushed out Ms. Solis Doyle, she chose Ms. Williams—like Ms. Solis Doyle, an old friend who had never before managed a presidential campaign. Mrs. Clinton's ability to manage the one person with whom she spoke most often, former President Bill Clinton, was also questioned by some of her advisers and supporters.

Mr. Clinton moved in his own orbit—he heatedly argued with his wife's advisers who wanted to write off South Carolina, defying them to campaign there—and took no direction from the campaign about what to say or where to go, some of them said. (Mr. Obama defeated Mrs. Clinton in the South Carolina Democratic primary by nearly 29 percentage points.)

Several aides, donors and supporters, who requested anonymity to recount private conversations with the candidate, said they had warned Mrs. Clinton that her husband's attacks on Mr. Obama were demeaning to her and hurting her campaign. Mrs. Clinton replied that her husband became "carried away" at times but that she did not see any real harm from his approach, they said.

Mrs. Clinton's top advisers said that while her management style might be untidy, it showed her to be comfortable with conflicting ideas among her aides. They said she had pronounced herself "ready to learn" from her mistakes and was resistant to placing too much power in the hands of a single political adviser in the mold of Karl Rove in President Bush's two campaigns for the White House.

"She thinks the way to manage effectively is to get a lot of smart people around who don't agree and let them work out their differences creatively," said Howard Wolfson, her communications director. "Let them hash through things, and as a result, you come up with the best process."

Hesitant to change personnel

A senior adviser, Harold Ickes, joined the campaign full-time in January as Mrs. Clinton's aides began to realize that the contest was not going the way they had planned. Mr. Ickes cautioned about drawing firm conclusions about her from this period, when she faced the demands of being a candidate.

"It's hard to draw conclusions about her management style," he said, "because she is, in fact, not the manager of her campaign." [WHAT?]

Still, some of her senior advisers said Mrs. Clinton was left with little option but to become more assertive in getting her campaign back on track—a shift highlighted by her decision to push out Ms. Solis Doyle, one of her closest and longest-serving aides. Her husband changed his advisers at regular intervals as he faced various troubles and shifting political demands while president; Mrs. Clinton, in contrast, has relied on a relatively unchanging cast since she was first lady.

Caught off-guard

For all her years on the public stage, Mrs. Clinton has never come close to assembling and running an enterprise like the 700-person, $170 million-and-counting campaign organization that she has created. At times, her aides made assumptions about tactics and voters that turned out to be wrong. They nearly ran out of money at all the wrong times, like just after Mrs. Clinton's victory in the New Hampshire primary and right before the 22 state nominating contests on Feb. 5.

The day after her loss in the Iowa caucuses, Mrs. Clinton took command of a long meeting in New Hampshire. "I'll do whatever you guys need me to do," she said, a participant recalled. "I get the message."

But a month later, she described herself as stunned to learn the campaign was nearly broke—notwithstanding financial reports sent to her every week by e-mail—and was all but conceding the 11 contests that were to come over the next month.

Unlike Mr. Bush, Mrs. Clinton has shown no interest in having one strong person running all aspects of the campaign operation. And unlike her husband during the early part of his 1992 bid for the presidency, she does not try to keep a hand in everything, with lines of communications all through the campaign.

Instead, she talked daily to a few people—Mr. Penn, Ms. Solis Doyle and, now, Ms. Williams. Even Mr. Ickes, her longtime friend and adviser, says he speaks with her infrequently.

This approach, many of her associates said, had the effect of breeding resentment at campaign headquarters. Since there was no one person in charge, they said, it was hard to make decisions, and Mr. Penn would frequently use his personal connection with Mrs. Clinton to block the campaign from moving in directions he opposed, like putting an increased emphasis on trying to present a human side of Mrs. Clinton.

Ms. Williams had been among those who lobbied Mrs. Clinton to remove Ms. Solis Doyle, arguing that the campaign lacked a plan or a message despite starting out with an overwhelming advantage in money and name recognition, campaign officials said. After resisting for much of the winter, Mrs. Clinton, before the vote in Iowa, told aides that she would replace Ms. Solis Doyle but that she wanted to wait until after New Hampshire. But when Mrs. Clinton won the New Hampshire contest, the decision was pulled back. Ms. Williams was brought in to work alongside Ms. Solis Doyle, but without an obvious portfolio. The move was widely seen at campaign headquarters as a slap at Ms. Solis Doyle.

Offended, she threatened to leave and had to be courted to return, agreeing to do so only on the condition that she would be in charge. She was finally dismissed after more losses and the news that the campaign was running out of money.

(Adam Nagourney reported from Washington, and Patrick Healy and Kate Zernike from New York.)

20080310-02 11:35 Bill Re: "Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager"

Dear SteveB,

If Obama wins the nomination, he'd better not pick her to run with him. That might make the D ticket unbeatable, but she'd be plotting all the time. He would have to seriously distance himself from her and keep an eye on her, allowing her to go to state funerals and ribbon-cuttings and not much else.

20080310-03 12:10 SteveB Re: "Sniping by Aides Hurts Clinton's Image as Manager"

Dear Bill,

And think about Bill Clinton and his SEPARATE sphere of influence...whether Obama were at the top or second. It's all too weird and Othellian for me. [Note: not "Orwellian", Othello was...never mind. —SteveB]

20080311-01 10:47 B. Obama Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Hillary Clinton

Dear SteveB:

It's tough to think of two states more different than Wyoming and Mississippi. But we won Wyoming on Saturday, and we just learned that we won Mississippi by a large margin tonight.

Between those two states, we picked up enough delegates to erase the gains by Senator Clinton last Tuesday and add to our substantial lead in earned delegates. And in doing so we showed the strength and breadth of this movement.

But just turn on the news and you'll see that Senator Clinton continues to run an expensive, negative campaign against us. Each day her campaign launches a new set of desperate attacks.

They're not just attacking me; they're attacking you.

Over the weekend, an aide to Senator Clinton attempted to diminish the overwhelming number of contests we've won by referring to places we've prevailed as "boutique" states and our supporters as the "latte-sipping crowd." I'm not sure how those terms apply to Mississippi and Wyoming—or Virginia, Iowa, Louisiana, or Idaho for that matter. I know that our victories in all of these states demonstrate a rejection of this kind of petty, divisive campaigning.

But the fact remains that Senator Clinton's campaign will continue to attack us using the same old Washington playbook. And now that John McCain is the Republican nominee, we are forced to campaign on two fronts.

Thank you, Barack

20080312-01	19:24	India	Fw: AVAAZ Petition: Stop Using Food for Fuel; Energy
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

"Increased demand for biofuels is driving up food prices and accelerating climate change, as rainforests are destroyed to grow fuel. But with strong global sustainability standards, we can ensure that biofuels help, rather than hurt."

http://www.avaaz.org/en/biofuel_standards_now/9.php?cl=60466009

20080312-02	23:51	SteveM	Fw: "Say What, Barrack?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. Largely debunked by Snopes.com:
<http://www.snopes.com/politics/obama/saywhat.asp> —SteveB]

"Say What, Barrack?" by Paul R. Hollrah

Tuning in to C-Span recently, I found myself listening to a speech by Senator Barack Hussein Obama, Jr. He was standing in the pulpit of a black church in Selma, Alabama, and as I studied the body language of the dozen or so black ministers standing behind the senator, I couldn't help but be reminded of the little head-bobbing dolls that people used to place in the rear windows of their 1957 Chevrolets. If their reactions are any indication, the new "Schlickmeister" of the Democrat Party is actually a pretty accomplished public speaker.

However, as he spoke, I found my b.s. alarm going off, repeatedly. But I couldn't quite figure out why until I actually read excerpts of his speech several days later. Here's part of what he said:

...something happened back here in Selma, Alabama. Something happened in Birmingham that sent out what Bobby Kennedy called, "ripples of hope all around the world." Something happened when a bunch of women decided they were going to walk instead of ride the bus after a long day of doing somebody else's laundry, looking after somebody else's children.

When (black) men who had PhD's decided 'that's enough' and 'we're going to stand up for our dignity,' that sent a shout across oceans so that my grandfather began to imagine something different for his son. His son, who grew up herding goats in a small village in Africa could suddenly set his sights a little higher and believe that maybe a black man in this world had a chance.

So the Kennedy's decided we're going to do an airlift. We're going to go to Africa and start bringing young Africans over to this country and give them scholarships to study so they can learn what a wonderful country America is.

This young man named Barack Obama got one of those tickets and came over to this country. He met this woman whose great great-great-great- grandfather had owned slaves; but she had a good idea there was some craziness going on because they looked at each other and they decided that we know that, (in) the world as it has been, it might not be possible for us to get together and have a child. There was something stirring across the country because of what happened in Selma, Alabama, because some folks are willing to march across a bridge. So they got together and Barack Obama Jr. Was born. So don't tell me I don't have a claim on Selma, Alabama. Don't tell me I'm not coming home to Selma, Alabama.

Okay, so what's wrong with that? It all sounds good. But is it?

Obama told his audience that, because some folks had the courage to "march across a bridge" in Selma, Alabama, his mother, a white woman from Kansas, and his father, a black Muslim from Africa, took heart. It gave them the courage to get married and have a child. The problem with that characterization is that Barrack Obama, Jr., was born on Aug. 4, 1961, while the first of three marches across that bridge in Selma didn't occur until Mar. 7, 1965, at least five years after Obama's parents met.

Obama went on to tell his audience that the Kennedys, Jack and Bobby, decided to do an airlift. They would bring some young Africans over so that they could be educated and learn all about America. His grandfather heard that call and sent his son, Barack Obama, Sr., to America.

The problem with that scenario is that, having been born in Aug., 1961, the future senator was not conceived until sometime in Nov., 1960. So if this African grandfather heard words that "sent a shout across oceans," inspiring him to send his goat-herder son to America, it was not a Democrat Jack Kennedy he heard, nor his brother Bobby, it was a Republican President, Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Obama's speech is reminiscent of Al Gore's claim of having invented the Internet, Hillary Clinton's claim of having been named after the first man to climb Mt. Everest, even though she was born five years and seven months before Sir Edmund climbed the mountain, and John Kerry's imaginary trip to Cambodia.

As one of my black friends, Eddie Huff, has said, "We need to ask some very serious questions of the senator from Illinois. It's not enough to be black, it's not enough to be articulate, and it's not enough to be eloquent and a media darling. The only question will be how deaf an ear, or how blind an eye, will people turn in order to turn a frog into a prince."

"Life's tough.....it's even tougher if you're stupid."—John Wayne

20080312-03	17:52	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Hillary Clinton
-------------	-------	------------	---

Dear SteveB:

When we won Iowa, the Clinton campaign said it's not the number of states you win, it's "a contest for delegates." When we won a significant lead in delegates, they said it's really about which states you win. When we won South Carolina, they discounted the votes of African-Americans. When we won predominantly white, rural states like Idaho, Utah, and Nebraska, they said those didn't count because they won't be competitive in the general election. When we won in Washington State, Wisconsin, and Missouri—general election battlegrounds where polls show Barack is a stronger candidate against John McCain—the Clinton campaign attacked those voters as "latte-sipping" elitists.

And now that we've won more than twice as many states, the Clinton spin is that only certain states really count. But the facts are clear. For all their attempts to discount, distract, and distort, we have won more delegates, more states, and more votes.

Meanwhile, more than half of the votes that Senator Clinton has won so far have come from just five states. And in four of these five states, polls show that Barack would be a stronger general election candidate against McCain than Clinton.

We're ready to take on John McCain. But we also need to build operations in places like Pennsylvania, Indiana, North Carolina, and Oregon that will hold their primaries in April and May. Barack Obama needs your support to fight this two-front battle. Please make a donation of $25 right now.

With our overwhelming victory in the Mississippi primary yesterday, our lead in earned delegates is now wider than it was on Mar. 3rd, before the contests in Ohio and Texas. And thanks to your help, we have dramatically increased our support among so-called "superdelegates"—Governors, Members of Congress, and party officials who have a vote at the Democratic National Convention in August. As the number of remaining delegates dwindles, Hillary Clinton's path to the nomination seems less and less plausible.

Now that Mississippi is behind us, we move on to the next ten contests. The Clinton campaign would like to focus your attention only on Pennsylvania—a state in which they have already declared that they are "unbeatable." But Pennsylvania is only one of those 10 remaining contests, each important in terms of allocating delegates and ultimately deciding who our nominee will be.

We have activated our volunteer networks in each of these upcoming battlegrounds. We're putting staff on the ground and building our organization everywhere. The key to victory is not who wins the states that the Clinton campaign thinks are important. The key to victory is realizing that every vote and every voter matters. Throughout this entire process, the Clinton campaign has cherry-picked states, diminished caucuses, and moved the goal posts to create a shifting, twisted rationale for why they should win the nomination despite winning fewer primaries, fewer states, fewer delegates, and fewer votes.

We must stand up to the same-old Washington politics. Barack has won twice as many states, large and small, in every region of the country—many by landslide margins. And this movement is expanding the base of the Democratic Party by attracting new voters in record numbers and bringing those who had lost hope back into the political process. Push back against the spin and help build the operation to win more delegates in these upcoming contests.

Thank you for your support and for everything you've done to build a movement that is engaging voters and winning contests in every part of this country.

David Plouffe, Campaign Manager, Obama for America
Paid for by Obama for America [Not "America for Obama"?—SteveB

20080316-01	09:55	SteveB	"Drug Trade Tyranny on the Border" Drug Wars
-------------	-------	--------	--

"Drug Trade Tyranny on the Border" by Manuel Roig-Franzia, the Washington Post

Mar. 16, 2008, (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/03/15/AR2008031501013.html?hpid=topnews>)

(Mexican cartels maintain grasp with weapons, cash and savagery.)

(TIJUANA, Mexico) The killers prowled through Loma Bonita in the pre-dawn chill. In silence, they navigated a labyrinth of wood shacks at the crest of a dirt lane in the blighted Tijuana neighborhood, police say. They were looking for Margarito Saldaña, an easygoing 43-year-old district police commander. They found a house full of sleeping people.

Neighbors quivered at the crack of AK-47 assault rifles blasting inside Saldaña's tiny home. Rafael García, an unemployed laborer who lives nearby, recalled thinking it was "a fireworks show," then sliding under his bed in fear.

In murdering not only Saldaña, but also his wife, Sandra, and their 12-year-old daughter, Valeria, the Loma Bonita killers violated a rarely broken rule of Mexico's drug cartel underworld: Family should remain free from harm. The slayings capped five harrowing hours during which the assassins methodically hunted down and murdered two other police officers and mistakenly killed a 3-year-old boy and his mother.

The brutality of what unfolded here in the overnight hours of Jan. 14 and early Jan. 15 is a grim hallmark of a crisis that has cast a pall over the United States' southern neighbor. Events in three border cities over the past three months illustrate the military and financial power of Mexico's cartels and the extent of their reach into a society shaken by fear.

More than 20,000 Mexican troops and federal police are engaged in a multi-front war with the private armies of rival drug lords, a conflict that is being waged most fiercely along the 2,000-mile length of the U.S.-Mexico border. The proximity of the violence has drawn in the Bush administration, which has proposed a $500 million annual aid package to help President Felipe Calderón combat what a Government Accountability Office report estimates is Mexico's $23 billion a year drug trade.

A total of more than 4,800 Mexicans were slain in 2006 and 2007, making the murder rate in each of those years twice that of 2005. Law enforcement officials and journalists, politicians and peasants have been gunned down in the wave of violence, which includes mass executions, such as the killings of five people whose bodies were found on a ranch outside Tijuana this month.

Like the increasing number of Mexicans heading over the border in fear, the violence itself is spilling into the United States, where a Border Patrol agent was recently killed while trying to stop suspected traffickers.

Drawing on firepower, savage intimidation and cash, the cartels have come to control key parts of the border, securing smuggling routes for 90 percent of the cocaine flowing into the United States, according to the State Department. At the same time, Mexican soldiers roam streets in armored personnel carriers, attack helicopters patrol the skies, and boats ply the coastal waters.

"The situation is deteriorating," Victor Clark, a Tijuana human rights activist and drug expert, said in an interview. "Drug traffickers are waging a terror campaign. The security of the nation is at stake."

Dominated by a private army

More than 1,900 miles southeast of Tijuana, the city of Reynosa stretches along the Rio Grande, across from south Texas. This is Gulf cartel country, a region dominated by the cartel's private army, Los Zetas. Their arsenal befits a military brigade, exceeding those of some Mexican army units.

Led by Heriberto Lazcano Lazcano, Los Zetas are a highly disciplined mercenary squad composed of former elite Mexican troops, including officers trained by the U.S. military before they deserted. The group has become an obsession of Calderón's administration, which has sent more than a thousand troops to Reynosa and neighboring cities. Soldiers crowd the slender canal bridges that crisscross Reynosa, stopping drivers at random and staring across the cityscape with their fingers on the triggers of heavy weapons. The tense atmosphere has led to mistakes.

On Feb. 16, soldiers fatally shot Sergio Meza Varela, a 28-year-old with no apparent ties to the drug trade, when the car he was riding in didn't stop at a checkpoint. "You're scared to leave your house," Alejandra Salinas, Meza's cousin, said in an interview outside the family tire shop. "We're just in the way."

In Tijuana, Ciudad Juarez and Nuevo Laredo, the growing Sinaloa cartel is fighting rivals over smuggling routes. But in Reynosa, police say, only Mexican soldiers threaten the Gulf cartel's control. To prepare for battle, Los Zetas have stocked safe houses with antitank weapons, assault rifles, grenades and other heavy weapons, including some that Mexican law enforcement authorities believe once belonged to the U.S. Army.

"How can I fight them?" said Juan Jose Muñoz Salinas, Reynosa's police chief. "It's impossible." On Feb. 7, soldiers stormed the dusty "El Mezquito" ranch outside Miguel Aleman, west of Reynosa, and found one of the largest illegal arsenals in recent memory: 89 assault rifles, 83,355 rounds of ammunition, and plastic explosives capable of demolishing buildings. Two days later in nearby Nuevo Laredo, soldiers found a weapons cache that included eight military uniforms to be used as disguises. The mounting evidence that cartels have infiltrated many border police forces has prompted drastic action.

In Reynosa, soldiers disarmed the entire police force in January, leaving them without weapons for 19 days while ballistics tests were conducted. Police officers, who make $625 a month, were also forced to provide voice samples for comparison with recordings of threats made over police radios, Mayor Oscar Luebbert Gutiérrez said in an interview.

"It wasn't worth it," said Muñoz Salinas, the police chief. "They come after us, but it's other authorities that are really involved. Look at the state police, the federal police and the military."

The enemy is in the house

It was New Year's Day in Tijuana, the hilly city at America's busiest border crossing. City workers prepped for celebrations, but Jesus Alberto Rodriguez Meraz and Saul Ovalle Guerrero, both veteran police officers, had other plans. They were going to get rich.

The officers stole one ton of marijuana from the Arellano Felix drug cartel. But before they could sell the load they were kidnapped. Four days later their bodies were found, Tijuana's new police chief, Jesus Alberto Capella, said in an interview. The killings barely registered in Mexico, numbed by an avalanche of at least 30 police officer murders in the past three months and dozens more in the past year. Their case illuminates the pervasive police corruption created by drug money. One of every two police officers murdered in Mexico today is directly involved with drug gangs, according to estimates by police officials, prosecutors and drug experts.

Capella, nicknamed "Tijuana Rambo" because he fought his way out of an assassination attempt shortly before taking office, estimates that 15 percent of the city's 2,300 police officers work for drug cartels, earning a monthly stipend as body guards, kidnapers or assassins. In Baja California alone, Mexican justice officials estimate that 30 percent of the local and federal police force is on a cartel payroll. "We have the enemy in our house," Capella said.

The killings in Loma Bonita here were related to a police corruption case, Capella and other police officials said. A few days earlier, Tijuana police had killed an officer working as a bodyguard for a drug gang that tried to rob an armored car.

Cartel assassins, using police radios, vowed revenge. Within a week, Saldaña, his family, and two other officers had been murdered.

Some of the killings have come with specific messages taunting Mexican authorities. During one week in mid-February, six bodies were found with signs lashed to them that included information such as the phone number and address of the Mexican army office set up to receive tips about organized crime. According to analysts, such "narco-messages," some of which are carved into the bodies, are intended to keep residents from reporting tips.

The decline of the Arellano Felix cartel's dominance of Tijuana has had the unexpected effect of deepening police corruption. After one brother was assassinated and two others were arrested, a war erupted because the cartel's new leadership—including a sister, Enedina—refused to share territory with the Sinaloa cartel, a police official said on condition of anonymity. Once loyal to the Arellano Felix cartel, some police officers switched sides.

"The police became armed wings of the warring cartels," the police official said.

At the same time, tighter border enforcement following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks has made it harder for cartels to smuggle drugs into the United States. So the cartels developed a local market by giving out free samples of drugs, according to Clark, the Tijuana-based drug expert and human rights activist.

The estimated number of addicts in Tijuana doubled from 100,000 in 2004 to 200,000 in 2007, Clark said. The number of small stores or houses where drugs are sold increased fivefold—to 20,000 outlets—over that time. Each outlet pays protection money to police, so their proliferation meant more payoffs.

In response, authorities in Baja California and several other border states have begun giving police lie detector tests. The questions range from the innocuous to queries such as "Have you ever worked with a drug trafficker?"

Rommel Moreno Manjarrez, Baja California's attorney general, said in an interview that out of every 1,000 officers tested, 700 fail.

"It's impossible for the narco to succeed without the help of the police," he said. "The success that the narco has been having is because of the police."

Transformed by drug money

About 20 minutes south of Tijuana, high-rise condominiums line the coast near Rosarito Beach. Once a sleepy hideaway for Hollywood stars, the town had over time exploded into a gaudy party magnet, drawing tourists to the beach and the studio where the movies Titanic and Master and Commander were filmed. Rosarito's further transformation has been propelled by drug money and culture, turning the surfer's haven into a key transshipment point for cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamines.

City hall is now an armed encampment. Soldiers in armored personnel carriers guard the front entrance. The new police chief, Jorge Eduardo Montero Alvarez, now occupies an office inside the cordon. His headquarters was rendered uninhabitable by a December attack. Investigators believe Rosarito Beach police—working on behalf of the drug gangs—were behind the attack, which killed one of Montero Alvarez's bodyguards. Days later, Mexican soldiers disarmed the entire 149-officer Rosarito police force.

"I'm more afraid of the police than the narcos," said Jorge Luis Quiñones, a Rosarito Beach physician and businessman, reflecting a feeling that has built for years among many of the surrounding area's 150,000 residents.

In June 2006, three Rosarito Beach police officers were beheaded. For Hugo Torres Chabert, scion of the wealthy family that founded the famed Rosarito Beach Hotel, it was a grim wakeup call. Convinced that almost every level of the city's government had become tainted with drug money, Torres Chabert ran for mayor and won. Soon after taking office last December, he fired 80 of the city's 500 employees. But he says he hasn't been able to press for arrests for lack of evidence.

'Corrupt, but not stupid'

"They were corrupt, but not stupid," he said.

To the children of Rosarito Beach, narco gunmen had already become local heroes because they drove the fanciest cars, wore the latest styles and acted like they owned the town. "Black commandos," the drug cartel hit men, began openly flashing their weapons, snorting cocaine and strutting through the beach town.

"It became impossible to avoid drug dealers—your kids go to school with their kids," Aurelio Castañeda, a Rosarito Beach bar owner and merchants association official, said in an interview. "You'd go to a bathroom in a bar, and they'd be selling cocaine. They don't even try to hide it, and there was nothing you could do about it, nobody you could turn to."

Castañeda's once-busy bar, El Torito, is often empty. He says his business is down 80 percent since 2001, when Rosarito Beach's drug violence spiked, scaring off most surfers and other tourists. Beyond the flash of the bars and hotels, Rosarito Beach is a warren of impoverished neighborhoods where developers, after paying off city officials, did not bother to install water lines or electrical connections. The dismal living conditions created fertile recruiting grounds for drug traffickers, who have found many willing to "mule" their product across the border for $500 a trip.

But great quantities of drugs stay in Rosarito and are sold at hundreds of convenience stores or private homes that thrive under police protection. Not long ago, a Baja California journalist began digging into the problem. The cartels found out and, in a series of phone calls, threatened to kill him. It wasn't the first time. He'd had enough. Terrified, the journalist left the business.

"I was saying to myself, 'This is an important subject,'" the journalist said on condition of anonymity, fearing for his safety. "But I wasn't willing to lose my life over it."

© 2008 The Washington Post Company

20080318-01	18:00	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Video of Speech
-------------	-------	------------	---

Dear SteveB:

Barack Obama just finished a major speech on race in America and building a more perfect union. You should see it and read it for yourself:

<http://my.barackobama.com/hisownwords>.

Please forward this message to everyone you know.

Thank you, David Plouffe

Paid for by Obama for America

20080318-02	18:24	SteveM	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Look what I just found on Excite.com:

<http://apnews.excite.com/article/20080318/D8VG3O600.html> [Bad link. —SteveB]

Now you'll find out just how little she [Hillary Clinton. —SteveB] did as First Lady, a modest legacy of 35 years of experience!

20080319-01	09:19	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------------

Dear SteveM,

Definitely, the Clintons don't want this stuff to get out. Finally, lately, I've been hearing newspeople start to talk about Hillary's lack of experience. They'll say like, "What was it she did? Oh, ya, the health care debacle." Which, other than "day one", is all the woman can talk about. So her vast experience takes the actual form of one enormous failure.

And that's exactly how devious the Clintons are. They thought, "Hey, we could get attacked over this lack of experience thing. Maybe we'd better just go on the offensive and make the pillar of our campaign be that you are the most experienced candidate." Brilliant, and it has largely worked—that's how stupid we are—but totally dishonest and corrupt!

Hey, look out, Hillary! It looks like that pillar may be crumbling down on top of you. (Standing O)

Don't discriminate...hire an illegal!

20080319-02	20:18	B. Obama	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Iraq War
-----------------------------	-------	----------	--

Dear SteveB:

Five years ago today, President George W. Bush launched a war that should never have been authorized based on faulty premises and bad intelligence.

This war has now lasted longer than World War I, World War II, or the Civil War. Nearly four thousand Americans have given their lives. Thousands more have been wounded. Even under the best-case scenarios, this war will cost American taxpayers well over a trillion dollars.

And where are we for all of this sacrifice?

We are less safe and less able to shape events abroad. We are divided at home, and our alliances around the world have been strained. The threats of a new century have roiled the waters of peace and stability, and yet America remains anchored in Iraq. I am running for President because it's time to turn the page on a failed ideology and a fundamentally flawed political strategy, so that we can make pragmatic judgments to keep our country safe.

That's what I did when I stood up and opposed this war from the start and said that we needed to finish the fight against al Qaeda. And that's what I'll do as President of the United States.

Senator Clinton says that she and Senator McCain have passed a "Commander-in-Chief test"—not because of the judgments they've made, but because of the years they've spent in Washington.

She made a similar argument when she said her vote for war was based on her experience at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

But here is the stark reality: there is a security gap in this country—a gap between the rhetoric of those who claim to be tough on national security, and the reality of growing insecurity caused by their decisions.

It is time to have a debate with Senator McCain about the future of our national security. And the way to win that debate and keep America safe is to offer a clear contrast—a clean break from the failed policies and politics of the past.

Nowhere is that break more badly needed than in Iraq.

The judgment that matters most on Iraq—and on any decision to deploy military force—is the judgment made first.

If you believe we are fighting the right war, then the problems we face are purely tactical in nature. That is what Senator McCain wants to discuss—tactics. What he and the Administration have failed to present is an overarching strategy: how the war in Iraq enhances our long-term security, or will in the future.

That's why this Administration cannot answer the simple question posed by Senator John Warner in hearings last year: Are we safer because of this war? And that is why Senator McCain can argue—as he did last year—that we couldn't leave Iraq because violence was up, and then argue this year that we can't leave Iraq because violence is down.

When you have no overarching strategy, there is no clear definition of success.

Success comes to be defined as the ability to maintain a flawed policy indefinitely. Here is the truth: fighting a war without end will not force the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future. And fighting in a war without end will not make the American people safer.

When I am Commander-in-Chief, I will set a new goal on Day One: I will end this war. Not because politics compels it. Not because our troops cannot bear the burden—as heavy as it is. But because it is the right thing to do for our national security, and it will ultimately make us safer.

Here are the core elements of my strategy to address our critical national security challenges in the 21st century:

1. End the war in Iraq, removing our troops at a pace of 1 to 2 combat brigades per month;
2. Finally finish the fight against the Taliban, root out al Qaeda and invest in the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan, while making aid to the Pakistani government conditional;
3. Act aggressively to stop nuclear proliferation and to secure all loose nuclear materials around the world;
4. Double our foreign assistance to cut extreme poverty in half;
5. Invest in a clean energy future to wean the U.S. off of foreign oil and to lead the world against the threat of global climate change;
6. Rebuild our military capability by increasing the number of soldiers, marines, and special forces troops, and insist on adequate training and time off between deployments;
7. Renew American diplomacy by talking to our adversaries as well as our friends; increasing the size of the Foreign Service and the Peace Corps; and creating an America's Voice Corps.

Please take a minute to show your support for this plan:

<http://my.barackobama.com/fiveyearslater>.

We are at a defining moment in our history.

This must be the election when America comes together behind a common purpose on behalf of our security and our values.

That is what we do as Americans. It's how we founded a republic based on freedom, and faced down fascism. It's how we defended democracy through a Cold War, and shined a light of hope bright enough to be seen in the darkest corners of the world. When America leads with principle and pragmatism, hope can triumph over fear. It is time, once again, for America to lead.

Thank you, Barack Obama

20080320-01	18:31	D. Plouffe	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Hillary Clinton
-------------	-------	------------	---

Dear SteveB:

Senator Clinton and Senator McCain are reading from the same political playbook as they attack Barack on foreign policy. They have both criticized Barack's commitment to act against top al Qaeda terrorists if others can't or won't act. And they have both dismissed his call for renewed diplomacy as naïve while mistakenly standing behind George Bush's policy of non-engagement that just isn't working.

But most of all—after five years of overwhelming evidence that we are less safe, less able to shape events abroad, and more divided at home—Senator Clinton and Senator McCain are failing to address the consequences of a war they both supported that should have never been authorized and never been waged.

We need a leader who had the judgment to oppose this war before it began and who has a clear plan to end it. But Barack is facing a two-front battle against Senator Clinton and Senator McCain. We knew at the beginning of this campaign that we'd be up against the full force of the conventional thinking that grips Washington. But no one could have imagined it would go on this long, or that we'd have to fight this battle on two fronts at the same time.

Senator Clinton's campaign, with her chances of winning dwindling and our delegate lead even larger than it was before her so-called comeback on Mar. 4th, has adopted a "kitchen-sink" strategy to throw everything they can at us. Her campaign has made it clear they will do and say anything to win this nomination.

Senator McCain, now the presumptive Republican nominee, is already running his general election campaign. He's so eager to justify another 100 years of war in Iraq and drum up conflict with Iran that he and his campaign have been making sloppy and woefully false assertions about links between Iran and al Qaeda in Iraq.

We've got to take on both Senator Clinton and Senator McCain at the same time.

Yesterday, Barack laid out a clear plan to make America more secure and end the war in Iraq. Today, he laid out the economic costs of the war that Senator Clinton and Senator McCain supported. In both speeches—and in his speech on race in America earlier this week—Barack Obama demonstrated that he is the candidate with the courage and judgment to tackle the challenges we face.

The choice Americans have in this election is clear—and your support right now sends a message to those who support the status quo that it is time for a new kind of leadership.

Thank you,
David Plouffe, Campaign Manager, Obama for America
Paid for by Obama for America

20080324-01	21:00	SteveM	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

The experience that she she's always speaking of, is "exaggeration" and "lying". Which serves a politician of her ilk.

20080324-02	17:46	G. Cohen	Barack Obama; 2008 Montana Primary
-----------------------------	-------	----------	------------------------------------

Dear SteveB:

My name is Gabe Cohen, and I'm the State Director for the Obama campaign in Montana.

I'm writing to remind you that the Montana primary is coming up soon—on June 3rd—and to let you know how you can get involved in our campaign in the Big Sky State.

Organization is crucial here in Montana, and now's the time to start building the grassroots network that will help Barack succeed on Primary Day.

Sign up to organize for Barack in your community: <http://mt.barackobama.com/mtvolunteer>.

After more than 40 contests all across the country, Barack has won more than twice as many states, the most delegates, and the most votes. But this race is still close, and the Montana primary is one of only ten remaining contests.

Supporters across the state are needed to reach out to potential voters, organize their communities, and make sure as many supporters as possible are ready and excited for Primary Day.

No prior political experience is necessary. All you need is a hunger for change—and a willingness to turn your enthusiasm into action.

Our campaign is just getting started here in Montana, and you'll be hearing a lot more from us as the primary approaches.

We're looking forward to working with you and getting to know you in the weeks ahead.

Thank you, Gabe Cohen, Montana State Director, Obama for America

P.S.—Absentee balloting is now available in Montana. Download a ballot now. Any registered voter may vote by absentee ballot, even if he or she is able to vote in person on Election Day. Paid for by Obama for America.

20080326-01	10:18	V. Buchanan	Illegal Immigration Survey
-------------	-------	-------------	----------------------------

Dear SteveB:

The U.S. House of Representatives may soon consider an immigration enforcement bill that would add 8,000 new border patrol agents, improve border security and require that employers verify that their workers are legally in the United States.

Do you support or oppose this legislation to secure our borders and prevent illegal immigration?

Congressman Vern Buchanan, Representing the 13th District of Florida:

<http://buchanan.house.gov/>.

Sarasota District Office, 235 N. Orange Avenue, Suite 201, Sarasota, FL 34236, ph: (941) 951-6643, fx: (941) 951-2972

20080401-01	19:50	SteveB	"The Tall Tale of Tuzla" Hillary Clinton
-------------	-------	--------	--

"The Tall Tale of Tuzla" by Christopher Hitchens, Slate

Mar. 31, 2008, (http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/fighting_words/2008/03/the_tall_tale_of_tuzla.html)

(Hillary Clinton's Bosnian misadventure should disqualify her from the presidency, but the airport landing is the least of it.)

The punishment visited on Sen. Hillary Clinton for her flagrant, hysterical, repetitive, pathological lying about her visit to Bosnia should be much heavier than it has yet been and should be exacted for much more than just the lying itself. There are two kinds of deliberate and premeditated deceit, commonly known as suggestio falsi and suppressio veri. (Neither of them is covered by the additionally lying claim of having "misspoken.") The first involves what seems to be most obvious in the present case: the putting forward of a bogus or misleading account of events. But the second, and often the more serious, means that the liar in question has also attempted to bury or to obscure something that actually is true. Let us examine how Sen. Clinton has managed to commit both of these offenses to veracity and decency and how in doing so she has rivaled, if not indeed surpassed, the disbarred and perjured hack who is her husband and tutor.

I remember disembarking at the Sarajevo airport in the summer of 1992 after an agonizing flight on a U.N. relief plane that had had to "corkscrew" its downward approach in order to avoid Serbian flak and ground fire. As I hunched over to scuttle the distance to the terminal, a mortar shell fell as close to me as I ever want any mortar shell to fall. The vicious noise it made is with me still. And so is the shock I felt at seeing a civilized and multicultural European city bombarded round the clock by an ethnoreligious militia under the command of fascistic barbarians. I didn't like the Clinton candidacy even then, but I have to report that many Bosnians were enthused by Bill Clinton's pledge, during that ghastly summer, to abandon the hypocritical and sordid neutrality of the George H.W. Bush/James Baker regime and to come to the defense of the victims of ethnic cleansing.

I am recalling these two things for a reason. First, and even though I admit that I did once later misidentify a building in Sarajevo from a set of photographs, I can tell you for an absolute certainty that it would be quite impossible to imagine that one had undergone that experience at the airport if one actually had not. Yet Sen. Clinton, given repeated chances to modify her absurd claim to have operated under fire while in the company of her then-16-year-old daughter and a U.S.O. entertainment troupe, kept up a stone-faced and self-loving insistence that, yes, she had exposed herself to sniper fire in the cause of gaining moral credit and, perhaps to be banked for the future, national-security "experience." This must mean either a) that she lies without conscience or reflection; or b) that she is subject to fantasies of an illusory past; or c) both of the above. Any of the foregoing would constitute a disqualification for the presidency of the United States.

Yet this is only to underline the YouTube version of events and the farcical or stupid or Howard Wolfson (take your pick) aspects of the story. But here is the historical rather than personal aspect, which is what you should keep your eye on. Note the date of Sen. Clinton's visit to Tuzla. She went there in Mar., 1996. By that time, the critical and tragic phase of the Bosnia war was effectively over, as was the greater part of her husband's first term. What had happened in the interim? In particular, what had happened to the 1992 promise, four years earlier, that genocide in Bosnia would be opposed by a Clinton administration?

In the event, President Bill Clinton had not found it convenient to keep this promise. Let me quote from Sally Bedell Smith's admirable book on the happy couple, For Love of Politics: Taking the advice of Al Gore and National Security Advisor Tony Lake, Bill agreed to a proposal to bomb Serbian military positions while helping the Muslims acquire weapons to defend themselves—the fulfillment of a pledge he had made during the 1992 campaign.

But instead of pushing European leaders, he directed Secretary of State Warren Christopher merely to consult with them. When they balked at the plan, Bill quickly retreated, creating a "perception of drift." The key factor in Bill's policy reversal was Hillary, who was said to have "deep misgivings" and viewed the situation as "a Vietnam that would compromise health-care reform." The United States took no further action in Bosnia, and the "ethnic cleansing" by the Serbs was to continue for four more years, resulting in the deaths of more than 250,000 people.

I can personally witness to the truth of this, too. I can remember, first, one of the Clintons' closest personal advisers—Sidney Blumenthal—referring with acid contempt to Warren Christopher as "a blend of Pontius Pilate with Ichabod Crane." I can remember, second, a meeting with Clinton's then-Secretary of Defense Les Aspin at the British Embassy. When I challenged him on the sellout of the Bosnians, he drew me aside and told me that he had asked the White House for permission to land his own plane at Sarajevo airport, if only as a gesture of reassurance that the United States had not forgotten its commitments. The response from the happy couple was unambiguous: He was to do no such thing, lest it distract attention from the first lady's health care "initiative."

It's hardly necessary for me to point out that the United States did not receive national health care in return for its acquiescence in the murder of tens of thousands of European civilians. But perhaps that is the least of it. Were I to be asked if Sen. Clinton has ever lost any sleep over those heaps of casualties, I have the distinct feeling that I could guess the answer. She has no tears for anyone but herself. In the end, and over her strenuous objections, the United States and its allies did rescue our honor and did put an end to Slobodan Milosevic and his state-supported terrorism. Yet instead of preserving a polite reticence about this, or at least an appropriate reserve, Sen. Clinton now has the obscene urge to claim the raped and slaughtered people of Bosnia as if their misery and death were somehow to be credited to her account! Words begin to fail one at this point. Is there no such thing as shame? Is there no decency at last? Let the memory of the truth, and the exposure of the lie, at least make us resolve that no Clinton ever sees the inside of the White House again.

20080402-01	09:21	Ben	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Bolivia
--------------------	-------	-----	---

Dear SteveB,

That was pretty good. Too bad it wasn't published in the Washington Post. I knew about this, and found it pretty appalling. Remember, I was a big fan of Bill. I still think Bill was the best, and best-equipped, leader for America we've had since Kennedy. I liked Jimmy, too, but he was unfortunately not as powerful a speaker as he was a thinker. (Please don't flame at me about all this. I still AM a big fan of Bill.) And to be honest, I was a minor fan of Hillary's, as a First Lady.

I LIKED the health care proposal she made then—better than her current one—and believe that a strong First Lady makes a better White House. But as I watched Hillary buff herself up as a New York Senator, and aim herself at the presidency, my feelings began to become mixed. Personally, I'd be delighted to elect a woman to the White House. But I don't think she's the one I want to see there, first. She's certainly smart, and she's a fine speaker. But I've seen rough edges, and shortcomings, and I will not tolerate bold-faced mine's-bigger-than-yours tall tales and lying. Big negative points on this deal.

I wish it had mainstream national coverage. Obama, despite his relative inexperience, is still seeming like a genuinely honest man, with ideals (if not fully refined ideas) and energy. Even if he's a little off base on some things, his energy and idealism, coupled with the [admittedly weaker than in days past] checks and balances of the rest of the system, give me at least some hope. He's not ideal. He could be a disaster. But he might work out really well, too.

Now, if only we can get the courts un-padded, restore the Bill of Rights, restore the economy to something that encourages innovation and manufacturing once again, recreate a representative governmental system devoid of the corrupting influences of business, industry and the military, and prosecute the criminal element among our elected officials, maybe—just maybe—America can become strong again, and gradually regain the world's respect so quickly sold away over the last eight years. Maybe.

Tell me more about Bolivia some day. What's the corruption level like there...?

20080403-01 14:58 SteveB Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary & Bill Clinton, Bolivia

Dear Ben,

Some other good info: <http://www.northstarwriters.com/dc163.htm>.

Flame you? I'll only say you are comically gentle on the Clintons. I enjoy it.

Bolivian corruption? Haha. Americans are Puritans, Ben. The Latins are so much more corrupt period, in the shallow sense. The Governor of Puerto Rico was just arrested. Look at the lawlessness at the Mexican border, look at Chavez, and in Bolivia Evo Morales is as stupid, uneducated, and corrupt as any communist to ever come along. Yet this corruption is minor compared to American political corruption via campaign financing, lobbying, regulatory swinging doors, etc.

Yet the country is still doing better than the dollar. Go figure. We aren't so corrupt as we are sold-out.

Take care. Go Barack! Go Johnnie Boy!

20080413-01 09:02 SteveB "The Hillary Deathwatch: Bill Clinton Opens the Old Bosnia Wound"

"The Hillary Deathwatch: Bill Clinton Opens the Old Bosnia Wound" by Christopher Beam, Slate

Apr. 11, 2008, (http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/deathwatch/2008/04/the_hillary_deathwatch_13.html)

Bill Clinton turns the conversation back to his wife's biggest weakness, Obama ticks off the grass roots, and Hillary laughs again—always bad news—sinking her back down 0.5 points to 9.7 percent.

Hillary Clinton's Bosnia wound was this close to healing—the cast was off, the skin had closed, she was just starting to walk again unassisted— when Bill decided to rip it open again. Twice! At a stop Thursday in Boonville, Ind., Clinton defended his wife (unprompted, mind you) by saying, "There was a lot of fulminating because Hillary, one time late at night when she was exhausted, misstated and immediately apologized for it, what happened to her in Bosnia in 1995."

Never mind that she repeated the story several times, that the attention-getting Mar. 17 speech occurred in the morning, and that she by no means "immediately apologized"—quite the opposite, it was a full week before she acknowledged that she "misspoke," which is not the same as apologizing. Oh, and the trip was in 1996, not 1995.

Damage control, go! The Clinton camp hastened to explain Friday that it was "her mistake and she takes responsibility for it." But the toothpaste was out of the tube. Bill has demonstrated an uncanny ability to say the wrong thing at the wrong time. A quick review: He compared Obama to Jesse Jackson; he called Obama's opposition to the war a "fairy tale"; he exploded over Bill Richardson's Obama endorsement in a meeting with California superdelegates; and now he resurrects the most damaging story of the post-Feb. 5 race, if not the entire cycle. At this rate, he'll be caught in a janitor's closet with Geraldine Ferraro the day before Pennsylvania.

Luckily, Barack Obama is p*ssing off supporters, too. As California prepares its slate of delegates, both candidates are doing their best to weed out potential defectors. (Even pledged delegates can switch sides, remember?) Over the weekend, Clinton disqualified 40 people from the list. Obama, however, cut 900, angering a whole lot of Democrats. The campaign is now "revising" its list. In Pennsylvania, meanwhile, Obama has decided not to hand out "street money" to local party bosses. Apparently, it's a tradition in Philadelphia politics to furnish your campaign workers with small contributions. There's a word for this practice in other parts of the country—bribery—but, hey, when in Rome... Obama's refusal could rankle supporters in a place in which he desperately needs their help.

Meanwhile, another YouTube moment (read: televised humiliation) for Hillary. When a reporter asked her whether Bill Clinton's $800,000 in speaking fees from the Colombian government might constitute a conflict of interest, she let loose the longest, most mirthful guffaw we've ever heard out of her. Because conflict of interest is comedy gold. She finally managed to answer the question: "I am against the trade deal. It doesn't matter who talks to me." She should really stick to crying.

And because no omen goes unnoted at Deathwatch, we're obligated to mention that a Clinton campaign office in Terre Haute, Ind., caught fire last night. Who needs tea leaves when we have flaming headquarters?

20080413-02	09:12	SteveB	"Do They Want Us to Hate Them?" Hillary & Bill Clinton
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

"Do They Want Us to Hate Them?" by Emily Yoffe, Slate

Apr. 11, 2008, (<http://img.slate.com/blogs/blogs/xxfactor/archive/2008/04/11/do-they-want-us-to-hate-them.aspx>)

Two items today that should go to the top of the "Clinton fatigue" greatest hits:

First is Hillary laughing at a reporter's question about Bill getting paid $800,000 to speak at a group that supports the Colombia free-trade agreement (that the Democrats have taken a ridiculous anti-free-trade stand is another issue). The reporter asks if there is a conflict since Hillary has made a personal loan to her campaign, money that might be tainted by Bill's pro-free trade payments. She hoots at the question as if she's never heard anything more ludicrous. What's so funny? This is an issue at the heart of a potential third Clinton administration. It's vital to find out both where Bill's personal and presidential library money is from, and to have Hillary explain how her administration would keep him from going around the world getting paid for speeches (or even raising money for his charities) from groups or governments whose policies are in opposition to hers. That's not about perception of conflict of interest, that's about actual conflict of interest.

The second item is Bill's defense (now that the issue is finally dying down) of Hillary's description of the landing in Tuzla. He says her characterization of it was essentially correct—which is odd since she was forced to say she "misspoke." Then he says she may not have been completely accurate because she spoke late at night (wrong) and she's 60 years old and was exhausted. That's the way to get your wife elected president! (His behavior is consistent with my view that he doesn't want there to be another President Clinton.) The "she's old and tired" argument is perhaps not the strongest one to make especially since she's released two recent ads showing that a President Hillary Clinton will constantly be up at 3 a.m. taking calls about national security and home foreclosures.

20080413-03	09:14	SteveB	Video: Hillary Clinton Laughs Off Question
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

<http://www.cnn.com/video/#/video/politics/2008/04/11/sot.clinton.laughs.off.pool>

20080415-01	18:20	B. Obama	Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries
-----------------------------	-------	----------	------------------------------

Dear SteveB:

In the last 24 hours we saw renewed attacks from Senator McCain and Senator Clinton.

The same John McCain who voted to extend the Bush tax cuts for the wealthiest few said I was "out of touch" when I spoke about the frustrations that working people in this country are feeling.

Maybe that's to be expected from John McCain. But I was disappointed to hear the exact same talking points from my Democratic colleague, Hillary Clinton. When a candidate who believes lobbyists represent "real people" says that I'm out of touch, that's when you know politics is being played.

But in the last 24 hours we've also heard from people like you.

We asked some of the 1.3 million people who have already donated to this movement for change to share their story and promise to match your first donation to the campaign.

Here are some of the people waiting to match your donation:

Rick from Florida matched a donation of $25, writing:

"I am a typical American just like you. I've served in the military, I work hard for a living and I want what's best for my country, not just me. I've seen what's happened over the last years and I am deeply saddened, worried and, yes, even bitter. But I see something in Barack Obama I have never seen in a presidential candidate in my own 45 years and the hope and inspiration I feel right now brings tears even as I write this to you. We don't get many chances like this. I don't have much to give but I give what I can because it's important and I ask that you please consider joining me with a few dollars that, added to the small contributions from millions of people like you and I, can be what it takes to really change things. Thanks in advance!"

Eve from Oregon matched a donation of $50, writing:

"I'm thrilled that Barack recognizes how frustrated so many of us are by the politics of fear and cynicism we've seen these past seven years! But what really sets him apart is that he's not afraid to speak the truth and say what's not supposed to be spoken—that yes, we can love our country but also be frustrated with its direction and leadership.

When we started this campaign, we said we were going to do something different. We said we weren't going to take money from Washington lobbyists and PACs. And the cynics said we would never be able to compete against the status quo.

But what the cynics didn't anticipate was you.

They didn't understand that people like Rick, Eve, and you were tired of a politics that was about tearing each other down instead of lifting this country up.

And they didn't understand that you were going to finance this campaign with contributions of $5, $25 and $50 at a time.

There's nothing elitist about the largest grassroots campaign in the history of our country—and you can prove that right now.

Make a matching donation of $25:

<https://donate.barackobama.com/match>.

Thank you for all that you're doing to change our country.
Barack

Paid for by Obama for America.

20080422-01 09:38 SteveM Fw: Election? 2008 Primaries

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

From out there:

We in Denmark cannot figure out why you are even bothering to hold an election.

On one side, you have a b*tch who is a lawyer, married to a lawyer, and a lawyer who is married to a b*tch who is a lawyer.

On the other side, you have a true war hero married to a woman with a huge chest who owns a beer distributorship.

Is there a contest here?"

20080423-01 10:00 SteveB Re: Election? 2008 Primaries

Dear SteveM,

My goodness gracious sakes! I thought you had learned the lessons about political correctness by now, but this certainly does not show it! I understand that people in Arizona (and New Mexico...hell, Texas too) have trouble seeing things the way the rest of us do, but you should still probably be ashamed of yourself and take some classes in sensitivity training, if they have such a thing down there. I expect your next email will be a little more in line with the 21st Century, OK? Have a nice day.

20080425-01 15:04 SteveB To: Bill O'Reilly; 911 Operators

Dear Bill O'Reilly:

I know there are more important things happening, but I was very pleased to hear you speak out on your show last night on FOX against the 911 operator who thought she had to give the lady with the alligator in her kitchen the third-degree.

Many times recently, I have heard on TV even worse behavior on the part of these operators. Many times they are giving a lot of grief to the poor person calling. I do not understand why these people are not better trained to just get the facts and send help. They should act like the guy in the Brinks commercial. "What's the problem? Where are you? Help is on the way. Goodbye."

I for one am sick and tired of hearing them endanger lives by acting like suspicious cops or something. They all need nationwide sensitivity training. Who the heck do they think they are anyway?

Thanks again and keep up the good work.

PS: I tried to send this message through your billorielly.com website, but you wanted to charge me money. Shame on you!

—SteveB

20080426-01	12:20	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------

Dear Lianne,

Just wondering....are you as utterly sickened by the behavior, lies, and unbridled ambitions of the Clinton trailer-trash as I am?

20080501-01	09:56	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Evan Bayh & Hillary Clinton
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

I am so disappointed in our Evan Bayh backing that lying, deceitful, do-anything-to-get-elected, full of "testicular fortitude", non-gas-pumping, not-able-to-get-her-own-coffee-at-a-gas-station, stupid policies megalomaniac—Hillary "Day One" Clinton and, of course, her cheating, so-close-to-impeached, lying, worthless husband—Bill "Monica Loving" Clinton.

Shame on you, Evan Bayh!

20080501-02	11:44	SteveB	Fw: Political Science for Dummies
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Political Science for Dummies

DEMOCRAT:

You have two cows. Your neighbor has none. You feel guilty for being successful. You push for higher taxes so the government can provide cows for everyone.

REPUBLICAN:

You have two cows. Your neighbor has none. So?

SOCIALIST:

You have two cows. The government takes one and gives it to your neighbor. You form a cooperative to tell him how to manage his cow.

COMMUNIST:

You have two cows. The government seizes both and provides you with milk. You wait in line for hours to get it. It is expensive and sour.

CAPITALISM, AMERICAN STYLE:

You have two cows. You sell one, buy a bull, and build a herd of cows.

BUREAUCRACY, AMERICAN STYLE:

You have two cows. Under the new farm program the government pays you to shoot one, milk the other, and then pours the milk down the drain.

AMERICAN CORPORATION:

You have two cows. You sell one, lease it back to yourself and do an IPO on the 2nd one. You force the two cows to produce the milk of four cows. You are surprised when one cow drops dead. You spin an announcement to the analysts stating you have downsized and are reducing expenses. Your stock goes up.

FRENCH CORPORATION:

You have two cows. You go on strike because you want three cows. You go to lunch and drink wine. Life is good.

JAPANESE CORPORATION:

You have two cows. You redesign them so they are one tenth the size of an ordinary cow and produce twenty times the milk. They learn to travel on unbelievably crowded trains. Most are at the top of their class at cow school.

GERMAN CORPORATION:

You have two cows. You engineer them so they are all blond, drink lots of beer, give excellent quality milk, and run a hundred miles an hour. Unfortunately they also demand 13 weeks of vacation per year.

ITALIAN CORPORATION:

You have two cows, but you don't know where they are. You break for lunch. Life is good.

RUSSIAN CORPORATION:

You have two cows. You have some vodka. You count them and learn you have five cows. You have some more vodka. You count them again and learn you have 42 cows. The Mafia shows up and takes over however many cows you really have.

TALIBAN CORPORATION:

You have all the cows in Afghanistan , which are two. You don't milk them because you cannot touch any creature's private parts. You get a $40 million grant from the U.S. government to find alternatives to milk production but use the money to buy weapons.

IRAQI CORPORATION:

You have two cows. They go into hiding. They send radio tapes of their mooing [to an Arab radio station].

POLISH CORPORATION:

You have two bulls. Employees are regularly maimed and killed attempting to milk them. [It's even worse for the ones who try to mate them. —SteveB]

BELGIAN CORPORATION:

You have one cow. The cow is schizophrenic. Sometimes the cow thinks he's French, other times he's Flemish. The Flemish cow won't share with the French cow. The French cow wants control of the Flemish cow's milk. The cow asks permission to be cut in half. The cow dies happy.

FLORIDA CORPORATION:

You have a black cow and a brown cow. Everyone votes for the best looking one. Some of the people who actually like the brown one best accidentally vote for the black one. Some people vote for both. Some people vote for neither. Some people can't figure out how to vote at all. Finally, a bunch of guys from out-of state tell you which one you think is the best looking cow.

CALIFORNIA CORPORATION:

You have millions of cows. They make real California cheese. Only five speak English. Most are illegal. Arnold likes the ones with the big udders.

20080507-01	11:16	SteveB	2008 Indiana Democratic Primary
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------

I'm a little disappointed in Indiana, but considering how very prejudiced so many people there are, I guess Obama did OK. Too bad though, because it was a chance for Hoosiers to prove how smart they are, and maybe a chance to get that awful lying b*tch and her lying bastard husband out of the race and off our screens. But of course, this may also give her the chance to prove how utterly insane with ambition she really is, as if she hasn't already. Thank God that the people of North Carolina are a little smarter, much as I hate to admit it.

20080507-02	18:50	C. Glenn	2008 Montana Democratic Primary
-----------------------------	-------	----------	---------------------------------

Dear SteveB:

Last night, Barack won a decisive victory in North Carolina and finished closer than anyone expected in Indiana.

Today, the spotlight turns to the 6 remaining contests—and with less than one month to go before Primary Day, Montana is playing an increasingly vital role in this election.

Together, we can finish this race off and secure the nomination, but we need your help. And the best place for you to make a difference is at the Obama office nearest you.

There are lots of ways you can help out at your local Obama office, so find yours today and sign up to volunteer before the primary.

Like you, I've seen the excitement on the ground here for Barack's message of change.

It's because of this excitement—and the amazing work of grassroots supporters like you across the country—that we've won the most states, the most votes, and the most delegates with only 6 contests remaining.

You've helped create a movement that will compete in all 50 states in November, but we need to finish primary season strongly. And as the last state to vote, Montana can make a powerful statement that change is coming to our country.

We have just four weeks to make this happen, so sign up to volunteer at your local office:

<http://www.barackobama.com/>.

Thank you, Carrie Glenn, Montana Field Director, Obama for America

20080510-01	18:04	H. Clinton	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton
-----------------------------	-------	------------	---------------------------------

[The original email to Sen. Clinton appears to be missing. —SteveB]

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for your message. I have received thousands of emails from people all over the country. Your comments are very important to me and I am excited that so many people are joining our conversation about how to change the direction of the country. Unfortunately, due to the high volume of comments, I am unable to respond to each email individually.

Please visit www.hillaryclinton.com to learn more about my views on the issues and to read the latest information about my campaign.

Register to vote. Make sure you are registered to vote: <http://www.govote.org>.

Thank you again for your interest.

Sincerely, Hillary

20080516-01	10:35	SteveB	The Decline; Economics, Rich and Poor
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------------

As our founding fathers knew, a strong central government is essential in a perilous world, but is inherently dangerous in itself.

I don't want the money earned by the sweat of my brow or the earnings of any citizen confiscated by the government to enable big corporations to enslave us or give our jobs and our children's jobs to China and illegal immigrants. I don't want the wealth of the people wasted on government bureaucracy which never fulfills its promise, or wasted on wars which serve no purpose. But I also don't want a nation of cowards afraid to deliver swift, forceful vengeance and justice to Islamic thugs.

I want women to be able to make their own decisions concerning their own bodies, not the stupid government or some religious fanatics, no matter how conveniently they may define terms for themselves. But I also want my guns and my rights to them protected. A car or a truck is at least as dangerous a weapon, and I don't see anyone advocating to take them away. Not that I really give a damn about guns...it's just that all this cr*p from the Right and from the Left is just, well, cr*p! I DEMAND MY PRIVACY! I WANT FREEDOM!

I think every citizen has an equal right to affordable healthcare, even though I don't know how to achieve that. I want more of the nation's resources devoted to education and to the reform of education. (The latter would be so much easier than the former.)

I think we need to stop talking and do more to solve the energy problem. We need a man-in-space type of focus and to hell with space. We need fewer, if any, 4000 sq.ft. homes and less waste, but to hell with the landfills. Make them into energy producing ski slopes. Where's our Yankee ingenuity? We need to care for our world. This is what the American Indians taught us. What a sin and a shame that Jesus, the Bible, and the Church taught us the opposite.

The future is upon us and it is not pretty. I've been saying that for years.

During my lifetime I have seen America in a state of decline from what our parents, the Great Generation, handed to us, the "me" generation. Perhaps you have heard me talk before about how, in the small Indiana town of my youth, a barber or a man who worked in a shoe store could support a family, have a decent if modest house, an OK if used car, and send his children to college—often without his wife working. If you disagree with me and feel this past is still reality, we need to talk.

We can achieve nothing as long as our politicians are bought and sold by "special interests" whether they be giant corporations, powerful unions, racially divided constituencies, or foreign governments. The totality of the American people must come first for a change.

I have watched our politicians sell our great nation and its people down the creek, and I am sick of it! I have become absolutely convinced that there are four particular individuals, who have run our country or who want to run our country, who are complete and total morons.

Assume that all politicians have sold us out for selfish reasons. All mean us harm. All must be kept from power. There are many more, but these are the worst. Again, if you disagree, we need to talk. I would be happy to engage in discussions with anyone concerning my reasons for seeking to condemn these idiots to obscurity where they belong.

Thank you for your patience, your support, and, hopefully, for your vigilance and votes. (And not that I necessarily support Barack Obama or Ron Paul or Mike Huckabee or Dennis Kucinich or anyone else, but I think we need to do everything we can to shake things up, even if that means dismissing every single currently elected politician.)

As we used to say in the 60's but seem to have forgotten so long ago, POWER TO THE PEOPLE!

20080516-02 10:57 SteveM Re: The Decline; Illegal Immigration, Defense, The Border

Dear Dennis & SteveB,

OK Gentlemen let me bottom line this for you. You both bring up issues that sorely need addresses, complex as they may be. Thought Dennis you are misinformed as to the impact of the illegals. Please to refer to the recent Harvard study that points to a NEGATIVE $1.8 BILLION dollar impact on Arizona alone.

And the Liberal California is now waking up to the problem trying to address the impact also. There were four families live next door to me in Whittier, in a two bed, 1 bath, two car garage. Moved the Washer and Dryer out of the garage in to the yard and did laundry in a bucket, with a concrete block!

But the bottom line is that without strong National Defense worldwide and at the border, all other issues are mute.

None of the current candidates thrill me, but given only the experience levels of the three, with respect to their past stances on Security, and willingness the work "across the isle" to get something done, as the saying goes I'd rather dance with the devil that I know, then the one that I don't!

Flame suit on, Now then boys don't shoot the messenger! LOL

I've got the key to the highway, Yes I'm billed out and bound to go
I'm gonna leave here runnin', because Walkin' is much to slow.
I'm goin' back to the border, Where I'm better known,
Because you haven't done nothing, But drive a good man from home.
—from "Key To The Highway" by Big Bill Broonzy & Chas. Segar

20080516-03 10:58 SteveG Re: The Decline; Eisenhower's Military-Industrial Complex

Dear SteveB,

I don't know about the labels, but a lot of what is wrong now started with Eisenhower and has progressed: Interstate system & use of fuel to move things/people around, demise of trains, sprawling communities because of individual transportation, loss of public transportation. And then you have the start of the military industrial complex that has made egomaniacs out of some people. I like your rants and agree whole heartedly.

20080516-04 11:01 Dennis Re: The Decline; China, Trade

from SteveB:

I would be happy to engage in discussions with anyone concerning my reasons for seeking to condemn these idiots to obscurity where they belong.

Dear SteveB,

Whoa, the evil four are already destined for the dust bin of history.

I'd start a debate with you on a couple of your points—jobs going to China is mostly a myth (most have been lost to technological innovation and even China has lost 250,000 manufacturing jobs in the last ten years for the same reason) and we're going to need immigrants to pay for our Social Security—but otherwise, as an independent, I'm in tune with what you say. Stopping the decline of America will take a massive effort on the part of the next generation. Maybe the Big O can inspire that. On the other hand, let's hope our miserable baby boomer generation doesn't suck the hope out of any chance for a renewal by continuing all of the divisive cr*p.

Would love to hear from others about this. I'm off tonight for Croatia and Turkey for a month, but will try to check my e-mail for comments.

"Broad, wholesome, charitable views of men and things cannot be acquired by vegetating in one little corner of the earth all one's lifetime." —Mark Twain

20080516-05 11:02 SteveG Re: The Decline; Economics

Dear SteveB,

My mother did not work until I was in junior high and then she went to work at DePauw because as a benefit my brother and I got free tuition. We had a family basis in the formative years. When Dad passed away I went through tax returns of $2,500—$4,000 per year for a family of 4. As a child I had no idea or concern if we were rich, poor, middle class or what. I was a kid enjoying being a kid and learned a few things along the way.

20080516-06 11:15 SteveB Re: The Decline; Economics

Dear SteveG,

I know what you mean. I too was surprise by how little my parents made, yet how well they did...even saving money. What a wonderful time and community and schools and parents we had!!!

20080516-07 11:30 SteveB Re: The Decline; China, Trade

Dear Dennis,

I hear what you're saying, but the manufacturing has gone somewhere! I worked in China helping to automate a new Amway factory because China would no longer let the company import goods from their American factory in Grand Rapids, MI. How can they be losing manufacturing when their growth is so phenomenal? Are you sure you can trust the government's numbers? Every time I try to buy something that was manufactured, I have to struggle to find anything not imported from China. The only exception is clothes, which seem to come from Indonesia, India, or Honduras, etc.—not from North or South Carolina. I say, TAX the imports! To hell with free trade that is not free or fair at all. Illegals don't pay nearly as much as they demand. Let's keep the illegals the hell out and give our citizens, our children, and our hard-fought, hard-working LEGAL immigrants (2,000,000 per year, which seems like enough to me) a chance to work.

P.S.—You guys are all so much smarter than our politicians and almost all of the news media.

20080516-08 12:26 Dennis Re: The Decline; China, Trade

from SteveB:

I say, TAX the imports! To hell with free trade that is not free or fair at all.

Dear SteveB,

Free trade should, absolutely, mean fair trade. This seems to get confused by politicians exploiting the issue, especially when trying to fool blue collar workers into voting based on xenophobia. But not even fair trade will bring back the old manufacturing jobs to the U.S. The Germans, who pay even higher wages for manufacturing than the U.S., seem to be adding jobs through stimulating innovations in alternative energy, the so-called new green jobs. Meanwhile the U.S. Congress keeps funneling subsidies to industries in decline and not investing in the next energy revolution. Nor is there enough being invested in educating Americans to play a leading role in the world for this revolution.

Thus the need for immigrants. Yet our punitive immigration policy discourages high tech immigrants because it lumps all immigrants together. You only need to spend a few hours in an INS office to see how screwed up this country has become.

"Illegals don't pay nearly as much as they demand." —SteveB

Another myth. They demand very little since they lay low and seldom complain out of fear of being caught.

"Let's keep the illegals the hell out and give our citizens, our children, and our hard-working LEGAL immigrants (2,000,000 per year, which seems like enough to me) a chance to work." —SteveB

Illegals wouldn't come if no one was hiring them to do jobs Americans refuse to do (jobs with poor working conditions, no health care, and under the table wages). I don't think it's any accident that we have porous borders. The corporations that exploit illegals are the same ones buying the politicians who scream and yell about illegals to get elected, but do nothing constructive to solve the problem.

P.S.

"You guys are all so much smarter than our politicians and almost all of the news media." —SteveB

There are actually some very smart politicians and news media. Unfortunately, there so many people who have been dumbed down by the majority of politicians and media that intelligent voices don't count for much. It's all about entertaining the fools for fun and profit.

"More than any other time in history, mankind faces a crossroads. One path leads to despair and utter hopelessness. The other, to total extinction. Let us pray we have the wisdom to choose correctly." —Woody Allen

20080516-09	12:32	SteveM	John McCain
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------

Dear SteveB,

I'll say it one last time McCain is the lesser of the three evils, And Cindy is far more accomplished and compassionate than you know. I believe if you do some research you'll be impressed.

Obama is disingenuous when he states he was against the war since he wasn't in congress at the time and didn't have access to the flawed intel that everyone else had to make the choices from.

Obama did not grow up on the south side of Chicago, but in Indonesia and Hawaii and I believe that he's only joined Rev Wrights Church for political gain, so that's political baggage we don't know about. I don't think he shares my mid western values or sense of individual responsibility.

Unfortunately world politics won't let us annihilate at will, and speaking of world politics, they eat Obama alive, he so naive. Hell Hillary is better suited for foreigner policy!

20080516-10	13:11	SteveB	Re: The Decline; China, Trade
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------

from Dennis:

Illegals wouldn't come if no one was hiring them to do jobs Americans refuse to do (jobs with poor working conditions, no health care, and under the table wages). I don't think it's any accident that we have porous borders. The corporations that exploit illegals are the same ones buying the politicians who scream and yell about illegals to get elected, but do nothing constructive to solve the problem.

Dear Dennis,

Of course! We just have to enforce the law! But I don't believe the line that these are jobs Americans won't do—it's simply a matter of wages too low to live on—which needs to change. Immigration is fine. Illegal immigration is awful. I disagree that illegals "lay low" and don't cost society. Look up the estimated medical, public school, and crime/gang costs (like from the Latin Kings or MS13...really nice people).

These costs are astronomical. Illegals do seem to "lay low" though when it comes to paying for these things or paying taxes. Not to mention the lowering of wage scales and standards of living. Even here in Montana I've heard of 5 families in one house. Hardly the American dream. And, funny but not haha, some people are trying to tell me that I can't even call them "illegals" because it might offend someone!!!!

Legal immigrants do tend to be educated or highly educated because their immigration is legally regulated, hopefully, to benefit society (such as my wife, who is a lawyer from Bolivia). Many illegals are uneducated and don't feel they need to learn English. We Americans even seem to have doubts as to whether English should be our official language, even though it has become so, ipso facto, in much of the rest of the world.

20080516-11 14:38 SteveB Re: John McCain

Dear SteveM,

Are you sure McCain is the devil that you know? First, he was for amnesty for illegals, then not. He was for negotiating with Hamas, then against. He must become "pro-life" if he has a chance of being elected, but that isn't how he sounded before. He was against tax cuts, then for them. He doesn't seem to favor election finance reform and employs a boatload of powerful lobbyists, though, in all fairness, who doesn't? He seemed to back every Iraq decision, right or wrong, but now seems to be backpedaling...at least in his support for the Bush policies, if not in his support for the wars. He used to be 42, but now he will be 72 by the time he could serve, and he looks so damn old and acts so damn old that I can't believe it. I'm pretty sure I can tell from the video that his mind is starting to slip. Sometimes he doesn't know what state he is campaigning in. This is just too reminiscent of Bush for me!

Do you really think this geezer can take on the establishment? LOL

What are his real positions and who is he, really? I don't think we know a damn thing more about McCain than we do about Obama. At least Obama seems honest, is willing to listen, think, and maybe work for our common interests. At this point, I'm willing to give any outsider a shot at it, except maybe Ralph "the Wrecker" Nader. I don't believe experience matters nearly as much as character and brains.

20080516-12 14:58 SteveB John McCain; War

Dear SteveM,

I'm afraid that all we know about McCain is that he's part of the problem, not part of the solution. Well...and that Cindy is kinda dumb but, as you say, has big boobs and owns a beer distributorship. Oh, and he fought in another unnecessary war that cost way too many American lives because of the stupid way it was fought by the pu*sy President Bush...though I don't hold that against McCain.

I don't know when we will finally learn that if you are going to go to war, you go to annihilate. If a President can't stand the thought of that, he has no business attacking other nations.

And I think we can annihilate if we are attacked first. We are the only country in the world that cares what other countries think of us. What the hell? Let 'em think what they want...it is respect we are after, not praise. Power and its application are the only things that have ever kept the peace in the history of man. I think it's a bunch of pu*sy cr*p to think we have to be liked or something. (Not that I think you're a pu*sy by any means. I know better.) I say, let's be respected and feared, but let us be fair and just, so that we can respect ourselves.

20080516-13 15:46 SteveB Re: John McCain; Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton

Dear SteveM,

Hillary ain't suited for anything except her ugly-a*s PANTS suits and her big fat a*s ain't suited for that (she should try tents)! Her only foreign policy experience was learned from Monica, and she blew that! Look at the way she has run her campaign to be the ordained President. What a crock! Obama's campaign has run like a well-oiled machine because he's obviously a good administrator.

No one can be trained to be President. It takes OJT. Even unknown character (which I don't think is now the case) is better than known bad character. I don't care if Mac was a Vet. Big deal. He couldn't even stay out of prison camp. (Haha, just kidding, kinda.) What has he ever administered?

Since when is Hawaii not the U.S.? And come on, half the people here in my little Montana town go to the church they go to "network". I see no crime in that.

That doesn't make anyone indebted. Watch BO, listen to him, give him a fair chance, I think you might be impressed. At least he ain't confused.

20080519-01 11:59 David Re: The Decline; Libertarianism, "Nothing Gold Can Stay"

Dear SteveB,

Ah, a Libertarian just like me.

The sights of spring remind me of something you used to quote.

Nature's first green is gold,
Her hardest hue to hold.
Her early leaf's a flower;
But only so an hour.
Then leaf subsides to leaf,
So Eden sank to grief,
So dawn goes down to day
Nothing gold can stay.
—Robert Frost

20080519-02 21:39 SteveB, others Energy, Oil, Water

Below is a combination of thee separate emails back and forth:

SteveB: I've been thinking about the energy problem lately and I agree with you that the Islamic problem will not improve, though I hope their oil doesn't run out—it comes in too handy to make chemicals, drugs, and plastics and to power a few high performance vehicles and planes and maybe always will.

SteveM: If we can build some new refinery's the Saudis have plenty of 50 dollar oil as well as the Russians and Mexicans. High Sulfur content but it can still be refined out.

SteveB: Any old oil is fine for making chemicals, even recycled oil.

SteveB: I think our solution will come in the form of purely electric cars

SteveM: The only down side here is the disposal of said battery, based on current construct. I still contend that nuclear waste would be an easier problem.

SteveB: I think the environmentalists — of which I am one, otherwise — greatly exaggerate the landfill problem, etc. Nothing is more recyclable than lead-acid or ni-cad or even lithium batteries, especially if they were to start being used on a really large scale.

SteveB: ..our entire civilization seems to be built around it.

SteveM: DUH? the car?

SteveB: silly???

SteveB: Trucks must go. Everything possible needs to be electric, powered by coal with emissions pumped into chemically sequestered CO2, bio-mass ethanol, wind and water, even solar SteveM: If it was up to me every new house would have to be built with solar or wind, be the limousine liberals like Teddy K would complain about the view.

SteveB: I'm not sure all that local power-generation is as efficient as large central generating plants like we already have the power-grid all constructed for.

SteveB: We can't use food or farm land to produce energy. We have too great a need for food. Cities need to spread up not out in order to recover farm land.

SteveM: He said as he moved to Big Sky Country, LOL!

SteveB: Have you been to Indianapolis lately? What an ugly sprawling, wasteful mess. I'd really rather live in a large city and leave the entire state of Montana to wilderness, ranches, and farms.

SteveB: Giant water pipelines need to be constructed so that all that fresh water going into the ocean from, say, the Mississippi, the Columbia, and Niagara Falls can get to where it is needed most. Why not?...we do it efficiently enough with oil.

SteveM: Nuclear desalination plants off the California coast, There has been and will continue to be a water war here in the west. it's time for them to take one for the team.

SteveB: No need for a water war. Cheap abundant electricity from the grid can desalinate, but I still think it would be cheaper to bring water from the Mississippi or Columbia rivers in giant pipelines...maybe even trains? Look what Perrier has been able to do with transporting bottled water. LOL

SteveB: But if we are constantly bogged down in f*cking jihad, it could go either way.

SteveM: Maybe Michelle Obama could talk the bad Islamo-fascists into being nicer human beings, that way for the first in our adult lives America could be proud of her. NAAAAH, just gonna have to k*ll 'em.

SteveB: Ya! Just gonna have to k*ll 'em and the camels they rode in on! ^_^

from SteveB:

Did I mention "fission" before? That would be conventional "dirty" nuclear power. I meant "fusion" as in the sun and the H-bomb.

Alcohol as a fuel causes problems for vehicles and bigger problems for food prices.

We already have the technology to sequester the CO₂ emissions from coal-fired power plants, and/or we could also use what you suggest.

"First Successful Demonstration of Carbon Dioxide Air Capture Technology Achieved" from PhysOrg.com
Apr. 25, 2007, (<http://www.physorg.com/news96732819.html>)

"Synthetic Fuel Concept to Steal CO2 From Air" from PhysOrg.com
Feb. 13, 2008, (<http://www.physorg.com/news122136045.html>)

20080520-01 11:57 SteveB Re: The Decline; Libertarianism, Weather

Dear David,

And I thought a Libertarian was someone who ran around with their clothes off and had orgies!

Happy to hear spring has come...though you still have the month of fog and drizzle ahead, don't you? Here it is suddenly summer and the Bitterroot is swollen from melting snows. Will be canoeing it as soon as possible, but first we have to move to another house across town...yuk! Then back to Bolivia in two more years. Wish you could see the mountains here.

20080521-01 19:07 Dick Fw: AllMyFaves.com

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

ALL YOUR WEBSITES ON ONE PAGE What A Handy Tool! WOW!!!!!!! THIS IS THE COOLEST THING SINCE THE INVENTION OF THE TV REMOTE CONTROL. [I'm unconvinced.—SteveB]

<http://www.allmyfaves.com/>

20080521-02 20:49 SteveB Re: AllMyFaves.com; Edward Kennedy R.I.P.

Dear Dick,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Was very sorry to hear about Ted Kennedy. Our political views are very different on many issues, but I think he is one of the last great men. Wishing him well and thinking of him in my prayers. Take care, old friend.

20080522-01 09:10 V. Buchanan Illegal Immigration

[Newsletter from the Office of Rep. Buchanan. —SteveB]

(SARASOTA, Fla.) Congressman Vern Buchanan, just back from a visit to the U.S. border with Mexico, said more agents and additional resources are needed to stop illegal immigration and drug smuggling. Buchanan was in El Paso, Texas on Friday to meet with border patrol and customs agents, inspect the border and view the technology they use in their efforts to secure the southern border.

"It's clear we are making progress but more needs to be done," Buchanan said. "Illegal immigration is one of the biggest challenges facing our country, costing us billions of dollars each year and putting an unacceptable burden on our hospitals, our schools, our jails and our communities."

Buchanan toured detention facilities, examined security technology—including night vision technology, met with border patrol agents and K-9 units and visited several sections of the border where security needs differ. During his visit he witnessed the apprehension of individuals attempting to enter the country illegally and drug smugglers as well as the confiscation of illegal drugs.

"I was very impressed with the professionalism and dedication of the men and women patrolling the border," said Buchanan. "They deal every day with the challenges of illegal immigration and I am grateful for their service."

The 13th District Congressman noted that in Florida alone, we have more than half a million illegal immigrants costing the state's taxpayers more than $1.7 billion a year for education, emergency medical care, and incarceration when they break the law.

"We need to secure the borders first if we are ever going to stop the flow of illegals into our country," said Buchanan. "That is why I went to the border and saw first-hand what we're doing. I talked to the agents to find out what is and isn't working."

The El Paso border patrol oversaw approximately 22,760,000 northbound crossings in fiscal year 2007. Additional fencing and agents have helped reduce apprehensions in there by 38% from fiscal years 2006 to 2007.

"This proves that if given the necessary resources we can reduce illegal immigration and smuggling," said Buchanan. "I am even more convinced now than before that with more agents, secure fencing and new technologies we can secure the border."

Specifically, Buchanan called for the following to help solve the problem of illegal immigration: Add more border patrol agents to monitor the crossings along the 2000 mile-long southern border; Require employers to verify workers are legal and take away the economic incentive for illegals to come here; and, Appropriate the necessary funding to finish building 365 miles of the 700-mile long security fence authorized in 2006 along the southern border.

The Congressman is a cosponsor of the Secure America through Verification and Enforcement (SAVE) Act. The bill would enhance border security, provide employers with the tools they need to ensure that their employees are here legally, and enhance the government's ability to enforce existing federal laws and penalize offenders.

Washington, D.C. —Congressman Vern Buchanan (FL-13) yesterday received the "A in English" award from U.S. English, Inc. for his support of legislation making English the official language of the United States.

"Theodore Roosevelt once said, 'we have room for but one language, the language of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, the language of the Declaration of Independence—the English language,'" Buchanan said. "I strongly support making English our official language because it is a common language helps us live and work together. Learning English will open doors for legal immigrants working to build a better life in this country."

Congressman Buchanan is a cosponsor of H.R. 769, legislation that would make English our official language and end federal bilingual programs.

"I am pleased to present this award to Congressman Buchanan for his efforts to unite our diverse nation under the common language of English," said Mauro E. Mujica, Chairman of the Board of U.S. English, Inc. "Rep. Buchanan has actively reflected the viewpoints of his constituents regarding official English legislation. At a time when there is renewed interest toward preserving what unites us as a nation, we are grateful to the Congressman for his dedicated and enthusiastic support of this issue."

Vern Buchanan is a member of the House Immigration Reform Caucus.

20080522-02	13:01	SteveB	Fw: "Islam Is Not a Religion, Nor Is It a Cult. It Is a Complete System."
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

I have seen the effects of war...which is why I believe in peace. But...for some time there has been a "holy war" going on against western civilization and I have come to believe that it is a fight to the death. If there is a way out of it, I have yet to hear anyone proclaim it, other than total surrender. I will never do that, and I would think women would be even more reluctant. I don't know what is wrong with these people, but the only things they seem to understand are strength and violence and death. I agree that it is such a shame. The world has enough problems without the constant suicide attacks from Islamic extremists, who have taken over Islam and subjugated it to their evil purposes. But if it is suicide they want...I am inclined to oblige them. Sorry. In the history of Portugal and Spain, did you ever find a way to peace with these idiots that did not involve violence or surrender? I defend the right of Israel to exist...therefore I must die. Fun!

"Islam Is Not a Religion, Nor Is It a Cult. It Is a Complete System." posted by avideditor

Mar. 16, 2008, (<http://avideditor.wordpress.com/2008/03/16/islam-is-not-a-religion-nor-is-it-a-cult-it-is-a-complete-system/>)

Islam has religious, legal, political, economic and military components. The religious component is a beard for all the other components.

Islamization occurs when there are sufficient Muslims in a country to agitate for their so-called 'religious rights.'

When politically correct and culturally diverse societies agree to 'the reasonable' Muslim demands for their 'religious rights,' they also get the other components under the table. Here's how it works (percentages source CIA: The World Fact Book (2007)).

As long as the Muslim population remains around or under 2% in any given country, they will be for the most part be regarded as a peace-loving minority, and not as a threat to other citizens. This is the case in:

- United States—Muslim 0.6%
- Australia—Muslim 1.5%
- Canada—Muslim 1.9%
- China—Muslim 1.8%
- Italy—Muslim 1.5%
- Norway—Muslim 1.8%

At 2% to 5%, they begin to proselytize from other ethnic minorities and disaffected groups, often with major recruiting from the jails and among street gangs. This is happening in:

- Denmark—Muslim 2%
- Germany—Muslim 3.7%
- United Kingdom—Muslim 2.7%
- Spain—Muslim 4%
- Thailand—Muslim 4.6%

From 5% on, they exercise an inordinate influence in proportion to their percentage of the population. For example, they will push for the introduction of halal (clean by Islamic standards) food, thereby securing food preparation jobs for Muslims. They will increase pressure on supermarket chains to feature halal on their shelves—along with threats for failure to comply. This is occurring in:

- France—Muslim 8%
- Philippines—Muslim 5%
- Sweden—Muslim 5%
- Switzerland—Muslim 4.3%
- The Netherlands—Muslim 5.5%
- Trinidad & Tobago—Muslim 5.8%

At this point, they will work to get the ruling government to allow them to rule themselves (within their ghettos) under Sharia, the Islamic Law. The ultimate goal of Islamists is to establish Sharia law over the entire world.

When Muslims approach 10% of the population, they tend to increase lawlessness as a means of complaint about their conditions. In Paris, we are already seeing car-burnings. Any non-Muslim action offends Islam, and results in uprisings and threats, such as in Amsterdam, with opposition to Mohammed cartoons and films about Islam. Such tensions are seen daily, particularly in Muslim sections, in:

- Guyana—Muslim 10%
- India—Muslim 13.4%

Israel—Muslim 16%
Kenya—Muslim 10%
Russia—Muslim 15%

After reaching 20%, nations can expect hair-trigger rioting, jihad militia formations, sporadic killings, and the burnings of Christian churches and Jewish synagogues, such as in:

Ethiopia—Muslim 32.8%

At 40%, nations experience widespread massacres, chronic terror attacks, and ongoing militia warfare, such as in:

Bosnia—Muslim 40%
Chad—Muslim 53.1%
Lebanon—Muslim 59.7%

From 60%, nations experience unfettered persecution of non-believers of all other religions (including non-conforming Muslims), sporadic ethnic cleansing (genocide), use of Sharia Law as a weapon, and Jizya, the tax placed on infidels, such as in:

Albania—Muslim 70%
Malaysia—Muslim 60.4%
Qatar—Muslim 77.5%
Sudan—Muslim 70%

After 80%, expect daily intimidation and violent jihad, some State-run ethnic cleansing, and even some genocide, as these nations drive out the infidels, and move toward 100% Muslim, such as has been experienced, and in some ways is on-going, in:

Bangladesh—Muslim 83%
Egypt—Muslim 90%
Gaza—Muslim 98.7%
Indonesia—Muslim 86.1%
Iran—Muslim 98%
Iraq—Muslim 97%
Jordan—Muslim 92%
Morocco—Muslim 98.7%
Pakistan—Muslim 97%
Palestine—Muslim 99%
Syria—Muslim 90%
Tajikistan—Muslim 90%
Turkey—Muslim 99.8%
United Arab Emirates—Muslim 96%

100% will usher in the peace of 'Dar-es-Salaam'—the Islamic House of Peace. Here there's supposed to be peace, because everybody is a Muslim, the Madrasses are the only schools, and the Koran is the only word, such as in:

Afghanistan—Muslim 100%
Saudi Arabia—Muslim 100%
Somalia—Muslim 100%
Yemen—Muslim 100%

Unfortunately, peace is never achieved, as in these 100% states the most radical Muslims intimidate and spew hatred, and satisfy their blood lust by killing less radical Muslims, for a variety of reasons.

'Before I was nine I had learned the basic canon of Arab life. It was me against my brother; me and my brother against our father; my family against my cousins and the clan; the clan against the tribe; the tribe against the world, and all of us against the infidel.—Leon Uris, 'The Haj'

It is important to understand that in some countries, with well under 100% Muslim populations, such as France, the minority Muslim populations live in ghettos, within which they are 100% Muslim, and within which they live by Sharia Law. The national police do not even enter these ghettos. There are no national courts nor schools nor non-Muslim religious facilities. In such situations, Muslims do not integrate into the community at large. The children attend madrasses. They learn only the Koran. To even associate with an infidel is a crime punishable with death. Therefore, in some areas of certain nations, Muslim Imams and extremists exercise more power than the national average would indicate.

Today's 1.5 billion Muslims make up 22% of the world's population. But their birth rates dwarf the birth rates of Christians, Hindus, Buddhists, and Jews, and all other believers. Muslims will exceed 50% of the world's population by the end of this century.

20080523-01 13:56 SteveB John McCain; VP Pick Pointers

You know...McCain needs a VP candidate with vast experience, who could step up to the plate on day one, given McCain's advanced age...just in case he couldn't finish his term in office.

He is also weak with Catholics, liberals, Hispanics, independents, women, and "swing state" voters. Maybe he should pick Hillary as his VP candidate, and save Barack a whole world of trouble with both Hillary and Bill.

Then McCain could run as Bush's surrogate, Hillary could talk about her vast Bosnian combat experience, and maybe then and only then, the Republicans could win!

20080523-02 21:36 Dick Fw: Media, Democrats, 2008 Primaries

Another side to this ongoing controversy:

[Source of original email unknown. Robert Pillow? —SteveB]

I have a question that is not being addressed by most of the NEWS stations.

Are the delegates afraid to pick Hillary Clinton? The reason I ask this question is it seems OBAMA most of the time is playing the race card. WHY IS THIS PERMITTED? Do you forget he is half white? It seems the delegates are afraid to consider Hillary because of possible riots that could happen like the ones in the 1960's! Is this the reason they are responding in Obama's favor?

Another question a lot of Americans have is: Why do reporters report only their own slanted one-sided political beliefs? Wake up reporters and just report all the facts and let us the citizens of U. S. A. make our own decisions.

THAT IS WHY FOX AND FRIENDS AND THEIR NEWS STATION IS HIGHLY RESPECTED—THEY REPORT THE TRUTH BOTH SIDES AND LET US DECIDE. [This is a classic statement! I thought Fox was rightfully considered to be sleazy and unprofessional? Now they're "highly respected". By whom? Someone who is anonymous and thinks Fox News "reports both sides and let us decide [sic]". —SteveB]

Obama is too young and inexperienced to run this country. He could not even discern his Pastor's motives and ways. He and his wife stayed in that church for 20 years. Not only stayed but were or are still involved. How can he discern the ways of our country? "Our past behavior predicts our future behavior" He and his wife have 20 years of Wright's influences. "Birds of a feather flock together."

I am not for Hillary or Obama but I do feel the press is very unfair to Hillary. WHAT ARE THE NEWS REPORTERS HIDING BEHIND? DO YOU REPORTERS HAVE YOUR OWN AGENDA? NOT TO MENTION: 4, 5, & 7 HAVE BEEN UNFAIR TO MCCAIN. WHY IS THAT PERMITTED?

P. S. Please pass this note on to all the news stations and radio talk shows all over our country, even if you think they already have heard this. Be sure you do that today. It is a message that needs to be delivered to all reporters ASAP.

Dear Dick,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I read the email from, indirectly?, Robert Pillow, and I think the person who wrote it is completely wrong. FOX is totally Republican, MSNBC and NBC are totally Democratic, and CNN is fairly neutral with a liberal bias. It is not Obama who plays the race card, but Hillary and Bill. Notice that Hillary has also been playing the "assassination card". Her fanatical, nearly insane quest for power at any cost is beginning to take its toll on her. She is nothing but a lying, evil b*tch! Period!

She has run a terrible, terrible campaign...proving that she has no experience and is not fit to be President. Obama, on the other hand, has run an excellent campaign, and if he were not black, would have stomped Hillary into the ground long ago. He has proven that he can run a large organization, that he is of high moral character, and that he is fit to be President.

McCain is way too ancient, represents nothing but a continuation of Bush's failed policies and has flip-flopped on the major issues so often that no one knows what he really stands for. His campaign has had one debacle after another, largely ignored by the press because he and the Republicans are SO DAMN BORING! I mean, he was for amnesty for illegal aliens, then not, against lower taxes, then not, and who knows where he stands on abortion, etc. I don't trust him as far as I could throw him. "Straight talk" indeed!

The only reason people seem to have for being against Obama is that he is black, whether they will admit that to others or themselves or not. The "inexperience" thing is a red herring. How much experience did Lincoln or Kennedy have when they became President? No more than Obama! Bush, Carter, and Nixon, were not good Presidents, even though they had prior experience in government.

Dear Hillary Clinton Presidential Campaign:

Hillary talks a lot about her vast experience and how she is ready to lead the country on her famous "day one" in the Oval Office. I don't want to rain on your parade, but I feel I must share the following with someone in her campaign:

1. I can't seem to remember any executive experience. She tried to ramrod national healthcare down the throats of Congress and failed miserably. What else did she ever do except vote with Bush for the Iraq war?
2. Her comments concerning being under sniper fire in Bosnia are inexplicable and crazy, considering that it was all a big lie. I have never heard any explanation, just weak excuses.
3. Bill Clinton was the worst, most dishonest, cheatingest President ever. The Monica, Paula, Kathleen, Whitewater things, travel-gate, pardons, etc. were ugly and appalling. He should have been impeached.
4. Hillary has run the worst campaign in recorded history, going from a shoe-in to having to try to climb an impossible mountain. How does she think she could run the country if she can't even run a campaign? Look how many people have quit, been fired, or simply gone over to the Obama camp. Even many people who served under Bill and would seem to owe the Clintons some allegiance have gone over to the other side.
5. Her insistence on seating all the Florida and Michigan delegations is unfair to the rest of the country and to Obama. She evidently has no sense of fair play, simply an overwhelming greed for the office.
6. For me, her comments yesterday about the Robert Kennedy assassination were the last straw. Don't try to tell me they were taken out of context. Even her assertion that Bill's campaign didn't wrap-up till June was a lie or a mistake. Her remarks were terrible, stupid, almost crazy, and I condemn her for them. If she can make such a terrible mistake and then not even apologize for it (I saw her feeble attempt), she has no business being President.

I have tried to stay with her, but I cannot. She must be a worse person than her awful husband. I am now 100% for Obama. I believe him to be a man of honor, even if I don't agree with all of his positions. Not enough experience? Neither Lincoln nor Kennedy had much experience when they took office, and I think they did quite well. Compare them with Nixon, Clinton, Bush, or Johnson, who had plenty of experience but were quite lacking in character.

20080602-01	12:05	SteveB	2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton, Bill Clinton in Stevensville, MT
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

The low, dark clouds were hemmed in by the mountains on both sides as a crowd gathered in Stevensville, MT, to hear Bill Clinton tell people why they should vote for his wife's Presidential candidacy, even though she had already lost the race, by the Democrat's own rules, rules she had agreed to at the beginning. This is akin to telling everyone that there is still tons of gold up in these mountains where it was mined-out a century ago and everyone knows it

I had read about the event—call it a political rally—a couple of days previously, and saw it as my golden opportunity...just what I had been hoping for.

Stevensville is only about 20 miles from where we live, just down the Bitterroot Valley. It is actually the first white community founded in Montana (18xx). The population is listed at just 1000, but I heard crowd estimates of 500 and 2000, so many of the ranchers, etc. from the surrounding valley and communities, like me, had decided to risk the cold Montana rain to see the only past, present, or future President ever to visit the little town. Most were ardent or semi-ardent Hillary supporters, though I did see an old truck with prominent Obama signage. I was surprised that security was so lax. There were no metal detectors or pat-downs, but I guess they were searching bags, etc. One cop was announcing loudly that "atomic bombs are not allowed." I hope they do a better job for Obama.

During the time that I heard Slick Willie with his red face (from embarrassment?) ramble on in his hoarse southern drawl, I was the only heckler. I had no actually heckling experience before this, but it ain't that hard. I don't know if anyone took over the job after I left—I kinda hope so—but heckle the b*stard, I did!

I got to yell, "You were disbarred and impeached for lying!" I was there to inquire, "How's Monica?" I wanted to include Jennifer, Paula, and Kathleen, but you only have a few moments between sentences blasted through the PA to get your words heard. To this last, Bill actually replied. "Don't pay any attention to him."

When he talked about how Hillary was the most qualified candidate and had actually won the popular vote, I yelled, "What about the rules?"

I think my best shot was, "You cheated on your wife. Why should we believe you?" By then, I was getting booted by the crowd, but I had expected that. To me, this meant that I was being heard above the crowd noise. Isn't true communication sweet?

An older woman standing next to me admonished, "Don't do that!" So I got to ask her, "But what about the truth?" She answered, "It's not about that, it's about respect." To which I got to reply, "It's always about the truth, lady. I have no respect for any President who looks the American people in the eyes and lies to them, be it Nixon, Bush, or Clinton!"

I didn't think there would be a question and answer period, and though I was hoping to hurl one last zinger at Bill when he walked by, I wasn't positioned for any direct confrontation, though I would have relished one. I had heard enough of Bill's BS lies. It was time for me to go.

So I didn't get to ask why the Clintons think it's fair for the Florida and Michigan primaries to count, even though Hillary agreed that they wouldn't, and was the only person on the ballot in Michigan. Why do they think they can change the rules just because they have lost?

I didn't get to shout, "What about Hillary's Bosnian sniper lies?" or "What about Hillary's Kennedy assassination comments and subsequent lame-*ss apology?" or "What experience?" or "Hillary has more unbridled ambition than vast experience as she claims!" or "You stink-up our entire state!" I guess one can only do so much.

I only hope I made Bill's life a little less pleasant and his face a little redder. I hope that, at every Clinton rally, at least one person stands up, tells, and demands the truth. The simple truth. Something the Clintons have proven they have absolutely no respect for.

[But they sure have a lot more respect for the truth than most Republicans.]

20080605-01	14:58	SteveB	"Five Reasons Why Clinton Lost"
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------

"Five Reasons Why Clinton Lost" Newsweek

June 5, 2008, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/2008/06/04/let-the-second-guessing-begin.html>)

1. No Respect for the Voters

The flipside of Obama's respect for voters was Clinton's disrespect. It began with her announcement of her candidacy in early 2007, when she said she was "in it to win it."

Why else would someone run? The not-so-secret assumption behind her entire campaign was that she was the inevitable nominee. But voters don't like to be told how they will vote by politicians (or pundits). It's disrespectful. And primary voters, particularly the well-educated ones who helped power Obama's campaign, don't like to be pandered to, on the gas tax or anything else. Well-informed, college-educated voters are no longer a sliver of arugula-eating elites; they are the backbone of the Democratic Party. Most of all, voters don't like to be played for fools. When Clinton ran ads in South Carolina claiming that Obama admired Ronald Reagan and must be some crypto-conservative, she wasn't just wasting her money. She was offending people in a state that proved pivotal.

The main reason South Carolina was so important, of course, was that it marked the total loss of the black vote for Clinton. Early on, she was expected to split African-American women 50-50 with Obama. This was rightly seen as critical to her success. A series of comments by Bill Clinton about Obama (starting with his inaccurate depiction of Obama's Iraq war opposition as a "fairy tale") weren't racist, but they were disrespectful to Obama, especially coming from a former president, and thus disrespectful to voters who supported him, especially blacks. While Bill was also a huge asset to Hillary, especially in later primaries where he won her lots of rural votes, the defection of 90 percent of African-American voters to Obama presented the Clinton campaign with an insurmountable problem.

2. Poor Strategy

Clinton's failure to organize in the caucus states will go down as one of the worst tactical decisions in modern political history. But it was only part of a larger strategic error. The campaign was based on the idea that Obama would be eliminated on Super Tuesday. This might have made sense in 2006, when she was first planning her run. But by early 2007 it was clear that Obama would actually outraise Clinton, with the Internet as an inexhaustible supply of small donations. This meant that the traditional reason that candidates drop out—lack of funds—wouldn't apply to Obama in 2008. Clinton had plenty of time to recognize this reality and design a plan B for what would happen if she didn't wipe Obama out early. But even the most elementary planning for contingencies—like filing delegate slates in post-Super Tuesday states—was neglected.

By some accounts, Clinton would have been better off skipping the Iowa caucuses, which Obama won big. But this wouldn't have worked for her any better than it did for Rudy Giuliani. She might have helped herself there, however, had she avoided harsh Christmastime attacks on Obama in a state that is famous for punishing candidates who aren't nice.

A more supple strategy would have also led to adjustment of Clinton's message. Had she switched from inevitable and experienced to working-girl-tribune-of-the-forgotten-middle-class on Feb. 1 instead of Apr. 1, she might have won the nomination.

3. Weak Management

The failed strategy is the product of having the wrong people in charge. Mark Penn, the chief strategist, wrote a book in which he describes the country as a series of tiny distinct constituencies—exactly the wrong analysis in a year when the public has a thirst for unity and commonality. As a veteran of President Clinton's 1996 re-election campaign, he naturally and fatally used the old game plan, positioning Hillary as a cautious quasi-incumbent who couldn't possibly be seen as admitting error on her Iraq vote because that might weaken her in a general election. And a pollster in charge of a campaign is always a bad idea.

Patti Solis Doyle, the campaign manager, was in over her head, and communications director Howard Wolfson convinced himself that being rude to reporters (or complaining to their bosses) would somehow improve the tone of the coverage. His subordinates followed this approach to press relations, sometimes verbally abusing TV bookers and others in the media. The problem with "working the refs" (a basketball term for riding referees in hopes of a good call later on) is that, while it can sometimes succeed in the short term, it's always a long-term loser. Reporters wait in the weeds.

Clinton is responsible for personnel decisions; her poor judgment of people, overemphasis on loyalty and testy reaction to anyone delivering bad news made her slow to recognize the need for a management shakeup. On the morning after Ronald Reagan won the New Hampshire primary in 1980, he fired his campaign manager, John Sears, who was responsible for his loss in the Iowa caucuses and for a lot of bad blood with supporters. Had Clinton done the same after her New Hampshire win, she might have stabilized earlier.

4. Arrogance

The reason Clinton didn't adjust more quickly, alienated many potential donors, antagonized the press and had so much trouble winning over uncommitted superdelegates, is that from start to finish her campaign gave off a distinct whiff of arrogance. Campaign staffers, internalizing that victory was inevitable, felt that Clinton's stature in the party gave them license to play rough with anyone who wouldn't come along. So early on donors coughed up money, superdelegates pledged their support, and media outlets bought into meaningless national polls showing her way ahead, but few were happy about it. Unlike the diehard Clinton lovers, they felt intimidated. So later, when she desperately needed their support, they weren't there for her.

5. Entitlement

While Hillary turned out to be a much stronger candidate as time went on, one thing never changed: the sense that the Clintons felt they were owed the nomination. By repeatedly moving the goal posts on party rules, sideswiping Obama at every turn, whining about rampant sexism on the basis of two or three anecdotes, and claiming that the Florida primary resembled the 2000 fiasco and a rigged Zimbabwe election, Clinton continued to reinforce the impression that she considered the title hers no matter what. Her reported plan to concede this Saturday will have to be carried off with extreme graciousness—and no apparent demands being made in return—if she wants to lessen the sour impression she has left in many voters' minds.

Both Clintons were so far inside their own narcissistic bubble that longtime friends didn't dare tell her to quit in recent weeks because they knew she would never speak to them again. Hillary was surprised on the day after the last primary that even her most ardent supporters weren't standing by her anymore. This was a mark of the sense of entitlement that corroded her support among Democrats and helped seal her fate.

20080605-02	12:39	David	"How We Haven't Seen the Back of the Clintons Yet"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

"On How We Haven't Seen the Back of the Clintons Yet" by Christopher Hitchens, London Mirror

May 6, 2008, (<http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/topstories/2008/06/05/christopher-hitchens-on-how-we-haven-t-seenthe-back-of-the-clintons-yet-89520-20595523/>)

I have detested the Clintons ever since I covered the New Hampshire primary in 1992. The man I saw was not the silver-tongued charmer who seems to have bewitched so many people.

Up close, he seemed like a red-cheeked, piggy-eyed bully with a mean streak a mile wide.

And when he lied — which he more or less did for a living — he had a hard-faced little spouse to step into the TV studios to cover up for him.

This woman put up with A LOT from Bill over the years but could always tell herself it was worth it because in the long run the experience would give her the presidency she so obviously deserved.

Over the years I watched this gruesome drama — the Clintons using and abusing the democratic process as marital therapy — until, the morning after this year's Iowa caucuses, it finally seemed to be over.

A good friend of mine wrote an exultant article saying Barack Obama had done us the huge favour of moving America into a "post-Clinton" era.

No more would the happy couple be able to inflict themselves on us. We were free from Lanny Davis and Harold Ickes and Howard Wolfson and Hillary's ghastly brothers and all the easy money riff-raff who had benefited from Clinton's last minute pardons.

As I read it I was hit with the queasy realisation I didn't believe a word of it. My friend Congressman Steve Cohen was forced to apologise the other day for comparing the former First Lady to Glenn Close rising from the bathtub in Fatal Attraction.

It's actually been more like a movie about an unkillable swamp creature or lagoon dweller.

And the morning after the last two primaries Lanny Davis was circulating a petition in the Democratic party to attach her to the Obama ticket.

"Good grief," I found myself muttering. "Is there no end to this woman and her overweening ambition?"

Well, THAT was a dumb question and no mistake.

Her performance in New York on Tuesday night was positively flabbergasting. Having won South Dakota, she congratulated that state on having "the last word" — while Montana's results were still being counted.

She congratulated Mr. Obama all right but not for having won by securing the majority of delegates.

She let it be known that she would accept the vice presidential nomination without ceasing to count herself a candidate for the Presidential one.

And she demanded — wait for it — "respect" for the 18 million people who had voted for her. In other words, unless she gets a great deal of care and feeding and pampering, 18 million Americans will have been dissed.

The nerve. The nerve is really quite something.

In Washington yesterday, at the same pro-Israel podium at which Mr. Obama spoke earlier, Mrs. Clinton spoke of the man who has unprecedentedly won the nomination as if he was just another Senator, like her, just another friend of Israel, like her.

There was a time one might have expected a Jewish audience to be asked to applaud the choice of the first black American nominee but Mrs. Clinton couldn't find it in herself to be quite that gracious.

Indeed, if any one thing has exposed the hollowness and rottenness of the Clintons it is the almost casual way they have ignored their old black friends and allies to pursue a Clintonian version of a white backlash "southern strategy". Nothing is excluded if it serves the cause of the great entitlement.

From 16 years of polemics against this dynasty, I had acquired a huge shelf of anti-Clinton books and even written one myself in an effort to get the poison out of my system. For about 10 seconds after Iowa I thought of tossing them out. But now I think I'll have to hold on to my arsenal. I shall be needing it again.

Perhaps it's a Jaws-type movie I'm trying to think of. Like a Great White Shark, Mrs. Clinton will never stop her relentless predations until the very end.

20080605-03	13:05	SteveB	Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton, John McCain
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear David,

Yep! They are the slimiest pair of trailer-trash to come down the pike in a long, long time. I am just constantly amazed that more people don't recognize them for the lying pieces of cr*p that they are.

Hopefully, Obama will. If Hillary makes it to the ticket, he has lost my vote.

McCain I don't trust (Is he pro-choice or pro-life? Anti-illegal immigration or not? Oh great, pro-warwarwar!), and he is so fricking old I'm not sure he's even going to make it to November. And this is the best the Republicans can do?

20080605-04 13:10 SteveM Re: 2008 Primaries; Hillary Clinton, John McCain

Dear SteveB,

Your point? [Hitchens piece. —SteveB]

Did you expect anything else from Hillary? It ain't over UNTIL SHE says it's Over!

Woo Hoo I can't get enough of this street fight! LOL! I hope keeps going until Inaugural Day , like Gore. And one can only hope this splits the party into several smaller, less annoying groups, that present less of a threat to my wallet and national security.

And when McCain wins in a land slide, let's hope the liberal press knows where to place the blame for the loss, and not in racism. Though that may also be to much to ask for! Since I'm sure Bill and Hillary will be the first to raise the issue in an "I told you so moment".

Flame suit on!

20080605-05 14:29 SteveB Re: John McCain Can't Win

Dear SteveM,

I really don't think that nearly-senile, can-hardly-walk old fart stands a chance in hell! That's my prediction. It's amazing to me that he's the best the Republicans can come-up with. Any black or woman off the street could beat him. He does one stupid thing after another. Truth.

20080605-06 15:03 SteveM Re: John McCain (defense)

Dear SteveB,

Why the hateful, personal attack on McCain? He can hardly walk or raise his arms above his shoulders due to the beatings he took at the hands of the communists. Next are you going to kick the crutches out from under a cripple?

Besides I would think that you would identify with his moderate to liberal social views. Along with his push for change for the last 25 years, long before BHO got a clue. No Steve, McCain would not be my first choice, but I wouldn't attack a man's age, handicaps or injury's, just his views and policies and those that would influence them! As stated before I'll dance with the devil that I do know, and in this case the lesser of the evils.

Mark my words now the Dem's are going to split and many will either not vote or vote for McCain out of spit AND your liberal media friends will cry racism was the cause not the Clintons.

I'll wager a coke on it! you on?

20080605-07 19:04 SteveB Re: John McCain, Energy

Dear SteveM,

You're on, hot dog! McCain is an old fart and I don't care what made him old. War "hero" was not something he chose or that shows his merits. He was just shot-down and held prisoner for heaven's sake. I don't see exactly how being a prisoner makes one a hero. Better to fight and avoid being a prisoner, right? His fake smile seems senile too. I don't trust him to change anything, especially with his coterie of lobbyists.

No war monger will be elected this year! Mark my words. I like Obama's ideas about actually going after Bin Laden and being more effective in Afghanistan. And what's wrong with talking to people on your terms? It can't make us weaker...only stronger.

Important: McCain's not consistently pro-choice, nor does he take a strong stand against illegal immigration. He sponsored a bill to give them amnesty. The government has no business telling anyone what they can do with their own bodies, least of all pregnant women in a world with too many people.

By the way, on our ongoing energy conversation...98% of our lead comes from recycled batteries, so that seems to be going pretty well. Also, big power plants can eliminate CO₂ and other bad waste products pretty effectively. Internal (or even external) combustion engines can't, unless they burn hydrogen, and having been witness and nearly caught up in a horrendous industrial hydrogen explosion, I'm not sure people can safely handle it. Electric cars are much simpler and will ultimately be just as cheap and perform as well as conventional cars. Sorry Teamsters, big trucks need to be eliminated as much as possible in favor of electric trains. I hope there will always be a place for motorcycles...they and chemicals are good reasons for preserving oil for those uses.

20080606-01	13:47	Mark	Fw: "Obama Explains National Anthem Stance" Debunked
-------------	-------	------	--

[Source of original email unknown. Totally debunked by Snopes.com: <http://www.snopes.com/politics/obama/stance.asp>. If this isn't disgusting, then I don't know what is!!!! —SteveB]

"Obama Explains National Anthem Stance" (Mar. 22, 2008)

(<http://policelink.monster.com/topics/15571-obama-explains-the-national-anthem/posts>)

If this isn't disgusting, then I don't know what is!!!! To give this kind of an explanation tells me he thinks most Americans can't read, see, or comprehend what this man is about... The comment really nails it!

"LTG Bill Ginn" U.S.A.F. ret forwarded:

Hot on the heels of his explanation for why he no longer wears a flag pin, presidential candidate Senator Barack Obama was forced to explain why he doesn't follow protocol when the National Anthem is played.

According to the United States Code, Title 36, Chapter 10, Sec. 171, During rendition of the national anthem when the flag is displayed, all present except those in uniform are expected to stand at attention facing the flag with the right hand over the heart.

"As I've said about the flag pin, I don't want to be perceived as taking sides,"

Obama said. "There are a lot of people in the world to whom the American flag is a symbol of oppression. And the anthem itself conveys a war-like message. You know, the bombs bursting in air and all. It should be swapped for something less parochial and less bellicose. I like the song 'I'd Like to Teach the World to Sing.' If that were our anthem, then I might salute it."

"I don't think my church is actually particularly controversial." - Barack Obama.

If someone had told me 64 years ago, as I was roaring down the runway in the most beautiful airplane in the world, that I would see our country subjected to one of the most disgusting Presidential elections imaginable, I would have told them they were crazy as hell.... What in the world have we come to? And, Obama wants to be the leader of the American Military!!

"Obama and McCain" by Thomas Sowell, TownHall

June 5, 2008, (http://townhall.com/columnists/thomassowell/2008/06/05/obama_and_mccain/page/full/)

Now that the two parties have finally selected their presidential candidates, it is time for a sober—if not grim—assessment of where we are.

Not since 1972 have we been presented with two such painfully inadequate candidates. When election day came that year, I could not bring myself to vote for either George McGovern or Richard Nixon. I stayed home.

This year, none of us has that luxury. While all sorts of gushing is going on in the media, and posturing is going on in politics, the biggest national sponsor of terrorism in the world—Iran—is moving step by step toward building a nuclear bomb.

The point when they get that bomb will be the point of no return. Iran's nuclear bomb will be the terrorists' nuclear bomb—and they can make 9/11 look like child's play. All the options that are on the table right now will be swept off the table forever. Our choices will be to give in to whatever the terrorists demand—however outrageous those demands might be—or to risk seeing American cities start disappearing in radioactive mushroom clouds. All the things we are preoccupied with today, from the price of gasoline to health care to global warming, will suddenly no longer matter.

Just as the Nazis did not find it enough to simply kill people in their concentration camps, but had to humiliate and dehumanize them first, so we can expect terrorists with nuclear weapons to both humiliate us and force us to humiliate ourselves, before they finally start killing us. They have already telegraphed their punches with their sadistic beheadings of innocent civilians, and with the popularity of videotapes of those beheadings in the Middle East. They have already telegraphed their intention to dictate to us with such things as Osama bin Laden's threats to target those places in America that did not vote the way he prescribed in the 2004 elections. He could not back up those threats then, but he may be able to in a very few years.

The terrorists have given us as clear a picture of what they are all about as Adolf Hitler and the Nazis did during the 1930's—and our "leaders" and intelligentsia have ignored the warning signs as resolutely as the "leaders" and intelligentsia of the 1930s downplayed the dangers of Hitler. We are much like people drifting down the Niagara River, oblivious to the waterfalls up ahead. Once we go over those falls, we cannot come back up again.

What does this have to do with today's presidential candidates? It has everything to do with them. One of these candidates will determine what we are going to do to stop Iran from going nuclear—or whether we are going to do anything other than talk, as Western leaders talked in the 1930's.

There is one big difference between now and the 1930's. Although the West's lack of military preparedness and its political irresolution led to three solid years of devastating losses to Nazi Germany and imperial Japan, nevertheless when all the West's industrial and military forces were finally mobilized, the democracies were able to turn the tide and win decisively.

But you cannot lose a nuclear war for three years and then come back. You cannot even sustain the will to resist for three years when you are first broken down morally by threats and then devastated by nuclear bombs. Our one window of opportunity to prevent this will occur within the term of whoever becomes President of the United States next January.

At a time like this, we do not have the luxury of waiting for our ideal candidate or of indulging our emotions by voting for some third party candidate to show our displeasure—at the cost of putting someone in the White House who is not up to the job. Senator John McCain has been criticized in this column many times. But, when all is said and done, Senator McCain has not spent decades aiding and abetting people who hate America. On the contrary, he has paid a huge price for resisting our enemies, even when they held him prisoner and tortured him. The choice between him and Barack Obama should be a no-brainer.

Copyright © 2008 Salem Web Network

"Any man who is under 30, and is not a liberal, has no heart; any man who is over 30, and is not a conservative, has no brains." ...Sir Winston Churchill

"The Comeback Id" by Todd S. Purdum, Vanity Fair

July, 2008, (<http://www.vanityfair.com/politics/features/2008/07/clinton200807>)

(Old friends and longtime aides are wringing their hands over Bill Clinton's post—White House escapades, from the dubious (and secretive) business associations to the media blowups that have bruised his wife's campaign, to the private-jetting around with a skirt-chasing, scandal-tinged posse. Some point to Clinton's medical traumas; others blame sheer selfishness and the absence of anyone who can say "no." Exploring Clintonworld, the author asks if the former president will be consumed by his own worst self.)

It was a wedding straight out of Sex and the City: a rehearsal dinner looking out over the Eiffel Tower from the Trocadero, a garden ceremony and dancing reception in a grand chateau outside Paris, topped off by a private fireworks display. The groom was a thirtysomething American lawyer with friends in high places, the bride a dark-eyed designer with social sheen, and the guest list a mix of family and what Noël Coward once called Nescafé Society.

But the real cynosure of the occasion last August was the smiling, snowy-haired man who is the bride at every wedding and the corpse at every funeral he attends, the 42nd president of the United States, Bill Clinton. He had come to the City of Light with the motley crew that constitutes some of the postpresidential rat pack to celebrate the marriage of Douglas Band, the man who for the last decade has been his personal aide, gatekeeper, enforcer, and—more recently—counselor in the multifarious business, philanthropic, and political dealings that keep Clinton restlessly circling the globe.

Also in attendance was Ron Burkle, the California supermarket billionaire and investor who is Clinton's bachelor buddy, fund-raiser, and business partner. Burkle had come with an attractive blonde, described by a fellow guest as "not much older than 19, if she was that."

Burkle's usual means of transport is the custom-converted Boeing 757 that Clinton calls "Ron Air" and that Burkle's own circle of young aides privately refer to as "Air F*ck One." Clinton himself had arrived on the private plane of another California friend, the real-estate heir, Democratic donor, liberal activist, and sometime movie and music producer Steve Bing, whose colorful private life includes fathering a child out of wedlock with the actress Elizabeth Hurley and suing the billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian for invasion of privacy, alleging that private investigators for Kerkorian swiped Bing's dental floss out of his trash in a successful effort to prove that Bing's DNA matched that of a child delivered by Kerkorian's ex-wife, the former tennis pro Lisa Bonder. (The suit was later settled out of court.)

In fairness, it should be said that Clinton's entourage that weekend also included his daughter, Chelsea, and her boyfriend, Marc Mezvinsky, and no one who was there has adduced the slightest evidence that Clinton's behavior was anything other than proper. Nor, indeed, is there any proof of post-presidential sexual indiscretions on Clinton's part, despite a steady stream of tabloid speculation and Internet intimations that the Big Dog might be up to his old tricks. On any given visit to London, for example, Clinton is as apt to dine with Tony Blair or Kevin Spacey as with anyone who might raise an eyebrow. Todd S. Purdum takes the measure of America's leading political figures, from George W. Bush and John McCain to Bill Clinton and Barack Obama. Read a compendium of stories from Vanity Fair's national editor.

But among the not-so-small cadre of Clinton friends and former aides, concern about the company the boss keeps is persistent, palpable, and pained. No former president of the United States has ever traveled with such a fast crowd, and most 61-year-old American men of Clinton's generation don't, either. "I just think those guys are radioactive," one former aide to Clinton who is still in occasional affectionate touch with him told me recently, referring to Burkle and (to a lesser extent) Bing. "I stay far away from them."

Another former aide, trusted by Clinton for his good judgment, said, "On the sort of money, women, all that stuff ... I'm the bad guy. All this stuff is kept away from me. Whatever they're doing, they definitely view me as somebody you cannot confide in."

A longtime Clinton-watcher, who has had ties to the former president since his first campaign for governor of Arkansas, said of Clinton's sometimes questionable associations, "I don't know what to make of any of that, if it's a voyeuristic experience, or if he's participating in it."

Yet another long-serving Clinton aide said simply, "If you figure it out, would you let me know?" Bill Clinton's relevance—and his presence in public life—is as close to permanent as any politician's can be. Before touching off a string of controversies in his wife's campaign this year, he was among the most popular figures on the planet, one of only three Democratic presidents in the 20th century to serve two full terms. His looming presence will make him a factor in the Democratic vice-presidential sweepstakes, the fall campaign, and every future presidential election of his lifetime, whatever his wife's fate.

I have covered Clinton on and off for 16 years, since his 1992 presidential campaign. I first really met him on New Year's Eve 1994, when he shook my hand on the beach at Hilton Head Island, South Carolina, and let his eyes travel ever so subtly to the newly issued White House press pass hanging around my neck, so that he could know to say, "I'm glad you're here, Todd." As a White House correspondent for The New York Times for more than two years, I spent some part of almost every day watching, thinking about, worrying about, or writing about Clinton and his never-a-dull-moment presidency. I found it hard not to admire his roving intellect, his protean political talents, his outsize personality, and the tactical skill with which he eventually confronted the Republican congressional majority that bedeviled so much of his tenure. Clinton had no use for the string of pure and noble losers that had come to define the Democratic Party's presidential prospects for so long. He wanted to win, and he knew how. (I should add, by way of disclosure, that my wife, Dee Dee Myers, was Clinton's first press secretary. They have not been in regular contact since she left the White House, and she has not been a source for this article.)

To know Clinton is, sooner or later, to be exasperated by his indiscipline and disappointed by his shortcomings. But through it all, it has been easy enough to retain an enduring admiration—even affection—for a president whose sins against decorum and the dignity of his office seemed venial in contrast to the systemic indifference, incompetence, corruption, and constitutional predations of his successor's administration. That is, easy enough until now.

This winter, as Clinton moved with seeming abandon to stain his wife's presidential campaign in the name of saving it, as disclosures about his dubious associates piled up, as his refusal to disclose the names of donors to his presidential library and foundation and his and his wife's reluctance to release their income-tax returns created crippling and completely avoidable distractions for Hillary Clinton's own long-suffering ambition, I found myself asking again and again, What's the matter with him?

As I sought to answer that question for myself, in conversations with dozens of current and onetime Clinton aides, many of whom I have known all these years (Clinton himself declined to be interviewed), I realized just how much about the former president is not known, and not knowable, at the moment, mostly because of his unapologetic stonewalling. Virtually no one, except Ron Burkle, knows just what Clinton put into Burkle's investment business, or just what he has done since to earn millions of dollars, with the prospect of reaping millions more. Most of the names of the donors who have contributed some $500 million to Clinton's library and foundation over the past decade are not known, either.

Virtually no one, except his doctors and family, knows the precise state of Clinton's health. Virtually no one really knows what strategic role he has played in his wife's campaign.

A Cavernous Narcissism

So what can be known, or fairly inferred, from the available record?

There is reason to believe that Clinton, who never made more than $35,000 a year as governor of Arkansas and left the White House about $12 million in debt, has had his head turned by his ability to enjoy his post-presidential status; that the world of rich friends, adoring fans, and borrowed jets in which he travels has skewed his judgment or, at a minimum, created uncomfortable appearances of impropriety. There is ample evidence that his eight-year absence from a political workplace that has changed radically in the interim has left him conspicuously rusty at the craft of which he was once a master. There are those friends who worry that Clinton has never been the same since his quadruple bypass surgery, in 2004, and the unexpected follow-up operation six months later to remove accumulated scar tissue on his lung.

"There's an anger in him that I find surprising," one senior aide, who has known and served both Clintons for years, told me this spring. "There seems to be an abiding anger in him, and not just the summer thunderstorms of old. He has been called into question repeatedly by top staff. The fact is, you can only weigh in so often on this stuff. It's just a huge force of nature."

It may well have been Clinton's displaced anger (at the media, the Obama campaign, or both) on his wife's behalf that led to his charged performance in the South Carolina primary, where he campaigned extensively against the wishes of Hillary's high command in the mistaken belief that he could help her among black voters. He not only failed to do so but damaged his own relations with many prominent blacks, just as black voters were flocking to Barack Obama for the first time in large numbers. Hillary's campaign was arguably never the same again.

It is also possible that all these influences have combined to make the cavernous narcissism that has always driven Clinton, for better and worse, at last consume the man almost completely. It was Clinton's political genius to position the Democratic Party, for the first time in a generation, as the champion of those who "work hard and play by the rules." In his own life, he has always followed only the first half of that dictum, and has never been fastidious about appearances, in ways charming and not. At a private meeting in New York City in 1992, aids activists, who were lobbying Clinton to include a speaker with aids at the Democratic convention that summer, presented him with a big batch of condoms, and a participant told me at the time that Clinton instantly replied, "My staff thinks this is the last thing I need." Less amusingly, in the run-up to the 1996 re-election campaign, when Clinton took one of his many fund-raising trips to California, I teasingly asked his press secretary, Mike McCurry, whether the president intended to go jogging with Eleanor Mondale, the daughter of the former vice president—as he had on a previous trip—after he was spotted with her (and Barbra Streisand) in the wee hours of the morning. The next day, as we boarded the plane at Andrews Air Force Base en route to Los Angeles, McCurry, whose effectiveness as Clinton's spokesman was aided by the fact that he never fell in love with him, sidled up to me and told me that he had passed my question on to the president, and that Clinton had responded, in vivid terms he knew I could not print, that I should not confuse exercise with extracurricular activity.

Only much later would the world learn that no less an informed observer than Monica Lewinsky, whose judgment, in hindsight, has often seemed sounder than the president's, had taken note of Mondale's presence at his side. According to Andrew Morton's authorized account Monica's Story, Lewinsky flew into a swivet when she was once stopped at the White House gate on her way to a hoped-for meeting to deliver Christmas gifts to the president. While waiting, she learned that Mondale was with him in the White House.

"Do you think I would be stupid enough to go running with someone I was foolin' with?," Clinton later asked Lewinsky. Without missing a beat, she replied, "Do you want me to answer that?"

The "Butt Boy"

By most accounts, including his own, Clinton struggled to find his footing in the early days of his postpresidency. "I was lost for three weeks after I left the White House," he said on the campaign trail this winter. "Nobody ever played a song anymore. I had no idea where I was." He had ended his administration in a firestorm of criticism over his eleventh-hour pardon of a raft of assorted miscreants, including the fugitive financier Marc Rich, whose ex-wife, Denise, contributed $450,000 to Clinton's presidential-library fund, approximately $1 million to Democratic causes, including $70,000 to a fund supporting Hillary Clinton's Senate campaign, and $7,000 worth of furniture for the Clintons' new home in Chappaqua, in suburban Westchester County.

"When he first started transitioning, it was hard," one former longtime aide told me. "But then he said to me, 'I've always been a guy who could bloom where I was planted.' I've been impressed by how truly happy he's been as an ex-president. He's much more focused than I would ever think he would be." Soon enough, Clinton was busy with plans for his library, and for the foundation that would not only build it but would undertake philanthropic and policy projects around the world; with paid speeches at $150,000 to $250,000 apiece; and with the writing of what would become his best-selling memoir, My Life, published in 2004. Deeply in debt with Whitewater- and impeachment-related legal bills, he set about earning an income that would "support a senator," as he put it. He more than succeeded. This spring, when the Clintons—under intense pressure from Barack Obama and the news media—at last released their income-tax returns for the years since they left the White House, the total haul amounted to a staggering $109 million. Included in that total, besides Hillary Clinton's Senate salary and Bill Clinton's presidential pension, were $10 million in book income for Hillary and $29 million in book income for Bill, along with $51 million in speaking fees for the former president.

The command center for Bill Clinton Inc. is the former president's penthouse office on 125th Street, in Harlem, and the go-to guy in the operation is a figure barely known to the public but a center of controversy in Clintonworld: Doug Band. Band, 35, joined the White House as an intern in the counsel's office in 1995 and by the end of the administration was the president's personal aide, or "butt boy," the person responsible for making sure the president wakes up on time in the morning and stays on schedule during the day, and for peering around the corner of the president's existence 24-7, at home and on the road, to make sure he has everything he needs (lunch, tie, speech, hat, golf clubs, a handy bathroom) and avoids everything unnecessary, unwanted, and undesirable (you get the drift). Band was the fourth young person to hold that job in Clinton's White House tenure, and he holds some vestigial elements of it but has also moved far beyond. In Clinton's post-presidential years, Band, who earned a master's and a law degree by studying nights at Georgetown, has expanded his duties. His official title is "counselor," and Clinton credits him with helping to conceive the Clinton Global Initiative, the annual conference on venture philanthropy that brings together movers and shakers from the worlds of business, charity, and academia to tackle problems ranging from poverty to climate change.

Band can be brusque and aggressive for a person whose job it is not to be noticed. In 2001, when I wrote about Chelsea Clinton's graduation from Stanford for The New York Times and noted that a number of former White House staffers, including Band's predecessor, Kris Engskov, a bright young Arkansan, were on hand in Palo Alto to help out with logistics, I got a call the next morning from Band, curtly reminding me that he, not Engskov, was now the man who managed the former president's cell phone.

Last fall, Band fired off a stern letter to Nino Selimaj, owner of the Osso Buco restaurant, on University Place in Manhattan, demanding that a photograph of Selimaj with Chelsea Clinton that had hung in the restaurant's window for five years (in the time-honored tradition of publicizing celebrity patronage, but to Chelsea's apparent annoyance) be taken down forthwith. "Ms. Clinton, a private citizen, was not consulted prior to this picture being displayed, and thus, her permission was not given for you to do so," Band wrote. Selimaj, a Hillary Clinton supporter, was crushed but left the picture up until this April when he removed it to make room for a new batch of photos.

A former Clinton aide acknowledged, "He's a real point of animus from Hillaryland." In 2004, Maggie Williams, Hillary Clinton's former White House chief of staff, who had gone on to help establish Clinton's foundation as his post-presidential chief of staff, left her job after two and a half years at least partly, she told friends, because Band rubbed too many people the wrong way, perhaps unintentionally, and made too much work for her. Williams, who took over Hillary Clinton's struggling campaign in a staff shake-up this spring, has told intimates that while Band is not one of her favorites she had other, more personal, reasons for moving on. But one of Williams's former colleagues and friends told me, "Maggie said, 'That's it. I'm done,' because Doug does not show good judgment all the time."

A range of Clinton loyalists complain privately that Band does not keep Clinton away from people like Burkle and Bing, who attended Band's wedding to Lily Rafii, a glamorous designer of high-end handbags, belts, and other accessories.

A Classic Clinton Vacuum

The most pointed criticism of Band is precisely this: that he does not possess what Clinton has always needed in a string of strong-willed aides, such as his gubernatorial chief of staff Betsey Wright, or his director of Oval Office operations, Nancy Hernreich—the judgment to save him from himself. The origins of such criticism may lie in the fact that one of his predecessors as personal aide, Stephen Goodin, was cited, together with Hernreich, in the Starr Report as having tried to keep Monica Lewinsky away from the president, while Band, then only an intern, escorted her to a White House party, at her request.

"It's a classic Clinton vacuum, in my opinion," one former aide told me, referring to the inability of Band—or perhaps anyone—to monitor the company Clinton keeps. "He surrounds himself with people sometimes who are really good or really bad, and there's rarely any in-between."

Band's supporters among Clinton's longtime circle say most of the criticism means he is doing his job. "In my experience, he's pretty good at protecting a guy who, you know, everybody wants to grab his sleeve," former Clinton chief of staff John Podesta told me. "He pushes back hard." Even some who do not always admire his hard-charging style say he kept conscientious, worried vigil during Clinton's 2004 heart surgery and that Hillary relied on him greatly.

Band's defenders say that complaints about his judgment are misplaced, and are really complaints about Clinton's judgment. Band himself declined to be interviewed. But someone who knows him well said that he was sure Band was unhappy and surprised by the presence of Burkle's young date at his wedding, and that to the degree that Band has ruffled feathers or made enemies by saying "no" to various supplicants, friends, and favor seekers who believe Clinton should acquiesce to them, he has done so with the president's and his family's best interests at heart.

Over the last few years, aides have winced at repeated tabloid reports about Clinton's episodic friendship and occasional dinners out with Belinda Stronach, a twice-divorced billionaire auto-parts heiress and member of the Canadian Parliament 20 years his junior, or at more recent high-end Hollywood dinner-party gossip that Clinton has been seen visiting with the actress Gina Gershon in California. There has been talk of a female friend in Chappaqua, a woman in a bar at a meeting of the Aspen Institute, and a public sighting of Clinton, Bing, and a ravishing entourage in a New York elevator that, a former Clinton aide told me, led a business leader who saw them to say: I don't know what the guy was doing, but it was so clear that it was just no good.

None of these wisps of smoke have produced a public fire. But four former Clinton aides told me that, about 18 months ago, one of the president's former assistants, who still advises him on political matters, had heard so many complaints about such reports from Clinton supporters around the country that he felt compelled to try to conduct what one of these aides called an "intervention," because, the aide believed, "Clinton was apparently seeing a lot of women on the road." The would-be intercessor was rebuffed by people around Clinton before ever getting an audience with the former president, and another aide told me that the effort was not well received by either Bill or Hillary Clinton and that some Hillarylanders, in particular, were in denial about the continuing political risks that Bill's behavior might pose.

The sensitivity among Clinton's staff to these questions is such that, after I posed some queries about Clinton's relationship with Burkle and Co., a spokesman, Jay Carson, e-mailed me this comment: "The ills of the Democratic Party can be seen perfectly in the willingness of fellow Democrats to say bad things about President Clinton. If you ask any Republican about Reagan they will say he still makes the sun rise in the morning, but if you ask Democrats about their only two-term president in 80 years, a man who took the party from the wilderness of loserdom to the White House and created the strongest economy in American history, they'd rather be quoted saying what a reporter wants to hear than protect a strong brand for the party. Republicans look at this behavior and laugh at us."

Whatever the facts of Clinton's personal life, it is beyond dispute that he has associated with some decidedly unpresidential company. In 2002, Clinton flew to Africa with the New York investor Jeffrey Epstein on his private Boeing 727 on an anti-aids and economic-development mission. (Others on the mission included Kevin Spacey and the comedian Chris Tucker.) In 2006, Epstein was indicted on state charges of soliciting prostitution in Palm Beach, Florida, and he later came under investigation by federal authorities amid allegations that he hired under-age girls for massages and more in a house stocked with sex toys and genitalia-shaped soaps. He remains the subject of at least four pending civil lawsuits from young women and is reportedly expected to accept a plea deal on a state charge that would give him 18 months in prison, followed by house arrest, in lieu of a trial now set to begin this month.

When I asked several Clinton aides and friends why the boss hung around with people like Burkle and Bing, they suggested various reasons. Bing, 43, who helped finance Shine a Light, the recent Martin Scorsese documentary about the Rolling Stones, and who has given tens of millions to environmental and other causes dear to Clinton's heart in recent years, is described as very well read, thoughtful, interesting—and willing to stay up long into the night indulging Clinton's craving for conversational companionship. (A spokesman for Bing said he would have no comment.)

Burkle, 55, a onetime supermarket boxboy who eventually parlayed ownership of several grocery chains into a fortune that Forbes magazine estimates to be at least $3.5 billion, is said to have bonded with Clinton over their shared origins as outsiders who rose to the very biggest leagues. They met during Clinton's 1992 campaign, after the Los Angeles riots, and Burkle's union-friendly stance and support for a range of Democratic causes quickly endeared him to Clinton. A former Burkle associate told me that Burkle has always been careful to conduct his own social life discreetly in Clinton's presence, but would not deny that the divorced Burkle leads what he euphemistically called a "European lifestyle." And, the former associate added, "how many older guys wouldn't want to hang out with younger girls, if they could? Would you rather hang out with a smart, good-looking 20-year-old, or a 45-year-old?"

One person, who has worked at the highest levels for both Clintons, told me that Clinton's association with such people "just shows poor judgment, for someone who understands political calculations the way he does, and the subtleties as he does, that he puts himself in that position." Business with Burkle

In his book Giving, an extended Hallmark hymn to the virtues of venture philanthropy, Clinton writes that Burkle's provision of post—White House work was the "only private sector offer I accepted" upon leaving office. In fact, that is not true: Clinton has also collected more than $3 million in consulting fees from InfoUSA, a data-mining company headed by a longtime contributor, Vinod Gupta, a Nebraska multi-millionaire who has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Clintons' campaigns. The company has drawn media scrutiny for allegedly selling consumer data about vulnerable senior citizens to unscrupulous telemarketers, and some shareholders once sued InfoUSA, charging that Gupta wasted nearly $1 million in company funds flying the Clintons around the world. (InfoUSA did not respond to a request for comment.)

But Clinton's business relationship with Burkle is far and away his largest source of income after books and speeches: $15.4 million between 2003 and 2007, according to the Clintons' recently released tax returns. That amounts to about 20 percent of all the income that Clinton earned in those years. Until the release of the tax returns this year, Hillary Clinton's Senate financial-disclosure forms had revealed only that Clinton earned "more than $1,000" a year from his partnerships with Burkle.

Burkle is perhaps the single best example of the self-reinforcing network of rich personal, charitable, political, and business supporters Clinton has built since his White House years. For Clinton's re-election campaign Burkle held regular fund-raisers at Green Acres, his sprawling estate in Beverly Hills, which once belonged to the silent-film star Harold Lloyd, and Burkle has also raised millions of dollars for Hillary Clinton's campaigns. What has Clinton done in return? Burkle himself has said that Clinton has provided invaluable introductions and entrée to potential investors, including the Teamsters union. (A spokesman for Burkle's companies did not return repeated telephone calls seeking comment.) When the tax returns were made public this spring, Jay Carson issued a statement saying that "the president provides his best advice on potential investments, advocates generally on behalf of the funds, and seeks to create opportunities for investors to consider investing in these funds or in the investments the funds make."

The Burkle partnership carries ample potential for conflicts—real and perceived—whether or not Hillary Clinton is ever president. For one thing, she lent her campaign $11.4 million this year, and because the Clintons' finances are commingled, it would be difficult to discern whether money from Burkle-related ventures (or other potentially controversial sources of income) made its way into Clinton campaign coffers. Burkle's other investors include an entity connected to Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid al- Maktoum, the ruler of Dubai, whose regime has been cited for human-rights violations by the State Department. (Two years ago, Senator Clinton nevertheless opposed a Dubai-based company's efforts to acquire control over the management of six United States ports.)

Over the years, Clinton has had three main business involvements with Burkle. The first is a broad advisory capacity, for which Clinton has been paid flat fees for work as a rainmaker and liaison between Burkle and various potential investors. In fact, a Clinton aide says, this accounts for all the money that Burkle has paid Clinton to date. As part of the advisory arrangement, Clinton received a stake—of unknown size—in two Burkle domestic investment funds, for which Clinton will see a profit only if annual returns exceed a certain threshold. They appear on track to do so, the aide says, but have so far not produced a payout for Clinton. The third strand is an international investment fund (which has also yet to generate cash returns for Clinton) in which the former president invested an undisclosed amount of his own money, along with Burkle and the same entity connected to Sheikh Mohammed. Clinton has the right to opt out of any controversial investments by this fund, as he recently did with an investment in China.

Doug Band, though not Clinton himself, was involved in another Burkle investment that produced embarrassment. As The Wall Street Journal reported last fall, Band helped introduce Burkle to Raffaello Follieri (an Italian entrepreneur and the boyfriend of the actress Anne Hathaway), who had a proposal to buy and develop properties being sold off by the Catholic Church. Band received a $400,000 finder's fee for the transaction (which he has said he passed on to others involved). Burkle later sued Follieri for allegedly misappropriating funds to pay expenses. (The dispute was settled out of court.) A Clinton adviser told me that Follieri (who was recently charged with attempting to pass a bad check for $215,000 in New York; the charge was later dropped) had come with good references. (Attempts to reach Follieri were unsuccessful.)

This winter a Clinton spokesman announced that Clinton was moving to sever his ties with Burkle to avoid potential conflicts should Hillary Clinton become the Democratic nominee. But in fact, one Clinton aide told me, severing the ties is complicated because putting a value on the partnerships is difficult.

On the Stump

In the middle of the so-called Potomac primary this winter—simultaneous elections in Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia—I went to watch Clinton campaign for Hillary one Sunday in Baltimore County: at a senior-living complex in Catonsville and a gritty Democratic club in blue-collar Dundalk. Much of what I saw felt instantly recognizable: the fluid, conversational, extemporaneous style; the succinct statement of the case ("You ought to be for her because she's spent a lifetime making the only kind of change that matters: making changes in other people's lives"); the frequent pronouncements that something or other was "a big deal" (a favorite phrase in his presidency); and the genial stretchings of the truth.

"Now, when I got elected, I had the lowest net worth of any president of the 20th century," Clinton told his appreciative audience at the Charlestown Retirement Community, blithely ignoring poor Harry Truman, who so struggled to make ends meet as a senator in Washington that he put his wife, Bess, on his office payroll at a higher salary than any other employee there. A moment later, Clinton invoked Truman to make a point about Hillary's courage in fighting for universal health-insurance coverage, saying, "A lot of you remember that Harry Truman was the first president who tried to get universal health care for everybody. They beat his brains out and nearly destroyed his presidency, and he was a very great president." Truman's greatness is now in little dispute, but the contemporary criticism of his presidency had less to do with his drive for health care than with the Korean War.

But if much about Clinton is familiar to one who covered him in his prime, other aspects of his appearance and demeanor are unsettling. He is visibly older and thinner. His hair is whiter and his countenance paler. At times, as the day wears on, he makes an odd cotton-mouth sound, his tongue sticking to the roof of his mouth as he talks. "At some point in your life, which most of us in this room have reached," he tells the seniors, "you realize that even if you live to be 100—and I hope you all do, and a bunch of you will, by the way—you have more yesterdays than tomorrows."

That, too, was a line Clinton liked to use in the White House, but it rings differently at 61 than it did at 46 or 50. By the standards of the males in his family, Clinton is a very old man indeed. His father died at 28, three months before his son was born, and his maternal grandfather, who helped raise him, died at 58, so Clinton has long faced atypical intimations of his own mortality. Many of those who know him well say he now tires more easily, and loses energy.

Post-Op Complications

That is hardly surprising: not quite four years ago, Clinton underwent quadruple-bypass surgery to relieve blocked arteries in his heart, a procedure whose comparative commonness in the modern medical world belies the range of subtle, complex, and not always obvious complications that can follow it. "He's recovered much, much more slowly from the heart surgery than anybody thought," one former aide told me. "He still has energy, but not stamina. He can recover, but he used to do that nonstop, with three hours' sleep."

Just weeks after his triumphal encore appearance at the 2004 Democratic National Convention, in Boston, Clinton, who has suffered for years from esophageal reflux, the symptoms of which can sometimes mimic signs of cardiac trouble, complained of chest pains and shortness of breath, and an angiogram showed severely blocked arteries that doctors said meant he was doubtless headed for a major heart attack. On Sept. 6, 2004, in surgery at New York-Presbyterian Hospital/Columbia University Medical Center, Clinton's breastbone was cut open, his chest pulled apart. His heart was stopped for 73 minutes while a heart-lung machine maintained his body's flow of blood and breathing, and surgeons took blood vessels from his chest and his left leg to create detours around the segments of arteries in his heart that were severely clogged with plaque—more than 90 percent blocked in some cases.

Six months later, as the result of a rare and unexpected complication, Clinton had a second surgery to remove a rubbery rind of scar tissue caused by the accumulation of bloody fluid in the lower lobe of his left lung; the tissue had cut his breathing capacity by more than 25 percent. In this operation, known as a thoracotomy, an incision was made between a pair of Clinton's ribs, and doctors spread them apart to make room for the insertion of surgical instruments that peeled off tissue surrounding the scar tissue and then the hard, rubbery rind. Experts describe the aftermath of such surgery as typically quite painful, much more painful than that of bypass surgery.

As a private citizen—albeit a very prominent one—Clinton has not received anything like the postsurgical media attention he would have if he were still president, and many details of his treatment in recent years are not known. After his first surgery, The New York Times reported that he would take a range of medications, including a beta-blocker to maintain regular heartbeats, a statin to lower his cholesterol, an ace inhibitor to control high blood pressure, and aspirin to thin his blood. These medications may cause a range of side effects, including fatigue, muscle pain, dehydration, depression, and impotence. Coronary bypass can also cause subtle changes in cognition, which may, or may not, be temporary. There is further medical disagreement about whether such changes are caused in part by small particles of plaque that are discharged by the heart-lung machine and sent to the brain, or by the underlying artery disease itself. If a patient has arterial disease in his heart, he could have it in his brain too.

"I would think mood changes would be a big issue in his life from that bypass surgery, especially having to go back a second time," says Dr. Thomas Traill, a prominent cardiologist at the Johns Hopkins Hospital, in Baltimore, who is not involved in Clinton's care. Many people who have bypass surgery get depressed afterward, while others suffer from increased irritability. "It's very similar to postpartum depression. You deliver a child and then a week later it's a dismal anticlimax. The same thing happens with heart surgery: you wonder if you're going to make it, and then you wake up in the intensive-care unit and you're the center of the universe, and a week later you're exhausted and sore and about to be sent home."

"It's also true," Traill adds, "that a lot of people are never really the same again, that their mood is not right. Some of that may have been triggered by the original illness and some by surgery. Then there's a persistent problem: you're taking medications, you're under doctors' care, and every day when you shave you know you're not going to live forever. So whether or not he's, as they like to say, clinically depressed, his mood cannot be the same as before this happened."

The Guilt Factor

Whatever the explanation, much of Clinton's behavior on the campaign trail this year has been so maladroit as to constitute malpractice: his blowups at television reporters, his derisive dismissal of Obama's unwavering anti-war stance as a "fairy tale," and most of all his denigrating comparison of Obama's performance in the South Carolina primary to Jesse Jackson's victories there two decades ago (which even one of his closest former aides described to me as insensitive at best). Perhaps no figure in modern American politics has less standing to say "Shame on you!" than Bill Clinton, but he said just that—twice—to a hapless reporter who asked him in January about comments by a former South Carolina Democratic Party chairman comparing Clinton's tactics to those of the late Lee Atwater, the take-no-prisoners Republican strategist known for racially charged campaigns.

As the days wore on, the former Senate Democratic majority leader Tom Daschle said Clinton's behavior was "not keeping with the image of a former president." His former labor secretary and onetime friend turned critic, Robert Reich, called Clinton's attacks on Obama "ill-tempered and ill-founded." No less a loquacious commentator than the Reverend Al Sharpton said that it was time for Clinton to just "shut up." His old flame Gennifer Flowers, who has endorsed Hillary, referred to him as an "idiot husband."

Congressman James E. Clyburn of South Carolina, the highest-ranking black member of the House of Representatives, who pointedly had remained neutral in the primary, finally called Clinton's behavior "bizarre." And on more than one occasion, in one way or another, Senator Clinton herself had to tell him—as she did after he revived controversy over her imagined landing in Bosnia under sniper fire by unleashing a string of new inaccuracies to defend her—"Let me handle this." There is little doubt that Clinton's own intensity has fueled his wife's. One senior aide told me bluntly that Bill's anger "has not served her well. That side of him feeds the worst side of Hillary. He does stoke her up."

Aides to both Clintons say part of the problem was that, until Maggie Williams came on board, no one from Hillary's campaign was even tasked with routinely keeping Bill abreast of developments, so long-simmering tensions between her people and his were allowed to worsen. After Williams's arrival, Clinton participated in a daily conference call with her and other top campaign advisers to review the state of the race that one aide said sometimes turned into a virtual monologue. "There's not a detail that escapes his notice and commentary," the aide said, "and as usual with Clinton, much of what he says is worth listening to." Aides explain the depth of Bill Clinton's involvement by invoking what one of them called "the guilt factor."

"There's this piece of him really wanting this desperately for her, for all of the reasons you can imagine," this aide told me. "She put her career on hold to be with him I mean, it's her time, and he feels that." Clinton was also never cut out to be a supporting player. He is Gladys Knight and not a Pip, as his former aide Jamal Simmons, who now backs Obama, put it this spring.

The way Clinton handled the courtship of Senator Ted Kennedy in the run-up to Kennedy's eventual endorsement of Obama is instructive. "Barack pursued Kennedy with a soft touch," a person close to Kennedy told me. "He checked in every once in a while Counter that with the way the Clintons were handling him. There was nothing soft about the Clintons' requests. Hillary would call and make a formal request. Clinton, as he felt Kennedy slipping away, would get more and more insistent, and he would make the whole conversation about how bad Obama was, not how good his wife was."

Losing a Step

Clinton's temper has continued to get the better of him. By the eve of the Pennsylvania primary, he was reduced, in a Philadelphia radio phone interview, to denying that his comments in South Carolina had been in any way racially charged, and instead insisted that the Obama camp "played the race card on me." He sputtered, "I mean, this is just, you know ... You really gotta go something to play the race card with me—my office is in Harlem." At the end of the interview, apparently unaware that he was still on the air, Clinton was heard to say, "I don't think I should take any sh*t from anybody on that, do you?" Asked the next day by another reporter what he had meant by saying the Obama campaign "was playing the race card," Clinton would have none of it. "No, no, no, that's not what I said," he erupted, as if he did not know that his earlier comments had been recorded and were all over the Internet. He added, "You always follow me around and play these little games, and I'm not going to play your games today." It's a nice question, just who was playing the games. When I asked a Clinton campaign official how the former president could have issued such a flat denial, the aide immediately responded, with no trace of irony, that the offending reporter had used the word "playing," while in the radio interview Clinton had used the word "played." I'm not sure whether that makes Clinton's outburst better or worse, but it's of a piece with the parser the public knows so well.

As the primaries ground on, the campaign deployed Clinton more strategically (and, perhaps, more effectively) in the kinds of smaller towns presidents never visit—47 stops in Pennsylvania, 39 in Indiana, 50 in North Carolina—where he stumped in largely white, working-class areas but, poignantly for a man once dubbed the nation’s “first black president,” not in African-American ones. That sea change in Clinton’s standing among blacks will remain a consideration in how to use him, or not use him, in the general-election campaign, no matter who the Democratic nominee.

I saw Clinton at two of his nine stops on the day before the North Carolina primary in May. He was himself, for good and bad. In Zebulon, population 4,329, he arrived one hour and seven minutes late to speak to a crowd of 500 or so, talked for 40 minutes on topics from the Iraq war to hybrid cars, adoption and foster-care policy, and mortgage foreclosures, and concluded, in a repeated refrain that took on the insistence of a preacher’s call, that Hillary’s campaign had been carried along by “people like you in places like this.” Minutes later, after a front-porch rally in nearby Louisburg, population 3,726, a woman in the crowd approached him, tears streaming down her face. I could not get close enough to hear what was said, but Clinton listened, then cupped her face in his big hands, in that way that only he can. It was classic Clinton, but not enough to prevent an Obama blowout in the state the next day.

Perhaps more than anything, Clinton, whose audiences in recent years have tended to be adoring crowds who hang on every word of what those who have heard his standard speech say is a rambling tour d’horizon of world problems, has simply lost a step.

“Look, the game has changed,” said Mike McCurry. “He ran his last national campaign in 1996, and remember, we kind of ran unopposed. It’s been a while since he did that, and the way you summon people up and get them to do things has changed. All of this stuff, the blogging and the YouTubing and the way in which everything is instantaneously available: I tell you, until you get out there and are actually dealing with the consequences—having what you just said as you were walking out the door [all over the Internet], that’s brand-new to him.”

A Dictator’s Embrace

When Clinton left the White House, aides say, he made a list of all the world problems he cared most about and might yet do something to help solve. At the top of his list was Mideast peace, but Clinton quickly realized that that was an endeavor in which uninvited meddling was inappropriate, so he concentrated on a range of other issues, from H.I.V./aids to clean water, childhood obesity, global warming, and—after the South Asian tsunami and Hurricane Katrina—disaster relief. Some aides have said they see a clear effort to redress problems that he let fester as president, whether aids or the Rwandan genocide. It is beyond dispute that Clinton’s foundation has done worthy work around the world, funneling low-cost anti-retroviral drugs to more than a million aids patients, shining the singular power of a presidential spotlight on the good work of others, and raising millions of dollars for practical programs in places much of the world’s power establishment never bothers with.

But it is also beyond dispute that Clinton has blended the altruistic efforts of his philanthropy with the private business interests of some of his biggest donors in ways that are surpassingly sloppy, if not unseemly, for any former president. A case in point is Clinton’s relationship with Ukraine’s Victor Pinchuk, a billionaire and philanthropist who has donated millions to the ex-president’s foundation. According to Newsweek, in 2007, at a Pinchuk-sponsored international conference in Yalta, Clinton wowed the crowd with a presentation on Ukraine but also sparked controversy when he was embraced by Pinchuk’s father-in-law, the country’s former president Leonid Kuchma. Kuchma’s repressive regime has been linked by a government investigation to the 2000 murder of a dissident Ukrainian journalist.

The man was found decapitated—one of scores of journalists who have been killed or have disappeared in Ukraine since the country achieved independence, in 1991.

Even more troubling is Clinton’s relationship with the Canadian mining magnate Frank Giustra. This winter, a lengthy investigative report in The New York Times disclosed that, in 2005, Clinton flew to the Central Asian country of Kazakhstan on Giustra’s MD-87 jet for what was billed as a philanthropic three-country tour. The two men had dinner with President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who has held the country in a vise-like grip for nearly two decades. At their meeting, Clinton expressed support for Nazarbayev’s bid to head the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, which monitors elections and promotes democracy. That position was sharply at odds with official American foreign policy and came in the face of stinging criticism of Kazakhstan’s record on human rights from many sources, including the junior senator from New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton. Within two days, Giustra’s company signed preliminary agreements allowing it to buy into three uranium projects controlled by Kazakhstan’s state-owned uranium agency. And months after that the Clinton Foundation received a $31.3 million donation from Giustra that remained secret until a Giustra representative acknowledged it late last year. (Giustra has separately pledged another $100 million to the foundation.)

A Clinton spokesperson and Giustra have both said that Clinton was unaware of the specifics of the uranium deal. But critics of Clinton's judgment say that misses the point.

"There's no way in the world that President Clinton didn't understand what was going on there, and no way in the world that he didn't understand what his role was supposed to be in that visit: to lay the hands of the former president of the United States on the individual he was traveling with and thereby bring credibility to whatever reason that individual was there for," says Fred Wertheimer, the president of Democracy 21, a Washington watchdog group that monitors money and politics. "To deny that is to, basically, take the position that you can fool all of the people all of the time."

The Public Pensioner

It is for just such reasons that Clinton's refusal to make public the names of donors to his foundation has drawn withering fire. (Some donors—including the Saudi royal family and the governments of Dubai, Kuwait, and Qatar—were made public by The New York Sun when a list of them was discovered on a public computer monitor at the opening of the Clinton library, in Little Rock, and others have since become known as the result of interviews and journalistic digging through the tax records of known Clinton friends and supporters.) Clinton aides say that donors were promised confidentiality, but they have also pledged to make public the names of future donors—though not past ones—should Hillary Clinton become president.

"I think there's also a kind of sentiment that if somebody's given us money to save the lives of tens of thousands of kids who have H.I.V., let somebody f*cking b*tch about it," one senior Clinton adviser told me. "If they don't want us to take that money, or if it offends some sensibility of Fred Wertheimer, so be it."

Clinton is under no legal obligation to disclose such donors—or, for that matter, to disclose much of anything about his personal financial dealings. No one knows the details of the earnings—almost certainly many millions of dollars—that the first President Bush has made from his investment in the Carlyle Group, for example. Gerald Ford quietly raked in big director's fees from companies such as American Express, and Ronald Reagan briefly scandalized late-80s Washington by taking $2 million for a single speaking trip to Japan. But their wives never ran for president.

Throughout our history there has been a strong presumption that former presidents should conduct their affairs in ways that do not seem to cheapen, degrade, or exploit the high office they held. Hillary Clinton's own service as senator, and her presidential campaign, reinforce that imperative in Bill Clinton's case. Harry Truman was so reluctant to accept any business or commercial offer, however high-minded, that might be seen as capitalizing on the presidency that he nearly went broke in retirement. A few years after leaving office, he had seen a $600,000 advance from Life magazine for his memoirs whittled away by expenses and 67 percent income taxes to a net gain of about $37,000. Only the sale of his family farm for a shopping center saved him from real embarrassment. Finally, he took his case to Speaker of the House Sam Rayburn and Senate majority leader Lyndon Johnson, and the first bill stipulating an annual presidential pension (initially $25,000) and money for offices and staff was passed.

Clinton benefits handsomely from Truman's foresight. His presidential pension has totaled more than $1.2 million since he left office, and despite his fantastic private-sector income, an analysis this spring by the Web site Politico showed that he has taken almost as much in taxpayer dollars for his postpresidential existence as the other two living ex-presidents—Jimmy Carter and George H. W. Bush—combined. Since 2001, Clinton has received more in almost every category—pension, staff salaries, supplies—than any of his colleagues in that smallest of clubs. Before Ronald Reagan and Gerald Ford died, Clinton's telephone and rent expenses came close to exceeding the comparable expenses for all four then living former presidents combined. Part of the difference is that Clinton served eight years in office, entitling him to a federal health-insurance plan and a higher pension than Ford, Carter, or Bush, and part is that his office space in Manhattan is more expensive than space in Atlanta or Houston.

Still, there is a repellent grandiosity about Clinton's post-presidential style. Before he settled on more modest space in Harlem, Clinton had intended to rent the entire 56th floor of Carnegie Hall Tower, in Midtown, for roughly $738,000 a year. He changed course after a rash of sharp congressional and public criticism. Each year at Christmastime, Clinton sends out to supporters a slim, paperbound volume of his Selected Remarks, with a gold-embossed "Happy Holidays" greeting card replete with the requisite "bug" showing it was printed in a union shop. Last year's number ran 25 pages and featured three thoroughly ordinary efforts: a commencement speech at Knox College, in Illinois; remarks to the Nelson Mandela Foundation, in South Africa; and comments at the 50th-anniversary commemoration of the desegregation of Little Rock Central High School. "Since leaving office," the first page of the booklet states, "President Clinton has devoted his time and energy to causes of both personal concern and global significance."

A Solitary Man

Throughout his career, Bill Clinton has justified acts of extraordinary selfishness in the name of idealism—he's always in it for the people, the plain folks who tell pollsters they trust him to look out for their interests, even if they don't trust him. He has been forgiven colossal egotism, even cruelty, by those closest to him because of his superlative political talents, and because of the overreaching of his enemies. As president, Clinton often could not show grace in the smallest ways. He dithered about where and when to go on vacation, so that aides and Secret Service agents could not plan their own. He declined to release aides and reporters who had waited around all through a pointless Saturday of duty while he made up his mind whether to play golf (a game at which he has been known to cheat).

He was never, ever, on time. In Joe Klein's roman à clef about the Clintons, Primary Colors, the Betsey Wright character accuses the Bill Clinton character of always skating by on charm and talent and need. "You have never paid the bill," she tells him. "Never. And no one ever calls you on it. Because you're so completely f*cking special. Everyone was always so proud of you. And me, too. Me the worst."

In the end, this is Clinton's most grievous sin, his steady refusal to take grown-up responsibility for the consequences of his own actions. In the White House, on the day of his last sexual encounter with Monica Lewinsky, Clinton told her that he was worried that a foreign embassy might be listening in on their calls, and that if she were ever questioned, she should say they were just friends. Then he looked into her eyes and sang, "Try a Little Tenderness," a song that goes: "She may be weary, women do get weary, wearing the same shabby dress." On the day this winter that he accused Barack Obama of spinning a "fairy tale" about Obama's anti-war stance, Clinton went on to whine about an Obama campaign research sheet criticizing his business dealings and insisting, "Ken Starr spent $70 million and indicted innocent people to find out that I wouldn't take a nickel to see the cow jump over the moon."

So, yes, let us stipulate: Ken Starr was a prurient, partisan zealot. Yes, other ex-presidents have made a lot of money and it is hard to begrudge Clinton his earnings (even if he did take six million nickels for a speech to the Australian Council for the Peaceful Reunification of China). Yes, Obama is a daring opponent who thinks he is hot sh*t and has benefited from the same enthusiasm, energy, and fresh-faced appeal that a fella named Bill Clinton once elicited (but he has suffered from some of the same skepticism, too). It is Clinton's invariable insistence that his problems are someone else's fault, and that questions or criticisms of him, his methods, motives, or means are invariably unfair, that is his unforgivable flaw.

He has told friends that he is not worried that his aggressive performance this year has done lasting damage to his reputation (some of them are not so sure). Whatever the future holds for Hillary Clinton, her husband is not fading away. He will remain a presence, a force to be reckoned with, as long as he draws breath.

But for a politician with so many admirers, allies, acquaintances, faithful retainers, and hangers-on, Clinton remains a profoundly solitary man, associates say, without any real peers, intellectual equals, or genuine friends with whom he can share the sweetest things in life. (The one who has always come closest, for better and worse, for richer and poorer, is simply too busy these days.)

So he spends his time veering between feeling sorry for himself and working to help others, between doing good and giving his enemies fresh ammunition, between vindicating his legacy and vitiating it.

"So much of modern culture is characterized by stories of self-indulgence and self-destruction," Clinton writes near the end of Giving, from which he earned $6.3 million and gave away $1 million (or 16 percent) to charity. "So much of modern politics is focused not on honest differences of policy but on personal attacks. So much of modern media is dominated by people who earn fortunes by demeaning others, defining them by their worst moments, exploiting their agonies. Who's happier? The uniters or the dividers? The builders or the breakers? The givers or the takers? I think you know the answer."

I used to think he did, too. But substitute the words "my life" for the words "modern culture" and "modern politics" in the passage above, and you'll have a pretty succinct summary of what Bill Clinton has, at last, become.

(Todd S. Purdum is Vanity Fair's national editor.)

20080607-03 14:57 SteveB Re: "Obama Explains National Anthem Stance" McCain

Dear Mark,

Not only did Obama get this far, he'll get even farther because...

I really don't think that nearly-senile, can-hardly-walk old fart stands a chance in hell! That's my prediction. It's amazing to me that he's the best the Republicans can come-up with. Any black or woman off the street could beat him. He does one stupid thing after another. Truth.

McCain is an old fart and I don't care what made him old. War "hero" was not something he chose or that shows his merits. He was just shot-down and held prisoner for heaven's sake. I don't see exactly how being a prisoner makes one a hero. Better to fight and avoid being a prisoner, right? His fake smile seems senile too. I don't trust him to change anything, especially with his coterie of lobbyists.

No war monger will be elected this year! Mark my words. I like Obama's ideas about actually going after Bin Laden and being more effective in Afghanistan. And what's wrong with talking to people on your terms? It can't make us weaker...only stronger.

Important: McCain's not consistently pro-choice or for taking a strong stand against illegal immigration. He sponsored a bill to give them frigging amnesty. I want the government OUT of our lives except for national defense and illegal immigration is that kind of issue. The government has no business telling anyone what they can do with their own bodies, least of all pregnant women in a world with too many people.

20080607-04 16:53 SteveB Re: "Obama and McCain"

Dear SteveM,

Too bad McCain will die of old age or have a debilitating stroke before he has a chance to do anything against Iran. Israel has already announced that they're going to take care of Iran's nuclear threat...as well they should.

Frankly, I'm tired of all this fear mongering from the Right. They've had almost 8 years and they have failed utterly to make us any safer. Not a very good argument for McCain and his 95% Bush-lackey voting record.

20080611-01 09:56 J. Carson Barack Obama; 2008 Primaries, Are you up to the challenge?

Dear SteveB,

This has been a 50-state campaign from the very beginning. A year ago this week, our grassroots supporters organized a nationwide canvass in more than 1,000 cities to introduce people to Barack Obama.

Since then, we've had an unprecedented primary season that built a grassroots infrastructure in all 50 states—not just for Barack, but for all of the Democratic candidates.

Now it's time to bring all of that energy together for our common cause of change.

All across the country, Democrats, Independents, and even Republicans are tired of the politics of the past and are looking for new solutions to the challenges we're facing.

That's why we're launching a nationwide day of action on June 28th called "Unite for Change"—and asking you to host a Unite for Change meeting in your neighborhood.

In all 50 states, supporters like you—seasoned veterans and first-time volunteers alike—will host house meetings to reach out and bring together folks who supported all of the Democratic candidates (and those who are just tuning into the process now).

The goal is to come together and use the common values we share to build a united volunteer organization in your neighborhood that will register new voters and build support locally.

It's going to be an amazing time, and hosting your own event is easy. We'll provide all the tools and resources you'll need. Here are the details:

Unite for Change Meetings, June 28th

We're heading into a battle against John McCain, and the stakes are higher than ever before. But the path to victory is as simple as talking to your friends and neighbors.

From the beginning, this campaign has been about ordinary people reaching out and building the bonds of community—empowering one another by coming together to make change.

With the general election approaching, it's more important than ever to keep this momentum going. And there's no better way to make this happen in your community than hosting a Unite for Change event.

You'll gather—not just with Obama supporters, but with anyone who's tired of the politics of the past and ready for something new—to share your stories and lay the plans for how to build this movement locally in the weeks and months ahead.

It requires some responsibility, but don't worry—our team will be here with all the support and resources you need to make your Unite for Change event a big success.

Learn more and sign up to host a meeting in your community:

<http://my.barackobama.com/unite>

Yesterday, our deputy campaign manager, Steve Hildebrand, announced that this will be the first campaign in a generation to put staff in all 50 states.

It says a lot about our movement—and about the enthusiasm and resources people like you have supplied—that this is possible.

But being in every state will not be enough.

In order to succeed in every community in America, it's going to be up to you to take the lead. Everyone who hopes for real change after November is counting on you.

Thank you,
Jon Carson, National Voter Contact Director, Obama for America

20080611-02 13:59 SteveM Re: John McCain; 2008 Primaries & Election

Dear SteveB,

Could you be specific about the lies and misstatements. I rarely hear anything about McCain from the media since they seem to be focused on Obama and his pillaging advisers whom he let go today after stating that they didn't work for him because they weren't paid? What's that all about?

Don't get me wrong, SteveB, McCain ain't no prize but he's still far and above Obama. Now roll you yourself a joint and go sit on the porch until you blood pressure goes down.....

20080611-03 16:20 SteveB Re: John McCain; 2008 Primaries & Election

Dear SteveM,

Ya know...I'm fed up with McCain's pugnacious lying, misstatements, and senility already...and he doesn't even really have the nomination yet. Can't the guy just chill-out a little and be a little more clear and consistent in his pronouncements? How can he possibly handle the Presidency like this...always having to explain away his misstatements in an angry fashion? I wonder if there is any kind of impeachment process for a prospective nominee that could get him out and get someone a little more level-headed in?

And you have issues with Obama? He seems like an island of calm sanity in a stormy, conflicted sea of John McCain.

20080611-04 21:00 SteveB Re: John McCain; 2008 Primaries & Election, Barack Obama

Dear SteveM,

See today's news on his comments about how it's not important whether our soldiers come home from Iraq and Sen. Lieberman's inexcusable defense of this hypocrisy. McCain's senile misunderstandings of Iraq are now legendary. This guy and his holier-than-thou war hero cr*p are sickening.

I'll take Obama and his intelligence any day. Like Kennedy...his politics are too far left, but his heart and mind are sound.

20080618-01 17:44 India Fw: Tips on Pumping Gas; Energy

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

My line of work is in petroleum for about 31 years now, so here are some tricks to get more of your money's worth for every gallon:

Here at the Kinder Morgan Pipeline where I work in San Jose, CA we deliver about 4 million gallons in a 24-hour period thru the pipeline.. One day is diesel the next day is jet fuel, and gasoline, regular and premium grades. We have 34-storage tanks here with a total capacity of 16,800,000 gallons.

Only buy or fill up your car or truck in the early morning when the ground temperature is still cold. Remember that all service stations have their storage tanks buried below ground. The colder the ground the more dense the gasoline, when it gets warmer gasoline expands, so buying in the afternoon or in the evening....your gallon is not exactly a gallon. In the petroleum business, the specific gravity and the temperature of the gasoline, diesel and jet fuel, ethanol and other petroleum products plays an important role.

A 1-degree rise in temperature is a big deal for this business. But the service stations do not have temperature compensation at the pumps. When you're filling up do not squeeze the trigger of the nozzle to a fast mode. If you look you will see that the trigger has three (3) stages: low, middle, and high. You should be pumping on low mode, thereby minimizing the vapors that are created while you are pumping. All hoses at the pump have a vapor return. If you are pumping on the fast rate, some of the liquid that goes to your tank becomes vapor. Those vapors are being sucked up and back into the underground storage tank so you're getting less worth for your money.

One of the most important tips is to fill up when your gas tank is HALF FULL. The reason for this is the more gas you have in your tank the less air occupying its empty space. Gasoline evaporates faster than you can imagine. Gasoline storage tanks have an internal floating roof. This roof serves as zero clearance between the gas and the atmosphere, so it minimizes the evaporation. Unlike service stations, here where I work, every truck that we load is temperature compensated so that every gallon is actually the exact amount.

Another reminder, if there is a gasoline truck pumping into the storage tanks when you stop to buy gas, DO NOT fill up; most likely the gasoline is being stirred up as the gas is being delivered, and you might pick up some of the dirt that normally settles on the bottom.

20080620-01 16:47 B. Obama Declaring Our Independence

Dear SteveB:

Since we announced our decision not to accept taxpayer funds for the general election, tens of thousands of people like you have come forward to declare their independence from a broken system. This decision frees us to build a movement of millions of people giving whatever they can afford to a campaign that is truly reforming the way our political process works.

It also frees us to take our campaign for change to parts of the country where Democratic presidential candidates haven't spent too much time in the past. Our first television ad of the general election season goes on the air today.

Sure, we're on the air in places like Ohio and Florida, the typical battleground states. But we're also on the air in North Dakota, Montana, and Alaska—places that have emerged as competitive because of the unprecedented grassroots energy supporting our campaign.

These ads are supporting a 50-state ground operation that is being built right now by staff, volunteers, and thousands of Obama Organizing Fellows.

But we have our work cut out for us, and we need to grow this movement. Right now, you can declare your independence and help us run a campaign that is funded by the people and for the people.

If you make your first donation today, a fellow supporter is standing by to match your gift and double your impact. You can even choose to exchange a note with them and share why you are supporting this campaign.

Choosing not to accept these taxpayer funds was not an easy decision. I remain committed to fundamental campaign finance reform, and as president I will work to fix this broken system.

But we're facing opponents who have become masters at gaming the broken system as it stands today—collecting money from Washington lobbyists, special interest PACs, and relying on so-called 527 groups that can take unlimited contributions to peddle lies and smears.

We have chosen to do things differently. You can see for yourself what kind of people own our campaign—each of these folks have made a donation in the last 24 hours:

Sandra from Tennessee:

"I'm on disability and can't afford to give much but I figure the $10 is worth it. This is the first time in a long time that even the ones who can't afford it are giving, and are excited about a candidate and excited about the process."

Monica from South Carolina:

"The way that this primary and now this general election campaign have been funded truly gives the power to the citizens that are voting. This administration will owe the American people, not lobbyists and special interests groups."

Mauve from Iowa:

"THIS is true public financing. Getting average Americans from all backgrounds and tax brackets to care enough and to believe enough and to hope enough to give what they can."

Tim from Texas:

"Today, for the first time in my life, I contributed to a political campaign. I did so because I have always believed that true power rests with the people, if only those people could be organized. We have the power to take back our country from the special interest groups. There are more of us and when we act together, we are the force that can dictate the direction our country will take."

Join Sandra, Monica, Mauve, and Tim in declaring your independence. Make a matching donation today:

<https://donate.barackobama.com/match>.

Our fellow Americans are counting on us, and the stakes couldn't be higher—we can't afford another term of George Bush's disastrous policies.

We have a responsibility to win this election and deliver for them.

But with Washington lobbyists and special interest PACs declaring that they will spend hundreds of millions to tear us down, it's up to us to stand up for the change we need.

More than 50,000 people declared their independence since our announcement. Support our campaign for change and declare your independence today to help reach

Thank you for everything, Barack

20080628-01 21:29 SteveM Fw: Can Obama Legally Serve?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Can Obama legally serve as President? Really doesn't matter because the media have already anointed him and a Democratic majority in Congress would simply change the law if necessary.

Here's a question for you: SOME TIME AGO HILARY SAID SHE HAD SOMETHING ON OBAMA THAT WOULD CHANGE THE ELECTION AND THAT'S WHY SHE ONLY SUSPENDED HER QUEST FOR THE PRESIDENCY; WELL HERE IT IS. This came from a U.S.N.A. alumnus. It'll be interesting to see how the media handles this...

Barack Obama is not a legal U.S. natural-born citizen according to the law on the books at the time of his birth, which falls between Dec. 24, 1952, to Nov. 13, 1986. Federal Law requires that the office of President requires a natural-born citizen if the child was not born to two U.S. Citizen parents. This is what exempts John McCain, though he was born in the U.S. Panama Canal Zone.

U.S. Law very clearly states: 'If only one parent is a U.S. Citizen at the time of one's birth, that parent must have resided in the United States for a minimum ten years, five of which must be after the age of 16.' Barack Obama's father was not a U.S. Citizen is a fact. Obama's mother was only 18 when Obama was born. This means even though she had been a U.S. Citizen for 10 years, (or citizen of Hawaii, being a territory), his mother fails the test for at least 5 years prior to Barack Obama's birth, but after age 16.

In essence, Mother alone is not old enough to qualify her son for automatic U.S. Citizenship. At most, 2 years elapsed from the time his mother turned 16 until the time of Barack Obama's birth when she was 18. His mother would have needed to have been 16 + 5 = 21 years old at the time of Barack Obama's birth for him to be a natural-born citizen. Barack Obama was already 3 years old at the time his mother would have needed to be to allow him natural citizenship from his only U.S. Citizen parent. Obama should have been naturalized as a citizen, but that would disqualify him from holding the office. [And they somehow KNEW the dude was destined to be the fake President of the United States of America? Mind-blowing! How exactly did they do that? Time machine? UFO? Jesus—SteveB]

The Constitution clearly declares: Naturalized citizens are ineligible to hold the office of President. Though Barack Obama was sent back to Hawaii at age 10, any other information does not matter because his mother is the one who must fulfill the requirement to be a U.S. Citizen for 10 years prior to his birth on Aug. 4, 1961, with 5 of those years being after age 16. Further, Obama may have had to have remained in the USA for some time frame to protect any citizenship he might have had, rather than living in Indonesia.

This is very clear cut and a glaring violation of U.S. Election law. I think Governor Schwarzenegger of California should be very interested in discovering if Obama is allowed to be elected President without being a natural-born U.S. Citizen, since this would set a precedent. Stay tuned to your TV sets because I suspect some of this information will be leaking through over the next several days.

20080629-01 09:20 SteveB Re: Can Obama Legally Serve?

Dear SteveM,

LOL! It's all very clear.

Lie: Obama Is Not a Natural Born Citizen.

Truth: Senator Obama was born in Hawaii in 1961, after it became a state on Aug. 21st, 1959. Obama became a citizen at birth under the first section of the 14th Amendment:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

20080630-01 18:33 SteveM John McCain's Military Experience

Dear SteveB,

Let's bottom line this, McCain was a squadron commander, "Leadership"! Flew aircraft in to enemy fire, "Courage"! Can think and do at 600 miles per hour, all facts also. Desirable traits for Presidents. Fact!

What does BHO's back ground have to match or exceed? Listening to Rev. Wright "follower"! And stating " he (Barrack) could not confront the Reverend about his views", spineless worm, empty suit! Fact!

Always come to me first when you're confused, SteveB, LOL!

20080630-02 20:08 SteveB Re: John McCain's Military Experience

Dear SteveM,

I agree completely with Gen. Wesley Clark's comment yesterday that "flying in an airplane and getting shot down does not qualify one to be President."

Nor does it make one an expert in foreign policy.

This is joke to think McCain is somehow more qualified because he was in the military or was a POW. This is not to question his service or his patriotism.

It's just that these experience don't make one any more of an expert of foreign affairs or the military than being a plumber or a truck driver does. Fact.

20080701-01 15:45 SteveM Re: John McCain's Military Experience

Dear SteveB,

Being a prisoner of war does qualify Mac for president, and more than being part black qualifies BHO. But 22 years as a Senator is a better start then 2 years! And Barrack is know better than the rest with regard to his past stances.

20080701-02 17:52 SteveB Re: John McCain's Military Experience & Other Problems

Dear SteveM,

His service, though honorable and praiseworthy, has no relationship to being President. If it means that his judgment is so fine, please explain the following concerning Johnny Boy:

1. Abortion—he's pro-life (now).

2. Immigration—he's gone back and forth, but seems to be for amnesty for illegals.
3. Iraq—he wants to stay 100 years.
4. Afghanistan—he has no judgment different than Bush's failed policy.
5. Fairness to Veterans—he just voted against the bill.
6. The Economy—he admits he doesn't know anything about economics.
7. Business as usual—he wants to continue the big Republican sell-out of the American people to big business.
8. His war leadership was on a small, even tiny, scale. Obama just successfully led a giant campaign against supposedly insurmountable odds. That also shows leadership and courage.
9. Maybe McCain used to be able to think at 600 miles an hour (or faster), but now he thinks at about 1 mile per hour and not very well at that speed.

Given all this, I think it is unbelievable for Republicans to talk as if McCain is qualified to be President, but Obama is not. This is pure, unadulterated CR*P! And it should stop right now so that we can seriously discuss the vast problems facing this country that McCain's buddy, Bush, has led us into.

And I'm sick of the knee-jerk backlash against anyone who tries to talk seriously about McCain's qualifications. As I said, his service is appreciated, but it has nothing to do with Presidential-type experience, cunning, leadership, or temperament.

And, as even the Republicans say, the McCain who ran in 2000 would not vote for the McCain running in 2008.

20080701-03 18:37 SteveB Re: John McCain's Other Problems

Dear SteveM,

He's also for NAFTA and more free-trade and for privatization of Social Security—the first has been a failure for the U.S., the second is an impossibility in either party. His judgments sure go against mine, in so many many areas.

20080701-04 18:59 SteveB Re: John McCain's Military Experience

Dear SteveM,

Then they should say that (about the Senatorial experience) and stop the veteran cr*p. Obama has more experience than Kennedy when he was elected and history has shown JFK to have been a damn good President, despite being a liberal Democrat. I think the same would be true of Obama. WE NEED A DAMN CHANGE FROM WASHINGTON BUSINESS-AS-USUAL.

20080701-05 19:14 SteveB Re: John McCain's Military Experience

Dear SteveM,

Besides, none of the stuff you're talking about matters anyway, and it's probably about as true as the non-citizen thing.

The Republicans don't stand a chance in hell with McCain. Unless one or both of the candidates die before the election, get ready to have a "Muslim" in the White House! I predict it will be a landslide, maybe the biggest in American history.

The people are fed-up with the Republicans. The GOP had a golden opportunity (especially during idiot Bush's first term) and blew it terribly. It's time to try something else, anything else.

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me regarding border security. I appreciate hearing from you and would like to respond to your concerns.

Like you, I believe that securing the border is a critical first step in combating illegal immigration. Illegal immigration is a national problem that has been left unaddressed for far too long. You will be pleased to know that I supported an amendment to the Senate Budget Act of 2008 that will provide additional funds for border security, immigration enforcement, and criminal alien removal programs. This amendment was passed by the Senate on Mar. 14, 2008.

Specifically, this amendment will expand the zero tolerance prosecution policy for illegal entry to the United States to all 20 border sectors. The amendment directs the Department of Homeland Security to complete the 700 miles of fencing required under previously passed legislation and deploys 6,000 National Guard members to the southern border of the United States. Finally, the amendment calls for Immigration and Customs Enforcement to train and reimburse State and local law enforcement officers for the evaluation of the 27% of the prison population who are noncitizens in order to identify removable criminal aliens.

Again, thank you for taking the time to contact me. My highest priority is to safeguard our homeland, and I will keep your thoughtful comments in mind as we continue work on this issue. Do not hesitate to contact me with any additional questions or comments. For more information about issues and activities important to Florida, please sign up for my weekly newsletter at <http://martinez.senate.gov>.

Sincerely, Mel Martinez, United States Senator, <http://martinez.senate.gov>.

Here in Montana, though almost anyone can carry a gun, kids start legally driving at 14, there were no speed limits on many roads until recently, and there are no laws concerning at what age it is legal for kids to camp-out in state parks without adult supervision, surprisingly, there are fairly restrictive fireworks laws—especially compared to Indiana. Small firecrackers and sparklers are allowed, but rockets, roman candles, and most really fun stuff cannot be sold. Fortunately, I was able to order and have delivered various major bomb making supplies and chemicals, and rockets are not much of a challenge to a determined pyrotechnician.

Lately, though, I have spent a lot of time working at taking apart the packs of 100 small firecrackers they sell here only in June and July, so that I can have individual firecrackers. The fireworks manufacturers (and maybe the state of Montana) don't really want you to do this, of course. They would rather you blow 100 at once, imitating machine gun fire, in a blaze of small glory. Also, they would rather that you not ignite individual firecrackers in your hand and throw them, but, naturally, that's what I want to do.

What I'm doing (with my son-in-law, Saul, and his friends) is teaching them how to have 'firecracker wars' like we used to do down by Big Walnut Creek when we were kids. This activity is not only great fun, I'm also writing about it and taking pictures for my boys' website, ThitherAndYon.com[™].

What you do is have two to four guys build two to four sand 'forts' several feet apart on a sand bar. These can be as simple as a single 'wall' facing the other fort(s) or something more elaborate. These forts are then 'manned' by the standard 2' tall plastic army men that can still be purchased cheaply if you find the right source. When all is ready, each person stands behind their fort and tosses lit firecrackers at opposing plastic soldiers. When your soldiers are all knocked down (dead) your army has lost. For safety's sake, we now wear one leather glove for the igniting/throwing hand and sunglasses. In the old days, we didn't bother with any of that crap and sometimes paid the price when a firecracker would go off too soon or get sand from an explosion in the eye. Ouch!

Unfortunately, the Chinese have made it more difficult to deconstruct the firecracker packs. I can remember from the old days having to unwind a thread which bound all the individual firecracker fuses together with a long 'master' fuse. Now the manufacturers wind a red thread around all the fuses in one direction (say, clockwise) and a white thread around in the opposite direction. This makes it pretty tedious to do the separation required to play firecracker war. The operation always has to be done very carefully, because you don't want to pull the individual fuses out of the firecrackers and you want to preserve the master fuse as best you can because it is, after all, very useful for long time-delay explosions.

Have you discovered if the firecracker packs where you buy fireworks are also now complicated in this way? Let me know and I'll send you pictures when I get them completed.

20080707-01 15:09 Bill Re: Deconstucting Firecrackers

Dear SteveB,

I do remember a thread being integrated into the braid of a package of firecrackers, but the ones I've disaggregated in the last couple of years didn't have a thread—let alone two. May be a matter of brands.

What a I do remember is being careless as hell with firecrackers and having several blow up in my hand or face. I always looked at my hand after such a mishap to see if my finger(s) were intact.

My only selfish pyrotechnic regret these days is not being able to buy a good cherry bomb. You just can't get the powerful, dangerous ones these days. My favorite activity with them, besides lifting cans and other hollow things, was shooting them into trees full of starlings with a slingshot. You could light a cigar and then pull back the slingshot, cherry bomb in the pouch with the fuse up, and light the green fuse. The cherry bombs had enough mass that they could be propelled a couple of hundred feet to birds or other victims.

20080708-01 11:06 SteveB Re: Deconstucting Firecrackers

Dear Bill,

Don't remember ever firing cherry bombs with a slingshot, but that's a good idea—except for the inherent danger of maybe drawing it back near your face. Those things would take half your face off if you got very unlucky.

I do remember shooting a lot of the colored cracker balls with a slingshot, at all kinds of things. Gooch and I were just reminiscing about this.

Cherry bombs may be a thing of the past (though they must still be available somewhere), but if you want big explosions you can still make your own M-80's, M-100's, and even M-200's, like I do with stuff from:

<http://www.skylighter.com>.

<http://www.pyrocreations.com>.

Cool, huh?

20080708-02 14:43 SteveB Video: "Who Killed the Electric Car?" Energy

Worth watching if you haven't already seen it...

<http://video.google.com/videoplay?docid=-7202740060236675590>

20080710-01 14:33 SteveB Fw: Stop Energy Market Speculation Now!

from StopOilSpeculationNow.com:

Visit this Website to learn more about how Congress can dramatically reduce the price of oil and gas. With your help, Congress will take action now on this important issue.

<http://www.stopoilspeculationnow.com/>

"Finding His Faith" by Lisa Miller and Richard Wolffe, NEWSWEEK

July 12, 2008, (<http://www.newsweek.com/id/145971>)

(So much has been made about Barack Obama's religion. But what does he believe, and how did he arrive at those beliefs?)

In 1981 Barack Obama was 20 years old, a Columbia University student in search of the meaning of life. He was torn a million different ways: between youth and maturity, black and white, coasts and continents, wonder and tragedy. He enrolled at Columbia in part to get far away from his past; he'd gone to high school in Hawaii and had just spent two years "enjoying myself," as he puts it, at Occidental College in Los Angeles. In New York City, "I lived an ascetic existence," Obama told NEWSWEEK in an interview on his campaign plane last week. "I did a lot of spiritual exploration. I withdrew from the world in a fairly deliberate way." He fasted. Often, he'd go days without speaking to another person.

For company, he had books. There was Saint Augustine, the fourth-century North African bishop who wrote the West's first spiritual memoir and built the theological foundations of the Christian Church. There was Friedrich Nietzsche, the 19th-century German philosopher and father of existentialism. There was Graham Greene, the Roman Catholic Englishman whose short novels are full of compromise, ambivalence and pain. Obama meditated on these men and argued with them in his mind.

When he felt restless on a Sunday morning, he would wander into an African-American congregation such as Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem. "I'd just sit in the back and I'd listen to the choir and I'd listen to the sermon," he says, smiling a little as he remembers those early days in the wilderness. "There were times that I would just start tearing up listening to the choir and share that sense of release."

Obama has spoken often and eloquently about the importance of religion in public life. But like many political leaders wary of offending potential backers, he has been less revealing about what he believes—about God, about prayer, about the connection between salvation and personal responsibility. In some respects, his reticence is understandable. Obama's religious biography is unconventional and politically problematic. Born to a Christian-turned-secular mother and a Muslim-turned-atheist African father, Obama grew up living all across the world with plenty of spiritual influences, but without any particular religion. He is now a Christian, having been baptized in the early 1990s at Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago. But rumors about Obama's religion persist. In the new NEWSWEEK Poll, 12 percent of voters incorrectly believe he's Muslim; more than a quarter believe he was raised in a Muslim home.

His baptism presents its own problems. The senior pastor at Trinity at the time of Obama's baptism was the Rev. Jeremiah Wright Jr., the preacher who was seen damning America on cable TV for weeks last spring—and will doubtless be seen again this fall. In the NEWSWEEK Poll, almost half of the respondents say Obama shares at least some of Wright's views; nearly a third say Wright might prevent them from voting for the presumptive Democratic nominee.

The story of Obama's religious journey is a uniquely American tale. It's one of a seeker, an intellectually curious young man trying to cobble together a religious identity out of myriad influences. Always drawn to life's Big Questions, Obama embarked on a spiritual quest in which he tried to reconcile his rational side with his yearning for transcendence. He found Christ—but that hasn't stopped him from asking questions. "I'm on my own faith journey and I'm searching," he says. "I leave open the possibility that I'm entirely wrong."

The story of Obama's faith begins with his mother, Ann. Raised in the Midwest by two lapsed Christians, she lived and traveled throughout the world appreciating all religions but confessing to none. One of Ann's favorite spiritual texts was "Joseph Campbell and the Power of Myth," a set of PBS interviews with Bill Moyers that traces the common themes of religion and mythology, Obama's half sister, Maya Soetoro-Ng, tells NEWSWEEK. When the family lived in Indonesia, Ann, on occasion, would take the children to Catholic mass; after returning to Hawaii, they would celebrate Easter and Christmas at United Church of Christ congregations. Ann later went back to Indonesia with Maya, and when Obama visited, they would take him to Borobudur, one of the largest Buddhist temples in the world. Later, while working in India, Ann lived for a time in a Buddhist monastery.

Visiting temples was not just tourism for Ann. "These kinds of experiences were a regular part of our childhood and our upbringing, and were important to [our mother] because they involved ritual," says Maya. "She thought that ritual was very beautiful. The idea of human beings' striving to be better, having the curiosity and questions about all these things, [was] perpetual and constant inside her."

Did Ann believe in God? Obama calls his mother "an agnostic." "I think she believed in a higher power," he says. "She believed in the fundamental order and goodness of the universe. She would have been very comfortable with Einstein's idea that God doesn't play dice. But I think she was very suspicious of the notion that one particular organized religion offered one truth."

Obama's father, raised Muslim in Kenya, was, by the time he met Ann, "a confirmed atheist" who considered religion "mumbo jumbo," writes Obama in "The Audacity of Hope." (Barack Obama Sr. left the family when Obama was 2.) During his years in Indonesia, Obama went first to a Catholic school—and then to a public elementary school with a weekly class of religious education that reflected the dominant Muslim culture. He was raised, in part, by his stepfather, a man named Lolo, who "like many Indonesians ... followed a brand of Islam that could make room for the remnants of more ancient animist and Hindu faiths," Obama wrote in "Dreams From My Father." "He explained that a man took on the powers of whatever he ate." Lolo introduced young Obama to the taste of dog meat, snake meat and roasted grasshopper. In Indonesia, Obama has said, he saw women with and without head coverings and Muslims living comfortably next to Christians. He has said that his life among Muslims in Indonesia showed him that "Islam can be compatible with the modern world."

Though Obama was a serious student in Hawaii—and, even then, a seeker—"Dreams" describes an adolescence there of predictable teenage drinking and smoking (and basketball). During his first two years of college at Occidental, he says, he was "not taking anything particularly seriously, or at least, on the surface, not taking anything particularly seriously." After transferring to Columbia, though, the spiritual quest began in earnest.

People who knew him around that time describe a reserved, monkish man, uninterested in the extracurriculars of New York student life: bars, socializing, gossiping. William Araiza was in a political science seminar with Obama their senior year, and what he remembers most is Obama's detachment. "I don't want to imply he was intentionally aloof, he just seemed like he wasn't part of the college gang," Araiza says. "He was the kind of guy who didn't live in the dorms, didn't hang out on campus." Obama's first job out of college was at Business International, a research service in New York. "There was a lot of socializing," says Beth Noymer Levine, one of Obama's colleagues. "Here you had a hotbed of young singles—from the socializing there would be some storytelling—but [Obama] pretty much stayed out of that stuff ... He was very together, very mature, and I was 23 and felt like a train wreck next to him."

Obama says his spiritual quest was driven by two main impulses. He was looking for a community that he could call home—a sense of rootedness and belonging he missed from his biracial, peripatetic childhood. The visits to the black churches uptown helped fulfill that desire. "There's a side very particular to the African-American church tradition that was powerful to me," he says. The exuberant worship, the family atmosphere and the prophetic preaching at a church such as Abyssinian would have appealed to a young man who lived so in his head. And he became obsessed with the civil-rights movement. He'd become convinced, through his reading, of the transforming power of social activism, especially when paired with religion. This is not an uncommon revelation among the spiritually and progressively minded. ("There's no more dramatic story in American life" than the story of the civil rights movement, says North Carolina Rep. David Price, who knows Obama professionally and writes about politics and religion. "You could not continue to be kind and gentle in your personal life and also be denying other people's humanity.") When Gerald Kellman recruited Obama to go to Chicago as a community organizer, he remembers, the young man was "very much caught up in the world of ideas." He was devouring Taylor Branch's "Parting the Waters," which is part history of the civil-rights movement, part biography of Martin Luther King Jr.

In Chicago, Obama found that organizers and activists there (and elsewhere) were employing a progressive theology to motivate faith groups to action. Using the writings of Paul Tillich and, especially, Reinhold Niebuhr—and also King, African-American and Roman Catholic liberation theologians, and Christian fathers like Saint Augustine—local religious leaders emphasized original sin and human imperfection. Christ's gift of salvation was to the community of believers, not to individual people in isolation. It was therefore the responsibility of the faithful to help each other—through deeds—to respond to the call of perfection that will be fully realized only at the end of time. Adherents of this particular theology frequently refer to Matthew 25: "Whatever you neglected to do unto the least of these, you neglected to do unto me." Everyone, in other words, is in this salvation thing together.

Obama's organizing days helped clarify his sense of faith and social action as intertwined. "It's hard for me to imagine being true to my faith—and not thinking beyond myself, and not thinking about what's good for other people, and not acting in a moral and ethical way," he says. When these ideas merged with his more emotional search for belonging, he was able to arrive at the foot of the cross. He "felt God's spirit beckoning me," he writes in "Audacity." "I submitted myself to His will, and dedicated myself to discovering His truth."

Was it a conversion in the sense that he heard Jesus speaking to him in a moment after which nothing was the same? No. "It wasn't an epiphany," he says. "A bolt of lightning didn't strike me and suddenly I said, 'Aha!' It was a more gradual process that traced back to those times that I had spent in New York wandering the streets or reading books, where I decided that the meaning I found in my life, the values that were most important to me, the sense of wonder that I had, the sense of tragedy that I had—all these things were captured in the Christian story." And how much of the decision was pragmatic, motivated by Obama's desire, as he says in "Dreams," to get closer to the people he was trying to help? "I thought being part of a community and affirming my faith in a public fashion was important," Obama says.

The cross under which Obama went to Jesus was at the controversial Trinity United Church of Christ. It was a good fit. "That community of faith suited me," Obama says. For one thing, Trinity insisted on social activism as a part of Christian life. It was also a family place. Members refer to the sections in the massive sanctuary as neighborhoods; churchgoers go to the same neighborhood each Sunday and they get to know the people who sit near them. They know when someone's sick or got a promotion at work. Jeremiah Wright, whom Obama met in the context of organizing, became a friend; after he married, Obama says, the two men would sometimes get together "after church to have chicken with the family—and we would have talked stories about our families." In his preaching, Wright often emphasized the importance of family, of staying married and taking good care of children. (Obama's recent Father's Day speech, in which he said that "responsibility does not end at conception," was not cribbed from Wright—but the premise could have been.) At the point of his decision to accept Christ, Obama says, "what was intellectual and what was emotional joined, and the belief in the redemptive power of Jesus Christ, that he died for our sins, that through him we could achieve eternal life—but also that, through good works we could find order and meaning here on Earth and transcend our limits and our flaws and our foibles—I found that powerful."

Maya says their mother would not have made the same choice—but that Ann understood and approved of Obama's decision: "She didn't feel the same need, because for her, she felt like we can still be good to one another and serve, but we don't have to choose. She was, of course, always a wanderer, and I think he was more inclined to be rooted and make the choice to set down his commitments more firmly."

After his stint as an organizer, Obama went to Harvard Law School. He didn't officially join Trinity until several years later, when he returned to Chicago as a promising young lawyer intent on becoming a husband, a father and a professional success. Around the time Obama was baptized, he says he studied the Bible with gifted teachers who would "gently poke me about my faith." As young marrieds, Barack and Michelle (who also didn't go to church regularly as a child) went to church fairly often—two or three times a month. But after their first child, Malia, was born, they found making the effort more difficult. "I don't know if you've had the experience of taking young, squirming children to church, but it's not easy," he says. "Trinity was always packed, and so you had to get there early. And if you went to the morning service, you were looking at—it just was difficult. So that would cut back on our involvement." After he began his run for the U.S. Senate, he says, the family sometimes didn't go to Trinity for months at a time. The girls have not attended Sunday school. The family says grace at mealtime, and he talks to the children about God whenever they have questions. "I'm a big believer in a faith that is not imposed but taps into what's already there, their curiosity or their spirit," he says.

Amid the hubbub, Obama continued to try to work out for himself what it meant to be a person of faith. In 1999, while still in the Illinois State Senate, he shared an office suite with Ira Silverstein, an Orthodox Jew. Obama peppered Silverstein with questions about Orthodox restrictions on daily life: the kosher laws and the sanctions against certain kinds of behavior on the Sabbath. "On the Sabbath, if I ever needed anything, Barack would always offer," remembers Silverstein. "Some of the doors are electric, so he would offer to open them ... I didn't expect that."

Since severing ties with Wright and Trinity, Obama is a little spiritually rootless again. He lost a friend in Wright—and he lost a home, however tenuous those ties may have been toward the end, in Trinity. He has not found a new church, and he doesn't plan to look for one until after the election. "There's an aspect of the campaign process that would not make it a good time to figure out whether a particular church community worked for us," he says. "Because of what happened at Trinity, we'd be under a spotlight."

Nevertheless, his spiritual life on the campaign trail survives. He says he prays every day, typically for "forgiveness for my sins and flaws, which are many, the protection of my family, and that I'm carrying out God's will, not in a grandiose way, but simply that there is an alignment between my actions and what he would want." He sometimes reads his Bible in the evenings, a ritual that "takes me out of the immediacy of my day and gives me a point of reflection." Thanks to the efforts of his religious outreach team, he has an army of clerics and friends praying for him and e-mailing him snippets of Scripture or Midrash to think about during the day.

The Rev. Kirbyjon Caldwell—who gave the invocations at both of George W. Bush's inaugurals and presided over the wedding of the president's daughter Jenna—is among those on Obama's prayer team. When Caldwell talks about Obama, he can barely keep the emotion out of his voice. The thing that impresses him most, he says, is that when he asks Obama, "What can I pray for?" Obama always says, "Michelle and the girls." "He never says, 'Pray for me, pray for my campaign, pray that folks will quit bashing me.' He always says, 'Pray for Michelle and my girls'."

But Obama's faith is not without its critics. Some on the right say his particular brand of Christianity is a modern amalgam—unorthodox, undisciplined, even insincere. Last month Dr. James Dobson accused Obama of "deliberately distorting the traditional understanding of the Bible to fit his own world view, his own confused theology." The campaign responded that Obama was reaching out to people of faith and standing up for families.

When Franklin Graham asked Obama recently how, as a Christian, he could reconcile New Testament claims that salvation was attainable only through Christ with a campaign that embraces pluralism and diversity, Obama tells NEWSWEEK he said: "It is a precept of my Christian faith that my redemption comes through Christ, but I am also a big believer in the Golden Rule, which I think is an essential pillar not only of my faith but of my values and my ideals and my experience here on Earth. I've said this before, and I know this raises questions in the minds of some evangelicals. I do not believe that my mother, who never formally embraced Christianity as far as I know ... I do not believe she went to hell." Graham, he said, was very gracious in reply. Should Obama beat John McCain, he has history on his side. Presidents such as Lincoln and Jefferson were unorthodox Christians; and, according to a Pew Forum survey, 70 percent of Americans agree with the statement that "many religions can lead to eternal life." "My particular set of beliefs," Obama says, "may not be perfectly consistent with the beliefs of other Christians."

Last March, when video clips of Wright damning America blitzed the airwaves, Obama wrote a speech about race that he hoped would save his campaign. But it was, to some, also a speech about faith. Obama tried to explain his relationship with his pastor, to appeal to Americans' sense of the best in themselves. He spoke of racial divides in America as "a part of ourselves we have yet to perfect," and of his pastor as a flawed, human creature. "That speech," says Paul Elie, the Catholic author of "The Life You Save May Be Your Own," "is steeped in Christianity. We have relationships, they're all flawed, we're all broken. You can't renounce your history with a person at a stroke, we have to fare forward with other imperfect people and resist the claims to perfection coming from both sides." After Wright's performance a month later at the National Press Club, Elie says, Obama was right—and Christian—to repudiate him.

Did Obama see the race speech as a religion speech? Last week, aboard the campaign plane, he said: "Race is a central test of our belief that we're our brother's keeper, our sister's keeper ... There's a sense that if we are to get beyond our racial divides, that it should be neat and pretty, whereas part of my argument was that it's going to be hard and messy—and that's where faith comes in." As the general election wears on, Obama will have to summon all of his faith, in all of its complexity. Few things in life are harder, or messier, than the last months of a presidential campaign.

20080713-02	17:52	SteveM	Obama Says No to English as National Language
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

The polls show that 83% of Americans want English as the National language, only 15% opposed! Let's get a mitt and get in the game politicians!

Press 1 for McCain in English; Press 2 por Obama en Español

What dumb a*s point was he trying to get across? Was the idea that we should teach our kids Spanish just so we can order a sandwich at an American restaurant. Thanks, Obama, for looking out for me! (Sarcasm!!)

Barack Obama continues to show that he is not ready for the presidency, and more important, America is not ready for him. Our kids should not be told to learn Spanish. Our kids should be told to learn! English and math and science, engineering, so they can become contributing citizens.

Obama's example in his speech is that Americans sound silly when they go to France because they can only say a simple phrase. What's his elitist point?

English is the language of international business, commerce, science, engineering and technology. Even Formula One drivers must be fluent in English and they don't even race in the U.S., (England, Australia and Canada though).

What's Spanish the international language of? Drug running and illegal immigration? Tin Horn South American dictators? The Japanese and Germans have built car plants here in the U.S. and along with the Ford and GM they also have test tracks here in AZ. What learned language(s) do you think would better serve commerce?

Only in America would left-wing, pandering, Barack Obama tell Americans that their kids should learn Spanish.

20080714-01 12:04 SteveB Re: Obama Says No to English as National Language

Dear SteveM,

Now you're talkin' my language! Actually, every kid in America should start learning a foreign language in kindergarten and continue through high school or college. And the preferred language should be Spanish because, as the Miss Universe pageant just proved, the best-looking, sexiest women in the world are Hispanic. But it would be good if our school kids learned English too, so they can teach it to all those beautiful Hispanic woman flocking to our shores.

20080716-01 10:27 SteveM Fw: Navy Petty Officer Mike Monsoor

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com has verified the part of the email about the funeral: <http://www.snopes.com/politics/military/monsoor.asp>. But the big, insidious lie in this email is the accusation that "the media won't make this news." It appears that this story was covered extensively in the news media, so what we have here is yet another attempt to stir-up distrust of the media. The opportunity is also taken for a little patriotic saber rattling. —SteveB]

"Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of GOD."—Matthew 5:9

Navy Petty Officer Mike Monsoor, a Navy EOD Technician, was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor posthumously for jumping on a grenade in Iraq, giving his life to save his fellow SEALs.

During Mike Monsoor's funeral in San Diego, as his coffin was being moved from the hearse to the grave site at Ft. Rosecrans National Cemetery, SEALs were lined up on both sides of the pallbearers route forming a column of twos, with the coffin moving up the center. As Mike's coffin passed, each SEAL, having removed his gold Trident from his uniform, slapped it down embedding the Trident in the wooden coffin.

The slaps were audible from across the cemetery; by the time the coffin arrived grave side, it looked as though it had a gold inlay from all the Tridents pinned to it. This was a fitting send-off for a warrior hero.

This should be front-page news instead of the cr*p we see every day.

Since the media won't make this news, I choose to make it news by forwarding it onto you guys. I am proud of our military and the men and women who serve in it. They represent the highest and finest values of this country.

The liberal media never reports this type thing please forward it to a few of your friends... God bless the men and women in our Military.

20080716-02 12:01 SteveB Fw: Guns, as the Right Sees Them

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

1. An armed man is a citizen. An unarmed man is a subject.
2. A gun in the hand is better than a cop on the phone.

3. Colt: The original point and click interface.
4. Gun control is not about guns; it's about control.
5. If guns are outlawed, can we use swords?
6. If guns cause crime, then pencils cause misspelled words.
7. Free men do not ask permission to bear arms.
8. If you don't know your rights, you don't have any.
9. Those who trade liberty for security have neither.
10. The United States Constitution ©1791. All Rights Reserved.
11. What part of 'shall not be infringed' do you not understand?
12. The Second Amendment is in place in case the politicians ignore the others.
13. 64,999,987 firearms owners killed no one yesterday.
14. Guns only have two enemies; rust and politicians.
15. Know guns, know peace, know safety. No guns, no peace, no safety.
16. You don't shoot to kill; you shoot to stay alive.
17. 911: Government sponsored Dial-a-Prayer.
18. Assault is a behavior, not a device.
19. Criminals love gun control, it makes their jobs safer.
20. If guns cause crime, then matches cause arson.
21. Only a government that is afraid of its citizens tries to control them.
22. You have only the rights you are willing to fight for.
23. Enforce the gun control laws we ALREADY have, don't make more.
24. When you remove the people's right to bear arms, you create slaves.
25. The American Revolution would never have happened with gun control.

20080721-01 12:28 SteveB Re: John McCain's Military Experience

Dear SteveM,

I had forgotten that McCain was one of the famous Keating-5 back in the 80's until I saw a biography on CNN this weekend.

I guess he said that it was worse than when he was a prisoner of war. I guess so...he was caught red-handed being crooked as hell. Amazing he was ever able to recover from that embarrassment! About the worst corruption scandal in Senate history.

This guy is a crook and a liar and will take any political position to get ahead. He will sell his soul on any issue and has repeatedly.

And this was after he informed the audience that he had been so depressed in Hanoi that he attempted suicide. What a hero! And what could these experiences possibly have taught him about running a country? What exactly did he do that was heroic anyway? Try to kill himself? A hero has to save somebody, not totally fail in his mission. Who did he save? They didn't find anybody he saved for the bio. War hero? How? I guess I'm a war hero too then. I even succeeded at my mission (at the Ft. _____ radio station) and even managed to stay out of prison camp I Hanoi.

What a crock of sh*t McCain's stuff is! What an ordinary loser! And that would be bad enough, but this guy also should be in a nursing home somewhere. I suppose he would claim he a nursing home hero too...for trying to hang himself with his Depends.

I think we need to try something new. I don't think anything can be worse than dummy Bush. Just calling a spade a spade.

20080721-02 09:19 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

I love the way McCain was talking today or yesterday about all the "trouble on the Iraq-Pakistan border". LOL

Ya, he's such an expert on foreign affairs! He ain't senile at all!

If Obama had done that, the press would have been all over him like flies on a dead skunk. When McCain does it, it gets buried and attributed, I guess, to his age and excused, I take it, because he's a "war hero."

The guy scares the hell out of me, though nothing has ever scared me more than that awful fake smile of his. Creepy!

I guess we just gotta pray that he dies before the convention so a live, rational human being can become the Republican candidate.

20080721-03	09:29	SteveM	Fw: Obama's Gaffes
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

In one of his more egregious and easily demonstrated lies, made even more so by the day he decided to let it loose on, Obama has rewritten WWII history such that the allies liberated Auschwitz. Obama also spoke about his uncle, who was part of the American brigade that helped to liberate Auschwitz...

Auschwitz of course is in Poland. It was liberated by the Red Army on Jan 27 1945. Poland, on most maps is usually placed to the east of Germany, although we may need to investigate the geography textbooks the Messiah used as a child...

All it takes is one gaffe to taint a Republican for life. The political establishment never let Dan Quayle live down his fateful misspelling of "potatoe." The New York Times distorted and misreported the first President Bush's questions about new scanner technology at a grocers' convention to brand him permanently as out of touch.

But what about Barack Obama? The guy's a perpetual gaffe machine. Let us count the ways, large and small, that his tongue has betrayed him throughout the campaign:

1. Last May, he claimed that tornadoes in Kansas killed a whopping 10,000 people: "In case you missed it, this week, there was a tragedy in Kansas. Ten thousand people died—an entire town destroyed." The actual death toll: 12.
2. Earlier this month in Oregon, he redrew the map of the United States: "Over the last 15 months, we've traveled to every corner of the United States. I've now been in 57 states? I think one left to go." [Wasn't this a joke? —SteveB]
3. Last week, in front of a roaring Sioux Falls, S.D., audience, Obama exulted: "Thank you, Sioux City... I said it wrong. I've been in Iowa for too long. I'm sorry."
4. Explaining last week why he was trailing Hillary Clinton in Kentucky, Obama again botched basic geography: "Sen. Clinton, I think, is much better known, coming from a nearby state of Arkansas. So it's not surprising that she would have an advantage in some of those states in the middle." On what map is Arkansas closer to Kentucky than Illinois?
5. Obama has as much trouble with numbers as he has with maps. Last March, on the anniversary of the Bloody Sunday march in Selma, Ala., he claimed his parents united as a direct result of the civil rights movement: "There was something stirring across the country because of what happened in Selma, Ala., because some folks are willing to march across a bridge. So they got together and Barack Obama Jr. was born." Obama was born in 1961. The Selma march took place in 1965. His spokesman, Bill Burton, later explained that Obama was "speaking metaphorically about the civil rights movement as a whole."
6. Earlier this month in Cape Girardeau, Mo., Obama showed off his knowledge of the war in Afghanistan by homing in on a lack of translators: "We only have a certain number of them, and if they are all in Iraq, then it's harder for us to use them in Afghanistan." The real reason it's "harder for us to use them" in Afghanistan: Iraqis speak Arabic or Kurdish. The Afghans speak Pashto, Farsi or other non-Arabic languages.

7. Over the weekend in Oregon, Obama pleaded ignorance of the decades-old, multi-billion-dollar massive Hanford nuclear waste cleanup. [I'm drawing a blank too. —SteveB]

8. On Memorial day Barack Obama told a beautiful lie about his uncle on his mother's side (his mother does not have a brother) who helped liberate Auschwitz (Auschwitz was liberated by the Soviet Army). [We got this one, above, already. —SteveB]

9. While Obama DOES make many, many "gaffes"—the dumb "oops!" things like 57 states, etc.—he also makes statements revealing HIS HORRENDOUS JUDGEMENT—e.g. SUNDAY: "Iran is tiny...not a problem," MONDAY: "Iran is a grave threat" (among many others).

My concern is that the latter will be "excused" as merely gaffes, rather than seen as disqualifying core features of Obama.

For more see: http://www.americanthinker.com/blog/2008/05/john_fund_on_the_obama_gaffe_m.html.

20080722-01 10:21 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08

Dear SteveM,

But Obama's "gaffes" are usually just small things misspoken and often immediately corrected...such as the Sioux Falls thing...or jokes, such as the 57 states thing.

So what if he confused Auschwitz and Buchenwald telling an apparently true story?

<http://voices.washingtonpost.com/44/2008/05/obamas-uncle-and-the-liberatio.html>

McCain's gaffs usually involve muddled, confused understanding of important facts, such as when he misspoke in Iraq about Sunny and Sh*t Muslims and some statements he has made concerning Iran. I just learned this morning how rabidly pro-free-trade McCain is. I wonder who is paying him to take that stupid anti-American stand?

Give me youth! Give me integrity! Give me hip cool blackness and soul! Give me jazz and boogaloo in the White House, not Glenn Miller, I.V.'s and Depends™!

20080722-02 20:24 SteveB BP: Food for Fuel; Energy

Dear BP:

I just saw your TV commercial concerning your alternative energy efforts.

While I applaud such efforts, I feel that you make a grave mistake if you think that, as the commercial states, using America's and the world's food supply to make fuel is a "no brainer."

Have you taken a look at the price of corn and meat lately?

BIG MISTAKE! Let's use our food for food, find a way to burn coal cheaply and cleanly to make electricity, and develop good electric cars and trains. Thank you.

20080723-01 17:22 SteveM Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08

Dear SteveB,

I'm counting on his ole lady to keep him in check. I see BHO can even answer questions from his own handpicked traveling press corp. Too lame for me!

20080723-02 20:11 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08

Dear SteveM,

McCain is turning nasty from a lack of attention. What a big baby! All he does is react to Obama. He never leads.

He is way, way too confused about recent Iraq history to begin to be commander-in-chief. He acts as dumb as Hillary.

I'm worried that he may still think the Cold War is still going on and decide to nuke Russia. Who knows what his senility is capable of.

20080723-03 08:11 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/23/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

McCain is turning nasty from a lack of attention. What a big baby! All he does is react to Obama. He never leads.

He is way, way too confused about recent Iraq history to begin to be commander-in-chief. He acts as dumb as Hillary.

I'm worried that he may still think the Cold War is still going on and decide to nuke Russia. Who knows what his senility is capable of.

20080724-01 10:27 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/21/08

Dear SteveM,

Yes, he (Barack) "CAN"!

Bottom line: Watch the candidates. Barack is a smart, nice, honest guy. (The points in your other email have all been debunked.) McCain is a senile curmudgeon with a bad temper, a bad memory, and a proven history of corruption. He is on the wrong side of every issue I care about or that the American people care about. Beside all that, liberal and conservative mean almost nothing. It will be a landslide.

20080724-02 20:53 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—07/24/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

What an amazing contrast today!

McCain continues to confuse everything about the "surge", speaks of Iraq as if it were Viet Nam and as if there will ever be a clear-cut victory or defeat—no matter who is President or what the strategy, continues to call his honorable opponent a traitor, and confuses history again by stating that the conflict in Iraq came before the conflict in Afghanistan. How is he not a complete blithering idiot?

Meanwhile, Obama lays out a bright new future of world cooperation before a quarter million cheering people in Berlin.

I think it is absolutely essential for Republicans to try to find some way to get this guy, McCain, off all our backs, before he destroys the party forever. What a loser! Embarrassing, really. Maybe even more so than Bush and his buddies.

20080725-01 10:10 Dennis Re: Stop Energy Market Speculation Now!

from SteveB:

Visit this Website to learn more about how Congress can dramatically reduce the price of oil and gas. With your help, Congress will take action now on this important issue.

Dear SteveB,

Are you serious? Congress is inept, corrupt, and incompetent. They can't do anything about oil prices.

Speculators are not driving the price of oil. The real culprit is good old-fashioned supply and demand. Global growth has been on a tear in recent years, and should climb by more than 4 percent this year. That growth has required oil, a lot of it. The supply of oil, however, has not kept pace. Nor will we see a significant increase in production in the coming year.

For oil prices to continue falling, and to stay below $100 for a sustained period, will require a major global downturn in growth. And the weight of evidence suggests that's not going to happen anytime soon.

20080725-02	19:02	Dennis	"The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" Energy
-------------	-------	--------	---

T. Boone Pickens isn't alone... Alternative energy just got a strong new backer. Billionaire James Tisch, CEO of holding company Loews, wrote an op-ed piece for the Washington Post in support of wind and solar power. He said two factors will drive the shift to alternative energies — the high price of traditional fuels and cheaper alternative technologies. According to Tisch, wind energy is economic at about 7 cents per kilowatt-hour, down from 15 cents to 20 cents a few years ago. It costs 12 cents per kilowatt-hour to build a gas-fired power plant.

And with retail electricity prices set to rise as much as 30% this year, we should see a "liftoff" in solar energy. Tisch says a rooftop solar panel will pay for itself in 10 years, a 10% return on capital. Compared with the less-than 5% yield municipal bonds pay, that represents an extraordinary investment. Finally, Tisch believes hybrid cars will soar in popularity. It costs 2 cents per mile for a hybrid versus 20 to 25 cents per mile in traditional fuels.

"The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" by James Tisch, The Washington Post

July 20, 2008, (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/18/AR2008071802614.html>)

Bob Dylan said it best: "The answer is blowin' in the wind." While politicians and environmentalists have been busy arguing about how best to require that greenhouse gases be curtailed, the world around them has changed. The precipitous rise in oil and gas prices over the past year has made the debate on greenhouse gas emissions moot. The reduction in the output of those gases will move forward at warp speed, not because of rules, regulations and cap-and-trade decrees but because of free markets and economics.

Two factors are driving this sea change. First, the price of our traditional fuels — oil, gas and coal — has risen dramatically. Second, the silent and inexorable march of technology has dramatically reduced the costs of clean alternative energy sources such as wind turbines and photovoltaics, which converts sunlight into electricity. The result will be a dramatic reduction in the emission of greenhouse gases — without politicians passing a single additional piece of legislation.

How have we come to this point? Blame it on oil prices and technology. The extraordinary increase in the price of hydrocarbons and coal has created a price umbrella under which competing technologies can flourish. Already, clean wind energy is increasing by leaps and bounds. In the past five years, more than 5 gigawatts of wind turbine capacity has been built in Texas alone; on days when the winds whistle along the plains, wind energy represents just under 10 percent of the electrical supply in the Lone Star State.

Today, wind energy is economic at about 7 cents per kilowatt hour, and that is without factoring in production tax credits. A few years ago, that cost was 15 to 20 cents. Compare the 7 cents for wind energy with the 12 cents per kilowatt hour required to build a gas-fired power plant, and you can see why there is a veritable land rush to harness wind energy.

Texas is not the only state where the gravitational pull of economics and markets is working. Across the country, the price of electricity has skyrocketed for homeowners and businesses. This steep increase is creating a wide opening for technologies such as photovoltaics. The cost of this technology has fallen over the past few decades and is about ready for prime time. That retail electricity prices are increasing by as much as 30 percent this year will only accelerate the arrival of the "liftoff" phase of photovoltaics. Also, retail electricity prices in New York may soon be headed to 30 cents per kilowatt hour. At those prices, an investment in a photovoltaic array on the rooftop of a house will pay for itself in fewer than 10 years, resulting in a greater than 10 percent return on one's capital cost. Compared to the sub-5 percent yield on municipal bonds, this return represents an extraordinary investment.

So, without a gavel coming down in a single additional legislative session, wind and the sun will become much bigger contributors to our national electricity mix. And an added benefit is that they generate absolutely no greenhouse gases.

One more fast-approaching major change will all but guarantee that curtailment of greenhouse gases becomes an issue of the past: the advent of the electric car. Improvements in battery technology mean that in the next five to 10 years, plug-in hybrid electric vehicles will finally be on our roads. Within the next two to three decades, the gasoline-fired internal combustion engine automobile will no longer be sold. Since gasoline accounts for more than a third of worldwide oil demand, the rise of plug-in hybrids represents a mega-change in terms of emissions.

Plug-in hybrids are dramatically cheaper to operate than today's cars. They will consume about 2 cents' worth of electricity to travel one mile, compared with the current 20- to 25-cent cost of driving a mile using gasoline. If consumers flock to them because of their lower operating costs, and they will, the resulting reduction in greenhouse gases will be a benefit of extraordinary proportion — one that the Kyoto crowd thought could be achieved only through draconian regulation.

These changes will take place not only in the United States but worldwide. These technologies will be adopted simply because they are cheaper than their hydrocarbon-burning cousins. The old world of burning hydrocarbons to generate energy and power automobiles is on the way out because it is being priced out of the market. In the next few decades, it is possible that the only thing oil products will be used for is to power airplanes, heavy vehicles and ships. All that is required on the part of those wanting to reduce greenhouse gases is a little patience so these new technologies can be adopted by the market.

So there is a silver lining in the run-up of hydrocarbon prices. These elevated costs are causing a dramatic change in our energy and automobile mix that will result in significantly less greenhouse gas emissions in the next few decades. The change is already on the way based on today's technology, and it will only quicken with the technological advances that are sure to come. Without a doubt, the answer is blowin' in the wind.

(The writer is chief executive of Loews Corp., which has interests in Diamond Offshore drilling; Boardwalk Pipelines, an interstate natural gas pipeline company; and HighMount Exploration and Production, which drills for natural gas.)

20080725-03	21:05	SteveB	Re: "The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" Energy Speculation
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dennis,

But the demand is buoyed by speculators who have no intention of taking delivery of any oil. They simply sell to other speculators who artificially drive up the price. Oil is now like gold. Do you really think all those buyers of gold futures actually want to hold any gold? Not by a long shot. The result is a bubble of artificially high prices which WILL burst, but the net result is that we are all hurt, including many of the speculators, and all of the legitimate buyers.

20080726-01	09:09	Dennis	Re: "The Answer's in the Wind—and Sun" Energy Speculation
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

from SteveB:

But the demand is buoyed by speculators who have no intention of taking delivery of any oil.

Dear SteveB,

So is corn, soybeans, and pork bellies. That's how the market works. If whiney Americans (Phil Gramm got that right) weren't so addicted to oil (Dubya got that right), speculators wouldn't buy oil futures. And if the American dollar wasn't so weak (an even bigger factor in high oil prices), gold wouldn't be increasing in price (it still trails oil in appreciating, by the way).

If Congress wasn't such a bunch of cowardly wimps they would have been adding taxes to the price of gas at the pump all along. Gas shouldn't be so cheap (it's twice as much in Croatia and three times as much in Turkey, were I just traveled and paid the price without whining). If it was priced higher, then Americans would drive sensible cars, conserve resources (by not paying things they don't need with money they don't have), and might even start saving money for the future.

I'm not counting on that happening in my lifetime. So while Americans whine away I'm buying energy and gold stocks. It sure beats sending useless petitions to Congress.

20080726-02	09:16	Dennis	"After 20 Years of Ignoring This Investment, It's Finally Time to Buy" Wind Energy
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

"After 20 Years of Ignoring This Investment, It's Finally Time to Buy" by Chris Mayer, Daily Wealth

July 26, 2008, (<http://www.dailywealth.com/666/After-20-Years-of-Ignoring-This-Investment-It-s-Finally-Time-to-Buy>)

I've just spent the past few days in Vancouver at the annual Agora Financial Investment Symposium. It's always an interesting conference.

This year, Jim Rogers, of Investment Biker fame, spoke at the conference. Rogers, as usual, predicted the bull market in commodities has much further to run. He likes cotton, sugar, and coffee — all are 60% to 80% off their all-time highs. He advised attendees to pocket those little sugar packets that hotels have lying around for coffee and tea.

I spoke as well. The big theme to cover was "Seeking Profits in a Time of Risk and Scarcity," which is something I focus on all the time in my advisories. We own a number of scarce assets — everything from water rights out West, to oddball industrial metals, to office space in Tokyo.

Energy, though, is always the big subject at conferences right now. I think we've reached a point in this investment cycle where the focus will now shift to ideas that ease the high cost of energy through new energy-efficient products and materials.

Alternatives to hydrocarbon fuels also get a lot of attention. Wind, for example, is getting a lot of ink lately thanks to T. Boone Pickens' forceful editorials supporting it. Pickens, who made billions in the oil and gas patch, has focused his latest efforts on water and wind.

To tell you the truth, I haven't closely investigated clean energy since I started investing two decades ago. Alternatives like solar, wind, and geothermal simply couldn't compete with coal, oil, and natural gas on cost. But that's all starting to change...

Over the weekend, James Tisch, the CEO of one of my favorite companies (and favorite investments), Loews Corp, wrote an editorial in The Washington Post also supporting wind power. Tisch is one of the best investors in the world.

He's heavy into oil and natural gas. His company owns pieces of oil-service company Diamond Offshore and natural gas pipeline operator Boardwalk Pipeline. And he has a wholly owned subsidiary, HighMount Exploration & Production, which drills for natural gas.

Nonetheless, Tisch thinks that the old hydrocarbon fuels — oil, natural gas, and coal — are getting priced out of the market. They are getting so expensive the alternatives look cheaper. This is rendering the debate on greenhouse gas emissions moot.

He writes: "The reduction in the output of those gases will move forward at warp speed, not because of rules, regulations and cap-and-trade decrees, but because of free markets and economics."

He used the example of wind power. Today, the economics of wind energy work at 7 cents per kilowatt-hour. That is a lot better than the 12 cents per kilowatt-hour required to build a gas-fired plant.

That explains the rapid build-out of wind power in places such as Texas. "In the past five years," Tisch writes, "more than 5 gigawatts of wind turbine capacity has been built in Texas alone; on days when the winds whistle along the plain, wind energy represents just under 10% of the electrical supply in the Lone Star State."

On this point, I'd mention that owning wind-swept land in Texas is a pretty good idea.

Tisch makes other good points I'd like to pass along... He talks about electricity prices rising as much as 30% this year in some parts of the country. That makes rooftop solar panels suddenly look like a good economic proposition. Tisch maintains that such an investment would "pay for itself in fewer than 10 years, resulting in a greater-than-10% return on one's capital cost." Compared with the sub-5% you get on Treasuries, it looks like a good deal.

It's a fascinating time. There will still be ways to make money selling the old fuels. These changes don't take place overnight. But I agree with Tisch. The high price of energy sets in motion the wheels that will ultimately bring it lower. For investors today, our focus should start to shift more toward finding the winners in the new era of clean energy. Finally, he notes the improvements in battery technology. He predicts that within the next two or three decades, no one will sell a gasoline-powered car. Hybrids are already "dramatically cheaper" than today's cars. To travel one mile, they consume 2 cents worth of electricity, compared with 20-25 cents using gasoline. Again, pure economics will drive the change.

(Editor's note: Chris Mayer is the editor of Capital & Crisis, an investment advisory we read religiously at DailyWealth.)

20080728-01	11:01	SteveB	Re: "After 20 Years of Ignoring This Investment, It's Finally Time to Buy" Wind Energy, Energy Speculation
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dennis,

Wind is good. Using our food supply to make fuel has turned out to be a disaster and a boon to starvation everywhere.

I disagree with you, though, about speculation in the commodities markets. Speculators artificially and unnaturally drive-up the cost of all commodities, and I believe the problem requires a worldwide solution. Gold is simply the most obvious market to see how the effect works. Gold is essentially, even intrinsically worthless, except in the electronics, dental, and jewelry industries. These legitimate uses would never support a $1000/oz. price, since there is plenty of gold in the world and more coming daily.

Now, I believe almost completely in the free and fair marketplace. But something has to happen:

1. Anyone who buys a futures contract MUST take delivery of the goods. The contract cannot be resold. (not as free a market as I would like).
2. (better) When anyone purchases or re-purchases a futures contract, they have to pay the eventual supplier for delivery of the goods. If you re-sell the contract, the new buyer must also pay the eventual supplier for the delivery of the goods.
3. The other possibility would be to license legitimate traders who actually buy commodities and bar pure speculators from the marketplace. Why not?

Any of these will get speculators out of, especially, the energy, food and metals markets, and prices will fall to what would be reflected in a free and fair marketplace. These would be truly free and fair prices for all—buyers and sellers.

If you like the existing marketplace so well, look at the ease with which Enron manipulated and corrupted it. The band-aids applied have not fixed the underlying speculative problems.

But I share your concerns that governments, especially ours, seem to be pretty inept (at best) in everything they do. But we have learned much over the last hundred years or so about how to implement capitalism in countries where one would not suspect it could be successful—Russia, Colombia, China, India, and the list could be very long indeed if egos like Evo Morales, Hugo Chavez (DON'T BUY FROM CITGO!), and Fidel Castro didn't stand in the way. So I don't think I share your cynicism.

Take care. Hope you're enjoying your summer as much as I am here in Montana.

20080728-02	12:23	Dennis	Re: Energy Speculation
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------

from SteveB:

I disagree with you, though, about speculation in the commodities markets.

Dear SteveB,

These government agencies—the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the Federal Reserve, The U.S. Treasury, and the U.S. Dept of Energy—have all found speculation has little effect on oil prices. Blaming rising prices on speculation is an act of denial (despite the raising the example of Enron, which really was market manipulation—this, however, is no Enron). The causes include primarily a weak dollar and increased usage in developing nations, most of which provide subsidies to their populations to keep them from rioting. (The U.S. would be hypocritical to criticize these subsidies, by the way, with all the U.S. agricultural subsidies that distorts the price of food in developing countries.)

Americans have been spoiled by cheap energy for too long. All of the easy-to-access oil has been pumped. The world now has a lot more people with the money, particularly in Asia, to compete for energy resources. If Americans want to avoid confrontations over scarce energy resources in the future, there needs to be a huge investment in alternative energy immediately.

Personally, I think Americans are 30 years late in waking up to this and would rather whine about it than make the sacrifices necessary to solve the problem. Call me a cynic, but I envision that Americans are more likely to go to war to secure oil than to sacrifice their bloated lifestyles.

20080728-03	13:09	Dennis	"Lovable, Moronic Capitalists" Economics, Greed
-------------	-------	--------	---

"Lovable, Moronic Capitalists" by Bill Bonner, Daily Reckoning

July 25, 2008, (<http://dailyreckoning.com/lovable-moronic-capitalists/>)

The first economists—the two Adams, Adam Smith and Adam Ferguson—called themselves "moral philosophers." They were studying the human economy as though it were an anthill—to see how it worked. They figured it must follow rules—just like all other things under Heaven—and tended to see mistakes people made, such as spending too much money, as moral failings.

Modern economists are more like auto mechanics. They think they can control the economy with a screwdriver. And to some extent they're right. Which is why the world economy is in such a mess; they turned the wrong screws. But it's why we moral philosophers are having such a good time; finally, we get to laugh and say "I told you so."

In the news last week was word that the Argentines are taking back their national airline—Aerolineas Argentinas. Back in the heyday of privatization—led by economists from the University of Chicago—they sold it to a Spanish group. But now the Iberians can't seem to make a go of it—not with oil over $130 a barrel—so the Argentines are re-nationalizing it.

What is the likelihood that the heirs to Juan Peron will do a better job of running an airline than a private company? You might put the same basic question to Gordon Brown. What are the odds the Labor Party will run Northern Rock better than private owners? And in the United States of America—almost 30 years after the Reagan Revolution—the federal government is effectively nationalizing the biggest and most important financial institutions in the world, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Between the two of them, Fannie and Freddie hold almost half the entire nation's mortgages—equal to about a third of the U.S. GDP. It probably won't be too long before General Motors is nationalized too. Someone is going to have to pay GM's pension bill. Even if the company isn't nationalized, its health and pension obligations probably will be. But can America's Republicans and Democrats do a better job of running a mortgage company or an auto company than card-carrying capitalists?

On the evidence, maybe so.

Milton Friedman warned that if you put government in charge of the Sahara there would soon be a shortage of sand. But the heirs to Friedman have some explaining to do. The smartest of them have crashed airlines, busted banks and wrecked builders. They've ruined businesses so simple that even a half-wit could have made a profit. Fannie and Freddie couldn't win at their business, even though the deck was stacked in their favor from the very beginning. And the Friedmanites' beloved markets—which are supposed to "look ahead" and anticipate trouble before it happens—must have shut their eyes years ago. They walked out into the blazing desert without a map or a hat; no wonder they've been acting strange.

To many of the world's politicians and opinion mongers, the evidence of the last 12 months has proved what they always suspected—that capitalists are greedy s.o.b.s. But we would have spotted them that...and readily conceded that they are often morons too. Still, a system in which people get what they've got coming is infinitely better than a system in which people take only what government gives them. That's the essential difference between capitalism and socialism: one yields to Armani-clothed fraud; the other to cheap-suit force. Both have their moral failings. But one is wicked; the other is merely dumb.

Want to know who caused Aerolineas Argentina's bumpy ride...and who's responsible for bringing down Fannie and Freddie? Follow the money. Before 1971, in the Bretton Woods monetary era, major economies used the dollar as a reference of value. The greenback was a North Star—helping businessmen and investors find their way. The U.S. dollar was reliable because it was tied to gold, which the U.S. Treasury promised to deliver to any country at a rate fixed at $42 an ounce. Then, on Aug. 15, 1971, the U.S. Treasury reneged.

Egged on by modern economists, the last link with gold was cut. Governments, investors and businessmen could still look to the dollar as a point of reference, but good luck to them. This disgraceful mischief caused even the stars to wobble.

Since then, the U.S. government could print almost as many dollars as it wanted. Arguably, it printed too many. For something—perhaps it was too much cash and credit in circulation—led American homeowners to think house prices would rise forever. They over borrowed, homebuilders overbuilt, and Fannie and Freddie—even with all their Ph.D. economists on the payroll—over-lent. And something—maybe it was the same thing—caused the price of oil to rocket upwards 400% in the last five years.

The airlines hadn't seen that coming either. So, the big lenders and the high fliers are in trouble. Those are only two of a long list of today's troubles that can be traced...directly or indirectly...to the world's monetary system of the last 37 years. Businessmen, consumers and investors respond to financial signals. If interest rates are set too low, they tend to borrow too much. If the money supply expands too rapidly, they expand too rapidly too. To make a long story short, a bubbly supply of cash and credit led to bubbly markets.

The U.S. and major foreign stocks market bubbled up to all-time highs in Jan., 2000; then they headed down. In inflation adjusted terms, most never recovered. Then, in 2003, it was housing's turn...followed by emerging markets...and lately, oil and commodities.

Sure, the capitalists are greedy. And sure, many of them make mistakes. But with feds rearranging the heavens, it's a wonder they didn't wash up more often.

(Bill Bonner is the founder and editor of The Daily Reckoning. He is also the author, with Addison Wiggin, of the national best sellers Financial Reckoning Day: Surviving the Soft Depression of the 21st Century and Empire of Debt: The Rise of an Epic Financial Crisis. Bill's latest book, Mobs, Messiahs and Markets: Surviving the Public Spectacle in Finance and Politics, written with co-author Lila Rajiva, is available now by clicking here: <http://agorafinancial.com/>.)

20080728-04	15:37	SteveB	Re: Energy Speculation, Gasoline
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

Dear Dennis,

I forgot to mention in my last email that I have thought we should tax our gasoline and diesel fuel up to $4.00 a gallon for the past 30 years. Fuel would still be a minor part of what it costs to drive a decent automobile. The tax could have gone to develop alternatives, but, in the government's hands, who knows what would actually ever have gotten done.

And, yes, it is what Europe has done for a long time and that's where I got the idea a long time ago. If WE had done it too, I think everything would be better now. Every time alternative fuels have been able to start-up (see "Who Killed the Electric Car"), the price of oil has been made to plummet and the alternatives have gone under.

We need a major life-style change toward public transportation and electric cars and more compact cities. We have been sold down the river by our politicians. The weak dollar and the federal debt are just two small signs of that.

But from what I hear from my friends in Europe, they are practically in a state of chaos now. Their policy is now hurting almost everyone. They have not done cr*pola to develop alternatives to imported oil. They are the sissy's and whiners, not Americans, in my book. Why are they in chaos instead of being able to rely on their non-existent alternatives? What went wrong there that wouldn't have gone wrong here?

But I am positive that speculation adds greatly, at the present time at least, to the prices of all important commodities. Again, just look at the ridiculous price of gold? How can you believe our government that oil isn't exactly the same situation? It's only human nature that it would be so. Speculation IS "market manipulation".

Down with "free" trade!

20080729-01 11:05 J. Tester Energy, Gasoline

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for contacting me about the need for Congress to take action to address the increasing price of gasoline. I understand your concerns because I use 3,000 gallons of diesel every year on my farm. Today's prices add up quickly and put a dent in the bottom line for families and small businesses across the state.

To get at the heart of the recent spike in the price of gas, I am working hard with my Senate colleagues to crack down on speculators and market manipulators who inflate gas prices above the levels dictated by global supply and demand. I also believe that investing in renewable energy can help put our country on the path to energy independence. Last year, Congress passed legislation designed to curb America's dependence on oil. The Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007 (H.R. 6) greatly expanded the production of biofuels like cellulosic ethanol and biodiesel. This legislation also increased fuel efficiency standards to 35 miles per gallon by 2020. These are good initiatives that will help curb our country's reliance on foreign oil.

In addition, I strongly support responsible energy development here in America. The oil and gas industry is a vital part of Montana's economy and I want to find ways to develop this industry in the future. Montana's Richland County is one of the fastest growing oil production areas in the nation. Small companies in this area are providing our nation with fuel, jobs, and economic development. These producers compete with some of the largest oil companies and bring diversity to the marketplace. To further development in this area, I am also working closely with my colleague Senator Dorgan of North Dakota to promote development of the Bakken formation in Eastern Montana and North Dakota.

There are also vast areas in the Gulf of Mexico open to oil drilling. These sites are one of the United States' best sources of petroleum production. Many of the areas currently open to exploration are not being developed, despite significant incentives to do so. We need to continue to maximize areas currently available before sensitive regions are opened to new development.

As we move forward on legislation to bring down the price of fuel, be assured that I will keep your views in mind. Please do not hesitate to contact me again in the future if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely, Jon Tester, United States Senator, <http://tester.senate.gov/contact>

20080801-01 11:03 SteveM Fw: Executive Summary; McCain vs. Obama

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

THE EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

I know that some of you don't like to read long drawn out missives...so here's the executive summary...

Candidate	Congress	Military
John McCain	26 Years	22 Years
Barrack Obama	143 days	0

20080801-02 16:31 SteveB Re: Executive Summary; McCain vs. Obama

Dear SteveM,

And it is so very obvious that all McCain's years have contributed to nothing but a negative-minded, senile half-brain intent upon maintaining his crabby, ill-tempered, dictatorial view of the status quo. I'm ready for a fresh approach myself. Any fresh approach.

20080801-03 19:27 SteveB To: Glenn Beck; Obama Radio Point 08/01/08 @ 18:45, Experience

Dear Glenn Beck:

I was just listening to your program. You were asking if anyone out here could tell you what experience Obama has that would qualify him to be President. And I must say that, at least on this subject, your listeners do not seem to be a very intelligent group, no insult intended.

What Obama has run is a very, very good Presidential campaign. This is a big organization and he has done a better job than the Clintons or, arguably, John McCain, who has mainly been a failure at Presidential campaigns...at least up to the present moment.

And let me ask you this—what has McCain ever run except a campaign? Not a company. Not a state. Not a federal bureaucracy. He has been in the Senate longer than Obama, but that's not necessarily a plus for those of us who are sort of anti-politician.

Obama is smart and will try something new. He is not like McCain—old, crusty, senile, and determined to maintain the awful status quo no matter what cost.

PS: The Republican party has sold us all down the river, and I believe McCain will continue on the Bush road to ruin. I should have included that McCain is small-minded, negative, and often confused, if not lying. I think it is interesting how closely you and the other Conservative radio hosts stick to the Republican talking points. Please try to think more independently. Your country and its future are at stake.

20080801-04 20:19 SteveM Re: Glenn Beck; Obama Radio Point, Experience

Dear SteveB,

And yet , like Pelosi and Reed, you didn't answer the question, but attacked McCain on his age. Please refer to the earlier Executive summary. [20080801-01]

20080802-01 10:10 SteveB Re: Glenn Beck; Obama Radio Point, Experience

Dear SteveM,

I did mention McCain's executive experience...running his campaigns. Other than that, the only executive experience he seems to have is running scandal and corruption during the Keating Five times. He didn't even run the prison camp and what was he, a captain? They don't run anything except maybe one airplane. I've even heard that Cindy gets on top and runs things in the bedroom, thanks to Viagra. He does have more Senate experience. So what? He's senile now! That's not an attack on his age, that's a fact! Senility is so apparent in the videos that it's amazing.

20080802-02 15:21 SteveB "McCain: The Most Reprehensible of the Keating Five"

SteveM,

Come on, be honest, is it because he's black?

All McCain can do is attack Obama and they are the stupidest attacks imaginable. McCain has no program, no plan, unless we can trust him at his word to be:

1. Against abortion.
2. For free trade (at our complete peril).
3. For destroying the environment.
4. For raising taxes.
5. For more and more illegal immigration.
6. For war in Iraq for 100 years.
7. For a continuation of that idiot Bush's policies to reduce our liberties, spy on us, create an immense deficit, pursue provably needless wars, do nothing about any problems such as factory loss, healthcare, illegal immigration, education, deteriorating standard of living, the rape of America via free trade, energy (except to increase oil company profits...what a funny coincidence!), etc., etc.

And I am so very tired of seeing Obama attacked for his lack of experience. I say, great! You have not addressed the point I made about Hillary and that I now make about McCain. They may both have spent many years in Washington (running up massive favor debts to the good old boy networks), but neither of them have any but the tiniest bit of true executive experience. If McCain EVER had any, he's forgotten it by now. Hillary stole that of her husband and called it her own. P-U-L-E-E-Z-E !!! You seem to have no come-back for that glaring fact.

The American people deserve a CHANGE! The change Obama represents is not more risky than having the country run by a crooked idiot like Bush or McCain!

McCain was never exonerated in the Keating 5 scandal. In fact, he was severely reprimanded by the Senate. He is still completely in the pocket of the lobbyist and big business. This is your hero?

"McCain: The Most Reprehensible of the Keating Five" by Tom Fitzpatrick, Phoenix New Times

Nov. 29, 1989, (<http://www.phoenixnewtimes.com/1989-11-29/news/mccain-the-most-reprehensible-of-the-keating-five/>)

(The story of "the Keating Five" has become a scandal rivaling Teapot Dome and Watergate.)

You're John McCain, a fallen hero who wanted to become president so desperately that you sold yourself to Charlie Keating, the wealthy con man who bears such an incredible resemblance to The Joker.

Obviously, Keating thought you could make it to the White House, too.

He poured $112,000 into your political campaigns. He became your friend. He threw fund raisers in your honor. He even made a sweet shopping-center investment deal for your wife, Cindy. Your father-in-law, Jim Hensley, was cut in on the deal, too.

Nothing was too good for you. Why not? Keating saw you as a prime investment that would pay off in the future.

So he flew you and your family around the country in his private jets. Time after time, he put you up for serene, private vacations at his vast, palatial spa in the Bahamas. All of this was so grand. You were protected from what Thomas Hardy refers to as "the madding crowd." It was almost as though you were already staying at a presidential retreat.

Like the old song, that now seems "Long ago and far away." Since Keating's collapse, you find yourself doing obscene things to save yourself from the Senate Ethics Committee's investigation. As a matter of course, you engage in backbiting behavior that will turn you into an outcast in the Senate if you do survive.

They say that if you put five lobsters into a pot and give them a chance to escape, none will be able to do so before you light the fire. Each time a lobster tries to climb over the top, his fellow lobsters will pull him back down. It is the way of lobsters and threatened United States senators.

And, of course, that's the way it is with the Keating Five. You are all battling to save your own hides. So you, McCain, leak to reporters about who did Keating's bidding in pressuring federal regulators to change the rules for Lincoln Savings and Loan.

When the reporters fail to print your tips quickly enough—as in the case of your tip on Michigan Senator Donald Riegle—you call them back and remind them how important it is to get that information in the newspapers.

The story of "the Keating Five" has become a scandal rivaling Teapot Dome and Watergate. The outcome will be decided, not in a courtroom, but probably on national television.

Those who survive will be the sociopaths who can tell a lie with the most sincere, straight face. You are especially adept at this.

Last Friday night, on The John McLaughlin Show, which features well-known Washington journalists, the subject of the Keating Five was discussed. Panelist Jack Germond suggested that three of the Keating Five were probably already through in politics.

So you spend your days desperately trying to make sure you will be one of the survivors. You keep volunteering to go on radio and television stations to protest your innocence. Last week you made ABC's Nightline. Not long before that you somehow managed to get James Kilpatrick, the national columnist, to write a favorable paragraph about you. Last Sunday morning, you made it to national television again; this time on ABC's This Week With David Brinkley. You smiled at the panel with your usual studied insouciance. Sitting next to you was Senator John Glenn of Ohio.

Brinkley, Sam Donaldson, and George Will were the interrogators.

It was a sobering scene. There you sat with Glenn, both sweating before the cameras, waiting to answer questions: two badly tarnished American icons. No one forgets that Glenn was the first American astronaut to orbit the Earth. You won't let anyone forget that you were a prisoner of war. But you have played that tune too long. By now your constant reminders about your war record make you seem like a modern version of Arthur Miller's tragic failure Willy Loman.

Clearly, both you and Glenn sold your fame for Charles Keating's money. It was a Faustian bargain. It was also a bad joke on the rest of us and a disaster for many old people who lost their life's savings to Keating.

The money was never really Keating's to give. But he never would have got his hands on it if you and the rest of the Keating Five didn't halt the government takeover for two long years while Keating's people continued their looting.

And now, the tab for the Savings and Loan heist must be paid from taxpayer pockets.

On Sunday, Senators Dennis DeConcini, Alan Cranston, and Riegle refused offers to appear on the Brinkley show. What must we make of that?

You, the closest of them to Keating and the deepest in his debt, have chosen the path of the hard sell. You may even make it out of the pot, but to many, your protestations of innocence taste like gall. You are determined to bluff your way. You will stick to your story that you were acting to help a constituent and intended to do nothing improper. The very fact you attended the meeting makes you guilty, just as every man who entered the Brinks vault went to prison.

You insist that an accounting firm Keating hired told you Lincoln was sound. Alan Greenspan, who Keating also hired, wrote a report saying it was sound. Why shouldn't you believe the people Keating hired? You were, after all, fellow employees.

Perhaps you might silence your own conscience about all this someday.

Just keep telling everyone that it was your wife's money invested in that shopping center with Keating and that you knew nothing about it. Keep saying that cynical newspaper people don't understand that every move you make has always been for the enrichment of Arizona, the education of our Native Americans on the reservation, for the love of the elderly in Sun City and Green Valley.

Keep telling them that it wasn't that you were bought off but that Charlie Keating got special help only because he was one of the biggest employers in the state.

Just keep sitting there and staring into the camera and denying that Keating bought you for money and jet plane trips and vacations.

So what if he gave you $112,000? Just keep smiling at the cameras and saying you did nothing wrong. Maybe the voters will understand you took those tiring trips to Charlie's place in the Bahamas in their behalf. Certainly, they can understand you wanted to take your family along. A senator deserves to travel on private jets, removed from the awful crush of public transportation.

You sought out a master criminal like Keating and became his friend. Now you've discarded him. It shouldn't be surprising that you are now in the process of selling out your senatorial accomplices.

You're John McCain, clearly the guiltiest, most culpable and reprehensible of the Keating Five. But you know the power of television and you realize this is the only way you can possibly save your political career.

20080802-03 15:48 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/02/08
--

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

In the most amazing development of all, McCain's campaign came out the other day and said that McCain doesn't speak for the campaign!

And don't tell me he doesn't want to increase taxes. He has gone back and forth and I don't think he knows what he wants to do. As he says, he doesn't know anything about economics. LOL I've never seen a worse run campaign in my life than McCain's, or a more devious, dishonest, negative, bitter, and boring one. Even worse than Hillary's abortion of a campaign.

These guys make Obama look like a towering genius.

20080803-01 10:53 SteveM The John Edwards Story; Media
--

[This is another one of those emails which, while honestly telling about a true story on the surface, are in fact telling a world of lies beneath. I'd estimate that this email is 50% truth and 50% lie so insidious that it will literally rot the brain of an unsuspecting person. Here's the way it works. Fact (and admittedly a strike against Democrats by association): John Edwards is a rat. Lie: There was no liberal media conspiracy. It's a pretend conspiracy that the truth is being repressed. How dare they! The hidden agenda of this email is nefarious—to sow distrust and discord, at the very least. In a time when there is as much conservative media as liberal, the myth of the evil, lurking liberal media is perpetuated. And then there is the simple yet inescapable fact that one of the most basic and important tenants of liberal media is, duh, trying to get as close to the truth as it is humanly possible to do. Media that does not do this cannot be defined as liberal. Is respect for the truth a basic tenant of Rupert Murdoch, FOX, Rush, Glenn, and the rest of the conservative media gang? Their only basic tenants seem to be money and their agenda. In the case of this "liberal media conspiracy" the facts are these: All the mainstream media, liberal, middle, and conservative were slow to pick up the story from the Enquirer, because there was no corroboration. Then The Washington Post was a leader in getting the story out there in July, 2008, forcing Edward's admission to the affair, if not the child, on Aug. 7, 2008. —SteveB]

Dear SteveB,

Here's some better detail from MSM web sites also. Why has this not made the Evening news like the discredited story about McCain's alleged "affair did for 3 days?

Note that unlike the NY Times "McCain affair" there are photos, eye witnesses and progeny as a result of an affair, from which DNA could be offered up as proof of paternity. Oh how the mighty Democratic social conscience for us un-washed minions has fallen.

You got love the liberal media, Note the LA Times pull the story than reposted and edited venison with no explanation in Oct 7, and only 5 days ago reposted with an explanation once the "evidence" became "overwhelming", and in their BACKYARD!

What a bunch of

"Media Ignore John Edwards' Hotel Hookup" by James Hirsen, Newsmax

July 28, 2008, (<http://www.newsmax.com/Hirsen/John-Edwards-Blackout/2008/07/28/id/324710>)

After the National Enquirer broke a story about former presidential candidate John Edwards' meeting at the Beverly Hilton Hotel with his alleged mistress and the child they had together, the mainstream media proceeded to ignore the story.

Coverage of the incident continued to be noticeably absent from most major print and broadcast outlets. Fox News did corroborate that Edwards was where the Enquirer reporters said he was at the time, and that the potential Democratic vice presidential nominee was not registered as a guest at the hotel.

This is a man who ran as a serious candidate for leader of the free world and whose wife is bravely battling cancer. Still, the mainstream media for the most part have remained mum.

<http://www.foxnews.com/story/0,2933,391426,00.html> [July 25, 2008. —SteveB]

A Beverly Hills hotel security guard told FOXNews.com he intervened this week between a man he identified as former Sen. John Edwards and tabloid reporters who chased down the former presidential hopeful after what they're calling a rendezvous with his mistress and love child.

The Star Report: John Edwards sex scandal? Hey, you didn't hear it here, by Jeff Thomas, Mercury News

July 30, 2008, (http://www.mercurynews.com/news/ci_10048465 [Dec. 17, 2011, article no longer available. —SteveB])

So what's all this about squeaky-clean Democrat John Edwards and a sordid sex scandal? What, you haven't heard? If that's the case, then maybe you're one of the few remaining Americans who get most of their news from those dead-trees-and-ink thingies.

Members of the so-called Main Stream Media—yes, including this one—have treated the story of an alleged Edwards affair as if it were just another space alien story out of the National Enquirer. But wait! It is indeed the Enquirer that is out in front on this story, but it appears they have slightly more to go on than a UFO sighting.

They say they caught Edwards taking a back elevator to a woman's Beverly Hilton Hotel suite at 2 a.m. last week, and when the stakeout team tried to talk to him about what he was doing there, he bolted back downstairs and hid in a bathroom for 15 minutes before security intervened. The Enquirer says it has photos (and video?) of the whole encounter.

It gets even stranger. The alleged other woman (remember, Edwards is married to Elizabeth Edwards, who is suffering from incurable cancer) is the woman that the Enquirer reported last October was pregnant with Edwards' child. The Edwards campaign's response to that was that, no, the child's father is actually a close, married, aide to Edwards. That's loyalty! So far, there has not been a denial from either Edwards or the woman, who once produced videos for the Edwards presidential campaign, about the alleged escapade in Beverly Hills.

And if it's all a simple misunderstanding, if John Edwards was dropping by a hotel suite at 2 a.m. to say hello to a former campaign worker, then maybe someone should suggest to the politician that he come out and say that. Maybe it was his $500-a-cut hairdresser, for goodness sakes! In which case, money well spent. In any case, it doesn't seem like this is the kind of story that is going to fade into the mists of time. Especially in the slow-news days of August.

"Birth Certificate of Child Linked to Ex-Sen. John Edwards Lists No Father" by Lisa Zagaroli, McClatchy Newspapers

Aug. 21, 2008,

(http://www.mercurynews.com/ci_10067918?source%253Dmost_email%2626978592730A3B8C7F471EACE0DA4EF2.html)

The birth certificate of a child whom a tabloid newspaper claims was fathered by former Democratic Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina doesn't identify the child's father.

The document, obtained through a routine records request, shows that Frances Quinn Hunter was born last Feb. 27 to Rielle Hunter, a videographer who worked on Edwards' presidential campaign last year. But the space for the name of the father is blank, although the child was born more than two months after Hunter identified Andrew Young, Edwards' campaign finance director, as the father of her then unborn child. Young claimed paternity in a statement from his lawyer that was posted on the political blog mydd.com.

"John Edwards Denies Affair with Campaign Worker" LA Times

Oct. 13, 2007, (<http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/washington/2007/10/breaking-news-j.html>)

Former Sen. John Edwards today denied a story in the National Enquirer that he had an extramarital affair with a former campaign worker who followed him on numerous trips around the country.

Without naming the woman, the supermarket tabloid reported online that "Presidential candidate John Edwards is caught in a shocking mistress scandal that could wreck his campaign." The paper's only source is an unnamed friend of the woman who says the two met at a New York bar about 18 months ago. The newspaper quotes the woman as saying, "Sparks flew immediately. She never expected it would turn sexual since John is married and is running for president. But it soon did—and she fell for him."

The Associated Press reported today that Edwards told reporters, "The story is false. It's completely untrue, ridiculous." He said the story was "made-up." [Another great moment in American politics! —SteveB]

"I've been in love with the same woman for 30-plus years," Edwards added, about his wife Elizabeth, who is suffering from incurable cancer, "and as anybody who's been around us knows, she's an extraordinary human being, warm, loving, beautiful, sexy and as good a person as I have ever known. So the story's just false."

(This item was originally posted Thursday evening, Oct. 11. It was removed by an editor Friday but was reposted Saturday in a shortened form.)

UPDATE: Since some have asked for more details on this post, here they are. Better late than never: Thursday evening John Edwards spoke to a group of reporters, denying an alleged affair, initially reported in the National Enquirer, which had become the subject of intense speculation on the web. The Associated Press moved a story on the denial, and our blogger posted an item on the Edwards denial, including some details of the Enquirer story. It also mentioned a Huffington Post item that identified a woman who worked for Edwards and a feature on that woman from Newsweek last winter.

Shortly after, editors trimmed the post to delete the Huffington and Newsweek material, believing it also had not been verified. About 10 hours later a Times editor, concerned about an item now entirely focusing on the Enquirer allegations, removed the entire post and comments, some of which expressed similar concerns.

After web editors discovered the deletion, they launched an internal discussion about the importance of not deleting items from the site without explanation. That resulted in the item being reposted Saturday evening, minus three more paragraphs of Enquirer allegations but retaining the link to the Enquirer story. A brief explanation for the one-day deletion was also posted. Since the reposted item no longer carried the blogger's name, he felt it inappropriate to be responding online to past reader comments, so he removed his responses.

20080803-02	11:13	G. Haselhurst	On Truth & Reality; Philosophy, Science
-------------	-------	---------------	---

Dear SteveB:

Thank you for subscribing to our philosophy / science newsletter: "Philosophy of Science".

Geoff Haselhurst

<http://www.spaceandmotion.com>

Wisdom from Truth and Reality

20080803-03 11:50 SteveB Re: Truth and Reality; Philosophy, Science, Cosmology, Mind of God

Dear Geoff and Karene:

I love your website! Thank you!

I am working on a long poem about the nature of the universe/reality.

I first ran into the theory that matter is the result of a wave phenomenon through space in a series of articles in R&D Magazine, sometime in the 90's. The articles were written by a retired Kodak research scientist whose name now escapes me (I think there was a "Van" in it.). We corresponded briefly and he sent me a copy of one of his unpublished books. I believe he was seen as somewhat of a crackpot by the scientific community, but his theories made some sense to me. I have lately been trying to learn his name to re-read his writings and find out if he is still alive, but have had no luck so far. Have you ever come across such an individual?

At that time, as now, I wonder if TIME could be that wave phenomenon? In that case, if there is a God, all he had to do to create the universe was to begin the "ticking" of time. To me, that has an elegant simplicity, and is certainly no more far-fetched than the Hobbs Field.

BUT, as happy as I am that you have figured out so much of the "apparent" universe, I believe it must be remembered that one cannot prove that we and our universe do not simply exist in a computer program or, as the Buddhists posit, are part of what they refer to as "the Mind of God". If you have studied Zen or seen the movie, Matrix, or read Descartes, you will know what I mean. I would hope that this uncertainty would permeate any search for the truth. All we can ever theorize about, I believe, is this "apparent" universe in which we are somehow immersed. Reality is apparently beyond us.

That said, please allow me to question, as you do, a couple of pet theories of modern physics. The articles on your website raise some good points, but it seems to me, as a lay scientist only, that the big-bang theory, the red shift, Einstein, Hawking, and quantum physics make a pretty good cosmological case, and our best observations seem to support them.

BUT, it certainly gets complicated, doesn't it? Dark matter, dark energy, a time when there was no time (before the big-bang), 16 or so dimensions, an infinity of possible universes, including our Goldilocks one...truly mind boggling stuff!

Lately, I have been wondering this: If, almost 14 billion years ago, a big-bank flung out all the matter in the universe, and if today we see some of that matter in the form of allegedly ~13 billion-year-old galaxies moving away from us at nearly the speed of light, and if it seems to scientists, unfortunately I guess, that there is more "dark energy" in the universe than "dark matter"...then why is there not a big, giant, huge hole left in our visible universe surrounding the spot where the big-bang occurred? Wouldn't it be a logical conclusion that there should be one, and that we should be able to see it?

I would love to know your thoughts on these subjects.

Again, thank you so much for your website and your thoughtful work.

20080803-04 14:02 SteveB Re: The John Edwards Story; Edwards & McCain Affairs, Media

Dear SteveM,

Well...YA! I'm sure Edwards' pr*ck hasn't fallen off the way McCain's must have years ago!

Your email mentioned "McCain's affair"? LOL (Never heard about it on any of my news media...so, thanks for the info...not surprised to know McCain cheated on his wife as well as the American people. Makes me wonder what happened to his first wife, before Cindy took over...? But I knew all about Edwards from all the common media outlets, so I don't see any conspiracy. Even your sources are pretty mainstream.)

20080803-05 14:35 SteveM Re: Edwards & McCain Affairs, Media

Dear SteveB,

Never happened NY Times made up story, reporter was fired, Editor resigned. Since you didn't hear about where you are it now make sense with you support Obama and believe CNN, and Channel that's so bad about facts they've been lampooned on SNL.

I guess we're going to have the start pumping light and truth in to you up there, LOL!

20080803-06 14:42 Trudy Fw: Bad American; Media

"Today is a gift, that is why it is called the Present"—Magyar Gypsy

[Source of original email unknown. These points mostly answer non-existent media accusations and stereotypical "supposed" views of the Left. "WE NEED GOD BACK IN OUR COUNTRY!" Where has he been? Europe? —SteveB]

YES, I'M A BAD AMERICAN

I Am the Liberal-Progressive's Worst Nightmare. I am an American.

I believe the money I make belongs to me and my family, not some Liberal governmental functionary be it Democratic or Republican!

I'm in touch with my feelings and I like it that way!

I think owning a gun doesn't make you a killer, it makes you a smart American.

I think being a minority does not make you noble or victimized, and does not entitle you to anything.

I believe that if you are selling me a Big Mac, do it in English.

I believe everyone has a right to pray to his or her God when and where they want to.

My heroes are John Wayne, Babe Ruth, Roy Rogers, and whoever canceled Jerry Springer.

I know wrestling is fake and I don't waste my time watching or arguing about it.

I've never owned a slave, or was a slave, I haven't burned any witches or been persecuted by the Turks and neither have you! So, shut up already.

I believe if you don't like the way things are here, go back to where you came from and change your own country! This is AMERICA.

If you were born here and don't like it you are free to move to any Socialist country that will have you.

I want to know which church is it exactly where the Reverend Jesse Jackson preaches, where he gets his money, and why he is always part of the problem and not the solution. Can I get an AMEN on that one?

I think the cops have every right to shoot your sorry rear if you're running from them... [What about the rare case where your son runs because he thinks the cops are robbers? Simply, tough luck? Wouldn't it have been possible to save his life by mandating that the State, the Right's dreaded "BIG, BAD GOVERNMENT" be very, very careful and sure before it uses deadly force on its sovereign citizens whom it doesn't even have the right to make carry an ID card, yet somehow have the right to kill. —SteveB]

I also think they have the right to pull you over if you're breaking the law, regardless of what color you are.

And, no, I don't mind having my face shown on my driver's license. I think it's good.....

And I'm proud that "God" is written on my money.

I think if you are too stupid to know how a ballot works, I don't want you deciding who should be running the most powerful nation in the world for the next four years.

I dislike those people standing in the intersections trying to sell me stuff or trying to guilt me into making "donations" to their cause.

I believe that it doesn't take a village to raise a child, it takes two parents.

I believe "illegal" is illegal no matter what the lawyers think.

I believe the American flag should be the only one allowed in AMERICA! [So kiss those state and Confederacy flags goodbye? —SteveB]

If this makes me a BAD American, then yes, I'm a BAD American. If you are a BAD American too, please forward this to everyone you know. We want our country back! WE NEED GOD BACK IN OUR COUNTRY!

20080803-07	15:00	SteveB	Re: Media, McCain, Obama
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

Dear SteveM,

I suppose comedian and drug addict Rush Limbaugh is the guy who knows the truth?

Actually, most of us find CNN to be pretty objective. They bend over backwards to give McCain's ridiculous campaign the benefit of a doubt. FOX is obviously right wing, NBS and MSNBC are left wing. I don't ever watch any of the other networks, but I read a lot of stuff online.

I take it ALL with a giant grain of salt. I just know that when I personally watch what Obama actually does and says, I see an honest, intelligent, positive, concerned man who loves his country and wants it to be better. When I personally watch McCain, I see a bumbling, senile, negative, arrogant, power-hungry man who can't even keep his own story straight, let alone understand the modern world.

I don't listen to what anyone has to say. I watch what has happened, what happens, and what is actually said, and I draw my own conclusions. I don't believe anyone else's conclusions. I have no vested interest in anything but the truth. I want what is best for America. I find it impossible to believe that my eyes and mind deceive me about these two men. I trust my instincts and observations implicitly. I always have and I always will.

I realize that I am not in alignment with Obama's political philosophy, but I know that I was not in alignment with Lincoln's, Kennedy's, or Reagan's, yet these were all great Presidents, BECAUSE THEY WERE INTELLIGENT AND HAD LOVE IN THEIR HEARTS.

I don't believe McCain knows what it means to have love in his heart, and I say that only because I have personally watched what he has done and what he has to say. He is a bitter old man. I honestly do not have any idea whether I am in alignment with his political philosophy, because I cannot for the life of me detect one, at least not one that is consistent. And on every issue where he seems to maintain a modicum of consistence (see previous list), such as being pro-life, pro-free-trade, pro-illegal immigration, favoritism to special interests, especially giant corporations a la Bush...I disagree with him totally and absolutely, and I believe that you do also. This is the philosophy and policies that have sold the American people down the river and you know it. And who can even guess what his tax policy might be.

I don't give a goddamn about political philosophy. Look at radio talk show hosts for instance. On the Right we have a bunch of blithering idiots, and on the Left we have a bunch more blithering idiots. The same thing with almost all of our highly polarized politicians. The truth lies in the Middle Way. This was discovered thousands of years ago and has never been successfully refuted.

What I want in a President is a good man. An intelligent man is a plus. I don't have much faith in government either way, not even our own. But I KNOW from watching him and listening to him that McCain is not a good man, and if he ever was intelligent, he has so obviously lost way too many brain cells by this time to ever be considered so again.

Stop thinking about political philosophy! As my Zen teacher used to tell me, "The only problem with thinking is that it never gets you anywhere." It took me years to realize that he was speaking to my propensity, even need, to be overly logical. It took me years to learn to trust my feelings, yet they have seldom led me astray.

Seek and trust yours and I think you will see that this race is not as philosophically simple as you seem to think. I think you know in your heart that I am right... about that point at least.

Ease up and give this guy a chance to speak to you. McCain and Bush have had their chance and they have failed utterly and demonstrably. Period.

At this point in the history of the greatest nation the world has ever seen, WE NEED A CHANGE! Or do you truly believe that our government has been moving in the right direction? I find it hard to believe that you do.

20080803-08 15:17 SteveB Re: John McCain, Keating Five

The Keating 5 stuff may have been more than 20 years ago, but it reveals the same corruption which is destroying our country. McCain sold his soul and sold us out then, he's obviously sold it since, and he will sell it again. That is simply the kind of leader he is. He is for sale, just like Clinton and Bush before him. I will never believe that this is a good thing for America. This is the one thing needs to change if we are ever to solve our problems.

People don't change. Least of all old, senile people who poop in their pants. :-)

20080804-01 10:31 SteveB Re: John McCain, Keating Five

Dear SteveM,

Thanks for calling. I guess we got cut-off, then we were driving to the store, etc. Sorry.

The whole incident led to my telling Marci about the Keating 5 this morning. She was appalled and amazed that this guy would be able to run for President.

The more I think about it and the more I see how nasty his behavior is, the more I agree. He is a slimy, mangy dog in sheep's clothing and the sheep's clothing is in tatters. He does not deserve your loyalty and support, my friend. He represents everything you are against, believe me.

20080805-01 23:08 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/05/08 & Bonus: "Cindy McCain as Miss Buffalo Chip?"

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT (MISS BUFFALO CHIP):

Senile moment of the day. John McCain nominates his visibly embarrassed wife, Cindy, to partake in the bikers' 2008 Sturgis, ND Miss Buffalo Chip Beauty Contest, where contestants wear tiny bikinis, maybe take them off or get them wet, and must lick/suck pickles while the audience fantasizes they're...

"Cindy McCain as Miss Buffalo Chip?" by Kate Phillips, New York Times

Aug. 5, 2008, (<http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/08/05/cindy-mccain-as-miss-buffalo-chip/>)

(Sturgis, ND) John McCain nominates his visibly embarrassed wife, Cindy, to partake in the bikers' Miss Buffalo Chip Beauty Contest, where contestants must wear tiny bikinis, maybe take them off or get them wet, and eat bananas, pretending they're big penises.

AND, MCCAIN HAS TO DO THIS READING FROM A PREPARED SCRIPT!!!! Ya, this is the fool we need in the White House. OMG!

Video #1 (Go, Cindy!): <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DjtQGAtbe04>.

Video #2 (McCain pardoned): http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sNI_oDEQ4gk.

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

McCain opposed more offshore drilling for oil (the right position, if you ask me) until just after he received a big campaign contribution from big oil in June. Then he flip-flopped. Gee, sure glad this politician can't be bought! Now, can he remember who bought him? LOL!

20080806-01	20:56	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/06/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

After spending the last 2-3 days sarcastically mocking Obama's sensible suggestion to save fuel by properly inflating tires as if it were Obama's only energy proposal when, in reality, it was only one of many, McCain today decided that, well ya, it IS a good idea to make sure your tires are properly inflated and started handing out tire gauges in a serious, rather than in a sarcastic way. Gee, glad you thought of it, Johnny Boy!

This total misrepresentation of the truth that McCain has been engaging in is the kind of lying I think we're all sick to death of in American politics.

20080806-02	21:06	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/06/08—Bonus
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

McCain says he likes Paris Hilton's response "ad" to his despicable, green-with-envy attack ad of Obama in Europe spliced with views of Paris Hilton, Britney Spears, and three huge phallic symbols (so subtle, Johnny Boy!). Just another "uppity" black man, huh? You sure hated that 250,000 people crowd in Berlin, when you usually draw about 200 max., huh, Johnny?

The problem is, cute clever little Paris absolutely skewers McCain in the video "ad", but McCain doesn't seem to get it. LOL

20080807-01	19:31	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/07/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Actually...there wasn't one that I know of, though I'd be willing to bet that Cindy and/or McCain's senior staffers know of at least one, but they ain't tellin'!

Today, either McCain spoke at some event where only the usual 5 or 6 people showed up or Hillary shoved him below the radar of the "liberal news media." Obama was all over the place, and there were Hillary and Bill again, making fools of themselves, as usual. A convention floor fight? Ya, right!

Maybe with Obama on vacation, McCain will be able to get a little news coverage for his outlandish lies, total reversals of principle, outright meanness, and witty slip-ups, gaffs, mistakes, and...uh..."senior moments".

Except...oops...there will be the Olympics to compete against. Sorry, Johnny Boy.

20080808-01	18:12	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/08/08; "John McCain: Profile in Courage? Older Than God?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Well, folks, today McCain was pushed totally out of the news by the Olympics and the John Edwards Affair Debacle. The latter is a subject near and dear to Johnny Boy's heart, of course.

One Senile Moment that I have previously missed in these missives was the concocting of the McCain attack ad in which a bunch of prominent Democrats are taped saying nice things about Johnny Boy. It turns out that these videos were all years old and these Democrats were speaking of the previous incarnation of John McCain, which has now been completely repudiated by the new and improved John McCain. Whew! Obama was easily able to quickly put together a rebuttal attack ad containing more recent quotes from all the same Democrats making comments highly critical of the current incarnation of John McCain. What Johnny Boy expected to gain by all this, except to alienate his base, is anybody's guess.

Great news video on McCain's buddy, "W":

http://www.theonion.com/content/video/bush_tours_america_to_survey.

"John McCain: Profile in Courage? Older Than God?" from The Onion

July 17, 2008, (<http://www.rantsnreviews.com/tag/john-mccain/page/6/>)

Thoughts on Torture: Doesn't support stuff he couldn't handle.

Saturday Night Live Appearance: Solid.

Where He'd Be If Not Running for President: Dead.

Awards: Distinguished Flying Cross (Vietnam War); Silver Star (World War II); Bronze Star (Crimean War).

Inspiring Example: Co-sponsored a campaign finance act with Democrat Russ Feingold, the aim of which is to leave every campaigner as broke as McCain and Feingold.

Key Issues:

Health Care: Supports universal health care for all current and former POWs.

Iraq War: "The United States should no longer act as the world's police but instead as the world's stripper, dressed as the police."

Abortion: Would strongly oppose any legislation that would allow fetuses to be removed from the womb, fed only watery rice porridge, and physically and mentally tortured for months on end.

Immigration: Supports a path to legalization because Latinos are one of the few ethnic groups that don't appear in the senator's recurring nightmares.

Economy: "Once we win this ideological war on radical Islamic extremism which will rage for thousands of years, then we will concentrate on the economy."

Climate: Is against any kind of change at all.

Pakistan/Iran: Will not meet with leaders of unfriendly states, unless it's to give them a head's up that the United States is about to bomb them.

20080808-02	20:00	SteveB	"McCain Madness"
-------------	-------	--------	------------------

From a fellow Republican...

"McCain Madness" by Chuck Baldwin, Wall Street Journal

Feb. 8, 2008, (<http://www.libertylounge.net/forums/27009-mccain-madness-article-chuck-baldwin.html>)

A few weeks before Super Tuesday, my friend Howard Phillips asked me who I thought the Republican Presidential nominee would be. I predicted John McCain. With the results of Super Tuesday now history, most political pundits are also predicting that the Arizona senator will gain the Republican nomination for President. And with Mitt Romney now out of the race, McCain is all but assured the nomination. One did not need to be a seer to figure this one out.

For one thing, President George W. Bush all but destroyed whatever conservative influence was left in the GOP. Peggy Noonan is right about that.

Furthermore, the capitulation and compromise of principle by the Religious Right has also significantly sealed the death warrant of conservatism within the GOP. For the sake of not offending George Bush or losing whatever seat at the table the various leaders of the Religious Right felt they had, their spirit of resistance waned to the point that the very name "Christian Conservative" has lost all meaning, not to mention power.

As a result, Republicans have come to accept Big Government, runaway federal spending, the Welfare State, the Warfare State, the Nanny State, empire-building, gargantuan trade and budget deficits, warrantless eavesdropping, the loss of 4th Amendment rights, ad infinitum, ad nauseam. Therefore, how could anyone expect the vast majority of Republican voters to suddenly rediscover a huge commitment of conviction to conservative principles?

Add to that question the fact that there is only one true conservative/constitutionalist who made it to the Republican primaries: Congressman Ron Paul. And virtually the entire media and political establishment pummeled Congressman Paul to the point that his limited success in the race can be categorized as nothing short of miraculous.

Make no mistake about it: the establishment wants one of its own to succeed George Bush. In order for that to happen, they must manipulate the primaries to ensure that, no matter who wins in November, one of their fellow elitists will still wield power in Washington, D.C. On the Democratic side, both Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama fit the bill. And on the Republican side, John McCain is the ultimate insider. A long-standing member of the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR), John McCain will pursue the goals and ambitions of the globalists with a vengeance. As Pat Buchanan said recently, "John McCain will make Dick Cheney look like Gandhi." Buchanan is right on with that prediction.

Despite a liberal, Big Government track record, many Republican "conservatives" who have always been critical of John McCain are already beginning to warm up to him, feeling that his nomination is inevitable. Include in this list such notables as Grover Norquist, Tony Perkins, and fellow CFR member Richard Land.

Fortunately, not all of the conservative "talking heads" have jumped on the McCain bandwagon. Include in this list: Ann Coulter, who said she would campaign for Hillary Clinton if McCain is the Republican nominee; James Dobson, who said he would never vote for John McCain—no matter what; and Mr. Republican Cheerleader himself, Rush Limbaugh.

Then there is Mike Huckabee: the candidate to whom the evangelical George Bush robots have gravitated. Huckabee is every bit the Big Government liberal that is John McCain. In fact, Huckabee and McCain have developed a very close friendship, according to numerous sources. Many are even predicting that Huckabee will be McCain's running mate, in order to dupe evangelicals into accepting the McCain candidacy. (I have been saying this myself for months.) Even Rob Schenck said this about Huckabee: "After careful and prayerful consideration, I have concluded that an evangelical vote for Mike Huckabee is a vote for John McCain, and a vote for John McCain will be a disaster for this country."

But just who is this man, John McCain?

John McCain's father and grandfather were both admirals in the U.S. Navy. John was schooled in one of the most elite boarding schools in America. He graduated from the Naval Academy where he ranked 894th out of 899 students.

According to Joel Skousen's World Affairs Brief, Feb. 1, 2008, "[John McCain] used nepotism to get ahead: When he was rejected by the National War College, he used his father's contacts with the Secretary of the Navy to make them reconsider." Skousen also notes that "McCain cheated on his first wife after she had a severe accident. He then divorced her and married his multi-millionaire mistress, whose daddy bought McCain a spot in the Congress."

It has also never been explained why the son and grandson of Navy admirals would not rise to the rank of Admiral himself. (He exited the Navy as a Captain.) Was it his numerous adulterous affairs or his violent temper? Or both?

John McCain's biographer Robert Timberg chronicles McCain's numerous sexual affairs with subordinates both when he was an Executive Officer and later Squadron Commander. Obviously, such fraternization is a violation of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Skousen and many others have chronicled McCain's violent temper. Even as a young man, McCain was "a strikingly violent man." Timberg quotes McCain describing his propensity for violence, even as a youngster, saying, "At the smallest provocation I would go off into a mad frenzy, and then suddenly crash to the floor unconscious."

McCain says his vicious temper was transformed after being held as a Prisoner of War by the North Vietnamese. There is no doubt that John McCain was tortured by his Vietnamese captors, but it also seems clear, by both the written and oral records of many, that McCain spent the bulk of his captivity collaborating with his captors.

It is more than interesting that former POW John McCain would use the power of his senate seat to stop the investigation and pursuit of American MIAs in Vietnam. What would possess a former naval officer to do such a thing? In fact, a group of Vietnam veterans has uploaded a web page dedicated to exposing the truth regarding John McCain's record on this matter. See it at:

<http://www.vietnamveteransagainstjohnmccain.com/>.

That John McCain still has a vicious temper is well known. We can all remember him singing "Bomb, bomb, bomb, bomb, bomb Iran," to the tune of the Beach Boys hit song "Barbara Ann." He also said North Korea should be threatened with "extinction." He often boasts of America's 100-year war with Iraq and talks of pursuing enemies "to the gates of hell." There is no doubt, John McCain is one mad man.

Furthermore, McCain's position on a host of issues is extremely problematic for the future of America. On immigration, John McCain joined with Ted Kennedy to sponsor an amnesty bill for illegal aliens. He voted to give social security dollars to illegal aliens. His Hispanic Outreach Director, Juan Hernandez, is a dual American-Mexican citizen widely known for his "Mexico First" declarations.

He repeatedly voted against the Bush tax cuts. He co-authored the McCain/Feingold campaign finance bill that was ruled to be an unconstitutional infringement of the First Amendment. Regarding the Second Amendment, the president of the NRA called John McCain the "worst 2nd Amendment candidate," and Gun Owners of America gives McCain a grade of F-.

John McCain co-sponsored the energy tax bill (along with his senate buddy Joe Lieberman), which would dramatically increase the cost of gasoline. He supports radical global warming legislation. He joined with Democrats (Gang of 14) to block the attempt to confirm conservative, strict constructionist judges. In 2000, he called Christian leaders "agents of intolerance." He has received the endorsement of the pro-abortion Republicans for Choice Political Action Committee. And let's not forget that John McCain was ringleader of the infamous Keating Five ethical scandal, which cost taxpayers more than $160 billion.

Consider, too, the top donors to John McCain's campaign. One will find many of the same multinational corporations that support Democrats Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton also supporting John McCain. Include in this list Goldman Sachs, Citigroup, Lehman Brothers, and JP Morgan Chase & Co.

(By comparison, the top contributors to Ron Paul's campaign are [in order]: 1. Members of the U.S. Army, 2. Members of the U.S. Navy, 3. Members of the U.S. Air Force.) Source: <http://www.opensecrets.org/pres08/contrib.asp?id=N00005906&cycle=2008.>)

(And, in case one is interested, the same big Arkansas conglomerates that supported Bill Clinton also support Mike Huckabee.) Source: <http://www.opensecrets.org/pres08/contrib.asp?id=N00007539&cycle=2008.>)

Even New York Post D.C. Bureau Chief Charles Hurt wrote, "[I]f history is any guide, the McCain we've seen of late on the campaign trail is the most conservative McCain we'll ever see."

To vote for John McCain is madness!

"John McCain's Skeleton Closet" (<http://www.realchange.org/mccain.htm>)

John McCain is a maverick senator, Vietnam veteran and former prisoner of war for 5 years in North Vietnam. In 2000, he nearly beat George W. Bush by being an outspoken, even honest politician, which stunned everybody. He also is known for crafting bipartisan approaches to issues such as smoking and campaign reform.

This time around though, at 71, he apparently decided "now or never" and seems to have sold his soul, suddenly adopting a bunch of boilerplate conservative positions he was brave enough to resist 8 years ago. Now, conveniently, he's even claiming to be a Baptist instead of an Episcopalian.

It didn't look like anyone was buying it for a while there, but dang if he hasn't come back and pretty much sewed up the Republican nomination. McCain went from front runner to 3rd or 4th in various polls, spent all of his huge pile of cash and lost most of his staff, and worked his way back into a dominant position.

That New Time Religion

John McCain grew up Episcopalian. He went to an Episcopalian high school. For at least 15 years, he has been listed as an Episcopalian in authoritative directories such as the Almanac of American Politics and Congressional Quarterly's Politics in America 2008. He told a reporter from McClatchy News Service in June 2007, that he was an Episcopalian.

Suddenly, in Sept., 2007, he's campaigning in South Carolina, the heavily Baptist state where George W. Bush barely managed to stop McCain's presidential campaign 8 years ago. And guess what? McCain tells a reporter "By the way, I'm not Episcopalian. I'm Baptist."

When pressed, he said he's attended the North Phoenix Baptist Church in Arizona for more than 15 years, though he has never been baptized in that church. Now see, that's exactly the problem. Baptism is kind of a big thing in the Baptist Church. (That's how they got the name.) No baptism, not Baptist.

Anyway, details aside, this is one very clear indication of how McCain has changed. Now, he's just another hungry politician, happy to pander if it helps him win. Which eliminates the very reason people were excited about him in 2000—his honesty.

Founding Member of the Keating Five

Back in the old days, defendants in famous trials got numbers—the Chicago Eight, the Gang of Four, the Dave Clark Five, the Daytona 500. McCain was one of the "Keating Five," congressmen investigated on ethics charges for strenuously helping convicted racketeer Charles Keating after he gave them large campaign contributions and vacation trips.

Charles Keating was convicted of racketeering and fraud in both state and federal court after his Lincoln Savings & Loan collapsed, costing the taxpayers $3.4 billion. His convictions were overturned on technicalities; for example, the federal conviction was overturned because jurors had heard about his state conviction, and his state charges because Judge Lance Ito (yes, that judge) screwed up jury instructions. Neither court cleared him, and he faces new trials in both courts.)

Though he was not convicted of anything, McCain intervened on behalf of Charles Keating after Keating gave McCain at least $112,00 in contributions. In the mid-1980s, McCain made at least 9 trips on Keating's airplanes, and 3 of those were to Keating's luxurious retreat in the Bahamas. McCain's wife and father-in-law also were the largest investors (at $350,000) in a Keating shopping center; the Phoenix New Times called it a "sweetheart deal."

Mafia ties

In 1995, McCain sent birthday regards, and regrets for not attending, to Joseph "Joe Bananas" Bonano, the head of the New York Bonano crime family, who had retired to Arizona. Another politician to send regrets was Governor Fife Symington, who has since been kicked out of office and convicted of 7 felonies relating to fraud and extortion.

Family Problems

McCain has a reputation as a politician who has difficulty keeping his pants zipped, according to Republican sources. He acknowledges that his adultery broke up his first marriage. His second wife Cindy, the daughter of a wealthy Budweiser beer distributor, was addicted to prescription narcotics and even stole hard drugs from a medical charity that she ran. McCain acknowledges that she didn't want him to run, and only agreed once he promised that she doesn't have to go to New Hampshire or Iowa.

Quotes:

Leonardo DiCaprio is "an androgynous wimp."—McCain.

"The thought of [McCain] being president sends a cold chill down my spine. He is erratic. He is hotheaded. He loses his temper and he worries me."—Senator Thad Cochran of Mississippi, who has known McCain for 35 years.

Sources:

"McCain Says He's Been Baptist For Years", by Bruce Smith, The Associated Press, Sept. 12, 2007

"Candidates invite questions about their faith", by Stephen Dinan, Washington Times, Sept. 18, 2007

"The Pampered Politician", by Amy Silverman, Phoenix New Times, May 15, 1997

"See John Run Off at the Mouth", Phoenix New Times, Oct. 1, 1998

"Opiate for the Mrs.", Phoenix New Times, Sept. 8, 1994

"Flashes: What's Up, Murdoch?", Phoenix New Times, Sept. 17, 1998, the U.S. Veteran's Dispatch web site.

"Symington Gets Slammer", Phoenix New Times, Feb. 2, 1998

Election 98: Arizona Governor, Fox News web site, 1998 coverage (no longer on web)

"Keating Gets New Trial", CNNfn Web Site, Dec. 2, 1996

"No More Wagging,", (editorial) by Maureen Dowd, The New York Times, Jan. 3, 1999

"John McCain, rock-and-roll dad", by Andrew Essex, The New Yorker Magazine, Dec. 6, 1999 p52

"Unmasking Darth McCain", by William Cleeland, The Daily Illini, Mar. 9, 2001

"Famed McCain Temper is Tamed", By Michael Kranish, Boston Globe, Jan. 27, 2008

20080810-02 16:03 SteveB "John McCain and Adultery"

It's not just John Edwards.

Just to set the record straight about what a rat this guy is. He is no "hero"! Vicki Iseman wasn't the first, and she won't be the last. Shocking details of John McCain's history. How could the Republican party choose an adulterer to represent them after the way they ripped Bill Clinton apart for the same thing?

"John McCain and Adultery" by Jake Morphonios, The Liberty Tree

Feb. 28, 2008, (<http://www.nolanchart.com/article2957-ron-paul-john-mccain-and-adultery.html>)

In 1965 John McCain, a member of the U.S. Navy, married an attractive model named Carol Shepp. In 1967 McCain was sent to Vietnam. It didn't take long before McCain was shot down and taken prisoner.

Carol waited faithfully for McCain during his imprisonment. In 1969, Carol was in a terrible car crash. She was thrown through the windshield and suffered serious injuries. But Carol would not allow her POW husband to be notified of what had happened to her because she didn't want him to feel any additional stress. She stood by her man, alone, for the 5 years he was in prison. [Gee, what a "war hero", Johnny Boy!]

McCain was released in 1973 and returned home to find that Carol's accident had "left her 4 inches shorter and on crutches, and she had gained a good deal of weight." McCain no longer had a trophy wife he could feel proud of.

By the late 70's McCain had engaged in adulterous behaviors, as chronicled in the book The Nightingale's Song by Robert Timberg. Timberg wrote:

Off duty, usually on routine cross-country flights to Yuma and El Centro, John started carousing and running around with women. To make matters worse, some of the women with whom he was linked by rumor were subordinates. At the time the rumors were so widespread that, true or not, they became part of McCain's persona, impossible not to take note of.

In 1979 John McCain met Cindy Lou Hensley at a military reception in Hawaii.¹ Cindy was a millionaire and very attractive. McCain was eighteen years older than the wealthy Hensley, but that didn't stop him from developing an adulterous relationship with her.²

McCain says of their first meeting, "She was lovely, intelligent and charming, 18 years my junior but poised and confident. I monopolized her attention the entire time, taking care to prevent anyone else from intruding on our conversation. When it came time to leave the party, I persuaded her to join me for drinks at the Royal Hawaiian Hotel. By the evening's end, I was in love."

Knowing that Cindy's father had extensive business and political contacts³, McCain decided to abandon his first wife and marry Cindy. McCain divorced⁴ Carol in Apr., 1980 and immediately married Cindy the next month, May 17th. With the Hensley fortune and connections, McCain ran for Congress in 1982. He craved power and has been on a course to secure ultimate control ever since.

A man that cannot be faithful to a loving, self-sacrificing wife cannot be trusted to be faithful to the American people. Bill Clinton taught us that. This week the New York Times reported that during his previous Presidential run in 2000, McCain may have had an inappropriate relationship with the young and lovely lobbyist, Vicki Iseman. The public, not knowing McCain's history of adultery, responded to the NY Times as if they had to be making the story up. NOW what do you think?

Images are all over the internet of Cindy McCain standing at her husband's side as he denied reports of committing adultery with yet another young influential woman.

I wonder what Cindy was thinking.

¹Dan Nowicki, Bill Muller. "John McCain Report: Arizona, the early years", The Arizona Republic, 2007-03-01. Retrieved on 2007-11-21.

²Nancy Collins. "Cindy McCain: Myth vs. Reality", Harpers Bazaar, July 2007. Retrieved on 2008-01-11.

³Nicholas Kristof. "P.O.W. to Power Broker, A Chapter Most Telling", The New York Times, Feb. 27, 2000. Retrieved on 2007-04-22.

⁴<http://www.usvetdsp.com/mcaindiv.htm>

20080810-03	16:18	SteveB	"Is John McCain Stupid?"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

"Is John McCain Stupid?" by Daniel Henninger, The Wall Street Journal

July 31, 2008, (<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121745962594698731.html>)
(http://www.democraticunderground.com/discuss/duboard.php?az=view_all&address=103x373935)

Is John McCain losing it?

On Sunday, he said on national television that to solve Social Security "everything's on the table," which of course means raising payroll taxes. On July 7 in Denver he said: "Senator Obama will raise your taxes. I won't."

This isn't a flip-flop. It's a sex-change operation.

He got back to the subject Tuesday in Reno, Nev. Reporters asked about the Sunday tax comments. Mr. McCain replied, "The worst thing you could do is raise people's payroll taxes, my God!" Then he was asked about working with Democrats to fix Social Security, and he repeated, "everything has to be on the table." But how can? Oh never mind.

Yesterday he was in Aurora, Colo., to wit: "On Social Security, he [Sen. Obama] wants to raise Social Security taxes. I am opposed to raising taxes on Social Security. I want to fix the system without raising taxes."

What I'm asking is, does John McCain have the mental focus, the intellectual discipline, to avoid being out-slicked by Barack Obama, if he isn't abandoned by his own voters?

It's not just taxes. Recently the subject came up of Al Gore's assertion that the U.S. could get its energy solely from renewables in 10 years. Sen. McCain said: "If the vice president says it's doable, I believe it's doable." What!?!? In a later interview, Mr. McCain said he hadn't read "all the specifics" of the Gore plan and now, "I don't think it's doable without nuclear power." It just sounds loopy.

Then this week in San Francisco, in an interview with the Chronicle, Sen. McCain called Nancy Pelosi an "inspiration to millions of Americans."

Notwithstanding his promises to "work with the other side," this is a politically obtuse thing to say in the middle of a campaign. Would Bill Clinton, running for president in 1996 after losing control of the House, have called Newt Gingrich an "inspiration"? House Minority Leader John Boehner, facing a 10-to-20 seat loss in November, must be gagging.

The one thing—arguably the only thing—the McCain candidacy has going for it is a sense among voters that they don't know what Barack Obama stands for or believes. Why then would Mr. McCain give voters reason to wonder the same thing about himself? You're supposed to sow doubt about the other guy, not do it to yourself.

Yes, Sen. McCain must somehow appeal to independents and blue-collar Hillary Democrats. A degree of pandering to the center is inevitable. But this stuff isn't pandering; it's simply stupid. Al Gore's own climate allies separated themselves from his preposterous free-of-oil-in-10-years whopper. Sen. McCain saying off-handedly that it's "doable" is, in a word, thoughtless.

Pelosi heads a House with a 9% approval. To let her off the hook before the election reflects similar loss of thought.

The forces arrayed against Sen. McCain's candidacy are formidable: an unpopular president, the near impossibility of extending Republican White House rule for three terms, the GOP trailing in races at every level, a listless fundraising base, doubtful sentiments about the war, a flailing economy.

The generic Democratic presidential candidate should win handily. Barack Obama, though vulnerable at the margin, is a very strong candidate. This will be a turnout election. To win, Mr. McCain needs every Republican vote he can hold.

Why make it harder than it has to be? Given such statements on Social Security taxes, Al Gore and the "inspirational" Speaker Pelosi, is there a reason why Rush Limbaugh should not spend August teeing off on Mr. McCain?

Why as well shouldn't the Obama camp exploit all of this? If Sen. Obama's "inexperience" is Mr. McCain's ace in the hole, why not trump that by asking, "Does Sen. McCain know his own mind?"

In this sports-crazed country, everyone has learned a lot about what it takes to win. They've heard and seen it proven repeatedly that to achieve greatness, to win the big one, an athlete has to be ready to "put in the work."

John McCain isn't doing that, yet. He's competing as if he expects the other side to lose it for him. Sen. McCain is a famously undisciplined politician.

Someone in the McCain circle had better do some straight talking to the candidate. He's not some 19-year-old tennis player who's going to win the U.S. presidential Open on raw talent and the other guy's errors. He's not that good.

20080811-01 20:46 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/11/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

We have already heard McCain's campaign proclaim that Johnny Boy does not speak for the campaign.

Now, the New York Times reports that his campaign is having to hide his cell phone from him:

Mr. [Steve] Schmidt [a senior aide who is a tough former marine] has sought to cut down on Mr. McCain's use of his cell phone and limit the people who have regular access to Mr. McCain in an effort to keep him more focused, advisers said. He has been the impetus for an effort by Mr. McCain to limit sharply his engagements with reporters, the kind of freewheeling encounters that Mr. McCain enjoys—and that helped him charm the news media for years—but that often lead him to veer from his campaign's message of the day.

There are 8 a.m. calls every day in which the campaign settles on the daily message or attack. Someone in Mr. McCain's entourage—typically Nicolle Wallace, a Schmidt ally and a veteran of Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign and White House who recently joined the campaign as a traveling senior adviser—is given the responsibility of making sure Mr. McCain agrees to the message and tries to stick to it." If McCain is elected, will these people also be able to hide the button that launches all-out atomic war? I sure hope so!

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

McCain declared that, if elected, he would not run for a second turn, guaranteeing his lame duckiness throughout his Presidency and highlighting his vast age. This position has recently been rejected in another major flip-flop, this one, at least, making a little sense. Right, Johnny Boy, just what our nation needs, an 80-year-old lying, adulterous, senile Bush-clone President.

20080812-01 20:57 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

What a simple-minded, old-old-fashioned view of the world you have, Johnny Boy. You and George W. rattling your swords, threatening Russia, and telling them what they MUST do. How Putin must be laughing his a*s off! We're already up to our ears in war, boys. How many soldiers do you have left to send to Moscow? 2 or 3? And gee, we sure wouldn't want to leave Germany undefended, right?

As a matter of fact, this incident got me thinking that, at this moment in history, if Mexico, or Cuba, or Haiti, or Canada, or, heaven forbid, Russia wanted to invade the U.S., I'm not sure we'd have enough of an Army on the job to defend ourselves thanks to you two jokers. Am I wrong? What exactly IS our U.S. homeland defense? Nukes?

And Johnny Boy, is this the unsubtle way you would handle any world crisis? As if we're just at the end of WWII not deeply into 2008? As if we are going to bluster our way through any crisis? As if the world will do anything but laugh at your empty, worthless threats? Wouldn't a slightly, dare I say, nuanced approach be more effective at times?

And Johnny Boy, isn't your top foreign policy advisor and current traveling pal, Randy Scheunemann, currently registered—still—with the U.S. Dept. of Justice as a foreign agent working on behalf of the government of Georgia? I'm sure YOU don't see this as a conflict of interest, Johnny, but I sure do. Maybe instead of going off, as usual, half-cocked, you old bastard, you should do a little research and learn how the U.S. at least partly provoked this little war, and how Russia—though partly or even largely wrong—may have a valid point in what they've done. You talk about Georgia being a democracy as if WE have to defend it? What is Russia?

But, of course, if you still think the Cold War never ended, or that we have so much might that we can threaten Russia in their own back yard, or if you think that oil pipeline is so important, maybe it's time to break out those nukes, Johnny Boy.

20080812-02 21:46 SteveM Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

Dear SteveB,

I thought you were an American?

20080813-01 08:29 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

Dear SteveM,

That is your first truly ridiculous comment. What a page from the ugly-Republican playbook...when all else fails, question their patriotism.

20080813-02 08:54 SteveM Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

Dear SteveB,

DO you hear yourself when you speak/write this last piece of drivel. IT's f*cking UGLY The f*cking Russians are rolling over a democracy, and you belittle McCain for standing up to the Russians and with the oppressed, instead of putting aside your petty differences with him and standing with him in defiance! As the Georgians call for our help!

It's not your patriotism I question. [That's why you said, "I thought you were an American?" —SteveB]

20080813-03 09:09 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

Dear SteveM,

My point is that W has made it impossible for us to have any real influence in the world. All these two idiots can do is posture and throw out empty threats and orders that everyone in the world is laughing at. This is not how America should be. We need big, big change. Can McCain provide it? LOL

By the way, Russia is a democracy too, the last time I looked. Do you have all the inside information so that you know definitively that Russia was not provoked into having to defend their peacekeepers in S. Whatchamacallit? If that were to be the case (like Iraq had no WMD's), that would make the U.S. look even more stupid, wouldn't it, my friend? But I wouldn't expect McCain to show any reasonable restraint and not go off half-cocked before he can even know all the facts. He can just issue empty orders to Russia, proving he has no executive experience whatsoever, let alone any "expertise" in foreign affairs.

What a joke this man is!

20080813-04 09:39 SteveM Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

Dear SteveB,

With regard to Russia you are wrong, because you don't have all the information to make those statements below.

And it is difficult to take serious the latest hate filled, vitriol laced attacks on McCain that have nothing to do with policy and the impact of a possible partisan Congress, Senate and an Executive branch. Headed by an man whose meager

'record' of service shows he's NEVER reached across the aisle to work with the loyal opposition. Pelosi and Reed's behavior belies what is to come as they become emboldened.

Simply put this election has little to do with Mac or BHO and more about checks and balances. Change just for change sake is not good. And unless one is a drug addict/Alcoholic, DRASTIC change has NEVER work out for the best.

Pull the wool from your eyes and look at the big picture.

I'm going to the gym (It's actually the back room, LOL)

20080813-05 12:00 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08

Dear SteveM,

The problem is...checks and balances don't apply because McCain is absolutely unfit to be President. He totally lacks executive experience. He is stupid and senile. He is hot-tempered, dishonest, disloyal, corrupt, wishy-washy, mean, and an adulterer. History proves these things. Period. These are not qualities we want in a President and, beside them, party affiliation means nothing.

But I don't blame you for being afraid of the awful defeat the national Republicans are going to suffer in November because of their arrogant renunciation of the principles of the party and Bush's utter stupidity.

As to Russia-Georgia, I don't have any inside information either. I just know that the manner of Bush-McCain is wrong and not something that I personally want to see from our "leaders". It only makes matters worse. We should be strong, but not just straw dogs like Bush has made us. And the experts seem to think the jury is still out as to how justified this war is. How justified was Iraq, and that's right in Russia's backyard, not ours? I don't think it's right if Russia starts ordering us around either. McCain is so obviously a hot-headed fool who will do nothing but make everything worse for our country. If you want to balance the power, try to help the Republicans gain back control of the Congress. LOL

20080813-06 12:24 Dennis Fw: Lee Iacocca: Throw the Bums Out!

The following is by Lee Iacocca, the man who rescued Chrysler Corporation from its death throes. He's now 82 years old and has a new book, and here are some excerpts:

from Lee Iacocca:

'Am I the only guy in this country who's fed up with what's happening? Where the hell is our outrage? We should be screaming bloody murder. We've got a gang of clueless bozos steering our ship of state right over a cliff, we've got corporate gangsters stealing us blind, and we can't even clean up after a hurricane much less build a hybrid car. But instead of getting mad, everyone sits around and nods their heads when the politicians say, 'Stay the course.'

Stay the course? You've got to be kidding. This is America , not the damned 'Titanic'. I'll give you a sound bite: 'Throw all the bums out!'

You might think I'm getting senile, that I've gone off my rocker, and maybe I have. But someone has to speak up. I hardly recognize this country anymore.

The most famous business leaders are not the innovators but the guys in handcuffs. While we're fiddling in Iraq , the Middle East is burning and nobody seems to know what to do. And the press is waving 'pom-poms' instead of asking hard questions. That's not the promise of the ' America ' my parents and yours traveled across the ocean for.

I'll go a step further. You can't call yourself a patriot if you're not outraged . This is a fight I'm ready and willing to have. The Biggest 'C' is Crisis ! (Iacocca elaborates on nine C's of leadership, crisis being the first)

Leaders are made, not born. Leadership is forged in times of crisis. It's easy to sit there with your feet up on the desk and talk theory. Or send someone else's kids off to war when you've never seen a battlefield yourself. It's another thing to lead when your world comes tumbling down.

On Sept. 11, 2001, we needed a strong leader more than any other time in our history. We needed a steady hand to guide us out of the ashes. A Hell of a Mess! So here's where we stand. We're immersed in a bloody war with no plan for winning and no plan for leaving. We're running the biggest deficit in the history of the country. We're losing the manufacturing edge to Asia, while our once-great companies are getting slaughtered by health care costs. Gas prices are skyrocketing, and nobody in power has a coherent energy policy. Our schools are in trouble. Our borders are like sieves. The middle class is being squeezed every which way. These are times that cry out for leadership. But when you look around, you've got to ask:

'Where have all the leaders gone?' Where are the curious, creative communicators? Where are the people of character, courage, conviction, omnipotence, and common sense? I may be a sucker for alliteration, but I think you get the point. Name me a leader who has a better idea for homeland security than making us take off our shoes in airports and throw away our shampoo? We've spent billions of dollars building a huge new bureaucracy, and all we know how to do is react to things that have already happened.

Name me one leader who emerged from the crisis of Hurricane Katrina. Congress has yet to spend a single day evaluating the response to the hurricane, or demanding accountability for the decisions that were made in the crucial hours after the storm.

Everyone's hunkering down, fingers crossed, hoping it doesn't happen again. Now, that's just crazy. Storms happen. Deal with it. Make a plan . Figure out what you're going to do the next time.

Name me an industry leader who is thinking creatively about how we can restore our competitive edge in manufacturing. Who would have believed that there could ever be a time when 'The Big Three' referred to Japanese car companies? How did this happen, and more important, what are we going to do about it?

Name me a government leader who can articulate a plan for paying down the debt, or solving the energy crisis, or managing the health care problem. The silence is deafening. But these are the crises that are eating away at our country and milking the middle class dry.

I have news for the gang in Congress. We didn't elect you to sit on your a*s and do nothing and remain silent while our democracy is being hijacked and our greatness is being replaced with mediocrity. What is everybody so afraid of? That some bonehead on Fox News will call them a name? Give me a break. Why don't you! guys show some spine for a change?

Had Enough? Hey, I'm not trying to be the voice of gloom and doom here. I'm trying to light a fire. I'm speaking out because I have hope. I believe in America. In my lifetime I've had the privilege of living through some of America 's greatest moments. I've also experienced some of our worst crises: the 'Great Depression', 'World War II', the 'Korean War', the 'Kennedy Assassination', the 'Vietnam War', the 1970s oil crisis, and the struggles of recent years culminating with 9/11.

If I've learned one thing, it's this: 'You don't get anywhere by standing on the sidelines waiting for somebody else to take action. Whether it's building a better car or building a better future for our children, we all have a role to play. That's the challenge I'm raising in this book. It's a call to 'Action' for people who, like me, believe in America. It's not too late, but it's getting pretty close. So let's shake off the cr*p and go to work. Let's tell 'em all we've had enough.'

20080813-07

13:23

SteveB

Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/12/08; "Rice Told Georgia to Avoid Conflict with Russia"

Dear SteveM,

I told you it was a little more complicated than it first appeared.

"Rice Told Georgia to Avoid Conflict with Russia" AFP

Aug. 13, 2008, (http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5izFv2gnxpm_UCyh8eOXcJKXZwRuw)

(WASHINGTON) U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice privately warned Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili to avoid a conflict with Russia during her trip to Tbilisi in July, The New York Times reported Wednesday.

"She told him, in no uncertain terms, that he had to put a non-use of force pledge on the table," an unnamed senior U.S. official who accompanied Rice on the trip told the newspaper.

The message was delivered during a private dinner on July 9, the report added.

Publicly, however, during the trip Rice blamed Russia as a source of continuing unrest in the country. Russia "needs to be a part of resolving the problem and solving the problems and not contributing to it," she said at a July 10 joint press conference with Saakashvili.

Rice's July visit to Georgia came amid increased diplomatic confrontation between the Washington and Moscow over Georgia's desire to join NATO, as well as the status of the separatist provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

Despite the public bravado, top U.S. officials warned the Georgians not to allow the conflict to escalate through until hours before Georgia launched its attack, the newspaper reported.

The top U.S. envoy for the region, Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried, received a phone call from Georgia's foreign minister on Thursday saying their country was under attack, the report stated.

"We told them they had to keep their unilateral cease-fire," the unnamed official told the newspaper. "We said, be smart about this, don't go in and don't fall for the Russian provocation. Do not do this'."

Saakashvili did not inform Washington ahead of the offensive, senior U.S. officials told the newspaper. "The Georgians figured it was better to ask forgiveness later, but not ask for permission first," an administration official told the newspaper. "It was a decision on their part. They knew we would say no."

20080813-08	13:39	SteveM	Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD)
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Did you not get the memo a month ago about the secret mission to remove WMD's?

[Yellow cake uranium is not a WMD. —SteveB]

Even the liberal media reported it just now on TV with a F*CKING apology!!!! And Pelosi and Reed have shut the f*ck up about it too!

What am I going to have to do? Pump light in to your spider hole too!

1. U.S. removes 'yellowcake' from Iraq—Conflict in Iraqmsnbc.com. Jul 5, 2008 ... Secret U.S. mission hauls uranium from Iraq. Last major stockpile ...The removal of 550 metric tons of "yellowcake"—the seed material for ...www.msnbc.msn.com/id/25546334/.
2. FOXNews.com—Report: Uranium Stockpile Removed From Iraq in ... Jul 5, 2008 ... Report: Uranium Stockpile Removed From Iraq in Secret U.S. Mission, The last ... The yellowcake was the last major stockpile from Saddam's... www.foxnews.com/story/0,2933,376747,00.html.
3. Uranium removed from Iraq nuclear site—International Herald Tribune Jul 7, 2008 ... The yellowcake removed from Iraq—which was not the same yellowcake that ... The U.S. military has begun withdrawing the last of the extra... www.ihf.com/articles/2008/07/07/mideast/iraq.php.

4. LiveLeak.com—550 METRIC TONS of YELLOWCAKE Removed from Iraq Jul 5, 2008 ... 550 METRIC TONS of YELLOWCAKE Removed from Iraq. AP Exclusive: U.S. removes uranium from Iraq By BRIAN MURPHY The last major remnant of Saddam ... www.liveleak.com/view?i=398_1215296975.

5. U.S. Secretly Takes Yellowcake From Iraq, A Huge Stockpile Of ... Jul 5, 2008 ... A huge stockpile of natural uranium, the last major remnant of ... The yellowcake wasn't the only dangerous item removed from Tuwaitha. ... www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/07/05/world/main4235028.shtml.

20080813-09	17:53	SteveM	Fw: The Obama Tidal Wave
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says some truth, much malarkey. <http://www.snopes.com/politics/obama/billbrown.asp>.—SteveB]

The Obama Tidal Wave

We are witnessing a political phenomenon with Barack Obama of rare Magnitude. His speeches have inspired millions and yet most of his followers Have no idea of what he stands for except platitudes of 'Change' or That he says he will be a 'Uniter'. The power of speech from a charismatic person truly can be a Powerful thing. Certainly Billy Graham had charisma and both his manner of Speech and particularly the content changed millions. On the extreme other hand, the charisma of Adolph Hitler inspired Millions and the results were catastrophic. Barack Obama certainly is no Hitler or a Billy Graham, but for many Americans out there feeling just like a surfer who might be ecstatic and Euphoric while riding a tidal wave, the real story is what happens when it hits Shore.

Just Some of What Defines Barack Obama:

1. He voted against banning partial birth abortion. [Amen! —SteveB]
2. He voted no on notifying parents of minors who get out-of-state Abortions. [Amen! —SteveB]
3. Supports affirmative action in Colleges and Government. [OK, no big deal, simply a continuation of the status quo. —SteveB]
4. In 2001 he questioned harsh penalties for drug dealing. [Amen! —SteveB]
5. Says he will deal with street level drug dealing as minimum wage Affair. [Amen! —SteveB]
6. Admitted marijuana and cocaine use in high school and in College. [Amen! Amen! —SteveB]
7. His religious convictions are very murky. [And McCain's and yours aren't? —SteveB]
8. He is willing to meet with Fidel Castro, Hugo Chavez, Kim Jung Il And Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Amen!
9. Has said that one of his first goals after being elected would be To have a conference with all Muslim nations. Amen!
10. Opposed the Patriot Act.. [Amen! Amen! It is an invasion of our Constitutional rights! —SteveB]
11. First bill he signed that was passed was campaign finance reform. [Amen! Amen! —SteveB]
12. Voted No on prohibiting law suits against gun manufacturers. [Amen! Amen! Amen! —SteveB]
13. Supports universal health-care. [Amen! Amen! Amen! —SteveB]
14. Voted yes on providing habeas corpus for Guantanamo detainees. [So what? Big deal! —SteveB]
15. Supports granting driver's licenses to illegal immigrants. [I'll talk to him about this one, but so did McCain! —SteveB]

16. Supports extending welfare to illegal immigrants. [I'll talk to him about this one, but so did McCain! —SteveB]
17. Voted yes on comprehensive immigration reform. [I'll talk to him about this one, but so did McCain! —SteveB]
18. Voted yes on allowing illegal aliens to participate in Social Security. [I'll talk to him about this one, but so did McCain! —SteveB]
19. Wants to make the minimum wage a 'living wage'. [Amen! —SteveB]
20. Voted with Democratic Party 96 percent of 251 votes. [So the Republicans are better? —SteveB]
21. Is a big believer in the separation of church and state. [So am I!!!!!! F*ck "the church"! So were the founding fathers! —SteveB]
22. Opposed to any efforts to Privatize Social Security and instead Supports increasing the amount of tax paid. [I'm OK with that for now...we need big reform here. —SteveB]
23. He voted No on repealing the Alternative Minimum Tax. [Big deal! —SteveB]
24. He voted No on repealing the 'Death' Tax. [I'll talk to him about this one, but so did McCain! —SteveB]
25. He wants to raise the Capital Gains Tax. [I'll talk to him about this one! —SteveB]
26. Has repeatedly said the surge in Iraq has not succeeded.... [Who knows? —SteveB]
27. He is ranked as the most liberal Senator in the Senate today and That takes some doing. [Ha! He is truly not more liberal than Hillary. —SteveB]

If your political choices are consistent with Barack Obama's and you think that his positions will bring America together or make it a better Place, then you will probably enjoy the ride and not forward this Email.

If you Are like most Americans that after examining what he stands for, are truly not In line with his record, it would be prudent to get off the wave or better yet, Never get on, before it comes on shore and undermines the very foundations of This great Country.

We have limited time to save America or the Supreme Court As we know it.

Inaction is action. If you agree this is important, pass it on. The mainstream media Will not do it for you!

Bill Brown, MAY GOD BLESS YOU AND YOURS.

20080813-10 21:20 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/13/08
--

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Senator John McCain: "In the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations." Excuse me, Johnny Boy, while I pickup my a*s from the floor which I just laughed off. I guess it's too much to expect someone of your advanced years to remember, say...IRAQ!

And it appears more and more likely today that it could have been at least partly Johnny Boy's technically illegal foreign policy meddlings which helped cause this little war. After all, he is not the President (thank God!) or the State Department and, therefore, has no legal right to conduct American foreign policy. Yet McCain's conversations with Georgia's president and McCain's buddy-buddy with their bought-and-sold lobbyist/agent, Randy Scheunemann, seem to have helped lead the Geogian leader to think that he could attack Russia and that maybe we would come to their aid or that maybe Russia would be afraid of the U.S. and not retaliate.

Hence, McCain recently going off like a rocket and talking as if he were the President on this matter, further deepening the crisis—speaking as if he speaks for the people and government of the U.S. Anything to cover-up his culpability. And this, just after accusing Obama of trying to act too "Presidential" in Europe. Does the nerve and stupidity of this a*s-hole know no end? So much for your foreign policy "expertise", Johnny Boy!

20080814-01	10:19	H. Dean	Fw A Book of Lies—your action urgently needed
-----------------------------	-------	---------	---

Dear SteveB:

This morning our team here sent this email to a group of dedicated supporters, but I'm sending it to everyone I know.

In 2004, the media let right-wing crackpots like Jerome Corsi spread lies about John Kerry. Now Corsi is publishing another hit piece attacking Barack Obama.

This year I'm drawing the line—we're not going to let Corsi and the Republicans get away with it again.

Scroll down to check out Corsi's track record of ideologically driven lies and conspiracy theories, then sign up for the DNC Rapid Response Team and help keep these dirty tricks from ruining another election:

<http://www.democrats.org/rapidresponse>.

I hope you'll forward this email to everyone you know, too.

Thanks, Howard Dean

from DNC Rapid Response Team

Friend:

One of the most vile smear peddlers of the 2004 election has found a new target.

Jerome Corsi just published a new book full of rehashed distortions and the same old lies about Barack Obama, and the right-wing noise machine is in full gear promoting it.

In 2004, Corsi helped launch the Swift Boat smear campaign with a book of distortions and lies he wrote about John Kerry. Corsi was so extreme in his misrepresentations that even other Swift Boat attackers tried to distance themselves from him.

We cannot afford to let Corsi get away with the same dirty tricks that fooled so many people in 2004. We can't rely on the media to hold him accountable—in fact, the sheer brazenness of the lies is attracting even more coverage. The media have shown that they aren't going to stop him.

It's up to you to spread the truth, so here it is. Below you will find the facts about Corsi and his desperate fabrications. Read the latest research for yourself (it's almost unbelievable) and get this information to everyone you know who is following this election. Forward this message to your friends and family or use this online tool to get the truth out:

<http://www.democrats.org/bookoflies>.

Together we'll show Corsi, the Republicans, and John McCain that Barack Obama and the Democrats don't back down from a fight.

Thanks, DNC Rapid Response Team

The latest research on Jerome Corsi:

TOO CRAZY EVEN FOR SWIFTBOAT LIARS

Corsi Was Dropped From Unfit for Command Promotions Because of His Anti-Muslim, Anti-Catholic Comments.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette wrote in an editorial, "Consider the book Unfit for Command, put out by a collection of partisans who have now made it acceptable for veterans to attack each other's war records. The current National Review carries a piece decrying the bookstores that fail to carry "John O'Neill's book." This is curious in that the volume has a second author, but Jerome Corsi has dropped from the marketing because he has been revealed as the author of religiously bigoted remarks published on a Web site. Corsi not only considers Muslims to be pederasts, but he took the trouble to slam Catholic priests and refers to the pope as senile. Rather than wonder whether a book written by such a man can be trusted, the marketing tactic has shifted to pretend Corsi doesn't exist." [Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (Pennsylvania), 9/19/04]

O'Neill Tried to Minimize Corsi's Role in Unfit for Command After Bigoted Comments Came to Light.

"In a bit of historical revisionism, Swift Boat Veterans for Truth founder and Unfit for Command co-author John O'Neill distorted Jerome Corsi's role in co-authoring the book. O'Neill's backtracking comes on the heels of Media Matters for America's documentation of Corsi's history of posting bigoted comments. During appearances on MSNBC's Scarborough Country on Aug. 10 and CNN's Wolf Blitzer Reports on Aug. 11, O'Neill downplayed Corsi's role in writing the book. When asked about Corsi's involvement, O'Neill asserted, Corsi was "simply an editor and not really any sort of co-author." But an MMFA item entitled "Unfit book materials show Corsi more than just an 'editor,'" revealed Corsi to be much more than simply an editor of the anti- Kerry book. [Media Matters Press Release, 8/13/04]

"Anti-Kerry Book Author Apologizes for Slurs."

"One of the authors of a new anti-John Kerry book frequently posted comments on a conservative Web site describing Muslims and Catholics as pedophiles and Pope John Paul II as senile. In chat room entry last year on freerepublic.com, Corsi writes: 'Islam is a peaceful religion—just as long as the women are beaten, the boys buggered and the infidels are killed.' In another entry, he says: 'So this is what the last days of the Catholic Church are going to look like. Bugging boys undermines the moral base and the lawyers rip the gold off the Vatican altars. We may get one more Pope, when this senile one dies, but that's probably about it.'" [AP, 8/10/04]

ONE PARANOID BOOK OF LIES AFTER ANOTHER

Corsi Wrote a Book Saying Bush's "Globalist Agenda" Is Leading to a North American Union.

"The real reason behind President Bush's push for immigration reform, says author Jerome R. Corsi, is to unite the United States, Mexico and Canada by erasing borders and creating a "North American Union." That is the theme of Mr. Corsi's new book, "The Late Great U.S.: The Coming Merger with Mexico and Canada," which says the Bush administration's 'globalist agenda' is leading to a merger of the countries through the implementation of policies and laws to open trade barriers and renovate the highway systems in anticipation of increased travel within the new megastate. Mr. Corsi said a growing number of Americans think the North American Union is being forced onto Americans. Government officials say the idea is no more than an unjustified conspiracy theory spread through the Internet. Mr. Corsi said the impetus of the plan was the creation of the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America, announced by leaders of the United States, Mexico and Canada at Waco, Texas, in 2005." [Washington Times, 7/18/07]

Conservative Human Events Writer: Corsi Isn't "Any More Worthy Of Being Taken Seriously Than Those Who Think Jews Rule The World Or The 'Truthers' Who Think President Bush Is Responsible For 9/11.

"Under the headline "There Isn't Going to Be a North American Union," John Hawkins wrote, "Yesterday, Jerome Corsi was prattling on about the North American Union again after Michael Medved deservedly spanked him for spreading conspiracy theories. While I don't think Corsi is any more worthy of being taken seriously than those who think Jews rule the world or the 'Truthers' who think President Bush is responsible for 9/11, I thought I would respond to him one last time. (I think that's about the fourth time I've said that.) Now, why respond again? What's the point? Well unfortunately, a lot of conservatives consider this conspiracy theory to be so preposterous that they believe it's beneath them to even bother discussing it, and that leaves Corsi and his ilk to dominate the debate. And since there are a lot of conservatives being taken in by this North American Union nonsense, somebody has got to step up to the plate." [Human Events Online, 1/10/07]

Editor of Human Events: "I Guess There Are People Who Believe In" Corsi's North American Union Conspiracy, "But There Are People Who Believe In Bigfoot."

"Corsi plays on growing nationalist fears. He sees a scenario in which a North American Union is born and shares a currency, the "amero." Even some right-wing standard-bearers regard the fears as over-blown. Jed Babbin, editor of the conservative newspaper Human Events, says: "I guess there are people who believe in [the plan for a North American Union]. But there are people who believe in Bigfoot." [Newsweek, 12/10/07]

Corsi Wrote a Book Disagreeing With Most Scientists That There is a Limit to Oil.

"All his life, Jerome Corsi's been told that we're running out of oil. "I remember driving with my dad in a 1952 Plymouth and listening to him talk about the end of oil," says the 59-year-old New Jersey author. "Hasn't happened yet, and it's not going to happen." What makes him so sure? He doesn't buy the fossil fuel theory—that oil comes from dead plants and dinosaurs. He believes it comes out of the ground naturally, and that there's more coming up all the time...Eighteenth century Russian scientist Mikhail Lomonosov found biological debris in oil and concluded that it must have biological origin. "I'm at the point where the dinosaur theory seems silly," says Corsi. "You take a pile of cats and you bury them, dig them up 10 years later and you don't get oil." "The truth is that there is so much oil around the world that it's been easy to find," Corsi says. "We're awash in oil. There's more oil today in proven reserves than ever before in human history." [Western Standard (Alberta), 2/13/06]

Corsi Wrote a Book Claiming Democrats Were Being Corrupted by Iranian Funding and Helping Iranians Get Nukes.

"After their bitter campaign 2004 experience with the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, John Kerry and his fellow Dems aren't waiting to be shot at again. Yesterday, aides to Sens. Kerry, Hillary Clinton, Joe Biden and Ted Kennedy jumped all over literary mugger Jerome Corsi, co-author of the Kerry-bashing best seller 'Unfit for Command.' They knocked him to the ground and kicked him in the face (metaphorically, anyway) over his next Democrat trashing tome, 'Atomic Iran: How the Terrorist Regime Bought the Bomb and American Politicians.' The book—which Nashville's Cumberland House Publishing won't release till next month—claims Democratic pols are being corrupted by Iranian money and helping the nuke-seeking mullahs in Tehran." [Daily News (New York), 2/24/05] Corsi Wrote Unfit For Command Although He Was Not a Veteran. "Though not a veteran himself, Corsi co-authored 'Unfit for Command: Swift Boat Veterans Speak Out Against John Kerry.'" [Boston Herald, 1/25/05]

THE WRITINGS OF A PARANOID AND HATEFUL MAN

To read more of his posts, follow this link: <http://www.freerepublic.com/focus/user-posts?name=jrlc>

HATRED AND INTOLERANCE TOWARD ISLAM

"Let's see exactly why it isn't the case that Islam is a worthless, dangerous Satanic religion? Where's the proof to the contrary?" "Islam is like a virus—it affects the mind—maybe even better as an analogy—it is a cancer that destroys the body it infects."

ATTACKS ON JOHN KERRY...WITH NO MILITARY BACKGROUND

"First let's undermine the U.S. in Vietnam. Then we can go for gay marriage. When you get to be Pres. JFK-lite, there will be no end to how much of America we can destroy."

"Just don't let anybody put a tablet with the Ten Commandments in front of the school where that girl wants to wear a Muslim scarf—OH, No— then the RATS would complain. Anti- Christian, Anti- American—just like their Presidential Candidate—Jean Francois Kerrie."

"After he married TerRAHsa, didn't John Kerry begin practicing Judiasm? He also has paternal grandparents that were Jewish. What religion is John Kerry?"

"Kerry has a long history of Communist supporters."

"Kerry offers a clear choice. Anti-American hatred."

"John F*cking Commie Kerry and Commie Ted discuss their plan to hand America over to our nation's enemies."

DESPICABLE WRITINGS ON ISLAM SHOW BLIND HATRED

"The only good Mullah is a dead Mullah." [12/21/01]

"Forget about democracy. Just get out the checkbook and put everybody in Iraq on the payroll. That's all they want. Pay them first, democracy (or some b.s. Islamic version of it) will follow." [6/18/03]

"Mohammed-al-Mohammed proclaiming guidance from his hate-god Allah-i'll-be-da*ned-allah kills another dozen women and children by convincing a teenager to blow him/her/self up for victory in another world. Haven't we all had enough of this stupid "religion"?" [5/17/03]

"Another Mohammed-al-Mohammed Islam religion of hate maniac bites the dust. (Top Iraqi army official surrenders)" [5/17/03]

"Certainly can't be one of the Islam is a Religion of Peace hijackers? " [Bus Hijacking Near Bremen, Germany] [4/25/03]

"One more Mohammed al-Mohammed el-Mohammed Mohammed iced—great. " [Car Bomb Kills Egyptian Islamist in Lebanon Camp] [3/1/03]

"Let them build mosques—seems about all the Germans are worth these days." (Germany's Economic Woes) [2/6/03]
"Islam—the Legacy of Clinton." (AFP: Two Chechens with belts of explosives stopped in Moscow) [12/24/02]

"Islam is like a virus—it affects the mind—maybe even better as an analogy—it is a cancer that destroys the body it infects. A throwback, Medieval, anti-modern, anti-science, anti-knowledge doctrine." [11/26/02]

"Forget it—the only thing these Islamonazis understand is force—time to nuke the Temple of the Dome and send this "religion" back to Hell, the place it came from. " [11/17/02]

"Go for the Oil Fields. Set the mad dog lawyers loose!!! Let's ROLL!!! Take even the diapers from their heads. Remember—according to the Koran, Islam approves of lying as long as it is to non-believers. Saudis are lying killers who harbor killers." [11/17/02]

"All-ah be damned. What took him so long?" [11/14/02]

"Islam is like a virus—it infects the minds of the believers. Islamonazis are, unfortunately, the logical extreme of the "religion." [11/13/02]

"Good plan—raise OBL from the dead every time we get ready to ice another Islamonazi—ON TO BAGHDAD. LET'S ROLL !!!" [11/13/02]

"Nuke the ISLAM-nazis and let's move on. No more MUSLAMO fascists!!" [11/10/02]

"Islam has declared World War III against everything non-Muslim. " [10/28/02]

"When will the liberal media wake up to see that Islam has declared a World War against everything non-Muslim. May Allah be damned to the hell Muslims wish to create on earth." [10/25/02]

"Are there any Islamic "clerics" who aren't violent?" [10/20/02]

"May Islam join the garbage heap of worthless religions we have grown beyond. Any believers of Hermes out there?" [10/13/02]

"Muslims regularly trash religious sites holy to others. Jerusalem has a series of sites the Muslims have wrecked (e.g., the bus station they placed below the "Golgotha" site honored by many as an alternative location for the Christ's crucifixion). Seems like the Muslim principle that it is okay to lie to infidels. Very different mindset—no respect for anything non-Muslim" [9/30/02]

"ALL Arab MUSLIMS lie (the Koran endorses lying to infidels, namely us)—none of these names are real—Abdallah is really Mohammad Mohammad Mohammad readily altered to include Atta or Haj or whatever else they decide to call themselves for the moment." [7/10/02]

"Gotta love this stupid religion, ISLAM—Makes the Nazis look like a Sunday stroll in the park. ISLAM—it's gotta be straight from HELL. Just the Devil in disguise—that seems to about sum it up." [6/14/02]

"Arabs lie. ISLAM preaches lying to Infidels. Fingerprints don't lie. Boo-hoo—time to demand IDs to check into hotels and passport registration for all foreign nationalists who want hotel rooms. Also, ID checks and passport registrations for anyone renting an apartment." [6/5/02]

"Let's get rid of all the Saudi Arabians—that would have gone a long way to preventing Sept. 11." [6/5/02]

"Yet another violent raghead named Mohammad. What's new? Islam looks like a cancer, a plague, a deadly virus. No doctor worries about the free speech rights of cancer cells." [6/5/02]

"Yet another Little Islamic Man of Hate. Is there any other kind?" [5/31/02]

"The only thing the Islamic world understands is force. Let's destroy a few of these hate schools and start targeting these mad preachers of hate." [5/22/02]

"Let's see—who is it not politically correct to profile? Islam the "Peaceful Religion" whose Fundamental believers are insane, suicidal killers that hate America and all democratic societies? Or Arabs whose racial hatred of Jews drives them to create secret societies of terrorists sworn to eliminate Israel and all states who support Israel?" [5/20/02]

"Finally a way to end Jihad. Maybe the whole Arab world will blow itself up—live by the sword, die by the sword—seems an ancient formula. Bye, Bye Jihad." [5/20/02]

"I repeat: Muslims, cancer cells. It's hard to tell the difference. No doctor worries about the First Amendment rights of cancer cells. The therapy is to eliminate cancer cells so the body can go on living. Great to repeat it—keeps the thread going. Let the Muslims stop preaching terror and I'll revise my view. Meanwhile, Muslims, cancer cells is an equation that works." [5/20/02]

"May all these Arab maniacs explode and kill themselves—next time, maybe they will take Arab*RAT with them. Best solution to the homicide bombers is that they eliminate themselves, with as little loss to civilians as possible." [5/20/02]

"I repeat: Muslims, cancer cells. It's hard to tell the difference. No doctor worries about the First Amendment rights of cancer cells. The therapy is to eliminate cancer cells so the body can go on living." [5/19/02]

"Muslims, cancer cells. It's hard to tell the difference. No doctor worries about the First Amendment rights of cancer cells. The therapy is to eliminate cancer cells so the body can go on living." [5/17/02]

"File under the category "Islam is a worthless, violent CULT, not a Religion." [3/28/02]

CORSI HAS LOST TOUCH WITH EVEN THE FALSE REALITY HE LIVES IN

FALSE: "We find there is even uncertainty whether Stanley Ann and Obama Senior were ever married in a church." [p. 44]

REALITY:CORSI ADMITS ON THE SAME PAGE THAT OBAMA'S PARENTS HAD A LEGAL AMERICAN MARRIAGE

TIME Reported On Obama's Parents' Divorce Records.

TIME reported, "On Feb. 2, 1961, several months after they met, Obama's parents got married in Maui, according to divorce records." [TIME, 4/9/08]

Corsi Cites Time Story To Say "Divorce Papers Confirm...

"Corsi wrote, "Other sources say divorce papers confirm that a civil ceremony was held on Maui, on Feb. 2, 1961, when Ann was three months pregnant with Obama." Corsi cites the Apr. 9th, 2008, Time story for his reference to Obama's parents' wedding. [p. 44]

EVEN A LITTLE BASIC RESEARCH DISPROVES CORSI'S FABRICATIONS

FALSE: "Senator Obama could claim to be a citizen of Kenya, as well as of the United States. Obama can trace his heritage back to his mother, who was born in the United States and was an American citizen when he was born, and to his father, who was born in Kenya and was a Kenyan citizen when Obama was born." [p 103]

REALITY: OBAMA CANNOT CLAIM KENYAN CITIZENSHIP

Kenya Does Not Allow Dual Citizenship Applications for People Over 21 Years of Age.

The U.S. Office of Personnel Management writes of Kenya, "DUAL CITIZENSHIP: Not recognized except for persons under 21 years old." The Kenyan Constitution writes, "A person who, but for the proviso to section 87 (1), would be a citizen of Kenya by virtue of that subsection shall be entitled, upon making application before the specified date in such manner as may be prescribed by or under an Act of Parliament, to be registered as a citizen of Kenya: Provided that a person who has not attained the age of twenty-one years (other than a woman who is or has been married) may not himself make an application under this subsection, but an application may be made on his behalf by his parent or guardian." [U.S. Office of Personnel Management; Kenyan Constitution]

Even if Obama Had Applied for Dual Citizenship Before He Was 21—Which He Did Not—It Would Have Expired.

A person who, upon the attainment of the age of twenty-one years, is a citizen of Kenya and also a citizen of some other country other than Kenya shall, subject to subsection (7), cease to be a citizen of Kenya upon the specified date unless he has renounced his citizenship of that other country, taken the oath of allegiance and, in the case of a person who was born outside Kenya, made and registered such declaration of his intentions concerning residence as may be prescribed by or under an Act of Parliament." [Kenyan Constitution]

INVENTING WILD CONSPIRACIES ABOUT ANYTHING HE CAN

Corsi Wrote a Book Claiming Democrats Were Being Corrupted by Iranian Funding and Helping Iranians Get Nukes.

After their bitter campaign 2004 experience with the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, John Kerry and his fellow Dems aren't waiting to be shot at again.

Yesterday, aides to Sens. Kerry, Hillary Clinton, Joe Biden and Ted Kennedy jumped all over literary mugger Jerome Corsi, co-author of the Kerry-bashing best seller 'Unfit for Command.' They knocked him to the ground and kicked him in the face (metaphorically, anyway) over his next Democrat trashing tome, 'Atomic Iran: How the Terrorist Regime Bought the Bomb and American Politicians.' The book—which Nashville's Cumberland House Publishing won't release till next month—claims Democratic pols are being corrupted by Iranian money and helping the nuke-seeking mullahs in Tehran." [Daily News (New York), Feb. 24, 2005.]

Paid for and authorized by the Democratic National Committee, www.democrats.org. This communication is not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee. Democratic National Committee, 430 S. Capitol St. SE, Washington, DC 20003

20080814-02	12:52	SteveB	To: Rush Limbaugh; Oil, Energy
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------

Dear Rush:

I was driving in the car here this morning in beautiful, smog-free Montana, listening to your broadcast, basically about the History Channel's Modern Marvels episode detailing all the things we make from oil.

I think you missed the point! It is because of all these things you mentioned—plastic, makeup, asphalt, industrial chemicals, medicines, etc. etc. that are most conveniently and cheaply made from oil—that we need to conserve oil. Now, I'm as sorry as you are that idiot Al Gore is so closely associated with the concept, but the energy crisis is not the fault of conservation, it's the fault of greed and excess.

If you think, as you stated, that we can't go a long ways toward reducing our energy dependence on oil in 10 years, then I guess you thought we couldn't go to the moon, or maybe you're even one of those people who think we didn't go to the moon! Are you so totally dependent upon your oil stocks that you can't see what could be done, what should be done, and what can and must be done? And jobs and the economy don't need to be destroyed to do it. In fact, solving this problem will create more wealth and jobs than this nation has ever seen.

And I'm not talking about big government programs. Everything our government truly touches turns to sh*t, we have proven that over and over. But government can help by providing the types of incentives that are now wasted on big oil companies.

I believe that 30 years ago, gasoline should have been taxed up to about $4.00 per gallon. Even at that price, and even with all the whining, this would still make gasoline a small part of the cost of driving a vehicle. I'm sure it's a very small part of the cost of driving your vehicle, Rush. Figure it out if you don't believe me.

If we had done that 30 years ago, I think the problem would now be non-existent, but our politicians sold us down the river as usual. The tax could have been used to provide tax incentives to companies solving the problem, not big oil companies being part of the problem. I think wind can help a lot. I think nuclear, if well-thought-out can help. Turning food into fuel is a stupid idea to my mind—look at the price of grain lately—but there is algae and sugar cane and oil-producing beans. We need more and better public transportation and much, much more use of railroads. Our cities need to be controlled better to stop urban sprawl eating up our valuable farm land and to produce more compact cities, easier to get around in, and more conducive to alternative forms of transportation and public transportation.

But our best source of energy could solve two problems. We possess abundant coal. We have an existing power grid infrastructure. We need to produce most of our electricity from coal, sequester the pollution and CO2 using existing technology (because I don't want to keep experimenting on the only home we have in the universe, regardless of what anyone thinks of global warming), heat our homes with natural gas or electricity, produce and sell cheap electric cars—which we have proven can be done right now—and solve both the oil and pollution problems at the same time.

The only problem is that all of these solutions run counter to the vested interests you seem to so highly regard and support—big oil and the internal combustion engine. What a deadly love affair, for our world, for our economy, for our security, and for our future. I'm sorry if I am the first to inform you that, except for trucks, ships, and motorcycles, the internal combustion engine running on gasoline must die!

Although all the products you mentioned and that were covered in the Modern Marvels program can also be made from coal, it is cheaper and easier to make them from oil.

Let's keep gasoline at $4.00 a gallon, at least; transition to coal for electric trains and cars, and let's save the oil for ships, trucks, motorcycles, race cars, plastics, chemicals, and pharmaceuticals. Otherwise, we may have to ultimately do without all of these things, at least at a price that anyone but you yourself can afford.

The thing I heard from you that was most shocking to me was your utter pessimism that our energy problems can be solved. Come on, Rush, how can you give up on America, American ingenuity, and the American way of life so easily????????? I would have expected better of you! Thank you.

20080814-03 17:56 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/14/08
--

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Reprise: Senator John McCain: "In the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations." Something I meant to mention in yesterday's posting: I guess McCain not only excludes Iraq in this "rule", but also the mess that is Africa. But then of course, Africa doesn't count either, because they're...dare I say it, Johnny Boy...black!

Today McCain maintained that he would not rule out Pennsylvania's Tom Ridge as his VP choice, despite Mr. Ridge's pro-choice stance. If you want to give-up on your Evangelicals and destroy your chances of winning the election, that would be a smart thing to do, Johnny Boy. At the same time, in an interview with a conservative publication, the Weekly Standard, McCain indicated that NYC Mayor Michael Bloomberg's support for abortion rights "would make it difficult to choose him."

Trial balloon after trial balloon. I guess you don't know what to do, do you, Johnny Boy?

20080814-04 18:08 SteveB Abortion & Christian Fundamentalists

Dear SteveM, (ref. email about Obama's abortion stance and questionable religion)

I was just wondering...do you really, truly feel that the idiot government has any right or intelligence or judgment to order people, especially pregnant women, what they can and cannot do with their own bodies?

What about the right to privacy, especially in the first trimester? Show me something in the Bible forbidding it. Where is "life" defined in the Bible?

They are a brainwashed cult, for cryin' out loud. Right, there is no evolution and the universe is 6000 years old and Mary was a virgin!!!!!!

And is Johnny Boy an Episcopalian or a Baptist, as he now claims?

20080814-05 18:11 SteveM Re: Abortion & Christian Fundamentalists

Dear SteveB,

No I believe in a woman's right to choose, in the first trimester.

It gets murky and well defined after that, like partial birth abortion.

The real battle and confusion is when does life begins, I like to believe it occurs during the birth process.

As for calling some ones belief system or guide book (Bible, Koran) a crock, is not very PC Mr. Baker, Oddly enough if you had made the same statement about the Koran, the PC police would have busted you and taken your key board privileges away. But it seems it's OK for open season on Christians, which is the real crock!

I'm not very religious, I'm only in church for funerals, but I feel the 10 commandments offer some good guideline for life. And given the choice of hanging with Muslims or Christians, I'll take the Christians, because they won't KILL me for being a non-believer or a non practitioner like you.

By the way, Political correctness is a doctrine, fostered by a delusional, illogical minority, and rabidly promoted by an unscrupulous mainstream media, which holds forth the proposition that it is entirely possible to pick up a turd by the clean end.

20080814-06 18:13 SteveB Colin Powell on John McCain

I just saw a great quote from Colin Powell:

I've known John McCain for 30 years, and I've never found a reason to vote for him yet!!!!

20080814-07 19:12 SteveB To: Dave Spurgel; The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear David Spergel:

I heard about your WMAP work on the Science channel and looked up your website, where I found your email address.

I'm currently working on a longish poem concerning many of the latest theories of physics, titled "Dark Matter". These are all subjects that I find fascinating.

What I have been wondering...ever since I was watching the fireworks this past 4th of July. You know those mortar projectiles that explode about 200-300 feet in the air, sending colored sparks out in all directions? The place where the explosion occurs, which I call ground-zero, is empty of anything shortly after the explosion.

And what I've been thinking is that, if there was a big bang (and I have to admit that it seems likely), and if the farthest galaxies are still streaming away from us at nearly the speed of light (or at least were, when that light left them, say 12-13 billion years ago, and that is the rub...we don't know for sure what they're doing now), then shouldn't there be a big hole of nothing in the universe at ground zero of where the big bang occurred?

I don't think you have found such a hole of nothingness, have you? If not, why not? Could this mean that there wasn't a big bang after all?

If you can answer, I would really appreciate it, and I will send you a copy of my poem for free when it is finished.

Thank you very much and happy hunting!

20080814-08 19:24 SteveB Re: Abortion & Christian Fundamentalists

Dear SteveM,

I have read the Koran from beginning to end and, you know, I guess that it was dictated to Mohammed by God, even though Mohammed was illiterate. At least God was smart enough by this time to make sure that it got written down (late in Mohammed's life). Unfortunately for the modern world, neither Jesus nor any of his direct disciples knew how to or cared to write diddly.

Anyway, in one part of the Koran, God spends an entire chapter berating the people of a nearby village for spreading rumors that Mohammed's wife was a whore. It's so nice that God has so much time on his hands. In another part, God talks not about slavery being wrong, but that you should treat your slaves well. The Old Testament also testifies to slavery—even one's daughters. And little boy's a*s'es are certainly not off limits to these Arab b*stards. Mohammed's religion is to be spread by war, killing, whatever it takes to save the Infidel.

Missing from both great books, of course, is any mention that the Earth is anything to be treasured and taken care of. Apparently, it is to be raped at will, like the virgins in heaven. You might think that God, knowing the future, would have cautioned care in population growth, resource usage, and taking care of what he gave us, as the American Indians teach. A real lack of foresight, in my humble opinion. Thanks for the help, God.

McCain and his pro-life stance are mierda. I suppose that he thinks, as the Evangelicals do, that he knows the mind of God. And he thinks Obama is arrogant and elitist?

20080815-01 06:50 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/15/08
--

I just heard John McCain say that the Georgia-Russia conflict..."is the most serious international crisis since the end of the Cold War."

He must maximize this little conflict to crisis proportions in order to try to convince the American people that it's so serious that we need to elect Johnny Boy, with his immense foreign-policy expertise, which, to my mind, is a total figment of his warped imagination. (see previous postings). It's as much a fantasy as the one about Hillary Clinton being ready to run the country on her famous "day one", when we now know from all the campaign insiders that she couldn't even run a campaign. Neither Hillary nor Johnny Boy have any executive experience at all, so they need to stop talking about how Obama doesn't have any. It is ideas and leadership that matter on this level playing field of experience.

OMG! Where on this green Earth has this senile b*stard been keeping himself? Is he ever serious, or is it simply a fallacy to seek seriousness in the rantings of a senile idiot?

Hypocrisy! Hypocrisy! And more Hypocrisy and Lies!

20080815-02 09:07 D. Spurgel Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology
--

Dear SteveB:

The big bang theory (or better the expanding universe theory) seems to do a remarkably good job of explaining the evolution of the universe from a few minutes after the big bang until today. There are a host of observations that match the predictions of the theory.

What happened in the first minute of the big bang is less certain — as we go back in time, we are probing physics at higher and higher energies. The first microsecond corresponds to energies greater than that probed in the biggest particle accelerators.

The physics of the big bang itself is poorly understood. At these high energies, we need to combine quantum mechanics and general relativity. At present, we do not have a successful theory of quantum gravity, so do not have solid answers to questions like "what was there before the big bang?" "what caused the big bang?" "is the universe infinite?" "why did the big bang seem to happen at many points at once?" These questions are of great interest to both experts and the general public. They are topics of active research.

Good luck with your poem. —Dave Spurgel

20080815-03 10:02 SteveM Re: A Book of Lies

ref: Howard Dean (democraticparty@democrats.org.)

If you didn't send this to me I would not have known about it! You know that there is always some truth to these types of books, This should convince the fence sitters that the puppet BHO can't be entrusted to lead this great country!

BTW, who has their hand up his b*tt? Hateful Harry Reed or Nancy "the C*nt" Pelosi? Say what's her brother doing these days? Time? Roll in the Clintons and John Edwards if you guys are doing a great job of representing the country!

Tell Doctor Dean, How come it's only "free speech" when liberal, progressive socialists are doing the talking?

Political correctness is a doctrine, fostered by a delusional, illogical minority, and rabidly promoted by an unscrupulous mainstream media, which holds forth the proposition that it is entirely possible to pick up a turd by the clean end.

Luv ya, don't ever change, you continue to bring laughter to my life!

20080816-01 06:56 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/16/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Today's Senile Moment is so easy, which is good because we're about to head out the door to a concert tonight.

McCain's campaign, with Johnny Boy's approval, as you've probably heard by now, "appropriated" Jackson Browne's song, "Running on Empty", without payment, acknowledgement, or permission. Browne, a Democrat for Obama, is suing.

Just a simple mistake, right Johnny Boy? How many simple mistakes can a campaign make? And how many simple mistakes would you make as President, you lying, stealing, corrupt, stupid, decrepit old codger.

Tomorrow night's "faith debate" should pose an interesting contract between the two would-be candidates. Good luck, Johnny Boy, you're going to need it. Try hard to be honest, for once, and keep your ugly temper under control, please.

20080816-02 10:36 SteveM Instructions for Life

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

1. Take into account that great love and great achievements involve great risk.
2. When you lose, don't lose the lesson.

3. Follow the three R's:

- Respect for self.
- Respect for others.
- Responsibility for all your actions.

4. Remember that not getting what you want is sometimes a wonderful stroke of luck.

5. Learn the rules so you know how to break them properly.

6. Don't let a little dispute ruin a great relationship.

7. When you realize you've made a mistake, take immediate steps to correct it.

8. Spend some time alone every day.

9. Open your arms to change, but don't let go of your values.

10. Remember that silence is sometimes the best answer.

11. Live a good, honorable life. Then when you get older and think back, you'll be able to enjoy it a second time.

12. A loving atmosphere in your home is the foundation for your life.

13. In disagreements with loved ones, deal only with the current situation. Don't bring up the past.

14. Share your knowledge. It is a way to achieve immortality.

15. Be gentle with the Earth.

16. Once a year, go someplace you've never been before.

17. Remember that the best relationship is one in which your love for each other exceeds your need for each other.

18. Judge your success by what you had to give up in order to get it.

19. Approach love and cooking with reckless abandon.

20080817-01 15:33 Mary Fw: No "Change" for Him!

[Source of original email unknown. I sent an email to the address listed at the end (since removed), on 11/22/11. Delivery failed. Email the same as forwarded by SteveM (Oct. 5, 2008) and Phil (Oct. 22, 2008). —SteveB]

Dear Friends:

My name is Joe Porter [or Dan Frost]. I live in Champaign, Illinois [or Kokomo, IN]. I'm 46 years old, a born-again Christian [or just a "Christian"], a husband, a father, a small business owner, a veteran, and a homeowner. I don't consider myself to be either conservative or liberal, and I vote for the person, not Republican or Democrat. I don't believe there are "two Americas"—but that every person in this country can be whomever and whatever they want to be if they'll just work to get there—and nowhere else on earth can they find such opportunities. I believe our government should help those who are legitimately downtrodden, and should always put the interests of America first.

The purpose of this message is that I'm concerned about the future of this great nation. I'm worried that the silent majority of honest, hard-working, tax-paying people in this country have been passive for too long. Most folks I know choose not to involve themselves in politics. They go about their daily lives, paying their bills, raising their kids, and doing what they can to maintain the good life. They vote and consider doing so to be a sacred trust. They shake their heads at the political pundits and so-called "news", thinking that what they hear is always spun by whomever is reporting it. They can't understand how elected officials can regularly violate the public trust with pork barrel spending. They don't want government handouts. They want the government to protect them, not raise their taxes for more government programs.

We are in the unique position in this country of electing our leaders. It's a privilege to do so. I've never found a candidate in any election with whom I agreed on everything. I'll wager that most of us don't even agree with our families or spouses 100% of the time. So when I step into that voting booth, I always try to look at the big picture and cast my vote for the man or woman who is best qualified for the job. I've hired a lot of people in my lifetime, and essentially that's what an election is—a hiring process. Who has the credentials? Whom do I want working for me? Whom can I trust to do the job right? I'm concerned that a growing number of voters in this country simply don't get it. They are caught up in a fervor they can't explain, and calling it "change".

Change what?, I ask.

Well, we're going to change America , they say.

In what way?, I query.

We want someone new and fresh in the White House, they exclaim.

So, someone who's not a politician?, I press.

Uh, well, no, we just want a lot of stuff changed, so we're voting for Obama, they state.

So the current system, the system of freedom and democracy that has enabled a man to grow up in this great country, get a fine education, raise incredible amounts of money and dominate the news and win his party's nomination for the White House—that system's all wrong?

No, no, that part of the system's okay—we just need a lot of change.

And so it goes. 'Change we can believe in.' Quite frankly, I don't believe that vague proclamations of change hold any promise for me. In recent months, I've been asking virtually everyone I encounter how they're voting. I live in Illinois [or Indiana], so most folks tell me they're voting for Barack Obama. But no one can really tell me why—only that he's going to change a lot of stuff. Change, change, change. I have yet to find one single person who can tell me distinctly and convincingly why this man is qualified to be President and Commander-in-Chief of the most powerful nation on earth—other than the fact that he claims he's going to implement a lot of change.

We've all seen the emails about Obama's genealogy, his upbringing, his Muslim background, and his church affiliations. Let's ignore this for a moment. Put it all aside. Then ask yourself, what qualifies this man to be my president? That he's a brilliant orator and talks about change?

CHANGE WHAT?

Friends, I'll be forthright with you—I believe the American voters who are supporting Barack Obama don't have a clue what they're doing, as evidenced by the fact that not one of them—NOT ONE of them I've spoken to can spell out his qualifications. Not even the most liberal media can explain why he should be elected. Political experience? Negligible.

Foreign relations? Non-existent. Achievements? Name one. Someone who wants to unite the country? If you haven't read his wife's thesis from Princeton , look it up on the web. This is who's lining up to be our next First Lady? The only thing I can glean from Obama's constant harping about change is that we're in for a lot of new taxes.

For me, the choice is clear. I've looked carefully at the two leading applicants for the job, and I've made my choice.

Here's a question—where were you five and a half years ago? Around Christmas, 2002. You've had five or six birthdays in that time. My son has grown from a sixth grade child to a high school graduate. Five and a half years is a good chunk of time. About 2,000 days. 2,000 nights of sleep. 6, 000 meals, give or take.

John McCain spent that amount of time, from 1967 to 1973, in a North Vietnamese prisoner-of-war camp.

When offered early release, he refused it. He considered this offer to be a public relations stunt by his captors, and insisted that those held longer than he should be released first. Did you get that part? He was offered his freedom, and he turned it down. A regimen of beatings and torture began.

Do you possess such strength of character? Locked in a filthy cell in a foreign country, would you turn down your own freedom in favor of your fellow man? I submit that's a quality of character that is rarely found, and for me, this singular act defines John McCain.

Unlike several presidential candidates in recent years whose military service is questionable or non-existent, you will not find anyone to denigrate the integrity and moral courage of this man. A graduate of Annapolis , during his Naval service he received the Silver Star, Bronze Star, Purple Heart and Distinguished Flying Cross. His own son is now serving in the Marine Corps in Iraq. Barack Obama is fond of saying "We honor John McCain's service...BUT...", which to me is condescending and offensive—because what I hear is, "Let's forget this man's sacrifice for his country and his proven leadership abilities, and talk some more about change."

[Here we go with the "war hero" stuff, though it seems to have little to do with qualifications and maybe nothing to do with character. Who knows for sure? —SteveB]

I don't agree with John McCain on everything—but I am utterly convinced that he is qualified to be our next President, and I trust him to do what's right. I know in my heart that he has the best interests of our country in mind. He doesn't simply want to be President—he wants to lead America , and there's a huge difference. Factually, there is simply no comparison between the two candidates. A man of questionable background and motives who prattles on about change can't hold a candle to a man who has devoted his life in public service to this nation, retiring from the Navy in 1981 and elected to the Senate in 1982.

Perhaps Obama's supporters are taking a stance between old and new. Maybe they don't care about McCain's service or his strength of character, or his unblemished qualifications to be President. Maybe "likeability" is a higher priority for them than "trust". Being a prisoner of war is not what qualifies John McCain to be President of the United States of America—but his demonstrated leadership certainly DOES.

Dear friends, it is time for us to stand. It is time for thinking Americans to say, "Enough." It is time for people of all parties to stop following the party line. It is time for anyone who wants to keep America first, who wants the right man leading their nation, to start a dialogue with all their friends and neighbors and ask who they're voting for, and why.

There's a lot of evil in this world. That should be readily apparent to all of us by now. And when faced with that evil as we are now, I want a man who knows the cost of war on his troops and on his citizens. I want a man who puts my family's interests before any foreign country.

I want a President who's qualified to lead. I want my country back, and I'm voting for John McCain.

Semper Fi, Daniel L. Frost Jr., GySgt USMC Retired, Kokomo , IN [I'm confused. You said, above, that you live in Illinois. Besides, the issue is George Bush! —SteveB]

20080817-02 16:13 SteveB "$65 Oil Is Coming (Maybe)" Energy, Speculation

"\$65 Oil Is Coming \(Maybe\)" by John Markman, MSN Money

Aug. 15, 2008, (<http://money.ca.msn.com/investing/jon-markman/article.aspx?cp-documentid=19292150>)

If you're frustrated over the high cost of gasoline at the pump, don't trade in your Hummer for a Vespa just yet: A leading energy analyst is telling clients these days to prepare for crude oil to retreat back below $65 per barrel over the next three years.

How could it happen? He says conservation, new drilling, efficient new vehicles, alternative energy sources, a rising U.S. dollar and a global recession will combine to blast prices back to the Stone Age — or at least to last year's levels.

"The match has struck, the fuse has been lit, and four or five years from now OPEC producers are going to be drinking their own oil and choking on it," says Tony Kolton, the founder and president of Logical Information Machines, a provider of research to most of the world's major energy-trading companies for two decades.

Plenty of smart analysts disagree with this point of view, figuring that emerging-market demand will pump up fossil-fuel prices and that North Americans will blithely forget all about conservation if gasoline prices trend lower. But since Kolton's view is deeply out of consensus and at least minimally plausible, it does deserve our attention.

Speculators unmasked

Kolton, a specialist in the history, composition and psychology of the energy market, believes that speculators were without question behind the run-up of prices to $147 per barrel in July and that government threats to expose and punish their behaviour spooked them out of their positions in a hurry.

He says his data on open interest of non-commercial positions in crude trading, as well as conversations with professional traders at big oil companies, clearly show that speculators, and not rising demand from Asia, pushed the market to extremes.

In contrast to people who say the oil market is too big to be pushed around by hedge funds, Kolton counters that in fact it is much smaller than the bond, currency or equity markets. The oil market "can be easily manipulated," he says.

The reason for the misconception is that while the market is large in dollar terms, most of the oil companies' hedging positions are pointed the same direction and set for months at a time. So marginal new positions that point the opposite way can have an outsize impact, much like a 5-foot rudder can change the direction of a 500-foot ship.

"I would ask all the fundamental guys why oil was $147 a month ago and $114 today," Kolton says. "Their opinion that crude moves purely on real demand is BS. When the fast money comes out, there's a giant sucking sound."

The swift exit of the fast-money crowd has pushed oil back down to its March level, around $110. Kolton's research on seasonality and demand suggests oil prices will rebound back to the $125 area and then resume their crash. The $100 level will be hard to crack, but he expects energy bears to prevail over bulls within six months and launch crude on a journey below $65.

"You had a perfect storm of pre-Olympics demand in China, a plunging (U.S.) dollar, speculation, cold weather and fear of supply disruptions in Nigeria and Iran pushing it up, and now they've all swung around on a dime," Kolton says, observing that U.S. recession and conservation are gutting demand, Iran is at the negotiating table, the U.S. dollar is soaring against the euro in reaction to the worsening European economy, and the summer has proved milder than normal, sapping the use of air conditioning throughout North America.

"People who don't trade the futures markets don't realize that this is typical for commodities, which always trade on emotion. Look at silver in the late 1970s, which went from $4 to $50 and back to $4 in two years," Kolton says.

Diminished demand

What about all that talk of how supply is running out? Well, it's funny: The spike to $147 seems to have really got people thinking about scarcity, and they've started making plans that could be very long-lasting.

It's sort of like the day a person realizes it's time to stop smoking — a light-bulb moment of alertness to a long-simmering crisis. Oil bears now think the $147 level was a slap in the face that made major corporate users consider changing their behaviour in persistent and fundamental ways.

Auto companies became focused on creating smaller hybrid cars; individuals are discovering the joys of public transportation, car pools and bicycles; churches are lecturing on the need to turn out the lights in vacant rooms; and American presidential candidates are debating the merits of inflating tires. And perhaps most importantly, going green appears to have emerged from fad to lifestyle as the cool dads now drive Mini Coopers instead of gas-guzzling Suburbans to their kids' soccer practices. Big private-equity and venture-capital funds, and industrial titans such as General Electric (GE.N), are throwing billions of dollars into creating better batteries, advanced materials and vehicles that run on plug-in electric power and plentiful U.S. natural gas. Meanwhile, oil giants from Brazil to Beijing are exploring for new oil and finding it offshore a lot more easily than expected, with payoffs to come a lot sooner than most skeptics now believe possible.

All of this is coming at a time when a credit drought has seriously impaired economic growth and blunted employment levels in developed nations in Europe and the Americas, and threatens to spread to Australia and much of Asia. When people are commuting and consuming less, and when companies are making less, they collectively use less energy. The U.S. Energy Information Administration reported Tuesday that oil demand during the first half of 2008 fell by an average 800,000 barrels per day compared with the same period a year ago — the biggest volume decline in 26 years.

Bad news and other views

Of course, we should probably be careful about what we wish for. While stock prices have risen smartly as energy prices have cracked in the past month, stocks are likely to fall steeply along with oil prices if a global recession is the major driver behind demand destruction. Just in case you're wondering, Kolton's historical and economic research and his gut instincts as a veteran trader lead him to think that the Dow Jones Industrial Average ($U.S.:INDU) will sink to the 9,500 level next year — retracing the 2003-07 bull market — before the bear has had its fill.

Opposing point of view? Yeah, I've got that. David Anderson, an energy portfolio manager at Palo Alto Investors, who has been my go-to guy for years on the subject, thinks the idea of crude oil falling below $65 per barrel is ludicrous. And, frankly, he says he doesn't even care when it comes to his energy-industry positions.

"We never base our view on energy-industry stocks on the direction of oil prices," he says. "We are buying growth companies in a growth industry and always have at least a five-year horizon. The fundamentals of the business — increasing demand and decreasing supply over the long term — favour higher stock values over time."

Anderson says energy bears are just not facing reality. He points to U.S. Department of Energy research that forecasts global growth in demand rising to at least 110 million barrels of oil per day in a decade from the current level of 85 million. "To get to that level while supply from the best and biggest fields in the Middle East, North Sea and Gulf of Mexico is shrinking will be very tough," he says. "Oil prices are going up to ration supply, short of a total global economic meltdown."

If you want to invest along with Anderson instead of Kolton, here are the large and medium-sized companies he likes best on the recent pullback, with expectations that they will roar back starting in September: Petrohawk Energy (HK.N), Plains Exploration & Production (PXP.N), Chesapeake Energy (CHK.N), Apache (APA.N), Southwestern Energy (SWN.N), EOG Resources (EOG.N) and Range Resources (RRC.N). Anderson is always good with the small caps, and among his favourites now are Canadian Superior Energy (SNG.TO), Arena Resources (ARD.N) and Gastar Exploration (GST.N). With any luck, Kolton and Anderson can both be right. These energy companies were going to be very profitable with $75 crude oil a year ago, so they must be minting money now. Short of an expectation for the lights to go out worldwide over the next year, consider buying at these levels, while the pessimism lasts.

20080817-03 16:35 Dennis Re: "$65 Oil Is Coming (Maybe)" Energy, Speculation

from SteveB:

The swift exit of the fast-money crowd has pushed oil back down to its March level, around $110. Kolton's research on seasonality and demand suggests oil prices will rebound back to the $125 area and then resume their crash. The $100 level will be hard to crack, but he expects energy bears to prevail over bulls within six months and launch crude on a journey below $65.

Dear SteveB,

I'm certain Kolton is dead wrong and am investing accordingly. The price of oil corrected due to temporarily decreased demand and reversal of the dollar. We'll never see $65 oil again (probably never under $100 again either). When Americans stop whining and adjust to the reality of higher energy costs by resuming their old driving habits, the price will rise again. We'll see $200 oil within the next year when the dollar resumes its inevitable decline. The professional traders at the big oil companies have been consistently wrong (they thought last year that we'd see $25 oil again). This guy better take a remedial course in economics if he doesn't believe in the fundamentals of supply and demand.

Dear Mary,

I'm amused at this guy's delusion. Being a prisoner of war is not what qualifies John McCain to be President of the United States of America—but his demonstrated leadership certainly DOES.

What has he demonstrated? That he knows nothing about economics and doesn't care. That he's emotionally unstable (ask his Senate colleagues if they trust him). That he reacted irrationally to the Russian invasion of Georgia by saying that in the 21st century nations should not invade other nations (has he forgotten he supported invading Iraq). That he doesn't support health care reform (that would bail out the auto and other companies from their retirement cost nightmares). That he didn't show up eight times to vote for renewal of alternative energy (but claims in his ads that he supports it). That he really doesn't understand the cost of war (over nine trillion dollars just for the Iraq war, not to mention the loss of over 3000 American military lives). That he hasn't supported benefits for his fellow veterans (who don't happen to own ten houses and have a rich wife). I could go on and on, but you get the idea...

As Iacocca points out, America is going over a cliff. Do we want this senile old man to be the driver? I have a lot of questions about Obama. He does seem to think, like most politicians, that pandering will win votes. But I do think he is highly intelligent and, if elected, would be wise enough to seek the advice of those who are more experienced before making critical decisions. He does need to be more specific about what change would mean. But there is no doubt that a significant change in direction for the country is needed soon. Although, in my opinion, I think it's probably way too late. We're already over the cliff and the next president will be scrambling to pick up the pieces.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

10 Reasons I'm Voting Democrat

1. I'm voting Democrat because I believe the government will do a better job of spending the money I earn than I would.
2. I'm voting Democrat because freedom of speech is fine as long as nobody is offended by it.
3. I'm voting Democrat because when we pull out of Iraq I trust that the bad guys will stop what they're doing because they now think we're good people.
4. I'm voting Democrat because I believe that people who can't tell us if it will rain on Friday CAN tell us that the polar ice caps will melt away in ten years if I don't start driving a Prius.
5. I'm voting Democrat because I'm not concerned about the slaughter of millions of babies so long as we keep all death row inmates alive.
6. I'm voting Democrat because I believe that business should not be allowed to make profits for themselves. They need to break even and give the rest away to the government for redistribution as THEY see fit.
7. I'm voting Democrat because I believe three or four pointy headed elitist liberals need to rewrite the Constitution every few days to suit some fringe kooks who would NEVER get their agendas past the voters.
8. I'm voting Democrat because I believe that when the terrorists don't have to hide from us over there, and they come over here I don't want to have any guns in the house to fight them off with.
9. I'm voting Democrat because I love the fact that I can now marry whatever I want. I've decided to marry my horse.
10. I'm voting Democrat because I believe oil companies' profits of 4% on a gallon of gas are obscene but the government taxing the same gallon of gas at 15% isn't.

Any Questions?

20080818-02 10:40 SteveB Re: "I'm Voting Democrat"

Dear SteveM,

Hey, I'm glad to see you've finally seen the light. As you know, I'm voting Democratic too! Any questions?

20080818-03 14:35 SteveB To: Neil deGrasse Tyson; The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear Neil deGrasse Tyson:

I have loved learning of your work and watching you on TV. I found your email address on the web.

I'm currently working on a longish poem concerning many of the latest theories of physics, titled "Dark Matter. These are all subjects that I find fascinating.

What I have been wondering...ever since I was watching the fireworks this past 4th of July. You know those mortar projectiles that explode about 200-300 feet in the air, sending colored sparks out in all directions? The place where the explosion occurs, which I call ground-zero, is empty of anything shortly after the explosion.

And what I've been thinking is that, if there was a big bang (and I have to admit that it seems likely), and if the farthest galaxies are still streaming away from us at nearly the speed of light (or at least were, when that light left them, say 12-13 billion years ago, and that is the rub...we don't know for sure what they're doing now), then shouldn't there be a big hole of nothing in the universe at ground zero of where the big bang occurred?

I don't think even WMAP has found such a hole of nothingness, has it? If not, why not? Could this mean that there wasn't a big bang after all?

If you can answer, I will really appreciate it, and I will send you a copy of my poem for free when it is finished.

Thank you very much and happy gazing, etc.!

20080818-04 07:34 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/18/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

At Saturday's Faith Forum, or whatever it was, McCain complained that $3,000,000 of the taxpayers' money had been spent to study the DNA of bears in Montana.

One problem is that I consider the preservation of bears in Montana to be a worthy project and worth the tiny amount of money spent on it.

But, Johnny Boy, what I guess you forgot is that YOU VOTED FOR THE BILL THAT MADE THE APPROPRIATION!!!

You're obviously getting a little too old for this line of work, Johnny Boy.

20080818-05 08:48 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/18/08—Part 2; "The McCain Doctrines"

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT PART 2:

Today, in a speech before the VFW in Florida, McCain criticized Obama for wanting to be President of the United States. Is there no shame and no honesty left in this man? Does he really think we're all so stupid that we don't know that

Johnny Boy is running for President too? Did he just forget that he's running too? What can the story possibly be on this a*s-hole? Excuse me while I puke! (Am I stating these humble points too strenuously? I don't think so, especially since Obama is unwilling or unable to do so. Therefore, I have to!)

And I am doubly sick of McCain's claims that he is right about Iraq and Obama is wrong because McCain backed the surge and Obama did not. It will take historians a long time to figure out whether the surge had much or little to do with the current situation in Iraq, but the worst part of McCain's argument is that it ignores the fact that McCain has been dead wrong about Iraq ever since his warmongering started right after 9/11, right up to the "surge" even if one grants that he is right on that one point. The Iraq War did not begin with the famous "surge". It began in 2003 for Christ's sake, when McCain claimed that it had been run magnificently and proclaimed that Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld would have places in his Cabinet if he were ever President. America has come to see this was as wrong, no matter how patriotic we are and no matter how much we support the troops. But, of course, Johnny Boy, Obama is a traitor and against America if he agrees, as he always has, with the current majority of the American people, and disagrees with your "expert" warmongering assessment, Mr. Foreign Policy Expert Johnny Boy McCain.

Excuse me while I puke some more. Grow-up, McCain, you a*s-wipe!

"The McCain Doctrines" (formerly: "Why This Man Cannot Be Allowed to Run the Foreign Policy of America!!!!") by Matt Bai, New York Times

May 18, 2008, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2008/05/18/magazine/18mccain-t.html?pagewanted=all>)

(Whatever their disagreements on policy, United States senators, even in today's hyper-political climate, are reluctant to impugn one another's motives or integrity.)

That's doubly true among those who experienced combat in the Vietnam War, a group that now includes four sitting senators—the Republicans John McCain and Chuck Hagel and the Democrats John Kerry and Jim Webb—as well as former colleagues like Bob Kerrey, Max Cleland and Chuck Robb. These men share an obvious bond, and over the years they have more readily crossed partisan lines than other senators, constituting, in some ways, a party unto themselves. To outsiders, they give the impression of having seen things in their youth that confer a different kind of perspective on mere politics; they seem to know that there are worse things in life than losing an election and having to go home. In contrast to the insecurities of the many boomer politicians who avoided service in Vietnam or marched against it, the Senate's former soldiers exude a confidence that goes beyond military matters.

The war in Iraq has tested some of these friendships, however. Last year, after House Democrats voted to set a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, McCain and Webb—both of whom were featured heroes in a classic book on the era, Robert Timberg's Nightingale's Song—became embroiled in an unusually public disagreement. After McCain pointedly said the enemy in Iraq was celebrating along with Democrats, Webb accused him of unfairly questioning other people's patriotism. When Webb and Hagel (a close personal friend of McCain's) proposed a bill to give troops leaving Iraq and Afghanistan more time at home before redeploying, McCain, whose 19-year-old son has served with the Marines in Iraq, forcefully opposed them, saying the troops were needed in the theater. More recently, McCain has found himself on the opposite side of Webb and Hagel again, this time over their "G.I. bill" that would offer education money to every returning veteran. McCain and others want a more limited bill that would encourage rank-and-file soldiers to re-enlist rather than return to civilian life.

In these skirmishes, McCain is the outlier. Among his fellow combat veterans in the Senate, past and present, he is the only one who has continued to champion the war in Iraq; by contrast, Kerry, Webb and Hagel have emerged in the years since the invasion as unsparing critics of American involvement there. (In a new book, Hagel, who voiced deep concerns about Iraq even as he voted for the war resolution in 2002, predicts that the war will turn out to be "the most dangerous and costly foreign policy debacle in our nation's history.") This divide among old allies may be the inevitable result of a protracted war that has cleaved plenty of American households and friendships. But it may also be that the war is revealing underlying fractures among the Senate's Vietnam coalition.

There is a feeling among some of McCain's fellow veterans that his break with them on Iraq can be traced, at least partly, to his markedly different experience in Vietnam. McCain's comrades in the Senate will not talk about this publicly. They are wary of seeming to denigrate McCain's service, marked by his legendary endurance in a Hanoi prison camp, when in fact they remain, to this day, in awe of it. And yet in private discussions with friends and colleagues, some of them have pointed out that McCain, who was shot down and captured in 1967, spent the worst and most costly years of the war sealed away, both from the rice paddies of Indochina and from the outside world. During those years, McCain did not share the disillusioning and morally jarring experiences of soldiers like Kerry, Webb and Hagel, who found themselves unable to recognize their enemy in the confusion of the jungle; he never underwent the conversion that caused Kerry, for one, to toss away some of his war decorations during a protest at the Capitol. Whatever anger McCain felt remained focused on his captors, not on his own superiors back in Washington.

Not all of McCain's fellow veterans subscribe to the theory that the singularity of his war experience has anything to do with his intransigence on Iraq. (Bob Kerrey, for one, told me that while he was aware of this argument, he has never believed it.) But some suspect that whatever lesson McCain took away from his time in Vietnam, it was not the one that stayed with his colleagues who were "in country" during those years—that some wars simply can't be won on the battlefield, no matter how long you fight them, no matter how many soldiers you send there to die.

"McCain is my friend and brother, and I love him dearly," Max Cleland, Georgia's former Democratic senator, told me when we talked last month. "But I think you learn something fighting on the ground, like me and John Kerry and Chuck Hagel did in Vietnam. This objective of 'hearts and minds'? Well, hello! You didn't know which heart and mind was going to blow you up!

"I have seen this movie before, and I know how it ends," says Cleland, who lost three of his limbs to an errant grenade during the battle of Khe Sanh. "With thousands dead and tens of thousands more injured, and years later you ask yourself what you were doing there. To the extent my friend John McCain signs on to this, he is endangering America's long-term interests, and probably his own election in the fall."

If it is true that McCain's Vietnam experience left him with a different attitude about foreign wars from the one held by those who were on the ground, then it certainly wasn't apparent earlier in his political career. During the late 1980s and early 1990s, after he arrived in the Senate, McCain was, in fact, an outspoken opponent of American intervention in faraway lands—at least in cases where the country wasn't willing to lose thousands of lives to achieve its aims. But during the post-cold-war 1990s, as America's foreign-policy establishment struggled to define the nation's obligations to the rest of the world, McCain went through his own kind of inner journey, seeking some balance between the legacy of Vietnam and the pull of new crises around the globe—crises born of savagery and rife with human consequence. That journey led him inexorably toward Iraq, where McCain's resolve hardened to the point that now, as he prepares to run the climactic campaign of his life, he finds himself carrying the weight of another war, one that has divided the country and devastated his party. One way or the other, Iraq will determine this last phase of McCain's political life, as surely as the war in Vietnam defined its beginning.

When Captain McCain returned home from Hanoi in 1973, a grateful Navy gave him and his fellow P.O.W.'s their choice of assignments. McCain rather audaciously chose one normally reserved for higher-ranking officers: study at the prestigious National War College. The war in Vietnam collapsed during the five-plus years of his imprisonment, and McCain needed to understand what happened. He absorbed the writings of military historians, most notably Bernard Fall, a veteran of the French resistance who was a sharp critic of the American military in Vietnam. Fall, who lived (and died) among American troops in Vietnam, didn't quibble with America's strategic decision to intervene in the country, but he did lambaste its tactics: hunting down guerrillas in search-and-destroy patrols, trying to draw the Vietcong into traditional military battles. Fall believed the Americans did not learn from the failure in Indochina of the French, who insisted on fighting a jungle insurgency as if it were the Second World War.

In his book, Chuck Hagel writes of listening to declassified tapes from the mid-1960s in which Lyndon Johnson admitted to advisers that Vietnam probably couldn't be won but rued that withdrawal would make him the first American president to lose a war. "I wish someone had told me when I was sitting on a burning tank in a Vietnamese rice paddy that I was fighting for a lost cause just to save a president's legacy," Hagel observes acidly. Although McCain was held and tortured for the same cause, he never saw the situation the way Hagel did. In his view, the American effort began to turn around with the promotion in 1968 of Gen. Creighton Abrams, who adopted the tactics favored by counterinsurgency experts like Fall. Abrams pulled back the search-and-destroy teams and instead focused on winning the "hearts and minds" of South Vietnamese villagers. His goal was to encourage the South Vietnamese military to take over their own defense—the process that came to be known as "Vietnamization." McCain maintains that Abrams's strategy was working, but it was undercut by the fact that, by that point, the American public had already rendered its verdict, and the drawdown of troops continued until the war's chaotic end.

The lesson McCain and other conservatives took away from this version of history is that America was driven from Vietnam principally because the voters, discouraged by dire reports from a skeptical media, lost their will. McCain has said in the past that he felt the war could have been won had the right strategy been followed sooner. When I met with

McCain last month for a far-ranging conversation about Vietnam and Iraq, I asked him whether he still felt this was the case. "These are all hypotheticals," he replied. "But I think that if we had employed the strategy that Creighton Abrams put into effect when he relieved General Westmoreland"—that is, if the Abrams strategy had been used years earlier—"then at least the casualties would have been dramatically different."

As a new congressman in 1983, among the first of his generation of vets to serve in Washington, McCain brought with him an attitude toward American intervention similar to what would later come to be known as the Powell Doctrine, for its author, Colin Powell: simply put, if you were going to use the American military to end a dispute or displace a foreign government, then you had to have the American public firmly on your side and you had to be prepared to use overwhelming force to achieve your aims. Late that year, when his party's popular president, Ronald Reagan, proposed to extend the deployment of the Marines in Beirut, McCain was one of just 27 Republican representatives to object. The soldiers didn't have a clear mission, McCain said, nor enough numbers to affect the outcome of the conflict. (Ultimately, 241 American servicemen died when a suicide bomber struck the Marine compound there, and American forces were withdrawn.)

McCain strongly supported other operations, like the American-led invasion of tiny Grenada in 1983, as well as the first gulf war in 1991. But his first term in the Senate, which began in 1987, was marked mostly by extreme caution when it came to inserting American troops into foreign wars. As a newly arrived senator serving on the Armed Services Committee, McCain opposed Reagan's plan to fly the American flag on Kuwaiti oil tankers that were coming under fire from Iranian forces in the Persian Gulf.

In Aug., 1992, when the Bush administration and its allies were trying to get humanitarian aid to Bosnians caught in a multiethnic civil war, McCain broke with the majority of Republicans and voted against a resolution that authorized "demonstrations of force" in the region; he called it recklessly provocative. After the ambush in Somalia that claimed the lives of 18 American soldiers in Oct., 1993, a frustrated McCain introduced a resolution to bring the troops home immediately. Bob Dole, a staunch internationalist and then the Republican minority leader, persuaded other senators to defeat it.

McCain's critics have pointed to this early part of his political career to make the case that he later underwent a radical change in his philosophy, veering from a cautious approach to military force to a more hawkish, even bellicose mentality. His own aides, meanwhile, contend that McCain's philosophy has been entirely constant; they say his opposition to limited and ill-defined operations like Somalia and Bosnia wasn't at all inconsistent with his willingness, later, to use overwhelming force against a tyrant like Saddam Hussein.

The problem with these narratives is that neither reflects the context of the time. As two former national security officials in the Clinton administration, Derek Chollet and James Goldgeier, explain compellingly in America Between the Wars, a book to be published next month, the period between the cold war and the war on terror—the 90s, roughly speaking—was a decade when foreign-policy thinkers across the ideological spectrum were groping about in darkness, trying to feel out the limits of American power and to balance the twin risks of action and inaction. During that time, the United States bounced from one unforeseen crisis to another, undertaking a military intervention every 18 months, on average—a staggering pace compared with that of the years that came before. Old ideological alliances in Washington were shattered and reformed, as pacifists lined up with conservative isolationists to battle liberal hawks and neoconservatives. New terms—"failed state," "humanitarian intervention," "ethnic cleansing"—entered the American lexicon. It's fair to say, then, that McCain did evolve in his views on when and how to use American force over the course of the decade, but it's misleading to separate his evolution from the larger transformation that was happening all around him.

During the cold war, the guiding framework for military intervention was built around a pretty straightforward set of questions: were American forces needed to stop the expansion of Soviet ideology or territory, and if so, were the potential casualties worth the risk? When the Berlin Wall came down in 1989, however, that framework disappeared almost overnight. Ecstatic policy makers slashed the size of the military and hoped for a "peace dividend." In a famous article in 1989, Francis Fukuyama posited that we were witnessing "the end of history"; from that time forward, the theory went, mankind would drift inexorably away from totalitarianism toward individual freedom and democracy. Fukuyama didn't actually advocate that the United States retreat from its assertive global role, but that's what many in Washington—and especially conservatives—chose to hear. The long war was over, and America could now focus on defending its own borders, using technologies like missile defense, rather than sending its soldiers abroad to "police the world."

McCain explicitly rejected this idea, and yet he wasn't eager to commit American troops to humanitarian missions that could easily turn into military nightmares like Somalia. For him, as for others, the defining dilemma of this new terrain was Bosnia. In July 1995, after years of debate in Washington about how to stop Serbian forces from wiping out the Bosnian Muslims, the Serbs overran the town of Srebrenica and, while Dutch peacekeepers stood by, mowed down thousands of Muslim boys and men. Coming not long after the mass killings in Rwanda, the slaughter in Srebrenica again brought the moral implications of inaction home to American politicians—especially those who, like McCain, previously opposed armed intervention.

NATO responded with a series of airstrikes against Bosnian Serbs, which ultimately pushed the Serbian president, Slobodan Milosevic, to negotiate a settlement to the war. Clinton then urged Congress to approve the deployment of 20,000 American troops to help enforce the agreement. At the time, McCain was supporting the presidential campaign of his friend Phil Gramm, who was running against Dole in the Republican primaries. Gramm opposed the intervention, and he pleaded with McCain to stand by him; instead, this time, McCain decided to partner with Dole to ensure passage of the supporting resolution, stifling significant Republican opposition. It was a turning point, both for McCain and American consensus as a whole. "The Bosnian intervention was life-changing for a lot of people," Bob Kerrey told me. "It caused even some liberals to go from opposing intervention to supporting it."

Throughout the late '90s, McCain criticized what he called Clinton's "feckless photo-op foreign policy," but he also emerged as an important bulwark for the administration against Republicans who reflexively opposed Clinton's every move as commander in chief. McCain strongly supported airstrikes against Sudan and Afghanistan, in retaliation for terrorist attacks on two American Embassies, and against Iraq, where Saddam Hussein was obstructing weapons inspectors. In 1999, McCain took the lead in supporting the bombing of Serbia to prevent another genocide in Kosovo. His tone had changed considerably since the days before Srebrenica. "Our interests and values converge clearly here," McCain said in a speech from the Senate floor. "It seems clear to me that Milosevic knows no limits to his inhumanity and will keep slaughtering until even the most determined opponent of American involvement in this conflict is convinced to drop that opposition."

By the time McCain ran for president in 2000, he was the one arguing in debates for a more robust military presence in humanitarian crises, while George W. Bush forswore "nation building" and vowed a more "humble" foreign policy. During that campaign, McCain introduced the closest thing he had found to a doctrine for foreign intervention: the "rogue-state rollback," under which he proposed arming and training internal forces that might ultimately overthrow menacing regimes in countries like Iraq, Iran and North Korea.

McCain's more ambitious view of American power made him a natural ally of neoconservative thinkers like William Kristol, the editor of the fledgling Weekly Standard (now a New York Times columnist), and Robert Kagan of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Empowered during the Reagan era, the neocons were largely shoved aside during the '90s by the more isolationist, anti-Clinton voices who dominated Republican politics. By the time McCain expanded his circle of influence to include Kristol and other neocons in the late '90s, they had rallied around a single unifying cause: the overthrow of Saddam Hussein. In 1998, McCain was one of the sponsors of the Iraq Liberation Act, signed into law by Bill Clinton, which officially changed American policy from containing Hussein to deposing him, and he became a leading figure in the Committee for the Liberation of Iraq, a lobbying group founded by Randy Scheunemann, who is now his chief foreign policy adviser. McCain met with Ahmad Chalabi, the smooth Iraqi dissident who was a favorite of the neocons, and supported him publicly.

After the terrorist attacks of 2001 and the sudden elevation of Al Qaeda as a defining national security threat, McCain never had any doubt that Iraq, with its supposed capability to unleash or share weapons of mass destruction, posed an existential threat to the United States. Reading his statements from the time, there is no indication that he ever judged the invasion of Iraq by the standard he had used earlier in his career—whether it had the potential to become another Vietnam. Instead, as American troops swarmed Baghdad, McCain repeatedly compared Hussein to Adolf Hitler and predicted that the occupation of Iraq would be remembered in much the same way that history celebrated the liberation and rebuilding of Europe and Japan.

I arranged to talk with McCain during the last week of April, before a fund-raising event at the Grand Hyatt hotel in Tampa. When he strode, an hour late, into the conference room his campaign had reserved, his gait was rushed and purposeful and his manner decidedly businesslike. Having survived the sadism of the Vietcong and, more recently, skin cancer, McCain these days shows the wear of his 71 years. His face is more topographically interesting than it was when he first ran for president eight years ago, the skin folding into small craters and valleys as it runs into his neckline. His eyes look warier and less mischievous than they did back then. You can imagine, looking at him, how McCain spent much of these last few years: beseeching and indulging Republican power brokers, many of whom he does not like, all the while tolerating their lectures, bridling his infamous temper, keeping the irritation pent up. Perhaps repression exacts its cost.

Sitting down at the end of a long granite table, he greeted me warmly, and then, before I could ask a question or even introduce the subject at hand, he dove headlong into a five-minute soliloquy. He told me that he had just driven in from the airport on Eisenhower Boulevard, and that Eisenhower was a man he very much admired, because Eisenhower understood the costs of war and strove to keep America out of it. He then made reference to a "rather hysterical" column by Fareed Zakaria in that morning's Washington Post about McCain's views on foreign policy. His voice was tight and measured. "I've seen other stories and I've seen comments about my national-security speech," McCain said, referring to an address he gave in Los Angeles a few weeks earlier. "The story line is as follows: 'McCain's not the same McCain. He's changed, and now he's become a hawk, and he is dramatically different from what he was.'" He recited this narrative as if repeating the nonsensical words of dullards. "And anybody is free to write whatever they want and form whatever opinions they want to form. But facts are facts. And the fact is that I know war, and I know the tragedy of war. And no one hates war more than veterans."

From here, McCain went on to list for me some of the military actions he supported (Grenada, Panama) and some that he opposed (Beirut, Somalia). He had always followed the same set of values, he said, grounded in the premise that all people, not just Americans, were created equal and had inalienable rights. And when America could intervene militarily to further those values around the world without needless sacrifice in lives and money, he was all for it, and where we couldn't, he was not, and there was nothing extreme about that.

"As far as people who advise me," McCain went on, though I still hadn't asked a question, "probably one of my most trusted advisers for the last 30 years is Henry Kissinger, not known as a hawk or a neocon." McCain infused the word with sarcasm. "I also remember the days when Ronald Reagan was portrayed as a hawk and a neocon. I remember the near hysteria in response to his 'tear down this wall.' I remember the 'Oh, you can't do that, when you call the Soviets an evil empire.' I remember all those things. Same people who are now saying—" He stopped himself midsentence, then began again. "I'm always open to new ideas and new thoughts, but my principles were grounded many years ago in places like the National War College and other places where I have learned and studied and talked to people I admire and respect. "So," McCain said finally, "with that preface, I'd be glad to answer any questions you might have, and again, it's always good to be with you."

It's rare to see a presidential candidate vent in quite this way, but clearly some of the criticism over his policies on Iraq and foreign policy in general—mild criticism, to this point—had wounded McCain. When he looks in the mirror, he does not see a reckless or belligerent leader, and yet that was the man his detractors claimed to see. A few weeks earlier, the liberal radio host Ed Schultz made headlines by calling McCain a "warmonger" and then happily repeating the charge on CNN. As McCain and I talked, the Democratic National Committee had begun broadcasting an ad that repeatedly showed him saying at a New Hampshire campaign event that he would be fine with keeping American troops in Iraq for 100 years. The quote had been ripped out of context—he went on to say that such a troop presence would be possible only without casualties, in the same way that American soldiers had remained quietly for decades in South Korea and Europe—but it had already become a staple of Democratic attacks, and McCain could expect to see it about half a million more times before November.

McCain's major Los Angeles address seemed to have been written in part to reverse this perception. The speech began with McCain's hatred of war, then moved on to stress his commitment to multilateralism and to ending global warming. McCain called, again, for a "League of Democracies" to foster cooperation among free nations. Only in the final minutes did he get around to even mentioning Iraq. Clearly, the campaign was starting to worry about McCain being Reaganized in this way—that is, of having the fall campaign become a referendum on whether he was stable and rational enough to be trusted with the nation's nuclear codes.

McCain described himself, in that speech and in his preamble to our interview, as a "realistic idealist"—a phrase meant to bridge a divide inside his party. While there haven't really been neat camps into which you can divide Republicans in the post-cold-war era, some rough labels did emerge throughout the '90s. On one extreme were the isolationists, led most noisily by Pat Buchanan, who essentially believed that the end of the cold war should also have meant the end of America's military involvement in distant lands. In the middle were the group known as realists, who were willing to use force, but only where the country's vital strategic interests were at stake and where an international consensus could be forged. The realists identified with leaders like Kissinger and James Baker, the former secretary of state, who famously declared of Bosnia, "We do not have a dog in that fight." And then, on the other end of the spectrum, you had the idealists, including most of those known as neocons. The idealists believed that American force could and should be used to promote American values abroad, whether or not the countries involved posed an immediate danger to national security and whether or not the rest of the world agreed.

McCain has never been confused for an isolationist, but neither can he be confined to either of the other factions. One reason is temperamental; McCain just doesn't like labels, and he isn't very good at sticking to orthodoxies—a personality quirk he has tried hard to control during the campaign. "He's not a guy who drinks Kool-Aid easily," says Gary Hart, the former Democratic senator who was once close enough to McCain to have been a groomsman in his wedding. "He's suspicious of any group who sees the world that simply." Lorne Craner, a foreign-policy thinker who worked for McCain in the House and Senate in the 1980s, told me that McCain had a standing rule in his office then. All meetings were to be limited to half an hour, unless they were with either of two advisers: Jeane Kirkpatrick, the Reaganite idealist, or Brent Scowcroft, the former general who was a leader in the realist wing. McCain loved to hear from both of them at length.

It's clear, though, that on the continuum that separates realists from idealists, McCain sits much closer to the idealist perspective. McCain has long been chairman of the International Republican Institute, run by Craner, which exists to promote democratic reforms in closed societies. He makes a point of meeting with dissidents when he visits countries like Georgia and Uzbekistan and has championed the cause of Aung San Suu Kyi, the imprisoned leader of the Burmese resistance. Most important, as he made clear in his preamble to our interview, McCain considers national values, and not strategic interests, to be the guiding force in foreign policy. America exists, in McCain's view, not simply to safeguard the prosperity and safety of those who live in it but also to spread democratic values and human rights to other parts of the planet.

McCain argues that his brand of idealism is actually more pragmatic in a post-9/11 world than the hard realism of the cold war. He rejects as outdated, for instance, a basic proposition of cold-war realists like Kissinger and Baker: that stability is always found in the relationship between states. Realists have long presumed that the country's security is defined by the stability of its alliances with the governments of other countries, even if those governments are odious; by this thinking, your interests can sometimes be served by befriending leaders who share none of your democratic values. McCain, by contrast, maintains that in a world where oppressive governments can produce fertile ground for rogue groups like Al Qaeda to recruit and prosper, forging bonds with tyrannical regimes is often more likely to harm American interests than to help them.

As we spoke in Tampa, I asked McCain if it was true, as his friend Joe Lieberman and others suggested to me, that he had been brought to a more idealist way of thinking partly by the genocides in Rwanda and Srebrenica. "I think so, I think so," he said, nodding. "And Darfur today. I feel strongly about Darfur, and yet, and this is where the realist side comes in, how do we effectively stop the genocide in Darfur?" He seemed to be genuinely wrestling with the question. "You know the complications with a place that's bigger, I guess, than the size of Texas, and it's hard to know who the Janjaweed is, who are the killers, who are the victims. It's all jumbled up.

"So I've always tried to make a case for the realist side," he continued. "And I think it was pretty clear that in Kosovo, we could probably benefit the situation fairly effectively and fairly quickly. And yet I look at Darfur, and I still look at Rwanda, to some degree, and think, How could we have gone in there and stopped that slaughter?"

McCain is known for being a gut thinker, averse to overarching doctrines or theory. But as we talked, I tried to draw out of him some template for knowing when military intervention made sense—an answer, essentially, to the question that has plagued policy makers confronting international crises for the last 20 years. McCain has said that the invasion of Iraq was justified, even absent the weapons of mass destruction he believed were there, because of Hussein's affront to basic human values. Why then, I asked McCain, shouldn't we go into Zimbabwe, where, according to that morning's paper, allies of the despotic president, Robert Mugabe, were rounding up his political opponents and preparing to subvert the results of the country's recent national election? How about sending soldiers into Myanmar, formerly Burma, where Aung San Suu Kyi remained under house arrest by a military junta?

"I think in the case of Zimbabwe, it's because of our history in Africa," McCain said thoughtfully. "Not so much the United States but the Europeans, the colonialist history in Africa. The government of South Africa has obviously not been effective, to say the least, in trying to affect the situation in Zimbabwe, and one reason is that they don't want to be tarred with the brush of modern colonialism. So that's a problem I think we will continue to have on the continent of Africa. If you send in Western military forces, then you risk the backlash from the people, from the legacy that was left in Africa because of the era of colonialism."

The United States faced a similar obstacle in Myanmar, McCain went on, shaking his head sadly. "First of all, you'd have to gauge the opinion of the people over time, whether you'd be greeted as liberators or as occupiers," McCain said. "I would be concerned about the possibility that if it were mishandled, we might see an insurgent movement." He talked a bit about Aung San Suu Kyi, whom he called "one of the great figures of the 20th century," but then wondered aloud if the American public would support a military intervention.

"It goes back to the Vietnam thing," McCain told me. "I'm just not sure the American people would support a military engagement in Burma, no matter how justified the cause. And I can't tell you exactly when it would be over. And I can't tell you exactly what the reaction of the people there would be." Most American politicians, of course, would immediately dismiss the idea of sending the military into Zimbabwe or Myanmar as tangential to American interests and therefore impossible to justify. McCain didn't make this argument. He seemed to start from a default position that moral reasons alone could justify the use of American force, and from there he considered the reasons it might not be feasible to do so. In other words, to paraphrase Robert Kennedy, while most politicians looked at injustice in a foreign land and asked, "Why intervene?" McCain seemed to look at that same injustice and ask himself, "Why not?"

"I think we've learned some lessons," McCain told me. "One is that the American people have to be willing to support it. But two, we need to work more in an international way to try to beneficially affect the situation. And you have to convince America and the world that every single avenue has been exhausted before we go in militarily. And we better think not a day later or a week later, but a year and 5 years and 10 years later. Because the attention span, unfortunately, of the American people, although pretty remarkable in some ways, is not inexhaustible."

WHAT WAS STARTLING about this conversation was that, while McCain was talking about the dangers of intervening in a Zimbabwe or a Burma, he might just as well have been talking about the invasion of Iraq. Didn't that country, too, have a colonial history that had been carelessly considered, to say the least? Didn't the war's proponents fail to plan more than a few weeks out or to ask the hard questions about how their soldiers might be greeted in the streets?

"Yes, I agree with you," McCain said, nodding again, when I put this question to him directly. "It was one of the penalties that we paid. But remember, the major reason to go into Iraq were the weapons of mass destruction. That was the conventional wisdom at the time, not only held by the United States but certainly many other nations."

This was, of course, an arguable point, and that argument, with the benefit of hindsight, will probably continue to rage in Washington and in political-science departments around the country for decades. But the invasion of Iraq is now five years past, and the question at the heart of the 2008 campaign—or one of them, anyway—is bound to revolve around a more current dilemma. Why, given all the lessons of military intervention that McCain himself had just laid out, does he think it still makes sense to stay? Having bemoaned the impact of Vietnam on the nation, why is McCain—alone among the veterans of that war in the Senate—determined to settle in for another long and costly counterinsurgency?

The parallels between Vietnam and Iraq can be too readily overstated. The very nature of the wars is markedly different, for better or worse; Vietnam was a Communist uprising against an autocratic government, while Iraq represents a multiparty, ethnic conflict more similar to that of the Balkans. The casualties, to this point, aren't nearly analogous, either. The United States lost some 58,000 soldiers in Vietnam, compared with a death toll, after five years in Iraq, of about 4,000.

Still, in this current conflict there are echoes of Vietnam that have grown too loud to easily ignore. Both conflicts were entered into under pretenses that were later widely discredited. Reports from the front in Iraq depict American soldiers who find it difficult to discern friends from enemies as they try to navigate an unfamiliar culture, language and landscape. American leaders are talking yet again about transferring responsibility for the war to local forces and the police, but Iraqization doesn't seem to be faring a whole lot better than Vietnamization did; last month, some 1,000 Iraqi troops deserted during a crucial battle in Basra. Veterans return from their tours with missing limbs and deep psychological trauma. Pro-war officials frame the conflict as a central front in a longer struggle against an evil ideology, and they warn ominously of the proliferation of terrorist cells that will ensue if the insurgents aren't defeated in Iraq, just as the architects of Vietnam once promised a lethal fall of dominoes throughout Southeast Asia.

Like the war planners themselves, McCain made some assumptions before the invasion that turned out to be seriously flawed. He spoke in favor of the de-Baathification of the Iraqi government and military, a decision now widely considered to have been a disaster, and he predicted that American soldiers would be hailed as conquering heroes in Baghdad. But to his credit, he was also the first of the Iraq hawks to sound the alarm on the flailing occupation, singling out Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld for stinging criticism. After visiting Baghdad and Basra in the summer of 2003, McCain labeled Rumsfeld's military strategy a failure and began a long and lonely crusade for an influx of new troops to secure the capital and outlying areas—the tactic that came to be known as "the surge" when the president finally changed course three and a half years later and ordered another 20,000 troops into the theater.

The surge is unpopular with a lot of military leaders, mainly because of what they call "strategic stretch"—the resulting shortage of troops available to fight unforeseen conflicts in other parts of the globe. (There are now about 160,000 American troops tied down in Iraq, and those troops are already facing both extended tours and shorter intervals in between redeployments.) Some of the Pentagon's top commanders—most recently Richard Cody, the vice chief of staff of the Army, who testified before Congress last month—have voiced concern about the military's overall readiness at a time when the troop level in Afghanistan may soon reach 40,000 and when leading politicians, McCain prominently among them, have vowed to use military action if necessary to stop Iran from obtaining nuclear weaponry. McCain maintains that the military can increase its ranks by offering cash and other incentives to recruits, but it has already significantly lowered its recruiting standards and may not be able to stoop much lower. As Gen. James Jones, the former NATO commander and a close friend of McCain's, told me, "You can buy the numbers of troops, but you may not be able to buy the quality you need."

Even so, McCain insists that the surge and the Pentagon's new counterinsurgency strategy, which centers on a "hearts and minds" approach, can ultimately drive out insurgents and reduce American casualties in Iraq to virtually nothing. "Is it long and hard and tough? Yes," McCain told me. "Has Al Qaeda been beaten? No, but they certainly have been diminished." (To the dismay of many of his critics, McCain often uses "Al Qaeda" as a shorthand for the Iraqi insurgent group that calls itself Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.) "And it's obviously not just Al Qaeda," he went on. "It's Shiite militias. It's former Baathists who are still unhappy. It's corruption within the police that we have to worry about."

"All I can say is, the surge is succeeding," he said. "If someone wants to disagree with that, they're free to, but I have statistics—whether they be instances of violence, whether it be U.S. casualties, whatever it may be—that prove that this new tactic is succeeding. So I'm willing to stick with it."

A lot of McCain's fellow veterans in Washington seem confounded by what they see as his obvious failure to absorb the lessons of Vietnam. Jack Murtha, the Pennsylvania congressman and decorated Vietnam vet who became an early and outspoken critic of the war, told me that watching Iraq unfold convinced him, for the first time, that American troops could never have prevailed in Vietnam, no matter how long they stayed. "These kinds of wars cannot be won militarily," he said flatly. Another Democratic congressman with a Purple Heart, Mike Thompson of California, told me that promises of victory in Iraq sounded painfully familiar. "When I was in Vietnam, the members of Congress knew that we weren't going to be there forever, that we would have to redeploy, and in the time between when they knew that and when we redeployed, a lot of boys were injured and killed," Thompson said. "I think Senator McCain has been an outstanding public servant, but I think he's wrong on this."

In McCain's mind, however, there is a different kind of symmetry linking Vietnam and Iraq. Talking to him about it, you come to understand that he has, indeed, applied lessons from the first war to the second—but they are the lessons that he learned not in combat or in the Hanoi Hilton but in the pages of the books he read at the National War College in the 1970s. To McCain, the first four years of the Iraq war, as prosecuted by the Bush administration, seem strikingly similar to the years in Vietnam before Creighton Abrams arrived on the scene.

"It's a little bit eerily reminiscent, in that search-and-destroy is basically the same tactic that Rumsfeld, Casey, Sanchez, et al. employed," McCain told me, referring to George Casey and Ricardo Sanchez, the two previous generals to command coalition forces in Iraq. "Go out, kill bad people and then go back to base. That's basically what search-and-destroy was. We obviously failed to learn that lesson in history." In McCain's war, then, David Petraeus, the more innovative general who took over in 2007, is now playing the part of Abrams, pursuing a winning strategy that needs only the patience of the American people and their government to ultimately succeed.

"After nearly four years of a failed strategy, the difference in one year is dramatic," McCain says. "If they make that same progress in the next year," he predicts, "I think it's going to be quite impactful on American public opinion, as well as, more importantly, events on the ground."

The lesson McCain drew from Vietnam all those years ago is that you cannot turn your back on a war when at last you figure out how to win it, and he is determined not to let that happen again. Far from having failed to internalize the legacy of Vietnam, as some of his friends in the Senate suspect, he is, if anything, entirely driven by it. "I don't think you can isolate John's views in Iraq from his experience in Vietnam," Gary Hart told me. "Whether he is aware of it or not—and I want to tread carefully here, because I don't like psychologizing people—I don't think he can separate those things in his mind. In a way, John is refighting the Vietnam War."

JOHN MCCAIN HAS NEVER been very good at political artifice. Like every politician I've known, McCain will sometimes surrender to the cheap ploy or prevarication when the moment demands it, but it is often with a smirk or a wince, some hard-to-miss signal that he knows he's up to no good. In the more serious instances when he knows he has put expedience over principle (his reversal on the Bush tax cuts just in time for the campaign season may well turn out to be one of them), he has an almost therapeutic need to acknowledge it later, as he did when he told South Carolinians, weeks after losing the brutal primary there in 2000, that he had been wrong to defend the Confederate flag just to win their votes. And so, whether you agree with him or not, there is a notable honesty to his position on the war in Iraq. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama have spent the primary season competing over who's more eager to ship out of Iraq, but everyone associated with their campaigns knows that withdrawal will not happen quickly or without peril. McCain's pitch, on the other hand, is as straightforward as it is stripped of political charm. We made a mess in Iraq, he says, but it's our mess now, and we have to stay on and fix it.

Ultimately, McCain is relying on the same strategy to achieve success both in Iraq and in the November election. In each endeavor, McCain is staking everything on the notion that the public, having seen the success of a new military strategy, can be convinced that the war is, in fact, winnable and worth the continued sacrifice. Absent that national retrenching, McCain admits that this war, like the one in Vietnam, is probably doomed. Near the end of our conversation in Tampa, I asked him if he would be willing to change course on Iraq if the violence there started to rise again. "Oh, we'd have to," he replied. "It's not so much what McCain would do. American public opinion will not tolerate such a thing."

The problem is that there's actually no evidence to suggest that a reduction in casualties in Iraq will translate into a greater public tolerance for a protracted engagement there. According to Gallup, Americans' confidence that the surge is improving the situation on the ground rose sharply between last summer and this spring; 40 percent of those polled in March said the surge is working, compared with 22 percent last July, while 38 percent said it was making no difference, down from 51 percent last year.

For McCain, that's no small measure of vindication. And yet, during the same period, even as optimism about the new strategy grew, the percentage of Americans who say they want a timetable for gradual withdrawal—those, in other words, who agreed primarily with the two Democratic candidates—remained almost exactly the same, rising to 41 percent from 39 percent. (Another 18 percent have consistently said they want to get out right away.) Nor has the success of the surge in reducing American casualties done a thing to convince the public that the invasion made sense in the first place. According to another Gallup poll released a few weeks ago, 63 percent of Americans now believe it was a mistake to go to war—an all-time high.

It doesn't help that McCain has never put his argument for staying into some larger context that might explain what he really means by "winning" the war in Iraq. If you ask him to define victory, his answer is that Americans soldiers will have stopped dying, and that the Iraqi military and government will be functioning on their own. That would be a great day, no doubt, but surely the overarching purpose of a war can't be to stop more soldiers from dying in it. (On the one notable occasion when McCain tried to put a more hopeful spin on progress in Iraq, during a visit there last spring, the result was an unqualified public-relations debacle: strolling through an outdoor market in Baghdad market wearing a flak jacket and surrounded by what seemed like a regiment of U.S. soldiers, McCain declared that life for Iraqis was at last returning to normal. The next day, by some accounts, 21 Shiite workers at the market were abducted and killed.) McCain's main reason for continuing on in Iraq seems to be that we're already there and must not accept defeat, and that's an argument that probably feels all too familiar to many Americans who lived through a decade of aimless war in Vietnam, to no discernible end.

Undaunted, McCain soldiers on toward November and what could be his final campaign. When he ran in 2000, his philosophy of national greatness—the importance, as he always puts it, of "serving a cause greater than one's self"—found its expression in ideas like national service and campaign reform, proposals that independents and even many liberals could embrace. For a time then, McCain, adrift within his own party, was almost certainly the most popular politician in America. This time, his theme of selflessness is bound up, irrevocably, with Bush's unpopular war. Democrats, alarmed over their own disunity, can hardly wait to start pummeling McCain with Iraq. While I was working on this article, the Center for American Progress, the left's leading policy center in Washington, took the liberty of sending over a 10-page litany of McCain's selected comments on Iraq since 2002, delineated by helpful subheadings like "The War Begins—Rosy Outlook" and "The Critical Time Is Always Right Around the Corner."

McCain shrugs this off and insists that he will never waver from his support of the war, no matter what the personal cost. "As I said a year ago," he told me, "I would rather lose a campaign than a war." If he doesn't make the most persuasive argument of his life, he risks losing both.

20080818-06	21:07	SteveB	To: Keith Olbermann; "John McCain, Grow up!"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Keith:

You were at the height of your powers tonight when you railed for Senator McCain to "Grow up!"

This was the greatest thing I'd seen and heard since you chastised Senator Clinton for sort of calling for, or hoping for, Senator Obama's death!

You are the best! I love it! Please, please keep up the great work! Thank you!

—SteveB

20080819-01 14:41 SteveB 2nd Amendment

Dear Pat & SteveM,

PS—Do you know why the provision about the right to own guns is in the Constitution? Because the founding fathers did not trust the government...they didn't trust any government. Rightfully so, in my humble opinion.

They wanted citizens to have the firepower to overthrow their government when it became too corrupt to serve the people—as it has now largely become.

Unfortunately, they didn't envision Howitzers, fighters, helicopters, bombers, nuclear submarines, or A-bombs, so we citizens don't really have enough firepower any more to accomplish a change of government using our hand guns, rifles, and shotguns, yet this is the reason we were given the right to own them. Maybe with the media as allies...???

But we still have the ballot, my friend. I hope you will use it wisely, because this country that I love and that I want to pass to my children has become unbelievably f*cked-up, and I think it should be all right for someone, anyone, to have the guts to say so, and to want to change things!

20080819-02 16:20 SteveB "Reality Bites Again"

Dear SteveM,

Once again, just like with the energy crisis, etc., etc., the old politics that McCain is so much a part of, has led to nothing but failure and American decline. It is time to make it illegal for politicians like McCain and their campaigns to be bought and sold by the big power brokers. We need to kick-out all the traditional politicians in Washington and gain our freedom and security back! Then and only then will the labels "conservative" and "liberal" be able to recover any meaning.

McCain is part of the problem, not the solution!

The Daily Reckoning PRESENTS: The feeble American response to Russia's assertion of power in the Caucasus of Central Asia was appropriate, since, according to James Howard Kunstler, the United States' claims of influence in that part of the world are laughable. Read on...

"Reality Bites Again" by James Howard Kunstler, Kunstler.com

Aug. 19, 2008,

(<http://www.24hgold.com/english/contributor.aspx?article=1489669978G10020&contributor=James+Howard+Kunstler>)

(The truth about the Georgia-Russia Conflict.)

The U.S. had taken advantage of temporary confusion in Russia, during the ten-year-long post-Soviet collapse interval, and set up a client government in Georgia, complete with military advisors, sales of weapons, and even the promise of club membership in the Western alliance known as NATO. These blandishments were all in the service of the Baku-to-Ceyhan oil pipeline, which was designed specifically to drain the oil region around the Caspian Basin with an outlet on the Mediterranean, avoiding unfriendly nations all along the way.

At the time this gambit was first set up, in the early 1990s, there was some notion (or wish, really) among the so-called western powers that the Caspian would provide an end-run around OPEC and the Arabs, as well as the Persians, and deliver all the oil that the U.S. and Europe would ever need—a foolish wish and a dumb gambit, as things have turned out.

For one thing, the latterly explorations of this very old oil region—first opened to drilling in the 19th century—proved somewhat disappointing. U.S. officials had been touting it as like unto “another Saudi Arabia” but the oil actually produced from the new drilling areas of Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and the other Stans turned out to be preponderantly heavy-and-sour crudes, in smaller quantities than previously dreamed-of, and harder to transport across the extremely challenging terrain to even get to the pipeline head in Baku.

Meanwhile, Russia got its house in order under the non-senile, non-alcoholic Vladimir Putin, and woke up along about 2007 to find itself the leading oil and natural gas producer in the world. Among the various consequences of this was Russia’s reemergence as a new kind of world power—an energy resource power, with the energy destiny of Europe pretty much in its hands. Also, meanwhile, the U.S. had set up other client states in the ring of former Soviet republics along Russia’s southern underbelly, complete with U.S. military bases, while fighting active engagements in Iraq and Afghanistan. Now, if this wasn’t the dumbest, vainest move in modern geopolitical history!

It’s one thing that U.S. foreign policy wonks imagined that Russia would remain in a coma forever, but the idea that we could encircle Russia strategically with defensible bases in landlocked mountainous countries halfway around the world...? You have to ask what were they smoking over at the Pentagon and the CIA and the NSC?

So, this asinine policy has now come to grief. Not only does Russia stand to gain control over the Baku-to-Ceyhan pipeline, but we now have every indication that they will bring the states on its southern flank back into an active sphere of influence, and there is really not a damn thing that the U.S. can pretend to do about it.

We could have spent the past ten years getting our own house in order—waking up to the obsolescence of our suburban life-style, scaling back on the Happy Motoring, reconnecting our cities with world-class passenger rail, creating wealth by producing things of value (instead of resorting to financial racketeering), protecting our borders, and taking the necessary measures to defend and update our own industries. Instead, we pi*sed our time and resources away. Nations do make tragic errors of the collective will. The cluelessness of George Bush is nothing less than a perfect metaphor for the failure of a whole generation. The Boomers will be identified as the generation that wrecked America.

So, as the vacation season winds down, this country greets a new reality. We miscalculated in Western and Central Asia. Russia still “owns” that part of the world. Are we going to extend our current land wars there into the even more distant and landlocked Stan-nations? At some point, as we face financial and military exhaustion, we have to ask ourselves if we can even successfully evacuate our personnel from the far-flung bases in Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan.

This must be an equally sobering moment for Europe, and an additional reason for the recent plunge in the relative value of the Euro, for Europe is now at the mercy of Russia in terms of staying warm in the winter, running their kitchen stoves, and keeping the lights on. Russia also exerts substantial financial leverage over the U.S. in all the dollars and securitized U.S. debt paper it holds. In effect, Russia can shake the U.S. banking system at will now by threatening to dump its dollar holdings. The American banking system may not need a shove from Russia to fall on its face. It’s effectively dead now, just lurching around zombie-like from one loan “window” to the next pretending to “borrow” capital—while handing over shreds of its moldy clothing as “collateral” to the Federal Reserve. The entire U.S., beyond the banks, is becoming a land of the walking dead. Business is dying, homeownership has become a death dance, whole regions are turning into wastelands of “for sale” signs, empty parking lots, vacant buildings, and dashed hopes. And all this beats a path directly to a failure of collective national imagination. We really don’t know what’s going on.

The fantasy that we can sustain our influence nine thousand miles away, when we can’t even get our act together in Ohio is just a dark joke. One might state categorically that it would be a salubrious thing for America to knock off all its vaunted “dreaming” and just wake up.

20080819-03	16:54	SteveM	Re: “Reality Bites Again”
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------

Dear SteveB,

American's Creed is:

"I believe in the United States of America, as a government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign nation of many sovereign states; a perfect union, one and inseparable; established upon those principals of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes. I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies."—William Tyler Page

Stop reading the blame-America-first blogs.

20080819-04	17:05	Dick	Fw: The Bakken Formation; Oil, Energy
-------------	-------	------	---------------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. See Jun 25, 2009 response. —SteveB]

Verify here: <http://www.usgs.gov/newsroom/article.asp?ID=1911>.

don't even have to check with Scopes to see if this is true...Just put in "Bakken Formation" on GOOGLE and stand by for the load of info that will descend on you!...me.

1. Ever heard of the Bakken Formation?

GOOGLE it. It will blow your mind. The U. S. Geological Service issued a report in April ('08) that only scientists and oilmen/women knew was coming, but man was it big. It was a revised report (hadn't been updated since '95) on how much oil was in this area of the western 2/3 of North Dakota; western South Dakota; and extreme eastern Montana ... check THIS out:

The Bakken is the largest domestic oil discovery since Alaska's Prudhoe Bay, and has the potential to eliminate all American dependence on foreign oil. The Energy Information Administration (EIA) estimates it at 503 billion barrels. Even if just 10% of the oil is recoverable... at $107 a barrel, we're looking at a resource base worth more than $5.3 trillion. 'When I first briefed legislators on this, you could practically see their jaws hit the floor. They had no idea.' says Terry Johnson, the Montana Legislature's financial analyst.

'This sizable find is now the highest-producing onshore oil field found in the past 56 years,' reports The Pittsburgh Post Gazette. It's a formation known as the Williston Basin , but is more commonly referred to as the 'Bakken.' And it stretches from Northern Montana, through North Dakota and into Canada . For years, U. S. oil exploration has been considered a dead end. Even the 'Big Oil' companies gave up searching for major oil wells decades ago. However, a recent technological breakthrough has opened up the Bakken's massive reserves... and we now have access of up to 500 billion barrels. And because this is light, sweet oil, those billions of barrels will cost Americans just $16 PER BARREL! That's enough crude to fully fuel the American economy for 41 years straight.

And if THAT didn't throw you on the floor, then this next one should - because it's from TWO YEARS AGO, people!

2. U. S. Oil Discovery- Largest Reserve in the World!

Stansberry Report Online — Apr. 20, 2006: "Hidden 1,000 feet beneath the surface of the Rocky Mountains lies the largest untapped oil reserve in the world is more than 2 TRILLION barrels." On Aug. 8, 2005, President Bush mandated its extraction. They reported this stunning news: We have more oil inside our borders, than all the other proven reserves on earth. Here are the official estimates:

- 8 times as much oil as Saudi Arabia
- 18 times as much oil as Iraq
- 21 times as much oil as Kuwait
- 22 times as much oil as Iran
- 500 times as much oil as Yemen—and it's all right here in the Western United States.

HOW can this BE!? HOW can we NOT BE extracting this!? Because the democrats and leftwing republicans have blocked all efforts to help America become independent of foreign oil.

James Bartis, lead researcher with the study says we've got more oil in this very compact area than the entire Middle East -more than 2 TRILLION barrels. Untapped. That's more than all the proven oil reserves of crude oil in the world today, reports The Denver Post. Think 'OPEC' will drop its price - even with this find? Think again! It's all about the competitive marketplace, - it has to.

Got your attention/ire up yet? Hope so! Now, while you're thinking about it ... and hopefully P.O'd, do this:

3. Act!

Take 10 minutes and compose an e-mail; fax or good old-fashioned letter to all your friends and associates. Alert them to the fact that democrats and 'liberal' republicans have been and will continue to obstruct all plans to make America independent of foreign oil. The only solution is to vote all democrats and Marxist oriented republicans out of office. If you don't take a little time to do this, then you should stifle yourself the next time you want to complain about gas prices .. because by doing NOTHING, you've forfeited your right to complain.

20080819-05 17:17 Pat Re: 2nd Amendment

Dear SteveB,

I don't think the founding fathers meant to support armed insurrection. I think they put their faith in a revolution every 4 years called an "election". I think they would be appalled at what capitalism and it resultant corporation have done to the process. I personally don't think that democracy can properly exist in our form of capitalism. [I'm afraid you may be right about this last point, Pat. —SteveB]

20080819-06 17:27 SteveB Re: "Reality Bites Again"

Dear SteveM,

This is a bunch of cr*p and you know it. It is because I love my country that I want it to be better, as good as it used to be. The American people have so obviously been sold down the river by its politicians that things need to change. Wanting this change (or not wanting it, in your case) is no reflection whatsoever upon one's patriotism or love of America. That is the truth, my friend!

20080819-07 19:37 SteveM 1999 Arizona Republic Articles on John McCain (Chapts. 1-7), incl. The Keating Five

I remember the Keating Five. Do you remember the other four and their political affiliations? Yes, they are Democrats all!

In the end, McCain received only a mild rebuke from the Ethics Committee for exercising "poor judgment" for intervening with the federal regulators on behalf of Keating. Still, he felt tarred by the affair.

"The appearance of it was wrong," McCain said recently. "It's a wrong appearance when a group of senators appear in a meeting with a group of regulators, because it conveys the impression of undue and improper influence. And it was the wrong thing to do."

McCain noted that Bennett, the independent counsel, recommended that McCain and Glenn be dropped from the investigation.

"For the first time in history, the Ethics Committee overruled the recommendation of the independent counsel," McCain said. "I'm sure it had nothing to do with the fact that I was the only Republican of the five and the Democrats were in the majority (in the Senate)."

But McCain owns up to his mistake:

"I was judged eventually, after three years, of using, quote, poor judgment, and I agree with that assessment."

He was accused of improperly aiding Charles H. Keating, Jr., chairman of the failed Lincoln Savings and Loan Association, which was the target of an investigation by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB).

After a lengthy investigation, the Senate Ethics Committee determined in 1991 that Alan Cranston, Dennis DeConcini, and Donald Riegle had substantially and improperly interfered with the FHLBB in its investigation of Lincoln Savings. Senators John Glenn and John McCain were cleared of having acted improperly.

All five of the senators involved served out their terms. Only Glenn and McCain ran for re-election, and they were both re-elected.

Care to try again?

"Chapter I: What Is Honor?" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic

Oct. 3, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_I_1999.htm)

There is a grim determination to Sen. John McCain as he rises to address the Republican faithful. He moves stiffly through the heavy air of the gymnasium, his war injuries still evident.

There is his sore right knee, broken years ago when he ejected from a bomber over North Vietnam. There is his aching right shoulder, shattered by his captors. There is his hair, turned prematurely white by mistreatment and malnutrition.

Then there are his political wounds.

There is the edge McCain carries that led to angry outbursts with reporters during the Keating Five scandal. The defiant tone in his attacks on pork-barrel spending and calls for campaign-finance reform.

But for McCain, it's not about falling down. It's about getting up again.

Moments before he rose to speak, the lights had dimmed, and patriotic images had flashed on a screen: an American flag, a pilot in a flight suit, a senator shaking hands with President Reagan.

"At a time when America is searching for heroes to lead us," a narrator intoned, "it has the genuine article in John McCain."

Those are the scripted themes of McCain, 63, as he sets out on his carefully calculated campaign for the GOP nomination for president - genuine hero, proven leader, man of integrity in a wayward time.

But McCain is no comic-book hero, drawn in two dimensions.

He's sometimes driven by courage and duty, sometimes by anger and pride.

"I think life is a series of contradictions," said Jay Smith, who worked on McCain's first four campaigns. "Life is complex. Who among us is so simplistic that you can just pigeonhole?"

Certainly not McCain.

In recent years, he's become a champion of campaign-finance reform. More than a decade ago, he took free trips to the Bahamas with savings and loan tycoon Charles Keating. He continues to take big money from interests before his committees.

He's amassed a rogues' gallery of troublemaking former pals - Keating, Gary Hart, John Tower, Fife Symington, Duke Tully - who hardly square with his ambitions as a reformer.

As a senator, he's pilloried tobacco companies, though his wife owes her personal millions to beer sales.

He has romanced the national press while warring with Arizona reporters.

He prides himself on his personal integrity yet admits he wasn't faithful to his first wife, Carol, who was injured in a horrific car accident while McCain was in Vietnam.

He courts the veteran vote yet is despised among veterans who believe there are still POWs alive in southeast Asia.

He was hawkish on Kosovo, yet as a freshman congressman, he opposed Reagan's sending of Marines to Lebanon.

Some say McCain's seemingly principled positions - as on tobacco and campaign-finance reform - are all for show, helping him build his maverick image with a windmill tilt or two.

"In both instances (tobacco and campaign-finance reform), he took positions that were doomed to failure and stuck to them," said Grant Woods, former Arizona attorney general and an early McCain protégé.

"In terms of federal legislation, we're in the same position today that we were in five years ago. I wonder what the point of that is. If you truly want to accomplish something on the issue, you've got several ways to go, and this one has produced nothing - and by nothing, I mean nothing."

INTENSE, LIKABLE

Spend any time around McCain and you quickly find that he is well-read, intense, likable. He can talk Robinson Crusoe or Saturday Night Live. He can lead the bull session or just listen. One minute he is chatting about a Sports Illustrated story he read about Bobby Allison ("One of the greatest NASCAR drivers ever, and he's living on the charity of others") and the next he is shaking his head over World War I and the Battle of the Somme ("That's the argument for media coverage. They never would have put up with it").

While at the Naval Academy, McCain let some subjects slide, spending his time reading history and literature and, of course, howling at the moon. He graduated fifth from the bottom of his class.

McCain's sense of humor, sometimes indelicate, gets him in trouble. Back when he entered politics, he once referred to the Arizona retirement community of Leisure World as "Seizure World." More recently, it was a crude joke about Chelsea Clinton that raised eyebrows.

Still, McCain can be funny.

On a recent trip to South Carolina, state director Trey Walker was stumbling his way along the aisle of the moving campaign bus.

"Trey," McCain said, "is on a work-release program."

During an appearance at a Gridiron Club dinner in Washington, McCain appeared at the podium, wearing a jacket ridiculously covered with fake ribbons and medals, and cracked:

"The question I ask myself every morning while shaving in front of the mirror is: OK, John, you're an incredible war hero, an inspiration to all Americans. But what qualifies you to be president of the United States?"

From staffers, McCain inspires a loyalty not often found in Washington. He treats them like extended family, always remembering a child's name or a sick relative. Some have been with McCain for more than a decade.

"It's fun to be around him," longtime aide Deb Gullett says. "He cuts up all the time. If you screw up, you feel worse about it than he does."

Some have snickered about aides combing McCain's hair and dusting off his suit jacket before television appearances. What they do not realize is that McCain cannot do it himself - his shoulders are too damaged.

For exercise, McCain walks. He's hiked nearly every trail in Arizona, from the well-known to the obscure. He often drags along his family and staff.

As with everything else, McCain is a relentless hiker. On a recent trip to Lake Powell, he led his party through a slot canyon where the water was almost over their heads.

Gullett jokingly dubbed it "The McCain Death March" and vowed not to return.

In all this hubbub, McCain's family, including wife Cindy, stays in the background. Cindy has no interest in politics. She has agreed to travel with McCain once or twice a month, but she'd clearly rather be at home raising her four children, ages 14, 13, 11 and 8.

"My job is at home," she says simply.

After a well-publicized bout with an addiction to painkillers in the early 1990s, Cindy no longer reads the newspaper. She keeps up with news by listening to the radio.

These days, Cindy and John go weeks without seeing each other. It's a sacrifice they've made to raise their children in Phoenix.

"There are times I wish he were there on that particular evening," Cindy said. "But I wouldn't change our life in any way."

A LITTLE FREELANCING

On the campaign trail, McCain frustrates his handlers. He doesn't repeat the message often enough, frequently choosing to freelance. And if McCain wants to stand and answer questions, to hell with the carefully prepared schedule.

"We used to try," said John Weaver, McCain's national political director. "We'd say, 'Senator, we have to go,' and he would just look at us."

The man who earned the nickname "White Tornado" in Congress belies his years by working a schedule that would bury men half his age. While campaigning, his days often last from 6 a.m. to 11 p.m.

"I think I can outwork any other candidate," McCain says.

And there is much work to do, he says.

The presidency is broken, and the White House is stained by the Clinton-Lewinsky scandal. McCain plans to fix it.

"I'm not running for president to be someone," McCain said recently. "I'm running to do something. This is your country, my friends. And I'm running for president to give it back to you."

McCain says his background makes him qualified to be president. He is the son and grandson of admirals. He flew Navy attack bombers in Vietnam. He spent close to six years in a North Vietnamese prison camp. He served two terms in the House of Representatives and was elected to his third Senate term last year.

He's not in awe of the top job.

"I'm obviously aware of the enormous responsibilities," he said. "But I don't find it intimidating."

Most Americans have yet to meet John McCain. With Texas Gov. George W. Bush leading the polls, the national press has been content to sketch McCain as a caricature:

Former prisoner of war. Crusader for reform and breath of fresh air in Washington. One of the Keating Five, but the media tone on that seems to be, who cares, really?

"Since McCain is not yet a threat, nobody is talking much about his negatives," Woods said. "Because of the Bush phenomenon, (McCain's) avoided scrutiny. He'll stay under the radar just because we really don't have a race."

THE POW FACTOR

Tilton, N.H. - At Oliver's Diner, a woman shyly walks up to McCain, her eyes moist.

"I've been waiting 30 years to meet you," she says, and thrusts out her hand.

McCain looks down. The woman is holding a stainless steel POW bracelet, embossed with the lettering LCDR JOHN MCCAIN III 10-26-67.

"I'm very touched," McCain says. "Very touched."

Judy Tilton says she started wearing McCain's bracelet when she was 7 years old. It was given to her by her father, a retired lieutenant colonel in the National Guard.

Tilton said she first noticed McCain when he was elected to the Senate.

"I thought, 'Wait a minute, I know him,' " she said. "Every time he came to New Hampshire, I thought, 'Maybe I'll meet him.' "

When she saw a notice for the breakfast, Tilton decided it was time.

"It was terrific," she said. "I've been waiting a long time."

McCain knows that being a war hero is not enough to be elected president. But it doesn't hurt.

His military experience gives him a trump card over a generation of draft dodgers and National Guardsmen, those who avoided the war that stole much of McCain's youth.

After all, it was McCain who turned down an early release offered because his father was an admiral. McCain knew it was a propaganda ploy.

It was McCain who rotted in prison and was beaten to a pulp while Bill Clinton studied at Oxford and George W. Bush flew National Guard jets in Texas.

This gives McCain instant credibility on two key campaign issues, foreign policy and national defense, that make Bush and other non-combatant candidates a little queasy.

To tell his story, McCain doesn't need to drag out his medals, which include the Silver Star, Bronze Star, Legion of Merit, Distinguished Flying Cross and a fistful of others. His experiences were chronicled in a book, The Nightingale's Song, by Robert Timberg, as well as an A&E special that might have been titled John McCain: Hero or God? McCain just released his own book about his family and his Vietnam experience, Faith of My Fathers.

That book conveniently ends with his release from North Vietnam, skipping the less ennobling things that happened later.

His war story, and the bluntness of his personality that goes along with it, appeal to people.

Among them is his New Hampshire driver, Frank Cartier, a 28-year-old Manchester firefighter and Gulf War veteran whose unit led the 1st Marines into Kuwait City.

Cartier had always admired McCain and became his first volunteer in New Hampshire when he saw a blurb in the local paper. Cartier said McCain impressed him right off the bat.

Cartier said most candidates would just shake your hand and look to the next person. Not McCain.

"I was wearing my Marine tie clip," Cartier recalled. "And he looked me right in the eye and said, 'Thank you for serving.'

"As a Marine, you get a sense of who you would want to lead you into battle. I would gladly take the hill for John McCain."

This is the kind of impact McCain hopes to have, to bring younger voters back into the fold. As he campaigns, McCain often notes that the last election had the lowest voter turnout among 18- to 26-year-olds of any election in history.

"It is a shameful thing, my friends," McCain said, "when young people say we are corrupt. But to a certain extent, they are correct."

McCain also is attracting others into the fray, people who have never participated before. One is Rick Kamp, a 50-year-old marketing executive who hosted a meet-and-greet for McCain at his home in Concord, N.H.

Kamp rented a tent for the back yard and brought in a bartender and mountains of sandwiches for the guests, who would be tapped for donations before the end of the evening.

By the time things got started, it was raining in Concord. The crowd squeezed into Kamp's living room. As McCain spoke with a C-Span camera crew looking on, Kamp and his wife beamed.

"This is my maiden voyage in political activism," Kamp said.

Kamp, who sought out the McCain campaign on his own, said he wanted to support a candidate who is willing to take tough stands and fight for what he believes in.

"He's not the type who needs an overnight poll to tell him what to think or what to say on any given day," Kamp said. "I like that."

Despite the adulation, McCain says there is one thing he might change about his public persona: He doesn't want to be the "POW Candidate."

That may be strategy disguised as humility.

"I'm sure he doesn't want to be the POW candidate, but it's an integral part of his resume," said Jay Smith, who runs a public relations firm in Washington. "It's something people respond to for positive reasons.

"You use what you can use."

At every McCain rally, there are large posters of McCain as a young pilot, standing next to his bomber. In South Carolina, when McCain was introduced in stifling meeting halls, the speaker would note that "John McCain spent five and a half years in a place much smaller and hotter than this."

In his speeches, McCain spins stories about being a POW, though usually about other brave prisoners. He often notes that he was not a hero but served in the company of heroes.

"It doesn't take a lot of talent to get shot down," McCain is fond of saying. "I was able to intercept a surface-to-air missile with my own airplane."

When he talks of the war, or about another soldier's courage, it reminds people he is no phony.

In a speech before the state Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in New Hampshire, McCain recalled the tale of Mike Christian, a fellow POW who used red and white cloth to sew an American flag inside his prison uniform. Every night, the POWs hung up Christian's shirt and recited the Pledge of Allegiance.

One day, the North Vietnamese guards found the flag. They took Christian from the cell and beat him severely. When he was returned, his ribs were broken and his face badly bruised. The other POWs cleaned up Christian the best they could.

Later that night, as McCain struggled to sleep on the concrete slab that was his bed, he looked over into the corner of the room.

"There, beneath that dim light bulb, with a piece of white cloth and a piece of red cloth and his bamboo needle, his eyes almost shut from the beating that he had received, was my dear friend Mike Christian, making another American flag."

"Chapter II: John Wayne McCain" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic

Oct. 3, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_II_1999.htm)

Annapolis, Md., 1955 - Midshipman John McCain and his roommate, Frank Gamboa, are eating lunch at the mess hall at the U.S. Naval Academy when a first classman, a "firstie" in Naval parlance, begins dressing down a Filipino steward.

"He was just being nasty to him," Gamboa recalls. "(The firstie) was obviously not in a happy mood."

Gamboa hardly notices this exchange, but young John McCain is paying close attention. Since the steward is an enlisted man, he cannot fight back. The firstie is being a bully, a no-no at the Naval Academy.

The man outranks everyone at the table. McCain and Gamboa are barely past being plebes, the school's lowest rank. Fearing trouble, other underclassmen eat quickly and leave. The browbeating continues.

Finally, McCain can take no more.

"Hey, why don't you pick on someone your own size?" McCain blurts out.

There is a moment of silent shock at the table.

"What did you say?" replies the firstie.

"Why don't you stop picking on him?" McCain says. "He's doing the best he can."

"What is your name, mister?" snaps the firstie, an open threat to put McCain on report.

"Midshipman John McCain the Third," McCain says, looking straight at the upperclassman. "What's yours?"

The firstie saw the look in McCain's eyes. And fled.

"The guy got so flustered he just got up and left the table," Gamboa recalls.

A FAMILY IN SERVICE

John McCain had plenty to live up to at the Naval Academy.

There was his grandfather, Admiral John "Slew" McCain, Class of 1906, a grizzled old sea dog who commanded aircraft carriers in the Pacific during World War II.

Slew McCain's peers at the Naval Academy were Chester Nimitz and William "Bull" Halsey, who would become major commanders during World War II. One of Slew McCain's first assignments was as executive officer on a gunboat in the Philippines commanded by Nimitz.

"They would hunt and fish, and every now and then they would stop in for their mail," the younger McCain said recently in a TV interview. "Can you imagine?"

In the 1930s, the military passed a regulation that aircraft carriers could be commanded only by aviators. Already in his 50s, McCain's grandfather went to flight school.

He crashed five airplanes but got his wings and went on to command a carrier. He eventually would rise to command all U.S. carriers in the Pacific, under Halsey. Planes under Slew McCain's command participated in a number of battles, including Leyte Gulf, and once sank 49 Japanese ships in a day.

According to his grandson, McCain was the quintessential combat officer - a throwback, a gregarious, beloved commander who didn't worry whether his uniform was pressed. But the war, and his lifestyle, taxed his health.

"He had a very hard life to start with," the younger McCain recalled recently. "He smoked and he drank and he didn't take care of himself. Also, the strain of operations in World War II was immense."

When the Japanese surrendered aboard the USS Missouri on Sept. 2, 1945, Slew McCain was there. He can be seen in the famous picture, standing in the front row of U.S. officers. He was 61 years old, but he looked 80.

In fact, he had been sick for two weeks, at least since a cease-fire was called on Aug. 15, 1945. Around that time, the elder McCain talked with John Thach, who recalled the conversation in the book Carrier Warfare in the Pacific.

McCain had been staying in his sea cabin, popping his head out only occasionally.

"Admiral, you don't feel very well, do you?" Thach asked.

"Well," McCain responded, "this surrender has come as kind of a shock to all of us. I feel lost. I don't know what to do. I know how to fight, but now I don't know whether I know how to relax or not. I am in an awful letdown. I do feel bad."

On the day of the surrender, the old man would see his son, John S. McCain Jr., a submarine commander. The younger McCain had been given the job of escorting Japanese submarines into Tokyo Bay. Father and son posed for a picture aboard the Proteus, a submarine tender.

It was the last time John McCain Jr. would see his father alive.

Four days after the surrender aboard the Missouri, the elder McCain flew back to Coronado, Calif. Thach went to visit him and noted that he looked even worse. A few minutes into the visit, McCain said he wanted to lie down.

Thach went to San Diego to visit his father-in-law. A short time later, he got a phone call.

John "Slew" McCain had died of a heart attack.

He is buried in Arlington National Cemetery, next to his brother, William Alexander McCain, a cavalry officer known as "Wild Bill."

Bill McCain, who graduated from West Point, chased Pancho Villa with Gen. Blackjack Pershing, served as an artillery officer during World War I and attained the rank of brigadier general.

In his new book, Faith of My Fathers, McCain details his Scotch-Irish roots, noting that his great-aunt was a descendant of Robert the Bruce, an early Scottish king.

On this continent, McCain's roots date to the American Revolution. An early ancestor, John Young, served on Gen. George Washington's staff. After the family moved to Mississippi, a number of McCain's ancestors fought in the Civil War on the side of the Confederacy.

McCain's grandfather grew up on the family plantation in Carroll County, Miss. He attended the University of Mississippi, then entered the Naval Academy.

'HE WAS A TOUGH GUY'

Like his grandfather, John McCain was no scrubbed angel when he reached the Naval Academy in 1954. At Episcopal High, a private boarding school in Alexandria, Va., McCain was a rebel, earning the nickname "McNasty" from classmates who didn't dare cross him.

At 5-9, McCain was an excellent lightweight wrestler in high school. One of McCain's school friends, Malcolm Matheson, said McCain was no bully but took no guff.

"I always got along with him, but he was a tough guy," Matheson said. "He was small but feisty. He's always been that way.... If you messed with him, you probably would end up on the wrong side of it."

Despite his rebellious nature, McCain was destined to attend the Naval Academy, like his grandfather and his father (Class of '31) before him.

Ron Thunman, who commanded McCain's plebe, or first-year, class, said he had no idea that McCain came from an old Navy family but said the young man immediately impressed him. The plebe battalions competed in sports, McCain as a boxer.

What he lacked in skill, he made up for in ferocity, Thunman said.

"I got a real kick out of him," Thunman said. "It was clear that nobody was going to take him down without a hell of an effort."

Thunman said he noticed McCain had a quick mind and a good sense of humor. He quickly emerged as a leader in his group.

"He stood out because he was just one of those people that you liked and you got a chuckle out of," Thunman said. "He was somebody who was always moving at top speed in one direction or another. He was never one to hang back."

A free spirit, McCain chafed under the strict rules of the academy. Each year, he was always in the "Century Club," students with more than 100 demerits.

It was mostly small stuff - messy quarters, unshined shoes, reporting late to formation, things like that, recalls Gamboa, who roomed with McCain for three years.

"He and I, we got a lot of demerits," Gamboa said. "It was almost impossible not to."

McCain's grades were good in the subjects he enjoyed, such as literature and history. Gamboa said McCain would rather read a history book than do his math homework. He did just enough to pass the classes he didn't find stimulating.

"He stood low in his class," Gamboa said. "But that was by choice, not design."

On weekends, everyone wanted to hang out with McCain, who grew up around Washington and knew all the best parties. And with his good looks, McCain attracted plenty of women.

"We used to call him John Wayne McCain," Gamboa said. "He was graying at the temples, and it made him more dashing.... It was a real adventure living with John."

McCain's bio in the academy yearbook said it all:

"Sturdy conversationalist and party man. John's quick wit and clever sarcasm made him a welcome man at any gathering. His bouts with the academic and executive departments contributed much to the stockpiles of legends within the hall."

One such bout almost ended in disaster.

The further cadets rose in the academy, the fewer demerits they were allowed. Naturally, McCain was pushing the limit as his senior year neared an end.

McCain already had been skirting the rules. He and some friends had bought a television, which was prohibited. They would gather in their rooms on weekends, watching boxing on Friday nights and a Western, Maverick, on Sundays. The men kept the TV hidden in a "pipe locker," a space between the dormitory rooms that housed plumbing, heating and ventilation.

"One day, the company officer got to crawling around in there, and he found the TV," Gamboa said.

Normally, all the men involved would play a game similar to "paper, rock, scissors" to determine who would get the demerits. But Gamboa and the others wouldn't let McCain take the chance - the 30 demerits from the TV would get him kicked out.

"He wanted to, but we just insisted," Gamboa said. "The guy who took the demerits (a model midshipman named Henry Vargo) had none."

McCain also offered advice to the lovelorn. More than one midshipman made his way to McCain's room to ask for advice on a romantic relationship.

One evening, Gamboa was writing a thank-you letter to a date (a custom in those days), when McCain came up and snatched the letter away.

"This is a terrible letter," McCain said. "Did you have fun with her? Do you want to see her again? Here, I'll tell you what to say."

Gamboa and McCain remain close to this day. The friendship says something about McCain, notes Gamboa, a first-generation Mexican-American.

When the two met at the Naval Academy, they had nothing in common. Gamboa was the son of immigrant parents from a little town in the foothills of the Sierra Nevadas. McCain was the son and grandson of naval officers and attended private schools in Virginia.

But to McCain, race and status meant nothing, Gamboa said.

"I don't think John McCain had even been associated with Hispanics or any minorities, given where he lived and the school he went to, but yet he picked me, a Mexican-American, to be his roommate," Gamboa said.

"I've heard the comment that he has always done well with minorities. He's the most colorblind person I've ever met in my life.

"He treats me like a brother."

CHOOSING A CAREER

As the men graduated from the Naval Academy, they had to make a choice as to what branch of service they would enter, the Navy or the Marines.

Gamboa said he always knew what McCain would pick.

"There was never any question in our minds that he was going to be a flier," Gamboa said. "He was an adventurous spirit, and that's what he would do."

For McCain's roommates - Gamboa, Keith Bunting and Jack Dittrick - it was still an open question. Until they met Jack McCain, John's father.

During World War II, the elder McCain won the Silver Star while commanding two submarines: the USS Gunnel, which sunk freighters and battled Japanese destroyers in the Pacific; and the USS Dentuda, which was on hand at the Japanese surrender in Tokyo Bay.

While his son attended the Naval Academy, Jack McCain was living in nearby Washington, working as the Navy's senior liaison officer to Congress.

On weekends, John McCain and his roommates would go to his father's house, where the elder McCain would chomp cigars and tell them about the Navy.

"Every time we went to John's house, we would get a blue and gold pep talk from Jack McCain," Gamboa said.

Jack McCain was not subtle. To his friends, he was known as "Good Goddamn McCain."

Speaking to the Annapolis Class of 1970, Jack McCain made light of the antiwar slogan "make love, not war," by noting that naval officers "were men enough to do both," according to Faith of My Fathers.

"He was the best naval officer I ever met in my life," Gamboa said. "I think that's where John got his love of history, from his father. His father's den was filled ceiling to floor with books, and the majority were on history."

Jack McCain made a big impression on the midshipmen. McCain and his roommates joined the Navy, and all reached the rank of captain - Bunting as a submariner, Dittrick as an aviator and Gamboa on surface ships. John McCain went to flight school.

During training, McCain had several close calls, including a crash in Corpus Christi Bay and a collision with power lines in Spain. In both cases, he emerged virtually unscathed.

In 1964, while stationed in Pensacola, Fla., McCain started a relationship with Carol Shepp, a tall Philadelphia model he met while at Annapolis.

The next year, the two were married in Philadelphia. John soon adopted Carol's two sons from a previous marriage. In 1966, they had a daughter, Sydney.

A year later, McCain was sent to Vietnam as a bomber pilot on an aircraft carrier. Carol would not see her husband again for almost six years.

"Chapter III: The Crown Prince" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic

Oct. 3, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_III_1999.htm)

"THE PLANTATION," HANOI, AUGUST 1968 - John McCain sat on a stool, his teeth broken, his body battered from a savage beating, his arms tied behind him in torture ropes.

A guard entered the room.

"Are you ready to confess your crimes?" he asked.

"No," McCain replied.

Every two hours, one guard would hold McCain while two others beat him. They kept it up for four days.

Finally, McCain lay on the floor, a bloody mess, unable to move. His right leg, injured when he was shot down, was horribly swollen. A guard yanked him to his feet and threw him down. His left arm smashed against a bucket and broke again.

"I reached the lowest point of my 5 1/2 years in North Vietnam," McCain would write later. "I was at the point of suicide."

What happened next is chronicled in The Nightingale's Song, by Robert Timberg:

(McCain) looked at the louvered cell window high above his head, then at the small stool in the room. He took off his dark blue prison shirt, rolled it like a rope, draped one end over his shoulder near his neck, began feeding the other end through the louvers.

A guard burst into the cell and pulled McCain away from the window. For the next few days, he was on suicide watch.

McCain's will had finally wilted under the beatings. Unable to endure any more, he agreed to sign a confession.

McCain slowly wrote, "I am a black criminal and I have performed the deeds of an air pirate. I almost died and the Vietnamese people saved my life, thanks to the doctors."

He would never forgive himself.

"I had learned what we all learned over there," he would write later. "Every man has a breaking point. I had reached mine."

BRUSH WITH DEATH

Lt. Cmdr. John McCain was not thinking about a cell in the Hanoi Hilton when he took off in his A-4E Skyhawk from the USS Oriskany on the morning of Oct. 26, 1967.

As a pilot, McCain had led a charmed life, surviving a bad accident on the USS Forrestal about two months before.

The Forrester was stationed in the Tonkin Gulf, preparing for a mission. McCain was strapped into his jet, warming up the engine. Suddenly, a missile on another plane misfired, shooting across the deck and slamming into McCain's fuel tank. The missile didn't detonate, but the impact spilled hundreds of gallons of highly flammable aviation fuel on the deck. McCain's plane was engulfed in smoke.

As a fire blazed beneath him, McCain scrambled out of the cockpit, then dropped and rolled through the burning aviation fuel. Slapping out the fire on his flight suit, McCain started back to assist another pilot.

Then the first bomb exploded.

Flaming shrapnel whizzed across the flight deck. One man was decapitated; others were burned beyond recognition. McCain was knocked backward, and small pieces of metal peppered his chest. As the crew frantically fought the fire, more bombs and planes exploded.

In the end, 134 men lost their lives, and the Forrester was almost abandoned. McCain's injuries were minor.

After the accident, McCain transferred from the Forrester to the Oriskany, another aircraft carrier.

On Oct. 26, McCain would fly his 23rd sortie over Vietnam, joining a 20-plane mission to bomb a power plant in Hanoi, the North Vietnamese capital, which had been off-limits to U.S. attacks.

An officer warned McCain to be careful, that some of the pilots might not return.

"Don't worry about me," McCain said.

Hanoi was well-defended against air attack. As McCain approached his target, surface-to-air missiles the size of telephone poles filled the sky. Suddenly, his instrument panel lit up. A missile had locked on to his plane.

McCain dropped his bombs and began to pull up. Suddenly, a missile sheared off his right wing, sending his plane spinning toward earth, out of control. McCain ejected, breaking his right leg and both arms. He regained consciousness as he settled into a small lake in the center of Hanoi.

McCain's battered body sank 15 feet to the bottom of the muddy lake. He managed to kick his way to the surface with his one good leg, but his equipment dragged him back down. Finally, as he went down for a third time, McCain used his teeth to inflate his life preserver and bobbed to the surface.

North Vietnamese pulled McCain from the lake, stripping off his clothes. McCain felt a twinge in his right knee and was horrified to see his leg bent at a 90-degree angle.

"My God, my leg," McCain said.

A man slammed a rifle butt down on McCain's right shoulder, shattering it. Others bayoneted him in the foot and groin.

Eventually, he was thrown onto a truck and taken to Hanoi's main prison. He was placed in a cell and told he would not receive any medical treatment until he gave military information. McCain refused and was beaten unconscious.

On the fourth day, two guards entered McCain's cell. One pulled back the blanket to reveal McCain's injured knee.

"It was about the size, shape and color of a football," McCain recalled.

Fearful of blood poisoning that would lead to death, McCain told his captors he would talk if they took him to a hospital.

"They brought in this doctor we called Zorba, and he examined me, took my pulse and turned to this other guy we called The Bug and said something in Vietnamese, and The Bug said, 'It's too late, it's too late,' " McCain said.

"I said, 'If you take me to the hospital, I'll get well.' Zorba took my pulse again and shook his head, and The Bug said, 'It's too late.' And they took me back to my cell."

About two hours later, McCain's cell door burst open, and The Bug rushed in, saying, "Your father is a big admiral. Now we take you to the hospital."

It had taken some time, but the North Vietnamese figured out that McCain's father, Jack, was a major Naval commander for the United States. They started calling McCain "The Crown Prince."

MAINTAINING SILENCE

McCain was moved to a filthy hospital, where blood and plasma were administered. He recovered a little but was still in sorry shape.

Soon, McCain was told that a Frenchman wanted to talk to him and would take a message back to McCain's family.

Before the meeting, the North Vietnamese tried to set McCain's shattered right arm, which was broken in three places. Without anesthetic, a doctor using a fluoroscope worked on the arm for 90 minutes, with McCain screaming in pain. The arm had two floating bones, and the doctor could not set it properly.

Finally, the doctor gave up and wrapped a cast around McCain from his neck to his waist and down his right arm to his wrist.

They moved McCain to a new room with clean white sheets. Soon afterward, a North Vietnamese known as The Cat arrived. He was the commander of all prison camps in Hanoi.

Through an interpreter, The Cat told McCain that "the French television man is coming."

It was at that point that McCain realized his visitor was a journalist.

"I don't think I want to be filmed," McCain said.

The Cat wouldn't be dissuaded. He told McCain that he needed two operations and that he would not get them if he didn't say he was grateful to the Vietnamese people and sorry for his crimes.

The French TV crew arrived, led by a reporter named Francois Chalais. On the film, which was shown later on CBS television, McCain looks drugged. He wasn't. He was in agony from the abortive attempt to set the bones in his right arm.

McCain told Chalais that his treatment was satisfactory. This upset The Cat, who stood behind McCain and told him to say he was grateful for humane and lenient treatment. McCain refused. When The Cat pressed it, Chalais broke in.

"I think what he told me is sufficient," he said.

On the film, McCain told his wife, Carol, and his children that he was getting well and that he loved them. When the North Vietnamese insisted that McCain call for a quick end to the war, Chalais waved them off.

"How is the food?" Chalais asked.

"Well, it's not Paris, but I eat it," McCain replied.

The interview ended, and McCain was taken to his dirty room. The North Vietnamese operated on his knee, accidentally cutting the ligaments on one side. Throughout his stay as a POW, McCain could never walk right. Among his fellow POWs, he earned the nickname "Crip."

BLAME THE AMERICANS

After six weeks in the hospital, McCain was taken to a prison camp known as The Plantation and placed in a cell with George "Bud" Day and Norris Overly, both Air Force majors.

Taking one look at McCain, Day was convinced that the North Vietnamese had brought McCain to their cell to die and planned on blaming the Americans.

"He was extremely skinny, and he was just about filthy," said Day, a lawyer in Fort Walton Beach, Fla. "He had food and drink and liquids run all over his face. He had a pretty good beard . . . he probably weighed less than 100 pounds.

"He was in this great big white cast, and his hair was snow white. He just looked like he was absolutely on the verge of death."

Day said McCain's injured right arm jutted from his body cast like a stick "sticking out of a snowman."

But more than anything else, Day remembers McCain's eyes.

"His eyes were extremely bright, they had that real fever luster," Day said. "I just took one look at him and had no qualms that he was going to die, and soon."

Despite his poor condition, McCain still was happy to see fellow Americans. The men spent the night whispering among themselves.

By 6 a.m., Day was convinced that McCain had a decent chance to live, providing the fever did not get him. Slowly, McCain began to recover.

"He was just a very determined guy with a lot of spirit," Day said. "It's kind of like when you see a horse, a young colt, and you just know this is a strong-spirited animal. You could see all that in him."

McCain, it seemed, was too tough to die.

"John was not going to help the Lord take him out," Day said. "If the Lord was involved in taking him out, John was resisting all the way. If the Lord was helping him, John was giving Him 100 percent of his effort."

In the first days, McCain could not wash or feed himself without help. The task of nursing McCain fell to Overly, since Day had been tortured in ropes and had little use of his hands.

"I've got to give Norris a lot of credit," Day said. "Norris took care of John like a baby, like it was his own child. There was no question that he loved John. He did things for John that only a parent would do for their children."

Occasionally, North Vietnamese dignitaries would stroll by to gawk at the prize prisoner. Since McCain's father was an admiral, the North Vietnamese thought McCain's family was very wealthy. They would ask how many corporations his father owned. McCain just laughed.

Slowly, he was nursed back to health. McCain's infections were healing, now that he could wash regularly. Soon, he could hobble around in his cell for a few minutes at a time.

After a time, Overly was removed from the cell and placed with two other prisoners who were going to be released early.

Early release was forbidden by the military's Code of Conduct. To prevent the enemy from subverting prisoners or using them as propaganda tools, officers were to accept release in the order they were captured. That meant that the first man to be released should have been Navy Lt. Everett Alvarez, who had been shot down on Aug. 5, 1964.

Nevertheless, Overly and two others accepted early release. The other POWs soon dubbed the practice the "Fink Release Program."

McCain has spoken with Overly only once since the war, during a short phone conversation after McCain was released in 1973. But Day, who won the Medal of Honor for his service in Vietnam, has made his peace with Overly.

"If I had been in (Overly's) shoes, maybe I would have done things differently than I did," said Day, who retired from the Air Force in 1976 as a full colonel.

"I came back from Vietnam all crippled up and all screwed up, and a lot of that could have been avoided if I had given the gooks a lot of the stuff they were really pushing me for.

"I didn't think it was the right thing, so I didn't do it."

Once McCain was able to walk on his own, Day was moved out. For two years, McCain would be alone in his cell, which he described in U.S. News & World Report after his release:

"My room was fairly decent-sized - I'd say about 10 by 10. The door was solid. There were no windows. The only ventilation came from two small holes at the top in the ceiling, about 6 inches by 4 inches. The roof was tin, and it got hot as hell in there.

"The room was kind of dim - night and day - but they always kept on a small light bulb so they could observe me."

CODE TALKERS

In October 1968, McCain heard some noise in the cell behind him at The Plantation and began tapping on the cell wall, a common way for POWs to communicate. The call-up sign was the five-tap "shave and a haircut," and the other prisoner would answer with two taps.

For two weeks he got no answer, but finally two taps came back. Using a cup to the wall, McCain could hear the other prisoner and managed to give him the tap code. He finally gave McCain his name - Ernie Brace. For awhile, all Brace could do was tap out "I'm Ernie Brace" and then collapse into sobs.

Brace was a decorated former Marine who had flown more than 100 combat missions in Korea. He had been accused of deserting the scene of an aircraft accident, was court-martialed and received a dishonorable discharge.

But that didn't keep Brace out of the war. As a civilian pilot, he flew for a CIA-backed airline and was shot down over Laos.

Brace had spent 3 1/2 years in a bamboo cage with his feet in stocks and an iron collar around his neck. During the ordeal, he almost lost the use of his legs. He escaped three times, and when he was captured the third time, he was buried in the ground up to his neck.

After a year had passed, McCain and Brace were communicating with other prisoners in the camp, shuttling messages back and forth with the tap code.

On Dec. 9, 1969, a guard jerked open Brace's cell door. The incident is recounted in Brace's book, A Code to Keep.

"You are in bad trouble for communicating," the guard said. "You are being taken to a harsher place."

Blindfolded, Brace was put into a truck with soldiers and other prisoners. As the vehicle rolled through Hanoi, Brace felt someone tapping a message on his thigh.

"Hi," said the message. "I John McCain. Who U?"

Brace said tears began forming in his eyes as he grabbed his friend's hand, squeezing out the answer.

"EB here."

Offered early release, Brace turned it down, citing the military code. He was the longest-held civilian POW in Vietnam.

AN OFFER TO GO HOME

In June 1968, McCain was taken to an interrogation room where The Cat awaited him. He was joined by another man, "The Rabbit," who spoke very good English.

The Cat spent two hours in seemingly aimless conversation, telling McCain about how he had run French prison camps in the early 1950s. He said that he had released some prisoners early and that they had thanked him later. He also mentioned that Norris Overly had gone home "with honor."

All of sudden, The Cat blurted out: "Do you want to go home?"

McCain told him he'd have to think about it. He'd been hit by a bout of dysentery and was in poor shape. He was losing weight.

But McCain knew the real reason the North Vietnamese wanted to release him. He was the son and grandson of admirals (his father, Adm. Jack McCain, had been made commander of all U.S. forces in the Pacific in July 1968.) McCain's release would help the North Vietnamese propaganda machine.

McCain realized that the Code of Conduct gave him no choice. Alvarez, who was being held elsewhere, was supposed to be the first man released. McCain couldn't let down his father and grandfather.

"I just knew it wasn't the right thing to do," he said. "I knew that they wouldn't have offered it to me if I hadn't been the son of an admiral.

"I just didn't think it was the honorable thing to do."

Three days later, McCain met with The Cat again. The North Vietnamese turned the screws. The Cat told McCain that President Johnson had ordered McCain home. McCain asked to see the orders. The Cat didn't have any.

Then the North Vietnamese commander produced a letter from McCain's wife, Carol, saying, "I wished that you had been one of those three who got to come home."

McCain calmly told The Cat that the prisoners must be released in the order they were captured, starting with Alvarez.

On the Fourth of July, McCain had a final sit-down with The Cat and The Rabbit.

"Our senior officer wants to know your final answer," The Rabbit said.

"My final answer is the same," McCain said. "It's no."

"That is your final answer?"

"That is my final answer."

The Cat, who had been seated behind a pile of papers, grabbed a pen and snapped it in half. Ink spurted all over the desk. He rose and kicked the chair over behind him.

"They taught you too well," he said, then left, slamming the door.

Before long, McCain would find himself tied to a stool, and the guards would literally beat the "black air pirate" confession out of him.

McCain's account was confirmed in a cable from Averell Harriman, who was President Johnson's envoy to the Paris peace talks. Harriman had tea with a Vietnamese official, who mentioned that McCain had refused early release.

A CHRISTMAS SERVICE

On Christmas Eve 1968, about 50 POWs, including McCain, were herded into a room decorated with flowers for a makeshift church service.

The North Vietnamese were intent on milking the ceremony for every bit of PR value. Cameramen moved around the room, filming the ceremony. Flash bulbs popped in the background.

Meanwhile, McCain and other prisoners were busy exchanging information. One of the guards, conscious that he was being filmed, smiled while he told McCain to stop talking.

McCain cursed the guard and kept briefing another prisoner.

"I refused to go home," McCain said. "I was tortured for it. They broke my rib and re-broke my arm."

McCain pressed on, and the guards kept trying to quiet him.

"Our senior ranking officer is Colonel Larson," McCain said.

"No talking!"

McCain cursed them again and flashed his middle finger toward the camera.

He was taken back to his cell, where he waited for his beating. It didn't come until the day after Christmas.

In May 1969, the North Vietnamese asked McCain to write a letter to U.S. pilots asking them not to fly over North Vietnam. When he refused, they made him stand for hours and hours.

When McCain tired and sat down, a guard jumped on his injured leg. McCain was back on crutches for the next 18 months.

In late 1969, things began to look up for the POWs for the first time.

President Nixon had taken office in January. During the Johnson administration, released POWs weren't allowed to talk about bad conditions in the prison camps for fear that such complaints would make things even worse for the men still being held.

That changed under Nixon.

In August 1969, under pressure, the North Vietnamese began releasing sick and injured prisoners. Among them were Navy Lt. Robert Frishman, who had a badly injured arm, Air Force Capt. Wes Rumble, who was in a body cast with a broken back, and Navy Seaman Doug Hegdahl, who had lost 75 pounds.

The men held press conferences, telling the horrifying details of torture and mistreatment. After that, treatment of POWs began to improve.

By fall, the torture had almost stopped. The food improved. The guards seemed almost friendly.

McCain's barred cell door had been covered with wood to keep him from looking out and from getting any ventilation. But in fall 1969, the board was removed at night to cool McCain's cell. And prisoners were allowed to bathe more often.

"It was all very amazing," McCain would write later.

In December 1969, McCain was moved to the Hanoi Hilton. There he met with a Cuban journalist who asked McCain general questions about the war. After the interview, a photographer came in and started snapping pictures, though McCain had said he didn't want his picture taken. After that, he refused to meet with visitors.

In June 1970, McCain was moved into a room called "Calcutta," which had no ventilation. There, McCain suffered from heat prostration and another bout of dysentery and was cut to half rations.

In December 1970, McCain was moved to a room that housed 45 to 50 prisoners. In February 1971, the prisoners defied their captors and held a church service. When the men presiding over the service were taken away by guards, the men started singing "The Star Spangled Banner" very loudly.

Fearing a riot, the guards rushed in with ropes and subdued the men. A few days later, McCain and others were moved to a punishment camp the prisoners called Skid Row. Though the conditions were filthy, McCain said, the prison was a piece of cake compared with conditions in 1969.

In 1971 and 1972, conditions gradually improved. McCain, whose weight had dropped to 105 during his first years in Hanoi, began to regain some of his health. He was allowed to exercise, which eased the boredom and made it easier to sleep.

"He was crippled but mentally fierce," recalled Orson Swindle, who roomed with McCain for the last two years of their incarceration. "He was stiff-legged and had awkward movement of both arms. He did the funniest push-ups I've even seen.

"One of his arms was sort of crooked.... he did push-ups with a tilt to it."

The men were in a big room with a large concrete slab in the center and a 3-foot-wide, horseshoe-shape path around the slab. They would exercise by walking along the path.

"When John would run in place, it was sort of humorous to watch him," Swindle said. "One leg would bend, and the other wouldn't. It was a sight to behold."

To entertain themselves and the other men, McCain and Swindle organized "Sunday Night at the Movies" - retelling, and in some cases performing, scenes from Hollywood films they had seen.

One of their favorites was One-Eyed Jacks, a Marlon Brando movie in which Brando is beaten by a worthless sheriff played by Slim Pickens. McCain and Swindle especially loved the part where Brando calls Pickens a "scum-sucking pig."

In December 1972, McCain had a front-row seat to a full-scale bombing attack on Hanoi.

"It was the most spectacular show I'll ever see," McCain later wrote in U.S. News and World Report. "...The bombs were dropping so close that the building would shake. The SAMs were flying all over, and the sirens were whining - it was really a wild scene."

Though the bombing had been conceived by Nixon, the actual orders had been given by McCain's father, Jack.

McCain's father never wrote him during the war because of the propaganda value of such a letter. He did, however, try to pass McCain a secret message once, according to a passage in Faith of My Fathers.

In letters to his wife, McCain was using a fairly obvious code to send messages back to the States. Naval intelligence, fearing that McCain would be caught, apprised the admiral.

Adm. John McCain Jr. sent a hidden message in a letter Carol wrote to McCain: "JUNIOR URGES CAUTION PLEASE STOP THIS."

The younger McCain never saw it, because the North Vietnamese withheld Carol's letters.

By January 1973, McCain had been moved back to The Plantation. The prisoners sensed that the war was nearing its end. The guards hardly bothered them.

Around that time, McCain was playing bridge with Swindle and two others when he was dealt a perfect hand. But McCain made a rookie mistake and lost his advantage. The other men teased him unmercifully.

Finally, McCain stopped talking to Swindle, who slept right next to him on the floor. This went on for several days.

"We would be walking on the path, and I would say, 'Hi, John,' and John wouldn't respond," Swindle said.

Then one day, the guards came in and ordered Swindle to pack his gear. As one of the first pilots captured, Swindle was in line to be released.

As Swindle was being ushered out, a frantic McCain rushed up to his side.

"John comes running up and says, 'Orson, Orson, I've really been a jerk the last few days.' I said, 'I don't even want to talk to you,' and I turned away."

"Then I looked back at him and winked, and I had a big grin on my face, and I said, 'I'll see you at home.'"

In March, McCain joined a group of prisoners who were put onto trucks and driven to Gia Lam Airport in Hanoi. McCain said he didn't believe he was leaving until he actually spoke with an American in uniform.

It was the best day of his life.

"At the time, it wasn't that overwhelming. It was one of those things that you had anticipated for so long, nothing could have lived up to my expectations," McCain said. "It's like when a kid waits for Christmas, and then it arrives, and it can't quite live up to what he expected."

One by one, The Rabbit read off their names, and they boarded the plane.

McCain's long ordeal was over.

"Chapter IV: Arizona, the Early Years" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic

June 5, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_IV_1999.htm)

In 1979, John McCain came face to face with his future.

He was in Hawaii, attending a military reception. While there, he met a young, blond, former cheerleader named Cindy Hensley.

It was an incredible stroke of luck for McCain.

How fortunate could one man be? Here was McCain, who had his eye on Congress, meeting a young, attractive beer heiress from Arizona, which was adding a congressional district in 1982.

McCain recalls that both he and Cindy fudged their ages at first. McCain made himself a little younger and Cindy made herself a little older. They found out their real ages when the local paper published them. McCain was 43, Cindy 25.

"So our marriage," McCain cracks, "is really based on a tissue of lies."

While they were dating, McCain called Cindy from Beijing, where he was traveling with a contingent from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee while she was in the hospital recuperating from minor knee surgery. She thanked him for the lovely flowers in her room, sent from "John."

What McCain didn't tell Cindy was that he hadn't sent the flowers. They were from another John, who lived in Tucson.

"I never thanked him," Cindy notes with a grin.

After a whirlwind courtship, John asked Cindy to marry him. But there were some details to clear out of the way.

McCain needed a divorce from his wife of 14 years, Carol, who had been badly injured in a car accident while McCain languished in Hanoi.

The marriage had been strained by his years of absence, along with McCain's admitted affairs after returning from Vietnam.

In February 1980, less than a year after he met Cindy, McCain petitioned a Florida court to dissolve his marriage to Carol, calling the union "irretrievably broken." Bud Day, a lawyer and fellow POW, handled the case.

"I thought things were going fairly well, and then it just came apart," Day recalls. "That happened to quite a few.... I don't fault (Carol), and I don't really fault John, either."

In the divorce settlement, McCain was generous with Carol, the mother of their daughter Sydney and two other children, whom McCain had adopted. Among other things, McCain gave Carol the rights to houses in Florida and Virginia, and agreed to pay her medical bills for life.

Except for signing the property settlement, Carol did not participate in the divorce. A court summons and other paperwork sent to her during the proceeding went unanswered.

In April, the judge entered a default judgment and declared the marriage dissolved.

A month later, McCain married Cindy in Phoenix, and they moved there.

McCain was immediately plugged into Arizona's power elite. Cindy's father, Jim Hensley, owned a Phoenix Anheuser-Busch distributorship that had made him a millionaire many times over.

It was no secret that McCain was interested in a political career. In the six years after he returned from Vietnam, he had been in rehab and then was assigned to a political post, working in the Navy's Senate liaison office in Washington.

While there, McCain made friends with such political movers as Sen. Gary Hart and Sen. John Tower, who was the ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee. He also met Sen. Bill Cohen, now the secretary of Defense, who ended up being the best man at John and Cindy's wedding.

In 1981, McCain retired from the Navy, mostly because of his badly injured knees and shoulder, compliments of his North Vietnamese captors. Hensley gave his new son-in-law a job as vice president of public relations, but McCain was soon bored.

"Jim Hensley didn't care about PR," said Bill Shover, a former executive with Phoenix Newspapers Inc. who met McCain in 1981. "When you have the Budweiser franchise, you have a license to steal. You don't need PR."

It didn't take long for McCain to meet wealthy power brokers such as developer Charles Keating Jr. and Fife Symington III, who would later be elected governor. Local pols suggested McCain start slowly by running for the state Legislature, but McCain would have none of it.

Eager to make up for time lost as a POW, McCain wanted Arizona's new congressional seat.

But he had a problem. The new district was in Tucson. For McCain to move from Phoenix to Tucson would open him up to criticism as a carpetbagger.

Fate lent a hand. In January 1982, Rep. John Rhodes retired from the 1st District seat, which includes the East Valley.

On the day Rhodes announced his retirement, Shover got a call from McCain. He could hear noise in the background.

"Where are you?" Shover asked.

"I'm on the freeway," said McCain, who had stopped at a service station to call Shover. "I'm on the way to Mesa to buy a house."

Many have told the tale of John McCain winning the 1st Congressional District by wearing out three pairs of shoes. McCain's footwear definitely took a beating during the race, but it was more greenbacks than soles that swept McCain into the U.S. House of Representatives in 1982.

McCain's first campaign benefited from his wife's personal wealth, some of which had been tied up in a trust set up in 1971 by her parents, Jim and Marguerite "Smitty" Hensley.

In 1981, the trust expired and was dissolved, giving Cindy McCain a half interest in Western Leasing Co., a truck-leasing business controlled by her father, said Trevor Potter, general counsel to the McCain 2000 campaign and former chairman of the Federal Election Commission.

In 1982, Cindy McCain received $639,000 from Western Leasing, according to a financial disclosure report filed by McCain. Potter said that figure reflects Cindy's income on paper, not the actual cash she received, which was about $250,000.

In any case, that same year, the McCains lent $169,000 of their own money to the campaign. Western Leasing, in part, made those loans possible, Potter said.

"Her financial assets played a part in allowing them to loan money to the campaign," Potter said. "And her financial assets included the income from Western Leasing."

Western Leasing was not the only income the McCains had in 1982. They earned a combined $130,000 in salary and bonuses from Hensley and Co., the beer distributorship controlled by Cindy's father. John also had his Navy pension, which paid $31,000 a year.

"No one pretends that Cindy had no money at all," Potter said. "It was hers. And it wasn't something Jim (Hensley) had given her for the campaign."

Under 1982 election rules, it was legal for McCain to tap his wife's assets, as well as his own, when making personal loans to the campaign. In 1983, the rules were rewritten, with tighter guidelines on the use of family money.

In the end, including the personal loans, McCain would raise more than $550,000 to win the seat.

AN ALLY IN THE PRESS

McCain had money, and he also had another staunch ally in Phoenix: Darrow "Duke" Tully, publisher of the state's largest newspaper, The Republic.

Upon meeting McCain, Tully regaled him with stories of his own military service as an Air Force pilot in Korea and Vietnam. The two men quickly hit it off and soon were spending a lot of time together. Cindy McCain and Tully's second wife, Pat, also got along well. Both were far younger than their husbands.

Tully had logged many hours in Air Force simulators learning how to fly F-16s. He bragged about a simulated dogfight between him and McCain on the Goldwater gunnery range in southwest Arizona.

"Duke said he had gotten John in his sights and shot him down," Shover recalls. "John couldn't maneuver very well, because of his (formerly) broken arm."

Tully immediately started grooming McCain for public office.

Shover said Tully was practically McCain's PR man, hosting dinners to introduce him to the Valley's movers and shakers. He set up guest columns for McCain in PNI's flagship newspaper, The Republic. In one of them, McCain gave a tear-jerking account of Christmas in Hanoi. Tully became godfather to one of McCain's children.

With his connections and war record, McCain was taken seriously by the Republican establishment. Plus, McCain had charm. Women were drawn to him, and men respected him as a man's man.

"John was a very engaging guy," Shover recalls. "You could not help but like John."

McCain was vulnerable on one count. He was not from Arizona and looked like he was shopping for a congressional seat.

In 1982, at a candidates forum, McCain settled the carpetbagger issue for good. After noting that he had been a military brat and moved around his whole life, McCain played his ace in the hole.

"The place I lived the longest in my life was Hanoi," McCain said.

Although it was clear McCain had the tools to reach political office on his own, Tully helped open the door. Armed with a war chest provided by such people as Keating and Symington, McCain conducted a tireless door-to-door campaign and beat his primary opponents. He easily rolled over his Democratic challenger in the general election.

Tully and McCain would only get closer, and McCain would influence the paper.

In the pages of The Republic and The Phoenix Gazette, McCain could do no wrong. Political columnists adopted him like a lost puppy. Late Gazette columnist John Kolbe blasted McCain's Republican primary opponent in 1982, Jim Mack, for calling McCain's first wife to dig up dirt.

In 1984, McCain won a second term in the House, facing only token opposition. He was already hunting bigger game. McCain wanted to succeed Barry Goldwater, who was retiring from the Senate.

McCain's main stumbling block was Gov. Bruce Babbitt, a popular Democrat with deep family ties in the state. McCain's people decided early on that the race would be half won if they could persuade Babbitt to stay out.

"It wasn't so much a strategy as it was a reality," recalls Torie Clarke, McCain's press secretary from 1983 until 1989. "The theory was, if we worked really hard...if John really could get his roots deep in Arizona, it became less and less likely that Babbitt would want to run against him."

Babbitt also was toying with a run for president in 1988, two years after he would have been elected to the Senate. McCain's people kept the pressure on, making it clear that McCain planned an all-or-nothing assault on the seat.

In March 1985, Babbitt made it official: He wasn't running for the Senate. In May, five-term Congressman Bob Stump also took a pass, giving McCain an open field for the Republican nomination.

To face McCain, the Democrats fielded Richard Kimball, a tall, good-looking 37-year-old with an offbeat personality. Urged on by Tully, The Republic and Gazette editorial pages tore into Kimball, a former member of the Arizona Corporation Commission.

Republic columnist Pat Murphy blasted a Kimball position paper because it contained grammatical and spelling errors. Kolbe, now firmly in McCain's corner, also lampooned Kimball, saying he suffered from "terminal weirdness."

Of course, everyone knew that McCain was Tully's favorite.

"(Tully) was really pushing John," Shover said. "He liked him. (McCain) was probably the guy Duke wanted to be. Duke was this Walter Mitty type."

Walter Mitty to be sure. All of Tully's war stories were pure fiction. McCain, like everyone else, had been fooled.

Tully invented his military history to live up to the expectations of his father, whose other son had been killed in a military training accident.

In late 1985, the pressure of living the lie was building up inside Tully, causing him to drink and alienate his wife, Pat. After she filed for divorce, Tully, in his own words, "was beginning to crack up."

He began to drop not-so-subtle hints to people that he had never served in the military. Then, on Oct. 25, a concerned secretary summoned Shover to Tully's office.

Shover found Tully stepping on his plaques and certificates and throwing them into a trash can.

Determined to protect his boss, Shover told him to quietly get rid of his uniforms and to stop telling his fake war stories.

Tully refused to be quiet about it.

"It's almost like he was trying to get caught," Shover said.

Eventually, word leaked out to Tully's enemies, one of whom was Maricopa County Attorney Tom Collins, who had been smacked by The Republic for taking a trip with his family at taxpayer expense.

Collins, along with freelance aviation writer Dick Rose, began to investigate Tully's background. The day after Christmas, Tully told Shover that Collins would have a press conference to expose him.

Shover drafted Tully's letter of resignation and called Indianapolis, the headquarters of The Republic's parent company, Central Newspapers Inc.

Tully's reign was over.

One of the early press calls was to McCain.

"His response was kind of like, 'Yeah, I have heard of Duke Tully. I'm sorry about what happened to him. Any other questions?' " Shover said.

Shover said McCain was a political opportunist who moved quickly to distance himself from Tully.

"In other words, he walked," Shover said. "He used Duke Tully to gain what he got in his life and he left him just when Duke needed him most."

'SEIZURE WORLD'

The fall of Tully threw Kimball off balance, since he had sought to paint McCain as a tool of the newspaper and its publisher. For the next few months, Kimball darted and dashed around McCain, throwing a lot of punches and landing none.

McCain took Kimball seriously, though.

"We worried, we sweated, we were concerned every single day," Clarke said. "From the first to the last, until Election Day....that's probably the reason John is so successful. That's the way he is."

In June 1986, McCain gave Kimball an opening, jokingly referring to Leisure World, a retirement community, as "Seizure World."

Kimball launched another series of attacks, calling McCain "bought and paid for" by special interests, since much of McCain's campaign contributions came from political action committees in four industries: defense, real estate, petroleum and utilities.

Kimball also noted that McCain was a millionaire because of his wife's interests in the beer distributorship owned by her father. Kimball wasn't shy about airing the Hensley family laundry.

He had dug up old newspaper clips that showed Jim Hensley had been an underling to well-known power broker Kemper Marley Sr., a rich rancher and wholesale liquor baron with ties to the 1976 car-bomb murder of Arizona Republic reporter Don Bolles.

After World War II (Hensley was a bombardier on a B-17 that was shot down over the English Channel), Hensley and his brother Eugene went to work at Marley-owned liquor distributorships in Phoenix and Tucson.

In 1948, the Hensley brothers were convicted of falsifying records to conceal, government lawyers contended, the illegal distribution of hundreds of cases of liquor. The sales occurred from 1945 to 1947, postwar years when liquor was rationed and in short supply.

Eugene Hensley was sentenced to a year in federal prison. Jim Hensley got six months, but his sentence was suspended. He received probation.

In 1953, Jim Hensley was again charged with falsifying records at Marley's liquor firms. The companies were defended by William Rehnquist, who would go on to become chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. Hensley was found not guilty.

'STANDING ON A SOAPBOX'

In late 1986, as Kimball gained ground on McCain in the Senate race, the candidates agreed to debate on television.

Since McCain was a good deal shorter than the lanky Kimball, he stood on a riser behind the podium. At one point, Kimball called him on it, saying McCain was "standing on a soapbox" to make himself look taller.

McCain was angry but kept his cool. The next day, he got mad all over again when he saw himself standing on the riser on the front page of The Republic.

While the debate was mostly a draw, McCain enjoyed a huge fund-raising lead, outspending Kimball nearly 4 to 1. On Election Day, McCain steamrolled Kimball, 60 percent to 40 percent.

McCain went to a downtown hotel for his acceptance speech, an event chronicled in The Nightingale's Song by Robert Timberg.

Jay Smith, McCain's political consultant, was told to make sure McCain stood on a riser as he delivered his acceptance speech.

"Arriving at the hotel shortly after McCain, Smith saw reporters and well-wishers huddle together on the stage," Timberg wrote. "From the midst of the throng, he heard a familiar voice floating upward, thanking the voters for sending him to the Senate. Familiar but disembodied. McCain had seen the riser and kicked it aside. The White Tornado had become the Invisible Man."

By 1988, McCain was a hot property and was rumored to be George Bush's choice for vice president.

"Before Dan Quayle came popping out on the dock in New Orleans, the last name eliminated for consideration by the AP wire was John McCain," said Scott Celley, a McCain aide at the time.

But in October 1989, everything came crashing down around McCain.

"Chapter V: The Keating Five" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic and AlterNet

Oct. 3, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_V_1999.htm)
(<http://www.azcentral.com/news/specials/mccain/articles/0301mccainbio-chapter7.html>)

As a war hero and U.S. senator, John McCain's life has been chronicled in pictures. There are grainy mug shots of a young McCain, printed in U.S. newspapers after his jet was shot down over North Vietnam. There are black-and-white images of his return, grinning and waving, his hair turned prematurely gray by 5 1/2 years of malnutrition and torture in a Hanoi prison camp.

In happier times, there is McCain holding his newborn daughter while his wife, Cindy, smiles from her hospital bed.

But it is an innocent vacation picture that symbolizes McCain's Achilles heel and carries the reminder of the scandal that threatened his political career.

In the picture, which was taken in the Bahamas, McCain is seated on a bandstand while wearing an outrageous, straw party hat. Next to him on the dais, a bottle tipped to his lips, sits Charles Keating III, son of developer Charles H Keating Jr.

McCain calls the Keating scandal "my asterisk." Over the years, his opponents have failed to turn it into a period.

It all started in Mar., 1987. Charles H Keating Jr., the flamboyant developer and anti-porn crusader, needed help. The government was poised to seize Lincoln Savings and Loan, a freewheeling subsidiary of Keating's American Continental Corp.

As federal auditors crawled all over Lincoln, Keating was not content to wait and hope for the best. He'd spread a lot of money around Washington, and it was time to call in his chits.

One of his first stops was Sen. Dennis DeConcini. The Arizona lawmaker was one of Keating's most loyal friends in Congress, and for good reason. Keating had given thousands of dollars to DeConcini's campaigns. At one point, DeConcini even pushed Keating for ambassador to the Bahamas, where Keating owned a luxurious vacation home.

Now Keating had a job for DeConcini. He wanted him to organize a meeting with the regulators. The message: Get off Lincoln's back. Eventually, DeConcini would set up a meeting between five senators and the regulators. One of them was John McCain. McCain knew Keating well. His ties to the home builder dated to 1981, when the two men met at a Navy League dinner where McCain was the speaker.

After the speech, Keating walked up to McCain and told him that he, too, was a Navy flier, and that he greatly respected McCain's war record. He met McCain's wife and family. The two men became friends.

Charlie Keating always took care of his friends, especially those in politics. John McCain was no exception.

In 1982, during McCain's first run for the House, Keating held a fund-raiser for him, collecting more than $11,000 from 40 employees of American Continental Corp.

McCain would spend more than $550,000 to win the primary and the general election. In 1983, during McCain's second House race, Keating hosted a $1,000-a-plate dinner for McCain, though he had no serious competition and coasted into his second term. When McCain pushed for the Senate in 1986, Keating was there with more than $50,000.

By 1987, McCain had received about $112,000 in political contributions from Keating and his associates.

McCain had also carried a little water for Keating in Washington. While in the House, McCain, along with a majority of representatives, co-sponsored a resolution to delay new regulations designed to curb risky investments by thrifts like Lincoln.

Hesitant Participant

Despite his history with Keating, McCain was hesitant about intervening. At that point, he had been in the Senate only three months. DeConcini wanted McCain to fly to San Francisco with him and talk to the regulators. McCain refused.

Keating would not be dissuaded.

On Mar. 24 at 9:30 a.m., Keating went to DeConcini's office and asked him if the meeting with the regulators was on. DeConcini told Keating that McCain was nervous. "McCain's a wimp," Keating replied, according to the book Trust Me, by Michael Binstein and Charles Bowden. "We'll go talk to him."

Keating had other business on the Hill and did not reach McCain's office until 1:30. A DeConcini staffer had already told McCain about the wimp comment.

When he arrived, Keating presented McCain with a laundry list of demands for the regulators.

McCain told Keating that he would attend the meeting and find out whether Keating was getting treated fairly, but that was all.

"Keating gave me the clear impression that he expected me to do more," McCain said later. "He had several specific requests."

When Keating questioned his courage, McCain invoked his POW experience. He told Keating that he didn't spend 5 1/2 years in the Hanoi Hilton to be called a coward. The two argued, then Keating stormed out.

Despite the dust-up, McCain attended not one but two meetings with the regulators. McCain later explained that he thought it was the right thing to do, because Keating was a constituent.

McCain would live to regret it.

The first meeting, on Apr. 2 in DeConcini's office, included Ed Gray, chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, as well as four senators: DeConcini, McCain, Alan Cranston, D-Calif., and John Glenn, D-Ohio.

The meeting had a clandestine air. Gray came alone. None of the senators brought their aides. DeConcini asked Gray to withdraw a regulation in order to help Lincoln. Gray shook his head.

For Keating, the meeting was a bust. Gray told the senators that as head of the loan board, he worried about the big picture. He didn't have any specific information about Lincoln. Bank regulators in San Francisco would be versed in that, not him. Gray offered to set up a meeting between the senators and the San Francisco regulators.

The second meeting was on Apr. 9. The same four senators attended, along with Sen. Don Riegle, D-Mich. Also at the meeting were William Black, then deputy director of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp., James Cirona, president of the Federal Home Loan Bank of San Francisco, and Michael Patriarca, director of agency functions at the FSLIC.

In a recent interview with The Republic, Black said the meeting was a show of force by Keating, who wanted the senators to pressure the regulators into dropping their case against Lincoln. The thrift was in trouble for violating "direct investment" rules, which prohibited S&Ls from taking large ownership positions in various ventures.

"The Senate is a really small club, like the cliché goes," Black said. "And you really did have one-twentieth of the Senate in one room, called by one guy, who was the biggest crook in the S&L debacle."

Black said the senators could have accomplished their goal "if they had simply had us show up and see this incredible room and said, 'Hi. Charles Keating asked us to meet with you. 'Bye.' "

'ALWAYS HAMLET'

The five senators, including McCain, seemed like a united front to Black.

"They presented themselves as a group," Black said, "and DeConcini is the dad, who's going to take the primary speaking role. Both meetings are in his office, and in both cases it's 'we' want this, with no one going, 'What do you mean we, kemo sabe?' "

According to nearly verbatim notes taken by Black, McCain started the second meeting with a careful comment.

"One of our jobs as elected officials is to help constituents in a proper fashion," McCain said. "ACC (American Continental Corp.) is a big employer and important to the local economy. I wouldn't want any special favors for them.

"I don't want any part of our conversation to be improper."

Black said the comment had the opposite effect for the regulators. It made them nervous about what might really be going on.

"McCain was the weirdest," Black said. "They were all different in their own way. McCain was always Hamlet, wringing his hands about what to do."

Glenn, a former astronaut and the first American to orbit the Earth, was not as tactful.

"To be blunt, you should charge them or get off their backs," he told the regulators. "If things are bad there, get to them. Their view is that they took a failing business and put it back on its feet. It's now viable and profitable. They took it off the endangered species list. Why has the exam dragged on and on and on?"

Added DeConcini, "What's wrong with this if they're willing to clean up their act?" Cirona, the banking official, told the senators that it was "very unusual" to hold a meeting to discuss a particular company.

DeConcini shot back: "It's very unusual for us to have a company that could be put out of business by its regulators."

The meeting went on. McCain was quiet, while DeConcini carried the ball. The regulators told the senators that Lincoln was in trouble. The thrift, Cirona said, was a "ticking time bomb." Then Patriarca made a stunning comment, according to transcripts released later.

"We're sending a criminal referral to the Department of Justice," he said. "Not maybe, we're sending one. This is an extraordinarily serious matter. It involves a whole range of imprudent actions. I can't tell you strongly enough how serious this is. This is not a profitable institution."

The statement made DeConcini back off a little.

"The criminality surprises me," he said. "We're not interested in discussing those issues. Our premise was that we had a viable institution concerned that it was being overregulated."

"What can we say to Lincoln?" Glenn asked.

"Nothing," Black responded, "with regard to the criminal referral. They haven't, and won't be told by us that we're making one."

"You haven't told them?" Glenn asked.

"No," said Black. "Justice would skin us alive if we did. Those referrals are very confidential. We can't prosecute anyone ourselves. All we can do is refer it to Justice."

After the meeting, McCain was done with Keating.

"Again, I was troubled by the appearance of the meeting," McCain said later. "I stated I didn't want any special favors from them. I only wanted them (Lincoln Savings) to be fairly treated."

Black doesn't completely buy that argument. If McCain was concerned about Keating asking him to do things that were improper, why go to either meeting at all?

Black said McCain probably went because Keating was close to being the political godfather of Arizona and McCain still had plenty of ambition.

"Keating was incredibly powerful," Black said. "And incredibly useful."

McCain's reservations aside, Keating accomplished his goal. He had bought some time, though the price was very high.

SHORT-LIVED REPRIEVE

A month later, the San Francisco regulators finished a yearlong audit and recommended that Lincoln be seized. But the report was virtually ignored because of politics on the bank board.

Gray was being replaced as chairman by Danny Wall, who was more sympathetic to Keating.

The audit, which described Lincoln as a thrift reeling out of control, sat on a shelf. In Sept., 1987, the investigation was taken away from the San Francisco office, away from Black and Patriarca. In May, 1988, it was transferred to Washington, where Lincoln would get a new audit.

It was a win for Keating. A battle, not the war.

In Phoenix, the move sparked a triumphant party at the posh headquarters of American Continental.

Someone hurled a computer from the second floor, shattering a window. Keating, all 6-feet-5 of him, struck a Superman pose and ripped open his shirt to display a hand-drawn skull and crossbones over the letters FHLBB—the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

A secretary climbed onto a desk to take photos, and American Continental executive Robert Kielty joined her. Keating grabbed a roll of tape and lashed their legs together. Potted plants were knocked over. Beer and champagne were spilled on the carved wood desks. Kielty took a bottle of champagne and poured it down another secretary's blouse.

"Get this champagne colder," Keating yelled.

Back in San Francisco, Black was fuming.

"Clearly, we were shot in the back," he would say later.

Despite the reprieve, Keating's businesses continued to spiral downward, taking the five senators with him. News of the meeting leaked out, and now all five men were answering some very embarrassing questions.

"Did you lean on regulators for Charlie Keating?"

"Did you get campaign contributions in exchange for your cooperation?"

"Why did you protect Keating?"

Together, the five senators had accepted more than $300,000 in contributions from Keating, and their critics added a new term to the American lexicon:

KEATING FIVE

As the S&L failure deepened, the sheer magnitude of the losses hit the press. Billions of dollars had been squandered. The Keating Five became shorthand for the kind of political influence that money can buy. The five senators were linked as the gang who went to bat for an S&L bandit.

S&L "trading cards" came out. The Keating Five card showed Charles Keating holding up his hand, with a senator's head adorning each finger. McCain was on Keating's pinkie.

As the Keating investigation dragged through 1988, McCain dodged the body blows. Most landed on DeConcini, who had arranged the meetings and had other close ties to Keating, including $50 million in loans from Keating to DeConcini's aides.

But McCain made a critical error.

In spinning his side of the Keating story, McCain adopted the blanket defense that Keating was a constituent and that he had every right to ask his senators for help. In attending the meetings, McCain said, he simply wanted to make sure that Keating was treated like any other constituent.

Keating was far more than a constituent to McCain, however.

On Oct. 8, 1989, The Republic revealed that McCain's wife and her father had invested $359,100 in a Keating shopping center in Apr., 1986, a year before McCain met with the regulators.

The paper also reported that the McCains, sometimes accompanied by their daughter and baby-sitter, had made at least nine trips at Keating's expense, sometimes aboard the American Continental jet. Three of trips were made during vacations to Keating's opulent Bahamas retreat at Cat Cay.

McCain also did not pay Keating for the trips until years after they were taken, when he learned that Keating was in trouble over Lincoln. Total cost: $13,433.

When the story broke, McCain did nothing to help himself. When reporters first called him, he was furious. Caught out in the open, the former fighter pilot let go with a barrage of cover fire. Sen. Hothead came out in all his glory.

"You're a liar," McCain snapped Sept. 29 when a Republic reporter asked him about business ties between his wife and Keating.

"That's the spouse's involvement, you idiot," McCain said later in the same conversation. "You do understand English, don't you?"

He also belittled the reporters when they asked about his wife's ties to Keating.

"It's up to you to find that out, kids."

And then he played the POW card.

"Even the Vietnamese didn't question my ethics," McCain said.

The paper ran the story a few days later. At a news conference, McCain was a changed man. He stood calmly for 90 minutes and answered every question.

On the shopping center, his defense was simple. The deal did not involve him. The shares in the shopping center had been purchased by a partnership set up between McCain's wife and her father.

But McCain also had to explain his trips with Keating and why he didn't pay Keating back right away.

On that score, McCain admitted he had fouled up. He said he should have reimbursed Keating immediately, not waited several years. His staff said it was an oversight, but it looked bad, McCain jetting around with Keating, then going to bat for him with the federal regulators.

Meanwhile, Lincoln continued to founder.

In Apr., 1989, two years after the Keating Five meetings, the government seized Lincoln, which declared bankruptcy. In Sept., 1990, Keating was booked into Los Angeles County Jail, charged with 42 counts of fraud. His bond was set at $5 million. During Keating's eventual trial, the prosecution produced a parade of elderly investors who had lost their life's savings by investing in American Continental junk bonds.

'THE ULTIMATE SURVIVOR'

In Nov., 1990, the Senate Ethics Committee convened to decide what punishment, if any, should be doled out to the Keating Five.

Robert Bennett, who would later represent President Bill Clinton in the Paula Jones case, was the special counsel for the committee. In his opening remarks, he slammed DeConcini but went lightly on McCain, the lone Republican ensnared with four Democrats.

"In the case of Senator McCain, there is very substantial evidence that he thought he had an understanding with Senator DeConcini's office that certain matters would not be gone into at the meeting with (bank board) Chairman (Ed) Gray," Bennett said.

"Moreover, there is substantial evidence that, as a result of Senator McCain's refusal to do certain things, he had a fallout with Mr. Keating."

McCain, the ultimate survivor, had dodged another missile.

Among the Keating Five, McCain received the most direct contributions from Keating. But the investigation found that he was the least culpable, along with Glenn. McCain attended the meetings but did nothing afterward to stop Lincoln's death spiral.

Lincoln's losses eventually were set at $3.4 billion, the most expensive failure in the national S&L scandal.

McCain also looked good in contrast to DeConcini, who continued to defend Keating until fall 1989, when federal regulators filed a $1.1 billion civil racketeering and fraud suit against Keating, accusing him of siphoning Lincoln's deposits to his family and into political campaigns.

In the end, McCain received only a mild rebuke from the Ethics Committee for exercising "poor judgment" for intervening with the federal regulators on behalf of Keating. Still, he felt tarred by the affair.

"The appearance of it was wrong," McCain said recently. "It's a wrong appearance when a group of senators appear in a meeting with a group of regulators, because it conveys the impression of undue and improper influence. And it was the wrong thing to do."

McCain noted that Bennett, the independent counsel, recommended that McCain and Glenn be dropped from the investigation.

"For the first time in history, the Ethics Committee overruled the recommendation of the independent counsel," McCain said. "I'm sure it had nothing to do with the fact that I was the only Republican of the five and the Democrats were in the majority (in the Senate)."

But McCain owns up to his mistake:

"I was judged eventually, after three years, of using, quote, poor judgment, and I agree with that assessment."

[Gee, Johnny Boy, that would only leave one year of a four-year Presidency to turn that around and use good judgment at least a little of the time. I guess America would recover from the nuclear wars you'd probably cause during your three years of "poor judgment," to put it in your own words. Damning! How did you ever get nominated, Johnny Boy? — SteveB, Nov. 11, 2011]

"Chapter VI: Arizona, the Later Years" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic

Oct. 3, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_VI_1999.htm)

For many politicians, the Keating scandal would have been too much to overcome. But McCain refused to go down easily.

He employed a dual strategy. He would make himself accessible to any reporter anywhere who wanted to talk about the Keating Five, and he wouldn't let the controversy detract from his work as a senator.

McCain grimly marched about the country, struggling to clear his name.

"I have to say, it was not an easy time," said Torie Clarke, McCain's former press secretary. "But because of the strategy he decided to pursue.... nobody had time to sit around and feel sorry for themselves."

McCain's hobnobbing with the press had an unexpected side effect. Reporters started to like him.

McCain always returned phone calls. He showed up for his television appearances. He was willing to go off the record to help reporters unearth certain stories. He answered questions bluntly, without much political tap dancing.

For Beltway reporters bored with bureaucrats, McCain was fresh, new and different.

"Everybody in town," Clarke said, "from the makeup artist at the local news station to the producers and directors, every reporter and every editor, loves working with John McCain because he does not stand on ceremony, he has no airs."

Going into the 1992 election, some thought McCain was in trouble. President Bush was flagging in the polls, and McCain was coming off the Keating scandal. His Democratic opponent was Claire Sargent, a Phoenix community activist. Former Gov. Evan Mecham was running as an independent despite having been impeached and removed from office in 1988.

But McCain's image improved in 1991. Soon after the Persian Gulf War broke out, McCain was in demand. The phone began ringing off the hook the day POWs were taken.

"The Today Show called, and we started on The Today Show at four-something in the morning," said Scott Celley, a former aide. "The last thing I remember him being on was Australian Nightline, which was done here at Channel 10, a few blocks away, at close to 11 p.m. He was on television or the radio every minute of that day."

McCain became a regular on public affairs shows, using his expertise as a former Navy pilot and POW. McCain quickly became a national authority on foreign affairs.

The din of the Keating Five began to lessen. McCain stayed on message and began to distance himself from the scandal.

In 1992, McCain received 58 percent of the vote in the three-way election, easily winning a second Senate term.

Things did not go as well for Charlie Keating. In January 1993, a federal jury convicted him of 73 counts of wire and bankruptcy fraud in the collapse of American Continental and Lincoln.

Keating was sentenced to 12 years and seven months in prison but served just 50 months before the conviction was overturned on a technicality. In 1999, at age 75, he pleaded guilty to four counts of fraud for siphoning some $975,000 from American Continental before he had declared bankruptcy in 1989. He was sentenced to time served.

In 1995, McCain was lionized in The Nightingale's Song, a book that examined the military and political careers of McCain and four other Annapolis graduates, James Webb, Robert McFarlane, John Poindexter and Oliver North.

Robert Timberg devotes two of his 475 pages to the Keating scandal and says this about it:

"Stripped of the veneer of sleaze that coated the affair, McCain's defense of his actions was solid and credible. It didn't matter. The Keating Five label endured, shabby journalistic shorthand that made up in simplemindedness what it lacked in precision."

By 1996, McCain was considered a front-runner to be Bob Dole's running mate in the race against Clinton and Al Gore, before Dole picked Jack Kemp.

Today, the Keating Five scandal is barely mentioned. In most national profiles of McCain, it has been reduced to one paragraph.

McCain knows it will never disappear altogether.

"It'll be on my tombstone," McCain told 60 Minutes' Mike Wallace. "One of the Keating Five."

McCain ERUPTIONS

In the early 1990s, despite McCain's battering over Keating, he didn't stop throwing his weight around Arizona.

Some public officials are still stinging from McCain's volcanic temper.

One is Democrat Paul Johnson, the former mayor of Phoenix and an unsuccessful candidate for governor. During Johnson's stint as mayor, he saw McCain's temper up close, and it makes him think twice about McCain becoming president.

"His volatility borders in the area of being unstable," Johnson said. "Before I let this guy put his finger on the button, I would have to give considerable pause."

Johnson said he got a full dose of McCain's anger when he was in Washington in 1992, dealing with a federal land swap that involved the Phoenix Indian School. He and McCain, who disagreed over the issue, were in a hearing room with other mayors when hostilities broke out.

"He says, 'Start a tape recorder. It's best when you get a liar on tape,' " Johnson recalled. "Then I said something back to him, and before you knew it, we were nose to nose and chin to chin. No blows were exchanged, but we were as close to being 14-year-old boys as we possibly could be.... Testosterone was flowing all over place."

Johnson, who also fought McCain's plan for a regional airport, marvels at his wrath.

"Oh, gosh, you never dealt with a more brutal individual," Johnson said. "He was very tough."

McCain's penchant for bullying state officials essentially destroyed his relationship with Grant Woods, who served as state attorney general from 1990 until 1998.

Woods, son of powerful Mesa contractor Joe E. Woods, was an early McCain staffer. He provided key help in McCain's first run for Congress, mainly by persuading his influential father to support McCain in Mesa over several local candidates.

"The support of Joe Woods in the district was about 100 times more important than the support of Grant Woods," the younger Woods said. "When he went with McCain, it made it OK for the old guard to support McCain rather than one of the locals."

The Woods-McCain relationship began to chill in 1994 when Woods started investigating bid-rigging allegations surrounding Gov. Fife Symington's government cost-cutting program, Project SLIM. Despite pressure from other Republicans, including McCain, Woods pursued the probe.

Over the years, McCain had become very close to Symington. Even their staffs were tied together. Symington's former chief of staff, Wes Gullett, is McCain's deputy campaign director and is married to McCain aide Deb Gullett.

Others note that McCain called for the scalp of Gov. Evan Mecham, who was impeached and removed from office, but let Symington slide when he was under indictment for bank fraud. Symington later was convicted and resigned, but his conviction was overturned earlier this year.

McCain said the state was operating smoothly under Symington, which was not the case with Mecham. He bristled when it was suggested that he was protecting a friend.

"I really won't answer that kind of insinuation," McCain said. "I do what's best for the state. I do what's best for the country."

McCain added, "Of course (Symington) was a friend of mine. I had a friendly relationship with Gov. Mecham before he got into the difficulties."

Woods said McCain didn't like it when he investigated Symington.

"I think he probably liked to be in the loop," Woods said. "Consequently, when he wasn't, and then I kept investigating Republicans or criticizing Republicans...he never could get over that.

"It appeared clear to me that the only way I could return to his good graces was to be a good boy, and I wasn't willing to be a good boy."

Eventually, McCain and Woods had it out over Symington.

"He just did not approve of me constantly making life difficult for Republicans, and I made it clear that it wasn't going to change, and we weren't going to have any more of these conversations. We haven't talked in a long time."

Woods ultimately obtained a $725,000 civil settlement in the SLIM case.

Woods said he finds it ironic that McCain, Mr. Maverick in the Senate, didn't want Woods to assume the same role in the Arizona Republican Party.

"I guess it's OK to be the maverick but not tolerate mavericks around you," Woods said.

WIFE'S DRUG SCANDAL

By the early 1990s, his political rehabilitation was complete. Nobody on the national stage seemed to care about McCain's foibles.

What McCain didn't know was that the Keating scandal had already claimed another victim, one from McCain's own family.

In August 1994, a group of Valley journalists received a strange phone call from Jay Smith, McCain's political strategist.

They were offered an exclusive in exchange for agreeing to certain terms. They would attend individual interview sessions Aug. 19 and sit on the story until Aug. 22. The five journalists - three print reporters, a television reporter and a radio reporter - agreed.

One by one, they went to the McCain home, where they were told an incredible story.

Cindy McCain told them that she had been a drug addict for three years. From 1989 to 1992, she was addicted to Percocet and Vicodin. Worse, she had stolen pills from the American Voluntary Medical Team, a relief organization that she founded to aid Third World countries.

"More than anything, I wanted to be able to face my children," she said at the time, "for them to know I wasn't lying to them. They're too young to fully understand right now, but someday they will."

Cindy blamed two back surgeries and the Keating Five scandal - a mix of physical and emotional pain - for driving her to drugs.

Things started to unravel when a Drug Enforcement Administration audit found irregularities in AVMT's records, prompting an investigation, Cindy told the reporters.

In 1992, as the Keating affair surfaced again during McCain's run for a second Senate term, Cindy's parents confronted her about her drug use.

What had been so clear to Cindy's parents was lost on McCain, who said he hadn't noticed his wife's addiction.

"I was stunned," McCain said at the time. "Naturally, I felt enormous sadness for Cindy and a certain sense of guilt that I hadn't detected it. I feel very sorry for what she went through, but I'm very proud she was able to come out of it. For her, it was like the Keating affair had been for me - a searing experience, and we both came out stronger. I think it has strengthened our marriage and our overall relationship."

To avoid prosecution on drug charges, she would enter a federal diversion program.

In telling her story, Cindy got choked up when she told of federal drug agents knocking on her door, asking about missing pills.

The reporters were sympathetic.

Cindy had always been physically fragile. She suffered two miscarriages early in her marriage to McCain until doctors determined she was a "DES baby." Cindy's mother had been given the drug diethylstilbestrol during her pregnancy.

During the 1940s and '50s, DES was thought to prevent miscarriages. Instead, it caused numerous birth defects, including deformed uteruses in female offspring. Doctors finally detected the problem and took special precautions during Cindy's third pregnancy.

Even so, there were long separations, because Cindy couldn't travel while pregnant. Besides, she preferred Arizona to Washington.

Cindy told the reporters that she finally entered The Meadows, a drug-treatment center in Wickenburg, and went to anti-dependency meetings twice a week.

In 1993, she said, a hysterectomy ended the nagging back pain that had driven her to the painkillers.

So why go public a year later?

"If what I say can help just one person to face the problem, it's worthwhile," she said. "They should know it's OK to be scared. It's OK to talk about it. And there's nothing wrong with staying home, carpooling and potty-training a 3-year-old."

Given Cindy's heartfelt confession, the handpicked journalists did what Smith expected. They painted Cindy as the victim, a courageous soldier beating back the devil of drug addiction.

But there was far more to the story. The reporters had been the victims of a spin job. It became apparent the next week, as more details came out.

John McCain had organized the interviews to head off a far more negative story, one that centered on a former AVMT employee who accused Cindy McCain in a lawsuit of ordering him to conceal "improper acts" and "misrepresent facts in a judicial proceeding."

The accuser was Tom Gosinski, who had been fired from AVMT in 1993. It was he who had tipped the DEA to check out Cindy's organization. His lawsuit had been filed as a warning shot - his real allegation was that Cindy McCain had fired him because he "knew too much" about her drug use.

The details were in a 212-page report from the Maricopa County Attorney's Office that was about to become public when McCain arranged the interviews.

Ironically, County Attorney Rick Romley entered the fray at the request of McCain lawyer John Dowd, who charged that Gosinski was extorting the McCains by offering to settle the case for $250,000.

By asking Romley to investigate, Dowd helped create a public record that otherwise wouldn't have existed. When the report was released, McCain lost control of the story. Reporters who had been cut out of Cindy's private interview sessions, including those from The Republic, pursued it with new vigor.

Infuriated that his spin had failed to take, McCain refused to talk to reporters who weren't invited to Cindy's private interviews.

Dowd, who would later defend Gov. Fife Symington, put it plainly to a Republic reporter who called him for comment:

"You're not going to talk to Cindy. You're not going to talk to me. You're not going to talk to anybody associated with us. Have you got the message?"

Then he hung up.

Meanwhile, new allegations were surfacing, feeding the press frenzy for fresh angles, especially in light of McCain's silence.

Gosinski alleged that Cindy had asked him to lie to make it easier for her to adopt a baby from Bangladesh.

Backed up by court documents, the McCains denied there was anything improper in the adoption. They noted that the adoption probably saved the girl's life, as her cleft palate would not have allowed her to survive in Bangladesh.

Meanwhile, Gosinski's credibility started to slip. In Romley's report, several AVMT staffers said Gosinski had privately threatened to blackmail Cindy if she ever fired him.

Ultimately, Gosinski's lawsuit was dropped and he was never prosecuted.

The issue hasn't quite died. During a recent campaign swing through South Carolina, a New York Daily News reporter asked Cindy about her addiction.

She replied that she has been drug-free for eight years, but she acknowledged that she will always be in recovery.

"I had a real problem," she said, "and I dealt with my addiction head-on."

"Chapter VII: Inside the Beltway" by Bill Muller, The Arizona Republic

Oct. 3, 1999, (http://www.wmsa.net/People/john_mccain/ariz-republic_chap_VII_1999.htm)

None of McCain's battles have caused so much uproar - especially in his own party - as campaign-finance reform.

He surprised everyone by teaming with Democrat Russell Feingold and drafting a bill that would cut the legs out from under the major parties.

McCain's target was "soft money" - unlimited contributions given to political parties by corporations. He sees this as the ultimate evil in government, greasing the wheels for special interests.

Detractors say this is a bit high-handed, especially coming from a man who accepted $112,000 in campaign contributions from Charlie Keating and his pals.

They also note that McCain's stand on campaign-finance reform has not prevented him from working Washington, D.C., for campaign cash or accepting tens of thousands of dollars from corporations who are under the thumb of the Commerce Committee, which McCain heads.

The committee holds sway over a number of key industries, overseeing issues ranging from cable and satellite television rules to airline deregulation to access to telephone long-distance markets.

Armed with this seeming contradiction, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott fired a salvo at McCain after he tried to re-energize his campaign-finance bill in July.

"I just think, when you're out there raising money right and left," Lott told The New York Times, "and then you're talking about how you need to reform the system, it rings a little hollow."

McCain says he will persist because he believes the public wants reform.

"Most Americans care very much that it is now legal for a subsidiary of a corporation owned by the Chinese Army to give unlimited amounts of money to American political campaigns," McCain says. "Most Americans care very much that the Lincoln bedroom has become a Motel 6 where the president of the United States serves as the bellhop."

Though outspoken in Congress, McCain has resisted criticizing other Republicans during the presidential race. Instead, he's decided that Clinton makes a good whipping boy.

When the Kosovo conflict broke out, public affairs shows went running to McCain, and he didn't disappoint them. He became the first major political figure to question Clinton's tactics.

Though Kosovo worked out in Clinton's favor, McCain didn't really take a hit, said Dennis Goldford, chairman of the department of politics and international relations at Drake University.

"Nothing backfired," Goldford said. "McCain didn't propose something, some use of force, that backfired and had tremendous casualties and was a disaster."

Since it was ultimately Clinton's call, "McCain could take a principled position and not worry about whether it actually worked or not," Goldford said.

Even apart from Kosovo, McCain says, Clinton has pursued a "feckless, photo-op foreign policy."

McCain blames the president for gutting the military, which has seen its numbers reduced in recent years. He points to 11,000 military personnel on food stamps and pilots leaving the Navy and Air Force in record numbers to fly for commercial airlines, where they can make more money.

McCain also wants the armed forces rebuilt to better deal with modern threats.

"We have a military that is structured to fight a tank battle on the plains of Europe," McCain says. "What we need is a force that can be moved around the world on short notice."

He says that base closings are a must and that the government must provide proper health care for World War II veterans. He says it's an "absolute disgrace" that veterans are being ignored.

How does one rebuild the military and cut taxes at the same time? For McCain, that means targeting pork-barrel projects and weapons systems that he deems unnecessary, such as the Sea Wolf submarine, which will cost $4 billion apiece.

He also promises to repair Medicare and Social Security.

"More young Americans believe that Elvis is alive than believe they'll ever see a Social Security check," McCain says, adding that many in Congress don't see the need to repair Social Security. "They figure, 'Since I'll be gone by then, I'll let you figure it out yourselves. And you don't vote, so hell.'"

'A VERY EFFECTIVE VOICE'

Some have criticized McCain for failing to pass a piece of major legislation during his 17 years in Congress. McCain-Feingold died, as did his anti-tobacco bill. His line-item veto did pass, but it was later tossed out by the courts.

Congressman Matt Salmon, R-Ariz., said McCain shouldn't be judged on the number of bills he has passed.

"You should look at a person's success by how many bills they stopped," Salmon said. "He's been a very effective voice at cutting wasteful spending. I don't judge a person based on how many bills they get through... I think that's a bogus way of appraising somebody's strengths."

McCain was first elected to the House in 1982 and served two terms. As a freshman congressman, he broke from the pack in criticizing President Reagan's decision to station troops in Lebanon.

In a House floor speech in September 1983, McCain called for the withdrawal of all U.S. Marines from Lebanon. He was one of 27 Republicans to defy Reagan openly.

"The longer we stay in Lebanon, the harder it will be for us to leave," he said.

A month later, McCain was tragically proved right when the Marine barracks were bombed, killing 241 U.S. servicemen.

That speech drew national press for McCain, who was lauded in Rolling Stone magazine and was listed as a "Republican on the rise" by U.S. News & World Report.

Much of his second House term was dominated by talk of him running for the Senate, though in 1985, he drew more national attention when he returned to Vietnam with CBS news legend Walter Cronkite.

In 1986, McCain was elected to the Senate, replacing legendary Arizona conservative Barry Goldwater. In 1998, McCain was elected to his third term.

Over the years, McCain has earned his maverick status. He's not afraid to make a controversial floor speech, though some argue they have had little effect.

His defiant nature plays well in Arizona, a conservative state with a sagebrush-rebellion mentality. GOP voters like McCain's politics.

For the most part, he's been a good Republican, in some ways more conservative than Goldwater. During most of his years in Congress, he has been in the minority party.

Last year, McCain voted with his party 81 percent of the time. He voted to convict Clinton during the president's impeachment and supported the Contract With America.

During the Reagan years, McCain followed the party line, voting for prayer in public schools, the 1986 tax reform act, continued subsidies for tobacco companies and the reintroduction of some handgun sales.

He voted against the Equal Rights Amendment, funding for the Clean Air Act and opposed the 1983 nuclear freeze resolution.

At times, though, he would go against the tide.

In 1986, McCain voted with a two-thirds majority to override Reagan's veto of sanctions against South Africa. The next year, he outfoxed the administration and stopped an attempt to funnel $28 million from a poverty food program into a raise for Department of Agriculture employees.

Today, as chairman of the Commerce Committee, McCain is shepherding the deregulation of the telephone industry as well as dealing with burgeoning issues involving transportation, cable television and the Internet.

McCain also has made a name for himself by fighting wasteful government spending, which often takes the form of pet federal projects in congressmen's or senators' districts.

As part of his campaign rhetoric, McCain notes that Congress looks at appropriations bills "the way Willie Sutton looked at banks."

To root out the pork, McCain has stationed a staffer at Appropriations Committee meetings. He also pushed the line-item veto, which would allow the president to remove certain elements of a bill while allowing the legislation to become law.

Although it passed, the courts struck down the line-item veto in 1997.

McCain recently started his "It's Your Country" Web site (www.itsyourcountry.com), to monitor pork and corporate welfare. It includes "the daily outrage," naming companies that get huge federal subsidies in exchange for contributions to political parties.

McCain also targeted Big Tobacco, seeking to raise taxes on cigarettes to help states pay their smoking-related health care costs, finance an anti-smoking advertising campaign and pay for health research.

The tobacco industry mounted a $40 million national advertising campaign to defeat McCain's anti-tobacco bill, and it ultimately prevailed.

"The losers are the children of America," McCain said after the bill went down.

WATCHING HIS TEMPER

These days, John McCain is on his best behavior. He is focused on becoming president, and he's not going to let his temper get in the way. When reporters chase him on the street and ask for just one more question, McCain is accommodating.

"Anything," he says. "Anything."

It has not always been this way. More than one reporter has picked up his phone in the morning to hear McCain shrieking on the other end, furious over some injustice.

When The Republic ran an editorial cartoon about his wife Cindy's drug addiction, the senator didn't speak to his hometown paper for more than a year.

The cartoon, by Steve Benson, The Republic's Pulitzer Prize-winning cartoonist, showed Cindy McCain holding an emaciated child upside down by the ankle and shaking him over a field of starving children.

"Quit your crying and give me the drugs," read the caption.

McCain also has yelled at bureaucrats, dressed down fellow members of Congress and earned the name Sen. Hothead from Washingtonian magazine.

Some Arizona elected officials have been scarred by run-ins with McCain, who brooks no disloyalty - you are either with him or against him.

But McCain is a shrewd campaigner. He knows he can't show that side if he's going to reach the Oval Office.

His flaws remain below the surface, and they aren't drawing a lot of press.

"It has to have some new twist to it or new information, something like, hey, did you know..." McCain says.

"There will always be people who will attack me. I've heard some of the damndest things said about me. I was on a radio show in Charleston (S.C.), and someone calls up and says, 'Did you ever commit adultery with prostitutes in Subic Bay?' " McCain recalls, laughing.

"And I said the last time I was in Subic Bay was 1966, but no.

"Once every couple weeks, some hand grenade is lobbed into the headquarters with some stupid statement or charge."

McCain has one advantage: Much of his dirty laundry already has been aired.

BEDFORD, N.H. - McCain's campaign van is rocketing down the road to another event, another 100 people who want to shake his hand, hear his words, hope against hope that he'll be president.

He's leaning way back in the seat, answering questions about Vietnam, about Charlie Keating, about anything.

Just for a moment, his eyes close and he slumps a little, the weight of the campaign on his shoulders.

Then he's asked to define his message. McCain's eyes flutter open. The van is pulling to a stop in front of someone's home.

"Reform," McCain says as the door slides open.

There is faint smattering of applause from the lawn.

"Principle," he says. "And freedom."

And then he is gone.

Read more Biography of John McCain: <http://www.azcentral.com/news/election/mccain/>.

20080819-08

21:08

SteveB

John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/19/08; "John Lewis: John McCain's Wise Man?"

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

At yesterday's VFW convention, McCain inexplicably attacked Obama for, of all things, wanting to be President:

Behind all of these claims and positions by Senator Obama lies the ambition to be President.

Not only is this a lunatic accusation since, as was pointed out yesterday, McCain also seems to want to be President...in his 2002 political memoir, Worth Fighting For, McCain has this to say:

I didn't decide to run for president to start a national crusade for the political reforms I believed in or to run a campaign as if it were some grand act of patriotism. In truth, I wanted to be president because it had become my ambition to be president. . . . In truth, I'd had the ambition for a long time.

Senility, pure and simple!

From senility to outright lies (or maybe the insanity defense applies here too, huh Johnny Boy?)...this (below) from Mother Jones and verified.

LIAR, LIAR, PANT'S ON FIRE, JOHNNY BOY!!!!!!!!!!!!!! CAUGHT AGAIN!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

"John Lewis: John McCain's Wise Man?" by Janathan Stein, Mother Jones

Aug. 18, 2008, (<http://motherjones.com/mojo/2008/08/john-lewis-john-mccains-wise-man>)

John McCain says he plans to consult with Democratic Rep. John Lewis when he's President. That's news to Lewis.

During Saturday's presidential forum at Rick Warren's California mega-church, John McCain was asked to name the "three wisest people" he would "rely heavily on" if elected President. He didn't cite close confidantes Phil Gramm and Randy Scheunemann, possibly because they have gotten McCain into trouble politically. Instead McCain chose Gen. David Petraeus; former eBay CEO Meg Whitman, one of his economic advisers; and Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a leading figure in the civil rights movement.

This is not the first time McCain has invoked Lewis' name on the campaign trail. Earlier this year, in Selma, Alabama, he told the story of civil rights marchers trying to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge in a 1965 march from Selma to the state capital of Montgomery. Waiting at the crest of the bridge were a brigade of police and state troopers who meted out an attacks so violent that the day is known today as Bloody Sunday.

Central in McCain's telling was John Lewis, a man of just 25 who was at the front of the march and absorbed the first blow. Millions of Americans, McCain noted, "watched brave John Lewis fall."

But even though McCain has now repeatedly cited Lewis as a role model and potential adviser, McCain has not established a relationship with the Georgia Democrat in the 22 years they have served in Congress together. At the time of McCain's Selma speech, a Lewis associate told my colleague David Corn that McCain has never been close to Lewis. Lewis was not told about McCain's speech in Selma in advance, nor was he invited to attend.

In response to McCain's latest invocation of his name, Rep. Lewis said in a statement requested by Mother Jones, "I cannot stop one human being, even a presidential candidate, from admiring the courage and sacrifice of peaceful protesters on the Edmund Pettus Bridge or making comments about it." But, he added, "Sen. McCain and I are colleagues in the U.S. Congress, not confidantes. He does not consult me. And I do not consult him."

It took McCain years to fully embrace the goals that Lewis was fighting for on Bloody Sunday. In 1983, McCain voted against making Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday a national holiday, in opposition to most members of Congress, including many of his Republican colleagues. In 1987, the governor of Arizona repealed the state's recognition of King; McCain supported the move. It was only in 1990, 25 years after Lewis marched in Alabama, when Arizona reversed its decision that McCain changed his own stance on the issue.

And there are, of course, the fundamental differences between John McCain's political philosophy and the goals of Lewis and his fellow marchers. Lewis hoped that the federal government would use its influence to protect the rights of disenfranchised individuals; he sought an expanded role for government because of what he believed was government's power to do good. It explains, in part, why Lewis is a Democrat today and supports Barack Obama for president. McCain, on the other hand, is a fanatical enemy of government spending and has said, "I've found over time that less government involvement is better." It's a philosophy that would have left Lewis and his cohorts out in the cold.

20080819-09 21:19 SteveB Re: 2nd Amendment

Dear Pat,

I don't think the founding fathers would be appalled by capitalism at all...it was absolutely rampant and dominant in the Colonies. Look at Ben Franklin and Paul Revere and Thomas Jefferson, to name but a few. Capitalism is one of the highest expressions of freedom, even though it does not necessarily require freedom. Having seen firsthand the slavery of China, and having lived through the usurpation of beautiful freedom and capitalism in Bolivia by a Marxist government, and having owned my own businesses since I was a sophomore in high school, I cherish capitalism...especially capitalism that is not allowed to run rampant and control the government. Then there is no true freedom nor true capitalism. And, believe it or not, historical documents—including the Constitution itself—prove that the founding fathers did believe armed insurrection would someday be required. I pray that they were wrong.

20080820-01 11:25 SteveM Re: The Keating Five

Dear SteveB,

[Source of quotes unknown. —SteveB]

What know [No? —SteveB] comments about the other 4 Dem 3 who were convicted! Alan Cranston (D-CA), Dennis DeConcini (D-AZ), John Glenn (D-OH), and Donald W. Riegle (D-MI),

Heck, if you are as charitable of BHO and Rev Wright, surely you can forgive Mac for something that happened 20 years ago? LOL!

In the end, McCain received only a mild rebuke from the Ethics Committee for exercising "poor judgment" for intervening with the federal regulators on behalf of Keating. Still, he felt tarred by the affair.

"The appearance of it was wrong," McCain said recently. "It's a wrong appearance when a group of senators appear in a meeting with a group of regulators, because it conveys the impression of undue and improper influence. And it was the wrong thing to do."

McCain noted that Bennett, the independent counsel, recommended that McCain and Glenn be dropped from the investigation.

"For the first time in history, the Ethics Committee overruled the recommendation of the independent counsel," McCain said. "I'm sure it had nothing to do with the fact that I was the only Republican of the five and the Democrats were in the majority (in the Senate)."

But McCain owns up to his mistake: "I was judged eventually, after three years, of using, quote, poor judgment, and I agree with that assessment."

20080821-01	11:12	SteveM	Fw: "Just One State" [California]; Illegal Immigration
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

This is only one State.....If this doesn't open your eyes, nothing will!

Just One State, from the Los Angeles Time

1. 40% of all workers in L. A. County (L.A. County has 10.2 million people)are working for cash and not paying taxes. This is because they are predominantly illegal immigrants working without a green card.
2. 95% of warrants for murder in Los Angeles are for illegal aliens.
3. 75% of people on the most wanted list in Los Angeles are illegal aliens.
4. Over 2/3 of all births in Los Angeles County are to illegal alien Mexicans on Medi-Cal , whose births were paid for by taxpayers.
5. Nearly 35% of all inmates in California detention centers are Mexican nationals here illegally
6. Over 300,000 illegal aliens in Los Angeles County are living in garages.
7. The FBI reports half of all gang members in Los Angeles are most likely illegal aliens from south of the border.
8. Nearly 60% of all occupants of HUD properties are illegal.
9. 21 radio stations in L. A. are Spanish speaking.
10. In L.A. County, 5.1 million people speak English, 3.9 million speak Spanish.

Less than 2% of illegal aliens are picking our crops, but 29% are on welfare. Over 70% of the United States ' annual population growth (and over 90% of California , Florida , and New York) results from immigration. 29% of inmates in federal prisons are illegal aliens. We are a bunch of fools for letting this continue.

HOW CAN YOU HELP? Send copies of this letter to at least two other people. 100 would be even better. This is only one State..... If this doesn't open your eyes nothing will! And you wonder why Nancy Pelosi wants them to become voters!

20080821-02	11:29	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/20/08; "McCain Unsure How Many Houses He Owns"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Now, Johnny Boy, I don't consider it bad, or arrogant, or elitist to be rich. But to not be able to count to 4 (or 7) is a little bit ridiculous, even for somebody of your advanced age, don't you think? And I still find it odd that, with your allegedly vast experience, you would assert that it takes $5,000,000 to be rich, even if you have since retracted this "mistake".

You are a pompous, mean-tempered, corrupt, elitist, out-of-touch, lying fraud, John McCain!!!!!!!!!! Please do America a favor and go home to one of your 4?, 7?, many? houses and stay there! McCain unsure how many houses he owns

"McCain Unsure How Many Houses He Owns" by Jonathan Martin and Mike Allen, Politico

Aug. 21, 2008, (<http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0808/12685.html>)

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that he was uncertain how many houses he and his wife, Cindy, own.

"I think—I'll have my staff get to you," McCain told Politico in Las Cruces, N.M. "It's condominiums where—I'll have them get to you."

The correct answer is at least four, located in Arizona, California and Virginia, according to his staff. Newsweek estimated this summer that the couple owns at least seven properties.

In recent weeks, Democrats have stepped up their effort to caricature McCain as living an outlandishly rich lifestyle—a bit of payback to the GOP for portraying Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) as an elitist, and for turning the spotlight in 2004 on the five homes owned by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry.

Pro-Obama labor groups have sent out mailers highlighting McCain's wealth, and prominent Democrats have included references to it in comments to reporters.

Twice in the past two weeks, those Democrats have focused on McCain's houses.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) told Politico's Ben Smith that it was McCain "who wears $500 shoes, has six houses and comes from one of the richest families in his state."

And David Axelrod, Obama's chief strategist, referred in an interview with Adam Nagourney of The New York Times to an imagined meeting of McCain strategists "on the portico of the McCain estate in Sedona—or maybe in one of his six other houses."

McCain's comments came four days after he initially told Pastor Rick Warren during a faith forum on Sunday his threshold for considering someone rich is $5 million—a careless comment he quickly corrected.

In the interview, McCain did not offer an alternate number, but had a new answer ready.

"I define rich in other ways besides income," he said. "Some people are wealthy and rich in their lives and their children and their ability to educate them. Others are poor if they're billionaires."

McCain, by anyone's measure, is well-off, if you account for his wife's fortune. Cindy McCain inherited control of her father's beer distributorship, the largest in Arizona, and has an estimated worth of more than $100 million.

(Carrie Budoff Brown and Ben Smith contributed to this article.)

20080821-03	12:12	SteveM	Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

Yeah, I really want Pelosi and Reid and BHO running the show for me, think about it! The Democrats purport that they are for the little guy, the poor guy, but look at the taxes for the lower incomes at 30K!

Both democratic candidates will return to the higher tax rates It is amazing how many people that fall into the categories above think Bush is screwing them and Bill Clinton was the greatest President ever. If Obama or Hillary are elected, they both say they will repeal the Bush tax cuts and a good portion of the people that fall into the categories above can't wait for it to happen. This is like the movie The Sting with Paul Newman; you scam somebody out of some money and they don't even know what happened Political correctness is a doctrine, fostered by a delusional, illogical minority, and rabidly promoted by an unscrupulous mainstream media, which holds forth the proposition that it is entirely possible to pick up a turd by the clean end. [There's that turd again. —SteveB]

Taxes... Whether Democrat or a Republican you will find these statistics enlightening and amazing. [If you don't believe the charts below, go to the link below and figure the amounts out yourself!]

<http://www.taxfoundation.org/publications/show/151.html>

	Taxes under Clinton 1999	Taxes under Bush 2008
Single making 30K	$8,400	$4,500
Single making 50K	$14,000	$12,500
Single making 75K	$23,250	$18,750
Married making 60K	$16,800	$9,000
Married making 75K	$21,000	$18,750
Married making 125K	$38,750	$31,250

[Not amazing at all. The Bush Tax Cuts are part of the cause of our problems. —SteveB]

20080821-04 12:18 SteveM Fw: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveB,

You think the war in Iraq is costing us too much? Read below.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Boy, am I confused. I have been hammered with the propaganda that it is the Iraq war and the war on terror that is bankrupting us. I now find that to be RIDICULOUS. I hope the following 14 reasons are forwarded over and over again until they are read so many times that the reader gets sick of reading them. I have included the URL's for verification of all the following facts:

1. $11 Billion to $22 billion is spent on welfare to illegal aliens each year by state governments. Verify at: <http://tinyurl.com/zob77>
2. $2.2 Billion dollars a year is spent on food assistance programs such as food stamps, WIC, and free school lunches for illegal aliens. Verify at: <http://www.cis.org/articles/2004/fiscalexec.html>
3. $2.5 Billion dollars a year is spent on Medicaid for illegal aliens. Verify at: <http://www.cis.org/articles/2004/fiscalexec.html>
4. $12 Billion dollars a year is spent on primary and secondary school education for children here illegally and they cannot speak a word of English! Verify at: <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0604/01/ldt.0.html>
5. $17 Billion dollars a year is spent for education for the American-born children of illegal aliens, known as anchor babies. Verify at <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0604/01/ldt.01.html>
6. $3 Million Dollars a DAY is spent to incarcerate illegal aliens. Verify at <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0604/01/ldt.01.html>
7. 30% percent of all Federal Prison inmates are illegal aliens. Verify at: <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0604/01/ldt.01.html>

8. $90 Billion Dollars a year is spent on illegal aliens for Welfare & Social services by the American taxpayers. Verify at: <http://premium.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0610/29/ldt.01.html>

9. $200 Billion Dollars a year in suppressed American wages are caused by the illegal aliens. Verify at: <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0604/01/ldt.01.html>

10. The illegal aliens in the United States have a crime rate that's two and a half times that of white non-illegal aliens. In particular, their children are going to make a huge additional crime problem in the U.S. Verify at: <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0606/12/ldt.01.html>

11. During the year of 2005 there were 4 to 10 MILLION illegal aliens that crossed our Southern Border, also as many as 19,500 illegal aliens from Terrorist Countries. Millions of pounds of drugs, cocaine, meth, heroin and marijuana crossed into the U.S. from the Southern Border. Verify at: Homeland Security Report: <http://tinyurl.com/t9sht>

12. The National Policy Institute "estimated that the total cost of mass deportation would be between $206 and $230 billion or an average cost of between $41 and $46 billion annually over a five year period." Verify at: <http://www.nationalpolicyinstitute.org/pdf/deportation.pdf>

13. In 2006 illegal aliens sent home $45 BILLION in remittances back to their countries of origin. Verify at: <http://www.rense.com/general75/niht.htm>

14. "The Dark Side of Illegal Immigration: Nearly One Million Sex Crimes committed by Illegal Immigrants in the United States." Verify at: <http://www.drdsk.com/articleshtml>

The total cost is a whopping $338.3 BILLION DOLLARS A YEAR.

Are we THAT stupid? If this doesn't bother you then just delete the message. If, on the other hand, if it does raise the hair on the back of your neck, I hope you forward it to every legal resident in the country including every representative in Washington, D.C.—five times a week for as long as it takes to restore some semblance of intelligence in our policies and enforcement thereof.

20080821-05 13:26 SteveB Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveM,

And Johnny Boy wants to do more for illegal aliens by giving them amnesty and letting a lot more into the country because he needs maids and gardeners for all his houses! And who knows what the cost of going to war with Russia would be. $Trillions?

20080821-06 15:06 SteveM Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveB,

Wrong, McCain got my message after he reached across the isle (unlike BHO) to Teddy Kennedy to get something done. He gave away too much in making the deal and got the message from me and other, and backed off. Haven't you been listen He admitted he made a mistake. Stop talking and you might here more,

[Hilarious! Thanks, SteveM. —SteveB]

20080821-07 16:16 SteveB Re: Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton

Dear SteveM,

Let me ask you this...and remember that no one dislikes the Clintons more than I do (except maybe Monica, Jennifer, Kathleen, and Christopher Hitchens)...why was the country so much better off at the end of Clinton's administration than we are at the end of idiot Bush's?

What a terrible waste and disappointment Bush, Cheney, McCain, and all the rest have been! Clinton was a better President getting his d*ck s*cked than idiot Bush or senile McCain could ever be (doing without)!

20080821-08 19:12 SteveB Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveM,

If this is all the Democrats' fault...where was idiot Bush's veto and his veto sustaining portion of Congress in all this? Almost nowhere to be seen! Where was McCain? Voting on the side of whoever paid him off!

20080821-09 19:44 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

McCain has now totally flip-flopped on his senile pledge to serve only one lame-duck term as President, if elected.

The reason? The latest polling shows that only 8% of the electorate would vote for McCain only if he will disavow running for a second term; while 10% say they would NOT vote for him if he is just going to be a lame-duck single-term President.

But, of course, your ambition to be President has nothing to do with your motives, right, Johnny Boy? The country be damned!

My God, I can't even imagine what that wasteland you call a mind will be like in 4 months, or 4 years, let alone 8 years, you senile a*s-wipe.

20080821-10 20:22 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08—Bonus

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

This is one that I am getting very sick of.

McCain's primary qualification for being President: he was a POW.

Why Obama doesn't love America or put America first: he wasn't a POW.

Why it's OK for McCain to be so rich and out-of-touch with most Americans that he doesn't even know how many homes he owns: he was a POW.

It was wonderful today seeing the McCain campaign going berserk today trying to attack Obama and defend McCain (he was a POW, you know) on his senile moment of being so rich he doesn't even know how many homes he owns!!!! I just loved it.

But, Johnny Boy, having been a total failure as a soldier in a war that has no relationship to the modern world (that you can find) is neither a qualification to be President nor an excuse for knowing nothing about ordinary economics. Not that it qualifies you as an expert on foreign policy either, which you have proven that you are not, and, in fact, you have instead proven that you would be a danger to your country and the world if you were President.

Lord, save us from this piece of floating cr*p (even if he was a POW)!

20080821-11 22:55 SteveM Re: Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton

Dear SteveB,

You have to f*cking ask?

Clinton had a Republican Congress that was smart enough to not spend and Clinton didn't do anything about Immigration so now we are in the 16th year of the invasion. Clinton also didn't do anything about the first world Trade center bombing, the U.S.S. Cole or the Embassy bombing.. How much different would the U.S. be had Clinton spent the money on getting bin laden then. Clinton gutted the CIA and the Military. SEE WHAT IT GOT US! [Ummmmm...PEACE??? — SteveB]

You also seem to forget the mortgage melt down and high interest rates from 92 to 99/2000. My house in California was worth half of what I bought it for at one point in the nineties and 45 percent of my neighborhood was foreclosed HUD houses.

What Planet were you living on then?

Political correctness is a doctrine, fostered by a delusional, illogical minority, and rabidly promoted by an unscrupulous mainstream media, which holds forth the proposition that it is entirely possible to pick up a turd by the clean end.

20080821-12 23:44 SteveM Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveB,

Wrong again. McCain went against Bush many times because he wanted spending cuts BUT even you have to admit the problems have become and will remain worse with Pelosi and Reed. Go back and review the email regarding the cost of ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION, 16 years of neglect. AND IF YOU REALLY want to SEE the costs spent some time in any border county (PHX is not one of them). But then Congress doesn't want to be called Xenophobes or Racist if we enforce the existing laws we don't need inactions waiting for new ones. But Pelosi and Reeds hands are apparently quicker than your eye. Hating Bush and calling him manes is backward looking. What are some old women who remembers all the bad stuff and brings it up during the argument? YOU NEED TO LOOK FORWARD if you want to solve the problems and recent past experience says Pelosi Reed and BHO will only f*ck it up worse. Like it or not, McCain has been right on many levels and issues. Deal with it!

20080821-13 23:47 Dennis Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08—Bonus

from SteveB:

But, Johnny Boy, having been a total failure as a soldier in a war that has no relationship to the modern world...

Dear SteveB,

During my Vietnam tour last year we went by small boat though the maze of canals in the thick tangle of vegetation of the Mekong Delta. I kept thinking, when not singing to myself the "Vietnam Rag" by Country Joe McDonald ["It's one, two, three—what are we fightin' for." —SteveB], that it would have been pure hell serving on a swift boat. If anyone was a hero in Vietnam, Kerry and all those guys certainly were just for surviving that ordeal.

Later, I walked around the lake in the middle of Hanoi where McCain plopped after having his a*s shot out of the sky while bombing the city. It seemed to me that being a pilot bombing civilians from several thousand feet was not exactly heroic (actually, cowardly may not be too strong a word for it). Okay, so he survived a dingy hell hole of a cell for five years. An accomplishment, to be sure, but at least no one was shooting at him.

The bottom line is that neither of those Vietnam experiences qualify either Kerry or McCain for any political office.

20080822-01 09:52 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/21/08—Bonus

Dear Dennis,

I couldn't agree more. That's why it irks me so much that he calls himself a hero and acts like nobody dare challenge him. As you say, an accomplishment, yes, but not something that qualifies him as a hero or a Presidential candidate in any way. (I guess, unless the President were captured and held hostage by Columbian guerrillas or Iran or Osama bin Laden.)

20080822-02 09:56 SteveB Re: Income Taxes: Lower Under Bush Than Clinton

Dear SteveM,

None of this diatribe makes anything I said above any less true!

20080822-03 09:58 SteveB Re: The Cost of Illegal Immigration

Dear SteveM,

Again, none of this diatribe makes anything I said above any less true. Bush and McCain have done nothing but CAUSE problems for almost 8 years and have done nothing to solve them. They are so obviously the problem, not the solution!

20080822-04 18:58 D. Plouffe Keeping Track

Dear SteveB:

If somebody asked you, you probably wouldn't have to think about it.

But when a reporter asked John McCain how many houses he owns, he stumbled and said, "I think—I'll have my staff get back to you." If you're like the millions of people who are struggling to keep up with their mortgage, you might have a different perspective.

Not only does John McCain have trouble keeping track of all his houses, he looks at record gas prices and a crippling foreclosure crisis and thinks the economy is fundamentally "strong." And last weekend he said anyone making less than $5 million a year isn't rich.

This is the side of John McCain his campaign wants to hide.

So yesterday, we launched a TV ad to show everyone how out-of-touch John McCain is with the economic realities of regular Americans. But if we're going to get the truth out, it's going to take all of us working together to make it happen.

The more we hear from John McCain about the economy, the more we see just how out-of-touch he is. You don't have to be an economist to understand that we can't afford eight more years, or four more years, or even one more year of the same failed economic policies that George Bush has put in place. If John McCain understood what Americans are dealing with, he'd know that we need to be doing more.

Barack has a plan to cut taxes for middle class families by $1,000 and offer students who perform community service a $4,000 tax break to pay for college tuition. But John McCain's tax plan does nothing for 101 million middle class families. Barack will set the minimum wage to rise with inflation. But John McCain is more concerned about making sure limits on campaign contributions rise with inflation—and he's voted against raising the minimum wage 19 times. That's a difference that should be easy to remember. Thanks for your help.

David Plouffe, Campaign Manager, Obama for America

Paid for by Obama for America.

20080822-05 19:44 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/22/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

For how long has Obama been calling for a responsible time-table for withdrawal of troops from Iraq and Iraq standing on its own two feet? And how long has McCain blustered and practically called him a traitor for wanting to perform the stated will of the American people?

Now, what has Coldoleezza Rice apparently negotiated in Baghdad? Could it be a...time-table, Johnny Boy, you war-mongering piece of cr*p? Looks like your famous "vast foreign policy experience" doesn't lead you in the right direction any more than your senility leads you to know how many houses you own.

Or maybe Bush and Rice and all the rest of the U.S. are ignorant, inexperienced traitors too? Come to think of it...what could they possibly know...hardly any of them were ever POW's like you were, Johnny Boy. And that's what makes you so smart and holier-than-thou, right, Mr. Patriot?

20080822-06 23:04 S. Schale 10 New Offices: Florida Campaign for Change

Dear SteveB:

As the convention kicks off next week in Denver with the theme of One Nation, the Florida Campaign for Change is opening the doors of ten new offices. We're inviting you to come and celebrate by uniting your communities in our campaign to change America.

Every day, more Floridians are embracing our campaign's message of change, but we need you to help keep the momentum going.

You—our supporters and volunteers—are the backbone of this movement, and these new offices will give you more access to the tools you need to change America.

Find your local office opening, meet fellow supporters, and grow our movement for change.

With Election Day less than 75 days away, now is the time to introduce people in your community to this campaign and Barack's message of change. Face-to-face contact is the best way to bring new people into the political process, and our new offices are a great way to get started.

No previous political experience is required to attend an opening and get involved—just a passion for this movement and a hunger for change.

Come join us this week at one of our new offices and learn how you can help us inspire more Floridians to join Barack's cause.

We look forward to seeing you this week. Thanks,

Steve Schale, Florida State Director, Obama for America

Paid for by Obama for America

20080823-01 08:21 SteveM Fw: Did You Know About This? Iraq, Media

[Source (and purpose) of original email unknown. Notice the bad ol' media again. Also, when we pulled out at the end of 2011, the country instantly became unstable. Bad, bad war. Stupid in the extreme! They were our counter-weight to Iran and Syria. Saddam was. Stupid Bush. —SteveB]

Did you know about this ? ? ? Did you know? I didn't know! How could we?

Did you know:

1. 47 countries' have reestablished their embassies in Iraq ?
2. The Iraqi government currently employs 1.2 million Iraqi people?
3. 3100 schools have been renovated, 364 schools are under rehabilitation, 263 new schools are now under construction; and 38 new schools have been completed in Iraq ?
4. Iraq 's higher educational structure consists of 20 Universities, 46 Institutes or colleges and 4 research centers, All currently operating?
5. 25 Iraq students departed for the United States in Jan., 2005 for the reestablished Fulbright program?
6. The Iraqi Navy is operational? They have 5—100-foot patrol craft,34 smaller vessels and a naval infantry regiment.
7. Iraq's Air Force consists of three operational squadrons, Which includes 9 reconnaissance and 3 US C-130 transport aircraft (under Iraqi operational control) which operate day and night, and will soon add 16 UH-1 helicopters and 4 Bell Jet Rangers?
8. Iraq has a counter-terrorist unit and a Commando Battalion?
9. The Iraqi Police Service has over 55,000 fully trained and equipped police officers?
10. There are 5 Police Academies in Iraq that produce over 3500 new officers every 8 weeks?
11. There are more than 1100 building projects going on in Iraq ? They include 364 schools, 67 public clinics, 15 hospitals, 83 railroad stations, 22 oil facilities, 93 water facilities And 69 electrical facilities.
12. 96% of Iraqi children under the age of 5 have received the first 2 series of polio vaccinations?
13. 4.3 million Iraqi children were enrolled in primary school by mid October?
14. There are 1,192,000 cell phone subscribers in Iraq and phone use has gone up 158%?
15. Iraq has an independent media that consists of 75 radio stations, 180 newspapers and 10 television stations?
16. The Baghdad Stock Exchange opened in June of 2004?
17. Two candidates in the Iraqi presidential election had a Televised debate recently?

OF COURSE WE DIDN'T KNOW! WHY DIDN'T WE KNOW? BECAUSE OUR MEDIA WON'T TELL US!

Instead of reflecting our love for our country, we get photos of flag burning incidents at Abu Ghraib and people throwing snowballs at the presidential motorcades. Tragically, the lack of accentuating the positive in Iraq serves two purposes: It is intended to undermine the world's perception of the United States thus minimizing consequent support; and it is intended to discourage American citizens.

Above facts are verifiable on the Department of Defense web site: <http://www.defenselink.mil/>

Did you know? I didn't know But I know now.....Pass it on! Give it a Wide Dissemination

20080823-02	12:23	SteveB	Re: Did You Know About This? Iraq, Media
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveM,

What took so freakin' long? I would have thought all this stuff would have been accomplished by the time Bush and McCain told us the bold-faced lie that the mission had been accomplished. LOL!

Then it's about damn time to do the will of the majority of Americans and bring home the troops!!!

20080823-03	12:43	SteveB	Barack Obama's Birth Certificate: The Evidence
-------------	-------	--------	--

[I deleted most of the rabid, racist, birther emails from 2008, unfortunately, perhaps, but I kept this. —SteveB]

"Born in the U.S.A.: The Truth About Obama's Birth Certificate" by Jess Henig, FactCheck.org

Aug. 21, 2008, (<http://factcheck.org/2008/08/born-in-the-usa/>)

Summary

In June, the Obama campaign released a digitally scanned image of his birth certificate to quell speculative charges that he might not be a natural-born citizen. But the image prompted more blog based skepticism about the document's authenticity. And recently, author Jerome Corsi, whose book attacks Obama, said in a TV interview that the birth certificate the campaign has is "fake." We beg to differ. FactCheck.org staffers have now seen, touched, examined and photographed the original birth certificate. We conclude that it meets all of the requirements from the State Department for proving U.S. citizenship. Claims that the document lacks a raised seal or a signature are false. We have posted high-resolution photographs of the document as "supporting documents" to this article. Our conclusion: Obama was born in the U.S.A. just as he has always said.

Update, Nov. 1: The director of Hawaii's Department of Health confirmed Oct. 31 that Obama was born in Honolulu.

Analysis

Update Nov. 1: The Associated Press quoted Chiyome Fukino as saying that both she and the registrar of vital statistics, Alvin Onaka, have personally verified that the health department holds Obama's original birth certificate.

Fukino also was quoted by several other news organizations. The Honolulu Advertiser quoted Fukino as saying the agency had been bombarded by requests, and that the registrar of statistics had even been called in at home in the middle of the night.

Honolulu Advertiser, Nov. 1 2008: "This has gotten ridiculous," state health director Dr. Chiyome Fukino said yesterday. "There are plenty of other, important things to focus on, like the economy, taxes, energy."

Will this be enough to quiet the doubters? "I hope so," Fukino said. "We need to get some work done."

Fukino said she has "personally seen and verified that the Hawaii State Department of Health has Sen. Obama's original birth certificate on record in accordance with state policies and procedures."

Update, Apr. 27, 2011: The White House released the long-form version of President Barack Obama's birth certificate, confirming (yet again) that he was born in the United States. The Hawaii Department of Health made an exception in Obama's case and issued copies of the "Certificate of Live Birth."

Since we first wrote about Obama's birth certificate on June 16, speculation on his citizenship has continued apace. Some claim that Obama posted a fake birth certificate to his Web page. That charge leaped from the blogosphere to the mainstream media earlier this week when Jerome Corsi, author of a book attacking Obama, repeated the claim in an Aug. 15 interview with Steve Doocy on Fox News.

Corsi: Well, what would be really helpful is if Senator Obama would release primary documents like his birth certificate. The campaign has a false, fake birth certificate posted on their website. How is anybody supposed to really piece together his life?

Doocy: What do you mean they have a "false birth certificate" on their Web site?

Corsi: The original birth certificate of Obama has never been released, and the campaign refuses to release it.

Doocy: Well, couldn't it just be a State of Hawaii-produced duplicate?

Corsi: No, it's a—there's been good analysis of it on the Internet, and it's been shown to have watermarks from Photoshop. It's a fake document that's on the Web site right now, and the original birth certificate the campaign refuses to produce.

Corsi isn't the only skeptic claiming that the document is a forgery. Among the most frequent objections we saw on forums, blogs and e-mails are:

1. The birth certificate doesn't have a raised seal.
2. It isn't signed.
3. No creases from folding are evident in the scanned version.
4. In the zoomed-in view, there's a strange halo around the letters.
5. The certificate number is blacked out.
6. The date bleeding through from the back seems to say "2007," but the document wasn't released until 2008.
7. The document is a "certification of birth," not a "certificate of birth."

Recently FactCheck representatives got a chance to spend some time with the birth certificate, and we can attest to the fact that it is real and three-dimensional and resides at the Obama headquarters in Chicago. We can assure readers that the certificate does bear a raised seal, and that it's stamped on the back by Hawaii state registrar Alvin T. Onaka (who uses a signature stamp rather than signing individual birth certificates). We even brought home a few photographs:

CERTIFICATION OF LIVE BIRTH

STATE OF HAWAII
HONOLULU

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH
HAWAII, U.S.A.

CERTIFICATE NO. 151 1961 - 010641

CHILD'S NAME
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA II

DATE OF BIRTH
August 4, 1961

HOUR OF BIRTH
7:24 PM

SEX
MALE

CITY, TOWN OR LOCATION OF BIRTH
HONOLULU

ISLAND OF BIRTH
OAHU

COUNTY OF BIRTH
HONOLULU

MOTHER'S MAIDEN NAME
STANLEY ANN DUNHAM

MOTHER'S RACE
CAUCASIAN

FATHER'S NAME
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA

FATHER'S RACE
AFRICAN

DATE FILED BY REGISTRAR
August 8, 1961

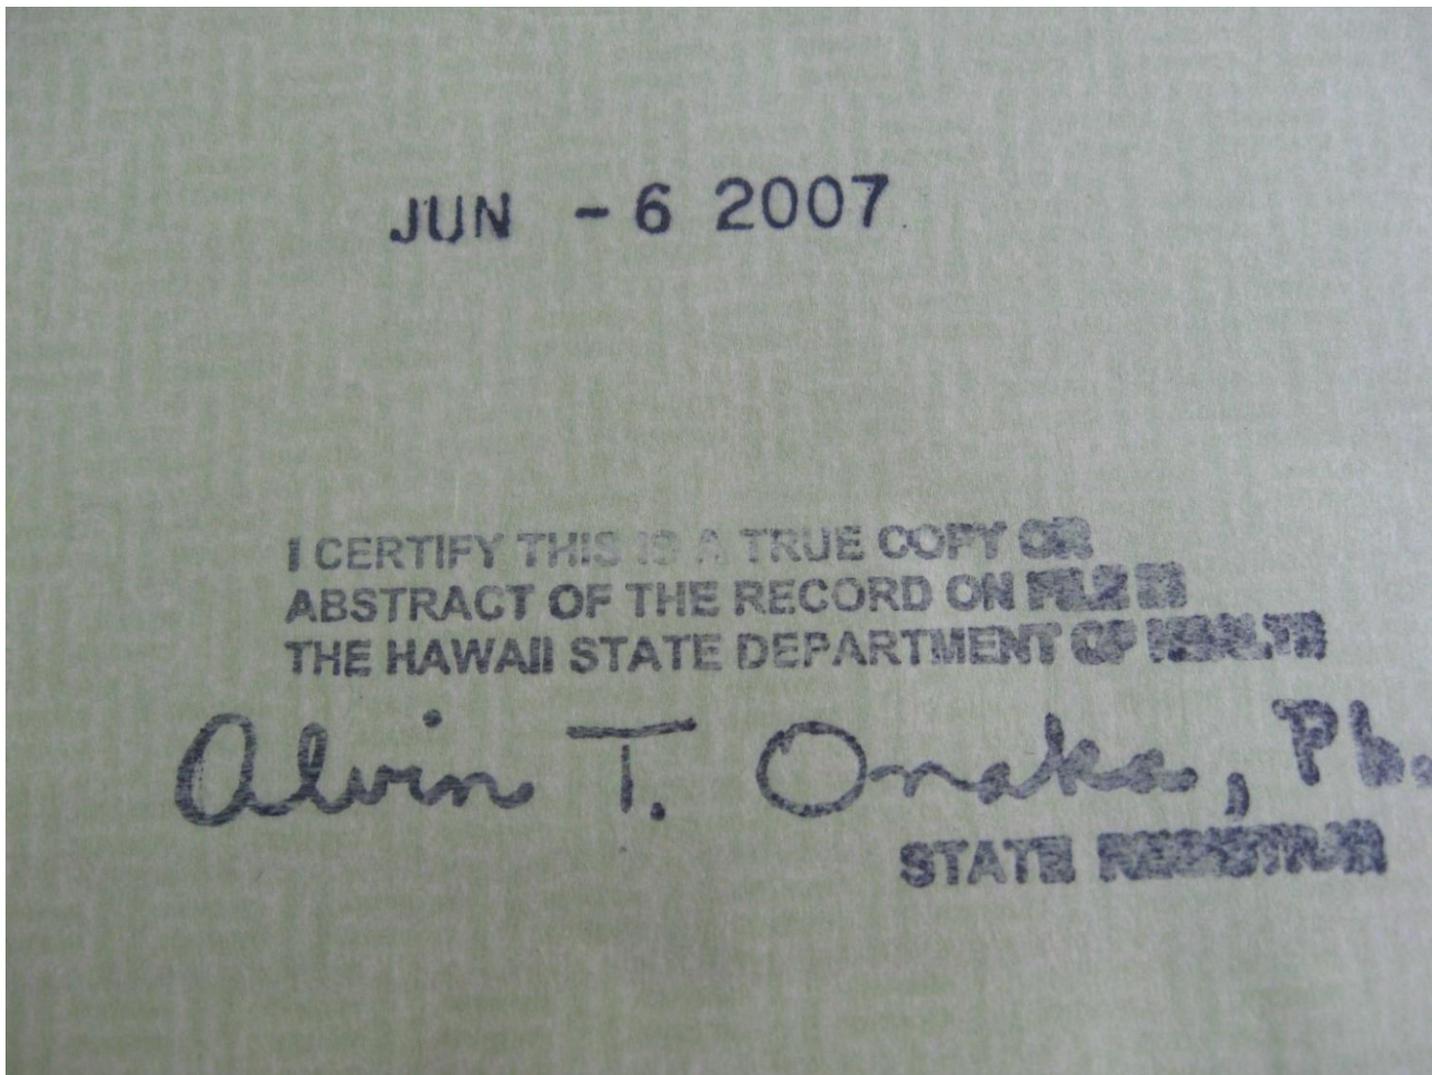

This copy serves as prima facie evidence of the fact of birth in any court proceeding. (HRS 33A-12b), 33A-15)

DHSM 1.1 (Rev. 11/01) LASER

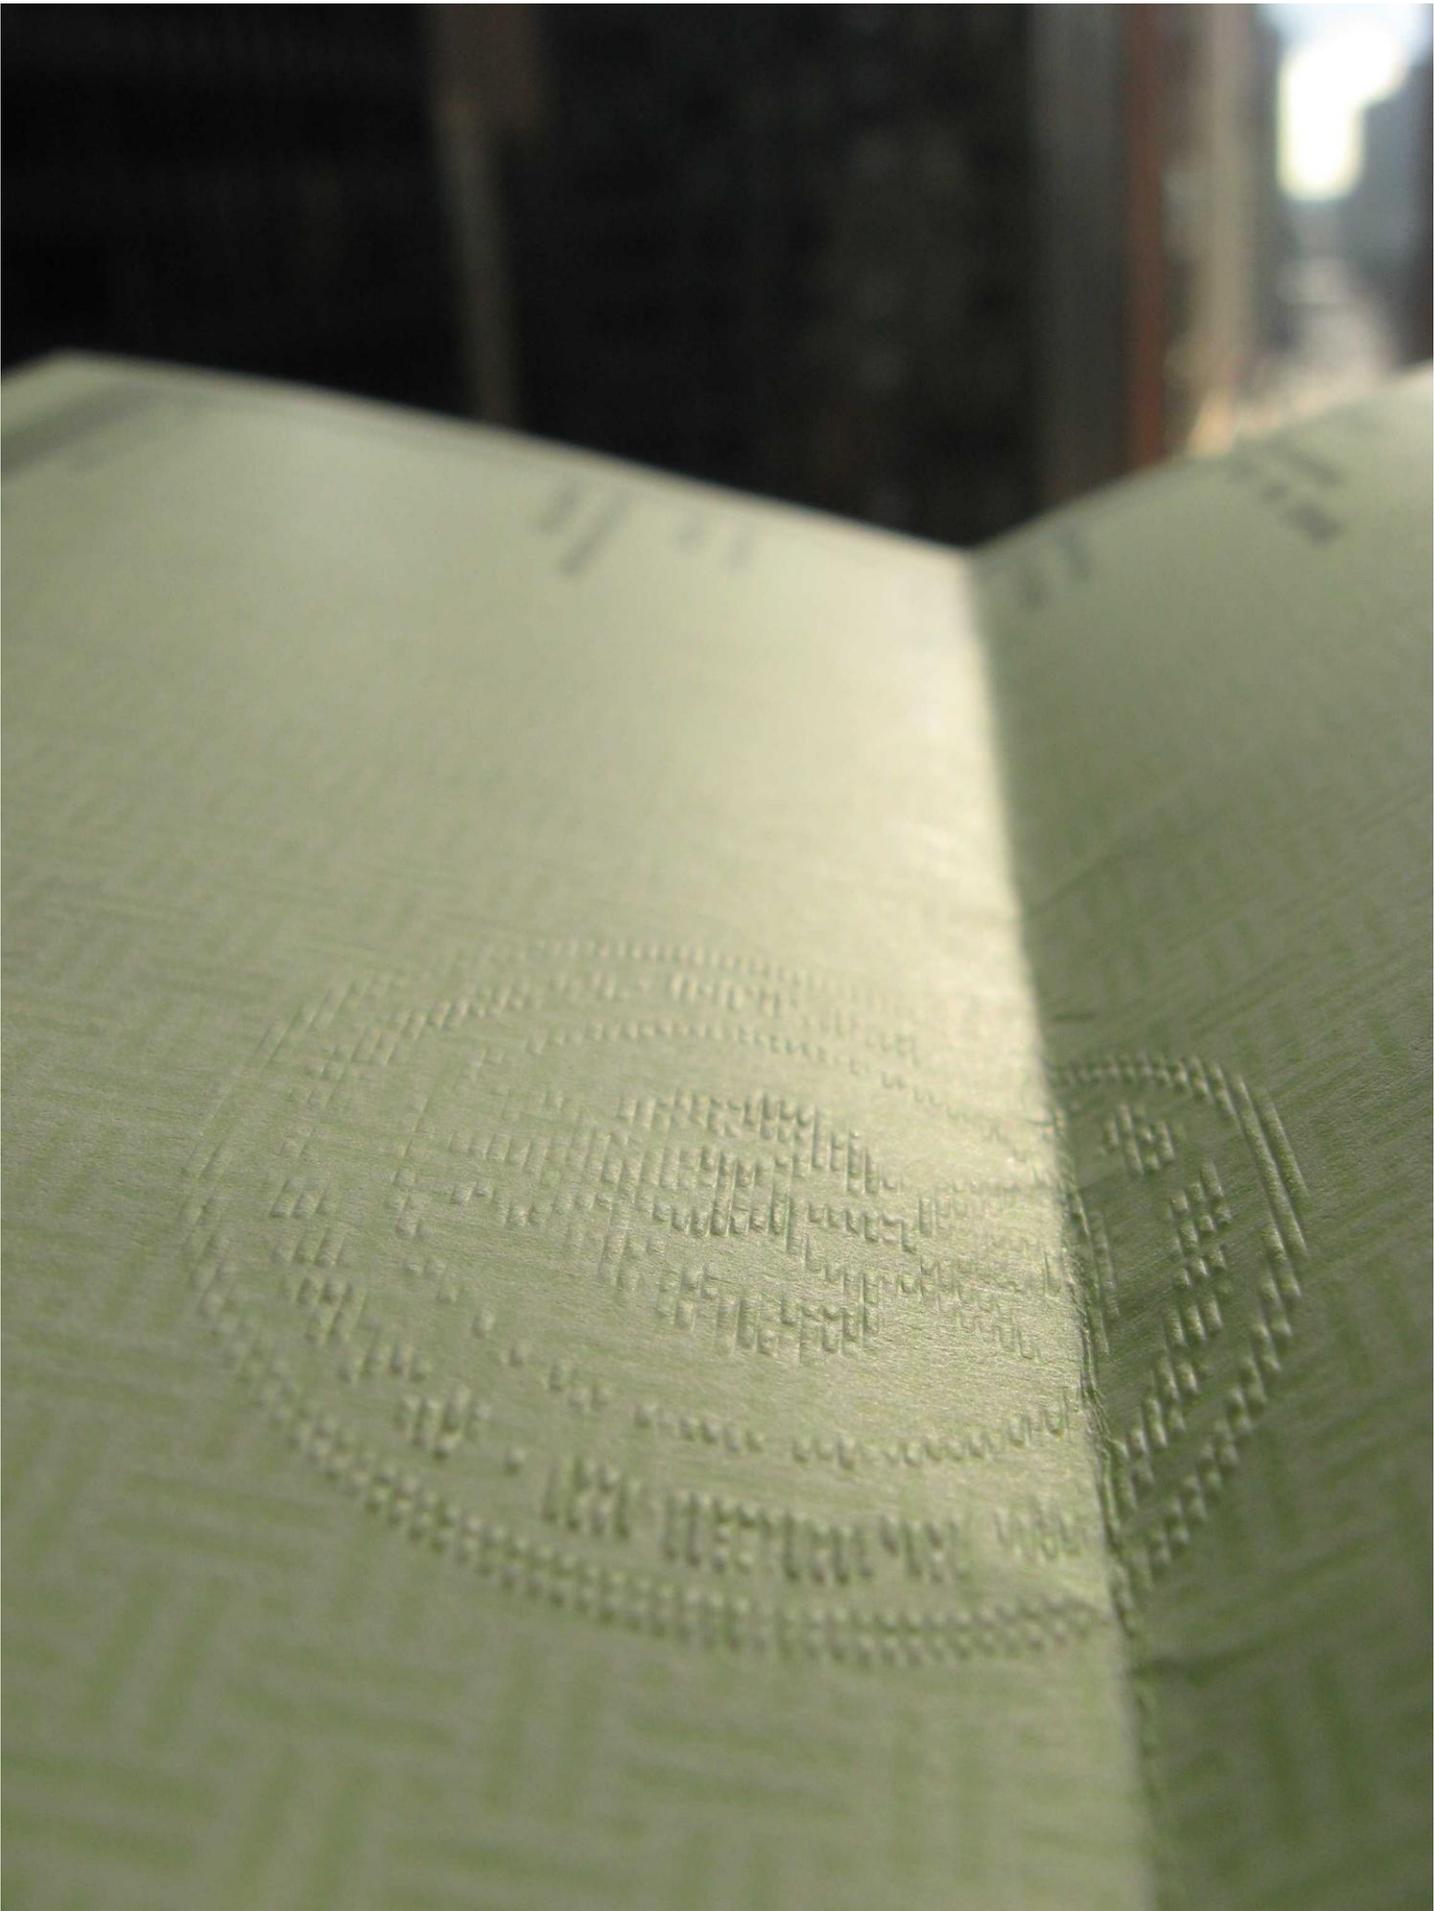

ANY ALTERATIONS VOID

CERTIFICATE

The Obama birth certificate, held by FactCheck writer Joe Miller.

Alvin T. Onaka's signature stamp.

The raised seal.

CERTIFICATION OF LIVE BIRTH

STATE OF HAWAII
HONOLULU

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH
HAWAII U.S.A.

CERTIFICATE NO. 151 1961 - 010641

CHILD'S NAME
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA II

DATE OF BIRTH
August 4, 1961

HOUR OF BIRTH
7:24 PM

SEX
MALE

CITY, TOWN OR LOCATION OF BIRTH
HONOLULU

ISLAND OF BIRTH
OAHU

COUNTY OF BIRTH
HONOLULU

MOTHER'S MAIDEN NAME
STANLEY ANN DUNHAM

MOTHER'S RACE
CAUCASIAN

FATHER'S NAME
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA

FATHER'S RACE
AFRICAN

DATE FILED BY REGISTRAR
August 8, 1961

These photos haven't been edited in any way.

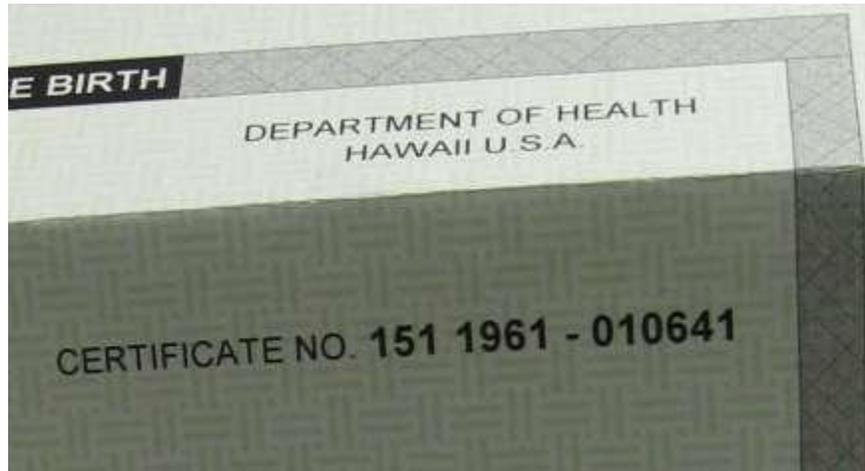

The certificate has all the elements the State Department requires for proving citizenship to obtain a U.S. passport:

"Your full name, the full name of your parent(s), date and place of birth, sex, date the birth record was filed, and the seal or other certification of the official custodian of such records." The names, date and place of birth, and filing date are all evident on the scanned version, and you can see the seal above.

The document is a "certification of birth," also known as a short-form birth certificate. The long form is drawn up by the hospital and includes additional information such as birth weight and parents' hometowns. The short form is printed by the state and draws from a database with fewer details. The Hawaii Department of Health's birth record request form does not give the option to request a photocopy of your long-form birth certificate, but their short form has enough information to be acceptable to the State Department. We tried to ask the Hawaii DOH why they only offer the short form, among other questions, but they have not given a response.

The scan released by the campaign shows halos around the black text, making it look (to some) as though the text might have been pasted on top of an image of security paper. But the document itself has no such halos, nor do the close-up photos we took of it. We conclude that the halo seen in the image produced by the campaign is a digital artifact from the scanning process.

We asked the Obama campaign about the date stamp and the blacked-out certificate number. The certificate is stamped June 2007, because that's when Hawaii officials produced it for the campaign, which requested that document and "all the records we could get our hands on" according to spokesperson Shauna Daly. The campaign didn't release its copy until 2008, after speculation began to appear on the Internet questioning Obama's citizenship. The campaign then rushed to release the document, and the rush is responsible for the blacked-out certificate number. Says Shauna: "[We] couldn't get someone on the phone in Hawaii to tell us whether the number represented some secret information, and we erred on the side of blacking it out. Since then we've found out it's pretty irrelevant for the outside world." The document we looked at did have a certificate number; it is 151 1961-010641.

Blowup of certificate number

Some of the conspiracy theories that have circulated about Obama are quite imaginative. One conservative blogger suggested that the campaign might have obtained a valid Hawaii birth certificate, soaked it in solvent, then reprinted it with Obama's information. Of course, this anonymous blogger didn't have access to the actual document and presents this as just one possible "scenario" without any evidence that such a thing actually happened or is even feasible.

We also note that so far none of those questioning the authenticity of the document have produced a shred of evidence that the information on it is incorrect. Instead, some speculate that somehow, maybe, he was born in another country and doesn't meet the Constitution's requirement that the president be a "natural-born citizen."

We think our colleagues at PolitiFact.com, who also dug into some of these loopy theories put it pretty well: "It is possible that Obama conspired his way to the precipice of the world's biggest job, involving a vast network of people and government agencies over decades of lies. Anything's possible. But step back and look at the overwhelming evidence to the contrary and your sense of what's reasonable has to take over."

In fact, the conspiracy would need to be even deeper than our colleagues realized. In late July, a researcher looking to dig up dirt on Obama instead found a birth announcement that had been published in the Honolulu Advertiser on Aug. 13, 1961:

91-939 Kalapu St., Ewa Beach, Ewa,	—
daughter, Aug. 3.	Al
Mr. and Mrs. Barack H. Obama,	St
6035 Kalanianaʻole Hwy., son, Aug. 4.	Sl
Mr. and Mrs. Norman Asing, 2135	Fr
Ani Aniku St., son, Aug. 4.	Fr
Mr. and Mrs. Andrew A. M.	Fr

Obama's birth announcement

The announcement was posted by a pro-Hillary Clinton blogger who grudgingly concluded that Obama "likely" was born Aug. 4, 1961 in Honolulu.

Of course, it's distantly possible that Obama's grandparents may have planted the announcement just in case their grandson needed to prove his U.S. citizenship in order to run for president someday. We suggest that those who choose to go down that path should first equip themselves with a high-quality tinfoil hat.

The evidence is clear: Barack Obama was born in the U.S.A.

Sources

United States Department of State. "Application for a U.S. Passport." Accessed Aug. 20, 2008.

State of Hawaii Department of Health. "Request for Certified Copy of Birth Record." Accessed Aug. 20, 2008.

Hollyfield, Amy. "Obama's Birth Certificate: Final Chapter." Politifact.com. June 27, 2008, <http://www.newsweek.com/id/154599>.

Below photos X2 from (<http://www.snopes.com/politics/obama/birthcertificate.asp>):

CERTIFICATION OF LIVE BIRTH

STATE OF HAWAII
HONOLULU

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH
HAWAII U.S.A.

CERTIFICATE NO. [REDACTED]

CHILD'S NAME
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA II

DATE OF BIRTH
August 4, 1961

HOUR OF BIRTH
7:24 PM

SEX
MALE

CITY, TOWN OR LOCATION OF BIRTH
HONOLULU

ISLAND OF BIRTH
OAHU

COUNTY OF BIRTH
HONOLULU

MOTHER'S MAIDEN NAME
STANLEY ANN DUNHAM

MOTHER'S RACE
CAUCASIAN

FATHER'S NAME
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA

FATHER'S RACE
AFRICAN

DATE FILED BY REGISTRAR
August 8, 1961

OHSM 1.1 (Rev.11/01) LASER

This copy serves as prima facie evidence of the fact of birth in any court proceeding. [HRS 338-13(b), 338-19]

ANY ALTERATIONS INVALIDATE THIS CERTIFICATE

Short form.

STATE OF HAWAII		CERTIFICATE OF LIVE BIRTH			DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH
				FILE NUMBER	151 61 10611
1a. Child's First Name (Type or print)		1b. Middle Name		1c. Last Name
BARACK		HUSSEIN		OBAMA, II
2. Sex	3. This Birth	4. If Twin or Triplet, Was Child Born		5a. Birth Date	Month Day Year	5b. Hour
Male	Single <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Twin <input type="checkbox"/> Triplet <input type="checkbox"/>	1st <input type="checkbox"/> 2nd <input type="checkbox"/> 3rd <input type="checkbox"/>		August	4, 1961	7:24 P.M.
6a. Place of Birth: City, Town or Rural Location					6b. Island
Honolulu					Oahu
6c. Name of Hospital or Institution (If not in hospital or institution, give street address)				6d. Is Place of Birth Inside City or Town Limits?
Kapiolani Maternity & Gynecological Hospital				If no, give judicial district Yes <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> No <input type="checkbox"/>
7a. Usual Residence of Mother: City, Town or Rural Location			7b. Island	7c. County and State or Foreign Country
Honolulu			Oahu	Honolulu, Hawaii
7d. Street Address				7e. Is Residence Inside City or Town Limits?
6085 Kalaniana'ole Highway				If no, give judicial district Yes <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> No <input type="checkbox"/>
7f. Mother's Mailing Address					7g. Is Residence on a Farm or Plantation?
					Yes <input type="checkbox"/> No <input checked="" type="checkbox"/>
8. Full Name of Father			9. Race of Father
BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA			African 9
10. Age of Father	11. Birthplace (Island, State or Foreign Country)	12a. Usual Occupation		12b. Kind of Business or Industry
25	Kenya, East Africa ✓	Student 0		University 9
13. Full Maiden Name of Mother			14. Race of Mother
STANLEY ANN DUNHAM			Caucasian 1
15. Age of Mother	16. Birthplace (Island, State or Foreign Country)	17a. Type of Occupation Outside Home During Pregnancy		17b. Date Last Worked
18	Wichita, Kansas ✓	None 0		0
I certify that the above stated information is true and correct to the best of my knowledge.		18a. Signature of Parent or Other Informant			18b. Date of Signature
		Stanley Ann Dunham Obama			Parent <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> 8-7-61
I hereby certify that this child was born alive on the date and hour stated above.		19a. Signature of Attendant			19b. Date of Signature
		David A. Smolan			M.D. <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> 8-8-61 D.O. <input type="checkbox"/> Midwife <input type="checkbox"/> Other <input type="checkbox"/>
20. Date Accepted by Local Reg.		21. Signature of Local Registrar			22. Date Accepted by Reg. General
AUG - 8 1961		U. K. Lee			AUG - 8 1961
23. Evidence for Delayed Filing or Alteration

Long form.

20080823-04 12:45 SteveB Re: Barack Obama's Birth Certificate: The Evidence & Other Smears

Dear SteveM,

The rest of the Republican cr*p and smear campaign is all lies too! I'll demonstrate that one-by-one over the coming weeks.

Oh, John McCain, you were a POW, right? Big deal, Johnny Boy, you total failure as a soldier and total failure to your party and to your country!

20080824-01 01:04 Dennis "545 People"

All of this (below) raises the question: Who are the irresponsible people who elect these sorry b*stards? Are Americans just a bunch of spoiled, whining chumps who can't see how they are divided by lies and false promises? Americans may not deserve what they get, but they get what they deserve!

[Snopes.com says it's correctly attributed, but it's been slightly edited over the years. —SteveB]

"545 People" by Charlie Reese, Orlando Sentinel

Mar. 7, 1995, (http://www.fernleynews.com/1400000/545_People.html)

Politicians are the only people in the world who create problems and then campaign against them.

Have you ever wondered why, if both the Democrats and the Republicans are against deficits, we have deficits?

Have you ever wondered why, if all the politicians are against inflation and high taxes, we have inflation and high taxes?

You and I don't propose a federal budget. The President does.

You and I don't have the Constitutional authority to vote on appropriations. The House of Representatives does.

You and I don't write the tax code, Congress does.

You and I don't set fiscal policy, Congress does.

You and I don't control monetary policy, the Federal Reserve Bank does.

One hundred senators, 435 congressmen, one president, and nine Supreme Court justices 545 human beings out of the 300 million are directly, legally, morally, and individually responsible for the domestic problems that plague this country.

I excluded the members of the Federal Reserve Board because that problem was created by the Congress. In 1913, Congress delegated its Constitutional duty to provide a sound currency to a federally chartered, but private, central bank.

I excluded all the special interests and lobbyists for a sound reason. They have no legal authority. They have no ability to coerce a senator, a congressman, or a president to do one cotton-picking thing. I don't care if they offer a politician $1 million dollars in cash. The politician has the power to accept or reject it. No matter what the lobbyist promises, it is the legislator's responsibility to determine how he votes. Those 545 human beings spend much of their energy convincing you that what they did is not their fault. They cooperate in this common con regardless of party.

What separates a politician from a normal human being is an excessive amount of gall. No normal human being would have the gall of a Speaker, who stood up and criticized the President for creating deficits. The president can only propose a budget. He cannot force the Congress to accept it.

The Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, gives sole responsibility to the House of Representatives for originating and approving appropriations and taxes. Who is the speaker of the House? She is the leader of the majority party. She and fellow House members, not the president, can approve any budget they want. If the president vetoes it, they can pass it over his veto if they agree to.

It seems inconceivable to me that a nation of 300 million cannot replace 545 people who stand convicted—by present facts—of incompetence and irresponsibility. I can't think of a single domestic problem that is not traceable directly to those 545 people. When you fully grasp the plain truth that 545 people exercise the power of the federal government, then it must follow that what exists is what they want to exist.

If the tax code is unfair, it's because they want it unfair.

If the budget is in the red, it's because they want it in the red.

If the Marines are in IRAQ , it's because they want them in IRAQ.

If they do not receive social security but are on an elite retirement plan not available to the people, it's because they want it that way.

There are no insoluble government problems.

Do not let these 545 people shift the blame to bureaucrats, whom they hire and whose jobs they can abolish; to lobbyists, whose gifts and advice they can reject; to regulators, to whom they give the power to regulate and from whom they can take this power.

Above all, do not let them con you into the belief that there exists disembodied mystical forces like 'the economy, inflation,' or 'politics' that prevent them from doing what they take an oath to do.

Those 545 people, and they alone, are responsible.

They, and they alone, have the power.

They, and they alone, should be held accountable by the people who are their bosses provided the voters have the gumption to manage their own employees.

We should vote all of them out of office and clean up their mess!

(Charlie Reese is a former columnist of the Orlando Sentinel Newspaper.)

20080824-02 11:41 SteveB Re: 545 People; Government

Dear Dennis,

I like it! Let's do it! Throw the bums out!!!!

20080825-01 21:15 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/25/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

When asked about re-establishing the draft, McCain's answer seemed to be a definite "yes!" A couple of quotes from the policy section of Johnny Boy's website might inform anyone who cares that this guy is such a war-monger that he will never be able to do anything but raise taxes and re-establish the draft in order to fulfill his ambitions, which apparently include challenging the Russians on their own turf. I wonder how he feels about the Chinese? Shame on you, a*s-hole!

As President, John McCain will strengthen the military, shore up our alliances, and ensure that the nation is capable of protecting the homeland, deterring potential military challenges, responding to any crisis that endangers American security, and prevailing in any conflict we are forced to fight.

John McCain believes that the answer to these challenges is not to roll back our overseas commitments. The size and composition of our armed forces must be matched to our nation's defense requirements. As requirements expand in the global war on terrorism so must our Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines, and Coast Guard be reconfigured to meet these new challenges. John McCain thinks it is especially important to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps to defend against the threats we face today.

If Johnny Boy is elected, the country will be bankrupt before his first term could end, and we can only pray that there is no terrible military defeat to go along with it.

20080826-01 10:13 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/26/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

SURPRISE! SURPRISE! On the Tonight Show last night, Johnny Boy defended being so out of touch with the country's economic realities that he STILL doesn't know how many houses he owns. His defense? He was a POW! LOL! How many times and for how many types of senility do you think you can go to that well, idiot?

20080826-02 11:33 SteveB "The Election from Hell" 2008 Election

"The Election from Hell" by John Derbyshire, National Review

Aug. 25, 2008, (<http://www.nationalreview.com/articles/225398/election-hell/john-derbyshire>)

(I won't be watching either of the party conventions.)

How quickly time passes! It has been a mere year and a half since the first candidate debates, and the party conventions are upon us already. Next week, the Democratic-party convention in Denver—"Most Diverse in Party History" boasts the website. The following week, the Republicans in Minneapolis-St. Paul—"Twin Cities Promise Double Fun for GOP."

Fun? Melancholy spectacles both, in this writer's opinion, for this is the most disastrously awful choice Americans have ever been offered for the post of chief executive.

It is true that no election season reaches this point without much grumbling from commentators about the poverty of choice on offer. "Who else have you got?" asks pollee of poller in the famous Paul Conrad cartoon ... which dates from the 1964 campaign. There are grounds to believe that this election's choice is quite exceptionally bad, though.

I can't say that I ever felt much warmth for either John McCain or Barack Obama. The first struck me as a burned-out Senate seat-warmer (term limits! oh please, term limits!) who had shown outstanding courage as a young warrior but considerable wrong-headedness as a politician—a category of persons with which history has, after all, been well supplied. Obama I have never seen as anything but a bag of wind, possessed of great political guile, but steeped in the faddy, solipsistic notions of post-1960s college leftism.

That these two men are much worse than I thought only became apparent to me at the Saddleback interviews conducted by Baptist minister Rick Warren in front of 5,000 of his parishioners. Here the truth came out. These are not merely two different specimens of mediocrity, as is usual in Presidential campaigns; they are two different specimens of love-the-world romantic fantasist.

Perhaps there is at least—I am clutching at straws, dear reader—some tiny element of choice in the fact that McCain and Obama are methodologically different in their desires to spend as much of America's resources as they can get their hands on to lift up foreign peoples in foreign places. In accordance with their youthful experiences, McCain sees the task in warlike terms: "evil must be defeated." To Obama it's more a matter of community organizing: "building public health infrastructure around the world."

Both men are determined to set this planet to rights, though, and hang the cost. Doesn't the United States have infinite resources? Of course it does. Eliminator of All Evil, or Welfare Agency to the World; Brig. Gen. Jack D. Ripper or Albert Schweizer; you just have to choose. Can we afford it? Yes, we can! (That faint sound you hear? That's the clink-clink of devaluing dollars—just ignore it.)

One hardly knows where to start with this gibberish. With eliminating evil, perhaps.

Warren: How about the issue of evil? ... Does evil exist and if so, should we ignore it, negotiate with it, contain it or defeat it?

McCain: Defeat it. ... Of course evil must be defeated ...

Warren didn't raise a peep. This is a Christian church? Hasn't anybody present heard of original sin? The only way to eliminate evil is to eliminate the human race. I wouldn't rule out the possibility that McCain's policies will have that result, but if it's the result he intends, he ought to tell us.

Warren: There are 148 million orphans in the world, 148 million kids growing up without Mommies and Dads. ... Would you be willing to consider and even commit to doing some kind of emergency plan for orphans like President Bush did with AIDS?

Obama: I think it's a great idea. ... I think that part of our plan though has to be how do we prevent more orphans in the first place and that means that we're helping to build the public health infrastructure around the world ...

Heaven forbid that people in Nigeria, Nauru, Norway, or Nicaragua should build their own clinics and hospitals, without any help from Uncle Sam and his limitless bounty! Heaven forbid they should take care of their own orphans, and we of ours!

But then, as John McCain says: "America's greatest moral failure has been, throughout our existence, perhaps we have not devoted ourselves to causes greater than our self-interest." Except, of course, that nations are supposed to devote themselves to their self-interest, and to nothing else. That's what sane people want their nation to do. That's what all the other nations of the world do.

As individual human beings, of course, all but a small minority of us routinely devote ourselves to "causes greater than our self-interest." We gladly yield up our time, our money, and occasionally our very lives, on behalf of such causes—family, union, professional association, church, political party, neighborhood softball league, nation. Those of us who have deep religious convictions often go way beyond the norm, helping strangers in foreign lands. All good acts, all noble acts ... by individual human beings.

A government, however, is not a human being. This rather elementary point of ontology seems to have escaped all three principals in Saturday's gathering. Governments don't go to the bathroom; governments don't date; governments don't catch cold. As a human being, John McCain is free to give up time and money to causes above his personal self-interest, and would be right to feel pleased with himself for having done so. As chief executive of our federal government, however, during his working hours he should attend to America's national self-interest, AND TO NOTHING ELSE AT ALL.

Rick Warren didn't even ask the two men about the Census Bureau report, released two days before, a topic of much commentary. (Though not by me. I had already said what I had to say when the previous report came out in May 2007.) Possibly this omission was in deference to Saddleback's location down there in southern California. Perhaps Pastor Warren feared that if he mentioned demographics, viewers might find themselves wondering if the 5,000 people present at this forum are the last 5,000 left in Orange County who can understand English. More likely Warren just believes, in common with most genteel Americans, including for a certainty both candidates, that only wicked people talk about demographics.

So I won't be watching either of the party conventions. Both parties' choices of nominee are appalling to me. I contemplate the next four years with dread. I don't want either of these men in charge of the federal government, neither the crazy old fool nor the simpering sophomore. I don't want either the moralistic imperialism of John McCain or the welfare-state-to-the-world sentimentalism of Barack Obama. I don't want my country represented by either a Compassionate Crusader or by Oprah Winfrey in drag. (Possibly in person, too, if the rumors we're hearing about Obama's plans for Ms. Winfrey are true.)

Even if I wanted either of them, I do not believe, as both candidates apparently do, that our country has the nigh-infinite fiscal resources required to fund their lunatic world-saving schemes. The effort to rid Iraq of evil has cost us working stiff's a trillion dollars so far; say $7,000 a head. Population-wise, the world has 260 Iraqs. So I'm in for two million bucks? John, hate to tell ya, but I don't have that kind of money. And this is the "conservative" candidate!

What a disaster! What on earth has happened to us? Nothing yet as bad as what will surely happen if either of these two gibbering numbskulls gets his hands on the levers of supreme executive power.

20080827-01	00:32	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/27/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

from MSNBC's First Read:

The McCain campaign may contend that Obama is the "biggest celebrity" in the presidential race, NBC/NJ's Adam Aigner-Treworgy notes, but its candidate has spent most of this week hobnobbing with as many GOP celebrities as his campaign can find.

On Monday, McCain kicked off the Democratic Convention with an endorsement from Puerto Rican Reggaeton star Daddy Yankee. He then hopped on a plane to fly up north for a fundraiser in Sacramento with Patricia Heaton (from "Everybody Loves Raymond") and Arnold Schwarzenegger. Heaton then traveled to Burbank, CA on McCain's Straight Talk Jet Monday afternoon to attend a fundraiser at the Beverly Hilton featuring stars from both big and small screens. Those in attendance included Robert Duvall, Gary Sinise, Stephen Baldwin, Craig T. Nelson, Dean Cain (Lois and Clark), Jon Cryer, and long-time McCain supporter Wilford Brimley.

Then on Tuesday, McCain raised money in his hometown of Phoenix and was introduced by TV and movie star Angie Harmon and her husband, long time NY Giants defensive back Jason Sehorn. Capping off the star-studded start to the week, McCain took a brief afternoon trip to San Diego yesterday, making a surprise appearance at a fundraiser hosted by John Voigt.

Interesting that Paris Hilton is missing, even though one of the fundraisers was held at the Beverly Hilton. Gosh, Johnny Boy, sure looks like you're not out of touch with real Americans, are ya? Not by a long shot, Mr. House-Counter! LOL! I'm disappointed in Daddy Yankee because I kinda like some of his music, though he can't hold a candle to Don Omar.

The funniest McCain supporter, though, has to be Wilford Brimley. He and McCain make for two great old farts. I sure would hate to smell any room that the two of them might inhabit for a while. Can you spell "D-E-P-E-N-D-S"? Maybe Wilford could talk McCain into co-starring in another bad remake of Cocoon. Too bad there's nothing like those aliens yet that can cure, well...s-e-n-i-l-t-y, Johnny Boy!

20080828-01	15:03	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/28/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Yesterday, it was announced that McCain had picked his running mate, but was keeping his decision a secret for now.

Today, he announced that he has not made his choice yet.

Do you think that maybe he just forgot which person he picked??? LOL!

20080829-01	06:55	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/29/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Below, I quote the McCain campaign's senile reply to one of the greatest speeches ever given in my lifetime...a speech in which Obama annihilated McCain's petty, mean-spirited attacks on his patriotism, character, and experience; destroyed McCain's lies of independence and foreign policy expertise; spelled out in detail where he would lead America; and demonstrated the character, generosity of spirit, intelligence, and determination to lead the country in a new, better direction that is so far beyond what McCain can muster that it is as if the 21st Century were pitted against 5,000,000 BC.

The McCain response, as usual, contained nothing but more Republican lies, misconceptions, delusions, distractions, and irrelevant, misleading drivel.

I am serving notice that I will stand with Obama against this Washington business-as-usual, bought and- sold cr*p that has our great nation on the brink of destruction. Even if you think Obama's statements are just empty words, I swear to you that mine are not. IT IS TIME FOR CHANGE THAT IS PAST DUE, JOHN MC CAIN, YOU LYING TOTAL A*S-HOLE!!!!

Please explain to me, Johnny Boy, how it is that YOU are ready to be President, you inexperienced, usually dead wrong, war-mongering, lying, cheating, corrupt old-timer? Remember the Keating 5! Remember Iraq! Remember how you cheated on your wives! Remember how you have helped sell the American people down the river! For God's sake, you senile b*stard, remember how many houses you own!

From John McCain's website:

(ARLINGTON Va.) Tonight, the McCain campaign issued the following statement from Tucker Bounds, McCain 2008 spokesman, on Barack Obama's acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention:

Tonight, Americans witnessed a misleading speech that was so fundamentally at odds with the meager record of Barack Obama. When the temple comes down, the fireworks end, and the words are over, the facts remain:

Senator Obama still has no record of bipartisanship, still opposes offshore drilling, still voted to raise taxes on those making just $42,000 per year, and still voted against funds for American troops in harm's way. The fact remains: Barack Obama is still not ready to be President.

20080829-02 07:40 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/29/08—Addendum

ADDENDUM TO TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Oh, but Johnny Boy, I momentarily forgot. You were a POW! Geez, as you keep reminding us and keep reminding us, that's what makes you such an expert on everything, makes you the only true patriot, and makes all your shortcomings somehow OK. Please excuse me, great warrior who fought no war.

I am an ardent, genuine conservative...who believes that government should stay out of our lives as much as possible. But who else will protect us from big unions, big business, big churches, big crime, big illegal immigration, or big foreign enemies...all of whom have bought and paid for our politicians, much to the detriment of you and me and of our children, brothers and sisters. I think we all know this in our hearts.

I will take an honest intelligent man anytime over a lying, dishonest, morally bankrupt, decrepit, old, stupid, senile fool.

But that's just me.

20080829-03 07:59 SteveM "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"

"Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?" by Charles Krauthammer, Townhall.com

Aug. 29, 2008, (<http://townhall.com/columnists/charleskrauthammer/2008/08/29/self-made-man-or-mysterious-stranger/page/full/>)

(WASHINGTON) Barack Obama is an immensely talented man whose talents have been largely devoted to crafting, and chronicling, his own life. Not things. Not ideas. Not institutions. But himself.

Nothing wrong or even terribly odd about that, except that he is laying claim to the job of crafting the coming history of the United States. A leap of such audacity is odd. The air of unease at the Democratic convention this week was not just a result of the Clinton psychodrama. The deeper anxiety was that the party was nominating a man of many gifts but precious few accomplishments—bearing even fewer witnesses.

When John Kerry was introduced at his convention four years ago, an honor guard of a dozen mates from his Vietnam days surrounded him on the podium attesting to his character and readiness to lead. Such personal testimonials are the norm. The roster of fellow soldiers or fellow senators who could from personal experience vouch for John McCain is rather long. At a less partisan date in the calendar, that roster might even include Democrats Russ Feingold and Edward Kennedy, with whom John McCain has worked to fashion important legislation.

Eerily missing at the Democratic convention this year were people of stature who were seriously involved at some point in Obama's life standing up to say: I know Barack Obama. I've been with Barack Obama. We've toiled/endured together. You can trust him. I do.

Hillary Clinton could have said something like that. She and Obama had, after all, engaged in a historic, utterly compelling contest for the nomination. During her convention speech, you kept waiting for her to offer just one line of testimony: I have come to know this man, to admire this man, to see his character, his courage, his wisdom, his judgment. Whatever. Anything. Instead, nothing. She of course endorsed him. But the endorsement was entirely programmatic: We're all Democrats. He's a Democrat. He believes what you believe. So we must elect him—I am currently unavailable—to get Democratic things done. God bless America.

Clinton's withholding the "I've come to know this man" was vindictive and supremely self-serving—but jarring, too, because you realize that if she didn't do it, no one else would. Not because of any inherent deficiency in Obama's character. But simply as a reflection of a young life with a biography remarkably thin by the standard of presidential candidates.

Who was there to speak about the real Barack Obama? His wife. She could tell you about Barack the father, the husband, the family man in a winning and perfectly sincere way. But that only takes you so far. It doesn't take you to the public man, the national leader.

Who is to testify to that? Hillary's husband on night three did aver that Obama is "ready to lead." However, he offered not a shred of evidence, let alone personal experience with Obama. And although he pulled it off charmingly, everyone knew that, having been suggesting precisely the opposite for months, he meant not a word of it.

Obama's vice presidential selection, Joe Biden, naturally advertised his patron's virtues, such as the fact that he had "reached across party lines to... keep nuclear weapons out of the hands of terrorists." But securing loose nukes is as bipartisan as motherhood and as uncontroversial as apple pie. The measure was so minimal that it passed by voice vote and received near zero media coverage.

Thought experiment. Assume John McCain had retired from politics. Would he have testified to Obama's political courage in reaching across the aisle to work with him on ethics reform, a collaboration Obama boasted about in the Saddleback debate? "In fact," reports the Annenberg Political Fact Check, "the two worked together for barely a week, after which McCain accused Obama of 'partisan posturing'"—and launched a volcanic missive charging him with double cross.

So where are the colleagues? The buddies? The political or spiritual soul mates? His most important spiritual adviser and mentor was Jeremiah Wright. But he's out. Then there's William Ayers, with whom he served on a board. He's out. Where are the others?

The oddity of this convention is that its central figure is the ultimate self-made man, a dazzling mysterious Gatsby. The palpable apprehension is that the anointed is a stranger—a deeply engaging, elegant, brilliant stranger with whom the Democrats had a torrid affair. Having slowly woken up, they see the ring and wonder who exactly they married last night.

20080829-04 10:02 SteveB Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"

Dear SteveM,

Total BS.

20080829-05 11:16 SteveM Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"

Dear SteveB,

Your analytical debating skills dazzle me, as well as your undying devotion to the South side Chicago Machine Candidate. LOL!

Every statement [Krauthammer, above] is correct and I don't see any mean spiritedness, unlike your unwarranted personal assaults on Senator McCain

(ARLINGTON, Va.) Tonight, the McCain campaign issued the following statement from Tucker Bounds, McCain's 2008 spokesman, on Barack Obama's acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention:

Tonight, Americans witnessed a misleading speech that was so fundamentally at odds with the meager record of Barack Obama. When the temple comes down, the fireworks end, and the words are over, the facts remain: Senator Obama still has no record of bipartisanship, still opposes offshore drilling, still voted to raise taxes on those making just $42,000 per year, and still voted against funds for American troops in harm's way. The fact remains: Barack Obama is still not ready to be President.

20080829-06 12:00 SteveB Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"

1. McCain's record shows that he's nearly as partisan as they come.

2. Offshore drilling is a gimmick, bought and paid for by the oil companies and Arabs, and will have no impact even long range except to use up our precious reserves and pollute the coastlines. Ya, all we need is more of our energy supply to be at the mercy of hurricanes. We need a real, non-oil solution and we have needed it for 30 years and you know it. This is as big a gimmick as temporarily removing the gasoline tax to put road workers out of work without helping the real problem.

3. The tax thing is a blatant lie. He just didn't support the Bush tax cuts which are bankrupting the country, along with his little totally unnecessary war in Iraq, which was just to please his daddy. And McCain was all for that!

4. Obama has voted to support the troops more than McCain has, and in a bipartisan way.

5. McCain is no more ready to be President just because he was a POW. His thinking is old, his few ideas are wrong, he's been bought and sold, he has NO executive experience. Look it up. And they are not unwarranted attacks...the man is a crabby, mean, stupid, corrupt lying fool. Period. Look at his mean-spirited campaign.

20080829-07 12:39 SteveM Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"

Dear SteveB,

Just because you don't like Mr. Krauthammers perspective doesn't make it any less true. Remember free speech is a two way street and you have not made one salient point in debate of Mr. Krauthammers points to prove the bullsh*t.

So now that McCain has picked his running mate and will receive a big bump in the polls. I'll leave you with the reminder that I predicted a land slide and now it's time to "turn out the lights, the party's over" LOL!

END of discussion.

20080829-08 15:21 SteveB Re: "Self-Made Man or Mysterious Stranger?"

Dear SteveM,

See daily McCain's Senile Moment of the Day postings for detailed reasoning and analysis.

I have nothing but disdain, ridicule, loathing, and revulsion for the Republicans who forsook their values and squandered the opportunity of a lifetime to make this a better country, but instead did their best to drive it into the ground. It's time for a change!

Take care, buddy. I have nothing but warm feelings for you, personally, and nothing but extreme sorrow for your political views.

20080830-01 06:41 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/30/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Remember yesterday's statement from the McCain website: "The fact remains: Barack Obama is still not ready to be President."?

Now, I'm not opposed to McCain's choice of 44-year-old Alaskan governor Sarah Palin for VP. But as a complete rookie who professes to having no interest in foreign affairs, doesn't her choice destroy McCain's #1 criticism of Obama, the very foundation of McCain's campaign, as it was Hillary's before him? (You aren't really very original are you, you old pr*ck?)

I mean, surely McCain couldn't admit that Governor Palin is not ready to serve as President, or he would be admitting to a crass political ploy of almost immeasurable stupidity. But how can the senile idiot argue that Obama is not ready to be President if he also argues that this woman is ready?

Looks like you caught yourself in your own trap, Johnny Boy. It's going to be interesting to see which lies and deceptions you use to try to wriggle your way out.

20080830-02 07:43 SteveM Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/30/08

Dear SteveB,

How can anyone take you seriously if you don't admit that Palin has accomplished more as the Governor than BHO in his entire career. Plus as an outsider with a demonstrated record of change she offers more hope for change than insider Biden and empty suit BHO.

Based on her resume she's also more of a man than BHO AND more of a lady than Michelle, lol! Mac doesn't have to defend her, she can do it herself!

So now you're an ageist and sexist? LOL! What's next, racism directed towards whites?

Yeah you bet its politics, what with three of every 10 "Hill raisers" ready to vote for the McCain ticket, you can do the math, from the 18 million supporters. Yeah it's not hard to figure out when it comes to which minority is going to carry the vote for this historic minority selection. SteveB, need I remind you that hell hath no fury like a woman scorned.

SteveB I really can't see how you can say Mac is mean, after his sincere congratulations advertisement to BHO on his nomination. While BHO was attacking him in his acceptance speech. [The opposite of what really happened. —SteveB]

Speaking of attacks now Biden won't be old beat up on a woman like he beat up on everyone in Congress. The public won't go for that. Now the empty suit and Biden will have to dance around and watch their words out of fear of being called a sexist. What a delicious and cruel twist of circumstances. Rolling on the floor laughing my A*S off.

Yes SteveB it's called hardball, welcome to the big leagues!

As Dandy Don Meredith used to sing on Monday night football, turn out the lights the parties over!

20080830-03 11:07 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—08/30/08

Dear SteveM,

You have lost your way, my friend, as you will come to see in the coming months.

At the same time McCain was congratulating Obama, he was running nasty, lying attack ads. Obama never attacked McCain in his acceptance speech. In fact, he complimented him...then pointed out all the details of how he was wrong. That is hardly an attack. That's the difference between a gentleman and a rat. You should watch the speech in order to start to get a feel for your future president.

Your opinion of Obama was formed from all the cr*p the right-wing fanatics were spewing. 99% of this BS has been disproven, but you cling to your misconceptions. It is sad.

I suppose you still believe Obama was not born in the U.S., that he's a Muslim, and that he and Michelle don't love America. None of this cr*p is true, none of the Republican response to his acceptance speech was true. This woman, Palin, has no record except more corruption. Period!

You lie, to yourself most of all, when you say you think she's qualified to be President when, in the same breath, you say Obama is not. Shame on you!

You are being manipulated, buddy. Come back down to reality with the rest of us and turn that radio off!

20080830-04 11:37 SteveM "Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values"

Dear SteveB,

You really need to read the bio at this link:

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sarah_Palin.

And the article below from the left leaning USA Today, AND you don't come away thinking that she's more of a man than BHO AND more of a lady than Michelle, I'll buy you lunch.

"Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values" by John Fritze, USA Today

Aug. 29, 2008, (http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-08-29-palinprofile_N.htm)

Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, barely a year into her term, received a harrowing call in December from the physician reviewing her prenatal tests. The doctor asked her to come in for a talk.

Palin, who already had developed a reputation for directness, instead took the news over the phone, learning that her fifth child, Trig, had Down syndrome.

"I've never had problems with my other pregnancies, so I was shocked," Palin told the Anchorage Daily News in May. "It took a while to open up the book that the doctor gave me about children with Down syndrome."

She said there was never any doubt she would have her son, who was born in April.

Friends said Palin's resolve during the subsequent doctor visits, medical tests and Trig's birth offers insight into a woman who lived her principles and treasured her family as she faced one of her most difficult personal challenges.

"She's very, very strong in her values," said Curt Menard, mayor of Matanuska-Susitna Borough, who said he has known Palin since she was 3. "I don't think there was ever a question that they were going to have the baby."

Presumptive Republican presidential nominee John McCain introduced Palin, 44, as his running mate Friday. She is her party's first female candidate for vice president.

McCain: 'The right partner'

Audio: McCain taps Palin as running mate

Readers Dish: Talk plainly about Palin

McCain met Palin at the National Governors Association meeting in Washington in February and came away "extraordinarily impressed," according to a statement from McCain's campaign. On Thursday, McCain invited her to become his running mate.

Palin, the daughter of a teacher and a school secretary, is a former point guard who took her high school basketball team to the state championships in 1982. She won her first race for City Council of Wasilla in 1992 by casting herself as "a new face." McCain and other supporters sounded a similar refrain Friday, playing up the fresh voice she could bring to the presidential race.

Democrats, including presidential nominee Barack Obama's campaign spokesman Bill Burton, questioned her relative inexperience, but Palin has beat back similar criticism before. In 1996, at 32, she was elected mayor of Wasilla, a city of 9,780 located about 40 miles north of Anchorage. She ousted a three-term incumbent for the position and focused her tenure on reducing taxes.

"I was just your average hockey mom in Alaska, coaching some basketball on the side," Palin said during a rally in Dayton, Ohio, where her selection was announced. "My agenda was to stop wasteful spending, cut property taxes and put the people first."

Palin beat incumbent Gov. Frank Murkowski, a fellow Republican, in a 2006 primary and then beat a former governor, Democrat Tony Knowles, in the general election, becoming the state's first female governor.

Among Palin's accomplishments in the State House: passing legislation that began a competitive process to construct a gas pipeline and overhauling the state's ethics laws.

"She's a solid individual," said Gene Therriault, the Republican Senate Minority Leader in the Alaska Legislature. "I think she is a person who holds her principles very near and dear."

Critics argue that she is overly aggressive, noting that a nickname she picked up for being a strong basketball player, "Sarah Barracuda," stuck with her for her political career. A citizens group considered advocating for her recall as mayor after she fired several department heads.

Former Wasilla city councilman Nick Carney, who recruited Palin but later became one of her strongest critics in Wasilla, told the Anchorage Daily News in 2006 that he believed she made the staff changes as retribution because they supported her opponent in the race.

Palin faces an ongoing state investigation of accusations that she fired the state's public safety commissioner this year because he would not fire a state trooper who is her sister's ex-husband. She has denied any wrongdoing. Earlier this month, Palin released recordings of a phone conversation between one of her aides and a state trooper lieutenant in which the aide said the governor was troubled that her ex-brother-in-law remained on the force.

The trooper, Mike Wooten, was reprimanded and suspended for five days in 2006 for allegedly drinking beer while on duty and driving his marked patrol car, illegally killing a moose and using his Taser on his 10-year-old stepson, state records show.

Andrew Halcro, who ran against Palin as an independent in 2006 and now runs a blog critical of her, credited Palin with shaking up the Republican establishment in Alaska but also described her as "vindictive." "It seems her vindictiveness is what's gotten her into trouble with this trooper out here," he said. "She couldn't just let it go and walk away."

Palin ran for governor in part on a platform of cracking down on ethical violations. When she was chairwoman of the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission, which helps oversee the state's energy industry, Palin complained about ethics violations by Randy Ruedrich, a fellow member of the commission who also chairs the Alaska Republican Party. Palin quit the commission in 2004. Ruedrich, who had resigned from the commission in 2003, paid a $12,000 fine in 2004 for engaging in partisan political activity on the job.

Palin's family moved to Alaska in 1964 when she was 3 months old. She graduated from Wasilla High School in 1982. She received a bachelor's degree in communications and journalism from the University of Idaho in 1987, according to a National Governors Association biography.

She competed in the Miss Alaska contest after being chosen Miss Wasilla in 1984, according to the Daily News. Adrian Lane, a longtime family friend who lives in Wasilla, said he remembers her playing basketball at a young age with all the boys in the neighborhood.

"People misread her," Lane said. "She's strong. People aren't going to run over her."

She is married to Todd Palin, a lifelong Alaskan who is a production operator on the North Slope and a four-time champion of the Iron Dog, the world's longest snowmobile race.

Palin, who enjoys fishing and hunting, attends a non-denominational evangelical church with her family when she is in Wasilla.

"What I've seen in private is what you see in public," said pastor Larry Kroon of the Wasilla Bible Church. "I think her faith and her integrity are both very real."

The Palins have four children in addition to Trig. At the rally Friday, Palin said her oldest son, Track, enlisted in the U.S. Army last Sept. 11 and will deploy to Iraq this Sept. 11.

20080830-05 12:46 SteveB Re: "Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values"

Dear SteveM,

According to your own John McCain, having strong values but no experience in Washington and no experience being a POW does not qualify a person to be President, so it therefore (ipso facto) does not qualify someone to be either a Vice-Presidential or Presidential candidate. Look-up all the drivel McCain and his campaign have put-out and you will see I'm right.

In the case of Obama, I know McCain and his campaign have ulterior motives, so I know I can't trust the ambitious bastard.

In the case of Palin, I'll take McCain's word for it!

Their only argument against Obama has been that he ain't qualified! And this b*tch is? No offense to women intended (I love 'em all)!

Doesn't the fact that the senile old-fart criticized Obama for his desire to be President, while running for President himself, tell you that this man has no principles whatsoever and will say anything? And that is just the very least, most obvious case of his utter moral corruption, ambition, and senility. This is an evil man. I will take a good, honest, intelligent man over an evil, lying, stupid man anytime for anything. Believe me, their particular political views don't matter a bit compared to that!

Supporting these pro-life Republican b*stards and their intrusions into our privacy, freedom, and dignity is why I questioned if you were born again, even more than that Bible passage, my friend.

20080830-06 13:17 SteveB Re: "Friends: VP Choice Has 'Very Strong' Values"

The McCain campaign has been totally unable to refute one single point that Obama made in his acceptance speech.

And that is what will ultimately cost the Republicans the election, by a landslide!

Plus (I predict) during the campaign, McCain will either die of old age or demonstrate his mean temper and senility so much that the electorate will reject him out of hand.

20080830-07 16:08 SteveB Fw (from MoveOn): Who Is Sarah Palin?

Dear MoveOn member,

Yesterday was John McCain's 72nd birthday. If elected, he'd be the oldest president ever inaugurated. And after months of slamming Barack Obama for "inexperience," here's who John McCain has chosen to be one heartbeat away from the presidency: a right-wing religious conservative with no foreign policy experience, who until recently was mayor of a town of 9,000 people.

Huh?

Who is Sarah Palin? Here's some basic background:

She was elected Alaska 's governor a little over a year and a half ago. Her previous office was mayor of Wasilla, a small town outside Anchorage. She has no foreign policy experience.¹ Palin is strongly anti-choice, opposing abortion even in the case of rape or incest.² She supported right-wing extremist Pat Buchanan for president in 2000.³ Palin thinks creationism should be taught in public schools.⁴ She's doesn't think humans are the cause of climate change.⁵

She's solidly in line with John McCain's "Big Oil first" energy policy. She's pushed hard for more oil drilling and says renewables won't be ready for years. She also sued the Bush administration for listing polar bears as an endangered species—she was worried it would interfere with more oil drilling in Alaska.⁶

How closely did John McCain vet this choice? He met Sarah Palin once at a meeting. They spoke a second time, last Sunday, when he called her about being vice-president. Then he offered her the position.⁷

This is information the American people need to see. Please take a moment to forward this email to your friends and family. We also asked Alaska MoveOn members what the rest of us should know about their governor. The response was striking. Here's a sample:

She is really just a mayor from a small town outside Anchorage who has been a governor for only 1.5 years, and has ZERO national and international experience. I shudder to think that she could be the person taking that 3 am call on the White House hotline, and the one who could potentially be charged with leading the U.S. in the volatile international scene that exists today.—Rose M., Fairbanks, AK

She is VERY, VERY conservative, and far from perfect. She's a hunter and fisherwoman, but votes against the environment again and again. She ran on ethics reform, but is currently under investigation for several charges involving hiring and firing of state officials. She has NO experience beyond Alaska.—Christine B., Denali Park, AK

As an Alaskan and a feminist, I am beyond words at this announcement. Palin is not a feminist, and she is not the reformer she claims to be.—Karen L., Anchorage, AK

Alaskans, collectively, are just as stunned as the rest of the nation. She is doing well running our State, but is totally inexperienced on the national level, and very much unequipped to run the nation, if it came to that. She is as far right as one can get, which has already been communicated on the news. In our office of thirty employees (dems, republicans, and nonpartisans), not one person feels she is ready for the V.P. position.—Sherry C., Anchorage, AK

She's vehemently anti-choice and doesn't care about protecting our natural resources, even though she has worked as a fisherman. McCain chose her to pick up the Hillary voters, but Palin is no Hillary.—Marina L., Juneau, AK

I think she's far too inexperienced to be in this position. I'm all for a woman in the White House, but not one who hasn't done anything to deserve it. There are far many other women who have worked their way up and have much more experience that would have been better choices. This is a patronizing decision on John McCain's part and insulting to females everywhere that he would assume he'll get our vote by putting "A Woman" in that position.—Jennifer M., Anchorage, AK

So Governor Palin is a staunch anti-choice religious conservative. She's a global warming denier who shares John McCain's commitment to Big Oil. And she's dramatically inexperienced. In picking Sarah Palin, John McCain has made the religious right very happy. And he's made a very dangerous decision for our country.

In the next few days, many Americans will be wondering what McCain's vice-presidential choice means. Please pass this information along to your friends and family.

Thanks for all you do. —Ilyse, Noah, Justin, Karin and the rest of the team

Sources:

¹"Sarah Palin," Wikipedia, Accessed Aug. 29, 2008, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sarah_Palin

²"McCain Selects Anti-Choice Sarah Palin as Running Mate," NARAL Pro-Choice America, Aug. 29, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17515&id=13661-9148195-iaKOGex&t=1>

³"Sarah Palin, Buchananite," The Nation, Aug. 29, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17736&id=13661-9148195-iaKOGex&t=2>

⁴"'Creation science' enters the race," Anchorage Daily News, Oct. 27, 2006, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17737&id=13661-9148195-iaKOGex&t=3>

⁵"Palin buys climate denial PR spin—ignores science," Huffington Post, Aug. 29, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17517&id=13661-9148195-iaKOGex&t=4>

⁶"McCain VP Pick Completes Shift to Bush Energy Policy," Sierra Club, Aug. 29, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17518&id=13661-9148195-iaOGex&t=5>

⁷"McCain met Palin once before yesterday," MSNBC, Aug. 29, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=21119&id=13661-9148195-iaOGex&t=8>

"Choice of Palin Promises Failed Energy Policies of the Past," League of Conservation Voters, Aug. 29, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17519&id=13661-9148195-iaOGex&t=6>

"Protecting polar bears gets in way of drilling for oil, says governor," The Times of London, May 23, 2008, <http://www.moveon.org/r?r=17520&id=13661-9148195-iaOGex&t=77>

20080831-01 10:04 SteveB "Brazil Admits Amazon Deforestation on the Rise" Environment

"Brazil Admits Amazon Deforestation on the Rise" by AP

Aug. 30, 2008, (<http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/26472726/>)

(69 percent increase in 1 year reported; 20 percent of forest now cleared.)

(RIO DE JANEIRO) Amazon deforestation jumped 69 percent in the past 12 months — the first such increase in three years — as rising demand for soy and cattle pushes farmers and ranchers to raze trees, officials said Saturday.

Some 3,088 square miles of forest were destroyed between August 2007 and August 2008 — a 69 percent increase over the 1,861 square miles felled in the previous 12 months, according to the National Institute for Space Research, or INPE, which monitors destruction of the Amazon.

"We're not content," Environment Minister Carlos Minc said. "Deforestation has to fall more and the conditions for sustainable development have to improve."

Brazil's government has increased cash payments to fight illegal Amazon logging this year, and it eliminated government bank loans to farmers who illegally clear forest to plant crops.

The country lost 2.7 percent of its Amazon rain forest in 2007, or 4,250 square miles. Environmental officials fear even more land will be razed this year — but they have not forecast how much.

Minc says monthly deforestation rates have slowed since May, but environmental groups say seasonal shifts in tree cutting make the annual number a more accurate gauge.

Most deforestation happens in March and April, the start of Brazil's dry season, and routinely tapers off in May, June and July: Last month, 125 square miles of trees were felled, 61 percent less than the area razed in June.

Environmentalists also argue that INPE's deforestation report wasn't designed to give accurate monthly figures, but to alert and direct the government to deforestation hot spots in time to save the land.

The Amazon region covers about 1.6 million square miles of Brazil, nearly 60 percent of the country. About 20 percent of that land has already been deforested.

Copyright 2008 The Associated Press.

20080831-02 16:39 J. Fornof Senator Obama's Campaign for Change in Hamilton, Montana
--

Dear SteveB:

Now that we have the Hamilton office up and running, we were wondering if you were still interested in any volunteer opportunities with the campaign here in the valley. I'd love to get together with you and discuss the different things that we will doing as we look towards the general election. Please let me know if you are interested!

P.S. We are waiting on Obama-Biden gear to come in, but we do have a few t shirts available including one "Montana for Obama" XL shirt.

Thanks! John Fornof, Campaign for Change, Hamilton, MT, 773-459-7364

20080901-01

16:58

SteveB

John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/01/08; "Palin Flipped on Alaska's 'Bridge to Nowhere'"

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Lies, mistruth, and more lies. Sarah Palin, who supposedly loves her five young children and her pregnant 17-year-old daughter so much that she's abandoning them in favor of running as Johnny Boy's VP candidate, looks like just another Washington-type politician to me, except that she's only a super Alaskan black-fly light-weight version!

"Palin Flipped on Alaska's 'Bridge to Nowhere'" AP

Aug. 31, 2008, (<http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/26486063/#.TxhPB29SQhI>)

(She's touted her opposition to pork projects, but initially welcomed funds.)

(ANCHORAGE, Alaska) Gov. Sarah Palin was for the so-called infamous "Bridge to Nowhere" before she was against it, a change of position the GOP vice presidential running mate conveniently ignored Saturday when she bragged about telling Congress "thanks but no thanks" to the pork barrel project. Federal funds for the $398 million bridge were tacked into an appropriations bill as an earmark, the practice by which members of Congress get special funding for pet projects. Sen. John McCain opposes earmarks as an avenue for pork barrel and special interest spending.

After McCain introduced her as his choice for vice president on the Republican ticket, Palin talked about her reform credentials, and said she stopped the bridge project as part of an effort to end of earmarking in appropriations bills.

Pushed by Sen. Ted Stevens [The discredited Republican Senator from Alaska who will soon be tried on corruption charges. —SteveB], the bridge project became a symbol of congressional misuse of tax dollars. It would have connected the town of Ketchikan to an island with 50 residents and an airport on it. Ferries and water taxis serve the island now.

"I have championed reform to end the abuses of earmark spending by Congress," Palin said in her vice presidential campaign debut in Dayton, Ohio. "In fact, I told Congress, I told Congress 'thanks but no thanks' on that Bridge to Nowhere." [Gee, did she tell Congress twice? —SteveB] "If our state wanted a bridge, I said we'd build it ourselves," she said.

She didn't talk that way when she was running for governor. The Anchorage Daily News quoted her on Oct. 22, 2006, as saying yes, she would continue state funding for the bridge because she wanted swift action on infrastructure projects. "The window is now while our congressional delegation is in a strong position to assist," she said. [Ya, get that money while the Congressional delegation is still out of jail, Sarah! LOL! —SteveB]

20080902-01

13:15

Phil

Fw: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..." Colombo/Birther, etc. [& see 09/25/10, below]

[Source of original email unknown. Email the same as forwarded by SteveBA (Sept. 25, 2010). —SteveB]

A lot of unanswered questions!

Ah... Sorry to bother you, Mr. Obama, sir. Excuse me Mr. Obama, I mean Senator Obama, sir. Um . . .'know you are busy and important and stuff. I mean running for president is very important and... ah... hate to bother you. I will only take a minute ok, sir.

See, I have these missing pieces that are holding me up, and I was wondering sir, if you could take time out of your busy schedule and help me out. You know, no big deal, just some loose ends and things.

Hey, you have a nice place here! The wife sees houses like this on TV all the time and says, boy, she wishes she had digs like this, you know? Is that painting real? Really? Wow. I saw something like that in a museum once!

Oh, sorry sir. I didn't mean to get off the track. So if you could just help me out a minute and give me some details, I will get right out of your way. I want to close this case and maybe take the wife to Coney Island or something. Ever been to Coney Island ? No, I didn't think so...

Well, listen, anyways, I can't seem to get some information I need to wrap this up. These things seem to either be "locked" or "not available". I'm sure it's just some oversight or glitch or something, so if you could you tell me where these things are... I... I... have them written down here somewhere... oh, 'Sorry about the smears. It was raining out. I'll just read it to you.

Could you help me please find these things, sir?

- Your Occidental College records.
- Your Columbia College records.
- Your Columbia Thesis paper.
- Your Harvard College records.
- Your Selective Service registration.
- Your medical records.
- Your Illinois State Senate records.
- Your Illinois State Senate schedule.
- Your law practice client list.
- A certified copy of your original birth certificate.
- Your embossed, signed paper Certification of Live Birth.
- Your Harvard Law Review articles that were published.
- Your University of Chicago scholarly articles.
- Your Record of Baptism.

Oh, hey... listen! I know you are busy! Is this too much for you now? I mean, tell you what. I will come back tomorrow. Give you some time to get these things together, you know? I mean, I know you are busy, so I will just let myself out. I will be back tomorrow. And the day after.

".....In God We Trust....."

20080902-02 15:35 SteveB Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."
--

Dear Phil,

I don't know if all these things are known, but most of this is a hoax. His birth certificate, for example, has been fully vetted, and other documents can be accessed from Obama's website, although some third-party sites will also verify that most of this is untrue.

Remember, McCain is the one who was not born in the U.S.! And Palin? Well, we don't know anything about her except that she was a desperate pick who appears to be totally unprepared to be a 72-yearold heartbeat away from the Presidency.

20080902-03 16:02 Phil Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."
--

Dear SteveB,

What in the hell was the thinking on Palin, anyway? How can she bring anything to the ticket?

Obama is just going to roll in November.

20080902-04 16:29 SteveB Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."

Dear Phil,

God, I hope so! I'm sick of Bush, the Iraq war, the lies, the free trade, illegal immigration, and the economy. The Republicans had their chance and blew it big-time! I'll tell ya, regardless of politics...to solve our problems, I'll take a young, honest, intelligent man over an old, lying, pro-life, senile idiot anytime (and I don't give a goddamn if he was a POW)! It looks to me like Obama deserves a chance to be that man!

20080902-05 19:53 SteveB Fw: P.O.W.

Dear SteveB:

from Brave New PAC: [Defunct, 3/21/12. —SteveB]

To see McCain resort to playing the POW card when answering legitimate questions, in my mind, cheapens that experience. And by cheapening his own experience in war, he degrades all of our experiences in war. He turns the horrific incidents we've all seen, touched, smelled, and felt into a lame excuse to earn political points. And it dishonors us all.

—Brandon Friedman, a veteran of both Iraq and Afghanistan

John McCain has been exploiting his prisoner of war experience every chance he gets. He has used this story to justify everything from not knowing how many homes he has to his healthcare plan to his marital infidelities to his taste in music. The McCain campaign is even using his POW story in paid ads. But now a veteran who was a prisoner with McCain in Vietnam is explaining loud and clear that being a POW does not qualify McCain to lead our country.

<http://bravenewpac.org/>

Dr. Phillip Butler knew McCain as a fellow POW. Watch and listen! We are sure this video will draw an onslaught of right-wing attacks, but we bring it to you because it is our job to continue to convey the truth together and give these issues national attention. As Dr. Butler has said, McCain does not have the temperament to have his finger near the red button. Get this video to everyone you know: friends, family members, coworkers, and especially those who don't share your political views. The video is designed to reach them. Get it on your social networking sites like Digg. And get it to every blog, newspaper, and TV station that has ever overplayed McCain's POW story. It is time to fight back with truth!

The mainstream press has already begun to call out McCain for overusing his POW story. And it's cut across all political persuasions.

Whether he's deflecting criticism over his health-care plan or mocking a tribute to the Woodstock music festival, Senator John McCain has a trump card: the Hanoi Hilton.—Edwin Chen, Bloomberg

Noun, Verb, POW—Andrew Sullivan, The Atlantic Monthly

The McCain campaign's constant invocation of the candidate's POW past is weird bordering on irrational...—Ana Marie Cox, TIME

I think they are going to it way too many times.—Howard Fineman, Newsweek

Remember how Joe Biden got the press to refer to Rudy Giuliani as "A noun, a verb, and 9/11"? Well, let's actually take Andrew Sullivan's lead here and get the media to boil McCain down to a similar phrase: "A noun, a verb, and POW." Considering how often the McCain campaign invokes his POW story, isn't that what they're already doing?"

Yours, Robert Greenwald and the Brave New team

Paid for by the Brave New PAC and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee. Brave New PAC is supported by members like you, please consider making a donation. To stop receiving the latest videos from us, click here. We are located at 10510 Culver Blvd., Culver City, CA 90232.

20080902-06	21:28	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/02/08; "Bushies Come to Palin's Aid"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Hey, Johnny Boy, try to run away from idiot Bush all ya want. I think the American people will figure out the truth by election time, and you're goin' down, a*s-hole!

"Bushies Come to Palin's Aid" by Michael Isikoff, Newsweek

Sept. 2, 2008, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/blogs/stumper/2008/09/02/bushies-come-to-palin-s-aid.html>)

The McCain team has hastily assembled a team of former Bush White House aides to tutor the vice presidential candidate, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, on foreign-policy issues, to write her speeches and to begin preparing her for her all-important Oct. 2 debate against Sen. Joe Biden.

Steve Biegun, who once served as the No. 3 National Security Council official under Condoleezza Rice at the White House, has been hired as chief foreign-policy adviser to the Alaska governor, campaign officials told NEWSWEEK. After taking leave from his job as vice president for international affairs at Ford Motor Co. last Friday, Biegun flew to St. Paul and, together with McCain's foreign-policy guru Randy Schuenemann, began briefings for Palin on national-security issues—an area where her resume is conspicuously thin.

Biegun is hardly the only Bushie to be tapped for Palin duty. Among others: Matt Scully, a former Bush White House speechwriter who helped draft some of the major foreign-policy addresses during the president's first term, is working on Palin's acceptance speech to the convention Wednesday night.

Mark Wallace, a former lawyer for the Bush 2000 campaign who served in a variety of administration jobs including chief counsel at the Federal Emergency Management Agency and deputy ambassador to the United Nations, has been put in charge of "prep" for the debate against Biden.

Wallace's wife, Nicolle Wallace, the former White House communications director, has taken over the same job for Palin. Tucker Eskew, another senior Bush White House communications aide, is serving as senior counselor to Palin's operation. Douglas Holtz-Eakin, the former chief economist at the Council of Economic Advisers who has been serving as top economics guru for the McCain campaign, has moved over to serve as Palin's chief domestic-policy adviser.

The proliferation of former Bush White House aides in the Palin team may strike some as ironic—and could even provide some fodder for the Democrats—given the McCain camp's efforts to distance itself from the unpopular president. (It has been widely noted, for example, that while the president is addressing the convention tonight by satellite, neither the president nor Vice President Cheney will be coming anywhere near St. Paul. And when Palin's selection was announced last week, McCain aides touted it as an example of the senator returning to his "reformer roots" and rebelling against the GOP establishment.)

One administration critic, Steve Clemons of the New America Foundation, said today that while he personally liked Biegun and viewed him as "extremely competent," his retention as Palin's foreign-policy tutor could have unpleasant consequences. Describing Biegun—a Russia expert who once served as staff director for Sen. Jesse Helms at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—as a "big gun" in conservative foreign-policy circles, Clemons said "he will turn her into an advocate of Cheneyism and Cheney's view of national-security issues."

20080903-01	11:50	SteveB	Oil Market Speculation; Energy
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------

Dear Dennis,

Hope you're having a great summer. Are you in Ann Arbor?

I just heard Michael Lynch of Strategic Energy & Research (SEER) on Bloomberg TV and thought of you.

He was saying that since there were no real demand/supply or geopolitical realities affecting the price of oil, that, at least, the run-up from $85 to $145 for a barrel of oil had to be speculative. [And see above, Aug. 17, 2007, 4:13 pm. —SteveB]

You notice most commodities coming down now as the realities of the marketplace finally take hold. The problem is that these speculative bubbles hurt us all (except the few successful speculators and the Arabs) and must somehow be stopped while still allowing a free market.

My suggestions before about making futures contracts final or paying delivery charges, I think, would accomplish this.

20080903-02	16:06	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/03/08; "Obama hits Davis on 'Issues'"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Has anyone but me noticed that Johnny Boy only seems to talk about Obama and/or Biden/Palin (or being a POW)? We still don't know how many houses he has, let alone what he would do about the economy, shipping jobs to China, illegal immigration, or...say...the energy crisis (except drill, drill, drill, which is the last thing we much do). I guess there are no problems if you're as rich and famous as John McCain! Talk about running away from the issues as if they don't exist and as if you Republicans haven't produced problems instead of solving them, Johnny Boy!

By "personality" your campaign couldn't possibly mean...maybe...RACE, could it, an*s breath?

"Obama hits Davis on 'Issues'" by Carrie Budoff Brown, Politico

Sept. 3, 2008 (http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0908/Obama_hits_Davis_on_issues.html)

Barack Obama hit John McCain on Wednesday over a comment from his campaign manager that the presidential race will be decided more on personalities than on issues.

"Which probably explains why last night when they were speaking, all these speakers [at the Republican National Convention] came up, you didn't hear a single word about the economy," Obama said at an economic forum in New Philadelphia, Ohio. "Not once did people mention the hardships that people are going through."

"I guess I don't blame them," Obama added, "because if you don't have any issues to run on, you want it all to be about personality. If you have got George Bush's track record and John McCain voting 90 percent of the time in agreement with George Bush, then you probably don't want to talk about issues either."

McCain campaign manager Rick Davis told Washington Post editors Tuesday that issues will have an impact on undecided voters but will not be conclusive.

"This election is not about issues," Davis said. "This election is about a composite view of what people take away from these candidates."

The Obama campaign challenged the remarks Tuesday, and Obama added criticism of Davis' remarks in his stump speech Wednesday, as part of an extended riff aimed at painting McCain as out of touch.

20080903-03	17:06	Clark	"Noonan, Murphy Trash Palin on Hot Mike: 'It's Over'"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---

"Noonan, Murphy Trash Palin on Hot Mike: 'It's Over'" by Ben Smith, Politico

Sept. 3, 2008, (http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0908/Noonan_Murphy_trash_Palin_on_hot_mic_Its_over.html)

After a segment with NBC's Chuck Todd ended today, Republican consultant Mike Murphy and Wall Street Journal columnist Peggy Noonan were caught on a live mike ridiculing the choice of Sarah Palin.

"It's over," said Noonan, who then responded to a question of whether Palin is the most qualified Republican woman McCain could have chosen.

"The most qualified? No. I think they went for this — excuse me — political bullsh*t about narratives," she said. "Every time the Republicans do that, because that's not where they live and it's not what they're good at, they blow it."

Murphy chimed in: "The greatness of McCain is no cynicism, and this is cynical."

Noonan's blunt call contrasted with her conflicted column today saying Palin "could become a transformative political presence."

The Sarah Palin choice is really going to work, or really not going to work," Noonan wrote. "It's not going to be a little successful or a little not; it's not going to be a wash. She is either going to be magic or one of history's accidents. She is either going to be brilliant and groundbreaking, or will soon be the target of unattributed quotes by bitter staffers shifting blame in all The Making of the President 2008 books.

(UPDATE: Noonan tries to explain her remarks, and says that what's "over" isn't, she meant, McCain's campaign, but that what's over is the truth to the belief that "whatever the base of the Republican party thinks is what America thinks.")

20080903-04	18:33	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/03/08—Bonus
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

Just watched a video clip on TV of McCain handling a little baby at some political event today or yesterday. The baby's head was lolling around so much that I thought it was a wonder that Johnny Boy didn't break the baby's neck. Not only does this a*s-wipe not know how many houses he has, or whether someone is ready to be President, he has led such a sheltered life that he doesn't even know or, more likely, remember how to support a baby's neck. But, of course, I have to excuse his ignorance because, golly gee, he was a POW!

THIS MAN IS DANGEROUS! God help us!

20080903-05	18:53	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/03/08—Bonus—Addendum
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

ADDENDUM TO TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

Yes indeed! The Family Values Party!

McCain can't handle a baby and has cheated on both of his wives. He divorced the first because she had medical problems after she stuck by him the whole time he was a, you guessed it, POW! He cheated on the second in a famous political scandal during his first run at the Presidency. I won't even mention his participation in the Keating Five scandal.

VP candidate Palin can't be bothered to help take care of her five children, including the four-month-old with Down's Syndrome and the pregnant, unmarried 17-year-old. She not only doesn't support abortion under any circumstances, she doesn't believe in sex education in the schools, easily available birth control, or public schools, for that matter. She's for good, old-fashioned, Bible-thumping home schooling. I guess even that doesn't prevent screwing around in her unsupervised family.

Ya, Mrs. Palin, you might as well leave them kids at home and go gallivantin' (love that word!) 'round the country espousing family values, cause you don't seem to be able to handle yer own family (so how ya gonna run the country?). Ya, invade them women's privacy and tell 'em what to do with their own lives and bodies, you gun-totin' trailer trash!

Jeez, American families would be in such good hands with these two ignorant scoundrels!

Ya know, I was just thinking...

If Obama gets elected: it will almost certainly ended two of the worst political dynasties (by far) in American history—the Clintons and the Bushes.

If McCain gets elected: it will encourage and perpetuate both of them.

20080905-04	19:11	Mike	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/05/08
--------------------	-------	------	---

Dear SteveB,

I actually care more for the DNC side but your words are worse than a sugar infected 5th grade potty mouth...

I like good info and your an intelligent person with a knack for creative writing, but the cursing you use sounds like less intellectual.

I would love to read a piece that gives someone a sense of connection and deep thought. Your poetry always hits the spot. Try doing that with your angst and frustration.

Obama's economic side is optimistic, but even you know that you hope to move away from this country so why care so much about the candidates that only matter for 4 years. John McCain has gotten to this point for some reason. So what if you hate his guts. Be poetic about it or else run for office in a skirt with black face paint on and see what happens.

Keep the good stuff coming and wipe away the filth.

[You have to be kidding me! What filth? You will find very little "cursing" in these posts. Very occasionally, yes, but, then, we are a bunch of adults, sh*t happens! Get used to it. —SteveB]

20080908-01	10:25	David	Fw: Photo: Patriotic & Likes Guns
--------------------	-------	-------	-----------------------------------

<http://www.snopes.com/photos/politics/palin.asp>

20080909-01 10:20 Ben Fw: McCain-Pain Bumper Sticker

20080909-02 20:11 SteveB "Super-Smasher Targets Massive Mystery"

"Super-Smasher Targets Massive Mystery" by Alan Boyle, MSNBC

Sept. 8, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/24525554/ns/technology_and_science-science/t/super-smasher-targets-massive-mystery/#.Ty_RRixSQhJ)

Chapter 1: Particle collider comes close to the big bang on a small scale

(MEYRIN, Switzerland) In the beginning was the big bang. God may have been around before then — but as far as scientists are concerned, the big bang is as far back as they can go. And to get back there, they're getting ready to blast subatomic particles so energetically that the extreme conditions of the freshly born universe will be re-created on Earth.

Will those "little big bangs" crack age-old scientific mysteries? Or, despite repeated assurances from the world's top experts, will they create black holes that could gobble up the planet? After decades of preparation, scientists are finally switching on a machine that will separate the facts from what is plainly science fiction.

The machine is the $10 billion Large Hadron Collider, or LHC — the most powerful, most expensive particle-blaster ever invented. On Wednesday, Europe's CERN particle-physics lab is due to start shooting beams of protons through the LHC's 17-mile-round (27-kilometer-round) ring of tunnels beneath the French-Swiss border.

It will take months for the machine to reach full power. But eventually, those protons will be whipped up to 99.999999 percent of the speed of light, slamming together with the energy of two bullet trains colliding head-on. Underground detectors as big as cathedrals will track the subatomic wreckage on a time scale of billionths of a second. Billions of bits of data will be sent out every second for analysis.

As big as the numbers surrounding the LHC are, the mysteries it was built to address are bigger:

- What was the newborn universe made of?
- What causes things to have mass?
- Why is most of that mass hidden?
- Where did all the antimatter go?
- Is our entire universe a mere sliver of all that is?

"The LHC is the most powerful microscope that's ever been built," said John Ellis, a theoretical physicist here at CERN. "It will be able to explore the inner structure of matter on a scale that is 10 times smaller than anyone's been able to do before."

Ellis said the LHC also serves as "the most powerful telescope ever built," even though it looks inward rather than outward.

"We know that the way elementary particles interacted with each other controlled the very early universe," he explained. "So with the LHC we are able to, in some sense, re-create the conditions that existed in the universe when it was just a fraction of a second old — the sort of thing that the optical telescopes just can't see."

What's the point?

Past experiments in particle physics have yielded scores of practical spin-offs, ranging from new medical therapies to high-tech industrial materials — and even the World Wide Web, which you're using to read this report. But the potential for spin-offs isn't why more than 10,000 researchers around the world are looking forward so anxiously to the LHC.

"People ever since the ancient Greeks — and probably a long time before that — have wanted to understand how matter is made up, how it behaves, where the universe comes from," said Ellis, surrounded in his office by stacks of research papers. "And so we are responding to that continuing human urge."

The quest is not without controversy: Scientists say there's a chance that the LHC could create microscopic black holes, a phenomenon never before observed on Earth. They hasten to add that the tiny singularities will instantly pop out of existence, but that hasn't stopped critics from trying to block the collider's startup.

Two of the critics have filed suit in federal court in Hawaii, seeking the suspension of LHC operations until more studies are done.

Responding to the critics, CERN has issued a series of reports explaining why the LHC will pose no threat. Ellis was one of the report's authors. "If the LHC were to make microscopic black holes, it would be tremendously exciting — and no danger," he said.

The 62-year-old London native has spent more than half his life at CERN, delving into topics ranging from dark matter to the theory of everything. Once the LHC is up and running, he expects to find out whether the theories he and other physicists have developed over all those years lead to solid evidence — or lead to a scientific dead end.

"Theoretically, that would be the most interesting possibility, because it would really mean that we had to tear up our notebooks of the last 45 years and start more or less from scratch," Ellis said.

The God Particle

The theory described in all those notebooks is known as the Standard Model, which ranks among the scientific world's most successful theories. The Standard Model lays out a menagerie of subatomic particles and their interactions — and provides the basis for inventions ranging from television sets to microwave ovens to nuclear bombs.

Only one elementary particle predicted by the Standard Model has not yet been detected: the Higgs boson, which is thought to interact with other particles to give them mass. Without the Higgs, the big bang might have been an insubstantial flash in the pan — all energy, and no mass. Or so the theory goes.

The elusive Higgs boson looms so large as a gap in the Standard Model that Nobel-winning physicist Leon Lederman wrote a book about it called The God Particle. (He joked that he wanted to call it the "Goddamn Particle," but his editor wouldn't let him.)

"This is in some sense the holy grail of particle physics, to find this missing link in the Standard Model," Ellis said. "So that's one thing that we're really looking forward to with the LHC. In fact, back when we persuaded the politicians to stump up the money to build the thing, that's probably what we told them."

Not even the LHC will be able to spot the Higgs boson directly. Instead, physicists will have to infer its existence through an analysis of the other particles that should be created when it decays. It's not an easy task, but Ellis believes the evidence should turn up within a year or two of the machine's startup.

Even that won't mark the end of the quest. Ellis compared the Higgs boson to a doorway that should lead beyond the Standard Model.

"I don't think that the Higgs door, if you like, is just closing off the room, and there is nothing beyond," he said. "I believe there's going to be a lot more physics beyond. What it's going to be, I don't know. Maybe it's supersymmetry. Maybe space has additional dimensions. Maybe it's something that we haven't thought of yet. I certainly hope it's something we haven't thought of yet. It would be great to come across a real surprise."

But Ellis and his colleagues at CERN have two nagging concerns in the back of their minds: What if somebody else finds the magic door first? Or what if they spent all these billions of dollars and there's no Higgs particle at all?

A competitive twist

Fifteen years ago, when Leon Lederman wrote "The God Particle," he thought the Higgs boson would be found in the Superconducting Super Collider, a project that was just getting started in Texas. That machine would have been four times as powerful as the LHC — but when the costs started running far beyond the initial estimates, Congress killed the program.

Over the decade that followed, U.S. scientists weren't just waiting for the LHC to be built: The focus shifted to the Tevatron collider at Fermilab in Illinois, which theorists figured might have just enough punch to pick up the Higgs' trail.

Last year, researchers at Fermilab passed the word that they had found some interesting data — readings that hinted at the presence of the Higgs but weren't yet solid enough to publish. That added a competitive twist to the grail quest.

"The longer we wait, the higher the probability that Fermilab discovers something that we wouldn't mind discovering ourselves here," Jos Engelen, CERN's chief scientific officer and deputy director general, said last year.

Beyond the God Particle

What if physicists don't find the God Particle they are expecting to see? Ellis acknowledged that was a possibility. "This might be a little bit difficult to explain to our politicians, that here they gave us 10 billion of whatever, your favorite currency unit, and we didn't find the Higgs boson," he said.

But Ellis has faith that even then, there'd be something to discover — maybe something even weirder and more wonderful than the Higgs boson.

"Probably the most likely option then might be extra dimensions," Ellis said. "And there are some ideas where if you have some additional dimensions of space, you could somehow do the job that the Higgs does in the Standard Model."

For years, string theorists have noted that their equations come out better if they assume that the universe has nine or 10 spatial dimensions instead of the three we can perceive. The LHC could provide the first evidence of those extra dimensions: Some theorists say the collisions could produce anomalously heavy particles, suggesting that part of their momentum was going into the extradimensional realm. Harvard physicist Lisa Randall estimates that the LHC could nail down the evidence for extra dimensions in five years.

Other theorists have focused on the idea that every subatomic particle should have an as-yet-undetected "supersymmetric" partner that mirrors many of the characteristics of the particles we know, but is dramatically different in other respects. The partners would have greater masses and a different spin, for example.

To date, no actual evidence of supersymmetry has been found. But if supersymmetric particles don't exist, then a lot of the theories that look beyond the Standard Model would have to be thrown out.

If supersymmetric particles do exist, they could account for a large part of the universe's dark matter. That's the 90 percent of all matter that scientists can detect only by its gravitational effect — a puzzle that has bedeviled astronomers for decades. "There are good reasons to think that these dark matter particles, if they exist, will be observable in the LHC," Ellis said.

Exploring the big-bang frontier

One of the LHC's detectors, known as ALICE, is devoted to studying the stuff that the universe was made of less than a billionth of a second after the big bang. Earlier experiments have hinted that the stuff was a super-hot liquid consisting of subatomic particles known as quarks and gluons.

For one month out of every year, the LHC will switch from smashing protons to smashing heavy lead ions, in an effort to re-create that quark-gluon soup and let ALICE analyze the recipe.

Yet another detector, LHCb, will study the tracks of particles containing specific types of quarks and antiquarks. The Standard Model predicts that equal amounts of matter and antimatter should have been produced in the big bang — but today, we see hardly any antimatter in nature. That's a good thing, because matter and antimatter annihilate each other when they come in contact, leaving pure energy behind.

LHCb will follow up on earlier experiments that suggest matter won out over antimatter because they somehow decay in different ways.

And then there are the wild cards in the deck: Could the LHC really create black holes or exotic forms of matter? What about all these claims that the world is in peril?

Chapter 2: Discovery or doom? Collider stirs debate

Sept. 8, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/24556999/ns/technology_and_science-science/t/discovery-or-doom-collider-stirs-debate/#.Ty_Re1xSQhJ)

Will the Large Hadron Collider save the world, or destroy it?

As the atom-smasher at Europe's CERN research center is readied for its official startup on Wednesday, researchers might wish that the general public was captivated by the quest for the Higgs boson, the search for supersymmetric particles and even the evidence for extra dimensions.

But if the feedback so far is any guide, the real headline-grabber is the claim that the world's most powerful particle-smasher could create microscopic black holes that some fear would gobble up the planet.

The black-hole scenario is even getting its day in court: Critics of the project have called for the suspension of work on the European collider until the scenario receives a more thorough safety review, filing separate legal challenges in U.S. federal court and the European Court of Human Rights.

The strange case of the planet-eating black hole serves as just one example showing how grand scientific projects can lead to a collision between science fiction and science fact. The hubbub also has led some to question why billions of dollars are being spent on a physics experiment so removed from everyday life.

Why do it?

Michio Kaku, a theoretical physicist at the City College of New York, acknowledged that people often ask about the practical applications of particle physics. Even if physicists figure out how a particle called the Higgs boson creates the property of mass in the universe, how will that improve life on Earth?

"Sometimes the public says, 'What's in it for Numero Uno? Am I going to get better television reception? Am I going to get better Internet reception?' Well, in some sense, yeah," he said. "All the wonders of quantum physics were learned basically from looking at atom-smasher technology."

Kaku noted that past discoveries from the world of particle physics ushered in many of the innovations we enjoy today, ranging from satellite communications and handheld media players to medical PET scanners (which put antimatter to practical use).

"But let me let you in on a secret: We physicists are not driven to do this because of better color television," he added. "That's a spin-off. We do this because we want to understand our role and our place in the universe."

About those black holes ...

The black holes that may (or may not) be generated by the Large Hadron Collider would have theoretical rather than practical applications.

If the collider's detectors turn up evidence of black holes, that would suggest that gravity is stronger on a subatomic scale than it is on the distance scales scientists have been able to measure so far. That, in turn, would support the weird idea that we live in a 10- or 11-dimensional universe, with some of the dimensions rolled up so tightly that they can't be perceived.

Some theorists say the idea would explain why gravity is so much weaker than the universe's other fundamental forces — for example, why a simple magnet can match the entire Earth's gravitational force pulling on a paper clip. These theorists suggest that much of the gravitational field is "leaking out" into the extra dimensions.

"It will be extremely exciting if the LHC did produce black holes," CERN theoretical physicist John Ellis said. "OK, so some people are going to say, 'Black holes? Those big things eating up stars?' No. These are microscopic, tiny little black holes. And they're extremely unstable. They would disappear almost as soon as they were produced."

Not everyone is convinced that the black holes would disappear. "It doesn't have to be that way," said Walter Wagner, a former radiation safety officer with a law degree who is one of the plaintiffs in the federal lawsuit. Despite a series of reassuring scientific studies, Wagner and others insist that the black holes might not fizzle out, and they fear that the mini-singularities produced by the Large Hadron Collider will fall to the center of the earth, grow larger and swallow more and more of Earth's matter.

Ellis, Kaku and a host of other physicists point out that cosmic rays in space are far more energetic than the collisions produced in the Large Hadron Collider, and do not produce the kinds of persistent black holes claimed by the critics. In the most recent report, CERN scientists rule out the globe-gobbling black holes and the other nightmares enumerated in the lawsuit, even under the most outlandish scenarios. Wagner remains unconvinced, however.

"I don't think the knowledge we are going to acquire by doing such an experiment outweighs the risk that we are taking, if we can't quantify that risk. ... We need to obtain other evidence," he said.

Strangelets, monopoles and more

Black holes aren't Wagner's only worry: He also is concerned that when the collider creates a soup of free-flying quarks, some of those quarks might recombine in a hazardous way — creating a stable, negatively charged "strangelet" that could turn everything it touches into more strangelets.

The lawsuit also suggests that magnetic monopoles — basically, magnets with only a north or a south pole, but not both — could be created in the collider and wreak havoc.

Physicists point out that such phenomena have never been seen, either in previous collider experiments or in the wide cosmos beyond Earth.

"The experiments that we will do with the LHC have been done billions of times by cosmic rays hitting the earth," Ellis said. "They're being done continuously by cosmic rays hitting our astronomical bodies, like the moon, the sun, like Jupiter and so on and so forth. And the earth's still here, the sun's still here, the moon's still here. LHC collisions are not going to destroy the planet."

But how will all those collisions benefit the planet?

"We don't justify CERN or other big particle accelerators on the basis of spin-offs or technology transfer," Ellis said. "Of course, we do have programs for that. Personally, I believe that the most important knowledge transfer that we can make is by training young people who then maybe go off and do something else. I think that's probably more important than some particular technological widget that we may develop.

"I think the primary justification for this sort of science that we do is fundamental human curiosity," Ellis said. "It's true, of course, that every previous generation that's made some breakthrough in understanding nature has seen those discoveries translated into new technologies, new possibilities for the human race. That may well happen with the Higgs boson. Quite frankly, at the moment I don't see how you can use the Higgs boson for anything useful."

Kaku takes a different view: He said physicists will have to do a better job of explaining the potential payoffs if they expect taxpayers to keep covering the multibillion-dollar cost of exploring the scientific frontier. He pointed to the example of the Superconducting Super Collider — a project planned for Texas that would have been bigger than the Large Hadron Collider, but was canceled by Congress after $2 billion had been spent.

"After that cancellation, we physicists learned that we have to sing for our supper," Kaku said. "The Cold War is over. You can't simply say 'Russia!' to Congress, and they whip out their checkbook and say, 'How much?' We have to tell the people why this atom-smasher is going to benefit their lives."

Forecasting future benefits

If past physics experiments are any guide, the potential payoffs would likely come in three areas, Kaku said:

Telecommunications:

The challenge of dealing with all the data created by past experiments led to the creation of the World Wide Web at CERN in 1990. In a similar way, the Large Hadron Collider could usher in an era of global distributed computing and more efficient mass data storage. A better understanding of the subatomic world could lead to breakthroughs in quantum computing and super-secure communication.

Medicine:

Particle accelerators are already playing a fast-rising role in cancer treatment and medical imaging. New technologies developed for the Large Hadron Collider could well find their way into hospitals of the future. The ultrasensitive photon detector built for the LHCb experiment is a prime example, said the project's deputy spokesperson, Roger Forty. "I think there will be some cross-pollination with medical applications," he told msnbc.com.

Energy:

Kaku suggested that the insights gained from the Large Hadron Collider could be applied to developing new energy sources in the decades ahead — such as controlled fusion power. Those microscopic black holes might even play a long-range role in the energy quest. "Some people think that maybe black holes in outer space may be a source of energy for future civilizations," he said.

Looking even farther ahead, Kaku noted that a deeper understanding of the universe has always led to technological leaps. Harnessing mechanical power led to the steam engine and the industrial revolution of the 19th century. The unification of electricity and magnetism led to computers, lasers and other 20th-century wonders. Unlocking the secrets of the atom led to the triumphs and terrors of the nuclear age.

"Human history has been shaped by the progressive unraveling of gravity, electricity and magnetism, and the nuclear force," Kaku said. "Now we are at the brink of the granddaddy of all such unifications ... the unification of all forces into a super force. We think the super force is superstring theory, a super force that drove the big bang, that created the heavens and the earth, that drives the sun, that makes all the wondrous technologies of the earth possible."

Will that great revelation come from the LHC? Even Kaku thinks that would be too much of a giant leap. "The Large Hadron Collider will not open up a gateway to another universe," he said. "It will not open up a hole in space. But it will try to nail down the equations which would allow perhaps an advanced civilization to do precisely that, to manipulate the fabric of space and time."

How will the machine do that? Ironically, it takes bigger and bigger machines to unlock the smallest subatomic mysteries — and the Large Hadron Collider is the biggest Big Bang Machine ever built. With its tangles of wiring, twists of plumbing and 17 miles of supercooled magnets, the machine may well rank as one of the engineering wonders of the 21st century.

Wednesday: Showtime for the Big Bang Machine

Chapter 3: Scientists turn on biggest 'Big Bang Machine'

Sept. 10, 2012, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/26439957/ns/technology_and_science-science/t/scientists-turn-biggest-big-bang-machine/#)

After 14 years of preparation, a new scientific wonder of the world opened for business Wednesday with the official startup of Europe's Large Hadron Collider.

The $10 billion particle accelerator is the biggest, most expensive science machine on earth, designed to probe mysteries ranging from dark matter and missing antimatter to the existence of extra, unseen dimensions in space.

Scientists, journalists and dignitaries watched from the control room at Europe's CERN particle-physics center on the French-Swiss border, near Geneva, as beams of protons were sent all the way around the collider's 17-mile (27-kilometer) underground ring of supercooled pipes for the first time.

"Today is a great day for CERN," the organization's director general, Robert Aymar, told the crowd in the control room as the startup process began.

Controllers checked the alignment of the beam as barriers were removed at each stage of the route. Applause and shouts greeted every report of progress along the 330-foot-deep (100-meter-deep) tunnel — climaxing when the beam made its first full clockwise circuit, less than an hour after it was turned on.

"It's a fantastic moment," Lyn Evans, the project leader for the Large Hadron Collider, said afterward. "We can now look forward to a new era of understanding about the origins and evolution of the universe."

As champagne flowed in the control room, former CERN chief Luciano Maiani noted that the money spent on the project over 14 years was a mere fraction of the $40 billion that China spent for this summer's Olympic Games in Beijing. "These are the Olympics of science," CERN spokeswoman Paola Catapano replied during a Webcast interview.

Hours later, the LHC's counterclockwise proton beam made its first-ever circuit. The next steps in the process will be to fine-tune the beams and bring them together for their first collisions. It will take weeks for the collider to go through its commissioning process, and the LHC isn't expected to reach full power until next year.

'First Beam,' first celebration

Even though the first scientific results are months away, CERN used Wednesday's "First Beam" events as a high-profile occasion for celebration. For the more than 10,000 scientists, engineers and other workers involved in the project, the Large Hadron Collider represents a revolutionary new research opportunity as well as an unprecedented engineering achievement.

Video: The biggest physics experiment "The combination of the size, scale, complexity and technology — well, the comparison I always use is the pyramids," Peter Limon, a U.S. physicist from Fermilab who played a part in building the device, said during a pre-startup walkthrough. "This is what we do today comparable to the pyramids of 4,000 years ago."

The LHC is designed to do things the pyramid's builders never imagined.

Once the machine is in full operation, two streams of invisible protons will be whipped up in opposite directions around an underground racetrack to 99.999999 percent of the speed of light. When the two waves of protons slam into each other, scientists expect particles to melt into bits of energy up to 100,000 times hotter than the sun's core — a state that should replicate what the entire universe was like just an instant after it came into being.

How can the Large Hadron Collider possibly perform such feats? That's where the wonder begins.

Going down ...

No one was allowed in the underground tunnel for Wednesday's maiden run, but a visit during the final phases of the LHC's construction provided an inside look at the wonder at work.

During the seven-year construction phase, components of the collider and its detectors had to be lowered down piecemeal from CERN's assembly halls, then put together in underground caverns as big as cathedrals.

Although the scale of the project is impressive, these cathedrals are no gleaming shrines to science: Our trip felt more like going into the bowels of a well-worn power plant or subway system. That's because most of the facility was actually carved out in the 1980s for an earlier particle-smasher called the Large Electron Positron collider, or LEP. CERN has spent the past seven years remodeling the space for the Large Hadron Collider.

Steven Nahn, a physicist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, conducted research at CERN during the LEP era. "They stole our tunnel, that's the way I see it," Nahn joked as Limon showed us around.

For years, Nahn, Limon and thousands of other researchers have pitched in on the design and assembly of the LHC's instruments, forsaking quiet laboratories for the din of the construction site — as well as the occasional industrial mishap.

The LHC tunnel: Misbehaving magnets

Limon is a veteran of Fermilab's Tevatron, which had been the world's most powerful collider but is being dethroned by the LHC. At full power, the proton beams at the LHC will run into each other with the force of two 400-ton bullet trains going 100 mph. That amounts to 14 trillion electron volts, or about seven times the Tevatron's maximum power.

To bend those subatomic bullet trains into a circular path requires a chain of more than 1,800 superconducting magnets that have been chilled so close to absolute zero that they're colder than the average temperature of outer space (1.9 Kelvin, or 456.3 degrees below zero Fahrenheit).

Some of those magnets have to be collimated to focus the beams precisely at the ring's four collision points, like a telescope focusing light onto its mirrors. Drawing on its experience from Tevatron, Fermilab was put in charge of providing many of those magnets. But back in March 2007, a design flaw led to a violent breakdown during a cool down test. The supports that held the magnet in place came loose with a loud bang and a cloud of dust.

"Everybody ducked about two seconds after it happened," Limon recalled.

The LHC's scheduled startup had to be delayed 10 months to install and test a fix for the faulty magnets. Even with the fix, there's no guarantee that the magnetic field will always hold. A runaway proton beam could blast right through its helium-cooled pipeline and kill anyone who got in its way. That's why the tunnel is sealed off for each run. If anything goes wrong, a computer-controlled system will shut down the collider and send the errant beam down a blind alley within milliseconds.

However, if everything goes right, each pulse of protons will whip around the ring 11,000 times a second, traveling the equivalent of a trip to Neptune and back before they slam into the protons going the other way at four points around the ring. Four main detectors will watch what happens next.

ATLAS and CMS: What the detectors do

For millennia, people have studied how things work by breaking them apart and watching what happens to the pieces. Physicists started doing that with atoms about 90 years ago, confirming that atoms were composed of electrons, protons and neutrons — plus a menagerie of other particles they never expected to find. (After the discovery of the muon, physicist Isidor Rabi famously exclaimed, "Who ordered that?")

Physicists determined that protons, neutrons and many of the other particles were built up from even more fundamental constituents known as quarks. The particles built up from quarks are classified as hadrons, and that's where the LHC's name comes from: It's a large collider that smashes hadrons together.

So what will come out of those tiny, trillion-degree smash-ups? The LHC will look for exotic high-energy particles that supposedly came into existence just after the big bang — for example, the Higgs boson (which is thought to give other particles their mass) or supersymmetric particles (which may account for much of the universe's dark matter).

These particles can't be detected directly, because they interact so weakly with ordinary matter. Instead, the LHC's detectors will track how those particles decay into more easily detectable particles as they fly out from the collision point.

It's like reconstructing the scene of a crime from forensic evidence: Scientists will try to track down the usual suspects (or, they hope, the extremely unusual suspects) by analyzing the subatomic evidence that the culprits leave behind.

To solve their mysteries, the LHC's scientific sleuths will use the latest and greatest tools of the trade, built at a cost of billions of dollars. The two main detectors — ATLAS (A Toroidal LHC Apparatus) and CMS (Compact Muon Solenoid) — are structured like the layers of an onion to spot different kinds of particles:

- Trackers: Both detectors have tracking devices at the center to follow the paths of short-lived particles.
- Calorimeters: The next layers are two different types of calorimeters that measure the energies of the particles given off. One captures electromagnetic energy, while the other captures the energy from particles such as protons, neutrons and pions.
- Magnets: Huge magnets are built into each detector to bend the paths of the particles so they can be identified by their charge.
- Muon detectors: The outer layers of the detector track the paths of muons, particles that can't be stopped by any of the inner layers.

Probing the smallest scales of matter requires some of the biggest machines ever devised. ATLAS is the largest of all detectors, measuring 151 feet long and 82 feet high — bigger than your typical apartment building.

"It has an awful lot of free space inside," CERN theoretical physicist John Ellis explained. "The reason for that is, they want to be able to measure particles which come out of the collision ... even if the interior of the detector is so clogged with collision products they can't measure them properly there."

Over on the other side of the LHC's ring, CMS takes up less than half as much space as ATLAS but weighs almost twice as much. It contains more iron than the Eiffel Tower, built into alternating magnetized layers with particle detectors like a metallic jelly roll. CMS' built-in magnets and its expensive fine-resolution silicon tracker are part of a different strategy to do the same things that ATLAS does.

"You get big arguments between the ATLAS guys and the CMS guys as to which is the best way to measure these particles," Ellis said. "ATLAS is going to bend them that way, CMS is going to bend them this way, and we'll see in a few years' time which is the better idea."

ALICE: The big bang in the machine

ATLAS and CMS get most of the attention, but the contraption that best merits the title of "Big Bang Machine" is about a mile (1.5 kilometers) down the road from ATLAS. The ALICE detector (A Large Ion Collider Experiment) is designed exclusively to study the stuff that the universe was made of less than a millionth of a second after the big bang.

ALICE will run for only about a month out of every year, conducting experiments that will require the collider to switch over from smashing protons to smashing lead ions, which are 100 times heavier than protons. The high-energy collisions should blast those ions so thoroughly that, for just an instant, they turn into a plasma of free-flying quarks plus gluons, the particles that usually bind quarks together.

Past experiments indicated that the quark-gluon plasma behaved like a liquid. When ALICE gets up and running, "then maybe we reach the gas phase," said Jurgen Schukraft, CERN's spokesperson for the ALICE experiment. That would be something never before seen in the cosmic scheme of things.

LHCb: The mystery of antimatter

The fourth detector is also designed to answer a specific cosmic question. LHCb will study particles containing particular "flavors" of quarks and antiquarks, known as B mesons and anti-B mesons, with the aim of figuring out why matter has a huge edge over antimatter in our universe.

Earlier studies revealed that the particles and antiparticles decayed differently, which runs counter to the idea that matter and antimatter should be in symmetry. LHCb will follow up on those studies, using a battery of high-tech detectors that are lined up on one side of the collision point. Among those instruments are a tracker that can locate particles with a precision of 10 microns, or a tenth the width of a human hair.

Two smaller experiments round out the ring: LHCf, which studies cosmic-ray-like events near ATLAS; and TOTEM, which measures the effective size of protons using a detector near CMS.

The Grid: Getting out the data

The LHC is designed to produce as many as 600 proton collisions per second, and that creates a flood of digital data that gushes out from the detectors' wiring. If you were to put all the data from one of the main detectors onto CDs, the stack of disks would pile up to the orbit of the moon in six months. The challenge is to pick out only the most promising readings.

Each of the detectors uses "triggers" to pick out the good stuff. Only about 100 events per second are sent to thousands of computers and tape drives at CERN for storage. It's like narrowing down that moon-high stack of CDs to a stack that's only 6 miles high — which is still high enough for a transcontinental jet to run into.

To get the data out to researchers around the world, CERN has set up a multi-tier computer network called the Grid. Digital information goes out to the "Tier 1" data centers on a fiber-optic network at a rate of up to 10 gigabits per second — or roughly 1,000 times the speed of a typical cable Internet connection.

If the system works, it could set the model for future computing — not only for physics but also for other high-end applications such as climate simulation, genetic analysis and petroleum prospecting. Just as the World Wide Web was the best-known spin-off from CERN's LEP experiment back in the 1990s, the Grid could well become the LHC's most visible legacy.

Magnet for innovation

Who will benefit the most from that legacy? The Grid may distribute the data across the world — but it's hard to argue with the idea that Europe's 21st-century wonder of the world will serve as a magnet for innovation over the next decade.

That has sparked more than a few cases of "collider envy" among American researchers, and some worry about the prospects of a reverse brain drain. Michio Kaku, a theoretical physicist at the City College of New York, is already noticing a trend in his colleagues' travel plans.

"They're going where the action is, and that is Europe," Kaku said.

Chapter 4: Europe leaps ahead on physics frontier

Adam Yurkewicz was born, raised and schooled in New York state, intending to become an engineer. But in 1996, during his junior year in college, he got hooked on quantum electrodynamics and other wild ideas from the frontiers of physics — and he's never been the same since.

To follow his vocation as a particle physicist, Yurkewicz has been a grad student in Michigan, an experimenter in Illinois, a postdoctoral researcher in New York, and other things in between. He is now working on the ATLAS experiment at the Large Hadron Collider, and living in France with his New York-born wife and their first child.

In short, Yurkewicz is a science nomad.

"I don't think I've lived in the same place for more than a year in the last 10," he said as he sat at a table outside the cafeteria at Europe's CERN particle-physics center, just outside Geneva.

There are a lot of brainy nomads hanging around CERN's cafeteria nowadays. The patrons hail from all over the United States, from Canada, from Russia, from Japan, from China, and of course from across Europe. "It's like a mini-U.N.," Yurkewicz said.

Changing of the guard

The buzz of activity at CERN's Swiss campus dramatically illustrates a changing of the guard on the frontier of physics, with Europe taking over from the United States. For the past 14 years, Europeans have taken the lead role in building and financing the $10 billion Large Hadron Collider, which was started up on Wednesday. The U.S. federal government kicked in $531 million for construction.

The LHC is just this week's most obvious example of Eurocentrism in science: Less than 200 miles (300 kilometers) away, an even costlier international physics project, the $13 billion ITER fusion research center, is just getting started in southern France. And European officials are currently considering how to move forward with yet another fusion project, the $1 billion HiPER laser-fusion facility.

Meanwhile, in the United States, physicists were shocked last December to see Congress pull back on research spending, to the tune of $94 million. Financial support for ITER was virtually wiped out. It took months for some of that money to be restored in a supplemental funding bill — and while Congress dithered, scores of research positions were lost.

For decades, American know-how has benefited mightily from a "brain drain" of talent from Europe. It started in earnest when German physicist Albert Einstein and many of his colleagues fled the Nazi threat in Europe in the 1930s and relocated in the United States. That flow of expertise continued right through the space effort of the 1960s and '70s as well as the telecommunications revolution of the '80s and '90s.

Adam Yurkewicz, a postdoctoral researcher for Stony Brook University in New York, lives in France and works on the Large Hadron Collider's ATLAS experiment.

Today, the United States still ranks No. 1 in most science and engineering indicators, but recent figures from the National Science Foundation indicate that the U.S. lead is eroding. And it doesn't take a Ph.D. to figure out that when it comes to cutting-edge physics, all roads are currently leading to Europe.

Michio Kaku, a widely known author and theoretical physicist at the City College of New York, traces the reversal of fortunes back to the cancellation of the Superconducting Super Collider project in Texas.

"Let's be blunt about this: There could be a brain drain of some of our finest minds to Europe, because that's where the action is," Kaku said. "We had our chance, but Congress canceled our supercollider back in 1994. We're out of the picture. We can basically tag along after the Europeans, begging them for time on their machine — but really, the action is in Europe now."

Dutch physicist Jos Engelen, CERN's deputy director general and chief scientific officer, pretty much agrees with Kaku.

"People now talk of an inverse brain drain," he said. "That is, on these projects, our American colleagues have no difficulty finding other American colleagues who want to join us."

Engelen's boss, CERN Director General Robert Aymar, put it even more starkly during a news conference after Wednesday's startup: "Whatever happened, the competition was won by CERN."

The scientific spotlight's shift to Europe raises a dilemma for Yurkewicz and his wife, Katie, a physicist who works in CERN's communication office. For the sake of their 6-month-old son and their families back home, they'd love to move back to the United States when Adam's postdoctoral stint ends next year. But they both realize their job prospects are a lot better if they stay at CERN.

"Whether I'd want to stay ... I haven't decided on that yet," Adam Yurkewicz said a couple of months ago. "Right now, it looks like a big advantage to be here."

Commuters with computers

Not all of the 10,000-plus people involved in the LHC project are full-time residents like Yurkewicz. Most researchers spend just a few weeks at a time at CERN — checking in on their experiments (with graduate students in tow), then returning to their labs and classrooms back home.

"It's almost like commuting for those of us on the short term," said Karl Ecklund, a physics professor at the University of Buffalo who is part of the team behind the LHC's Compact Muon Solenoid detector, or CMS for short.

Another way that the LHC's researchers can be involved in the experiments without being there is to plug in through videoconferencing. Even before the final push to the collider's startup, it was difficult to reserve a spot for video linkups during the afternoons in CERN, which correspond with the morning's working hours in the United States.

Once the collider has been up and running for a while, some of the maintenance duties could be shifted thousands of miles away, thanks to high-speed network links that connect the control rooms at CERN with remote operations centers around the world.

"A lot of the shift work is just watching things. ... Shifting it to the U.S. is just a question of bandwidth," said Fermilab's Joel Butler, head of the U.S.-CMS Research Program. "I don't imagine they're going to let you 'drive' the lab, but you can at least read the map and tell what's going on."

Nevertheless, virtual reality has its limits — particularly now, when the multibillion-dollar machine's kinks have to be ironed out. "There's nothing like being there," Ecklund said.

The next big thing

Is the Large Hadron Collider a model for big science projects to come, or will it turn out to be the last of the big-science dinosaurs? Nearly everyone involved in the project says that the expense and the complexity required for doing grand scientific experiments have become greater than any one country could manage alone.

"Each facility of this scale is going to exist in one place in the world," Butler said.

So who decides how and where big science projects will be conducted? In the case of the Large Hadron Collider, CERN went ahead with its plan, and other nations gradually signed on. A slightly different model came into play for the ITER fusion project — which is being organized and funded by Europe's atomic energy agency and six other nations, including the United States.

The concept behind ITER goes back to the Reagan-Gorbachev summits of the 1980s, but it took years of political machinations to nail down the details. Finally, in 2005, the partners struck a compromise that put ITER's research reactor in France and another research center in Japan. ITER's structure calls upon each of the partners to provide hardware according to a complicated formula, leading up to the scheduled start of operations in 2016.

Aymar, a French physicist who headed up the ITER project before he took on CERN's top job, is intimately familiar with both approaches. He said CERN can take advantage of a huge head start in future international science projects, just because it's been doing it successfully for more than 50 years.

"To start from zero ... I don't recommend for any international body just to start," Aymar said. "It's very, very difficult, because you have to provide everything, with no background."

Long-term and short-term futures

That doesn't mean CERN has a lock on the next Big Bang Machine. The United States and other nations are also interested in at least a piece of the action. That includes the rising stars in science and technology, such as China and India. Just last year, Beijing hosted an exploratory meeting for designing the International Linear Collider, the particle-physics project regarded as the successor to the LHC.

The ILC won't be built until sometime in the next decade — if it's built at all. That depends on whether the LHC is successful, and whether governments ultimately decide that the ILC's estimated $6.7 billion cost (or whatever the full cost turns out to be) is worth it.

The amount of money and political will for doing grand physics projects is clearly limited, said physicist Barry Barish, director of the ILC's Global Design Effort. He estimated that the international community would be willing to fund a $5 billion to $10 billion international project every 10 to 20 years.

"Obviously, we can do one every one or two decades, and that's it, because of the cost," he said this year at a scientific conference. "So we have to do the right one."

Does cutting-edge physics really have to cost so much? Lawrence Krauss, a theoretical physicist at Case Western Reserve University, said many people assume that physicists get together and ask themselves, "How can we come up with something that costs the most?" But Krauss argued that the reality was exactly the opposite.

"If you want to do the challenge of fusion, if you want to understand the early universe or the fundamental structure of matter, there's just no other way. This is the least amount you can spend," Krauss said. "You just have to decide if it's worth it."

For Yurkewicz and thousands of other physicists, it's worth it — even if they have to journey to a foreign land. It's particularly worth it now, when the Big Bang Machine is starting up.

"The most exciting part of particle physics," he said, "is being in that control room and watching the data come in."

Chapter 5: Big bang sparks big reaction

Sept. 12, 2008, (<http://cosmiclog.msnbc.msn.com/news/2008/09/12/4351175-big-bang-sparks-big-reaction>)

Comments only and some good links at the end to other articles.

© 2008 MSNBC Interactive

20080910-01	19:53	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/05/08
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Mike,

Are you telling me that cr*p like the article below doesn't make you sick? Well, it makes me sick. I'm tired of all the lies and these politicians, who are supposed to serve us instead of always selling us down the river. This McCain is one of the worst. He is a blatant liar and so is his VP candidate. That's the blunt truth, not a personal belief. [check out the "Keating Five" and his wife-cheating if you don't believe me, let alone this current presidential campaign and the "bridge to nowhere".] And I'm tired of the unjustified, unnecessary, wasteful war in Iraq. "100 years," my b*tt, John McCain!

I'll gladly not send you any more political emails, but how dare you lecture me as if I am not your elder and have no right to express my opinion, however offensive you might find that. No offense intended, but I find that highly insulting.

I have no right to express my opinion because "McCain got to this point for some reason" (so he must be a good guy? Is that what you mean? How naive!)? I have no right to express my opinion unless I run for office? Ridiculous!

This is your idea of "filth"? I send it to many women, with no complaints. Have you ever been to a bar or a baseball game or a pool hall or a locker room? I don't get it. Maybe you're being satirical?

I'm sorry if you are unable to read opinions that you don't agree with, even if they might contain the word "a*s", which is about the worst word used in my articles. If this is the case, I don't know how you're going to learn about both sides of campaigns or issues. You should read some of the blatantly racist, extreme right wing stuff some of my correspondents send to me. I certainly don't agree with either their language or their views, but I read a lot of it, just to know.

And do you mean to imply that I have no right to criticize politics or politicians because I'm going to be leaving the country? I am an American and I will always be an American. I love my country. My daughters and my grandson live here. My brothers live here. I'm living here and I shall always return here. I care what happens to America. Very much. How can you possibly ask why I care about "the candidates that only matter for 4 years"? Believe me, what they do in office matters a lot longer than four years, my young friend.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

If you think things are so wonderful in America right now, study a little history. We are on the brink of great troubles and something needs to be done about it. This is no time for more idiots like Bush and McCain running the country, believe me. And remember, I'm not a liberal Democrat; I'm a conservative Republican. But, as I've said, I'll take an honest, intelligent man over a lying fool any time.

Read the article below (and the short one after it). I don't think even the McCain campaign can accuse the Associated Press of the liberal bias they so liberally sling around, just as Hitler did. This may be America in the 21st Century, but that doesn't mean that evil does not walk among us, son-in-law. It's good sometimes to remember that and never to run away from it. Define it for yourself, but it is there for us all and must be faced and, hopefully, defeated.

Thanks for the compliments on my poetry. I continue to work hard, both on my writings and on my businesses. Again, I mean no offense, but I will defend my right to speak clearly and forcefully because so much is at stake, especially for you three.

"Obama Accuses McCain Campaign of 'Lies'" AP

Sept. 10, 2008, (http://www.oregonlive.com/politics/index.ssf/2008/09/obama_accuses_mccain_camp_of_l.html)

NORFOLK, Va.—Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama on Wednesday accused Republican John McCain's campaign of using "lies and phony outrage and Swift-boat politics" in claiming he used a sexist comment against vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin.

Calling it "the latest made-up controversy by the John McCain campaign," Obama responded to the Republicans' charge that he was referring to Palin when he used the phrase "lipstick on a pig" at a campaign stop Tuesday.

"I don't care what they say about me. But I love this country too much to let them take over another election with lies and phony outrage and Swift-boat politics. Enough is enough," he said.

Obama's reference was to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an outside group that in 2004 made unsubstantiated allegations about Democratic nominee John Kerry's decorated military record in Vietnam.

In his initial comments Tuesday, Obama was delivering a dissertation about McCain and President Bush when he used the lipstick aphorism—not Palin. In fact, his reference to the Alaska governor later on was a defense of her strong belief in religion.

The lipstick maxim is hardly new to either Obama or McCain. The Democrat has used it in the past, and McCain repeated the folksy metaphor when he criticized Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on health care. McCain was never accused of being sexist when he uttered those words.

On Tuesday, Obama criticized McCain's policies as similar to those of President Bush, saying: "You can put lipstick on a pig. It's still a pig. You can wrap an old fish in a piece of paper called change. It's still going to stink after eight years."

The McCain campaign immediately jumped on the comments, arguing they were directed at Palin, the GOP's first woman on a presidential ticket. In her acceptance speech last week, she had referred to herself in a joke about lipstick being the only difference between a hockey mom and a pit bull.

Accusing Obama of "smearing" Palin in "offensive and disgraceful" comments, the McCain campaign demanded an apology. The McCain campaign on Wednesday issued an Internet ad that said Obama was talking about Palin and said of Obama: "Ready to lead? No. Ready to smear? Yes."

Obama's campaign has accused the GOP camp of engaging in a "pathetic attempt to play the gender card." The campaign noted two other instances of McCain using the phrase "lipstick on a pig" and its use by other Republicans such as House Minority Leader John Boehner and Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl. With the fight dominating television news shows Wednesday morning, Obama responded before beginning a discussion of education at a Norfolk high school.

"What their campaign has done this morning is the same game that has made people sick and tired of politics in this country. They seize on an innocent remark, try to take it out of context, throw up an outrageous ad because they know that it's catnip for the news media," Obama said.

Later in the appearance, a supporter asked Obama how he was going to avoid Kerry's fate of allowing lies to undermine his campaign. Obama responded that every day he will hammer away at the issues that matter in Americans' lives and make the argument that McCain offers the same policies as Bush. "This whole thing about lipstick, nobody actually believes that these folks are offended," he said. "Oh, we're shocked. Everybody knows it's cynical, everybody knows it's insincere."

McCain campaign spokesman Brian Rogers responded, saying: "Barack Obama can't campaign with schoolyard insults and then try to claim outrage at the tone of the campaign. His talk of new politics is as empty as his campaign trail promises."

McCain released a new TV ad Wednesday that suggests an Obama link to what the Web site FactCheck.org called "completely false ... misleading" attacks while failing to note that the source of the attacks were, according to the Web site, "Internet postings and mass e-mail messages," not the Obama campaign.

Copyright 2008 The Associated Press

This is from an article in one of our local Montana newspapers:

[This little article was submitted by Julie Hollar, a local veterinarian. She had been called to a house where a 10-year-old dog was sick. She found that it had cancer and should be put to sleep. The couple had a four-year-old son and thought he should witness their dogs last moments, to say good-bye, to learn about death, to know what was going on... — SteveB]

After the dog had died, the four of them were sitting around wondering aloud about the sad fact that animal lives are shorter than human lives. Shane [the little boy], who had been listening quietly, piped up, 'I know why.'

Startled, we all turned to him. What came out of his mouth next stunned me. I'd never heard a more comforting explanation.

He said, 'People are born so that they can learn how to live a good life—like loving everybody all the time and being nice, right?' The four-year-old continued, 'Well, dogs already know how to do that, so they don't have to stay as long.'

20080912-01 07:12 SteveG Fw: Candidates' Educational Backgrounds

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I guess some things matter more than others. Educational background of candidates:

Obama:

Occidental College—Two years.
Columbia University—B.A. political science with a specialization in international relations.
Harvard—Juris Doctor (J.D.) Magna Cum Laude

Biden:

University of Delaware—B.A. in history and B.A. in political science.
Syracuse University College of Law—Juris Doctor (J.D.)

McCain:

United States Naval Academy—Class rank 894 of 899

Palin:

Hawaii Pacific University—1 semester
North Idaho College—2 semesters—general study
University of Idaho—2 semesters—journalism
Matanuska-Susitna College—1 semester
University of Idaho—3 semesters—B.A. in journalism

20080915-01 20:40 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/15/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

It wasn't a very good day for you was it, Johnny Boy?

Just when the stock market and Wall Street are melting down or, Heaven help us, beginning to melt down, and one of the world's largest investment banks disappears overnight...

You're stating that the economy is fundamentally sound! Then trying to claim you meant that the American workers (those that are still employed, I take it) are fundamentally sound. Whew!

Then, fellow Republican Karl Rove, one of the dirtiest politicians to ever tell a lie and the man whose strategies your campaign emulates, Karl Rove, of all people, calls you a liar!

Johnny Boy, you can try to distract us with all the pretty girls and lies you want to, but the Republican mantras of deregulation, free trade, illegal immigration, tax cuts, and unnecessary war have all come home to roost and they are feeding on your soul, my friend, all bought and paid for by the big companies and lobbyists who have always been your buddies, Johnny Boy.

It is such a shameful public spectacle that you are too senile to even realize what is happening, Mr. POW.

20080916-01 08:28 SteveM "Spotting a New Leader"

"Spotting a New Leader" by Fred Smith, Christianity Today

Dec. 1, 2004, (<http://www.christianitytoday.com/biblestudies/articles/churchhomeleadership/041201.html>)

The most gifted athletes rarely make good coaches. The best violinist will not necessarily make the best conductor. Nor will the best teacher necessarily make the best head of the department.

So it's critical to distinguish between the skill of performance and the skill of leading the performance, two entirely different skills.

It's also important to determine whether a person is capable of learning leadership. The natural leader will stand out. The trick is identifying those who are capable of learning leadership over time.

Here are several traits to help identify whether someone is capable of learning to lead:

1. Leadership in the past. The best predictor of the future is the past. When I was in business, I took note of any worker who told me he was superintendent of a school or a deacon in his church or a Boy Scout leader. If he showed leadership outside of the job, I wanted to find out if he had some leadership potential on the job.

2. The capacity to create or catch vision. When I talk to people about the future, I want their eyes to light up. I want them to ask the right questions about what I'm talking about. The founder of Jefferson Standard built a successful insurance company from scratch. He assembled some of the greatest insurance people by simply asking, "Why don't you come and help me build something great?" A person who doesn't feel the thrill of challenge is not a potential leader.

3. A constructive spirit of discontent. Some people would call this criticism, but there's a big difference in being constructively discontent and being critical. If somebody says, "There's got to be a better way to do this," I see if there's leadership potential by asking, "Have you ever thought about what that better way might be?" If he says no, he is being critical, not constructive. But if he says yes, he's challenged by a constructive spirit of discontent. That's the unscratchable itch. It is always in the leader. People locked in the status quo are not leaders. I ask of a potential leader, Does this person believe there is always a better way to do something?

4. Practical ideas. Highly original people are often not good leaders because they are unable to judge their output; they need somebody else to say, "This will work" or "This won't." Brainstorming is not a particularly helpful practice in leadership, because ideas need to stay practical. Not everybody with practical ideas is a leader, of course, but leaders seem to be able to identify which ideas are practical and which aren't.

5. A willingness to take responsibility. One night at the end of the second shift, I walked out of the plant and passed the porter. As head of operations, I had started my day at the beginning of the first shift. The porter said, "Mr. Smith, I sure wish I had your pay, but I don't want your worry." He equated responsibility and worry. He wanted to be able to drop his responsibility when he walked out the door and not carry it home. That's understandable, but it's not a trait in potential leaders. I thought about the porter's comment driving home. If the vice-president and the porter were paid the same money, I'd still want to be vice-president. Carrying responsibility doesn't intimidate me, because the joy of accomplishment—the vicarious feeling of contributing to other people—is what leadership is all about.

6. A completion factor. I might test somebody's commitment by putting him or her on a task force. I'd find a problem that needs solving and assemble a group of people whose normal responsibilities don't include tackling that problem. The person who grabs hold of the problem and won't let go, like a dog with a bone, has leadership potential. This quality is critical in leaders, for there will be times when nothing but one's iron will says, "Keep going." Dale Carnegie used to say, "I know men in the ranks who will not stay in the ranks. Why? Because they have the ability to get things done." In the military, it is called "completed staff work." With potential leaders, when the work comes in, it's complete. The half-cooked meal isn't good enough.

7. Mental toughness. No one can lead without being criticized or without facing discouragement. A potential leader needs a mental toughness. I don't want a mean leader; I want a tough-minded leader who sees things as they are and will pay the price. Leadership creates a certain separation from one's peers. The separation comes from carrying responsibility that only you can carry. Years ago, I spoke to a group of presidents in Columbus, Ohio, about loneliness in leadership. One participant, president of an architectural firm, came up afterward and said, "You've solved my problem." "What's your problem?" I asked. "My organization's always confused," he said, "and I didn't know why. It's because I don't like to be lonely; I've got to talk about my ideas to the rest of the company. But they never know which ones will work, so everybody who likes my idea jumps to work on it. Those who don't, work against it. Employees are going backward and forward-when the idea may not even come about at all." Fearing loneliness, this president was not able to keep his ideas to himself until they were better formulated. A leader must be able to keep his or her own counsel until the proper time.

8. Peer respect. Peer respect doesn't reveal ability, but it can show character and personality. Trammell Crow, one of the world's most successful real estate brokers, said that he looks for people whose associates want them to succeed. He said, "It's tough enough to succeed when everybody wants you to succeed. People who don't want you to succeed are like weights in your running shoes." Maxey Jarmen used to say, "It isn't important that people like you. It's important that they respect you. They may like you but not follow you. If they respect you, they'll follow you, even if perhaps they don't like you."

9. Family respect. I also look at the family of a potential leader: Do they respect him or her? Fifteen years ago, my daughter said, "Dad, one thing I appreciate is that after you speak and I walk up, you are always attentive to me. You seem proud of me." That meant a lot to me. If respect isn't there, that's also visible. The family's feelings toward someone reveal much about his or her potential to lead.

10. A quality that makes people listen to them. Potential leaders have a "holding court" quality about them. When they speak, people listen. Other people may talk a great deal, but nobody listens to them. They're making a speech; they're not giving leadership. I take notice of people to whom others listen.

It's not enough for people to have leadership potential; they must have character and the right setting in which to grow. Before I give someone significant leadership responsibilities, I find it helpful to ask myself several questions:

1. What will this person do to be liked? It's nice to be liked, but as a leader it cannot be the controlling factor. The cause must be the prime motivator.

2. Does this person have a destructive weakness? There are only two things I need to know about myself: my constructive strength and any destructive weakness. A destructive weakness may not show up on a test; it's a character flaw. A destructive weakness may, for example, be an obsession. An obsession controls us; we don't control it. It only grows worse over time.

3. Can I provide this person the environment to succeed? It is so important, particularly in the early days of someone's leadership, that he or she be put into a congenial environment. I wouldn't want, for example, to put someone who requires mentoring with a leader who pays no attention to people. An environment that threatens our sense of security or well-being splits our concentration from the cause. Young leaders need an environment in which they can concentrate on leading.

20080916-02	12:38	SteveG	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/15/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

I have been obsessed with the election this year, am bent a little if not more to the left, hear the senility of remarks by Johnny and the others, see the stupidity in their movements toward the elections, hear Karl, hear Sarah, and cannot for the life of me understand how Johnny keeps climbing in the polls.

20080916-03	13:01	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/15/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveG,

I couldn't agree more. It's totally inexplicable to me. In fact, it even makes me think that we're not educated enough anymore, as a country, to be a working democracy. I worry about our future!

20080916-04 13:04 SteveB Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveM,

Good article. Thank you.

Jeez! Every one of these things seems to totally rule out Johnny Boy and Johnny Girl (Sarah) to me, and make Obama and Biden seem like manna from heaven! But that's just me...

20080916-05 14:08 SteveM Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveB,

REALLY???????????

Just give one GOOD example of leadership the black guy has demonstrated in the past?

When asked what his toughest decision in the past was, the self aggrandizing black guy said "whether or not to make a speech again the war". REALLY. I don't know about you but I have had to make the decision the "pull the plug" on human beings and loved pets, among other tough decisions that affect others and not just my political standing and so has McCain!

If you are in-capable of recognizing leadership in Palin and McCain, you are doomed to the socialist bent of Pelosi, Reid, and BHO, to run us into the ground like Jimmy did in the late 70's. You do remember that don't you?

20080916-06 15:48 SteveB Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveM,

What has Palin ever run without corruption? What has McCain ever run except a campaign? Palin is nothing but a stupid distraction.

Obama has run a successful campaign so far, and it is much cleaner and more honest than his competition's. My bet is that it will get him elected. If so, that will prove his management skills are superior. If not, then my hat's off to the lying lobbyists running the McCain campaign. These points you make are simply not valid in any way.

I'll take an honest, intelligent man any day over a bought-and-sold, lying, senile idiot. It's as simple as that. And the right-left-socialist labels you and the radio shock jocks hang on people are nothing but cr*p. Democrat-Republican...nothing but cr*p. It is the man that counts. Period! Don't be deceived by the right-wing lies.

McCain has proven himself to be a cheap liar. Obama has proven himself to be smart, honest, and adaptable—all qualities we need if we are to get out of this mess that idiot Bush, McCain, and the Republicans have put us in.

And I swear you have some kind of Pelosi-Reid complex. I never think about those people and don't need to. Who the hell cares, except the shock jocks! Why do you never mention the names Cheney or Rumsfeld, who will and already are going down in history as the evil villains they are.

You don't find it ironic that McCain tries to tell us everything is OK on the very day things fall apart? And fall apart because of Republican deregulation? Ridiculous! This man is a dangerous idiot! Being a POW didn't qualify him for anything except prison, where he should have gone for Keating-5!

20080916-07 19:08 SteveM Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveB,

How gullible you are, Carly stated that NONE of the Candidate could run a corporation, because it's private enterprise, you have to make a profit. But you beloved MSM edited it to suit their own plan and you bite!

Mar., 2005, McCain introduced a bill to "fix" Fannie and Freddie, because they were out of control and McCain stated that they could bring down the economy, Mar., 2005! The Democrats, including the black guy, voted it down and today tried to lay the blame at McCain. What a bunch of morons, they think all of us are too dumb to remember. [I believe this to be factual: <http://hotair.com/archives/2008/09/17/mccains-attempt-to-fix-fannie-mae-freddie-mac-in-2005/>. —SteveB]

You really need to start doing your homework or you're going to flunk out

20080916-08	20:31	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/16/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Johnny Boy! Today wasn't a very good day either, was it? I guess only you are too senile to see it, otherwise you would take your marbles and go home like the discredited, embarrassingly senile idiot that you are.

Today, one of your top economic advisors, Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard (where she did a pretty poor, widely discredited job) had her own senile (or brilliant?) moment. She stated unequivocally that neither Palin or McCain were fit to run a major corporation. Later, she seemed to clarify her misstatement by claiming that the U.S. is much easier to run. LOL!!!!

In all fairness, she claimed as an afterthought that her opponents, Obama and Biden, also couldn't run a major corporation, but at the very least, these statement seem to place all four candidates at the same exact level of incompetence...both her employer and his enemies. Well said, Carly!

Meanwhile, Johnny Boy, you continue to babble on about the definition of America's economic "fundamentals"—which only you define as its workers (no offense intended)—and babbling about how you've always been a champion of the deregulation that got us into this mess. You have no solution, no proposals, no demonstration of a clear understanding of the problem. Of course not! You think the middle class is all people who have less than $5,000,000!

Meanwhile, Obama's past legislation and legislation attempts were all in the right direction, and his current 6-point economic plan, which has been on the table for some time, seems very solid and would probably be a big help in our current situation.

Yes, not a very good day, Mr. War Hero! Please keep up the good work, Johnny Boy and your excellently managed and run campaign. LOL!

20080916-09	22:01	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/16/08—Addendum
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

ADDENDUM TO TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

I was probably a little too easy on you today, Johnny Boy...

There was also your advisor, Douglas Holtz-Eakin's assertion that you invented the Blackberry, or were somehow responsible for it, even though it is made by a Canadian company. This in an absurd attempt to convince us that you (and Phil Gramm) somehow have the credentials to fix the current economic crisis that you and he largely laid the ground work for with your blind deregulation. Interesting that you could invent the Blackberry without knowing, as you have so proudly admitted, old geezer, "how to work the email."

Then, Mr. Self-Proclaimed War Hero, there was your brilliant solution to the aforementioned economic crisis...you will appoint a commission to figure out what you apparently don't even know how to say anything about.

Ah, yes, a commission! Just what we need to calm the markets and fix the immediate problems. If you had been the Roman Emperor, I'm sure you would have fiddled while Rome burned, a*s-wipe!

20080917-01 09:03 SteveB Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveM,

More bull cr*p! Wiggle. Wiggle. Wiggle.

In a democracy, the least fit to lead are the liars. That is why Nixon, the Clintons, and idiot Bush are so discredited and will go down in history as nothing but liars.

McCain is the biggest liar of them all. (Although Palin is starting to give him some competition.) I watched the entire video of Carly's interview, so what are you talking about MSNBC for? We know what she said and it was damning and definitely leveled the playing field. And how does some worthless b*tch like her get to be a spokesman for McCain anyway? What is she lobbying for, huh? The fact of the matter is that she couldn't run a major corporation either. Look it up.

What had Lincoln or Kennedy led before they became President? Nothing. What had Ronald Regan run before he became governor or California...almost as big and complicated a job at the time as the Presidency? Nothing. They simply possessed the qualities necessary for the job. In my estimation, so does Obama.

My friend, I can see that you are lost in a sea of lies and ideology, much like the Christian Fundamentalists. These discussions are getting us nowhere because you ignore all reasonable arguments. And I know what I know and see what I see and I believe I see clearly. Please leave me to my vision and I will leave you to Rush's.

20080917-02 10:07 SteveM Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveB,

MSN stands for main stream media. [Except...shouldn't that be MSM? —SteveB]

Lincoln started and lead the Republican party. [But very inexperienced when he ran for president. —SteveB]

Kennedy was a Naval Officer—LEADERSHIP. [And a junior Senator like Mr. O. —SteveB]

Get a grip, SteveB. I don't listen to RL, never have, why would I?

20080917-03 10:23 SteveB Re: "Spotting a New Leader"

Dear SteveM,

The labels Republican and Democrat don't mean cr*p to me! Believe me, running a PT boat (or an airplane that gets shot down) is nothing compared to running a Presidential campaign with thousands of staffers and millions of dollars which, like that rare corporation these days, must take in more money than it spends. Make a profit indeed!

You need to at least admit that, with Palin at the table (if not way before then!), all talk of who is qualified is rendered moot and beside the point.

Since you fail to concede even that least little point and move on to any discussion of issues, don't bother me with this cr*p any more, please. I give up! The whole world, minus the radical Right, seems to think Mr. Obama is qualified. And who are Republicans to argue otherwise, since they have a V.P. candidate much less qualified for the presidency than Barry. Your argument is kaput!

20080917-04 15:31 SteveB Fw: Defending Against the Republican Lies

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I'm a little confused. The Republican lies are just too much! Let me see if I have this straight.....

If you grow up in Hawaii , raised by your grandparents, you're 'exotic, different.' Grow up in Alaska eating mooseburgers, a quintessential American story.

If your name is Barack you're a radical, unpatriotic Muslim. Name your kids Willow, Trig, and Track, you're a maverick.

Graduate from Harvard law School and you are unstable. Attend 5 different small colleges before graduating, you're well grounded.

If you spend 3 years as a brilliant community organizer, become the first black President of the Harvard Law Review, create a voter registration drive that registers 150,000 new voters, spend 12 years as a Constitutional Law professor, spend 8 years as a State Senator representing a district with over 750,000 people, become chairman of the state Senate's Health and Human Services committee, spend 4 years in the United States Senate representing a state of 13 million people while sponsoring 131 bills and serving on the Foreign Affairs, Environment and Public Works and Veteran's Affairs committees, you don't have any real leadership experience.

If your total resume is: local weather girl, 4 years on the city council and 6 years as the mayor of a town with less than 7,000 people, 20 months as the governor of a state with only 650,000 people, then you're qualified to become the country's second highest ranking executive.

If you have been married to the same woman for 19 years while raising 2 beautiful daughters, all within Protestant churches, you're not a real Christian.

If you cheated on your first wife with a rich heiress, and left your disfigured wife and married the heiress the next month, you're a Christian.

If you teach responsible, age appropriate sex education, including the proper use of birth control, you are eroding the fiber of society.

If, while governor, you staunchly advocate abstinence only, with no other option in sex education in your state's school system, while your unwed teen daughter ends up pregnant, you're very responsible.

If your wife is a Harvard graduate lawyer who gave up a position in a prestigious law firm to work for the betterment of her inner city community, then gave that up to raise a family, your family's values don't represent America's.

If you're husband is nicknamed 'First Dude', with at least one DWI conviction and no college education, who didn't register to vote until age 25 and once was a member of a group that advocated the secession of Alaska from the U.S., your family is extremely admirable.

OK, much clearer now.

20080917-05 17:53 SteveM Fw: Presidential Candidate Comparison
--

[Source of fwd. unknown. —SteveB]

Read carefully. It will be your dollars that pay for the "Changes" we're being promised if Obama wins.

2008 PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE COMPARISON TALKING POINTS

ISSUES/POSITIONS:

Favors new drilling offshore U.S.?

McCain—Yes; Obama—No

Will appoint judges who interpret the law not make it?

McCain—Yes; Obama—No

Served in the U.S. Armed Forces?

McCain—Yes; Obama—No

Amount of time served in the U.S. Senate?

McCain—22 years; Obama—173 days

Will institute a socialized national health care plan?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

Supports abortion throughout the pregnancy?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

Would pull troops out of Iraq immediately?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

Supports gun ownership rights?

McCain—Yes; Obama—No

Supports homosexual marriage?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

Proposed programs will mean a huge tax increase?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

Voted against making English the official language?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

Voted to give Social Security benefits to illegals?

McCain—No; Obama—Yes

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

MCCAIN 0% on home sales up to $500,000 per home (couples). McCain does not propose any change in existing home sales income tax.

OBAMA 28% on profit from ALL home sales. (How does this affect you? If you sell your home and make a profit, you will pay 28% of your gain on taxes. If you are heading toward retirement and would like to down-size your home or move into a retirement community, 28% of the money you make from your home will go to taxes. This proposal will adversely affect the elderly who are counting on the income from their homes as part of their retirement income.)

DIVIDEND TAX

MCCAIN 15% (no change)

OBAMA 39.6%—(How will this affect you? If you have any money invested in stock market, IRA, mutual funds, college funds, life insurance, retirement accounts, or anything that pays or reinvests dividends, you will now be paying nearly 40% of the money earned on taxes if Obama becomes president. The experts predict that 'Higher tax rates on dividends and capital gains would crash the stock market, yet do absolutely nothing to cut the deficit.')

INCOME TAX—MCCAIN

(no changes)

Single making 30K—tax $4,500

Single making 50K—tax $12,500

Single making 75K—tax $18,750

Married making 60K- tax $9,000

Married making 75K—tax $18,750

Married making 125K—tax $31,250

INCOMETAX—OBAMA [These numbers are not real. —SteveB]

(reversion to pre-Bush tax cuts)
Single making 30K—tax $8,400
Single making 50K—tax $14,000
Single making 75K—tax $23,250
Married making 60K—tax $16,800
Married making 75K—tax $21,000
Married making 125K—tax $38,750

Under Obama, your taxes could almost double!

INHERITANCE TAX

MCCAIN—0% (No change, Bush repealed this tax); OBAMA—Restore the inheritance tax.

Many families have lost businesses, farms, ranches, and homes that have been in their families for generations because they could not afford the inheritance tax. Those willing their assets to loved ones will only lose them to these taxes.

NEW TAXES PROPOSED BY OBAMA

New government taxes proposed on homes that are more than 2400 square feet. New gasoline taxes (as if gas weren't high enough already) New taxes on natural resources consumption (heating gas, water, electricity) New taxes on retirement accounts, and last but not least....New taxes to pay for socialized medicine so we can receive the same level of medical care as other third-world countries!!!

You can verify the above at the following web sites:

<http://money.cnn.com/news/specials/election/2008/index.html>

<http://www.cnn.com/ELECTION/2008/issues/issues.taxes.html>

<http://elections.foxnews.com/?s=proposed+taxes>

http://bulletin.aarp.org/yourworld/politics/articles/mccain_obama_offer_different_visions_on_taxes.html

http://blog.washingtonpost.com/fact-checker/candidates/barack_obama/

http://blog.washingtonpost.com/fact-checker/candidates/john_mccain/

20080917-06	17:55	SteveM	Fw: "Sarah Palin is the U.S.'s Answer to Margaret Thatcher!"
-------------	-------	--------	--

[Source of original email unknown. HILARIOUS! —SteveB]

Sarah Palin is the U.S.'s answer to Margaret Thatcher! Anyone who thinks she cannot handle the job or deal briskly and efficiently with ANY issue, including foreign governments well, will be mistaken.

Governor Sarah Palin of Alaska is exactly what she portrayed during her introduction and exactly what our U.S. Government needs. She is ethical to a fault (if there is such a thing), a refreshing change to the status-quo and as smart and determined a PERSON (gender really isn't an issue here as far as I'm concerned) as anyone could ask for at the head of government.

Sarah is no naive mall town mayor she just started out there. Btw, as Mayor of Wasilla, she brought this small town through a lot of GOOD changes and left it at the end of her term having grown to the 4th largest CITY in Alaska a lot of growth and a stronger economic base than ever before. As well as manager of the $36 million budget and staff.

She has EXECUTIVE experience running a government (something NONE of the other candidates can actually boast, not even John McCain) as Governor of Alaska and got there by defeating the incumbent Republican Governor, who was definitely part of the "old school" and who WAS very much in the pocket of the big oil companies. You want change you can believe in?

Sarah Palin is everything she looks to be and more. Her approval rating as Governor of Alaska has been as high as 95% and is currently leveled out consistently in the upper 80 percentile throughout the state (and in both parties)—the HIGHEST approval rating of ANY sitting Governor.

Sarah has been turning around corruption in the Legislature of Alaska—turning things on their ear for that matter; cutting spending in spite of the increased income the state is currently receiving due to the high oil prices—she has insisted on putting a huge amount of the "windfall" into savings for the future rather than spending, spending, spending—and has insisted from the get-go on what she refers to as "honest, ethical and transparent governing"—no more closed door meetings and dealings—the big oil companies thought she would be a pushover and have learned better to their chagrin.

She understands the "real people" and the economic issues we all face. Rather than passing useless "laws" or throwing money at pet projects, she (most recently) temporarily suspended the state gas tax (on gasoline at the pumps, fuel oil and natural gas for homes, etc.) and has ordered checks issued to ALL residents of Alaska this fall in an attempt to assist with the burden of high fuel costs for the upcoming winter.

She became Governor of Alaska by defeating the Incumbent Republican Governor and doing it without the money or the support of the Republican Party, which was amazing in itself—and she won by a landslide. The "powers that be" at that time totally underestimated Sarah and learned better the hard way. She has done exactly what she claimed she was going to do and is just as popular today as the day she was elected—perhaps more so—she works well with both sides in the Legislature.

As for worrying about what would happen if McCain were to die or step down or whatever ... Theta, up here in AK we've only been wondering how long we would be able to KEEP Sarah in Alaska and have seen her as our first woman President of the U.S. from the start. It's always been a matter of whether she would wait until the end of her TWO terms as Governor (no doubt at ALL that she would be reelected if she ran for a second term at the end of her current term) ... or end up in Washington sooner. She could do the job TODAY.

Personally, I feel a lot better about McCain now that I know he has someone as savvy, as strong, as ethical and as steady as Sarah at his back. She will be an excellent Vice President ... and my guess is will be our U.S. Republican Presidential candidate in four years.

20080917-07 18:05 SteveM Fw: "Obama's Not Exactlys"

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

GET YOUR HEAD OUT OF THE SAND. TERRY ANDERSON, A BLACK LOS ANGELES TALK RADIO HOST, WENT DOWN A LIST OF THINGS SENATOR OBAMA HAS SAID THAT AREN'T EXACTLY CORRECT:

Obama's Not Exactlys

1. Selma March Got Me Born—NOT EXACTLY, your parents felt safe enough to have you in 1961—Selma had no effect on your birth, as Selma was in 1965. (Google 'Obama Selma' for his full Mar. 4, 2007, speech and articles about its various untruths.)
2. Father Was a Goat Herder—NOT EXACTLY, he was a privileged, well educated youth, who went on to work with the Kenyan Government.
3. Father Was a Proud Freedom Fighter—NOT EXACTLY, he was part of one of the most corrupt and violent governments Kenya has ever had.
4. My Family Has Strong Ties to African Freedom—NOT EXACTLY, your cousin Raila Odinga has created mass violence in attempting to overturn a legitimate election in 2007, in Kenya. It is the first widespread violence in decades. The current government is pro-American but Odinga wants to overthrow it and establish Muslim Sharia law. Your half-brother, Abongo Obama, is Odinga's follower. You interrupted your New Hampshire campaigning to speak to Odinga on the phone. Obama's cousin Odinga in Kenya ran for president and tried to get Sharia

Muslim law in place there. When Odinga lost the elections, his followers have burned Christians' homes and then burned men, women and children alive in a Christian church where they took shelter.. Obama SUPPORTED his cousin before the election process here started. Google Obama and Odinga and see what you get. No one wants to know the truth.

5. My Grandmother Has Always Been a Christian—NOT EXACTLY, she does her daily Salat prayers at 5am according to her own interviews. Not to mention, Christianity wouldn't allow her to have been one of 14 wives to 1 man.

6. My Name Is African Swahili—NOT EXACTLY, your name is Arabic and 'Baraka' (from which Barack came) means 'blessed' in that language. Hussein is also Arabic and so is Obama. Barack Hussein Obama is not half black. If elected, he would be the first Arab-American President, not the first black President. Barack Hussein Obama is 50% Caucasian from his mother's side and 43.75% Arabic and 6.25% African Negro from his father's side. While Barack Hussein Obama's father was from Kenya, his father's family was mainly Arabs. Barack Hussein Obama's father was only 12.5% African Negro and 87.5% Arab (his father's birth certificate even states he's Arab, not African Negro).

http://www.arcadeathome.com/newsboy.phtml?Barack Hussein Obama - Arab-American, only 6.25%25 African

7. I Never Practiced Islam—NOT EXACTLY, you practiced it daily at school, where you were registered as a Muslim and kept that faith for 31 years, until your wife made you change, so you could run for office. 4-3-08 Article 'Obama was 'quite religious in Islam'.

<http://www.wnd.com/index.php?fa=PAGE.view&pageId=60559>

8. My School in Indonesia Was Christian—NOT EXACTLY, you were registered as Muslim there and got in trouble in Koranic Studies for making faces (check your own book). Feb. 28, 2008. Kristoff from the New York Times a year ago: Mr. Obama recalled the opening lines of the Arabic call to prayer, reciting them with a first-rate accent. In a remark that seemed delightfully uncalculated (it'll give Alabama voters heart attacks), Mr. Obama described the call to prayer as 'one of the prettiest sounds on Earth at sunset.' This is just one example of what Pamela is talking about when she says 'Obama's narrative is being altered, enhanced and manipulated to whitewash troubling facts.'

9. I Was Fluent in Indonesian—NOT EXACTLY, not one teacher says you could speak the language.

10. Because I Lived In Indonesia, I Have More Foreign Experience—NOT EXACTLY, you were there from the ages of 6 to 10, and couldn't even speak the language. What did you learn except how to study the Koran and watch cartoons.

11. I Am Stronger on Foreign Affairs—NOT EXACTLY, except for Africa (surprise) and the Middle East (bigger surprise), you have never been anywhere else on the planet and thus have NO experience with our closest allies.

12. I Blame My Early Drug Use on Ethnic Confusion—NOT EXACTLY, you were quite content in high school to be Barry Obama, no mention of Kenya and no mention of struggle to identify—your classmates said you were just fine .

13. An Ebony Article Moved Me to Run for Office—NOT EXACTLY, Ebony has yet to find the article you mention in your book. It doesn't, and never did, exist.

14. A Life Magazine Article Changed My Outlook on Life—NOT EXACTLY, Life has yet to find the article you mention in your book. It doesn't, and never did, exist.

15. I Won't Run on a National Ticket in '08—NOT EXACTLY, here you are, despite saying, live on TV, that you would not have enough experience by then, and you are all about having experience first.

16. Voting 'Present' Is Common in Illinois Senate—NOT EXACTLY, they are common for YOU, but not many others have 130 NO VOTES.

17. Oops, I mis-voted—NOT EXACTLY, only when caught by church groups and Democrats, did you beg to change your mis-vote.
18. I Was A Professor of Law—NOT EXACTLY, you were a senior lecturer ON LEAVE.
19. I Was a Constitutional Lawyer—NOT EXACTLY, you were a senior lecturer ON LEAVE.
20. Without Me, There Would Be No Ethics Bill—NOT EXACTLY, you didn't write it, introduce it, change it or create it.
21. The Ethics Bill Was Hard to Pass—NOT EXACTLY, it took just 14 days from start to finish.
22. I Wrote a Tough Nuclear Bill—NOT EXACTLY, your bill was rejected by your own party for its pandering and lack of all regulation—mainly because of your nuclear donor, Exelon, from which David Axelrod came.
23. I Have Released My State Records—NOT EXACTLY, as of Mar., 2008, state bills you sponsored or voted for have yet to be released, exposing all the special interests pork hidden within.
24. I Took On the Asbestos Altgeld Gardens Mess—NOT EXACTLY, you were part of a large group of people who remedied Altgeld Gardens. You failed to mention anyone else but yourself, in your books.
25. My Economics Bill Will Help America—NOT EXACTLY, your 111 economic policies were just combined into a proposal which lost 99-0, and even YOU voted against your own bill.
26. I Have Been a Bold Leader in Illinois—NOT EXACTLY, even your own supporters claim to have not seen BOLD action on your part.
27. I Passed 26 of My Own Bills in One Year—NOT EXACTLY, they were not YOUR bills, but rather handed to you, after their creation by a fellow Senator, to assist you in a future bid for higher office.
28. No One on My campaign Contacted Canada about NAFTA—NOT EXACTLY, the Canadian Government issued the names and a memo of the conversation your campaign had with them.
29. I Am Tough on Terrorism—NOT EXACTLY, you missed the Iran Resolution vote on terrorism and your good friend Ali Abunimah supports the destruction of Israel ...
30. I Want All Votes to Count—NOT EXACTLY, you said let the delegates decide.
31. I Want Americans to Decide—NOT EXACTLY, you prefer caucuses that limit the vote, confuse the voters, force a public vote, and only operate during small windows of time.
32. I passed 900 Bills in the State Senate—NOT EXACTLY, you passed 26, most of which you didn't write yourself.
33. I Believe in Fairness, Not Tactics—NOT EXACTLY, you used tactics to eliminate Alice Palmer from running against you.
34. I Don't Take PAC Money—NOT EXACTLY, you take loads of it.
35. I don't Have Lobbyists—NOT EXACTLY, you have over 47 lobbyists, and counting.
36. My Campaign Had Nothing to Do with the 1984 Ad—NOT EXACTLY, your own campaign worker made the ad on his Apple in one afternoon.
37. I Have Always Been Against Iraq—NOT EXACTLY, you weren't in office to vote against it AND you have voted to fund it every single time.
38. I Have Always Supported Universal Health Care—NOT EXACTLY, your plan leaves us all to pay for the 15,000,000 who don't have to buy it.

39. My Uncle Liberated Auschwitz Concentration Camp—NOT EXACTLY, your mother had no brothers and the Russian army did the liberating

20080918-01 14:30 B. Obama Solving Our Financial Crisis

Dear SteveB:

The economy hit a new low this week, and in every part of the country, people like you are feeling it.

The recent financial disasters—from the collapse of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to the historic drop in the stock market—are not just a string of bad luck. They are the result of years of bad decisions made in favor of big corporate special interests instead of America's working families.

More than 600,000 Americans have lost their jobs since January. Home foreclosures are skyrocketing, and home values are plunging. Gas prices are at an all-time high, and we're still spending more than $10 billion every month on a war in Iraq that should never have been waged.

John McCain's campaign is doing everything it can to focus attention on false personal attacks and distractions—but there's too much at stake for that kind of politics.

I need your help to get the conversation back on track.

For eight years, Bush-McCain economic policies have favored reckless deregulation and huge tax loopholes for big corporations. Now, as these corporations crumble, American taxpayers are facing costly bailouts.

More of the same failed ideas are not going to solve our economic problems.

I'm calling for a $1,000 tax break for middle-class families—not just because they need help dealing with the rising costs of gas, food, and health care, but also because our economy needs to be reinvigorated from the bottom up, not the top down.

I'm proposing a second stimulus package to save over one million jobs and provide immediate relief to struggling families.

And I'll end the "anything goes" culture on Wall Street with real regulation. We can see clearly that our economy is stronger when we protect investments and pensions, and avoid devastating bankruptcies and bailouts.

This is no ordinary time, and it shouldn't be an ordinary election. Help keep the discussion focused on the issues.

Thanks for helping to bring the change this country needs, Barack

20080918-02 20:50 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/18/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

WOW! This guy really is senile! And how does abject stupidity qualify a man to be President? After almost getting tarred and feathered at a GM auto plant in Michigan yesterday, McCain was interviewed by a Florida affiliate of Spain's Union Radio (Radio Caracol Miami).

Below is the transcript of that very frightening interview which shows McCain to be a complete ignoramus on foreign policy, the world, and even where friendly member countries of NATO are located:

Q: Senator, finally, let's talk about Spain. If you are elected president, would you be willing to invite President Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero to the White House to meet with you?

McCain: I would be willing to meet with those leaders who are friends and want to work with us in a cooperative fashion. And by the way, President Calderon of Mexico is fighting a very, very tough fight against the drug cartels. I am glad we are now working in cooperation with the Mexican government on the Merida plan. And I intend to move forward with relations and invite as many of them as I can, of those leaders to the White House.

Q: Would that invitation be extended to the Zapatero government, to the president himself?

McCain: I don't, I, you know, honestly, I have to look at relations, and the situations, and the priorities but I can assure you I will establish closer relations with our friends, and I will stand up to those who want to do harm to the United States of America. I know how to do both.

Q: So you have to wait and see if he is willing to meet with you, will you be able to do it in the White House?

McCain: Well, again, I don't. All I can tell you is that I have a clear record of working with leaders in the hemisphere that are friends with us and standing up to those who are not. And that's judged on the basis of the importance of our relationship with Latin America and the entire region.

Q: Okay, what about you? I'm talking about the President of Spain.

McCain: What about me what?

Q: Okay, are you willing to meet with him if you are elected president?

McCain: I am willing to meet with any leader who is dedicated to the same principles and philosophy that we are for human rights, democracy, and freedom. And I will stand up to those that do not.

Check it out online for yourself. I don't make this stuff up. Who could? Not even Shakespeare. Nobody would believe it.

GEEZ! This senile old geezer is actually running for President? Of the U.S.? OMG! I don't think idiot Bush is even this stupid.

Oh, and Johnny Boy finally decided today that maybe the economy is not so great and maybe there is a crisis and maybe he would start firing people. He still couldn't offer any concrete proposals, let alone any solutions. What a sad state the Grand Old Party has fallen to!

20080919-01	10:03	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/18/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveM,

Here is what I got back from my Senile Moment of yesterday from a friend:

The longer he talks, I am afraid to say, he makes even our old friend W look not half bad. He scares the shi*t out of me. He is just all over the place trying to get votes. Someone tends to come around the same or next day to clean up his messes. He doesn't make sense when he does talk and has zero plans about anything. He is just damn scary. Sarah Palin is also scary!!

Let's talk about what these people are actually doing to conduct their campaigns, what's happening now. There's no need to send me a bunch of lies from right-wing radicals that have already been discredited. Let's look at what these men are actually doing and saying, then you tell me if you still think McCain would make a good President. I'm being honest with you when I tell you that all the evidence I've seen—and this is what he says every day—makes me sure he's senile! Please actually READ yesterday's email and tell me this man is a foreign policy expert!

20080919-02	10:25	SteveB	Ideology
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------

Dear SteveM,

And try to put your ideology aside and try to look at all this stuff with more objectivity.

I have. I'm basically very conservative. I think the government should stay out of our lives and our pocketbooks as much as possible. I think government should help our people first, not other countries. We need to stop illegal immigration and keep jobs here, even if it means limits to free trade. We need regulation and tax incentives to curb greed and evil among our own people. We need real solutions to the energy crisis. I don't trust government to take our guns, tell women what they can do in their private lives with their own bodies, talk to me about their f*cking religions, tell local government how to educate our children, or interfere in our lives unless we're stepping on the rights of others. We need a balanced budget, achieved by being at peace with the world.

I'm not really a Democrat. I don't like communism and pretty much feel exactly the same way about Christianity. Political correctness be damned.

But I will NOT stand aside and let another IDIOT be put in the White House, especially at a time when we need clear thinking and fresh approaches to solve our myriad of problems.

John McCain may have been real damned great when he sat in prison, or when he graduated about dead last in his Naval Academy class, or how many little screwed-up commands his daddy got him, or when he cheated on his wives, or when he f*cked up the S&L scandal, but if that's the case, he's now a shadow of his former self. He proves over and over again that he is a blithering, lying, senile idiot. Just watch what he says and what he does.

The blatant, repeated lying is what I am most sick of. More Nixon. More Clinton. More Bush. This is not the way a President acts or how a Presidential candidate gets elected. The lipstick on a pick incident and flurry of McCain campaign lies is simply one of the most recent, and one I haven't even bothered to discuss in my postings, but it is one of the ugliest and most blatant. Without a shred of truth. This is your candidate?

He doesn't know the borders of Iran, he doesn't know how to handle Russia, he talks yesterday about how safe the offshore oil platforms are when there were, what, 139 destroyed in the recent hurricane (ya, what a dependable source of what is really a trickle oil—no solution to our problem!), he thinks Spain is an enemy in Latin America, not a NATO ally in Europe. How offensive!

And foreign affairs is his strong suit????????? He admits and shows every day that he understands economics about as well as he understands "the email."

He is an idiot and, proof of proofs: he chose another idiot as his VP candidate in a blatant attempt to get elected, not thinking of what is best for the American people in any way. If you ask me, that's been typical of his approach to politics his entire life. McCain first, country last!

This guy is bad, bad news and—mark my words—the American people are waking up to this fact. [This turned-out to be true. —SteveB]

20080919-03 12:42 SteveM Re: Ideology

Dear SteveB,

We will agree to disagree.

No matter what "kernel of truth" your arguments against McCain (a disabled veteran, who deserves better from you) and Palin, they will be better than then socialist puppet Obama! This morning the black guy repeated verbatim Pelosi's vote buying blackmail demands. I cannot in good conscience give control of the Presidency, the House and the Senate to Pelosi, Reid, and BHO. These are people who look down on you and believe that the only reason socialism hasn't worked, is because they haven't been ruining it.

I lived through the "Carter Admin" once, so to put a fine point on it, a dead John McCain, dragged around the campaign trail in a casket, like "Weekend at Bernie's" is better for the country than BHO. Or to use your ideology, "less worse". BHO, Biden and the Dem's in general offer negative leadership in theory and practice, (picking up the turd by the clean end).

As for people waking up, do not discount the angry women who feel betrayed by Donna Brazile and Howard Dean, who are going to "show you" when they're in the voting booth. Let's just hope the Chicago Machine doesn't try to steal this election like they did in '60.

So in parting, we will agree to disagree, and I predict, a McCain/Palin win, that Blacks will riot in multiple cities (do you think BHO we give a "can't we all get along" speech?), and Cook Co, Ill. will have ballot and voter fraud. Mark my words! [This prediction also turned-out to be wrong. —SteveB]

20080919-04	18:48	Charlie	Hello from Houston, TX; Blogs
-----------------------------	-------	---------	-------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Hello from Houston, TX. This is Charlie, a friend of Ben's.

Somehow I got on your EMAIL list (McCain Senior Moments). I hope you're keeping a blog or archive of these, they'd be fascinating historical references.

I'm a "hacktivist"—technoid who's also a political junkie. And very involved in a lot of different political activities both from an on-the-street perspective (marching, etc.) as well as building websites for political action.

Feel free to visit my blog:

<http://cyberchuck-video.homeip.net/wordpress/>.

See the DNCC '08 blog and pictures (I was in Denver at the stadium) and look at the "links" section for other blogs (including others I've done).

Do you have a blog somewhere? If you're not blogging you really ought to be.

20080919-05	19:07	SteveB	This Is the Week McCain Lost the Election
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

This is the week McCain lost the Presidency by proving that he isn't competent to be President.

20080919-06	20:25	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/19/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Today, these were the lies Johnny Boy had to tell about the economic crisis (instead of offering any solution):

My friends, this is the problem with Washington. People like Senator Obama have been too busy gaming the system and haven't ever done a thing to actually challenge the system.

We've heard a lot of words from Senator Obama over the course of this campaign. But maybe just this once he could spare us the lectures, and admit to his own poor judgment in contributing to these problems. The crisis on Wall Street started in the Washington culture of lobbying and influence peddling, and he was square in the middle of it.

This was interjected into the problem while Obama was meeting with his seven top economic advisors. I thought Obama's response, given later, was brilliant:

This morning, Senator McCain gave a speech in which his big solution to this world wide economic crisis was to blame me for it.

This is the guy who spent nearly three decades in Washington and after spending the entire campaign saying I haven't been in Washington long enough, he apparently now is willing to assign me the responsibility for all of Washington's failures.

I think it's pretty clear that Sen. McCain is a little panicked right now. At this point he seems to be willing to say anything or do anything or change any position or violate any principle to try and win this election.

I think that's all fine and good but here's what I think. In the next 47 days you can fire the whole trickle-down, on-your-own, look-the-other way crowd in Washington who has led us down this disastrous path. Don't just get rid of one guy. Get rid of this administration. Get rid of this philosophy. Get rid of the do-nothing approach to our economic problem and put somebody in there who's going to fight for you.

20080919-07 21:40 SteveB Fw: George W. Bush's Resume

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

An Executive's Resume. This person needs a job. This individual seeks an executive position. He will be available in Jan., 2009, and is willing to relocate.

RESUME of GEORGE W. BUSH, 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, DC 20520

EDUCATION AND EXPERIENCE:

Law Enforcement: I was arrested in Kennebunkport, Maine, in 1976 for driving under the influence of alcohol. I pled guilty, paid a fine, and had my driver's license suspended for 30 days. My Texas driving record has been 'lost' and is not available.

Military: I joined the Texas Air National Guard and went AWOL. I refused to take a drug test or answer any questions about my drug use. By joining the Texas Air National Guard, I was able to avoid combat duty in Vietnam.

College: I graduated from Yale University with a low C average. I was a cheerleader.

PAST WORK EXPERIENCE:

I ran for U.S. Congress and lost.

I began my career in the oil business in Midland Texas , in 1975. I bought an oil company, but couldn't find any oil in Texas. The company went bankrupt shortly after I sold all my stock.

I bought the Texas Rangers baseball team in a sweetheart deal that took land using taxpayer money.

With the help of my father and our friends in the oil industry (including Enron CEO Ken Lay), I was elected governor of Texas.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS AS GOVERNOR OF TEXAS:

I changed Texas pollution laws to favor power and oil companies, making Texas the most polluted state in the Union. During my tenure, Houston replaced Los Angeles as the most smog-ridden city in America.

I cut taxes and bankrupted the Texas treasury to the tune of billions in borrowed money.

With the help of my brother, the governor of Florida , and my father's appointments to the Supreme Court, I became President of the United States, after losing by over 500,000 votes.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS AS PRESIDENT:

I am the first President in U.S. History to enter office with a criminal record.

I invaded and occupied two countries at a continuing cost of over one billion dollars per week.

I spent the U.S. Surplus and effectively bankrupted the U.S. Treasury.

I shattered the record for the largest annual deficit in U.S. History.

I set an economic record for most private bankruptcies filed in any 12-month period.

I set the all-time record for most foreclosures in a 12-month period.

I set the all-time record for the biggest drop in the history of the U.S. Stock market.

In my first year in office, over 2 million Americans lost their jobs and that trend continues.

I'm proud that the members of my cabinet are the richest of any administration in U.S. History. My 'poorest millionaire,' Condoleezza Rice, has a Chevron oil tanker named after her.

I set the record for most campaign fund-raising trips by a U.S. President.

I am the all-time U.S. And world record—holder for receiving the most corporate campaign donations.

My largest lifetime campaign contributor, and one of my best friends, Kenneth Lay, presided over the largest corporate bankruptcy fraud in U.S. History, Enron.

My political party used Enron private jets and corporate attorneys to assure my success with the U.S. Supreme Court during my election decision.

I have protected my friends at Enron and Halliburton against investigation or prosecution. More time and money was spent investigating the Monica Lewinsky affair than has been spent investigating one of the biggest corporate rip-offs in history.

I presided over the biggest energy crisis in U.S. History and refused to intervene when corruption involving the oil industry was revealed.

I presided over the highest gasoline prices in U.S. History.

I changed the U.S. Policy to allow convicted criminals to be awarded government contracts.

I appointed more convicted criminals to my administration than any President in U.S. History.

I created the Ministry of Homeland Security, the largest bureaucracy in the history of the United States Government.

I've broken more international treaties than any President in U.S. History.

I am the first President in U.S. History to have the United Nations remove the U.S. from the Human Rights Commission.

I withdrew the U.S. from the World Court of Law.

I refused to allow inspectors access to U.S. 'prisoners of war' detainees and thereby have refused to abide by the Geneva Convention.

I am the first President in history to refuse United Nations election inspectors (during the 2002 U.S. election).

I set the record for fewest numbers of press conferences of any President since the advent of television.

I set the all-time record for most days on vacation in any one-year period. After taking off the entire month of August, I presided over the worst security failure in U.S. history.

I have set the all-time record for most people worldwide to simultaneously protest me in public venues (15 million people), shattering the record for protests against any person in the history of mankind.

I am the first President in U.S. history to order an unprovoked, pre-emptive attack and the military occupation of a sovereign nation. I did so against the will of the United Nations, the majority of U.S. Citizens and the world community.

I have cut healthcare benefits for war veterans and support a cut in duty benefits for active duty troops and their families in wartime.

In my State of the Union Address, I lied about our reasons for attacking Iraq and then blamed the lies on our British friends.

I am the first President in history to have a majority of Europeans (71%) view my presidency as the biggest threat to world peace and security.

I am supporting development of a nuclear 'Tactical Bunker Buster,' a WMD.

I have so far failed to fulfill my pledge to bring Osama Bin Laden to justice.

RECORDS AND REFERENCES

All records of my tenure as governor of Texas are now in my father's library, sealed and unavailable for public view. All records of SEC investigations into my insider trading and my bankrupt companies are sealed in secrecy and unavailable for public view. All records or minutes from meetings that I, or my Vice-President, attended regarding public energy policy are sealed in secrecy and unavailable for public review. I specified that my sealed documents will not be available for 50 years.

It does not bother me that three out of every four Americans disapprove of my handling of our country. They are really stupid anyway. They are so dumb that they elected me twice.

20080920-01 09:48 SteveB Republican Socialists: Bush & McCain

Dear SteveM,

I don't know if you realize what has happened, but your Republicans have become socialists overnight, and it's a damn good thing for the country that they did, because I think they may have avoided this century's Great Depression by doing so.

Even idiot Bush and his advisors and appointees, including SEC chairman, Christopher Cox, (whom neither Bush nor McCain can fire) obviously have a much better understanding of the kinds of problems the Phil Gramm/Republican deregulation of the banking system and Wall Street has led us into. Funny thing, we haven't heard much from McCain's Phil Gramm lately, have we?

McCain's senile idiocy: "The chairman of the S.E.C. serves at the appointment of the President and in my view, has betrayed the public's trust," he said at a rally in an airport hangar here. "If I were President today, I would fire him." "The fundamentals [duh, I mean the American workers and don't you dare insult them—even if they boo me at every rally) are strong." [Strange that "workers" are not what any economist or even McCain himself ever meant by "economic fundamentals" until his senile moment occurred. What a dirty liar our self-proclaimed war hero is. (You know, to me, a "war hero" is not a guy who crashes planes and sits in prison doing nothing. It is a man who sacrifices himself in some way to save the lives of others or win a battle. Even many veterans object to McCain calling himself a "war hero".)]

It appears that your Grand Old Party has sold you down the river more than your poor old nemesis Jimmy Carter ever conceived of.

And who cares if Lincoln was a Republican? My comment (unanswered by you) that his experience going into office was less than Obama's still applies. But maybe you think the Civil War was a big mistake and a communist plot too? Go Rebels!

20080920-02 11:06 SteveB Re: Hello from Houston; Blogs

Charlie,

Hello from the Bitterroot Valley, Montana. Good to hear from you. Ya, Ben and I go back to the Seventies when we taught high school together, before Ben went to dental school and I became an automation controls design engineer

(now retired). I did work in the U.S. (of course), Canada, Mexico, Indonesia, China, Great Britain, and Puerto Rico (even Houston and Huntsville).

I really liked your blog and am happy to know about it. I don't do a blog myself and don't really know much about it, but would like to learn more. I'm actually more of a poet and novelist than political hack, but I've just been getting so pi*sed—first by the Clintons, then by McCain, that I had to express myself, at least to my friends and acquaintances. I appreciate your positive comments on my emailings.

Ideologically, I'm more of a radical conservative than a Democrat, though I am pro-choice, antiestablishment, against election buying by special interest groups, for the legalization of marijuana, anti-Iraq war, anti-Afghan war, anti-state sponsored religion (especially fundamentalist—hello, Texas!), anti-tax and spend, anti-illegal immigration (though I am married to a Bolivian), against deficit spending and high taxes, but for a government that protects its citizens from attacks both foreign (a la 9/11 and illegals) and domestic (a la Wall Street greed and meltdown).

I guess that about sums it up...

I hope you'll stay in touch. Hope you rode out the hurricane well. Poor Galveston. I hope the government, etc. can help down there better than in New Orleans, even though people don't seem to be complaining as much. (Jeez...a lot of hopes in this paragraph...)

20080921-01	00:37	Charlie	Re: Hello from Houston; Blogs
-------------	-------	---------	-------------------------------

from SteveB:

Hello from the Bitterroot Valley, Montana. Good to hear from you. Ya, Ben and I go back to the Seventies when we taught high school together, before Ben went to dental school and I became an automation controls design engineer (now retired). I did work in the U.S. (of course), Canada, Mexico, Indonesia, China, Great Britain, and Puerto Rico (even Houston and Huntsville).

Dear SteveB,

Interesting.

I really liked your blog and am happy to know about it. I don't do a blog myself and don't really know much about it, but would like to learn more. I'm actually more of a poet and novelist than political hack, but I've just been getting so pi*sed—first by the Clintons, then by McCain, that I had to express myself, at least to my friends and acquaintances. I appreciate your positive comments on my emailings.

Blogging is just writing. If you can use MS Word and do EMAIL you can blog.

There are quite a few free blogs out there, two are:

<http://www.blogger.com/>.

<http://www.wordpress.com/>.

Ideologically, I'm more of a radical conservative than a Democrat, though I am pro-choice, anti-establishment, against election buying by special interest groups, for the legalization of marijuana, anti-Iraq war, pro-Afghan war, anti-state sponsored religion (especially fundamentalist—hello, Texas!), anti-tax and spend, anti-illegal immigration (though I am married to a Bolivian), against deficit spending and high taxes, but for a government that protects its citizens from attacks both foreign (a la 9/11 and illegals) and domestic (a la Wall Street greed and meltdown).

"Radical conservative"? Just about 80% of what you state I agree with, and if I have to have a label I'd say "Progressive Independent", although I think the Democrats (of the two parties) have more chance of moving to our shared directions than Republicans.

Part of the "20%" is "anti-tax and spend". I'd say that I am not against taxes per se .. I'm for taxes if and only if there's accountability on where the taxes go.

So, for example, I'm definitely opposed to this $800 billion taxpayer funded bailout of the financial system. I'm not opposed to taxes to be used for building roads and bridges (provided the bridges go somewhere, not "nowhere" (I'm sure you know the reference)).

I guess that about sums it up...

Well, that sums up our first conversation. :-)

I hope you'll stay in touch. Hope you rode out the hurricane well. Poor Galveston. I hope the government, etc. can help down there better than in New Orleans, even though people don't seem to be complaining as much. (Jeez...a lot of hopes in this paragraph...)

Well, the responses seem to be much better coordinated. But if you notice there has been a near-complete media blackout for Galveston and NO ONE is allowed to go in there. Even flyover media flights (to get pictures) have been banned.

20080921-02 09:59 SteveB Fw: Donate to Planned Parenthood in Sarah Palin's Name

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Instead of (in addition to?) us all sending around emails about how horrible she is, let's all make a donation to Planned Parenthood. In Sarah Palin's name!

And here's the good part: when you make a donation to PP in her name, they'll send her a card telling her that the donation has been made in her honor. Here's the link to the Planned Parenthood website:

https://secure.ppaction.org/site/SPageServer?pagename=pp_ppol_Nondirected_HonoraryGiving

I guess the only problem would be finding out Sarah Palin's address Haha! Here's her new one in Arizona:

Sarah Palin
29005 N. 82nd St.
North Scottsdale, AZ 85266

20080921-03 11:53 KE Saavick Ford Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear SteveB:

Your question to Dr. Neil deGrasse Tyson was directed to me. He has been impossibly busy lately and I have agreed to share the task of answering the many questions he receives daily.

In answer to your question, the Big Bang resulted in an expansion of space in our Universe in an explosion that is unlike any chemical explosion that you've seen (such as with fireworks). In a firework explosion, you see shrapnel moving away from the origin of the explosion. In effect, a firework explosion is an explosion of stuff within space. The Big Bang was an explosion of space itself.

The expansion of the Universe is based on observations of the space between galaxies growing (note that space within galaxies does not appear to be expanding- the mutual gravity of all the stars & planets in a galaxy is enough to overcome space expansion). If we track that expansion back in time, it seems that all of those galaxies must meet at a point some 13.7 billion years ago. So all of those distant galaxies as well as galaxies nearby & where you're sitting reading this were all at the same hot, dense start point, some 13.7 billion years ago at the beginning of our Universe.

Thank you for your interest,

K. E. Saavik Ford
Astrophysicist and Hayden Associate
Asst. Prof. of Astronomy
Borough of Manhattan Comm. College - CUNY

20080921-04 12:11 SteveM Fw: Chicago Information

Dear SteveB,

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Body count. In the last six months 292 killed (murdered) in Chicago, 221 killed in Iraq.

Sens. Barack Obama & Dick Durbin, Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., Gov. Rod Blagojevich, House leader Mike Madigan, Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan, Mayor Richard Daley.....our leadership in Illinois.....all Democrats. Thank you for the combat zone in Chicago. Of course they're all blaming each other. Can't blame Republicans, there aren't any!

State pension fund $44 Billion in debt, worst in country. Cook County (Chicago) sales tax 10.25% highest in country. (Look 'em up if you want). Chicago school system one of the worst in country. This is the political culture that Obama comes from in Illinois. He's gonna "fix" Washington politics?

Political correctness is a doctrine, fostered by a delusional, illogical minority, and rabidly promoted by an unscrupulous mainstream media, which holds forth the proposition that it is entirely possible to pick up a turd by the clean end.

20080921-05 12:55 SteveB Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear K. E. Saavik Ford:

Thank you so much for your reply to my question.

I guess I can try to understand how the Big Bang was "an explosion of space itself".

But if, as you say, "If we track that expansion back in time, it seems that all of those galaxies must meet at a point some 13.7 billion years ago." (which I believe to be true), where exactly is this point? And why does the universe seem so evenly distributed with matter? Can it be that some matter (which became galaxies) was thrown out of the singularity at higher rates of speed/acceleration than others? To me, this seems unlikely.

Therefore, if all we think we know is true, I still don't see why there isn't a big emptiness around where the original singularity existed.

Please pardon my ignorance if I seem so.

It seems to me that the facts that we are discussing are of immense importance in understanding the nature of existence and, in my readings, at least, seem to have been largely ignored by scientists.

Again, thank you so much for trying to help me understand this difficult subject. I hope you will keep trying. You are a good person.

20080921-06 14:17 SteveB Republican Party Loyalty

Dear SteveM,

I have to admit that I completely fail to understand your dogged loyalty to the Republican party!

Surely, you don't really think that one party is more socialist than the other (as recent events have proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that this is not the case). Both parties (not necessarily every single individual within them) have sold the American people down the river in the interest of maintaining personal power, prestige, and ego. Almost anyone you talk to knows and admits that both parties are corrupt and have failed to live up to their ideals. Surely, you don't doubt this.

You maintain that you simply seek a balance of power. Does that mean that if you thought Congress was going to be in Republican hands, even veto-proof Republican hands, that you would break down and vote for the guy who has not proven himself to be a total lying senile b*stard—and vote instead for Obama instead of the lying idiot?

I doubt it.

If you think the GOP is a bunch of good guys with a unique, correct philosophy...you're living in a fictional past, not reality, my friend.

20080921-07 14:58 Trudy Fw: 143 Days of Experience

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

You couldn't be a new lawyer with 143 days of experience and become a partner in any law firm. You couldn't get a job at McDonalds and become district manager after 143 days of experience. You couldn't become chief of surgery after 143 days of experience of being a surgeon. You couldn't get a job as a teacher and be the superintendent after 143 days of experience. You couldn't join the military and become a colonel after a 143 days of experience. You couldn't get a job as a reporter and become the nightly news anchor after 143 days of experience.

BUT....

From the time Barack Obama was sworn in as a United State Senator, to the time he announced he was forming a Presidential exploratory committee, he logged 143 days of "experience" in the Senate. That's how many days the Senate was actually in session and working. After 143 days of work "experience," Obama believed he was ready to be Commander In Chief, Leader of the Free World 143 days. We all have to start somewhere. The senate is a good start, but after 143 days, that's all it is—a start.

AND, strangely, a large sector of the American public is okay with this and campaigning for him. We wouldn't accept this in our own line of work, yet some are okay with this for the President of the United States of America ? Come on folks, we are not voting for the next American Idol! Please, please forward this before it's too late!!!!

20080921-08 15:22 Trudy Fw: Change???

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Don't just delete it because you are a Democrat, explain it if you can. My guess is like Obama's legislative record, no one will be able to explain why. I don't need any more change myself.

This was sent to me by a good friend in DC.....take from it what you will.....

Hey guys...facts are facts!! This has to make you think a little bit, if not then keep your blinders on!

George Bush has been in office for 7 1/2 years. The first six the economy was fine. A little over one year ago:

1. Consumer confidence stood at a 2 1/2 year high;
2. Regular gasoline sold for $2.19 a gallon;
3. the unemployment rate was 4.5%.
4. the DOW JONES hit a record high—14,000 +
5. American's were buying new cars, taking cruises, vacations o'seas, living large!...

But American's wanted 'CHANGE'! So, in 2006 they voted in a Democratic Congress & yep—we got 'CHANGE' all right. In the PAST YEAR:

1. Consumer confidence has plummeted.
2. Gasoline is now over $4 a gallon & climbing!.
3. Unemployment is up to 5% (a 10% increase).
4. Americans have seen their home equity drop by $1 2 TRILLION DOLLARS & prices still dropping.
5. 1% of American homes are in foreclosure.
6. as I write, THE DOW is probing another low~~11,100—$2.5 TRILLION DOLLARS HAS EVAPORATED FROM THEIR STOCKS, BONDS & MUTUAL FUNDS INVESTMENT PORTFOLIOS!

YEP , IN 2006 AMERICA VOTED FOR CHANGE!...AND WE SURE AS HELL GOT IT!!!.....NOW OBAMA, the DEM'S CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT—AND THE POLLS SAY HE'S GONNA BE 'THE MAN'—CLAIMS HE'S GONNA REALLY GIVE US CHANGE!!.....JUST HOW MUCH MORE 'CHANGE' DO YA THINK YOU CAN STAND???...

20080921-09 15:42 Trudy Fw: "Bad American"

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

YES, I'M A BAD AMERICAN

I Am the Liberal-Progressives Worst Nightmare. I am an American.

I believe the money I make belongs to me and my family, not some Liberal governmental functionary be it Democratic or Republican!

I'm in touch with my feelings and I like it that way!

I think owning a gun doesn't make you a killer, it makes you a smart American.

I think being a minority does not make you noble or victimized, and does not entitle you to anything.

I believe that if you are selling me a Big Mac, do it in English.

I believe everyone has a right to pray to his or her God when and where they want to.

My heroes are John Wayne, Babe Ruth, Roy Rogers, and whoever canceled Jerry Springer.

I know wrestling is fake and I don't waste my time watching or arguing about it.

I've never owned a slave, or was a slave, I haven't burned any witches or been persecuted by the Turks and neither have you! So, shut up already.

I believe if you don't like the way things are here, go back to where you came from and change your own country! This is AMERICA.

If you were born here and don't like it you are free to move to any Socialist country that will have you.

I want to know which church is it exactly where the Reverend Jesse Jackson preaches, where he gets his money, and why he is always part of the problem and not the solution. Can I get an AMEN on that one?

I think the cops have every right to shoot your sorry rear if you're running from them..

I also think they have the right to pull you over if you're breaking the law, regardless of what color you are.

And, no, I don't mind having my face shown on my driver's license. I think it's good.....

And I'm proud that "God" is written on my money.

I think if you are too stupid to know how a ballot works, I don't want you deciding who should be running the most powerful nation in the world for the next four years.

I dislike those people standing in the intersections trying to sell me stuff or trying to guilt me into making "donations" to their cause.

I believe that it doesn't take a village to raise a child, it takes two parents.

I believe "illegal" is illegal no matter what the lawyers think.

I believe the American flag should be the only one allowed in AMERICA!

If this makes me a BAD American, then yes, I'm a BAD American.

If you are a BAD American too, please forward this to everyone you know.

We want our country back!

We NEED GOD BACK IN OUR COUNTRY!

20080921-10 16:37 SteveB Re: "Bad American"

Dear Trudy,

Oh my, NOT politically correct, but I can find nothing here to argue with. Mainly because these are "straw dog" positions created for the left, here. Let's take America back by electing Obama and firing every single member of Congress. If we fire ALL of them in the next 2 or 3 elections, maybe the stupid, selfish, power-hungry, lying, a*s-holes will begin to get the idea that we are fed-up!!!

You see, the tactic in your forwarded email is to divide by creating a lie about one side's position. "Liberal Progressives" are Americans too and want pretty much the same things as the Conservative writer of the email. Don't you think?

Let me give you a little example of something interesting. Here's a quote from the email: "If you were born here and don't like it you are free to move to any Socialist country that will have you."

Well, the writer of the email is obviously pretty darned unhappy about things, by his/her belligerent attitude. Does that mean the author will be heading to Cuba soon, as I guess he/she should? Is it impossible for a country to be on an erroneous path in at least one area, and responsible citizens not like what has become and want to change it? And would that mean they don't love America? See how ridiculous this gets? But a little subtle.

20080921-11 17:14 Trudy Re: "Bad American"

Dear SteveB,

I know that is the real way to do it, but they only give us two choices each time , the agendas are from sooooo long ago that I'm not too sure anyone can be just Republican or Democratic these days. Help!!!!

20080921-12 17:21 SteveB Re: "143 Days of Experience"

Dear Trudy,

Lincoln and Kennedy had almost no experience before becoming great Presidents. Ronald Reagan and Arnold had NO experience, except as actors, before becoming successful governors of California—a job almost as difficult as President, if you ask me.

McCain has zero executive experience too, just like Hillary Clinton did/didn't. Obama too. So what? It's an even playing field when it comes to experience. McCain's statements of the last few weeks and months prove that he is confused by foreign affairs (Georgia, Iran, Spain) and economics ("the fundamentals are sound").

McCain has proven by his words and actions that he is a liar and senile (see previous postings).

McCain finished almost last in his class at the Naval Academy and only graduated because his Daddy and Granpa were admirals. In the Navy, about all he did was crash airplanes (look it up). Again, Daddy finally got him a command—for a while. Obama's academic record is impeccable.

Basically, I'm a conservative, but as the current Wall St. crisis and the budget deficits and the jobs going to China and the illegal aliens have shown, the Republicans have sold the American people down the river just as much as the Democrats. They all are controlled by their greed, ambition, the big companies, the special interests, and even foreign governments. They ALL need to be sent home!

As I've said, I'll take an honest, intelligent man over a lying, stupid, senile one any day. Obama is that man, not McCain.

20080921-13 17:25 SteveB Re: Change???

Dear Trudy,

Except Congress did almost nothing during the Bush era. What we are reaping now are the fruits of Republican deregulation and selling-out to the highest bidder which began in the Republican-controlled Congress during the Clinton (still don't like that guy) era (Phil Gramm) and continued during Bush's first term, when the Republicans controlled everything, had their chance, and totally blew it.

20080921-14 18:01 SteveB Re: A Book of Lies

Dear SteveM,

Huh??? The stuff in this book has been completely discredited as BS! How is it possible that, "This should convince the fence sitters that the puppet BHO can't be entrusted to lead this great country!?" I suppose Obama wasn't born in the U.S. and his parents weren't his parents and he's a mole! As the song says, "Paranoia, big destoya!"

20080922-01 10:21 KE Saavick Ford Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear SteveB:

Keep in mind that how we measure things is by looking at 'space'. So if space itself is expanding, there is no 'outside' or 'inside' the big bang — it's all there — there is no origin point. Think of it as though we are all dots on the surface of a balloon, and the balloon is blown up - but we are restricted to exist on the surface of the balloon. All the dots are together, on top of each other at the beginning, before you blow the balloon up. When you blow it up, the space between the dots expands. The dots on the balloon all get further apart and if you look from the perspective of any one dot, the furthest dots travel furthest and fastest.

Switch your perspective to a new dot and the view is the same. This is called isotropy, a key discovery scientists have made by observing our universe. The relatively smooth, even distribution of galaxies in our universe is also a prediction of the big bang (we all start together and spread out evenly - called homogeneity), so we are aware of it and even pleased to see it. There's no hole. And that accords with our predictions.

Hope that helps,
KES Ford (K. E. Saavik Ford)

20080922-02 11:12 SteveB Re: "Bad American"

Dear Trudy,

That's why I don't care about Republican or Democrat and don't care so much about the agendas either. And maybe it's a little sad that we really only ever have two choices. I think I wish we had a solid third party, but if you look at other countries, multiple parties often lead to chaos, so I'm not sure I want to wish that on us.

After having Nixon, Clinton, and Bush look me and the American people in the eyes and lying out their a*s'es to us, lying is the one thing I can stand the least in a politician—to me, it is the unforgivable sin. The liars are the politicians who don't give a damn about us and want only power and all the things that go with it for themselves. They have sold their souls!

Hillary and McCain are the two biggest liars of them all, so, for me, the decisions there are easy. I have yet to catch Obama in a real lie. I catch McCain every single day.

For me the rest is easy, though not as effective unless everyone would do it. As long as the person who is out of office, trying to get in, is not a blatant liar, I will vote for them and against the incumbent. Regardless of party. Judges included.

I want them all to wake up to knowing who their bosses really are—we, the people! Then, once they have woken up, maybe we can convince them to reform the election system so that politicians cannot be bought and sold by whomever has the money—big companies, special interests, foreign governments, friends, all of them—out of luck! Anything less is total corruption of the system, and that's what we have now, and that's why the system is broken and doesn't work.

20080922-03 13:47 SteveB Re: Chicago Information

Dear SteveM,

These problems are the fault of drugs and no jobs and that has a lot to do with Republicans!

Legalize marijuana, tax the hell out of it, use that money to fight smugglers, growers, and dealers of cocaine, heroin, and crack, and to cure addicts and prevent more addicts (though the marijuana would go a huge way toward eliminating addict, dealers, etc.). The prisons would be almost empty and that would save a ton of money too. Eventually, a lot of cops could be laid-off and they could go back to being just a*s-holes. That would save a ton of money too.

People just want to get high and the idiot Republicans don't think they have the right to. If Republicans had their way, alcohol and sex would be illegal too!!!

To try to blame all the problems in the country or anywhere in the country on just Democrats is asinine and you know it!!! Way, way too simplistic and I'm ashamed of you for it.

20080922-04 20:32 SteveB Fw: "Don't Let Them Know..."

Dear SteveM,

Please rise above ideology on this one!

If McCain is such a great leader (as you keep trying to prove through references to the distant past), where is his leadership on this current financial crisis that Bush and his buddies and Phil Gramm and John McCain and their buddies have gotten us into?

What is the great leader's solution? Where is even straight, consistent talk from the great leader? Where is any hint that he even understands in the least what is going on? Blame Obama indeed! What a crock of you-know-what! This idiot should be tarred-and-feathered the way the GM autoworkers wanted to do.

Below is an email I just received from another conservative friend.

[Original source of email unknown. —SteveB]

Remember who you voted for back in 2000?

Since 2000, our national debt has roughly doubled. Following the ongoing financial bailout, the federal government will have borrowed $10 trillion, mostly from foreign lenders. That's roughly $100,000 per family. And that doesn't include any of the future promises to pay for Medicare and Social Security. The money for that will begin to come out of the Treasury's general fund in about 10 more years.

When you remember who you voted for, don't let the grandkids know!

20080922-05	22:41	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/22/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

With the Alaskan Troopergate scandal rapidly unraveling, I guess we now know why you picked Sarah Palin for you prospective VP, Johnny Boy. It turns out that she's just as big a liar as you are, Mr. Self-proclaimed War Hero.

Palin had publicly stated that her reason for firing Alaska's Public Safety Commissioner Walt Monegan was because, "He never had authorization to fly to DC!" [to work on obtaining federal money for investigating and prosecuting sexual assault cases, something you would think Palin would be all for]

However, the truth of the matter is slightly more complex, hinting more than strongly at a cover-up. Alaskan Democrats have turned-up a travel authorization document signed by Palin's Chief on Staff Mike Nizich on June 18. He had approved Monegan's trip to Washington for the purpose of meeting with Senator Lisa Murkowski.

So, this was the "insubordination" that led to Monegan's firing, not his refusal to fire a trooper as a personal favor to Palin and her family. Bull cr*p! I'm sure you're aware by now that Monegan has a nearly impeccable record as an Alaskan public official—that is, before Palin and the McCain campaign got ahold of him.

All this is why I predict that Palin will not make it to the election. If she does, I'll be surprised. I'm sure the McCain campaign is debating the issue now and trying to figure-out how they can best get out of this hellacious mess that Johnny Boy has gotten them into.

I would say that McCain might make the decision to cut her loose, but, if he did, that would be the first good, non-senile decision that I've seen him make this entire campaign, so I don't think he has the guts to make it, even if Palin costs him the election—which is looking more likely every day.

But, of course, McCain's stupid back-and-forth blubbering about the economy, Georgia, and Spain, etc., etc., isn't really proving to the American people that he's the expert on foreign affairs and the great leader he claims to be. Right, Johnny Boy?

20080923-01	15:37	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/23/08; "McCain Loses His Head"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Maybe the Right is finally waking up from its wishfully-thinking, blinkerblind slumber. You can read the entire article below, but the basic argument today by respected conservative columnist George Will is the following sentences damning McCain:

It is arguable that, because of his inexperience, Obama is not ready for the presidency. It is arguable that McCain, because of his boiling moralism and bottomless reservoir of certitudes, is not suited to the presidency. Unreadiness can be corrected, although perhaps at great cost, by experience. Can a dismaying temperament be fixed?

You go, George!

"McCain Loses His Head" by George F. Will, The Washington Post

Sept. 23, 2008; (http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/09/22/AR2008092202583_pf.html)

"The queen had only one way of settling all difficulties, great or small. 'Off with his head!' she said without even looking around."—Alice's Adventures in Wonderland

Under the pressure of the financial crisis, one presidential candidate is behaving like a flustered rookie playing in a league too high. It is not Barack Obama.

Channeling his inner Queen of Hearts, John McCain furiously, and apparently without even looking around at facts, said Chris Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, should be decapitated. This childish reflex provoked the Wall Street Journal to editorialize that "McCain untethered"—disconnected from knowledge and principle—had made a "false and deeply unfair" attack on Cox that was "unpresidential" and demonstrated that McCain "doesn't understand what's happening on Wall Street any better than Barack Obama does."

To read the Journal's details about the depths of McCain's shallowness on the subject of Cox's chairmanship, see "McCain's Scapegoat" (Sept. 19). Then consider McCain's characteristic accusation that Cox "has betrayed the public's trust."

Perhaps an old antagonism is involved in McCain's fact-free slander. His most conspicuous economic adviser is Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who previously headed the Congressional Budget Office. There he was an impediment to conservatives, including then-Rep. Cox, who, as chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, persistently tried and generally failed to enlist CBO support for "dynamic scoring" that would estimate the economic growth effects of proposed tax cuts.

In any case, McCain's smear—that Cox "betrayed the public's trust"—is a harbinger of a McCain presidency. For McCain, politics is always operatic, pitting people who agree with him against those who are "corrupt" or "betray the public's trust," two categories that seem to be exhaustive—there are no other people. McCain's Manichaeic worldview drove him to his signature legislative achievement, the McCain-Feingold law's restrictions on campaigning. Today, his campaign is creatively finding interstices in laws intended to restrict campaign giving and spending. (For details, see The Post of Sept. 17; and the New York Times of Sept. 19.)

By a Gresham's Law of political discourse, McCain's Queen of Hearts intervention in the opaque financial crisis overshadowed a solid conservative complaint from the Republican Study Committee, chaired by Rep. Jeb Hensarling of Texas. In a letter to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, the RSC decried the improvised torrent of bailouts as a "dangerous and unmistakable precedent for the federal government both to be looked to and indeed relied upon to save private sector companies from the consequences of their poor economic decisions." This letter, listing just $650 billion of the perhaps more than $1 trillion in new federal exposures to risk, was sent while McCain's campaign, characteristically substituting vehemence for coherence, was airing an ad warning that Obama favors "massive government, billions in spending increases."

The political left always aims to expand the permeation of economic life by politics. Today, the efficient means to that end is government control of capital. So, is not McCain's party now conducting the most leftist administration in American history? The New Deal never acted so precipitously on such a scale. Treasury Secretary Paulson, asked about conservative complaints that his rescue program amounts to socialism, said, essentially: This is not socialism, this is necessary. That non sequitur might be politically necessary, but remember that government control of capital is government control of capitalism. Does McCain have qualms about this, or only quarrels?

On "60 Minutes" Sunday evening, McCain, saying "this may sound a little unusual," said that he would like to replace Cox with Andrew Cuomo, the Democratic attorney general of New York who is the son of former governor Mario Cuomo. McCain explained that Cuomo has "respect" and "prestige" and could "lend some bipartisanship." Conservatives have been warned.

Conservatives who insist that electing McCain is crucial usually start, and increasingly end, by saying he would make excellent judicial selections. But the more one sees of his impulsive, intensely personal reactions to people and events, the less confidence one has that he would select judges by calm reflection and clear principles, having neither patience nor aptitude for either.

It is arguable that, because of his inexperience, Obama is not ready for the Presidency. It is arguable that McCain, because of his boiling moralism and bottomless reservoir of certitudes, is not suited to the Presidency. Unreadiness can be corrected, although perhaps at great cost, by experience. Can a dismaying temperament be fixed?

20080923-02 17:16 SteveB Re: Hello from Houston; Blogs

Dear Charlie,

Good to hear from ya. Ya, this government "bail-out" has me worried and now, apparently, a lot of Dems are giving it a second thought.

I'm not sure McCain has figured out yet that we might have a problem, so maybe in a month or two he'll be ready to give it his first thought...if he still has one and hasn't forgotten the subject. Unfortunately, a 21st Century Depression doesn't look impossible to me. Unfortunately, I'm not in gold, though I have friends who are!

What a bunch of asinine a*s-holes we've had running this country! I'm for tossing them all out—Republican and Democrat—and starting over fresh, but that won't happen. Somehow the buying and selling of all politicians has to be stopped. That's really our main problem, I think.

Take care and let's keep tryin' to do our part. I appreciate your efforts!

20080923-03 18:14 Ben Fw: "A Conservative for Obama" [duplicate, see 10/10/08]

Here's one of those independent voters—this one a lot like me. Republicans really should take the time to read this and maybe thoughtfully respond, regardless of who really wrote it. He does seem to be intelligent enough as to have "a clue" as to what he is doing. How is it that these are not valid points? Go Goldwater! McCain, you suck, you lyin' old geezer!

This was featured on the editorial page of the Austin American Statesman yesterday.

[Source of original email unknown. Debunked by Snopes.com. Wikipedia seems to think it's real. Email the same as forwarded by SteveM (Oct. 10, 2008) —SteveB]

"A Conservative for Obama" by Wick Allison, Editor-in-Chief, D Magazine

Sept. 20, 2008, (<http://www.opednews.com/articles/A-Conservative-for-Obama-by-Wick-Allison-080920-563.html>)

(Former National Review publisher endorses Obama.)

(My party has slipped its moorings. It's time for a true pragmatist to lead the country.)

THE MORE I LISTEN TO AND READ ABOUT the most liberal member of the U.S. Senate, the more I like him. Barack Obama strikes a chord with me like no political figure since Ronald Reagan. To explain why, I need to explain why I am a conservative and what it means to me.

In 1964, at the age of 16, I organized the Dallas County Youth for Goldwater. My senior thesis at the University of Texas was on the conservative intellectual revival in America. Twenty years later, I was invited by William F. Buckley Jr. to join the board of National Review. I later became its publisher.

Conservatism to me is less a political philosophy than a stance, a recognition of the fallibility of man and of man's institutions. Conservatives respect the past not for its antiquity but because it represents, as G.K. Chesterton said, the democracy of the dead; it gives the benefit of the doubt to customs and laws tried and tested in the crucible of time. Conservatives are skeptical of abstract theories and utopian schemes, doubtful that government is wiser than its citizens, and always ready to test any political program against actual results.

Liberalism always seemed to me to be a system of oughts. We ought to do this or that because it's the right thing to do, regardless of whether it works or not. It is a doctrine based on intentions, not results, on feeling good rather than doing good.

But today it is so-called conservatives who are cemented to political programs when they clearly don't work. The Bush tax cuts, a solution for which there was no real problem and which he refused to end even when the nation went to war led to huge deficit spending and a $3 trillion growth in the federal debt. Facing this, John McCain pumps his conservative credentials by proposing even bigger tax cuts. Meanwhile, a movement that once fought for limited government has presided over the greatest growth of government in our history. That is not conservatism; it is profligacy using conservatism as a mask.

Today it is conservatives, not liberals, who talk with alarming bellicosity about making the world safe for democracy. It is John McCain who says America's job is to defeat evil, a theological expansion of the nation's mission that would make George Washington cough out his wooden teeth.

This kind of conservatism, which is not conservative at all, has produced financial mismanagement, the waste of human lives, the loss of moral authority, and the wreckage of our economy that McCain now threatens to make worse.

Barack Obama is not my ideal candidate for president. (In fact, I made the maximum donation to John McCain during the primaries, when there was still hope he might come to his senses.) But I now see that Obama is almost the ideal candidate for this moment in American history. I disagree with him on many issues. But those don't matter as much as what Obama offers, which is a deeply conservative view of the world. Nobody can read Obama's books (which, it is worth noting, he wrote himself) or listen to him speak without realizing that this is a thoughtful, pragmatic, and prudent man. It gives me comfort just to think that after eight years of George W. Bush we will have a president who has actually read the Federalist Papers.

Most important, Obama will be a realist. I doubt he will taunt Russia, as McCain has, at the very moment when our national interest requires it as an ally. The crucial distinction in my mind is that, unlike John McCain, I am convinced he will not impulsively take us into another war unless American national interests are directly threatened.

"Every great cause," Eric Hoffer wrote, "begins as a movement, becomes a business, and eventually degenerates into a racket." As a cause, conservatism may be dead. But as a stance, as a way of making judgments in a complex and difficult world, I believe it is very much alive in the instincts and predispositions of a liberal named Barack Obama.

[I still say, not bad, even if we don't know who wrote it. —SteveB]

20080924-01	07:30	SteveM	Fw: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama
-------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. I couldn't find anything on Snopes.com, but this email is well known as blatantly racist trash. I GUESS THE GUY IS SHOUTING, EY? Email the same as forwarded by SteveM (Oct. 5, 2008). —SteveB]

A pilot's perspective on Obama

DO I HAVE THIS STRAIGHT?

HIS FATHER WAS A BLACK AFRICAN MUSLIM FROM KENYA. WE HAVE SEEN PICTURES OF HIS AFRICAN FAMILY.

HIS MOTHER WAS A WHITE AMERICAN ATHEIST FROM KANSAS. WHERE ARE THE PICTURES OF HIS AMERICAN FAMILY?

[SEE — DICK - RUN. SEE - JANE - RUN. WHERE - ARE - THEY — GO - ING? Good writing! —SteveB]

HIS FATHER DESERTED HIS MOTHER WHEN HE WAS ONLY TWO YEARS OLD [Wow! Obama's father was young! — SteveB] AND WENT BACK TO AFRICA BY WAY OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY. HOW? WAS HIS FATHER WEALTHY?

[Ah-ha! That is the question that is at the nub of it, was he wealthy? LOL. —SteveB]

HIS MOTHER MARRIED AN INDONESIAN MUSLIM AND THEN MOVED TO JAKARTA WHERE HE WAS ENROLLED IN A MUSLIM SCHOOL.

WHEN HE REACHED HIGH SCHOOL AGE HIS MOTHER SENT HIM TO HAWAII TO BE WITH HIS WHITE GRANDPARENTS AND HE WAS PUT INTO AN EXPENSIVE PRIVATE SCHOOL. HE LATER WENT TO HARVARD UNIVERSITY. HOW? WERE HIS GRANDPARENTS RICH?

[Jeez, Now I gotta know if they were rich too? I can't remember. —SteveB]

HE LIVES IN A $1.4 MILLION HOUSE OBTAINED THROUGH A DEAL WITH A WEALTHY FUNDRAISER. HOW?

HE 'WORKED' AS A CIVIL RIGHTS ACTIVIST IN CHICAGO . HE HAS NEVER HELD A PRODUCTIVE JOB OR RECEIVED A PAY CHECK THAT WAS NOT GOVERNMENT-FUNDED AND/OR TAYPAYER SUPPORTED.

[What a sucking leech! —SteveB]

THE PRESIDENCY IS NOT A CIVIL RIGHTS POSITION, NOR IS IT SUBJECT TO AFFIRMATIVE ACTION SET ASIDES. ON-THE-JOB TRAINING WON'T CUT IT.

HE ENTERED POLITICS AT THE STATE LEVEL AND THEN THE NATIONAL LEVEL WHERE HE HAS MINIMAL EXPERIENCE.

HE IS PROUD OF HIS 'AFRICAN HERITAGE.' (A FATHER WHO GOT A WHITE GIRL PREGNANT AND DESERTED HER.)

[Double Jeez! And that father of his! But I thought he was rich, anyway? —SteveB]

WHERE IS THE PRIDE IN HIS 'WHITE HERITAGE'? (A MOTHER WHO FLAUNTED CONVENTION AND DID NOT BELIEVE IN GOD).

[My goodness, even his mother wasn't very good. How could the boy be anything but a bad President? —SteveB]

SOME MIGHT THINK THERE WAS NOT MUCH TO BE PROUD OF EITHER WAY.

HE BELONGS, AND HAS BELONGED FOR OVER 20 YEARS, TO AN 'AFRO-CENTRIC' CHURCH IN CHICAGO THAT HATES WHITES, HATES JEWS, AND BLAMES AMERICA FOR ALL THE WORLD'S PERCEIVED FAULTS. (INCLUDING CREATING THE AIDS VIRUS IN ORDER TO INFLICT IT ON AFRICANS.)

HE REPEATEDLY WHITEWASHES THE PASTOR, HIS CHURCH AND THE MEMBERS WHO CHEERED AFTER HEARING VITRIOLIC TIRADES AGAINST AMERICA.

HE COULD NOT CONFRONT HIS PASTOR BUT HE WANTS US TO BELIEVE HE CAN CONFRONT NORTH KOREA AND IRAN?

YEAH RIGHT!!

[Obama looks pretty damn good on this front, in my book! —SteveB]

DURING HIS VERY BRIEF TIME IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE HE HAS MANAGED TO AMASS THE NUMBER ONE ULTRA LIBERAL VOTING RECORD OUT OF THE ONE HUNDRED MEMBERS.

[Snopes.com does argue this point, but it could be approximately true. Maybe, though, he is just practical, as his Presidency has shown. —SteveB]

HE HAS VOTED CONSISTENTLY FOR BIGGER GOVERNMENT AND HIGHER TAXES. HE HAS VOTED FOR BIG ENTITLEMENTS AND LEGISLATION THAT WOULD SEVERELY CURTAIL AMERICA 'S ABILITY TO FIGHT TERRORISM AND TO PROTECT OUR BORDERS AND OUR NATIONAL INTERESTS AROUND THE WORLD.

[You kinda stole this line from George W., didn't 'ya? Whoa! Rattle those swords! Where's my damned saber? —SteveB]

BUT, HE IS A GOOD ORATOR. ISN'T THAT A COMFORT?

[Mar. 2012 — After Rick Perry and Herman Cain? Frankly, yes! —SteveB]

YEAH, I THINK I SEE HOW WELL HE COULD UNITE THE COUNTRY.

[But...I thought you were saying you were against Obama? Now you see how he could "unite the country well" (to paraphrase)? Oh, I get it! Sarcasm. You're being sarcastic! Well, how clever of you! And you were so serious until this moment...—SteveB]

I THINK THE TRUTH IS THAT HE HOPES NO ONE WILL PUT THE PIECES TOGETHER.

[Ah, now the truth comes out! —SteveB]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, LET ME INTRODUCE YOU TO OUR NEW CHIEF PILOT. HE HAS NEVER FLOWN AN AIRPLANE. IN FACT, HE HAS NEVER EVEN SAT IN THE COCKPIT, BUT HE SAYS HE HAS RIDDEN ON PLANES BEFORE. WE ARE SURE HE WILL GUIDE US SAFELY THROUGH THE STORMS WE MAY ENCOUNTER ON THIS FLIGHT.

[More sarcasm, you clever pilot. Now you're talkin' my language. —SteveB]

PEOPLE WHAT ARE YOU THINKING? HAVE YOU NEVER HEARD THE STORY ABOUT THE WOLF, HIDING IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING, SO HE CAN DESTROY THEM FROM WITHIN? THE HAND WRITING IS ON THE WALL. DO YOU NOT HAVE EYES TO SEE IT?

[Obama is going to destroy us from within? The Republican in sheep's clothing? Is this more sarcasm? What the hell is wrong with my eyes? Help! —SteveB]

THINK LONG AND HARD BEFORE YOU VOTE FOR THIS GUY! CONSIDER YOUR KIDS & GRANDKIDS. THEIR FUTURE IS IN OUR VOTING HANDS.

[Is this like a homework assignment? —SteveB]

Do you care enough to send this on? [No more SHOUTING? —SteveB]

[Actually, I'm too scared now to do anything but cringe in the corner with my .38, after realizing there are nuts like the writer of this email out there. —SteveB]

20080924-03	10:18	SteveB	"The Twelve Lies of Sarah Palin"
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

"The Twelve Lies of Sarah Palin" by Andrew Sullivan, The Atlantic

Sept. 23, 2008, (<http://www.theatlantic.com/daily-dish/archive/2008/09/the-twelve-lies-of-sarah-palin/211322/>)

Just for the record, I asked an intern to go back and double fact-check the twelve documented lies that Sarah Palin has told on the public record. These are not hyperbolic claims or rhetorical excess.

They are assertions of fact that are demonstrably untrue and remain uncorrected. Every single one of the lies I documented holds up after several news cycles have had a chance to vet them even further. I know the MSM demands that we move on from the fact that someone who could be president next January has a list of public lies so extensive and indisputable that the McCain campaign has still not been able to rebut or even address any one of them, while fencing her off from the press and refusing to hold a press conference to clear the air on so many murky questions of fact that get to the core of whether this person is fit to be vice-president or president.

So for the record, let it be known that the candidate for vice-president for the GOP is a compulsive, repetitive, demonstrable liar. If you follow the links, here is the proof. I repeat: proof:

1. She has lied about the Bridge to Nowhere. She ran for office favoring it, wore a sweatshirt defending it, and only gave it up when the federal congress, Senator McCain in particular, went ballistic. She kept the money anyway and favors funding Don Young's Way, at twice the cost of the original bridge.

http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-08-31-palin-bridge_N.htm)

2. She has lied about her firing of the town librarian and police chief of Wasilla, Alaska.
3. She has lied about pressure on Alaska's public safety commissioner to fire her ex-brother-in-law.
4. She has lied about her previous statements on climate change.
5. She has lied about Alaska's contribution to America's oil and gas production.
6. She has lied about when she asked her daughters for their permission for her to run for vice-president.
7. She has lied about the actual progress in constructing a natural gas pipeline from Alaska.
8. She has lied about Obama's position on habeas corpus.
9. She has lied about her alleged tolerance of homosexuality.
10. She has lied about the use or non-use of a TelePrompter at the St Paul convention.
11. She has lied about her alleged pay-cut as mayor of Wasilla.
12. She has lied about what Alaska's state scientists concluded about the health of the polar bear population in Alaska.

You cannot trust a word she says. On anything.

20080924-04 11:13 SteveB Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama

Dear SteveM,

What is important is that McCain is a senile idiot! He proves it every single day. TOP THAT!

20080924-05 12:23 SteveM Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama

Dear SteveB,

Who gives a damn? This is the same old ridiculous, meaningless stuff! Don't care. Not important. None of it.

Funny, that's how I feel about your blind love affair with BHO, and attacks on McCain, Don't care! Guess that makes us even!

20080924-06 13:15 SteveB Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama

Dear SteveM,

You will notice with a careful reading of my emails that I have NO love affair with Obama. None at all. He is simply NOT a lying, corrupt, senile idiot who can't run cr*p.

McCain can't even run himself in any kind of reasonable, logical, rational, consistent manner, so I know he isn't qualified to run the country. He really isn't qualified to run his mouth and, obviously, his campaign staff know this.

20080924-07 13:35 SteveM Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama

Dear SteveB,

"He is simply NOT a lying, corrupt, idiot who can't run cr*p"

YOU are WRONG ON this regarding OBAMA and your continued insistence otherwise is indicative of a love affair.

Your continued savage attacks on an honorable, disabled veteran, as the only reason to vote for BHO, without ONCE presenting any examples of leadership, (138 votes of present), Executive experience and judgment (Resko, Wright, Ayers are examples of poor judgment) is indicative of a blind love affair with the oracle.

You were an American soldier with McCain and an educated man, who should be able to disagree with a candidate without the disagreeable personal attacks.

It's time for some serious self examination, SteveB. I'd tell you to head for the woods, but I'm afraid a bear would eat you, and I'd get the blame.

Waiting for my early ballot.

20080924-08 14:39 SteveB Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama

Dear SteveM,

Bull cr*pola! I don't care how honorable and disabled he was—like so many others—that has nothing at all to do with being qualified to run the country. His entire career has proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that he is a lying, corrupt, wife-cheating, stupid, now-senile failure. And he can proclaim himself a war hero all he want, but I say that is an insult to true war heroes, which he is certainly not! And to say that he cannot be attacked on his record and character (read George Will) is simply an un-American position. Of course his character matters...as much as you would like that and his record not to matter...so that the only thing that would matter would be his time as a POW. Bull cr*p!

These are NOT personal attacks, merely proven statements that you, for some reason, disagree with. The proof is all there in the record and more proof becomes available daily as the old fart stumbles over his own tongue and half-mind time and time again.

He has never successfully run anything in his life! He can never lead America! HE IS SENILE! Face it! And that fact has nothing to do with his ideology or positions on anything.

I don't give a damn about Obama. He is simply the better of the two...without a doubt, and he will be elected. Get used to it. The country will survive nicely without idiot Bush or senile McCain at the helm.

20080924-09 15:07 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/24/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

Today's senile moments are huge, because sad, embarrassing, and ridiculous as they are, they show a man whose mind is basically gone...a man who, despite his huge crabby ego and ambition, is not fit to be President of these United States and proves it every day, almost every time he opens his mouth or makes a decision (those few decisions that are not made for him).

It's a little hard to find online (finally found at ABC News), but yesterday McCain finally gave his first news conference in more than 6 weeks. It was at a Freeland, MI Dow-Corning plant. McCain allowed five questions from the assembled press after having nothing to say about the solar energy work he went there to see.

I guess we know now why he gives so few news conferences, while Obama allows free access to the press. In fact, I guess it's been more than a month since McCain went back to the press section on his own airplane. Amazing! And sad! So much for the "straight talk express"! Good luck with those debates, Mr. Facile-with-the-answer McCain.

One thing McCain had to say (sounding more and more like the Democrats he can't resist imitating):

So it is essential, for our economy, to stimulate grown and grow this government...I...excuse me [laughs]...grow this economy, not grow the economy, er, government. We need to grow the economy.

This is an exact quote! Scary, huh? You'll get it yet, you old geezer...oops, too late!

He was asked (concerning the pending economic crisis bill aimed at fixing America's "strong fundamentals"): "If the fate of this bill...is in your hands, on your vote, could you and would you still vote against it?" [Seems like a simple question for a strong, clear-minded leader, right?—SteveB]

McCain's answer: "We'll [I guess he had a turd in his pocket—old joke, sorry—he didn't say "I'll".—SteveB] have to say that I hope that Democrats would recognize that this issue should not be in any way related to my vote. [Ah, leadership!] This issue should be—and their vote should be determined in how we can resolve this crisis and get America going again. This is a huge crisis, we know! ...the greatest financial crisis since World War II." [I guess somebody finally told him. Thanks Carly or Phil!] What a great leader! And, just last week, the great leader was telling us that there was no crisis, unlike Obama, who saw the problem coming and proposed a solution to it months ago. And whether you think that solution is good or not, McCain has now totally adopted it as his own. What a great leader!

In other, older, news headlines: "McCain seeks bailout opinions from Romney, business executives while in New York." Gee, if Sarah Palin is so qualified and experienced and is, after all, his VP choice, my didn't McCain seek her opinion too while she was in town? LOL!

Below: If not totally true, true in very large part.

posted on Mlive.com by nolimits3333 on 09/23/08 at 11:16 pm:

McCain's Economic Adviser is ex-Texas Sen. Phil Gramm. On Dec. 15, 2000, hours before Congress was to leave for Christmas recess, Gramm had a 262-page amendment slipped into the appropriations bill. It forbade federal agencies to regulate the financial derivatives that greased the skids for passing along risky mortgage-backed securities to investors. And that, my friends, is why everything's falling apart. That is why the taxpayers are now on the hook for the follies of Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, Bear Stearns and now the insurance giant AIG to the tune of $700 billion.

20080924-10	15:54	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/24/08—Bonus
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

AND NOWWW, FOLKS!!!!!!!!!!!!!! BIG NEWS!!!!!!

McCain seeks to postpone Friday's debate because of the financial crisis he didn't think existed!!!!!! Ya, Johnny Boy, the "fundamentals" are sound!

Johnny Boy, YOU COWARDLY IDIOT!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

This guy is a worthless FOOL!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

20080924-11	16:17	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/24/08—Bonus
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Yes! Good leadership, Johnny Boy!

That's the way to calm the markets, etc.! Act like we're in such a big disaster that you can't even hold a stupid debate.

That is sooooo far-fetched, you senile idiot!

I didn't think you had the nerve to stand beside a real man, let alone try to debate with him when your mind is essentially empty and your soul is beyond corrupt!

20080924-12 17:29 SteveB The Wounded POW Hero Ploy

Dear SteveM,

And... :-)

I'm really getting sick and tired of this old-fart being defended, or defending himself, by saying the American people don't have the right to criticize him...because he's a veteran and a former POW...and this does NOT equate to "war hero".

He's running for President of the greatest country on Earth, for heaven's sakes. I'm a veteran. I don't care if he's a veteran. It is fine and hunky-dory that he served his country...but that was a long time ago and, with two admirals in the family, it would have taken courage NOT to serve at that time. How much courage does it take to simply remain in prison and betray your country because you're tortured? It is of the utmost relevance and importance NOW if the man is not intelligent enough, experienced enough, non-senile enough, and of the right temperament to be President.

To me, he proves every single day that he is NOT! He lies every day! This is not academic, this is not ideological, because I am much closer to McCain's ideology than to Obama's (though that pro-life, pro-evangelical, pro-corruption, pro-lies and distortion, pro-cronyism, big-business-can-do-no-wrong cr*p will NEVER fly with me!).

If he were a veteran...even if he were a legitimate war hero—which he is not!—it would still be fare to judge the man based on his present abilities and lack of ideas and ideals. I didn't see Bush go easy on Kerry because he was a veteran, fer cryin' out loud!

As has been so eloquently stated by Keith Olbermann, "GROW UP, JOHN MC CAIN!"

20080924-13 17:52 SteveB Panic!!

The truth of the matter is that McCain is in a complete state of panic, just as Conservative George Will said the other day.

Obama is calm and in charge and getting ready to debate. He has a handle on the situation and knows what must be done and what he must do. He hasn't even been planning on going to Washington for the vote unless he's really needed, which will not be hard for him to calmly decide (whether to go or not).

McCain proved yesterday that, while he may have finally come to the conclusion that there is something wrong, he has no idea what it is or what to do about it. As he has stated so eloquently: he knows nothing about economics! Complete and utter panic! Of course he can't take the time to debate. He has to rush around like the idiot he is, steal Obama's talking points, and try to figure out what to do. He still doesn't even know, as the leader of his party (HA!), whether he will vote for what has been proposed or not.

This is exactly the kind of President McCain would make, just like we saw during the Georgia crisis. A panicky, bluster covering an empty mind and an emptier heart. He is a still-bitter, hollow man and he proves it every single day, with ever word and with every action. God help us if such a man were to get elected.

20080924-14 19:53 SteveB Media Bias

Dear SteveM & Pat,

I'll agree that MSNBS knows who they're for, and it ain't the Right.

And Fox? Fair and balanced? Haha! How could they be more Right?

But you say even CNN has a liberal bias. I can't detect it. Lou Dobbs? Right; Glenn Beck? Far Right.

Then you have Nancy Grace! And Greta Van Susteren was a CNN fixture for years.

So who's Liberal? Larry King? LOL! He's the only guy on TV who is a contemporary of McCain. Wolf Blitzer? He's the most even-handed guy in the media. I've watched him for years and I can't figure out if he's for Republicans, Democrats, or neither.

So where is this CNN Liberal bias? Could it be spelled "P-a-r-a-n-o-i-a induced by R-u-s-h L-i-m-b-a-u-g-h"?

20080925-01 09:55 SteveB "Lobbyists in 'Feeding Frenzy'"
--

"Lobbyists in 'Feeding Frenzy'" by Fredreka Schouten, Ken Dilanian and Matt Kelley, USA TODAY

(http://www.netrootz.com/images/groups/group_30/Lobbyists_in_feeding_frenzy_over_700bln_bailout.pdf)

WASHINGTON—The financial services industry, which has spent billions on lobbying and campaign contributions over the last decade, is scrambling to make its case for a proposed $700 billion bailout plan amid deep public skepticism.

Wall Street firms, commercial banks and insurers are lobbying on an array of issues—from beating back proposals to make it easier to reduce mortgage debts in bankruptcy courts to fighting, unsuccessfully so far, to retain control over executive pay.

"You have a feeding frenzy going on," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a non-partisan watchdog group.

Camden Fine, head of the Independent Community Bankers of America, said he worked through the weekend to successfully extend the bailout plan to commercial banks. He hasn't stopped working the phones since. "If cell phones cause cancer, I'm in trouble," he said. The financial services industry has left its mark in other ways.

An early draft of the proposal had restricted the bailout to firms headquartered in the United States. Scott Talbott, the top lobbyist for the Financial Services Roundtable, said his group was among those that helped to expand that definition to firms with "a significant presence" here. The trade group's members include London-based Barclays.

The association was working to defeat a proposal to allow bankruptcy judges to reduce mortgage debts. Talbott said that would increase banks' risks and drive up mortgage costs. "It could price some people out of the (housing) market," he said.

Consumer groups say the bankruptcy measure would help reduce the number of foreclosures and ease the financial crisis. "Why is anyone listening to the people who brought us this problem?" asked Kathleen Day, a spokeswoman for the Center for Responsible Lending, which supports the bankruptcy change.

Government watchdogs and consumer groups say the political muscle of the industry helped it persuade Congress to change banking and bankruptcy laws in ways that contributed to the crisis.

Political action committees and individual employees of the financial services industry—which includes finance, insurance and real estate companies—have contributed $2 billion to federal campaigns since 1989, according to the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics (CRP).

The industry, for example, has contributed nearly a third of all the campaign money that has flowed to the chairmen of the House and Senate committees overseeing the bailout, according to the Sunlight Foundation, which analyzed CRP's campaign finance data.

"What is most troubling about this historic episode is that the problems were identified years ago," Common Cause, a watchdog group, said in a report on the influence of the industry's campaign contributions and lobbying. "Yet, thanks in part to the political power of the financial institutions ... the government refused to step in."

The report cited a 2005 amendment defeated in the Senate, 40-58, that would have curbed predatory lending. No Republicans supported it, Senate records show, and four Democrats voted against it, including Joe Biden, the Democratic vice presidential nominee. His running mate, Barack Obama, voted for it. Republican nominee John McCain voted against it.

In an interview, Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., who sponsored the amendment, noted that opponents warned that the measure would have driven Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac out of the business of subprime lending, which "could have averted this crisis." Durbin said the bill didn't pass because "there was a lot of money being made—and the people who were making money in this subprime mortgage mess, many of them were major contributors. That, unfortunately, is a major factor in the decision-making process in Washington."

But the financial meltdown has dented the industry's credibility in Congress, says John O'Neill, a lobbyist for the law firm Venable and former staffer for the Senate Finance Committee. That may explain its failure Wednesday to stop Congress from imposing limits on the salaries of executives whose firms seek assistance from the government.

"They're going to be viewed, parts of the financial industry, as a little bit radioactive by some folks up there," O'Neill says.

DONATIONS TO SENATE COMMITTEE MEMBERS [What election?]

Subcommittee Chair or Ranking Member (RM)?	Total Contributions	Financial Services Contributions	% Finance Contributions of total
Dodd, Chris, Chair. D Conn. Yes	$43,344,186	$13,163,356	30%
Shelby, Richard C., RM R Ala. Yes	$20,741,533	$4,240,502	20%
Johnson, Tim D S.C. Yes	$16,364,546	$2,782,143	17%
Hagel, Chuck R Neb. Yes	$8,408,360	$1,610,616	19%
Schumer, Charles D NY Yes	$46,362,049	$12,793,446	28%
Crapo, Mike R Idaho Yes	$7,058,045	$1,278,842	18%
Bayh, Evan D Ind. Yes	$23,910,036	$3,971,396	17%
Martinez, Mel R Fla. Yes	$16,088,801	$2,896,435	18%
Reed, Jack D R.I. Yes	$13,147,550	$2,686,232	20%
Allard, Wayne R Colo. Yes	$9,103,388	$1,447,500	16%
Carper, Tom R Del. Yes	$8,306,428	$2,097,718	25%
Bunning, Jim R Ky. Yes	$17,402,562	$2,417,585	14%
Menendez, Robert D N.J. No	$26,087,972	$3,820,822	15%
Akaka, Daniel D Hawaii No	$6,428,013	$549,095	9%
Brown, Sherrod D Ohio No	$17,364,119	$1,432,581	8%
Bennett, Robert F. R Utah No	$10,546,194	$1,864,292	18%
Enzi, Mike R Wyo. No	$4,303,148	$943,894	22%
Dole, Elizabeth R N.C. No	$30,528,042	$3,285,529	11%
Corker, Bob R Tenn. No	$21,122,955	$2,422,829	11%

DONATIONS TO HOUSE COMMITTEE MEMBERS [What election?]

subcommittee chair or ranking member (RM)?	Total Contributions	Financial Services Contributions	% Finance Contributions of total
Frank, Barney, Chair. D Mass. Yes	$7,800,282	$2,430,361	31%
Bacchus, Spencer, RM R Ala. Yes	$8,478,461	$3,579,199	42%
Kanjorski, Paul D Pa. Yes	$6,526,370	$2,718,472	42%
Pryce, Deborah R Ohio Yes	$9,644,584	$2,805,109	29%
Maloney, Carolyn D N.Y. Yes	$8,206,424	$2,390,461	29%
Biggert, Judy R Ill. Yes	$4,812,163	$1,300,677	27%
Waters, Maxine D Calif. Yes	$3,687,508	$359,445	10%
Capito, Shelley Moore R W.Va. Yes	$9,471,708	$1,442,572	15%
Gutierrez, Luis V. D Ill. Yes	$3,629,409	$661,907	18%
Paul, Ron R Texas Yes	$50,054,595	$1,659,559	3%
Watt, Melvin D N.C. Yes	$3,784,876	$780,278	21%
Miller, Gary G. R Calif. Yes	$3,364,982	$690,788	21%
Velazquez, Nydia M. D N.Y. No	$5,400,152	$1,165,525	22%
Ackerman, Gary L. D N.Y. No	$9,395,930	$1,504,140	16%
Sherman, Brad D Calif. No	$7,839,873	$1,462,636	19%

Meeks, Gregory W. D N.Y. No	$3,657,984	$1,015,432	28%
Moore, Dennis D Kan. No	$10,545,735	$1,934,779	18%
Capuano, Michael E. D Mass. No	$4,402,712	$813,176	18%
Hinojosa, Ruben D Texas No	$4,100,872	$735,536	18%
Clay, William Lacy D Mo. No	$2,393,701	$290,100	12%
McCarthy, Carolyn D N.Y. No	$10,052,787	$908,045	9%
Baca, Joe D Calif. No	$4,124,421	$460,832	11%
Lynch, Stephen F. D Mass. No	$5,707,556	$765,494	13%
Miller, Brad D N.C. No	$4,652,256	$770,481	17%
Scott, David D Ga. No	$4,287,122	$911,504	21%
Green, Al D Texas No	$1,500,075	$183,265	12%
Cleaver, Emanuel D Mo. No	$2,589,538	$313,549	12%
Bean, Melissa L. D Ill. No	$8,913,613	$1,573,756	18%
Moore, Gwen D Wis. No	$2,086,326	$254,879	12%
Davis, Lincoln D Tenn. No	$4,366,497	$482,275	11%
Hodes, Paul W. D N.H. No	$1,618,766	$259,522	16%
Ellison, Keith D Minn. No	$1,138,378	$90,365	8%
Klein, Ron D Fla. No	$3,320,808	$789,238	24%
Mahoney, Tim D Fla. No	$2,553,626	$495,415	19%
Wilson, Charles D Ohio No	$609,691	$146,819	24%
Perlmutter, Ed D Colo. No	$1,419,818	$341,185	24%
Murphy, Christopher S. D CT No	$2,307,762	$493,332	21%
Donnelly, Joe D Ind. No	$1,580,631	$219,956	14%
Foster, Bill D Ill. No	$3,911,647	$161,936	4%
Carson, Andre D Ind. No	$1,306,787	$137,400	11%
Speier, Jackie D Calif. No	$1,290,807	$183,099	14%
Cazayoux, Don D La. No	$2,039,860	$112,300	6%
Childers, Travis D Miss. No	$1,315,736	$68,050	5%
Castle, Mike R Del. No	$7,591,986	$2,328,012	31%
King, Peter R N.Y. No	$6,709,578	$1,271,665	19%
Royce, Edward R. R Calif. No	$8,114,893	$2,353,853	29%
Lucas, Frank D. R Okla. No	$4,267,888	$859,878	20%
LaTourette, Steven C. R Ohio No	$8,637,211	$1,196,373	14%
Manzullo, Donald A. R Ill. No	$7,495,724	$1,304,319	17%
Jones, Walter B. R N.C. No	$6,452,439	$961,533	15%
Shays, Christopher R Conn. No	$12,760,606	$2,876,206	23%
Feeney, Tom R Fla. No	$5,705,257	$1,260,480	22%
Hensarling, Jeb R Texas No	$6,284,449	$1,950,421	31%
Garrett, Scott R N.J. No	$5,224,439	$996,899	19%
Brown-Waite, Ginny R Fla. No	$3,197,019	$649,129	20%
Barrett, J. Gresham R S.C. No	$3,553,083	$691,667	19%
Gerlach, Jim R Pa. No	$9,203,665	$1,453,549	16%
Pearce, Steve R N.M. No	$7,996,707	$685,047	9%
Neugebauer, Randy R Texas No	$5,515,655	$1,151,274	21%
Price, Tom R Ga. No	$5,628,466	$796,743	14%
Davis, Geoff R Ky. No	$9,372,768	$1,547,657	17%
McHenry, Patrick T. R N.C. No	$3,581,370	$786,000	22%
Campbell, John R Calif. No	$2,993,097	$745,635	25%
Putnam, Adam R Fla. No	$4,985,933	$730,298	15%
Bachmann, Michele R Minn. No	$2,176,100	$363,705	17%
Roskam, Peter J. R Ill. No	$1,806,944	$431,766	24%
Marchant, Kenny R Texas No	$1,921,414	$449,813	23%
McCotter, Thaddeus R Minn. No	$3,778,990	$576,404	15%
McCarthy, Kevin R Calif. No	$736,447	$173,112	24%
Heller, Dean R Nev. No	$1,242,583	$190,252	15%

from a Republican for Obama, Charles E. Kanter, AMS, (<http://www.sailcopress.com>):

I am a Republican, but a very sad Republican. Somehow my party chose as its presidential nominee, a man who had very minimal qualifications for the presidency, but was a war hero; a very personal hero for me. Now things are happening. During all his public speaking, watch him carefully. He looks drawn and tired. He acts panicky. His short-term memory is obviously slipping. He is making wild unsubstantiated charges. He is definitely not following his own "non-partisan agenda." If he is acting this erratic now, what will he be like as president when the going really gets tough? The thought of having Sarah Palin as President is even more scary than John's actions. Not only is she completely unqualified, but her personal history and beliefs are downright terrifying.

20080925-03 20:28 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/25/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

You know, I have to honestly admit that I don't know what to do about the current economic crisis, but I know that it is a crisis for our great country and for its future. I don't know what compromises are occurring or what language the bill will take or any of those things. I guess I just hope that, somehow, intelligence will prevail and things will work out. Since we are talking about the federal government, I guess that hope is rather small.

But in this time of national emergency akin to 9/11, it is such a sad spectacle to watch John McCain, once again, place his Presidential ambitions ahead of the good of the country.

Everyone in Washington, even the Republicans, obviously knows that McCain knows nothing about these subjects and can contribute nothing. Yet, once an agreement had already been reached, he pretended he's parachuting onto the burning deck of an aircraft carrier to save the day. Instead of saving the day, he made the deal already reached fall apart.

This man is pathetic, lost in a non-existent past, selfish beyond belief, acting like a complete fool. This is what the Grand Old Party has come to, and the sooner the American people realize it, the better.

20080925-04 21:14 SteveB Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—09/25/08

Dear SteveM,

And you call Obama an empty suit?

Having suspended his campaign to go to Washington to put his ambition before the good of the country, as late as this afternoon,

MC CAIN HAD STILL NOT READ THE 2-1/2 PAGE $700 BILLION PROPOSAL!

Does he have ADD or ADHD or dyslexia as well as senility? This is a US Senator and Presidential candidate?

How the hell did he think he was going to help the negotiations when he has no idea what they're negotiating?

Especially when he is accompanied all day by campaign personnel, while Obama has legislative personnel with him. You really think McCain is putting country first?

20081001-01 11:37 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/01/08

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

McCain and Obama on the same side with the bail-out! Bad news! McCain all over the press talking about what a big "crisis" we are in, but never any details from this bozo. And what exactly is the crisis, Mr. Self-proclaimed "War Hero"? Not quite able to spit that out, ar' ya'?

To me, this whole thing stinks to high heaven. The Treasury Secretary comes to the President for $1 trillion (essentially) during the last moments of his Lame Duck Presidency. "Gee, sir, we know we've been wrong all through this mess, but just give us this money to do whatever we want with no accountability and we will solve this crisis. And, while you're at it, kiss my a*s, Mr. President."

If anything, and I guess I have to trust these jokers somewhat, I think we need a bottom up approach rather than the proposal's top down—which just gets the fat cats paid first, when they should be paid last.

If these bundles of stinky mortgages were mainly getting paid, the crisis could go away. Let's use the government's money and power to re-negotiate all the predatory-interest loans, and the ones going bad. Give the people as good an interest rate as you would give the big banks, extend the terms to 30 years, get your new and improved AIG to insure the mortgages. If people can make the payments on these new, favorable mortgages—and I trust them more than I trust the government or the fat cats—then everything suddenly becomes OK on down the line. Where even these mortgages can't be paid, people lose their houses and their credit ratings (now more carefully scrutinized) and the government, or their agent, sells the houses into a rising market (because the glut of foreclosed homes has been eliminated). And everything must be different going forward—actually regulated for the good of we the people.

This would be a less socialistic approach to solving the problem.

Ya, right, tell me it has less or more chance of working than whatever Congress is currently concocting.

The operative word in that "concocting" is "c*cking"!

20081002-01	10:07	SteveB	"Skepticism of Palin Growing, Poll Finds"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

"Skepticism of Palin Growing, Poll Finds" by Jon Cohen and Jennifer Agiesta, The Washington Post

Oct. 2, 2008, (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/10/01/AR2008100103600.html>)

(Fewer than half of voters think she understands 'complex issues'.) [What about simple issues? —SteveB]

With the vice presidential candidates set to square off today in their only scheduled debate, public assessments of Sarah Palin's readiness have plummeted, and she may now be a drag on the Republican ticket among key voter groups, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Tonight's heavily anticipated debate comes just five weeks after the popular Alaska governor entered the national spotlight as Sen. John McCain's surprise pick to be his running mate. Though she initially transformed the race with her energizing presence and a fiery convention speech, Palin is now a much less positive force: Six in 10 voters see her as lacking the experience to be an effective president, and a third are now less likely to vote for McCain because of her.

A month ago, voters rated Palin as highly as they did McCain or his Democratic rival, Sen. Barack Obama, but after weeks of intensive coverage and several perceived missteps, the shine has diminished. Nearly a third of adults in a new poll from the Pew Research Center said they paid a lot of attention to Palin's interviews with CBS News's Katie Couric, a series that prompted grumbling among some conservative commentators about Palin's competency to be the GOP's vice presidential standard-bearer. The Pew poll showed views of Palin slipping over the past few days alone.

In the new Post-ABC poll, Palin matches the Democratic vice presidential candidate, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., on empathy, one of McCain's clear deficits against Obama, while fewer than half of voters think she understands "complex issues."

But it is the experience question that may prove her highest hurdle, particularly when paired with widespread public concern about McCain's age. About half of all voters said they were uncomfortable with the idea of McCain taking office at age 72, and 85 percent of those voters said Palin does not have the requisite experience to be president.

The 60 percent who now see Palin as insufficiently experienced to step into the presidency is steeply higher than in a Post-ABC poll after her nomination early last month. Democrats and Republicans alike are now more apt to doubt her qualifications, but the biggest shift has come among independents. In early September, independents offered a divided verdict on Palin's experience; now they take the negative view by about 2 to 1. Nearly two-thirds of both independent men and women in the new poll said Palin has insufficient experience to run the White House.

Obama was able for the first time to crack the 50 percent mark, albeit barely, on whether he has the experience to be president following Friday's presidential debate, and the question is one of Palin's central challenges as she prepares to face Biden in prime time before a national television audience.

20081002-02	10:24	Trudy	Fw: "Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street"
-------------	-------	-------	--

[Source of original email unknown. Debunked here: http://urbanlegends.about.com/od/barackobama/a/wall_street.htm & by Snopes.com: <http://www.snopes.com/politics/obama/fanniemae.asp>. Email the same as forwarded by SteveM (Oct. 5, 2008). —SteveB]

Here is a quick look into 3 former Fannie Mae Executives who have played big on Wall Street.

Posted in the Hampton Forum, (<http://www.topix.com/forum/city/hampton-va/TB1O8JA3VTCRJGDQA>)

"Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street"

Be sure to read the "Where are they now?" at the bottom!! Here is a quick look into 3 former Fannie Mae executives who have brought down Wall Street.

Franklin Raines was a Chairman and Chief Executive Officer at Fannie Mae. Raines was forced to retire from his position with Fannie Mae when auditing discovered severe irregularities in Fannie Mae's accounting activities. At the time of his departure The Wall Street Journal noted, "Raines, who long defended the company's accounting despite mounting evidence that it wasn't proper, issued a statement late Tuesday conceding that "mistakes were made" and saying he would assume responsibility as he had earlier promised. News reports indicate the company was under growing pressure from regulators to shake up its management in the wake of findings that the company's books ran afoul of generally accepted accounting principles for four years." Fannie Mae had to reduce its surplus by $9 billion. Raines left with a "golden parachute valued at $240 Million in benefits. The Government filed suit against Raines when the depth of the accounting scandal became clear.

<http://housingdoom.com/2006/12/18/fannie-charges/>

The Government noted, "The 101 charges reveal how the individuals improperly manipulated earnings to maximize their bonuses, while knowingly neglecting accounting systems and internal controls, misapplying over twenty accounting principles and misleading the regulator and the public. The Notice explains how they submitted six years of misleading and inaccurate accounting statements and inaccurate capital reports that enabled them to grow Fannie Mae in an unsafe and unsound manner." These charges were made in 2006. The Court ordered Raines to return $50 Million Dollars he received in bonuses based on the miss-stated Fannie Mae profits.

Tim Howard was the Chief Financial Officer of Fannie Mae. Howard "was a strong internal proponent of using accounting strategies that would ensure a "stable pattern of earnings" at Fannie. In everyday English—he was cooking the books. The Government Investigation determined that, "Chief Financial Officer, Tim Howard, failed to provide adequate oversight to key control and reporting functions within Fannie Mae," On June 16, 2006, Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., asked the Justice Department to investigate his allegations that two former Fannie Mae executives lied to Congress in Oct., 2004 when they denied manipulating the mortgage-finance giant's income statement to achieve management pay bonuses.

Investigations by federal regulators and the company's board of directors since concluded that management did manipulate 1998 earnings to trigger bonuses. Raines and Howard resigned under pressure in late 2004. Howard's Golden Parachute was estimated at $20 Million!

Jim Johnson is a former executive at Lehman Brothers, who was later forced from his position as Fannie Mae CEO. A look at the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight's May 2006 report on mismanagement and corruption inside Fannie Mae, and you'll see some interesting things about Johnson. Investigators found that Fannie Mae had hidden a substantial amount of Johnson's 1998 compensation from the public, reporting that it was between $6 million and $7 million when in fact it was $21 million." Johnson is currently under investigation for taking illegal loans from Countrywide while serving as CEO of Fannie Mae. Johnson's Golden Parachute was estimated at $28 Million.

WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

1. FRANKLIN RAINES — Raines works for the Obama Campaign as Chief Economic Advisor.
2. TIM HOWARD — Howard is also a Chief Economic Advisor to Obama.
3. JIM JOHNSON — Johnson hired as a Senior Obama Finance Advisor and was selected to run Obama's Vice Presidential Search Committee.

IF OBAMA PLANS ON CLEANING UP THE MESS—HIS ADVISORS HAVE THE EXPERTISE—THEY MADE THE MESS IN THE FIRST PLACE. Would you trust the men who tore Wall Street down to build the new Wall Street?!!

[I'd think you would trust them, SteveM—they're all Republicans! Email not true. No evidence these men ever served as advisors of any kind to Obama. —SteveB]

20081002-03	11:07	SteveB	Re: "Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Trudy,

I can't find that any of these three people in your email advise Obama. McCain is putting a lot of lies out there. (See below.)

Obama's Economic Policy Advisors, June 3, 2008

Jason Furman (director of economic policy)
Austan Goolsbee (senior economic policy advisor), University of Chicago tax policy expert
Karen Kornbluh (policy director)
David Cutler, Harvard health policy expert
Jeff Liebman, Harvard welfare expert
Michael Froman, Citigroup executive
Daniel Tarullo, Georgetown law professor
David Romer, Berkeley macroeconomist
Christina Romer, Berkeley economic historian
Richard Thaler, University of Chicago behavioral finance expert
Robert Rubin, former Treasury Secretary
Larry Summers, former Treasury Secretary
Alan Blinder, former Vice-chairman of the Federal Reserve
Jared Bernstein, Economic Policy Institute labor economist
James Galbraith, University of Texas macroeconomist
Paul Volcker, Chairman of the Federal Reserve 1979-1987
Laura Tyson, Berkeley international economist, Bill Clinton economic adviser
Robert Reich, Berkeley public policy professor, former Secretary of Labor
Peter Henry, Stanford international economist
Gene Sperling, former White House economic adviser

Other prominent economists who support Obama

Brad DeLong, Berkeley macroeconomist
Joseph Stiglitz, 2001 Nobel laureate
Edmund Phelps, 2006 Nobel laureate
Ray Fair, Yale macroeconomist
Dan McFadden, 2000 Nobel laureate
Robert Solow, 1987 Nobel laureate

Prominent finance people who support Obama (not actually economists)

William Donaldson, Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) Chair 2003-05

Arthur Levitt, SEC chair 1993-2001
David Ruder, SEC chair 1987-1989
Warren Buffet, investor, richest person in world

"McCain Charges Obama with Taking Advice from Raines" by Howard Kurtz, Washington Post

Sept. 19, 2008, (http://voices.washingtonpost.com/44/2008/09/19/the_ad_obama_has.html)

The Ad: Obama has no background in economics. Who advises him? The Post says it's Franklin Raines, for "advice on mortgage and housing policy." Shocking. Under Raines, Fannie Mae committed "extensive financial fraud." Raines made millions. Fannie Mae collapsed. Taxpayers? Stuck with the bill. Barack Obama. Bad advice. Bad instincts. Not ready to lead.

Analysis: This John McCain ad is based on a disputed premise.

There's no dispute that Obama has no background in economics—but then, neither does McCain, which makes this an odd charge for the Arizona senator to hurl.

Fannie Mae did collapse, requiring a government takeover, and Raines, its former chairman, paid $25 million in April to settle a case brought by federal authorities investigating his role in the agency's accounting problems. But he has never been a close adviser to Obama.

The commercial's main charge is based on an April story in The Washington Post that said Raines has "taken calls from Barack Obama's presidential campaign seeking his advice on mortgage and housing policy matters." Reporter Anita Huslin says Raines told her that during an in-person interview.

An Obama spokesman called the ad's contention "a flat-out lie," saying Raines has "never advised Senator Obama about anything, ever." But Raines did not claim to have advised the Illinois senator personally. In an accompanying statement, Raines said he never "provided his campaign with advice on housing or economic matters." That contradicts what he told Huslin five months ago.

Whether viewers will somehow hold Obama responsible for the Fannie Mae collapse because of what is at best a slight association with its former head is open to question. The commercial seems intended as a response to an earlier Obama spot charging that McCain can't clean up Washington because seven of his top campaign officials are former lobbyists.

20081005-01	17:57	SteveB	"The Dumbing Down of the GOP" (Palin), "Guess Who's Not Coming to Dinner" (McCain)
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

I would like to refer you to two very good articles today:

"The Dumbing Down of the GOP" by Joe Conason, Reuters/Slate

Oct. 4, 2008 (<http://www.salon.com/2008/10/04/dumb/>)

(Why aren't more conservatives disgusted that their party nominated a person devoid of qualifications for the vice presidency (again)?)

Sarah Palin's debate performance should signal the beginning of the end of her fad. But for the moment it is worth looking at the meaning of her nomination, without the protective varnish of what conservatives usually dismiss as political correctness.

Why should we pretend not to notice when Gov. Palin's ideas make no sense? Having said last week that "it doesn't matter" whether human activity is the cause of climate change, she said in debate that she "doesn't want to argue" about the causes. It doesn't occur to her that we have to know the causes in order to address the problem. (She was very fortunate that moderator Gwen Ifill didn't ask her whether she truly believes that human beings and dinosaurs inhabited this planet simultaneously only 6,000 years ago.)

Why should we ignore her inability to string together a series of coherent thoughts? As a foe of Wall Street greed and a late convert to the gospel of government regulation, along with John McCain, Palin promised to clean up and reform business. But when her programmed talking points about "getting government out of the way" and protecting "freedom" conflicted with that promise, she didn't notice.

Why should we give her a pass on the most important issues of the day? Supposedly sharing the fears and concerns of the average families who face the burdens of mortgages, healthcare and economic insecurity, Palin simply refused to discuss changes in bankruptcy law and proved that she didn't know the provisions of McCain's healthcare plan.

All the glaring defects so blatantly on display in her debate with Joe Biden—and that make her candidacy so darkly comical—would be the same if she were a hockey dad instead of a "hockey mom." In fact, the cynical attempt to foist Palin on the nation as a symbol of feminist progress is an insult to all women regardless of their political orientation.

There was a time when conservatives lamented the dumbing down of American culture. Preservation of basic standards in schools and workplaces compelled them—or so they said—to resist affirmative action for women and minorities. Qualifications mattered; merit mattered; and demagogic appeals for leveling were to be left to the Democrats. Not anymore.

Actually, the Palin phenomenon is the culmination of a trend that can be traced back to Dan Quayle, the undistinguished Indiana senator whose elevation onto the Republican ticket in 1988 had nothing to do with intellect or experience and everything to do with the youthful appeal of a handsome blond frat boy. (That was how Republican strategists thought they would attract female voters back then, which must be why they believe Palin represents progress.) Quayle too was unable to articulate, let alone defend, the policy positions for which he was supposed to be campaigning. He too had to undergo the surgical stuffing of stock phrases into his head as a minimal substitute for knowledge and thought. And in the same sad way, he too benefited from the drastically reduced expectations applied to anyone whose inadequacy is so obvious.

Quayle deserved more pity than scorn, however, because he seemed to know that he was fighting far above his weight class. Palin evokes no such sympathy, with her jut-jawed, moose-gutting confidence in her own overrated "common sense" and her bullying insistence that only "elitists" would question her expertise.

As Biden showed quite convincingly when he spoke about his modest background and his continuing connection with Main Street, perceptive, intelligent discourse is in no way identical with elitism. Palin's phony populism is as insulting to working- and middle-class Americans as it is to American women. Why are basic diction and intellectual coherence presumed to be out of reach for "real people"?

And why don't we expect more from American conservatives? Indeed, why don't they demand more from their own movement? Aren't they disgusted that their party would again nominate a person devoid of qualifications for one of the nation's highest offices? Some, like Michael Gerson and Kathleen Parker, have expressed discomfort with this farce—and been subjected, in Parker's case, to abuse from many of the same numbskulls whom Palin undoubtedly delights.

The ultimate irony of Palin's rise is that it has occurred at a moment when Americans may finally have grown weary of pseudo-populism—when intelligence, judgment, diligence and seriousness are once again valued, simply because we are in such deep trouble. We got into this mess because we elected a man who professed to despise elitism, which he detected in everyone whose opinions differed from his prejudices. That was George W. Bush, of course. Biden was too polite and restrained to say it, but the dumbing down is more of the same, too.

"Guess Who's Not Coming to Dinner" by Roger Ebert, Chicago Sun-Times

Sept. 28, 2008, (<http://rogerebert.suntimes.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080928/commentary/809289997>)

I do not like you, John McCain. My feeling has nothing to do with issues. It has to do with common courtesy. During the debate, you refused to look Barack Obama in the eye. Indeed, you refused to look at him at all. Even when the two of you shook hands at the start, you used your eyes only to locate his hand, and then gazed past him as you shook it.

Obama is my guy. If you are rude to him, you are rude to me. If you came to dinner at my house and refused to look at or speak with one of my guests, that would be bad manners and I would be offended. Same thing if I went to your house. During the debate, you were America's guest.

What was your problem? Do you hold this man in such contempt that you cannot bear to gaze upon him? Will you not even speak to him directly?

Do you think he doesn't have the right to be running for President?

Were you angry because after you said you wouldn't attend the debate, he said a President should be able to concern himself with two things at the same time? He was right. The proof is, you were there. Were you angry with him because he called your bluff?

During the debate, Jim Lehrer repeatedly called upon both candidates to speak directly to each other. Obama looked at you. He addressed you as "John," which as a fellow senator is his privilege. His body language was open. You stared straight ahead, or at Lehrer, or into space. Your jaw was clinched. You had a tight little smile, or a grimace, or a little shake of your head.

I had to do two things at once while watching the debate. I had to listen to what was being said. And I had to process your rigid and contemptuous behavior. If you were at a wedding and the father of the groom refused to look at or speak to the bride, how would that make you feel? Especially if you were the father of the bride?

You made a TV commercial showing the moments Obama agreed with you. Everybody knows he did. Did his agreement show honesty, or weakness? It is significant that you said it proved he was not ready to lead.

What is the better leadership quality: (1) Willingness to listen to your opponent, and keep an open mind? (2) Rigidly ignoring him? Which of the two of you better demonstrated the bipartisan spirit you say you represent? Was there anything he said that you agreed with? Could you have brought yourself to say so?

I'm not the only one who noticed your odd, hostile behavior. Just about everybody did. I'm sure many of your supporters must have sensed the tension. Before the debate, pundits were wondering if you might explode in a display of your famous temper. I think we saw that happen, all right, but it was an implosion. I have instructed my wife to exclude you from any future dinner parties.

20081006-01 05:06 SteveB Re: A Pilot's Perspective on Obama

Dear SteveM,

I "care enough" to throw this old bull-sh*t in the can!

Wake up! Watch what's going on around you. Obama has led like a President in a real crisis...McCain ran around like a mean, blustering, old chicken with its lying head cut off.

Just goes to prove that these "experience" arguments don't work. Nor do the character assassinations of a man who is the only one of the two to prove that he has character.

That's what's happenin' out there in the real world, right now!

The end is near for your Mr. Self-Proclaimed War Hero.

20081006-02 05:16 SteveB Re: No "Change" for Him! [10/5 duplicate]

Dear SteveM,

Do you really believe that everything is fine in America right now?

Do you not see that a lot of fundamental, complex things need to change and change soon if we are to prosper in the future? Surely you see this—energy, immigration, business regulation, war, taxes, balancing the budget, health care, education, infrastructure, jobs going to China, India, Mexico, campaign finance reform, etc. Lots of problems and everyone sees them. (but notice that I don't list gun rights, religious freedom, or abortion—not problems!).

Do you really think a 72-year-old senile has-been is going to change anything? We don't even have the time for him to learn all the cr*p he so obviously doesn't know!

Watch what is going on around you right now. History is unfolding and it's not looking good for your new idiots.

20081006-03 05:29 SteveB Re: "Three Men Who Brought Down Wall Street" [10/5 duplicate]

Dear SteveM,

Again, old news. Turns out...these guys don't work for Obama or really even have much to do with him, but McCain's campaign is full of guys who took money from Fannie and Freddy and all the rest. Why not talk about that, if these kinds of associations are really so intolerable for you?

Show me something more useful, like a coherent plan for how McCain would run the country. Show me something that indicates the man understands what's going on around him in the world right now...not 1950.

Why waste time and energy on all this stupid attack, attack stuff that totally fails to hide or divert from the fact that the man doesn't have brain-one left and has no solutions or proposals...other than "I'm going to form a commission"...["with," I guess, "all these high-priced brainiacs on it. Real geeks who know lots of stuff. I figure in a few months, they'll figure it all out, and get back to me with their report. I'll, um...get that great big report read real soon...and then we'll be on our merry way." But, what precisely do you see as the problem, Johnny? That's what we never hear, because there is no understanding. I'm serious. Unfortunately.]

Ya, Johnny Boy, that really inspires confidence!

20081006-04 19:03 D. Plouffe Just Released: Full McCain/Keating Video

Dear SteveB:

John McCain wants you to forget about his role in our country's last major financial crisis and costly bailout: the savings and loan crisis of the late '80s and early '90s. But voters deserve to know that the failed philosophy and culture of corruption that created the savings and loan crisis then are alive in the current crisis—and in John McCain's plans for our economic future.

We just released a short documentary about John McCain's role in that financial crisis—watch it now and share it with your friends:

<http://my.barackobama.com/keatingvideo>

Voters should know the facts about John McCain's poor judgment—judgment that has twice placed him on the wrong side of history.

Over the weekend, John McCain's top adviser announced their plan to stop engaging in a debate over the economy and "turn the page" to more direct, personal attacks on Barack Obama.

In the middle of the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression, they want to change the subject from the central question of this election. Perhaps because the policies McCain supported these past eight years and wants to continue are pretty hard to defend.

But it's not just McCain's role in the current crisis that they're avoiding. The backward economic philosophy and culture of corruption that helped create the current crisis are looking more and more like the other major financial crisis of our time.

During the savings and loan crisis of the late '80s and early '90s, McCain's political favors and aggressive support for deregulation put him at the center of the fall of Lincoln Savings and Loan, one of the largest in the country. More than 23,000 investors lost their savings. Overall, the savings and loan crisis required the federal government to bail out the savings of hundreds of thousands of families and ultimately cost American taxpayers $124 billion.

Sound familiar?

In that crisis, John McCain and his political patron, Charles Keating, played central roles that ultimately landed Keating in jail for fraud and McCain in front of the Senate Ethics Committee. The McCain campaign has tried to avoid talking about the scandal, but with so many parallels to the current crisis, McCain's Keating history is relevant and voters deserve to know the facts—and see for themselves the pattern of poor judgment by John McCain.

And this time, McCain's bankrupt economic philosophy has put our economy at the brink of collapse and put millions of Americans at risk of losing their homes.

It's no wonder John McCain would rather spend the last month of this election smearing Barack's character instead of talking about the top priority issue for voters. But if we work together, we can make sure the focus stays on the economy—and how to fix it.

Please forward this email to everyone you know. Thanks.

David Plouffe, Campaign Manager, Obama for America

Paid for by Obama for America.

20081010-01 13:29 Dennis Fw: "How Wall Street Works"
--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Once upon a time, in a village, a man appeared and announced to the villagers that he would buy monkeys for $10 each.

The villagers, seeing that there were many monkeys around, went out to the forest and started catching them. The man bought thousands at $10 and, as supply started to diminish, the villagers stopped their effort. He further announced that he would now buy at $20 for a monkey.

This renewed the efforts of the villagers and they started catching monkeys again.

Soon the supply diminished even further and people started going back to their farms. The offer increased to $25 each, and the supply of monkeys became so small that it was an effort to even find a monkey, let alone catch it. The man now announced that he would buy monkeys at $50! However, since he had to go to the city on some business, his assistant would now buy on behalf of him.

In the absence of the man, the assistant told the villagers. "Look at all these monkeys in the big cage that the man has collected. I will sell them to you at $35, and when the man returns from the city, you can sell them to him for $50 each."

The villagers rounded up all their savings and bought all the monkeys back from the man's assistant.

They never saw the man nor his assistant again, only monkeys everywhere!

Now you have a better understanding of how Wall Street works.

20081010-02 13:43 SteveB The Great Awakening
--

Seems like people are finally leaving McCain in droves to declare their intentions to vote for Obama. It's very refreshing, in a way, to see that the American public still has a little bit of sense, when push comes to shove. Maybe there is hope for us yet!

We have, perhaps, been very lucky to have this crisis right now. It sums up the legacy of the effectiveness of the Bush Presidency in destroying rather than improving people's lives. The entire Republican "way" has been starkly proven wrong!

And events have shown one candidate who would be firm at the reins, yet creative, intelligent, and open minded. A leader. These same events have shown the other to be a tired old has-been, skittering here and there, trying his best to come to some understanding of this mess that is not a total embarrassment to his senile self. Solutions? McCain? Forget it. This guy is full of bad ideas and always has been.

Democracy is lookin' fine! Let the People speak! And then let's start working on all these problems the Republicans either created or facilitated.

20081010-03	20:20	SteveB	"Can General Motors & Ford Survive?"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------------

Dear SteveM,

Truly sad days. What a shame. And this is not something that you can point to Pelosi and Reid and Obama and blame. This is just part of the terrible price we are having to pay because BOTH parties sold us down the river! This is no time for partisanship or ideology. This is the time to seek leaders of clarity, honesty, understanding, energy, fairness, and courage and let's make some fundamental changes. Everyone can now see that many are needed. This is a crisis that makes 9/11 look tiny.

"Can General Motors and Ford survive?" Business Week

Oct. 10, 2008, (<http://articles.moneycentral.msn.com/Investing/Extra/can-general-motors-and-ford-survive.aspx?page=1>)

The automakers are staggering, burning through thin cash reserves even as their shares tank. But no one knows when consumers will start buying new vehicles again.

At the close of business on Friday, General Motors' (GM) market capitalization stood below what it was in 1929 and down more than 94% from its 2000 peak of $52.4 billion.

At its low, GM's market cap stood at $2.6 billion. It was about $4 billion (or $48 billion in today's dollars) when the stock market crashed in 1929. GM closed at $4.89 Friday on the New York Stock Exchange. Over the past 52 weeks, GM's high was $43.20.

GM was not alone. The Dow Jones Industrial Average ($INDU) closed down 128 points, to 8,451.19, on Friday. Ford Motor (F) closed at $1.99. Ford's 52-week-high was $9.24. Balance-sheet issues

The automakers' shares have been hammered because their balance sheets and cash burn were a problem even before the investment calamity that forced the U.S. government to approve a controversial $700 billion bailout. The financial crisis has since spread to European and Asian markets.

GM, its dealers, and would-be car buyers are all suffering from lack of access to credit. "Action to establish some normalcy to credit markets is important to our industry, period," said GM President Frederick Henderson.

Rating agency Standard & Poor's said Thursday it was reviewing GM and Ford for further downgrades based on grim forecasts by firms like J.D. Power & Associates that the industry will sell 2 million fewer vehicles to consumers in 2008 than last year and that the cratering of demand for new vehicles will last through next year.

The ratings being reviewed by S&P include the B- long-term corporate credit ratings for both Ford and GM, along with the B- long-term counterparty credit ratings for the two companies' respective financing arms, GMAC and Ford Motor Credit. The ratings already indicate the companies' debts are below investment grade.

"While the global automotive industry is clearly experiencing a slowdown in 2008, the global market in 2009 may experience an outright collapse," said Jeff Schuster, J.D. Power's executive director of automotive forecasting. (Like BusinessWeek, S&P and J.D. Power are divisions of The McGraw-Hill Cos.)

Consumers are key

The wild card, executives at J.D. Power say, is how long consumers will stay out of the car-buying market. "Buying a new car is something that can be put off indefinitely," says J.D. Power Senior Vice President Gary Dilts, who used to be the top sales executive at Chrysler. "When people start looking at their 401(k) statements and looking to conserve cash, they could stay out another a year or more."

Besides an overall decline in sales, GM and Ford are especially hurting from a drop-off in demand for their pickups and full-size sport-utility vehicles. Those models have historically provided the companies with most of their profit. The spike in demand for small cars, from which the companies earn only about one-fifth as much profit, is not enough to compensate for the slowdown in the sales of bigger vehicles.

Auto dealers struggle to stay afloat [many already aren't]

More than 70% of car dealerships are losing profits, forcing many to lay off employees and shorten their business hours.

S&P believes that both automakers have enough cash for at least the rest of 2008, but that rapidly worsening industry conditions will make things tough for them in 2009. Fitch Ratings said this week that Ford could be down to $8 billion to $10 billion in cash by the second half of 2009, which is the minimum a car company the size of Ford needs to fund day-to-day activities.

No help from financing arm

GM lost a stunning $15.5 billion in the second quarter, and its cash stood at $24 billion. At that time, it was burning $1 billion a month of its reserves, but the rate of burn is thought to have increased in the recent Wall Street meltdown. The next 60 days will be critical, said GM's Henderson, who is watching to see whether the credit markets will loosen up after the U.S. government rescue package starts taking effect and European government actions kick in.

The automaker is searching the corporate equivalent of couch cushions for cash. It is, for example, trying to borrow between $250 million and $500 million from Detroit city pension funds using its corporate headquarters building as collateral. That amount of money is not enough to fund even one vehicle program.

Besides facing falling demand for cars and trucks, GM does not have the backstop of its GMAC finance arm, which for years earned huge money from auto and home loans. To raise money, GM sold a controlling stake in the finance subsidiary to Cerberus Capital Management, and the credit arm has also been hit by the subprime loan problem that has rocked Wall Street and world markets.

Hummer division on the block

GM is running out of assets to sell to raise money, and the ones it has for sale now are having a hard time finding buyers. It is trying to unload its Hummer division, as well as its commercial-vehicle business.

If it can't mortgage its building in downtown Detroit, it says it will try to sell it and lease the space back. Even at fire-sale prices, the availability of capital and credit is so tight for would-be buyers that GM isn't finding attractive offers.

In an indication of how fast GM is falling, it was only in May that the automaker bought the headquarters building for $626 million. Previously, it had leased the space it occupies on the Detroit waterfront.

To raise additional cash, GM has floated the idea of selling the public stock in its European operations, which could be spun off. But the success of that strategy is now in question, given the spread of U.S. economic problems to Europe and Asia.

The Bush administration approved a package of $25 billion in federal loans to automakers and suppliers to offset investments in building cleaner, greener vehicles. Federal officials recently said the money will likely not be available to automakers until the end of 2009. But Michigan legislators have said they will move to speed up the process to rescue their largest employers.

(This article was written and reported by David Kiley from Business Week's Detroit bureau.)

More bad news for the McCain campaign:

Sarah Palin has been found to have abused her powers in the firing of that dude up there. Doesn't say much for McCain's judgment and leadership, does it?

What exactly can the guy do right? It doesn't seem like he's done anything right, or made a wise decision in years and years. His mortgage proposal is a disaster. His drill drill drill is no solution to the problem. Getting rid of the gas tax for the summer would have been a tragedy. The "fundamentals" (to be defined later in a very strange way) of the American economy are strong. GM is not gonna go bankrupt. Uhh, gee, I guess we got a crisis on our hands here, my friends, but never fear, I'm temporarily suspending my personal smear campaign against Senator Obama for a couple days to go to Washington to ram something (anything, cause I don't get any of it) down those eggheads' throats so I can look like a big hero...I hope, I hope, I hope, pant, pant, pant...Then he sits there like a lump of coal while the fight rages on around him, without him. He made himself look like a powerless, unnecessary fool. He made it look pretty certain that, even if he were elected, he would have very little Presidential power at a time when we need a strong Presidency.

And I'm really getting sick of the lying, insulting, insultingly stupid attacks that McCain and Palin mount unceasingly against their rivals because they see no other hope of winning except in trying to destroy. Sometimes the Obama camp will respond in kind, but it is always a response and never even close to 1 for 1, more like 1 defensive attack back for each 10 attacks McCain delivers. I love it that they're finally starting to raise the Keating Five issue against McCain. Maybe McCain should have kept his ugly mouth shut in his stupid "Obama the Terrorist" attack bull cr*p, rather than bring this on himself unnecessarily. Again, no judgment!

I can't wait for both McCain and Palin to just go away with their stupid, divisive, petty politics and egotistical posturing, so that their betters can start sitting down and getting to serious work on the problems that surround and threaten us.

Thank you, John McCain, if you will just step aside and stay out of the way, Sir...see...you'd really rather retire to one of your, how many?, houses with your still-a-little-cute-but-old wife, instead of having to do a bunch of homework (like reading the Treasury Secretary's two page proposal last week, for cryin'- out-loud! How the hell were you going to ride in and save the day if you hadn't even read the frickin' proposal?) and try to understand all this economic mumbo jumbo and this diplomacy rigmarole and this trying not insult fellow NATO allies like Spain, which is kind of the law and the official foreign policy of the U.S., conducted legally by the President and the State Dept., not by a grandstanding Senator running for the Presidency, especially if it is a relationship as delicate as that of ours with Russia that is at stake.

Where exactly is that wisdom and judgment and leadership that all McCain's vast experience is supposed to have somehow granted him, despite the fact that he has shown nothing but the poorest of judgment all his life? How many planes did he crash? 5? He got mixed up in the middle of a banking scandal and learned nothing? He fantasizes that he was exonerated, but he was not. He cheated on his first wife? Maybe the second. He didn't look good enough campaigning against George Bush to get even close to the nomination, yet now he somehow looks good enough to replace his close buddy and total failure, George Bush, the Stupid??? Give me a break.

True colors...true colors...

I thought the Right were such huge believers in Freedom and Free Speech and the Constitution and the Founding Fathers and Ronald Reagan and guns and pro-life because "the people and their rights must be protected". But somehow Obama doesn't have the right to stand up and run for President without calls that he be killed? I'm sick of this frickin' cr*p, America! I thought y'all were better than this!

Well, I got news for 'ya McCain and Palin and all your ilk: "WE WON'T GET FOOLED AGAIN. NO NO! WON'T GET FOOLED AGAIN!" [CRASHING GUITARS!!!] Go crawl in a hole somewhere, you pin-headed right-wing a*s-holes! Your time in the sun has been an abject failure and is coming to a fitting end— out in the flames of a society burned at the stake of giant ego, greed, and power. Both political parties are at fault. The system has been proven corrupt.

Anyone who only wants to point fingers at this time is not a true American. I am empowered by my mother to arbitrarily make that call and I do.

Where's the famous McCain "economic solution" he suspended his campaign for? LOL!!!! I think McCain's idea of an economic solution is a double martini!

I hope we have the wisdom to learn from our mistakes and never make the same ones again (not that that will probably help us much, come to think of it!).

"Anti-Obama Anger Erupts at McCain Events" by AP

Oct. 10, 2008, (<http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/27123224/>) (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/27123224/ns/politics-decision_08/t/anti-obama-anger-erupts-mccain-events/#.TxQT229SQhI)

(Taunts, jeers noticeably louder when VP candidate Palin appears.)

(LA CROSSE, Wis.) Some of the anger is getting raw at Republican rallies and John McCain is mostly letting it flare.

A sense of grievance spilling into rage has gripped some GOP events as McCain supporters see his presidential campaign lag against Barack Obama. They're making it personal, against the Democrat. Shouts of "traitor," "terrorist," "treason," "liar," and even "off with his head" have rung from the crowd at McCain and Sarah Palin rallies, and gone unchallenged by them.

Presidential candidates are accustomed to raucous rallies this close to Election Day and welcome the enthusiasm. But they are also traditionally monitors of sorts from the stage. Part of their job is to leaven proceedings if tempers run ragged and to rein in an out-of-bounds comment from the crowd. Not so much this week, at GOP rallies in Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Florida and other states.

When a visibly angry McCain supporter in Waukesha, Wis., on Thursday told the candidate "I'm really mad" because of "socialists taking over the country," McCain stoked the sentiment. "I think I got the message," he said. "The gentleman is right." He went on to talk about Democrats in control of Congress.

The anti-Obama taunts and jeers are noticeably louder when McCain appears with Palin, a big draw for GOP social conservatives. She accused Obama this week of "palling around with terrorists" because of his past, loose association with a 1960s radical. If less directly, McCain, too, has sought to exploit Obama's Chicago neighborhood ties to William Ayers, while trying simultaneously to steer voters' attention to his plans for the financial crisis.

More subdued without Palin

The Alaska governor did not campaign with McCain on Friday, and his rally in La Crosse was much more subdued than those earlier in the week when the two campaigned together. Still, one woman shouted "traitor" when McCain told voters Obama would raise their taxes.

Volunteers worked up chants from the crowd of "U.S.A." and "John McCain, John McCain," in an apparent attempt to drown out boos and other displays of negative energy.

Palin, at a fundraiser in Ohio on Friday, told supporters "it's not negative and it's not mean-spirited" to scrutinize Obama's iffy associations.

McCain campaign manager Rick Davis said Friday the outbursts weren't a "big deal," but acknowledged considerable frustration among some of the candidate's supporters.

"Political rallies have always attracted people who are emotionally connected to the outcome of the election," Davis said, adding, "I'm confident it has nothing to do with what our candidates are doing or saying right now."

Obama disputed that assessment at a campaign rally in Chillicothe, Ohio, on Friday. "It's easy to rile up a crowd by stoking anger and division," Obama said. "In the last couple of days, we've seen a barrage of nasty insinuations and attacks."

The Obama campaign has kept up a daily drumbeat about McCain's "lies" and the Democratic candidate himself has routinely distorted his rival's record and agenda. Obama calls McCain "erratic" in a subtle but unmistakable attempt to exploit questions about the Republican's age and temperament. But his rallies and rhetoric have lacked the personal venom coming at him from the other side.

Secret Service investigates

The Secret Service confirmed Friday that it had investigated an episode reported in The Washington Post in which someone in Palin's crowd in Clearwater, Fla., shouted "kill him," on Monday, meaning Obama. There was "no indication that there was anything directed at Obama," Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren said. "We looked into it because we always operate in an atmosphere of caution."

Fitting with McCain's theme that people don't know enough about Obama, his co-chairman Frank Keating broached a subject Thursday that got one of Hillary Rodham Clinton's advisers removed from her inner circle during her Democratic primary campaign.

Keating described Obama as a "guy of the street" who should be more candid about his drug use as a young man. Obama wrote about his teenage experimentation with drugs and alcohol in his memoirs. The McCain campaign began running a new television ad criticizing Obama for his relationship with Ayers, a founder of the violent Weather Underground group during the Vietnam War era. Obama and Ayers are neighbors in Chicago, and the two once served together on a charity board. Ayers held a house party for Obama when he was launching his career in Chicago politics, but the two are not close friends.

"When convenient, he worked with terrorist Bill Ayers," the ad says. "When discovered, he lied." In two events this week, warm-up speakers at GOP rallies have used Obama's middle name, Hussein, to seed doubts about the Democrat, a tactic meant to draw attention to the false rumors that Obama is a Muslim, as well as to belittle him. "On Nov. 4, let's leave Barack Hussein Obama wondering what happened," a sheriff told Palin's Florida rally.

McCain once stepped forward directly to denounce that tactic. This week, his campaign merely issued a lukewarm criticism that tried to score a political point in the same breath: "We do not condone this inappropriate rhetoric which distracts from the real questions of judgment, character and experience that voters will base their decisions on this November."

Some of the frustration at McCain's rallies is from people who want the candidate to go harder after Obama. In Waukesha, when a voter begged McCain to take a more combative tone toward Obama, McCain instead talked about the financial crisis.

"Could I just say very quickly, yes, I'll do that," McCain said. "But I also, my friends, want to address the greatest financial challenge of our lifetime with a positive plan for action."

Copyright 2008 The Associated Press

20081011-01	09:13	SteveB	Re: "Anti-Obama Anger Erupts at McCain Events"
-------------	-------	--------	--

McCain at Dead End

It looks to me like the morally bankrupt McCain campaign has finally had its chickens come home to roost.

Yesterday, before an unruly crowd that wanted to lynch Obama—thanks to McCain campaign tactics—McCain finally had to admit that Obama is qualified to be President and that this is not something to be feared, and that he is not an Arab or a Muslim. He appeared to be rather horrified by what he was hearing repeated back from the crowd. Ya, Johnny Boy, this is the way to run a campaign, teach the voters to hate and fear the opponent, rather than teach them who is the better leader and better on the issues. What an evil you have done your country, old man!

An amazing turn of events. But is it McCain's good heart finally showing itself, or is this jailhouse conversion just more campaign tactics?

Well, you also might notice that in the last debate McCain was unwilling to call Obama a terrorist to his face or even mention the stupid Ayres thing. Is he getting soft-hearted?

Or does he just realize finally that all the lying is not working this time around. Obama is now 11% ahead in polls. McCain and his campaign know that the old man doesn't understand any of this 21st Century economic mumbo-jumbo. 86% of the people in the country say they are dissatisfied with the state of the nation and its direction. (Big surprise!)

So—if Obama is not a scary Muslim terrorist, there goes McCain's entire campaign and all its premises and mistakes, up in smoke. What a beautiful thing justice can be.

20081011-02 09:33 SteveB Overheard Conversation: John McCain & Rush Limbaugh

Rush Limbaugh: Senator McCain, maybe you should consider suspending your campaign at this grave juncture to take some time to think about what to do next to defeat that unholy, drug-dealin', pimpin', rapin', burglarizin', terrorist, black b*stard.

John McCain: Maybe that's not a bad idea. But haven't I suspended my campaign once already?

Limbaugh: So you do remember a few things? Ya, but don't worry, none of those idiots out there will notice. Only the goddamn liberal press!

McCain: That's the ticket!

Limbaugh: Then, with some time (hmmm, wonder if we could get the election postponed because of the, uh, yes, financial crisis!), maybe you can figure out a way to get that stiff, right-wing spine back again so you can go on the attack like a white-haired old pit-bull. Man, how could you possibly utter the words, "Senator Obama is a decent man."?

McCain: Well, he is a decent man, it seems to me, my friend. I think I'm tired of all the lies.

Limbaugh: Then you will never be President, Senator McCain! Especially since the stupid Palin thing doesn't seem to be going our way at all. It's more important than ever that you go out there like the rest of us, every day, and LIE! LIE! LIE! to make America free and safe.

McCain: Gee, you're kind of a scary guy, you know it?

20081011-03 17:47 SteveB "IMF Warns of Global Financial Meltdown"

Essentially, Bush f*cked McCain. Bush couldn't keep the economy rolling a few more measly weeks, until after the election. Then McCain might have had a fighting chance.

Come to think of it, Bush has hurt McCain in other ways: negotiating with Iran after Obama said we should and McCain said no, talking about more resources in Afghanistan after Obama said they were needed, negotiating a troop withdrawal timetable with Iraq when McCain was saying that would be foolhardy.

Mmmmm...Bush and McCain haven't gotten along since Bush shut down McCain's 2000 Presidential hopes and dreams....Naw! Surely Bush wouldn't go this far to make sure McCain never gets elected...right?

Meantime, folks, we ourselves, the American people, are now f'ed in so many ways! You will see them unfold and they are unfolding now. Better hope you can hang on to that retirement stock a good long time. Better hope you're not trying to run a business or even a government. Better hope you're not trying to keep a job that provides for you. Better hope you ain't tryin' to get some job you ain't got cause you ain't gonna get it! Gee...that's just about all of us isn't it? And that's not to mention somebody's grandkids who are going to be poor as they fight to pay off these massive debts, though I hope not.

Read the article below for more, stunning, details.

And who is to blame, in the end, except our politicians—both parties of them—who have sold us down the river, essentially in exchange for money to run the campaigns that maintain them in power. I expect nothing but heartless greed from businessmen...that is their purpose in life, and rightfully so. But it is the duty of government to protect us from their excesses. Government has failed us, again (or, more appropriately, de nouveau).

And, of course, we, their bosses have failed, because we, the people, didn't make the politicians reform a corrupt system, and we kept re-electing the bums instead of throwing them out! There's another convenient opportunity coming up soon.

"IMF Warns of Global Financial Meltdown" MSNBC

Oct. 11, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/27129830/ns/business-stocks_and_economy/t/imf-chief-warns-global-financial-meltdown/#.Txc1aG9SQhI)

(Bush urges patience in crisis fix; rich nations vow to fight credit crunch.)

(WASHINGTON) The International Monetary Fund warned Saturday that debt-ridden banks were pushing the global financial system to the brink of meltdown and rich nations had so far failed to restore confidence.

President Bush appealed for patience as world leaders raced to stabilize financial markets and avert the deepest global recession in decades, but the 185-nation IMF said more steps would be needed in the coming months.

"Intensifying solvency concerns about a number of the largest U.S.-based and European financial institutions have pushed the global financial system to the brink of systemic meltdown," IMF chief Dominique Strauss-Kahn said.

President Bush huddled with economic chiefs from the G-7—Japan, Germany, Britain, France, Italy and Canada—and officials from the IMF and World Bank, and said top industrial nations grasped the gravity of the crisis and would work together to solve it.

"In an interconnected world, no nation will gain by driving down the fortunes of another. We are in this together. We will come through it together," Bush said. "There have been moments of crisis in the past when powerful nations turned their energies against each other or sought to wall themselves off from the world. This time is different."

"I'm confident that the world's major economies can overcome the challenges we face," Bush said, adding that Washington was working as fast as possible to implement a $700 billion financial bailout package approved a week ago.

Yet there was no concrete offer of new moves when Bush spoke on a Rose Garden stage just after daybreak, flanked by representatives from nearly a dozen nations and international organizations.

Resolving the crisis

The fresh message of the day was Bush's plea that nations work together to address the crisis, avoiding the go-it-alone protectionist trade strategies that worsened conditions during the Great Depression. "We will do what it takes to resolve the crisis and the world's economy will emerge stronger as a result," he said.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Bush's commitment to collaborative action was repeated and agreed to by every official and minister who took part in a private White House meeting before the statement. Participating in that session with the president were top officials from the G-7, as well as from the European Union, World Bank and IMF.

Bush did not mention any specific action that prompted his call. But Ireland recently moved to guarantee all bank deposits, triggering similar actions in Germany and other countries concerned that nervous depositors would move their bank accounts to Ireland.

The president barely referenced a significant new step from his administration—partial nationalization of some banks. After days of speculation this move was coming, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson announced late Friday night that the government would buy part ownership in an array of American banks.

Intense market turmoil

President Hoover tried something like that in 1932 during the Great Depression. No detail was provided about how the new approach would work, only that it was similar to Britain's move to pour cash into its troubled banks in exchange for stakes in them. The U.S. government would use an unspecified portion of the $700 billion approved by Congress a week ago to purchase stocks in a wide variety of banks and other financial institutions.

The rescue program originally was sold to Congress and the public as a plan to buy mortgage-related loans from financial institutions. The goal was to remove troubled assets from those institutions' books and inspire them to restart more normal lending operations.

Congress passed the massive and hard-fought legislation, and Bush signed it. The government raised the amount of bank deposits it insured. Billions of dollars of reserves have gone into banking systems in the U.S. and other countries. Yet credit, the economy's lifeblood, has remained virtually frozen.

This paralysis in the credit markets has translated into intense turmoil in the stock markets. The Dow Jones industrial average just completed its worst week in history, plummeting more than 18 percent. Over the past year, people in the U.S. have watched $8.4 trillion drain from investment accounts and retirement savings.

So the administration decided to use the bailout bill to pump equity directly into the banks—an idea never mentioned during the congressional debate. The administration says it is authorized in an obscure corner of the 400-page legislation.

Officials are not saying how long it will take to get this program under way—just as is the case with the even more complicated effort to buy mortgage-backed securities.

Bush seemed to acknowledge that the lag is feeding anxiety on Wall Street. "These extraordinary efforts are being implemented as quickly and as effectively as possible," Bush said. "The benefits will not be realized overnight."

The White House session with Bush followed a three-hour meeting Friday night of G-7 finance ministers. The president largely echoed their terse statement, saying the nations have together pledged to "do what it takes to resolve this crisis."

Among their promises are preventing the failure of major banks, unfreezing credit markets, bolstering deposit insurance programs, getting the battered mortgage financing system to operate more normally and working with poorer but fast-growing nations that also are feeling the pinch.

To address this last pledge, Paulson scheduled a meeting Saturday evening of the Group of 20 countries—which include the G-7 plus the world's biggest developing countries such as China, Brazil and India—to explain recent actions by the U.S. and other wealthy allies.

French Finance Minister Christine Lagarde said she saw the discussions as a way to help emerging market countries understand actions by wealthier nations so they can be included in solutions and "if they wish, adopt the same principles."

In a briefing for the IMF's policy-setting board, Paulson said that after the immediate crisis "we must turn our attention to longer-term reforms to modernize our outdated financial regulatory structure."

Addressing the crisis

It was the 22nd day among the past 27 that Bush had spoken about the financial crisis, since evidence first arose that the year-old subprime mortgage mess was evolving into a broader and more calamitous meltdown. After the almost 40-minute meeting and his six-minute statement, the president left the White House for a nearly two-hour mountain bike ride in the nearby Virginia woods.

Bush also addressed the crisis in his weekly radio address, as did Democratic vice presidential candidate Joe Biden in delivering his party's response.

Biden criticized Republican nominee John McCain's proposal to solve the problem in part by having the government buy bad home-loan mortgages at full face value and renegotiate them at a reduced price. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama focused on words of calm.

"I know these are difficult times. I know folks are worried," he was to say at a rally in Philadelphia, according to prepared remarks released by his campaign. "But I also know that now is not the time for fear or panic. Now is the time for resolve and steady leadership. Because I know we can steer ourselves out of this crisis."

20081013-01	13:21	SteveB	"The Man Behind the Whispers About Obama"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

What if McCain is really a "Manchurian candidate"! He was held and brainwashed and seems to have an unquenchable ambition to be President. Weird! LOL!

The truth always pretty much prevails...

"The Man Behind the Whispers About Obama" by Jim Rutenberg, New York Times

Oct. 12, 2008, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2008/10/13/us/politics/13martin.html?pagewanted=all>)

The most persistent falsehood about Senator Barack Obama's background first hit in 2004 just two weeks after the Democratic convention speech that helped set him on the path to his presidential candidacy: "Obama is a Muslim who has concealed his religion."

That statement, contained in a press release, spun a complex tale about the ancestry of Mr. Obama, who is Christian. The press release was picked up by a conservative Web site, FreeRepublic.com, and spread steadily as others elaborated on its claims over the years in e-mail messages, Web sites and books. It continues to drive other false rumors about Mr. Obama's background.

Just last Friday, a woman told Senator John McCain at a town-hall-style meeting, "I have read about him," and "he's an Arab." Mr. McCain corrected her.

Until this month, the man who is widely credited with starting the cyber-whisper campaign that still dogs Mr. Obama was a secondary character in news reports, with deep explorations of his background largely confined to liberal blogs.

False claims

But an appearance in a documentary-style program on the Fox News Channel watched by three million people last week thrust the man, Andy Martin, and his past into the foreground. The program allowed Mr. Martin to assert falsely and without challenge that Mr. Obama had once trained to overthrow the government.

An examination of legal documents and election filings, along with interviews with his acquaintances, revealed Mr. Martin, 62, to be a man with a history of scintillating if not always factual claims. He has left a trail of animosity—some of it provoked by anti-Jewish comments—among political leaders, lawyers and judges in three states over more than 30 years.

He is a law school graduate, but his admission to the Illinois bar was blocked in the 1970s after a psychiatric finding of "moderately severe character defect manifested by well-documented ideation with a paranoid flavor and a grandiose character."

Though he is not a lawyer, Mr. Martin went on to become a prodigious filer of lawsuits, and he made unsuccessful attempts to win public office for both parties in three states, as well as for president at least twice, in 1988 and 2000. Based in Chicago, he now identifies himself as a writer who focuses on his anti-Obama Web site and press releases.

'I'm a colorful person'

Mr. Martin, in a series of interviews, did not dispute his influence in Obama rumors. "Everybody uses my research as a takeoff point," Mr. Martin said, adding, however, that some take his writings "and exaggerate them to suit their own fantasies."

As for his background, he said: "I'm a colorful person. There's always somebody who has a legitimate cause in their mind to be angry with me."

When questions were raised last week about Mr. Martin's appearance and claims on "Hannity's America" on Fox News, the program's producer said Mr. Martin was clearly expressing his opinion and not necessarily fact.

It was not Mr. Martin's first turn on national television. The CBS News program "48 Hours" in 1993 devoted an hour-long program to what it called his prolific filing of frivolous lawsuits. He has filed so many lawsuits that a judge barred him from doing so in any federal court without preliminary approval. He prepared to run as a Democrat for Congress in Connecticut, where paperwork for one of his campaign committees listed as one purpose "to exterminate Jew power." He ran as a Republican for the Florida State Senate and the United States Senate in Illinois. When running for president in 1999, he aired a television advertisement in New Hampshire that accused George W. Bush of using cocaine. In the 1990s, Mr. Martin was jailed in a case in Florida involving a physical altercation.

Those from his past amazed

His newfound prominence, and the persistence of his line of political attack—updated regularly on his Web site and through press releases—amazes those from his past.

"Well, that's just a bookend for me," said Tom Slade, a former chairman of the Florida Republican Party, whom Mr. Martin sued for refusing to support him. Mr. Slade said Mr. Martin was driven like "a run-over dog, but he's fearless."

Given Mr. Obama's unusual background, which was the focus of his first book, it was perhaps bound to become fodder for some opposed to his candidacy. Mr. Obama was raised mostly by his white mother, an atheist, and his grandparents, who were Protestant, in Hawaii. He hardly knew his father, a Kenyan from a Muslim family who variously considered himself atheist or agnostic, Mr. Obama wrote. For a few childhood years, Mr. Obama lived in Indonesia with a stepfather he described as loosely following a liberal Islam.

Theories about Mr. Obama's background have taken on a life of their own. But independent analysts seeking the origins of the cyberspace attacks wind up at Mr. Martin's first press release, posted on the Free Republic Web site in Aug., 2004.

Its general outlines have turned up in a host of works that have expounded falsely on Mr. Obama's heritage or supposed attempts to conceal it, including "Obama Nation," the widely discredited best seller about Mr. Obama by Jerome R. Corsi. Mr. Corsi opens the book with a quote from Mr. Martin.

"What he's generating gets picked up in other places," said Danielle Allen, a professor at the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton University who has investigated the e-mail campaign's circulation and origins, "and it's an example of how the Internet has given power to sources we would have never taken seriously at another point in time."

Ms. Allen said Mr. Martin's original work found amplification in 2006, when a man named Ted Sampley wrote an article painting Mr. Obama as a secret practitioner of Islam. Quoting liberally from Mr. Martin, the article circulated on the Internet, and its contents eventually found their way into various e-mail messages, particularly an added claim that Mr. Obama had attended "Jakarta's Muslim Wahhabi schools. Wahhabism is the radical teaching that created the Muslim terrorists who are now waging jihad on the rest of the world."

Mr. Obama for two years attended a Catholic school in Indonesia, where he was taught about the Bible, he wrote in Dreams From My Father, and for two years went to an Indonesian public school open to all religions, where he was taught about the Koran.

Mr. Sampley, coincidentally, is a Vietnam veteran and longtime opponent of Mr. McCain and Senator John Kerry, both of whom he accused of ignoring his claims that American prisoners were left behind in Vietnam. He previously portrayed Mr. McCain as a "Manchurian candidate." Speaking of Mr. Martin's influence on his Obama writings, Mr. Sampley said, "I keyed off of his work."

'Secret' Muslim allegations

Mr. Martin's depictions of Mr. Obama as a secret Muslim have found resonance among some Jewish voters who have received e-mail messages containing various versions of his initial theory, often by new authors and with new twists.

In his original press release, Mr. Martin wrote that he was personally "a strong supporter of the Muslim community." But, he wrote of Mr. Obama, "it may well be that his concealment is meant to endanger Israel." He added, "His Muslim religion would obviously raise serious questions in many Jewish circles." Yet in various court papers, Mr. Martin had impugned Jews.

A motion he filed in a 1983 bankruptcy case called the judge "a crooked, slimy Jew who has a history of lying and thieving common to members of his race." In another motion, filed in 1983, Mr. Martin wrote, "I am able to understand how the Holocaust took place, and with every passing day feel less and less sorry that it did."

In an interview, Mr. Martin denied some statements against Jews attributed to him in court papers, blaming malicious judges for inserting them. But in his "48 Hours" interview in 1993, he affirmed a different anti-Semitic part of the affidavit that included the line about the Holocaust, saying, "The record speaks for itself."

When asked Friday about an assertion in his court papers that "Jews, historically and in daily living, act through clans and in wolf pack syndrome," he said, "That one sort of rings a bell." He said he was not anti-Semitic. "I was trying to show that everybody in the bankruptcy court was Jewish and I was not Jewish," he said, "and I was being victimized by religious bias."

'Moderately severe personality defect'

In discussing the denial of his admission to the Illinois bar, Mr. Martin said the psychiatric exam listing him as having a "moderately severe personality defect" was spitefully written by an evaluator he had clashed with.

Mr. Martin, who says he is from a well-off banking and farming family, is clearly pleased with his newfound attention. But, he said, others have added to his work in "scary" ways. "They Google 'Islam' and 'Obama' and my stuff comes up and they take that and kind of use that—like a Christmas tree, and they decorate it," he said. For instance, he said, he did not necessarily ascribe to a widely circulated e-mail message from the Israeli right-wing activist Ruth Matar, which includes the false assertion, "If Obama were elected, he would be the first Arab-American president."

He said he had at least come to "accept" Mr. Obama's word that he had found Jesus Christ. His intent, he said, was only to educate.

(Kitty Bennett contributed reporting. Copyright © 2008 The New York Times)

20081014-01	12:11	SteveB	Fw: "Sorry, Dad, I'm Voting for Obama"
-------------	-------	--------	--

[Confirmed OK by Snopes.com. —SteveB]

"Sorry, Dad, I'm Voting for Obama" by Christopher Buckley

Oct. 10, 2008, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2008/10/10/the-conservative-case-for-obama.html>)

(The son of William F. Buckley has decided—shock!—to vote for a Democrat.)

Let me be the latest conservative/libertarian/whatever to leap onto the Barack Obama bandwagon. It's a good thing my dear old mum and pup are no longer alive. They'd cut off my allowance.

Or would they? But let's get that part out of the way. The only reason my vote would be of any interest to anyone is that my last name happens to be Buckley—a name I inherited. So in the event anyone notices or cares, the headline will be: "William F. Buckley's Son Says He Is Pro-Obama." I know, I know: It lacks the throw-weight of "Ron Reagan Jr. to Address Democratic Convention," but it'll have to do.

I am—drum roll, please, cue trumpets—making this announcement in the cyberpages of The Daily Beast (what joy to be writing for a publication so named!) rather than in the pages of National Review, where I write the back-page column. For a reason: My colleague, the superb and very dishy Kathleen Parker, recently wrote in National Review Online a column stating what John Cleese as Basil Fawlty would call "the bleeding obvious": namely, that Sarah Palin is an embarrassment, and a dangerous one at that. She's not exactly alone. New York Times columnist David Brooks, who began his career at NR, just called Governor Palin "a cancer on the Republican Party."

As for Kathleen, she has to date received 12,000 (quite literally) foam-at-the-mouth hate-emails. One correspondent, if that's quite the right word, suggested that Kathleen's mother should have aborted her and tossed the fetus into a Dumpster. There's Socratic dialogue for you. Dear Pup once said to me sigh fully after a right-winger who fancied himself a WFB protégé had said something transcendently and provocatively cretinous, "You know, I've spent my entire life time separating the Right from the kooks."

Well, the dear man did his best. At any rate, I don't have the kidney at the moment for 12,000 emails saying how good it is he's no longer alive to see his Judas of a son endorse for the presidency a covert Muslim who pals around with the Weather Underground. So, you're reading it here first.

As to the particulars, assuming anyone gives a fig, here goes:

I have known John McCain personally since 1982. I wrote a well-received speech for him. Earlier this year, I wrote in The New York Times—I'm beginning to sound like Paul Krugman, who cannot begin a column without saying, "As I warned the world in my last column..."—a highly favorable Op-Ed about McCain, taking Rush Limbaugh and the others in the Right Wing Sanhedrin to task for going after McCain for being insufficiently conservative. I don't—still—doubt that McCain's instincts remain fundamentally conservative. But the problem is otherwise.

McCain rose to power on his personality and biography. He was authentic. He spoke truth to power. He told the media they were "jerks" (a sure sign of authenticity, to say nothing of good taste; we are jerks). He was real. He was unconventional. He embraced former anti-war leaders. He brought resolution to the awful missing-POW business. He brought about normalization with Vietnam—his former torturers! Yes, he erred in accepting plane rides and vacations from Charles Keating, but then, having been cleared on technicalities, groveled in apology before the nation. He told me across a lunch table, "The Keating business was much worse than my five and a half years in Hanoi, because I at least walked away from that with my honor." Your heart went out to the guy. I thought at the time, God, this guy should be president someday.

A year ago, when everyone, including the man I'm about to endorse, was caterwauling to get out of Iraq on the next available flight, John McCain, practically alone, said no, no—bad move. Surge. It seemed a suicidal position to take, an act of political bravery of the kind you don't see a whole lot of anymore.

But that was—sigh—then. John McCain has changed. He said, famously, apropos the Republican debacle post-1994, "We came to Washington to change it, and Washington changed us." This campaign has changed John McCain. It has made him inauthentic. A once-first class temperament has become irascible and snarly; his positions change, and lack coherence; he makes unrealistic promises, such as balancing the federal budget "by the end of my first term." Who, really, believes that? Then there was the self-dramatizing and feckless suspension of his campaign over the financial crisis. His ninth-inning attack ads are mean-spirited and pointless. And finally, not to belabor it, there was the Palin nomination. What on earth can he have been thinking?

All this is genuinely saddening, and for the country is perhaps even tragic, for America ought, really, to be governed by men like John McCain—who have spent their entire lives in its service, even willing to give the last full measure of their devotion to it. If he goes out losing ugly, it will be beyond tragic, graffiti on a marble bust.

As for Senator Obama: He has exhibited throughout a "first-class temperament," pace Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.'s famous comment about FDR. As for his intellect, well, he's a Harvard man, though that's sure as heck no guarantee of anything, these days. Vietnam was brought to you by Harvard and (one or two) Yale men. As for our current adventure in Mesopotamia, consider this lustrous alumni roster. Bush 43: Yale. Rumsfeld: Princeton. Paul Bremer: Yale and Harvard. What do they all have in common? Andover! The best and the brightest.

I've read Obama's books, and they are first-rate. He is that rara avis, the politician who writes his own books. Imagine. He is also a lefty. I am not. I am a small-government conservative who clings tenaciously and old-fashionably to the idea that one ought to have balanced budgets. On abortion, gay marriage, et al, I'm libertarian. I believe with my sage and epigrammatic friend P.J. O'Rourke that a government big enough to give you everything you want is also big enough to take it all away.

But having a first-class temperament and a first-class intellect, President Obama will (I pray, secularly) surely understand that traditional left-politics aren't going to get us out of this pit we've dug for ourselves. If he raises taxes and throws up tariff walls and opens the coffers of the DNC to bribe-money from the special interest groups against whom he has (somewhat disingenuously) railed during the campaign trail, then he will almost certainly reap a whirlwind that will make Katrina look like a balmy summer zephyr.

Obama has in him—I think, despite his sometimes airy-fairy “We are the people we have been waiting for” silly rhetoric—the potential to be a good, perhaps even great leader. He is, it seems clear enough, what the historical moment seems to be calling for.

So, I wish him all the best. We are all in this together. Necessity is the mother of bipartisanship. And so, for the first time in my life, I’ll be pulling the Democratic lever in November. As the saying goes, God save the United States of America.

(Christopher Buckley’s books include Supreme Courtship, The White House Mess, Thank You for Smoking, Little Green Men, and Florence of Arabia. His journalism, satire, and criticism has appeared in The New Yorker, The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal, Vanity Fair, Vogue, and Esquire. He was chief speechwriter for Vice President George H.W. Bush, and the founder and editor-in-chief of Forbes FYI.)

20081015-01	09:29	SteveB	“McCain's Mission Impossible”
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------

Johnny Boy, this "fighter" cr*p isn't going to work either. This economic crisis does not require an empty-headed, angry, fighter; it calls for a calm, intelligent, cool hand. The solution will be found by a mature leader, not by a lying old man who bustles around like a teenage kid who understands zero of what is going on around him. Maybe you should finally try to deliver on some of those concrete economic proposals (that make sense, this time, I hope), Johnny Boy. Oh...I see, your dog ate your homework, or, oh, you say you can't remember which house you left your homework at? I see. So who are you going to fight, a*s-wipe, the banks? Wall Street? Fate? You mean you aren't going to "reach across the aisle in a bipartisan fashion"? Is fighting the only analogy you know, the only role you know how to take? Then what are you doing running for President of these United States? Grow up!

“McCain's Mission Impossible” by John Dickerson, Slate

Oct. 14, 2008, (http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/politics/2008/10/mccains_mission_impossible.html)

(Wednesday's debate may be his last chance to win this race.)

To get a sense of what John McCain is going through on the eve of the last presidential debate with 20 days before Election Day and Barack Obama leading in the polls, I decided to put some pressure on myself: I delayed working on this story until 45 minutes before my deadline. To approximate the string of people in McCain's ear offering advice, I turned on Fox News and Rush Limbaugh. Be the happy warrior! Attack! Talk about Ayers! Don't mention Ayers! Fire your campaign staff! ACORN! I then put Wagner on my iTunes.

I'm finding it very hard to concentrate. If we're all lucky, I may just give up and end this piece right here.

OK, maybe not.

I'm sure McCain finds it hard to concentrate, too. He is tough and likes challenging situations. But for McCain, Wednesday's debate comes with a degree of difficulty perhaps beyond the capacity of human achievement. That sounds like the obligatory hyperbole required to create false drama for the debate (so that we might justify our hyperbole after the debate is over). But after doing the tabulations, this is where I come down.

Wednesday night is McCain's last big chance to reach a wide national audience without the media filter.

Obama is ahead in the national and state polls. By Pollster.com's tabulation, Obama is comfortably ahead in states that would give him 256 electoral votes. By that measure, he needs only 14 more electoral votes to win. Obama is ahead in polls in states like Wisconsin, Minnesota, and New Mexico, which could give him that magic number. And the picture looks no better nationally: As John Harwood of the New York Times noted recently, only Ronald Reagan in 1980 came back from the deficit McCain faces. This isn't to say that McCain can't come back. It's just that the weather looks really bad for him.

After the debate, there will be only 19 days left to campaign. After about Oct. 21st—13 days before Election Day—there will be more states to go to than there will be days left to go to them. Without a big debate moment, McCain might be able to dismantle his opponent through advertisements, local media, visits to battleground states, and luck in the news cycle. But that would require a level of precise execution his campaign has not yet shown. Given that unlikelihood, the debate is a big opportunity.

Of course, McCain could just present himself as a nice guy and hope for the best. Sure, there are ways he could win, but they are increasingly fantastical—and they are all out of McCain's hands: All those new Democrats that have been registering in battleground states could stay home on Election Day. There could be a news development, like the discovery of Bush's DUI charge late in 2000 or the Osama Bin Laden tape that surfaced late in 2004, that knocks the race on its ear. A huge bout of buyer's remorse could kick in after it appears that Obama has the race locked up.

If McCain wants to take his destiny into his own hands, he has to knock Obama back. The problem for McCain is that pulling off an effective attack in a debate is like making a soufflé in a highway median. (The honking alone makes it very difficult.) It's hard to be aggressive in a debate because the format is so regulated and the risk of coming off as a brute is so high.

And, historically, the candidate who goes negative in a debate almost always comes off poorly. Bob Dole may have secured Gerald Ford's defeat when, in the 1976 vice-presidential debate, he got nasty and blamed Democrats for a string of wars. Jimmy Carter looked cold and snippy in 1980 next to Ronald Reagan. Lloyd Bentsen was the only candidate who successfully got off an attack line with his crack about his friend Jack Kennedy in his 1988 vice-presidential debate against Dan Quayle.

Even if McCain could overcome history and avoid Obama's effort to portray him as intemperate and erratic, he also has to overcome his recent ineffectiveness. According to the most recent Washington Post/ABC poll, as McCain has increased his attacks on Obama, two poll numbers have also increased: McCain's negatives and Obama's positives. Voters now give Obama the edge on leadership for the first time in the election, and they consider McCain the riskier choice.

Obama is hardly invincible. He has dodged questions, for example, by giving unrealistic answers about how his priorities would shift given the current economic crisis. He has also been less than candid about his thinking on Iraq in light of developments in the last few months. He has overstated his abilities as a bipartisan deal-maker and truth-teller. (And his campaign isn't terribly transparent.) It's hard to see, though, how McCain could take advantage of these issues in a way that changes the dynamic of the race.

McCain's other challenge is that Obama is not his only target. He's got to do something to improve his lot with voters who care about the economy. Despite "suspending his campaign" to assist in forming a financial rescue package (or perhaps because of it), McCain continues to trail his opponent badly when voters are asked to evaluate the candidates on the economy.

As the two candidates head into the debate, both have unveiled new programs aimed at helping regular Americans in a financial pinch. McCain has also offered a new pitch about character: He's a fighter. The message is actually a cleaner version of his acceptance speech. (Perhaps the editors were barred from the room this time.) It's also the message Hillary Clinton offered at the end of her campaign—but Clinton was far more effective in explaining how she was going to fight on behalf of the middle class.

McCain never really explains why his ability to fight, to buck his party, or to do unpopular things is going to improve anyone's life. Yes, he's been tested more, and endured more in life, than Barack Obama. But voters want to know: How's that help me? McCain has got one more night to make the case.

20081015-02	09:45	SteveB	Say Something Positive, John McCain
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------------

Tonight...why don't you tell us what you truly do believe in, John McCain? If you can remember what that is.

I mean, right now, you seem to be saying you're a liberal conservative, a non-believer in government regulation who wants to regulate, a tax cutter warrior who wants to bankrupt the nation, a "maverick" (haha) reformer surrounded by lobbyists and the Washington establishment and everything that entails, and, most confusing of all, you claim to be a man who knows nothing about economics who is going to magically solve our economic woes without bothering to understand them.

So tonight, instead of continually telling stupid, irrelevant, dirty lies about Mr. Obama, why don't you spend this precious time (especially for you, pin-head) telling the American people about what it is—beside ambition, greed, hunger, revenge, lies, and anger—that you believe in and that would make us want to vote for you?

I hope you will be able to remember something positive, something honorable, something that is not destructive.

Otherwise, why do you keep wasting our time, John McCain?

20081015-03 10:58 SteveB Fw: "The Party's Over"

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says this piece was actually written by Patrick J. Buchanan, Sept. 19, 2008: <http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/partysover.asp>]

About Linda Monk: Linda R. Monk, J.D., is a constitutional scholar, journalist, and nationally award-winning author. A graduate of Harvard Law School, she twice received the American Bar Association's Silver Gavel Award, its highest honor for law-related media. Her books include The Words We Live By: Your Annotated Guide to the Constitution, Ordinary Americans: U.S. History Through the Eyes of Everyday People, and The Bill of Rights: A User's Guide. For more than 20 years, Ms. Monk has written commentary for newspapers nationwide, including the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, and Chicago Tribune

"The Party's Over" by Linda Monk

The Crash of 2008, which is now wiping out trillions of dollars of our people's wealth, is, like the Crash of 1929, likely to mark the end of one era and the onset of another.

The new era will see a more sober and much diminished America. The "Omnipower" and "Indispensable Nation" we heard about in all the hubris and braggadocio following our Cold War victory is history. Seizing on the crisis, the left says we are witnessing the failure of market economics, a failure of conservatism.

This is nonsense.

What we are witnessing is the collapse of Gordon Gecko ("Greed Is Good!") capitalism. What we are witnessing is what happens to a prodigal nation that ignores history, and forgets and abandons the philosophy and principles that made it great.

A true conservative (Rep or Dem) cherishes prudence and believes in fiscal responsibility, balanced budgets and a self-reliant republic. He believes in saving for retirement and a rainy day, in deferred gratification, in not buying on credit what you cannot afford, in living within your means. Is that really what got Wall Street and us into this mess—that we followed too religiously the gospel of Robert Taft and Russell Kirk?

"Government must save us!" cries the left, as ever. Yet, who got us into this mess if not the government—the Fed with its easy money, Bush with his profligate spending, and Congress and the SEC by liberating Wall Street and failing to step in and stop the drunken orgy? For years, we Americans have spent more than we earned.

We save nothing.

Credit card debt, consumer debt, auto debt, mortgage debt, corporate debt—all are at record levels. And with pensions and savings being wiped out, much of that debt will never be repaid. Our standard of living is inevitably going to fall. For foreigners will not forever buy our bonds or lend us more money if they rightly fear that they will be paid back, if at all, in cheaper dollars.

We are going to have to learn to live again within our means.

THE PARTY'S OVER!

Up through World War II, we followed the Hamiltonian idea that America must remain economically independent of the world in order to remain politically independent.

But this generation decided that was yesterday's bromide and we must march bravely forward into a Global Economy, where we all depend on one another.

American companies morphed into "Global Companies" and moved plants and factories to Mexico, Asia, China and India, and we began buying more cheaply from abroad what we used to make at home: shoes, clothes, bikes, cars, radios, TVs, planes, computers.

As the trade deficits began inexorably to rise to 6 percent of GDP, we began vast borrowing from abroad to continue buying from abroad.

At home, propelled by tax cuts, war in Iraq and an explosion in social spending, surpluses vanished and deficits reappeared and began to rise. The dollar began to sink, and gold began to soar.

Yet, still, the promises of the politicians come. Barack Obama will give us national health insurance and tax cuts for all but that 2 percent of the nation that already carries 50 percent of the federal income tax load.

John McCain is going to cut taxes, expand the military, move NATO into Georgia and Ukraine, confront Russia and force Iran to stop enriching uranium or "bomb, bomb, bomb," with Joe Lieberman as wartime consigliere.

Who are we kidding?

What we are witnessing today is how empires end. The Last Superpower is unable to defend its borders, protect its currency, win its wars or balance its budget. Medicare and Social Security are headed for the cliff with unfunded liabilities in the tens of trillions of dollars. What we are witnessing today is nothing less than a Katrina-like failure of government, of our political class, and of democracy itself, casting a cloud over the viability and longevity of the system. Notice who is managing the crisis.

Not our elected leaders.

Nancy Pelosi says she had nothing to do with it. Congress is paralyzed and heading home. President Bush is nowhere to be seen.

Hank Paulson of Goldman Sachs and Ben Bernanke of the Fed chose to bail out Bear Sterns but let Lehman go under.

They decided to nationalize Fannie and Freddie at a cost to taxpayers of hundreds of billions, putting the U.S. government behind $5 trillion in mortgages. They decided to buy AIG with $85 billion rather than see the insurance giant sink beneath the waves.

An unelected financial elite is now entrusted with the assignment of getting us out of a disaster into which an unelected financial elite plunged the nation. We are just spectators.

What the Greatest Generation handed down to us—the richest, most powerful, most self-sufficient republic in history, with the highest standard of living any nation had ever achieved—the baby boomers, oblivious and self-indulgent to the end, have frittered away.

How do WE THE PEOPLE put the villains who are responsible under oath and sit them down at public hearings to determine whose necks should meet the guillotine?

Hypocritically, those who had oversight responsibility such as Senator Chris Dodd [Chairman of the Senate Banking Committee] and Barney Frank [Chairman, House Financial Services Committee] who helped get us into this mess are on every TV channel voicing their righteous indignation and pompously sitting on their elevated platform glaring down at those they are chastising and grilling, trying to pass the blame to others.

WE THE PEOPLE should be on the elevated platform in judgment and execution of the likes of Chris Dodd, Barney Frank and the rest of the band of thieves and conspirators who are responsible for the financial collapse of the U.S.

To name just a few of the culprits: Henry Paulson Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, Alan Greenspan & Ben Bernanke, Chairman Federal Reserve & Christopher Cox, SEC Chairman.

But not to worry—YOUR PUBLIC SERVANTS who fear being voted out of office will take their self-awarded Golden Parachute Congressional Retirement, give WE THE PEOPLE the finger one last time and head for their safe havens as the World Citizens they are.

However, before they waddle off into the sunset, they will go on record one last time denouncing corporate greed, lavish salaries and bonuses for their key felons at Fannie May, Freddie Mac, Lehman Brothers & AIG.

Meanwhile, WE THE PEOPLE fiddle while Rome burns and are too lazy and indifferent to vote the scum out of office.

20081015-04	18:52	SteveB	"The Risk of McCain's Health Plan"
-------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

And his Social Security "ideas" scare the hell out of me too!

"The Risk of McCain's Health Plan" by Ron Brownstein, National Journal and MSNBC

Oct. 10, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/27121059/ns/politics-national_journal/t/risk-mccains-health-plan/)

(Obama not exaggerating when calling his opponent's plan 'radical'.)

(WASHINGTON) This week's most important debate wasn't the meandering town hall duel between Barack Obama and John McCain. That encounter was understandably scored by polls and most pundits as a win for Obama, who seemed steadier than an over-caffeinated McCain. But lackluster questions and a constrictive format meant it did little to clarify the decision facing voters.

Far more instructive was the argument Obama instigated with McCain last week over health care. In several speeches, Obama accurately framed the central contrast between the nominees' approaches. The bedrock goal of Obama's plan is to reinforce the sharing of risk and cost between healthy and sick, young and old. By contrast, McCain, hoping to expand choice, would erode risk-sharing and accept sharper distinctions between the healthy and sick in both the availability and cost of coverage. One plan prizes solidarity; the other, autonomy.

Most Americans now receive their health insurance at work. That system promotes risk-sharing because employers don't vary the premiums based on a worker's age or health: The old and sick are subsidized by the young and healthy, who are then subsidized as they age.

McCain would upend that system. Today employers can deduct as a business expense the contributions they make to a worker's health insurance premiums. Workers, though, are not taxed on the value of their employer's contribution. That "exclusion" provides a powerful tax incentive for work-based coverage. McCain would end the exclusion so that workers pay taxes on their employer's premium contribution. Instead, he would provide a tax credit ($2,500 for individuals and $5,000 for families) that workers could apply to the cost of obtaining health insurance. In an ad this week, the Obama campaign described that trade as "the largest middle-class tax increase in history."

That's flat wrong. For all but the highest earners with the most-expensive insurance plans, the credit would more than offset the additional taxes workers would face from ending the exclusion, the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center calculates. The real problem with McCain's idea is that, without the economic incentive provided by the exclusion, more employers might stop offering coverage. And even employers who want to continue could find it difficult because younger workers would be likely to use their credit to buy stripped-down, cheaper coverage on their own. That would leave employers covering only older and sicker workers, which could quickly swell premiums to unaffordable levels. That concern prompted the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Business Roundtable to criticize McCain's plan in an eye-opening New York Times article on Tuesday.

McCain's camp insists that his proposal would not undermine employer-based coverage. But few experts agree. Several studies have projected that his plan would move about 20 million people from employer-based coverage to the individual insurance market. And in that market, older or sicker consumers face much higher costs than the healthy—if they can buy coverage at all.

McCain would further deregulate the individual market by allowing any insurance policy approved in any state to be sold in every state. He says that would provide consumers more choices, but it would also undercut state laws requiring insurers to cover specific treatments, like cervical or breast cancer screening for women. An insurer could locate in the one state that does not require it to fund mammograms (Utah) and sell in all 50 states. Even more worrisome, notes health economist Jonathan Gruber, is that insurance companies offering more-comprehensive policies for individuals would face the same risk as employers—losing healthy young workers to cut-rate plans from the least-regulated states. That would further unravel risk-sharing and increase prices for the sick.

Obama's goals couldn't differ more. Through incentives for (and mandates on) employers, the expansion of government programs, and new nationwide rules for insurers (such as requiring them to cover all applicants, regardless of their health), he wants to insure more Americans through large pools that promote risk-sharing.

McCain's approach would save people money when they are young but expose them to greater financial and health risks as they age. It repudiates the essence of insurance, which aims to spread risk not only across the population but across an individual's lifetime. Obama is wrong to portray McCain's plan as a tax hike. And the Democrat's alternative raises its own tough questions, especially about cost. But Obama does not exaggerate when he says that his rival is offering a "radical" new vision of how Americans can safeguard their health.

20081018-01	19:28	SteveB	"Cracking the ACORN Case"
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------

Notice...none of the cr*p about Obama has proven to be true so far! Strange, huh?

"Cracking the ACORN Case" by Andrew Romano, Newsweek

Oct. 15, 2008, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/blogs/stumper/2008/10/15/cracking-the-acorn-case.html>)

(Acorn + Mickey Mouse = The Most Adorable Political "Scandal" in Recent Memory. It may also be one of the most pointless.)

In recent days, conservative activists and right-leaning media outlets like FOX News and Matt Drudge—who led his influential site with the Mickey Mouse story yesterday afternoon—have tried to raise a ruckus over the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, a liberal nonprofit/lobbying group—it typically fights on behalf of poor people for free school lunches and government housing—that also spearheaded one of this cycle's largest (and most controversial) voter registration drives. Unless I'm mistaken, the conspiracy theory goes something like this: Obama "has ties" to Acorn; Acorn is trying to steal the election; therefore, by the transitive property, Obama is also trying to steal the election. To see why this makes no sense, it'll be helpful to break the equation down into three bite-sized pieces.

I. Obama Has Ties to ACORN: This is true. As the New York Times recently reported, "in 1995, Obama was on a team of lawyers that represented Acorn in a lawsuit to compel Illinois to comply with federal laws intended to enhance access to the polls"; the Justice Department "was on the same side as ACORN in the lawsuit." Later, "Obama conducted two leadership training sessions of roughly an hour each for ACORN's Chicago affiliate over a three-year period." Finally, the Obama campaign made (in February) a $832,598 payment to Citizens Services, Inc., a consulting firm affiliated with ACORN; Chicago initially reported that the money was for "staging, sound, lighting" before amending its FEC reports to reflect the fact that it was spent on get-out-the-vote efforts. About $80,000 of the $832,598 went to ACORN.

Of course, there's no proof here that Team Obama coordinated with ACORN on registering voters or anything. Still, if ACORN were committing voter fraud, that large February payment would certainly land the candidate in hot water—deservedly so. The key word, however, is "if." Which brings us to...

II. ACORN Is Trying to Steal the Election. This is not even remotely true. To date, there has been no shortage of charges against ACORN: Ohio in 2004; Colorado in 2005; Kansas City, Missouri in 2006 and Washington state in 2007. This year alone, authorities are investigating the organization's branches in Lake County, Indiana; Cuyahoga County, Ohio; Michigan; Nevada and Missouri. But not a single case alleges that ACORN is attempting to influence the outcome of the election. So why all the fuss? Because people are confusing voter fraud (a dangerous offense) with voter registration fraud (a petty crime). ACORN stands accused of the latter. The Politico's Ben Smith explains nicely: The former would be, say, voting the cemeteries or stuffing the ballot boxes.

This has happened occasionally in American history, though I can think of recent instances only in rare local races. Practically speaking, this can most easily be done by whoever is actually administering the election, which is why partisan observers carefully oversee the vote-counting process. The latter is putting the names of fake voters on the rolls, something that happens primarily when organizations, like Acorn, pay contractors for new voter registrations. That can be a crime, and it messes up the voter files, but there's virtually no evidence these imaginary people then vote in November. The current stories about Acorn don't even allege a plan to affect the November vote.

I'll use Mickey Mouse to demonstrate how ACORN has engaged in voter registration fraud. In Florida, ACORN pays local workers $8 an hour to gather 20 voter registrations a day. One of these workers, seeking to meet his quota and snap up his paycheck, wrote down "Mickey Mouse," forged a signature and turned his form; others have submitted forms with made-up names, repeated names, "unreadable handwriting, missing information, signatures that didn't match those on file, altered dates of birth or Social Security numbers." Following protocol, ACORN has tried to find the incomplete, duplicate or bogus forms and fire the employees who submitted them. But before sending every application to the state—which is required by law—the group unfortunately failed to flag a few.

This has undoubtedly made life more difficult for the local officials tasked with verifying applications, and ACORN should be held accountable. But it can't possibly change who's voting on Election Day. Mickey Mouse isn't going to show up at the polls. Voters can't vote if they don't exist. People who are registered twice will only be allowed to vote once. Annoying as they are, these inconsistencies can't affect the outcome of the election. They can only cause headaches.

For voter registration fraud to become voter fraud, ACORN would have to be engaged in a widespread, covert effort to flood the polls with ineligible voters impersonating their eligible peers. That would require a lot of top-down coordination: identifying willing impersonators, forging documents, etc. No one has accused ACORN of anything remotely like this. In fact, ACORN seems to have the opposite problem; the fact that it failed to filter some obviously fake registration forms from its 1.3 million applications suggests, if anything, a lack of organization. That's one reason actual voter fraud is extremely rare. As Art Levine reports, "only 24 people were convicted of illegal voting in federal elections between 2002 and 2005—and nobody was even charged by Justice with impersonating another voter.

(The Justice Department declined to answer questions about more recent fraud prosecutions.) And despite the anti-immigrant frenzy fueling photo-ID laws, only 14 noncitizens were convicted of illegally voting in federal elections from 2002 through 2005—mostly because of their ignorance of election law." Even then, it's a stretch to say the group that registered a lawbreaking voter should be held responsible for his or her actions.

III. Obama is Trying to Steal the Election: Back to the transitive property. If Obama has ties to ACORN but ACORN ISN'T trying to steal the election, how could Obama possibly be cheating? If Obama wins on Nov. 4, expect his opponents to claim that he climbed to victory on a mountain of fraudulent votes. But don't believe them—unless you believe that Mickey Mouse actually exists. And votes. Without anybody stopping him.

20081019-01 08:25 SteveB Fw: "What If the Candidates Lives Were Reversed?" [defense]
--

This provides a little perspective!

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

What if the candidates lives were reversed?

What if John McCain were a former president of the Harvard Law Review?

What if Barack Obama finished fifth from the bottom of his graduating class?

What if McCain were still married to the first woman he said 'I do' to?

What if Obama were the candidate who left his first wife after she no longer measured up to his standards?

What if Michelle Obama were a wife who not only became addicted to pain killers, but acquired them illegally through her charitable organization? What if Cindy McCain graduated from Harvard?

What if Obama were a member of the Keating-5? (as if it were a rock band or a club)

What if McCain were a charismatic, eloquent speaker?

If the above questions reflected reality, do you really believe the election numbers would be as close as they are?

You are The Boss... which team would you hire? With America facing historic debt, 2 wars, stumbling health care, a weakened dollar, all-time high prison population, mortgage crises, bank foreclosures, etc.

Educational Background—OBAMA/BIDEN:

Obama: Columbia University—B.A. Political Science with a Specialization in International Relations.
Harvard—Juris Doctor (J.D.) Magna Cum Laude

Biden: University of Delaware—B.A in History and B.A. in Political Science.
Syracuse University College of Law—Juris Doctor (J.D.)

Educational Background—McCAIN/PALIN:

McCain: United States Naval Academy—Class rank: 894 of 899

Palin:

Hawaii Pacific University—1 semester
North Idaho College—2 semesters—general study
University of Idaho—2 semesters—journalism
Matanuska-Susitna College—1 semester
University of Idaho—3 semesters—B.A. in Journalism

Now, which team are you going to hire?

Oh, and by the way: What if Barack Obama had an unwed, pregnant teenage daughter...

20081019-02 10:32 SteveM Re: "What If the Candidates Lives Were Reversed?"

Dear SteveB,

What if McCain didn't have to walk on eggs for fear of being called a racist only to have that allegation raised to elicit the "white liberal guilt" anyway, particularly when Obama supporters don't want to answer the charges. It's always a conversation stopper.

What if BHO had taken public money like he said he would?

20081019-03 13:10 SteveB Overheard Conversation: John McCain & Rush Limbaugh, Part 2

Rush Limbaugh: Johnny Boy, tell me about this Colin Powell thing, please? How could he turn commie like this?

John McCain: Believe me, he's lyin' out his a*s! He's been pullin' for me all along, like any Right wing conservative should do. And he knows that I got this foreign policy down pat! So it's just more typical lies from the Obama campaign.

Limbaugh: But Powell isn't in the Obama campaign.

McCain: Whatever, same thing. I will not talk to our enemy, Spain, under any conditions other than complete surrender. If they want to fight, they'll see what a fighter I am. I'll fight 'em. I'm not kidding either. Bam! Down they go! 'Bomb bomb Iran!' Heeheehee.

Limbaugh: But he also said that Obama is fully qualified to be President and that he could hit the ground running on the famous "Day 1". He also ensured his future sequestration in hell by stating that Sarah Palin, the goddess of the, ah, "twin goddesses" isn't qualified for squat! There goes your entire "He ain't qualified!" campaign that had the redneck population just confused enough for us to gain a few votes. (Frankly, they were understanding it better than the "Hey, he's a star!" campaign or even the usually unbeatable "He's a terrorist and I'm a redneck!" campaign.

McCain: [rising, knocking over microphone and chair, guards are being called, there is chaos in the studio] Wait till I get my hands on that traitor Colin Powell. Everybody knows that he's "palled around with known terrorists" for years. That's the connection between him and Obama and all true believers know it. Everyone who is not a Muslim, that is. Hey! Get your hands off me! I'm the President of the United States. Who are you gonna believe, me or a black man?

Limbaugh: (whispers) Get me out of here!

Sorry, Johnny Boy, but I think we're all finding your blizzard of lies to be just so much dog cr*pola and smoke screen, but we see ya' back there tryin' to move them levers.

20081019-04 13:24 SteveB Re: "What If the Candidates Lives Were Reversed?"

Oooooo...[said in baby talk] Barry didn't take the public money like he said he would? Oooooo...so better suspend your campaign and take your marbles and go to one of your ?# homes, Johnny Boy.

Did Obama break the law? No.

Did he do something unethical? Obviously not.

Did he make a smarter decision and pursue a better strategy than McCain? You betcha.

Did he do something that would allow special interests to gain more control of his campaign and/or the government? No, the opposite.

This is the real world and we play like big boys, John McCain. But at least, totally unlike yourself, we play fair!

I guess, if you don't think so and want to keep whining about nonsense, it just proves that you're not fit to run the American government, let alone any major corporation, Mr. Self-proclaimed war hero.

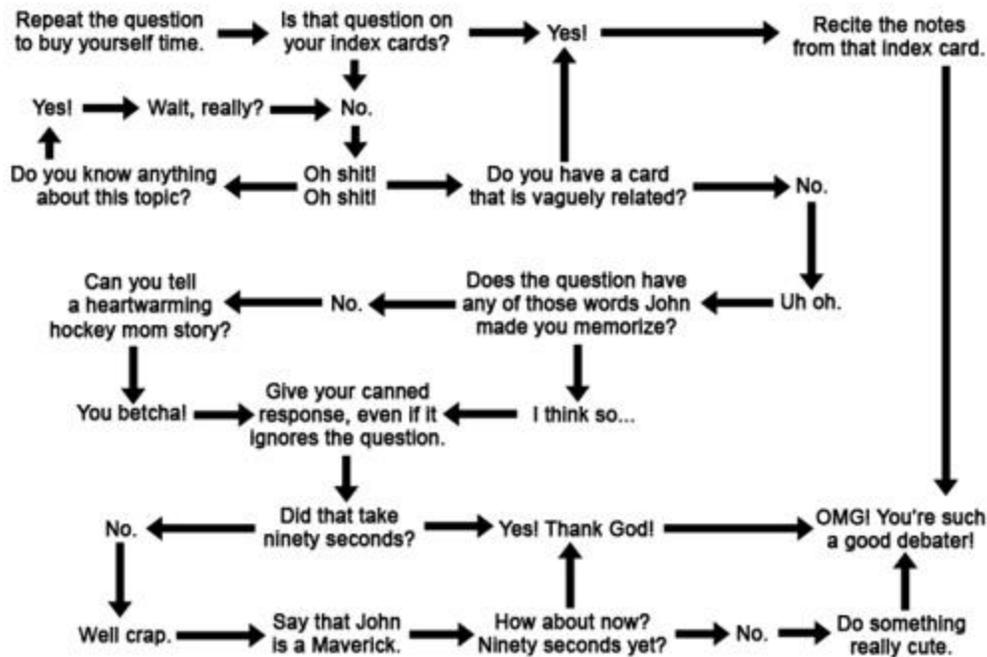

So what exactly is the point here? I guess exactly the same as the point to saying Obama associates with terrorists. These are not actual charges. They are stupid innuendo and harmful to the initiator, not the intended victim.

20081020-01 18:14 SteveB Fw: Sarah Palin Debate Flow Chart

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Sarah Palin Debate Flow Chart

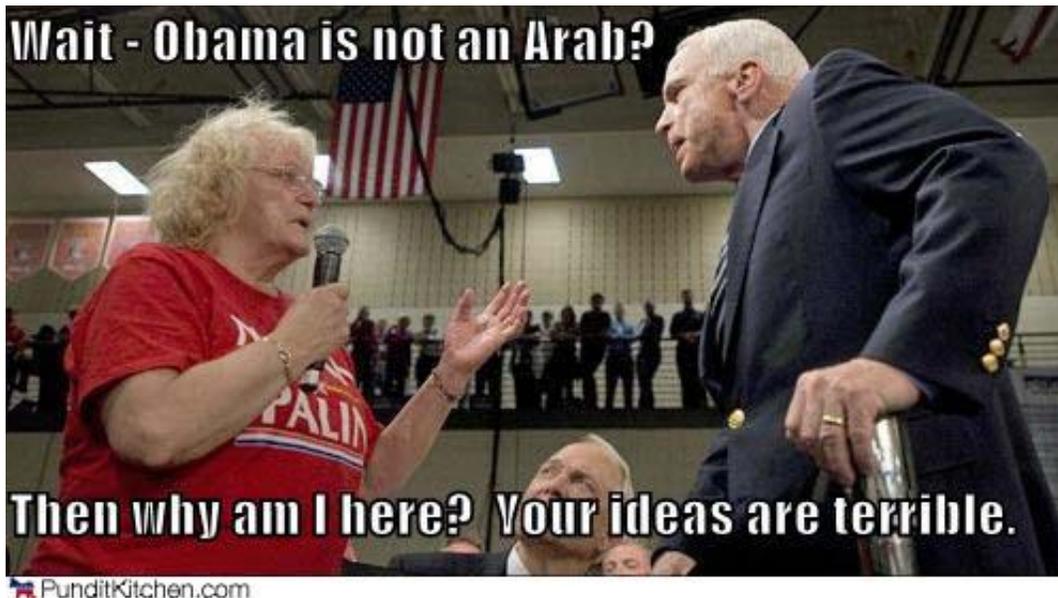

www.adennak.com

20081020-02 18:16 SteveB Fw: Joe the Plumber / Obama the Muslim [defense]

[Source of fwd. unknown. —SteveB]

20081021-01 14:36 Phil Fw: Illinois Politics

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Chicago Politics:

Body count in the last six months:

292 Murdered in Chicago
221 Killed in Iraq

Our leadership in Illinois (all Democrats):

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama
U.S. Sen. Dick Durbin
U.S. Rep. Jesse Jackson, Jr.
Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich
Illinois House Leader Mike Madigan
Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan
Chicago Mayor Richard Daly

Thank you for the combat zone in Chicago. Of course, they are blaming each other—can't blame the Republicans, because there aren't any!!!!

State Pension Fund: $44 Billion in debt (worst in the nation)
Cook County (Chicago) Sales Tax: 10.25% (highest in the nation)
Chicago School System: one of the worst in the nation

This is the political machine that Obama says he comes from Illinois. And now Obama says he's gonna 'fix' Washington politics!!!!

Spread the word! Save America!

20081021-02 17:00 SteveB "In Endgame, Metrics Are Adding Up for Obama"

"In Endgame, Metrics Are Adding Up for Obama" by Charlie Cook, National Journal

Oct. 21, 2008, (<http://www.nationaljournal.com/columns/off-to-the-races/in-endgame-metrics-are-adding-up-for-obama-20081021>)

(Several key factors don't look too good for McCain.)

(WASHINGTON) One of the most unsettling aspects of this campaign is that for an election cycle so turbulent, with so many surprising twists and turns, over the last few days it suddenly has had the feel of concrete setting. Just seven or eight weeks ago, Sen. Barack Obama had a lead over Sen. John McCain, but it hardly seemed sure; we wondered, is this lead real, is it durable?

But today it seems very unlikely that the focal point of this election is going to shift away from the economy. And as long as the economy is the focal point, it's difficult to see how this gets any better for Republicans up or down the ballot. It's sobering to think of the magnitude an event would have to have to pull voters' minds off the economy, the credit markets that have seized up, the stock market that has been pummeled, the values of their 401(k) and other retirement plans that have plummeted. How can an election that was so volatile now suddenly seem to be so inevitable?

At this point it would be difficult to see Republican losses in the Senate and House to be fewer than seven and 20 respectively. A very challenging situation going into September turned into a meltdown last month, the most dire predictions for the GOP early on became the most likely outcome.

1. The metrics of this election argue strongly that this campaign is over, it's only the memory of many an election that seemed over but wasn't that is keeping us from closing the book mentally on this one. First, no candidate behind this far in the national polls, this late in the campaign has come back to win. Sure, we have seen come-from-behind victories, but they didn't come back this far this late.
2. Early voting has made comebacks harder and would tend to diminish the impact of the kind of late-breaking development that might save McCain's candidacy. With as many as one-third of voters likely to cast their ballot before Election Day, every day more are cast and the campaign is effectively over for them. The longer Obama has this kind of lead and the more votes are cast early, the more voters are out of the pool for McCain.
3. Considering that 89 percent of all voters who identified themselves as Democrats voted for John Kerry four years ago and 93 percent of Republicans cast their ballots for George W. Bush, the switch from parity between the parties to a 10-point Democratic advantage would seem to almost seal this outcome irrespective of the candidates fielded on each side. The unprecedented surges seen in Democratic party registrations in those states that require party affiliations confirm that.
4. Just look at the money and spending. With Obama now outspending McCain routinely by margins of 3- and 4-to-1 in advertising in so many states, it's hard to see how the Arizonan's campaign can drive a message. For a time, Obama was matching McCain one for one in negative advertising, then spending double or triple on top of that in positive advertising. Now Obama seems primarily doing positive ads, probably the right move given his lead going into this final stretch. Organizationally, it's hard to find any state where McCain is organized as well as President Bush was four years ago or Obama is today, a product of both money and enthusiasm.
5. While many are talking about the so-called "Bradley effect," voters telling pollsters that they will vote for an African-American candidate when they won't, putting aside the question of whether it ever existed, it hasn't been seen in at least 15 years and the likely surge in turnout among African-American and young people seems sufficient to offset it anyway.
6. Finally there are the states. Obama is now leading in every state that Al Gore and John Kerry both won, including Michigan, Pennsylvania, Minnesota and Wisconsin, and he is ahead in Iowa, New Hampshire and New Mexico, the three states that went once but not twice for Democrats in 2000 and 2004. He is also ahead in Florida, Colorado and Virginia. If that weren't enough (and it is), he's running basically even in Indiana, Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina and Ohio, and even threatening in Montana, North Dakota and West Virginia.

As things are going now, this election would appear to be on a track to match Bill Clinton's 1992 5.6 percent margin over President George H.W. Bush, the question is whether it gets to Bush's 1988 7.7 percent win over Michael Dukakis or Clinton's 8.5 percent win over Robert Dole in 1996.

Maybe some cataclysmic event occurs in the next two weeks that changes the trajectory of this election, but to override these factors, it would have to be very, very big.

Copyright 2008 by National Journal Group Inc.

20081022-01 09:55 SteveM Joe Biden Gaffe: "Obama Will Be Tested by Russia"

Dear SteveB,

Sunday morning, at Mustang Corners on my way to Tombstone, I told my riding pals that Russia was going to "try Obama on for size if elected." And now I find that Joe Biden is arguing, again, why Americans should not elect Barack Obama president of the United States but, instead, should pull the lever for John McCain:

"Mark my words," the Democratic vice presidential nominee warned at the second of his two Seattle fundraisers Sunday. "It will not be six months before the world tests Barack Obama like they did John Kennedy. The world is looking. We're about to elect a brilliant 47-year-old senator president of the United States of America. Remember I said it standing here if you don't remember anything else I said. Watch, we're gonna have an international crisis, a generated crisis, to test the mettle of this guy."

"I can give you at least four or five scenarios from where it might originate," Biden said to Emerald City supporters, mentioning the Middle East and Russia as possibilities.

So SteveB, who's lives and what city(s) do you propose to sacrifice to assuage your guilt?

[Mar. 2012, Don't know, but Russia must have wisely decided not to tangle with Barry. Biden, dumb remark. —SteveB]

20081022-02 10:19 SteveB "Sarah Palin Flunks a 3rd Grader's Question"

Dear SteveM,

OH MY GOD! was certainly my reaction. So the woman cares so little about the job that in all these weeks she hasn't even brushed up on the Constitution or asked one of the Bush handlers around here what the job description is?

This woman is a complete idiot! Not for not knowing the answer to the question (which is bad enough) but for not even caring enough about America to learn about the job.

An "F" for you, Mrs. Palin. Now, please go back home to Alaska and leave us the hell alone!

"Sarah Palin Flunks a 3rd Grader's Question" Oct. 21, 2008, AP

3rd Grader Question: What does the Vice-President do?

Palin: "They're in charge of the U.S. Senate ... really get in there with the senators and make a lot of good policy changes..."

America: "Oh. My. God!"

20081022-03 11:56 SteveB Re: Illinois Politics

Dear Phil,

But it doesn't turn out that Obama had anything, really, to do with any of these negatives.

What does have to do with them...is that poor people are often black, unemployed, prone to drugs and crime, not too much fun to be around, and oftentimes not too good looking either. :-)

But all people are still our brothers, right? And, to the black ones, we owe rock 'n' roll and a hell of a lot else, even some of our freedom.

Do you really believe the Bush Presidency has done anything to preserve and bring jobs for these people? This would cost almost nothing...just some tax incentives and less free trade. But N-0-0-0-0-0, millions of our best jobs, especially for uneducated or undereducated workers—our former backbone of factories—have been shipped to China and Mexico!

And now small business is being strangled so big business can thrive on government bail-outs? Oh...just the Republican way, I forgot.

20081022-04 13:37 SteveB Re: Joe Biden Gaffe

Dear SteveM,

My God! (again) Do you think they wouldn't test the old fart? My God, he almost got us in trouble with Russia already, and us with no troops available except maybe you and your riding buddies. And I'm sure you'd give 'em hell and I'd be very grateful for your efforts, but this is not a scenario we desire. What would frighten the hell out of me, and apparently most Americans, is the thought of that senile maniac running around like a rooster with its head cut off, or, even worse, that idiot Palin trying to run things during some international crisis.

How can you dare to even hint at an allegation that Obama is inexperienced and/or not ready when we have seen him master a crisis like McCain could not do, and when you have that blithering idiot Palin on the ticket?

How can you dare talk about problems Obama could not handle when you have a senile 72-year-old and Palin? After all we've learned, you would sleep better with Palin in charge? Insane.

The one f*cking point in the known universe that you should be able to come to terms with and agree with is that Obama (or that fake Joe the Plumber, for that matter) would make a better President than Palin. You won't even go for "at least as good", will you b*t-hole? Totally unfair and unjust! No idiot, not even a woman idiot, can make as good a President as an intelligent man. Period.

Get serious, dude! And say hi to Tombstone for me.

20081022-05 14:01 SteveB Editorial Endorsement: "Barack Obama for President"

Obama—not inexperienced...now tried and tested and vetted to be your President! That other guy...he didn't really seem like the kind of leader you'd want in a crisis, did he? And that Palin! What the hell was the old guy thinking? [And the constant attacks and lies from the McCain campaign, what the hell was that all about? What a strategy! What vaunted Republican integrity! What maverickism! Phooee!]

—The American People

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch traditionally favors the Republican party. It is interesting and noteworthy that it has endorsed a candidate three weeks before the election. Missouri remains a toss-up state, very much in play.

"Barack Obama for President" by St. Louis Post Dispatch Editorial Board

date? (<http://www.aftguild.org/hot-topics/St-Louis-Post-Dispatch.html>)

Nine Days before the Feb. 5 presidential primaries in Missouri and Illinois , this editorial page endorsed Barack Obama and John McCain in their respective races. We did so enthusiastically. We wrote that either Mr. Obama's message of hope or Mr. McCain's independence and integrity offered America "the chance to turn the page on 28 years of contentious, greed-driven politics and move into a new era of possibility."

Over the past nine months, Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois , has emerged as the only truly transformative candidate in the race. In the crucible that is a presidential campaign, his intellect, his temperament and equanimity under pressure consistently have been impressive. He has surrounded himself with smart, capable advisers who have helped him refine thorough, nuanced policy positions. In a word, Mr. Obama has been presidential.

Meanwhile, Mr. McCain, the senior senator from Arizona , became the incredible shrinking man. He shrank from his principled stands in favor of a humane immigration policy. He shrank from his universal condemnation of torture and his condemnation of the politics of smear. He even shrank from his own campaign slogan, "County First," by selecting the least qualified running mate since the Swedenborgian shipbuilder Arthur Sewall ran as William Jennings Bryan's No. 2 in 1896.

In making political endorsements, this editorial page is guided first by the principles espoused by Joseph Pulitzer in The Post-Dispatch Platform printed daily at the top of this page. Then we consider questions of character, life experience and intellect, as well as specific policy and issue positions. Each member of the editorial board weighs in.

On all counts, the consensus was clear: Barack Obama of Illinois should be the next president of the United States. We didn't know nine months ago that before Election Day, America would face its greatest economic challenge since the Great Depression. The crisis on Wall Street is devastating, but it has offered voters a useful preview of how the two presidential candidates would respond to a crisis. Very early on, Mr. Obama reached out to his impressive corps of economic advisers and developed a comprehensive set of recommendations for addressing the problems. He set them forth calmly and explained them carefully.

Mr. McCain, a longtime critic of government regulation, was late to recognize the threat. The chief economic adviser of his campaign initially was former Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, who had been one of the architects of banking deregulation. When the credit markets imploded, Mr. McCain lurched from one ineffectual grandstand play to another. He squandered the one clear advantage he had over Mr. Obama: experience. Mr. McCain first was elected to Congress in 1982 when Mr. Obama was in his senior year at Columbia University . Yet the younger man's intellectual curiosity and capacity—and, yes, also the skills he developed as a community organizer and his instincts as a political conciliator—more than compensate for his lack of more traditional Washington experience.

A presidency is defined less by what happens in the Oval Office than by what is done by the more than 3,000 men and women the president appoints to government office. Only 600 of them are subject to Senate approval. The rest serve at the pleasure of the president. We have little doubt that Mr. Obama's appointees would bring a level of competence, compassion and intellectual achievement to the executive branch that hasn't been seen since the New Frontier. He has energized a new generation of Americans who would put the concept of service back in "public service."

Consider that while Mr. McCain selected as his running mate Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska , a callow and shrill partisan, Mr. Obama selected Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware . Mr. Biden's 35-year Senate career has given him encyclopedic expertise on legislative and judicial issues, as well as foreign affairs. The idea that 3,000 bright, dedicated and accomplished Americans would be joining the Obama administration to serve the public—as opposed to padding their resumé's or shilling for the corporate interests they're sworn to oversee—is reassuring. That they would be serving a president who actually would listen to them is staggering.

And the fact that Mr. Obama can explain his thoughts and policies in language that can instruct and inspire is exciting. Eloquence isn't everything in a president, but it is not nothing, either. Experience aside, the 25-year difference in the ages of Mr. McCain, 72, and Mr. Obama, 47, is important largely because Mr. Obama's election would represent a generational shift. He would be the first chief executive in more than six decades whose worldview was not formed, at least in part, by the Cold War or Vietnam . He sees the complicated world as it is today, not as a binary division between us and them, but as a kaleidoscope of shifting alliances and interests. As he often notes, he is the son of a Kenyan father and a mother from Kansas , an internationalist who yet acknowledges that America is the only nation in the world in which someone of his distinctly modest background could rise as far as his talent, intellect and hard work would take him.

Given the damage that has been done to America 's moral standing in the world in the last eight years—by a preemptory war, a unilateralist foreign policy and by policies that have treated both the Geneva Conventions and our own Bill of Rights as optional—Mr. Obama's election would help America reclaim the moral high ground. It also must be said that Mr. Obama is right on the issues. He was right on the war in Iraq . He is right that all Americans deserve access to health care and right in his pragmatic approach to meeting that goal. He is right on tax policy, infrastructure investment, energy policy and environmental issues. He is right on American ideals.

He was right when he said in his remarkable speech in March in Philadelphia that "In the end, then, what is called for is nothing more, and nothing less, than what all the world's great religions demand: that we do unto others as we would have them do unto us. Let us be our brother's keeper, Scripture tells us. Let us be our sister's keeper. Let us find that common stake we all have in one another, and let our politics reflect that spirit as well."

John McCain has served his country well, but in the end, he may have wanted the presidency a little too much, so much that he has sacrificed some of the principles that made him a heroic figure in war and in peace. In every way possible, he has earned the right to retire. Finally, only at this late point do we note that Barack Obama is an African-American. Because of who he is and how he has run his campaign, that fact has become almost incidental to most Americans. Instead, his countrymen are weighing his talents, his values and his beliefs, judging him not by the color of his skin, but the content of his character. That says something profound and good—about him as a candidate and about us as a nation.

20081022-06 15:14 SteveB Re: No "Change" for Him! [to 10/22 duplicate]

Dear Phil,

Change? Let's change all the politicians in both parties who have sold the American people down the river. Toss them all out! Now, that's truly change we can live with!

Plus ++++++ this email below is real old now...because we have now seen both men tested by two crises.

And maybe it would have been logical to predict that the experienced old self-proclaimed "war hero" would do a better job and give you a more comfortable, safer feeling than a seemingly inexperienced young black guy out of Illinois.

But what actually happened is that the junior Senator handled both crises with wise maturity and leadership. He didn't interfere with the President's foreign policy in George, but he did state what he thought our goals should be in the region. I thought they sounded prudent, reasonable, and in our interest. McCain started acting like he was running the country and got the Russians pi*sed off. Getting angry solves nothing in national affairs! And foreign policy was supposed to be McCain's strong point? Doesn't look like it in any way. Plus he doesn't know where Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan, and Pakistan are, doesn't know Suni from Shiit, doesn't know Spain is in Europe and is our ally not a terrorist nation in this hemisphere.

Then we have the much bigger economic crisis. I have famously (haha) pointed-out McCains many missteps and blunders and freak-outs all during this whole, sordid affair. But the most shocking thing of all is that blank look in McCain's eyes whenever he talks about the economy. He has absolutely no grasp of it all, so a McCain administration would be more Bush policies, more doing what the people with money tell the President to do because he doesn't serve the people because he doesn't know how to and because he owes so many people and companies and governments his job.

In short, in both crises, McCain ran around like a rooster with his head chopped off. Not good in a leader.

Then, added into all that is the astounding Palin misjudgment and miscalculation after all the lies of putting country first. Amazing!

20081023-01 12:27 SteveB John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08. "My Friends, That's Change That We Can't Not Believe in Disagreeing With"

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

I really wish I could make-up stuff this good! Yes, today's little tidbit is quite a juicy one, folks. And, Johnny Boy, I think you need to realize that if you botch things this badly very many times, you start to look like a senile, old clown instead of a serious Presidential contender.

This is the actual text from a speech McCain gave in Reading, PA yesterday, in what will probably end up being one of the most important electoral states. I have transcribed the remarks, but you will also find the actual—unbelievable—video at this location:

A MAVERICK MISSPEAKS

"My Friends, That's Change That We Can't Not Believe in Disagreeing With" by Oliver Burkeman, Manchester Guardian

Oct. 22, 2008, (<http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/oliverburkemanblog/2008/oct/22/uselections2008-johnmccain>)

See the amazing video: McCain Agrees with MNRtha in Moon, PA:
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NLVSURIFoQs&feature=player_embedded)

Oh, dear, here's a confused chap — later identified as "John McCain" — grabbing hold of a podium in western Pennsylvania yesterday and speaking a whole bunch of words that he doesn't seem to have planned in advance, by the end of which he has accidentally agreed with Democratic congressman John Murtha's portrayal of western Pennsylvania as a "racist area". Note the expert way he attempts to rescue himself from the error by repeating some of the same words in a different combination in the hope that something will stick — a rhetorical technique plainly borrowed from Sarah Palin. Nevertheless, by the time the debacle is over he has managed to describe the region as "the most patriotic part" of America, so the basic divisive mission of the speech is still achieved.

"On case [?].I think...you may have noticed that Senator Obama's supporters have been saying some pretty nasty things about Western Pennsylvania lately.

And you know? I couldn't agree with them more! [huh?]

[Quickly] I couldn't disagree with you...I couldn't agree with you more...than the fact that Western Pennsylvania is the most patriotic, most God-loving, most, uh...patriotic part of America. This is a great part of the country!"
[Thank you, FOX News and Manchester Guardian! —SteveB]

It's very instructive to watch the technique McCain uses to try to get himself out of the mess he creates—a false appeal to patriotism. For how can it be more than stock, fake patriotic lines when the purpose is simply to distract an audience from a catastrophe? Other than that, this little speech speaks for itself and leaves me speechless.

[In this first paragraph, I don't really know what kind of probably lying, snide accusation he's trying to make. It doesn't seem likely, with PA being such an important swing state, that the Obama people would be bad-mouthing PA. Is he referring to that one time Obama misspoke about PA people and their guns and religion, forever ago? —SteveB]

Gee...we couldn't have some, say...SENILITY problems here, could we, Johnny Boy? And if you're just tired, being the actual President has to be just as tiring (look at how the hair of Presidents goes grey or white so quickly once they get in office).

Notice that the way McCain handles his little personal crisis here in this speech is just how he handled the Georgia and economic crises and the current crisis he is facing in his campaign's apparently losing strategies—with distraction and lies, not with leadership and solutions!

I really don't think this is the kind of penetrating, mature, intelligent wits we want our President to have about him. But, of course, there is always the intellectual giant of the ticket...Ms. Palin!

20081023-02	12:36	SteveG	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

NOONTIME REPORT ON THE POLLS: OBAMA IS UP 10 POINTS IN INDIANA, A SWING STATE THAT HASN'T GONE DEMOCRATIC SINCE 1964!

20081023-03	13:07	SteveB	John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08—Bonus; "McCain Says Obama Will 'Say Anything' to Win"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

TODAY'S BONUS SENILE MOMENT:

Below is a great one and another good example of how the McCain campaign executes its strategies of lies and deceptions.

The rule is, any of what you presume to be your weaknesses or shortcomings, must be impugned to the opposition and attacked mercilessly. What this means is that if you have the habit of, say, putting your campaign ambitions ahead of the national interest (instances cited previously) then accuse Obama of not loving his country or not putting America first or some cr*p to that effect. If you fear that being accused of having no executive experience and of being told that POW (read failed soldier) experience does not qualify one to be President, attack Obama's experience.

Here, McCain was already embarrassed after he was called down on the lie he's been telling that poor people who pay no taxes will get a tax refund. So he attacks.

But by telling what he knows are huge lies about Obama's tax plan and that it's socialist and wants to "redistribute the wealth" in ways not done by current tax law (a lie, by the way), McCain is the one proving that it is he who will "say anything" to win! He will tell any lie! Over and over! Yet it is his own personal failing that he lashes out to accuse Obama of. Ironic, huh? Are you distracted enough to vote for this monster?

"McCain Says Obama Will 'Say Anything' to Win" by Glen Johnson, AP

Oct. 23, 2010, (http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/2008-10-22-2824987828_x.htm)

(ORMOND BEACH FL) Republican John McCain, kicking off a cross-state bus tour aimed at keeping vote-rich Florida from swinging to the Democrats, on Thursday accused rival Barack Obama of saying "anything to get elected."

The Arizona senator said Obama had added a work requirement to his proposal to grant a 10 percent universal mortgage credit. A top Obama aide said the campaign added the requirement two weeks ago to avoid charges that the proposal provided "welfare" to non-working Americans.

"Thirteen days to go, and he changed his tax plan because the American people had learned the truth about it and they didn't like it," McCain told a crowd at lumber yard. "It's another example that he'll say anything to get elected."

An Obama spokesman accused McCain of distortion and said the Democrat's plan always included a work requirement, although it was discussed only within the campaign or to reporters who inquired about the particulars of the plan.

"Last week, Sen. McCain called Obama's tax cuts for working people welfare. Today he's claiming Sen. Obama doesn't do enough to help the unemployed," said Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor. "The only thing consistent about these attacks is how dishonest they are. All of Sen. Obama's tax credits only go to workers and they always have."

20081023-04	14:38	SteveB	Re: John McCain's Senile Moment of the Day—10/23/08
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveG,

I was disappointed with my Hoosiers when they didn't pick Obama over Hillary, but they could totally make-up for it by going for Obama now!

Out of all my correspondents, only two remain staunchly pro-McCain. They are both pretty big racists from Indiana and they sure ain't a gonna go vote for no black Marxist Muslim who wasn't born in the U.S.

If McCain were that dead guy from the movie, Bernie?, the corpse that those, like, college guys carried around everywhere, trying to make it look just alive enough so that they didn't get arrested? I'm not remembering it very well...anyway, if that were McCain, they'd still vote for him on ideological reasons. He's further Right.

So McCain being proven senile is no big deal to these guys. I love 'em though, big dummies! (Your family is given to you by God and your friends are given to you by God.)

Maybe the electorate ain't so dumb, though, after all...or maybe we're just lucky sometimes...but, really, I think people are tired of the same old cr*p and worried, maybe even scared, so they have come out of their stupor and opened their eyes a little more than usual, and, for now, seem to be coming to Obama in droves.

TODAY'S SENILE MOMENT:

There are just so many! I can hardly pick and choose any more. And there have been so many juicy ones lately that seem to indicate so clearly that there is something wrong with McCain. And, after recent events, could things get any worse for our hero (make that self-proclaimed war hero)?

So much fertile ground...including Ms. Palin (now ain't that the truth!)...I know what I'll write about today! I'll go back to one of those continuing senile moments that stretch on forever. One I've been wanting to discuss.

McCain wants to privatize Social Security!!!!!!

Now, that would have worked out wonderfully during the current market crashes, wouldn't it! What would the government (or some "private" entity like Fanny Mae or Freddie Mac?) have been into? Government bonds? I doubt it? Gold? Also way down. Currency? Commodities? Lehman? AIG? Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac? What if there had not only been the mortgage, interest, debt, stock market, banking crises, but also the government losing trillions in the stock market? Unable to send out the checks people need to live and that are basically, owed, to them. Wonderful, Johnny Boy! Intelligent!

And this is a guy who needs to win my alternative home state of Florida where many people depend on Social Security. Even though many of the retired folks there must be able to identify with McCain's senility and, I guess, just general oldness, but his support is slipping there too, even though Obama has not hit this Social Security thing nearly hard enough. McCain's constant, lying attacks pretty much prevent an effective, intelligent dialog between the candidates on the issues.

(Has anyone except me noticed that, in his speeches, McCain is able to list things, grimace, rotate around, give that awful glare, and that's about it? He never goes below the "headlines" to the underlying 2nd, 3rd, or nth layers of an issue, as Obama can do. He is unable, apparently, to do more than just list a bunch of cr*p he has been told to say. He's simply after those few key words that ignite the "base"—terrorist, the "real" America, socialist, communist, redistribute the wealth (which I'll have more on in an upcoming posting), tax increase, etc.) In a Presidential candidate, this seems rather stupid, doesn't it, America? One would certainly hope that it can never seem intelligent enough to lead to victory.

But...I have a good feeling that justice will be served soon. You might want to be on the lookout for that, Johnny Boy.

Dear GaryC & Dale,

Progressive taxation is hardly socialistic, or McCain and Bush are socialists too.

"McCain's Hero: More Socialist Than Obama!" by Timothy Noah, Slate

Oct. 23, 2008

http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/chatterbox/2008/10/mccains_hero_more_socialist_than_obama.html

(McCain can call Obama a socialist or he can all Teddy Roosevelt his hero. He can't do both.)

Imagine that instead of telling Joe "the Plumber" Wurzelbacher that "when you spread the wealth around it's good for everybody," Barack Obama had said the following: We grudge no man a fortune in civil life if it is honorably obtained and well used. It is not even enough that it should have been gained without doing damage to the community.

We should permit it to be gained only so long as the gaining represents benefit to the community. ... The really big fortune, the swollen fortune, by the mere fact of its size, acquires qualities which differentiate it in kind as well as in degree from what is possessed by men of relatively small means. Therefore, I believe in a graduated income tax on big fortunes, and ... a graduated inheritance tax on big fortunes, properly safeguarded against evasion, and increasing rapidly in amount with the size of the estate.

The New York Post's Page One would blare: "OBAMA: I'LL SEIZE 'SWOLLEN FORTUNES'!" Bill Kristol would demand to know, in his New York Times column, what godly powers enabled Obama to discern precisely whose wealth—David Geffen's? George Soros'?—would "benefit the community." On Fox News, Bill O'Reilly would start to say something, then sputter, turn purple, and keel over backward in a grand mal seizure.

John McCain, meanwhile, would have to stop saying that Teddy Roosevelt is his hero, because the passage quoted above is from T.R.'s "New Nationalism" speech of 1910. Either that, or McCain would have to quit calling Barack Obama a socialist. [Or he would have to confess to being a Socialist himself! LOL!] T.R. justified progressive taxation straightforwardly as a matter of equality. In his 1907 State of the Union address, Roosevelt said:

Our aim is to recognize what Lincoln pointed out: The fact that there are some respects in which men are obviously not equal; but also to insist that there should be an equality of self-respect and of mutual respect, an equality of rights before the law, and at least an approximate equality in the conditions under which each man obtains the chance to show the stuff that is in him when compared to his fellows.

Obama is constrained by a very different political climate to justify his sole proposed tax hike—on incomes above $250,000—by stating its benefit to commerce. Here's his "spread the wealth around" comment in context (for a more complete transcription, click here):

I do believe that for folks like me, who have worked hard but, frankly, have also been lucky, I don't mind paying just a little bit more than the waitress who I just met over there who, things are slow, and she can barely make the rent. My attitude is that if the economy's good for folks from the bottom up, it's going to be good for everybody. If you've got a plumbing business, you're going to be better off if you've got a whole bunch of customers who can afford to hire you. And right now, everybody's so pinched that business is bad for everybody. And I think when you spread the wealth around it's good for everybody.

In a radio address on Oct. 18, McCain said that to the "straight-talking," "plainspoken" Wurzelbacher, words like "spread the wealth around" sounded a lot like socialism. "And a lot of Americans are thinking along those same lines. ... At least in Europe, the Socialist leaders who so admire my opponent are up front about their objectives. They use real numbers and honest language. And we should demand equal candor from Senator Obama."

In an Oct. 22 speech in Manchester, N.H., McCain expostulated further: "Joe and guys like him will earn the wealth. Barack and politicians like him will spread it."

Joe didn't really like that idea, and neither did a lot of other folks who believe that their earnings are their own. After all, before government can redistribute wealth, it has to confiscate wealth from those who earned it. And whatever the right word is for that way of thinking, the redistribution of wealth is the last thing America needs right now. In these tough economic times, we don't need government "spreading the wealth"—we need policies that create wealth and spread opportunity.

When T.R. spoke of "swollen fortunes" and "malefactors of great wealth," socialism was a genuine force in American politics, perceived by many to pose a serious threat to the social order. When T.R. first called for a "graduated income tax" in his 1907 State of the Union, he was proposing a measure that the Supreme Court had ruled unconstitutional. Indeed, the federal income tax struck down by the Court wasn't even "graduated," or progressive; it was a flat-rate tax. Today, McCain demagogically attacks Obama's purported "socialism" knowing that socialism is a dead letter in the United States. He feigns shock at progressive taxation

("confiscate wealth") nearly a century after the states ratified the 16th Amendment, enabling Congress to enact a progressive income tax, and nearly a decade after he himself scolded a town-hall questioner on MSNBC's Hardball who cried "socialism" about the rich having to pay a greater percentage of their income in taxes. "Here's what I really believe," McCain said. "When you are—reach a certain level of comfort, there's nothing wrong with paying somewhat more."

In his book The Great Tax Wars, Steven Weisman, formerly of the New York Times, writes that T.R.'s previous experience as police commissioner of New York City made him worry "about anarchy arising from gross economic inequality." Today, the income gap between the top 0.01 percent of families in the United States and the bottom 90 percent is greater than it was in T.R.'s day. The last time it was anywhere near so great was in 1929. The top marginal income-tax rate, meanwhile, is near its historic low in the late 1920s. Those of you seeking a cause to the current financial meltdown may draw your own conclusions. (For more on taxes and historic patterns of inequality in the United States, click here.)

T.R., of course, was no socialist. Indeed, his purpose was largely to prevent socialists from coming to power. But the trust buster got called a socialist a lot more often than Obama ever will. He writes in his autobiography:

Because of things I have done on behalf of justice to the workingman, I have often been called a Socialist. Usually I have not taken the trouble even to notice the epithet.... Moreover, I know that many American Socialists are high-minded and honorable citizens, who in reality are merely radical social reformers. They are opposed to the brutalities and industrial injustices which we see everywhere about us.

T.R. then goes on to outline his strong differences "with the Marxian Socialists" and their belief in class warfare and the inevitable demise of capitalism. Later, he returns to his earlier theme: Many of the men who call themselves socialists today are in reality merely radical social reformers, with whom on many points good citizens can and ought to work in hearty general agreement, and whom in many practical matters of government good citizens can well afford to follow.

There were, however, limits to T.R.'s tolerance. "I have always maintained," he concluded, "that our worst revolutionaries today are those reactionaries who do not see and will not admit there is any need for change."

20081024-03 16:44 SteveB "This Is Not a Test"

As long as the lies continue, they must be set straight!

"This Is Not a Test" by Fred Kaplan, Slate

Oct. 23, 2008, (http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/war_stories/2008/10/this_is_not_a_test.html)

(Sitting on an aircraft carrier deck in 1962 didn't prepare John McCain for the Presidency.)

In the last few days, Sen. John McCain has told crowds that he's "been tested" when it comes to dealing with international crises, and as proof he cited the big enchilada of crises, the showdown over Soviet nuclear missiles in Cuba in 1962. "I had a little personal experience in that," McCain said in Ohio. "I was there."

Tom Blanton wondered what would have happened if the Cuban Missile Crisis hadn't been a secret. Warren Bass argued that the crisis was scarier than we thought. Christopher Beam described why the McCain camp rejoice when the senator's war record is attacked, and Fred Kaplan explained why Gen. Wesley Clark questioned whether McCain's military experience was relevant to the presidency. No, he was the pilot of a naval attack plane on an aircraft carrier in the Caribbean. As he put it at a campaign rally in Pennsylvania, "I sat in the cockpit on the flight deck of the U.S.S. Enterprise, off of Cuba. I had a target." Then he added: "My friends, you know how close we came to nuclear war. Americans will not have a president who needs to be tested. I've been tested, my friends."

I mean no disrespect for carrier pilots, especially those poised for combat. The job requires a special sort of skill, nerve, and bravery that few of us have ever faced. (Certainly I never have.) But it is not at all clear how this experience tested McCain—or any of the other pilots on the four aircraft carriers off the coast of Cuba—for the job of making strategic decisions in a crisis, any more than working an assembly line tests someone to be president of a major manufacturing corporation.

As a 26-year-old Navy lieutenant in Oct., 1962, John McCain was prepared to follow orders, fly his plane along a predetermined path to a preselected target, drop his preloaded bombs, and fly back. Again, this is not to be minimized. But neither does it constitute being "tested" to be—either then or 46 years later—the president of the United States.

Here's what the president at the time, John F. Kennedy, did during the crisis.

The confrontation began when U-2 spy planes detected the Soviets surreptitiously shipping missile launchers and nuclear warheads to Cuba and, in some cases, already setting them up on Cuban bases. Kennedy assembled all his top advisers in the Cabinet Room to discuss how to respond. (Lucky for historians, he secretly tape-recorded all these deliberations.

You can buy copies of the tapes from the JFK Library or read Sheldon Stern's book Averting The Final Failure: John F. Kennedy and the Secret Cuban Missile Crisis Meetings, an excellent account.)

On the first day of deliberations, Kennedy figured that he would have to bomb the missile sites. McNamara suggested blockading the island as an interim measure to buy some time. Kennedy agreed. By the third day of the crisis, Kennedy was musing about Soviet motives and wondering what kind of "face-saving" gesture he might offer to get them to back off. One possibility, he said, might be a trade: We'd withdraw the missiles we had in Turkey—on the Soviet Union's southern border—if they withdrew the missiles they had in Cuba. None of the advisers reacted to this remark.

On Oct. 26, the 13th and final day, Khrushchev sent Kennedy a telegram offering just such a trade. Kennedy favored taking the deal. "To any man at the United Nations or any other rational man," he can be heard on the tapes saying, "it will look like a very fair trade. ... Most people think that if you're allowed an even trade, you ought to take advantage of it."

All of Kennedy's advisers—his brother Robert Kennedy, Vice President Lyndon Johnson, McNamara, McGeorge Bundy, the entire Joint Chiefs of Staff—vociferously opposed the deal. All of them at this point—even McNamara—urged Kennedy to bomb the missile sites. They protested that trading the missiles in Turkey would amount to appeasement; it would wreck NATO, betray the Turks, advertise our weakness. On the tapes, they sound hysterical; you can hear the quivering in their voices.

Kennedy remained preternaturally cool. He recalled that the attack plan, drawn up a few days earlier by the Joint Chiefs and endorsed by McNamara, was calling for 3,500 conventional bombing sorties against the Soviet missile sites and air bases in Cuba—500 sorties a day for seven days—followed by an invasion of the island.

"I'm just thinking," Kennedy said, with remarkable calm, "about what we're going to have to do in a day or so ... 500 sorties ... and possibly an invasion, all because we wouldn't take missiles out of Turkey.

And we all know how quickly everybody's courage goes when the blood starts to flow, and that's what's going to happen in NATO ... when we start these things and the Soviets grab Berlin" in retaliation, "and everybody's going to say, 'Well, this Khrushchev offer was a pretty good position.' " At another point, Kennedy noted that if we went to war and it was later learned that this deal had been on the table and we had rejected it, it was "not going to be a good war."

At the end of the day, without telling more than a handful of his advisers, President Kennedy ordered his brother to tell the Soviet ambassador that he accepted Khrushchev's deal—as long as it was kept a total secret, as indeed it was until the tapes came out 20 years later. (Not wanting to appear weak, Kennedy himself contrived the cover story—and ordered his palace historians, Arthur Schlesinger and Ted Sorensen, to perpetrate the myth—that he'd stared the Russians down.)

And so, the point is even more clear-cut than it might seem at first glance: Just because John McCain sat in a cockpit on a flight deck during the tensest five days of the Cuban Missile Crisis, that doesn't mean he absorbed the slightest bit of wisdom about how to handle a crisis from the top. What about Sen. Barack Obama—has he ever been tested for a crisis of this sort? There's no evidence that he has. In this sense, former President Bill Clinton's evasive remark a few months ago when he was asked about Obama's qualifications—"You can argue that nobody is ready to be president"—may well be true.

[Of course, both men have been recently tested by the little international crisis in Georgia and the huge financial crisis everywhere. McCain is also facing an additional crisis that allows us to witness his tested character—his losing campaign. Most voters, it seems, have liked what they have seen of Obama's leadership in difficult situations.]

The lesson of Kennedy's performance in the Cuban Missile Crisis is that a president should be coolheaded, ask the right questions, listen to a wide range of advice, then exercise his own judgment.

With this history in mind, which of the two candidates—McCain or Obama—seems best-suited to handle a crisis? That's the appropriate question.

20081025-01	10:29	SteveB	Why Are So Many Republicans Endorsing Obama?
-------------	-------	--------	--

I wonder why all these Republicans keep coming out and endorsing Obama? Especially with him being a Muslim socialist terrorist. LOL! I don't think I've heard of one prominent Democrat endorsing McCain.

Could be significant...maybe these Republicans are looking beyond ideology, to who would make the best President?

20081025-02 10:52 SteveB McCain's Message of Change

I think McCain should think-up his own campaign strategies and slogans—instead of stealing Obama's! LOL!

How desperate for power is that? Notice below, he always gets that "fight" in there, to remind us he's a violent, self-proclaimed war hero.

10/24/08...in an address at a campaign rally in Denver

"We cannot spend the next four years as we have spent much of the last eight: hoping for our luck to change at home and abroad," he said. "We have to act. We need a new direction, and we have to fight for it."

20081026-01 20:44 SteveB Barack Obama Quote: "The Real America"

"There are no real or fake parts of this country. We are not separated by the pro-America and anti-America parts of this nation—we all love this country, no matter where we live or where we come from. There are patriots who supported this war in Iraq and patriots who opposed it, patriots who believe in Democratic policies and those who believe in Republican policies. The men and women from Indiana and all across America who serve on our battlefields may be Democrats and Republicans and Independents, but they have fought together and bled together and some died together under the same proud flag. They have not served a red America or a blue America—they have served the United States of America."—Barack Obama, Indianapolis, Oct. 23, 2008.

20081026-02 21:34 Larry Fw: "Straight Talk" to Republicans & Democrats

[Source of original email unknown, but this article is widely reprinted on the web. For instance: http://forums.fishusa.com/m_124008/mpage_1/key_/tm.htm. Snopes.com seems to know nothing. —SteveB]

(If you do a little searching, you'll find this letter on a Web page where Mr. Lear—whose father invented the Lear jet and much, much more—has included other information by which he can be contacted; I just didn't feel comfortable including it here, though.)

A Humble Plea to McCain and Obama Supporters:

Dear friends,

I am truly astonished by the ignorance Obama supporters have displayed in their quest to get someone—ANYONE—into the White House. Now, wait a minute. I can well understand your dislike or even hatred of our clown, GWB, but he is not the root cause of all of our problems. Our Congress is. And a change there would be welcomed by all. You ain't gonna get it done with Obama. You gotta fire the whole damnable crooked Congress. (Read my book, Bernie's War!).

Perhaps I'm looking at all of this from a different perspective than you because my life experiences have been so different from yours. I'm 80 years old and have traveled the world where I've seen a great deal. I spent five years on active duty as a fighter pilot in the U.S.A.F. and another seven years flying with the Air National Guard in California and Texas as well as a few years flying in the U.S.A.F. Reserve. I spent three years on active duty in Germany flying Czech border patrol with 'cold guns' in aircraft inferior to the MIG during the Korean 'Police Action' when it was thought that Korea was a diversion for a Soviet invasion of Western Europe.

I lived abroad for a total of 28 years. Three years in Germany, twenty years in Switzerland and five years in Great Britain where I was based doing 'spook' work for the U.S. behind the Iron Curtain before it fell. During that era of the Cold War I ventured to Moscow, Prague, Warsaw, Bucharest, Peshawar, Pakistan and Bulgaria posing as a Swiss French speaking arms dealer purchasing weapons we surreptitiously supplied to the Afghani Mujahedeen in their successful fight against the Soviets, all of which came back to haunt us.

I've been there and done that and have had close associations with top government people in Germany, the Netherlands and Great Britain. I've had more foreign affair experience than Obama could ever dream of and, yet, wouldn't have the temerity to deign myself 'Presidential' material; although I feel eminently more qualified to judge who would NOT be best for our country. My long-time world experience should count for something in my plea to you to abandon this miscreant flake. You will only be doing yourself and our country an enormous disservice if you persist in your support of this flash-in-the-pan opportunist. On this, you MUST trust me. I've associated closely with European royalty and African politicians. I've traveled to the Far East to observe their cultures. My point is that Obama, although formally well educated and a brilliant orator, is a neophyte when it comes to understanding the world and is uniquely unqualified for the job as President of these great United States. His knowledge of economics is nil and his tax proposals absurd and life-threatening to the U.S. not only in economic terms but in preserving our national security as well. I don't want a 'citizen of the world' to be President, I want a citizen of the good old USA to be President.

Screw the rest of the world as they have well and truly screwed us. The time has come for us to awaken and start looking after ourselves. Now THAT would be CHANGE if that's what you're looking for.

While McCain has abstained from playing 'the race-card', Obama is playing it to the hilt even though he's technically not an African-American. To qualify for this distinction you must be at least one-sixth black. Obama is only one-eighth. His father would be, as he was one-sixth. No, Obama is more Muslim than black yet he trades on his blackness.

The larger question I have about him is that we really don't know much about him other than what HE tells us, what we read on blogs and from some serious non-partisan investigators whose factual reports are, unfortunately, generally ignored and which receive precious little media exposure.

I, as a registered Independent, a military veteran and a patriot, beseech you to put aside party considerations and vote for the lesser of the two evils. Yes, I am NOT a McCain supporter, but he is, at least, not a flake, doesn't carry Muslim baggage and is a PROVEN hero and patriot WITH experience. It's not a party issue. It's all about electing the best we can trust with what we've got to work with. Mr. Obama is NOT that guy. Please, please rethink your voting position.

Thanks for reading my innermost thoughts. I care about all of you, but I care more about our country. Please help me to do both.

William P. (Bill) Lear, Jr., lear@cfl.rr.com, (386) 763-5051

20081027-01	10:00	SteveB	Re: "Straight Talk"
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------

Dear Larry,

Thanks for sending this, but this guy is just dead wrong (and I don't care where his daddy took him when he was a little boy, Mr. Lear has zero foreign policy experience either).

1. Few incoming presidents have had much foreign policy experience. You can really only get it in the Executive branch, so neither Obama or McCain have any official foreign policy experience whatsoever. McCain lies about his experience, Obama doesn't. McCain is both border-line senile and stupid, so he ain't gonna learn it. Obama is intelligent and will learn it. At least Obama knows where Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Spain are! McCain has gotten all this confused on several recorded occasions, and even thought Spain was a terrorist enemy in the Western Hemisphere. Frightening! (And these things about McCain being stupid and uneducated are things I have seen with my own eyes during the campaigns. Does anybody think I am going to believe lies over what I see with my own eyes, and anyone can see if they will just look through eyes unclouded by petty ideology?) I choose not to trust Mr. Lear.

2. I was reading this and kept thinking "racist?" Sure enough, towards the end he amazingly asserts that Obama is not black (yet we are supposed to treat his as if her were a stupid, uneducated black man, for some reason, while the white man must automatically, for no reason, be OK). To me his definitions are ridiculous in 2008, but what is this stuff about Obama being only 1/8 black? His father looks to me as close to 100% as it is possible to get. I mean, he is the color of coal, for Heaven's sakes, and his mother looks as close to 100% white as possible. By my calculations, this makes him 50% black, or as we say in 2008, black. What is the point anyway? Only a racist would care.

3. Is this guy telling me that because Obama is black (no other coherent reasons given. Does he think McCain knows more about economics?), I should vote for the proven liar instead of the proven honest man? The idiot over the near-genius? The oldie looking back over the younger man looking forward?

4. Obama has not played any race card in this campaign, even one time, that I know of. The "factual reports" on the internet are pure BS. Obama was born in America, etc. It's been proven to everyone's satisfaction except the crazies.

5. McCain was not a war hero. He was a failure as a soldier. He is a "self-proclaimed" war hero. His experience in the Navy has nothing to do with the duties of Commander-in-Chief. This is all just another big lie!

No, thanks. I think I'll stick with Barack!

20081027-02 10:12 Phil Re: Illinois Politics

Dear SteveB,

This is all true, but less relevant than Obama sitting in Wright's congregation for 20 years listening to his message.

20081027-03 10:20 SteveB Re: Illinois Politics

Dear Phil,

Not to worry! At least Wright didn't seem to turn Obama into a freakin' low-life habitual dirty liar the way something has made McCain.

At this point in the McCain campaign, nearly every single sentence is a lie. This morning, I heard him say that the polls are lying and he is really ahead and climbing. See what I mean? Delusional!

If Wright made Obama into some kind of America-hating, terrorist or racist, it sure doesn't seem to show through very well, does it? I've been looking very closely, and all I see is a good, intelligent man who wants to do good. A man like that...we rarely have a chance to vote for!

20081027-04 13:07 SteveM "Investors: Obama Rise Is Tanking the Stock Market"

Dear SteveB,

If the election is over (based on polls) and the Stock Market is supposed to be a predictor of the future economy, why is the Stock Market plummeting? Does that mean that Obama hasn't a clue how to fix the economy or at least those who know doesn't think he does? I think investors are pulling their money out and hiding it from Pelosi, Reid and the Marxist BHO

If Obama is elected, how will he and Barney fix economy? By raising taxes to kill private investment and new jobs and doing whatever will bring him campaign money and buy him votes, consistent with whichever way the polls tell him to go?

How will McCain fix economy? By not doing anything stupid, for one. Second, doing whatever is in the best interest of the country aside from political interests.

Friends, there is no magic bullet and tough times are ahead. Forget wishful thinking based on Obama-Nada. The Obama bubble won't help any more than the housing bubble.

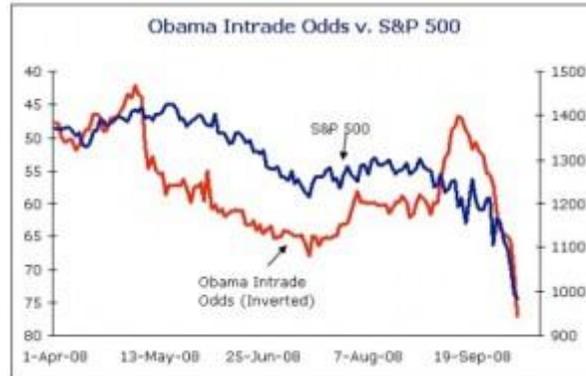

Eventually the economy will recover if we take right action and don't screw it up further.

"Political correctness is a doctrine, fostered by a delusional, illogical minority, and rabidly promoted by an unscrupulous mainstream media, which holds forth the proposition that it is entirely possible to pick up a turd by the clean end."

"Investors: Obama Rise is Tanking the Stock Market" by MacRanger, Macsmind Blog

Oct. 9, 2008, (<http://macsmind.com/wordpress/2008/10/09/investors-obama-rise-is-tanking-the-stock-market/>)

I took the day off to visit three local firms that deal in the stock market to ask them if in fact they think the rise of Obama in the polls is corresponding with the drop of the DOW and the S&P. The response was nearly unanimous.

Much of the meteoric dive of the markets since September 15th have been blamed on the credit crisis, the housing crisis, but one can't deny that the market is in part also reacting to the possibility of a business tax happy Barack Obama. Additionally Democrats are squawking about more regulation and over sight — the lack of which on their part led to the crisis in the first place.

Today I talked with several Obama supporters at work who constantly talk about having to cut corners and pinch pennies. I asked them what would they think if they knew that an Obama administration would sharply raise their taxes after taking office.

Much of the response had to do with the Obama talking points that he would not raise taxes except on those who make $250,000 or more, and I explained — and showed them how that is not true. That Obama will have no choice but to raise taxes across the board to pay for all the programs he's talking about starting. Not to mention — but I did — of how the Democratic congress has already did away with the Bush tax cuts and that beginning in 2010 — even if Obama didn't raise taxes — they would see an average of $3500 more tacked on to their annual tax bill.

In short if they think the economy is bad now just wait until Obama takes the reins of power. The average America isn't tuned to the buck like investors are, but they are seeing the light and the spiraling market is the solid proof of that. More proof is that a recent survey of CEO's in America by CEO magazine found that a whopping 74% of them feel that Barack Obama will be a disaster to the economy.

We all remember the last far left "new" democratic kid on the block, Jimmy Carter and the disaster he was to the American economy. In comparison many I've talked to believe that Barack Obama would make Carter look like Reagan after all is said, done and destroyed.

It's time to wake up America!

20081027-05 13:33 SteveB Re: "Investors: Obama Rise Is Tanking the Stock Market"

Dear SteveM,

LOL! Good one. I can't stop laughing...we all know the 1984 Brave New World opposite of this is true.

At least, most of us do.

A good Republican should stand up and take the blame for this mess—including the stock market crash. Who do you think brought us here? George "Idiot" Bush and John "Senile" McCain and their ilk (roughly speaking, of course. McCain has always been pretty ineffectual in his efforts)!

You talk loosely of "Marxists" (a word which adds no credibility to your arguments...socialist is already more connotative than necessary), but what could be more Marxist than the recent economic schemes dreamed up by your Republican administration and approved by your McCain.

Just as Palin shredded the "inexperience" argument, these actions by the Republicans annihilate the "socialist" argument. How dumb can your team be?

Myself...I'm pretty sure I'll saddle-up a fresher horse before I venture out across the looming wasteland.

20081027-06 16:26 SteveB "Sand Stolen Across Caribbean for Construction" Environment
--

from "Sand Stolen Across Caribbean for Construction" by Harold Quash, AP

Oct. 27, 2008, (<http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/27400598>)

('We will lose our beaches' unless crime is taken seriously, one official says.)

(SAN JUAN, PR) Ahh, the Caribbean. Sun, surf. But in some places, people are asking: "Where's the sand?"

It is disappearing at alarming rates as thieves feed a local construction boom.

Caribbean round grains, favored in creating smooth surfaces for plastering and finishing, are being hauled away by the truckload late at night. On some islands not much bigger than Manhattan, towns and ecologically sensitive areas are now exposed to tidal surges and rough seas.

In Puerto Rico, thieves once mined the dunes in the northern coastal town of Isabela, said Ernesto Diaz of the Department of Natural Resources. But now they are stealing the beaches of the tiny island of Vieques — 52 square miles where the U.S. military only recently halted its controversial bombing practice.

Among the hardest hit is Grenada, where officials are building a $1.2 million seawall to protect the 131-square-mile island. Large sand thefts have exposed north coast towns to rough seas, said Joseph Gilbert, the minister of works and environment.

One of the region's largest sand thefts targeted Jamaica, where nearly 100 truckloads were swiped from private property in the northwest, exposing protected mangroves and a limestone forest to wind and waves.

20081027-07 18:19 SteveB I Read the News Today, Oh Boy!

I read the news today, oh boy...

"This campaign [guess which one?] is in total melt-down."

"If you can't run a Presidential campaign, you probably can't run the country."

"...infighting between Palin and McCain. Palin is looking ahead to 2012."

And, most interesting of all, McCain was all over the news today complaining that Obama is winning and has attracted enough money to put-on his 1/2 hour TV special on Wednesday—before the election, instead of waiting until he's elected, like McCain would do.

Huh? L-O-L !!!

McCain: "Those Obama pricks! There has to be something wrong with this guy...hasn't anybody else noticed that he's...black!" [in my imagination, of course]

20081027-08	21:45	SteveB	Republicans for Obama
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

<http://www.republicansforobama.org/>

20081027-09	12:12	SteveB	Needed: A Populist Party of the Center
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Many of us agree that we need a true 3rd party here in the U.S. Historically, that has meant a party to the right of Republicans or to the left of Democrats. That is the problem.

What we need is a populist party of the middle that will do what is practical and works. They will shy away from excesses by both current parties.

20081028-01	06:45	SteveM	"W Ketchup Exhorts Americans to Defend the Constitution"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

PRESS RELEASE (Oct. 27., 2008)

(For media inquiries contact Bill Zachary (917) 733-3038. If you are having trouble reading this press release, please go to this link: <http://www.wketchup.com/newsreleases/081027.php>.)

"W Ketchup (<http://www.wketchup.com/>) Exhorts Americans to Defend the Constitution"

(Eagle Bridge, NY) Last week, W Ketchup called on Democratic nominee Barack Obama to release his records so Americans could make an informed decision in next week's elections. Although Obama has refused, this morning some of Obama's hidden past came to light.

In a 2001 radio interview on Chicago's WBEZ, while he was a state senator, Obama said: "The Supreme Court never ventured into the issues of redistribution of wealth and more basic issues of economic and social justice in this society. And to that extent, as radical as I think people try to characterize the Warren Court, it wasn't that radical; it didn't break free from the essential constraints that were placed by the Founding Fathers in the Constitution."

Essential constraints in the Constitution include: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated," and "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

Dan Oliver, CEO of W Ketchup, reacted: "Obama's shocking quote suddenly clarifies his past and gives context to his remark to 'Joe the Plumber' that he wants to 'spread the wealth around.' This man comes from the Marxist backwaters of academia and advocates overthrowing the essential liberties guaranteed by the Constitution to take property forcibly from one man and give it to another. We suggest voters consider the fates of Soviet Russia and Red China before pulling the lever for Obama."

In the 2001 interview, Obama continues: "One of the tragedies of the civil rights movement was because the civil rights movement became so court focused, there was a tendency to lose track of the political and community organizing activities on the ground that are able to put together the actual coalitions of power through which you bring about redistributive change. I am not optimistic about bringing major redistributive change through the courts. [Redistributive change] is essentially administrative and takes a lot of time."

Senator Obama began his community service by working as a leadership trainer with ACORN, an ultra-left wing community group. Among other activities, ACORN specializes in menacing the families of bankers at their homes and flooding bank lobbies with protesters in order to coerce banks to give risky loans to low income, inner city applicants. The Obama campaign recently gave ACORN $800,000 for a voter registration drive. Currently, ACORN is under investigation by the FBI in 15 states for voter fraud.

Bill Zachary, Chairman of W Ketchup, commented: "Steve Cohen (D-TN) has claimed that 'Barack Obama was a community organizer like Jesus,' but we don't recall biblical stories of the disciples threatening the families of Roman officials or shaking down the money lenders for extra cash. From his own words, we see that Obama did not organize the poor to help them create their own wealth and improve their lives, but as a power base to confiscate property from the America's wealth producers: redistributive change you'd better believe in."

Zachary added: "The Presidency of the United States is the most powerful position in history. Unlike in Rome and the great empires of history, we the people have the power to choose who occupies that august position. Despite what the polls say, we do not believe Americans will elect a closet Marxist, however mellifluous his rhetoric. This man is not a Democrat with whom we can respectfully disagree, but a Manchurian candidate set to overthrow our system of government and to destroy our way of life."

20081028-02 08:08 SteveB Lies & Damned Lies [defense]

Here's a little one for you.

I just saw Rudy Giuliani on TV this morning. Now there's a guy with a lot of credibility left! He was repeating the standard McCain campaign line that Obama is not just a liberal Democrat, he's way to the left, he's the most liberal Democrat in the Senate, and his voting record proves it. Now think about how tricky and deceitful this lie really is.

If a guy, anyone, is in the Senate, and let's say he's a Democrat. He's there voting on various bills with Republicans and Democrats. If the guy is a faithful Democrat, then he's voting with that group most of the time. Unless there are votes where a Senator is the only vote in the Senate for or against a bill (which almost never or never happens), there is no good way to measure which Senator is the most liberal based on his voting record.

Now McCain and Giuliani might consider Obama to be the most liberal member of the Senate, but to say that he's way left of other Democrats based on his voting record...It's all subjective, desperate BS! This is just another foul Republican lie and scare tactic! Boo! It's Halloween.

The other biggest lie? Obama is a socialist or Marxist because his tax plan is a little different than McCain's. What desperate BS!

Come on, next Tuesday! Let's bring down the curtain on this cr*p and this cr*p's champion, "hero", and "fighter"—Johnny Boy McCain! Until then, McCain's campaign might be better served discussing his (non-existent?) solutions to our problems, instead of constantly trying to find new ways to bring down a good man.

20081028-03 08:19 SteveB Redistributing the Wealth Is a Bipartisan Activity

Dear Mr. McCain:

In your long and storied (by you) career, you have voted many times to "redistribute" the wealth through a graduated, progressive tax. It's there in your voting record, Johnny Boy! Your proposed tax is a graduated, progressive tax (not flat) and so is Obama's. They're not much different except that Obama's favor's the middle class, yours doesn't. I suppose this makes you and your buddies (and almost all members of Congress going back to the 30's) socialists, Marxists, and "redistributors of wealth"?

A little ridiculous, don't you think?

20081028-04 10:02 SteveB Re: "W Ketchup Exhorts Americans to Defend the Constitution"

Dear SteveM,

OMFG! This is absolutely hysterical stuff!!! This piece is so frickin' insane it's like Monte Python to me! Keep sending me wacko stuff like this, 'cause I need a good laugh and something to wipe my b*tt with (figuratively).

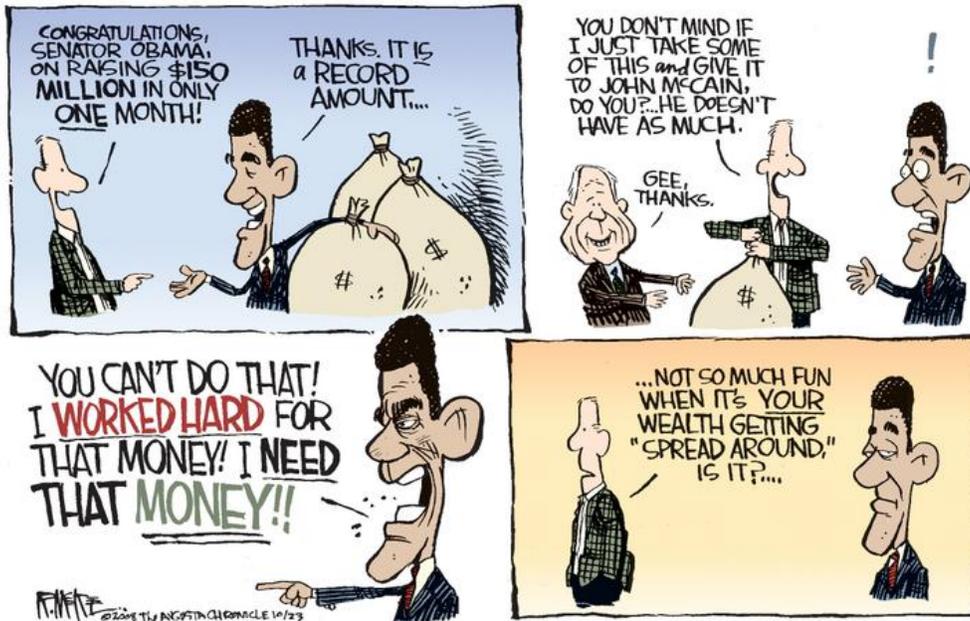

"Defend the Constitution" (from Democrats? Not idiot Bush?) indeed! F'ed up! Period. Fact!

"W Ketchup" indeed! I think the author got a little on his clean white Fundamentalist wacko right-wing shirt. F'ed up! Period. Fact!

This petty name-calling is not the cr*p we need. We need real solutions to real problems. McCain obviously has none.

Palin has all her "ideas" whispered into her ear by God (or her minister, or the 1st Dude, or Dick Cheney), but do you really want to trust that? Obviously, the rest of us don't.

20081028-05 16:40 SteveM Redistributing Obama's Wealth

20081028-06 17:00 SteveB Fw: Disunited States—Red & Blue

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Dear Red States,

If you manage to steal this election too we've decided we're leaving. We intend to form our own country, and we're taking the other Blue States with us. In case you aren't aware, that includes California, Hawaii, Oregon, Washington, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois and all the Northeast. We believe this split will be beneficial to the nation, and especially to the people of the new country of New California.

To sum up briefly: You get Texas, Oklahoma and all the slave states. We get stem cell research and the best beaches. We get the Statue of Liberty. You get Dollywood. We get Intel and Microsoft. You get WorldCom. We get Harvard. You get Ole' Miss. We get 85% of America's venture capital and entrepreneurs. You get Alabama.

We get two-thirds of the tax revenue, you get to make the red states pay their fair share.

Since our aggregate divorce rate is 22% lower than the Christian Coalition's, we get a bunch of happy families. You get a bunch of single moms. Please be aware that Nuevo California will be pro-choice and anti-war, and we're going to want all our citizens back from Iraq at once. If you need people to fight, ask your evangelicals. They have kids they're apparently willing to send to their deaths for no purpose, and they don't care if you don't show pictures of their children's caskets coming home. We do wish you success in Iraq , but we're not willing to spend our resources on Bush's Quagmire.

With the Blue States in hand, we will have firm control of 80% of the country's fresh water, more than 90% of the pineapple and lettuce, 92% of the nation's fresh fruit [Without Florida, Texas, and Georgia? Hard to believe. —SteveB], 95% of America's quality wines, 90% of all cheese, 90% of the high tech industry, 95% of the corn and soybeans (thanks Iowa!), most of the U.S. low-sulfur coal, all living redwoods, sequoias and condors, all the Ivy and Seven Sister schools plus Stanford, Cal Tech and MIT.

With the Red States, on the other hand, you will have to cope with 88% of all obese Americans (and their projected health care costs), 92% of all U.S. mosquitoes, nearly 100% of the tornadoes, 90% of the hurricanes, 99% of all Southern Baptists, virtually 100% of all televangelists, Rush Limbaugh, Bob Jones University, Clemson, and the University of Georgia. We get Hollywood and Yosemite, thank you.

Additionally, 38% of those in the Red states believe Jonah was actually swallowed by a whale, 62% believe life is sacred unless we're discussing the war, the death penalty or gun laws, 44% say that evolution is only a theory, 53% that Saddam was involved in 9/11 and 61% of you crazy b*stards believe you are people with higher morals than we lefties.

Finally, we're taking the good pot, too. You can have that dirt weed they grow in Mexico.

Peace out, Blue States

20081028-07	18:34	Mike	What Do You Like About Obama?
-----------------------------	-------	------	-------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Just curious, what's your top 5 list of reasons as to why Obama is your candidate?

20081028-08	19:01	Mike	Fw: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
-----------------------------	-------	------	--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

A little girl goes gets all dressed up for Halloween and decides that she is going to every house in the neighborhood to get candy. Her efforts were very successful. Later that night she sat down and proceeded to count her efforts, one by one. Upon counting all her candy, she approached her father with her glorious earnings and was looking for a praise of some sort. What she got from her father just might sum up Obama's extreme economic policies.

Her father "Obama" ask her to split her enormous earnings into 2 piles. One pile at 40% and the other pile at 60%. Then the father scooped up the 40% pile and placed it into a bag marked "Obama" and proceeded out the door.

An hour went by and the father returned with an empty bag. The daughter was most frustrated. She asked her daddy what had happened to the candy that she had worked so hard for? The father "Obama" went on to explain that he was penalizing her for her efforts and felt that he needed to take her hard earned candy and pass it out to those kids in the neighborhood that didn't go out to get it on their own. Not only did he hand out her 40% to the kids that did nothing to get their own candy, but he gave them the impression that he himself gathered up all the candy on his own, thus giving his own daughter no credit for her efforts. All the kids that did nothing loved her dad.

This guy really is a sucker to think that you can take from the rich simply because you think that spreading it around to less fortunate lazy individuals is going to create jobs? I own my own business and I take full responsibility for my health insurance, work ethic, and money. I will not hire a single person for as long as this guy is in office. His party is taking advantage of weak minded individuals who are too used to getting a silver spoon from mommy and daddy. So much for bailing us out of the very thing Jimmy Carter got us into with his slack jawed policies.

I like the interview they had on the radio with a black woman on the streets of Brooklyn. when asked who she would vote for she said "Obama of course". When asked what she thought of his running mate for V.P. she replied "I love his choice for Sarah Palin for V.P." I about died laughing.

I will vote for McCain who will unfortunately lose out to the Dem's. But it wasn't because of Obama's wit, charm and good sense of what matters. It was because he found a way to convince the weak-minded that "Change" is worth fighting for. He can keep the "Change" because I want the "Dollars".

20081028-09 20:30 SteveB Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear Mike,

Now, these are the best arguments yet! No wonder Obama isn't further ahead in the polls.

20081028-10 21:59 Bob Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear SteveB,

I have been receiving from you many emails smashing McCain and praising Obama, via somebody on your mailing list. However I have noted that you are very much for Obama and very much against McCain.

I am not saying McCain is the best choice by no means, by the way where is Ross Perot now when we really need him!!!! The U.S. needs to be ran like a business not a world bank and world police. The U.S. needs to put back its pride and forget about what the rest of the world says or thinks.

.....could go on and on, but I won't!

However you really need to look at world history and look at every country in the world that has been under a white president and then turned over to a n*gger. Every country where this has happened that n*gger has ran the country into a sh*t hole bigger than ever.

Also it is one thing that he is a n*gger, but also he is an Islamic f*cking n*gger which is even worse. Do you know the extreme Muslims are looking to destroy the U.S. from the inside out not from the outside in???? Especially with a name like Obama!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!! Come on people wake the f*ck up!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

But anyway I see the USA quickly catapulting to the sewer the way it is, but if people are really as stupid as they seem and if they do vote for this extreme Muslim n*gger well I hope you are all ready to pay the consequences.

So I hope you really think about this and don't vote for the rag head n*gger!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!! And if you do well get ready for the consequences.

All of the best regards.

20081028-11 22:54 SteveB Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear Bob,

Nice to hear from you. You sound serious. Seriously demented. :-)

Based on what you have to say, I'm happy I don't know you.

Have a nice life, Mr. Hater.

20081029-01 11:00 SteveB Re: What Do You Like About Obama?

Dear Mike,

Why I'm voting for Barack Obama? Easy, read my emails. And...

1. HONESTY—what could be more important after Nixon, Clinton, and Bush? I will not have a President that lies to me. McCain has proven himself to be the biggest liar of all (read my emails for proof).
2. Intelligence, not senility—not old, not pushing for stuff proven in the past to not work. Not nearly last in his class at the Naval Academy. He has proven his mastery of the subjects of Iraq, Afghanistan, Georgia, Israel, economics, etc. McCain is a rooster with his head cut off—all bluster, no substance at all. We have lately proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that stupidity is the last thing the country needs in a President.
3. He's a loving family man, not an adulterer (like McCain).
4. He has shown McCain the respect McCain never returned. In other words, he's a good guy.
5. His tax plan, healthcare proposal, energy proposal, and economic plans are far superior to McCain's, which are largely unknown, and formulated not by McCain, but by unknown people like Dick Cheney.
6. (I'll give you a bonus) He's black and there will be music and dancing and children in the White House.
7. (one contrary point) Ideologically, except for abortion, I'm probably more aligned with McCain's professions of smaller government, balancing the budget, etc., but, like Bush, I don't see how he would be able to accomplish anything with a Democratic Congress—hence, given the current crisis, disaster! And even with a Republican Congress, like Bush had, McCain would not know what to do. How could he, he's stupid.
8. (another bonus) Obama is pro-life and I will not let the government go back to making criminals and corpses out of women who want or need an abortion, even though, like Obama, I wish there were fewer abortions, but without good sex education in the schools, forget that, Republicans. We don't really know McCain's position, he's flip-flopped so much.
9. (still another bonus) He is obviously interested in bringing people together to solve problems, not split them apart for personal gain as McCain is trying to do. "Socialist" indeed! LOL!
10. Maybe he'll stop the wars, if anybody can.

Hope that helps.

20081029-02	11:14	SteveB	Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Mike,

How many "dollars" do you think you're going to get in the Republican created recession?

The country is in trouble. Realize it and plan accordingly.

Quit listening to the Republican lies. Study history! We have been a "socialist" nation to the degree Obama wants since the 1930's, and, in my lifetime, I have seen this situation supported and expanded by Republicans just as much as Democrats. In the current context, this scare word is ridiculously meaningless. McCain is nothing but the dirtiest of liars!

McCain's tax plan is just as "socialist". Study it. He's not asking for a flat tax or no tax, right? In fact, McCain opposed the current Bush tax cuts. Like all his other plans, it is also stupid!

Obama is no more socialist than McCain. For cryin' out loud—we're talking about Republicans and Democrats here! One could also say that McCain is more fascist than Obama, and Obama would have a legitimate right to say that, but he knows there are more important issues that need solutions, stupid senseless name-calling is not going to bring us to those solutions. McCain is divisive, Obama is not. Of course, the Democrats are a little more liberal than the Republicans, but if what you think is good is the right-wing fanaticism of Sarah Palin—against peace, abortion, public schools, and freedom of religion—then have at it.

"Socialist" indeed!

20081029-03 11:20 Bob Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear SteveB,

I would be the first to agree with you about me being demented!!!!

However I am not a n*gger hater at all, I have many n*gger friends including many white n*gger friends, I also love black women who are so hot. Also I believe that after the civil war all n*ggers should have been shipped back to Africa, however it was a Democratic congress that decided it would be to expensive to send them all back, has anybody tallied what the cost of this mistake has cost the U.S. and you??????

Also I do believe America needs change.

I am just saying don't jump from the frying pan to the fire!

And you should look at other countries around the world that thought a n*gger or a an Indian would make better changes, and how these countries have been sent on a downhill plunge.

Maybe look at just a few..... Nigeria (N), South Africa(N), Rhodesia(Zimbabwe, Zambia)(N), Venezuela(N), Bolivia(I) Haiti (N) and many many more..... Can you name me any that have success stories??????????????

Have you ever been out of the U.S.? Or are you like 99% of all the American sheep that only sit at home watching the boob tube CNN and think they know what is happening in the world.

All of the best my dear friend

20081029-04 11:27 Dennis Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

from Bob:

Still waiting for the list!!!!

Dear Bob,

Okay, Bozo Bob. What's your definition of "n*gger"? Are you using the word as a derisive pejorative for inferiority or blindly as a racial epithet? Do you consider all non-whites "n*ggers" out of some pseudo-scientific rationale or do you just toss it around to illustrate something about your own pathetic lack of self worth?

20081029-05 11:34 SteveB Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear Bob Hitler,

Have you ever been out of the U.S., Bob?

Are you sure you are the one who knows what's happening (and, apparently, what has historically happened) in the world? Do you speak a foreign language? Have you ever studied history? Have you ever read anything? It seems to me that, if you have read anything, you would understand that, unless we are black, we modern Americans of the 21st Century do not refer to black people as "n*ggers". Take my word for it, because used to be a conservative myself, but I am one who is tired of the Republican lies. They have sold Americans down the river. Black people have not.

Long live President Obama!

P.S. South Africa has done better under black administrations than white, which brought them pariah status. Since I know a little about Bolivia, I can tell you that they have never had a black President—there are about two black people in the entire country. Does this mean you think Indians are the same thing as blacks? Identical low-life scum?

Then the Japanese, Chinese, and Indian people—not being white Anglo-Saxon Protestants—must also be "n*ggers", right? They seem to be doing quite well—maybe better than we are right now—without Gringos in their governments.

Gee...there goes your beautiful (evil) racist argument...

20081029-06	11:34	SteveM	"Iowa Meatpacker Fined $10M after Immigration Raid"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveB,

I dare you to share this with your liberal friends back east, who think Immigrant Identity theft is harmless, 'cause "they just want to work picking food".

"Iowa Meatpacker Fined $10M after Immigration Raid" by AP

Oct. 29, 2008, (http://www.usatoday.com/news/nation/2008-10-29-immigration-raid_N.htm)

(DES MOINES, Iowa) On Wednesday fined a kosher meatpacking plant that was targeted by a federal immigration raid nearly $10 million for alleged violations of state labor laws.

Labor Commissioner Dave Neil assessed the civil penalties against Agriprocessors in Postville for what he called repeated violations of Iowa's wage laws from Jan., 2006 to June, 2008.

The alleged violations included illegally deducting sales tax and miscellaneous costs, and failing to pay dozens of workers their last paycheck after the May raid by federal immigration agents.

The civil penalties total more than $9.9 million.

An Agriprocessors spokesman didn't immediately return a telephone call seeking comment.

Also on Wednesday, a human resources employee of Agriprocessors changed her plea to guilty for her role in helping illegal workers use false documents to work at the plant.

Laura Althouse, 38, of Postville, appeared in federal court in Cedar Rapids to enter her plea to charges of conspiracy to harbor undocumented immigrants for financial gain and aggravated identity theft. She originally faced the conspiracy charge as well as charges of aiding and abetting document fraud and aiding and abetting aggravated identity theft.

Her lawyer didn't immediately respond to calls seeking comment.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said Althouse remains free on bail pending sentencing, which will be scheduled after a presentence investigation report is completed. She faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy charge, and up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine on the aggravated identity theft charge.

Copyright 2008 The Associated Press.

20081029-07	12:43	SteveB	Re: Redistributing Obama's Wealth
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

Dear SteveM,

Thanks for the cartoon.

I think it's McCain's wealth and that of his buddies the Republicans don't want touched. They don't believe they should have to pay their fair share.

And you know that under the current tax law, many rich people still avoid a lot of taxes? Or do you want a flat tax and pay a lot more than you do now?

Not me! I say a guy making $250,000 or a gal like Cindy making $4,000,000 should pay a greater percentage tax than, say, you and I do, making less. I've made more and paid more at other times in my life. Why shouldn't everyone? It has never seemed unfair to me.

But, now, suddenly, I guess it does seem unfair somehow to a rich old politician who is in the middle of a humiliating, monumental, history-changing a*s-kicking!

McCain isn't proposing a flat tax. Therefore, McCain is a Marxist-socialist redistributor of wealth! True! Right?

20081029-08 13:11 Bob Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear Dennis,

Good morning to you too.

I would say probably both as a derisive pejorative for inferiority and as a racial epithet!!!

However I do know many white n*ggers too!

But for your list to make it easier for you, let's just say black people. Hurry up with the list because once you provide it to me that's where I am going.

All my loving best.

20081029-09 13:39 Dennis Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear SteveB,

Here's the latest from the twit. Want to gang up on him?

My reply will be:

So, Whitey Redneck Bob, you think Blacks are inferior. I suppose you play golf better than Tiger Woods, play basketball better than Michael Jordon, display the moral courage of Nelson Mandela, have more integrity than Colin Powell, have made more scientific discoveries than Booker T. Washington, have any of the eloquence and intellectual acumen of our next president Barack Obama, et al?

As for African governments, did you know that Botswana has the least corruption of any government in the world, and is one of the fastest developing? South Africa, where I've traveled five times—four since the end of Apartheid—is developing pretty damn well too. I am always amazed at how the narrow minded can filter the facts to fit their prejudices. Did you learn stupidity from your parents, or have you acquired it through the diligent self denial of reality?

20081029-10 14:39 Charlie Re: Needed: A Populist Party of the Center

Dear SteveB,

Well, about that .. I heard an NPR show (podcast, I think it was, "To The Point"), where the guest was arguing that liberals should vote for McCain "to avoid having a single party in power".

I actually agree with this to a point: he was arguing that an all-Democratic government would enact laws & policies that favor their "base" and hence disenfranchise the "other side" (Conservatives, Republicans, whatever).

Well, a few thoughts there:

1. Bad policies and politics aren't limited to just Republicans.

2. Unethical politicians aren't just Republicans either.
3. New ideas can come from many places.

If I had been able to call in, I would have said that yes, a single party in charge (according to the guest) is a Bad Thing.

But what about VIABLE third parties? I'm a Green at heart and philosophically in many cases, but I'm voting Democratic because there is no viable alternative to our two-party system.

And to me, this is a possible way out of the "single party" (DUAL party!) system we have now.

My $.04 (adjusted for inflation).

20081029-11 14:49 SteveB Re: "Iowa Meatpucker Fined $10M after Immigration Raid"

Dear SteveM,

We don't want illegal immigrants in this country. Period. We want the laws enforced.

We wish McCain and Obama weren't too chicken-sh*t to even talk about the problem. McCain is a total traitor on this issue.

And...I was driving earlier today...listening to Rush for a while on the radio...he really is such a big, stupid idiot...thinking...

...every time the Republicans get into trouble and it looks like they might get the a*s-kicking they deserve, they break out all the big boogie men they can think of to try to control the American people. That's when we hear: Terrorists! Socialists! Communists! Baby-Killers! Redistributors of Wealth (ha!)

The American people are about to prove that no lie, no matter how clever and deceitful, works forever. The GOP is about to suffer the worst defeat in, perhaps, its history. It is the stupidity and lies of Bush and McCain that have gotten us here. It will be something different, something I suspect rather refreshing, that will take us back onto the path of strength and prosperity, freedom and respect from which we have strayed so far.

20081029-12 15:03 SteveB Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear Dennis,

I like your answer! Notice that he didn't seem to sense that I gave him China, India, and Japan as, I thought, appropriate answers to his question, but maybe that means it's just the blacks and not Muslims or atheists or anybody else that this guy hates.

OK, so maybe he's a decent guy after all. LOL!

I think you and I have him on the worldliness angle, huh? At least I didn't hear any more about that. :-) And how 'bout Booker T & the MG's too? "Hey, mon, pass me dat frod okra. Ah loves it!"

20081029-13 16:00 SteveB Re: Needed: A Populist Party of the Center

Dear Charlie,

Actually, divide and conquer has always been my philosophy—since reading the Foundation trilogy in the 60's.

And, as I've said, I'm more of a conservative than a liberal, and I think I wish we had more than two parties...though that can go badly too. Maybe we're lucky to have just two and the grass is always greener...?

And, as you say, good ideas can come from anywhere. I think most of us would agree that our idea of an ideal government would have many attributes picked from both parties, at least. Obama seems like a reasonable enough guy to put together a reasonable synthesis of the best ideas and make a decision based on what works best, not ideology. He will do this while magically reaching consensus. This is what a good leader does.

McCain is only an ideologue, at best. To me, it is such a shame that the GOP ended up in his foul hands.

I also say, kick out every incumbent! Come on, I dare you! I did on my ballot. Even judges.

For me, though, based on everything I've seen and thought, both during these campaigns and during my life, every single time...give me an honest, intelligent man over a lying, senile idiot!

20081029-14 19:53 Bob Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

My dear SteveB and all my new Friends,

Yes SteveB, I have lived outside of the U.S. for 42 years, going on 43. Also am proud to say I have never once voted for any president election due to I believe they are all lying, thieving, pilfering, conniving SOB's. And besides the fact it doesn't really matter who you vote for because the bankers will put in the guy that sucks the best cock anyway. So the joke is really on you..... thinking that your vote really makes a difference!!!!

Also you don't think Obama is a liar?????? F*ck dude come on!!!! He has been lying since day one, about everything.... please never forget he is a politician and that is one requisite for politicians they all must be able to lie with a straight face.

And unlike you I have actually lived on all 6 continents for years at a time, not just visited for a month or two while eating at Mc Donald's every day. I actually now live in Africa and have for the last 14 years. And yes I speak read and write French, Spanish, Russian, Thai, Urdu, not to mention Bantu and Bapanu, Patan and smatterings of other languages, and you what languages do you speak fluently? If you ever want to see what the real world is like and not just the plastic world you and your yuppie friends live in drop me a note, and come on over to Congo and let's see how smart you really are. This goes for Clark and DTox your buddies who think they are world travelers. I will compare passports with anybody.

Actually I am a high school dropout who left my home in Alabama at 11 with 20$ in my pocket. I now have $20+ million in the bank and travel mostly to Asia from Africa 6 times a year. Unlike all these yuppie educated idiots I see on your list. Again this is probably part of the problem with the U.S. is the old hippies all turned into yuppies who have totally f*cked up the U.S.

Oh and by the way here in Congo I can call n*ggers N*GGERS all day long and nobody minds..... And also for your information you need to travel to SA and see for yourself if it is better now!!!! I have recently been back and it is a sh*t hole compared to what it once was. Same with Nigeria, when I was there 40 years ago it was a great place and beautiful and clean and organized. Now it is a sh*thole. Congo has always been a sh*thole so I can not say anything about it except it has mostly been ran by n*ggers too.

As for Bolivia, to show how smart you really are there is more than 2 n*ggers there..... Actually there is a area there called Las Yungas it is all n*ggers probably close to 200,000 or more, so you are not as smart as you think you are. Maybe you need to read a little more before you try to BS people as of how smart you really aren't..... Also the Indian who is now president there is running the country deeper in the sewer then anyone before him. And Chavez is a n*gger too who has a huge national revenue, but the people have no medicine, rice, sugar, coffee, paper etc. And what about Haiti???? Now there is a great example, how do you like clay cookies to eat????

So while you guys sit there looking at the boob tube watching CNN and thinking that you are so in tune with the world?????? Well think again!!! All the very best. Hugs and Kisses.

20081029-15 21:24 SteveB Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear Bob,

It's interesting. Most of us who have seen the rest of the world, the world you don't seem to have anything good to say about, usually come to appreciate and respect and love the U.S. more for having seen the alternatives, even though we might love many of the alternatives.

You seem awfully bitter for a successful man. I would have figured you for a laid-off union autoworker from Tennessee. I guess I didn't have the state far wrong. :-)

You don't live in the U.S. You don't vote in the U.S. I guess you don't even like the U.S., otherwise you would spend more time here. I don't think you have spent much time here. I don't think you know the U.S. very well. Especially the U.S. of 2008. And you are a bigot.

So I don't really think we have anything in common. Thanks for sharing your perspective with us. Till next time.

20081030-01	12:27	SteveB	"McCain Camp Trying to Scapegoat Palin"
-------------	-------	--------	---

"McCain Camp Trying to Scapegoat Palin" by Roger Simon, Politico/Reuters

Oct. 30, 2008, (<http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1008/15073.html>)

John McCain's campaign is looking for a scapegoat. It is looking for someone to blame if McCain loses on Tuesday. And it has decided on Sarah Palin.

In recent days, a McCain "adviser" told Dana Bash of CNN: "She is a diva. She takes no advice from anyone." Imagine not taking advice from the geniuses at the McCain campaign. What could Palin be thinking? Also, a "top McCain adviser" told Mike Allen of Politico that Palin is "a whack job."

Maybe she is. But who chose to put this "whack job" on the ticket? Wasn't it John McCain? And wasn't it his first presidential-level decision? And if you are a 72-year-old presidential candidate, wouldn't you expect that your running mate's fitness for high office would come under a little extra scrutiny? And, therefore, wouldn't you make your selection with care? (To say nothing about caring about the future of the nation?)

McCain didn't seem to care that much. McCain admitted recently on national TV that he "didn't know her well at all" before he chose Palin. But why not? Why didn't he get to know her better before he made his choice?

It's not like he was rushed. McCain wrapped up the Republican nomination in early March. He didn't announce his choice for a running mate until late August. [Once again, as in not reading the Wall St. bailout plan—2 pages—McCain seems lazy to do the work required to be President.]

Wasn't that enough time for McCain to get to know Palin? Wasn't that enough time for his crackerjack "vetters" to investigate Palin's strengths and weaknesses, check through records and published accounts, talk to a few people, and learn that she was not only a diva but a whack job diva?

But McCain picked her anyway. He wanted to close the "enthusiasm gap" between himself and Barack Obama. He wanted to inject a little adrenaline into the Republican National Convention. He wanted to goose up the Republican base.

And so he chose Palin. Is she really a diva and a whack job? Could be. There are quite a few in politics. (And a few in journalism, too, though in journalism they are called "columnists.")

As proof that she is, McCain aides now say Palin is "going rogue" and straying from their script. Wow. What a condemnation. McCain sticks to the script. How well is he doing?

In truth, Palin's real problem is not her personality or whether she takes orders well. Her real problem is that neither she nor McCain can make a credible case that Palin is ready to assume the presidency should she need to.

And that undercuts McCain's entire campaign.

This was the deal McCain made with the devil. In exchange for energizing his base by picking Palin, he surrendered his chief selling point: that he was better prepared to run the nation in time of crisis, whether it be economic, an attack by terrorists or, as he has been talking about in recent days, fending off a nuclear war.

"The next president won't have time to get used to the office," McCain told a crowd in Miami on Wednesday. "I've been tested, my friends, I've been tested."

But has Sarah Palin? [And, of course, McCain is referring to the fact that he thinks he's been "tested" because he sat on an aircraft carrier during the Cuban missile crisis back in 18...er...196? and made no decisions whatsoever, but somehow, that qualifies him as having Presidential-level experience in time of crisis—the only way I know that you could say you've been "tested". Again, everything McCain says is a lie.]

I don't believe running mates win or lose elections, though some believe they can be a drag on the ticket. Lee Atwater, who was George H.W. Bush's campaign manager in 1988, told me that Dan Quayle cost the ticket 2 to 3 percentage points. But Bush won the election by 7.8 percentage points.

So, in Atwater's opinion, Bush survived his bad choice by winning the election on his own.

McCain could do the same thing. But his campaign's bad decisions have not stopped with Sarah Palin. It has made a series of questionable calls, including making Joe the Plumber the embodiment of the campaign.

Are voters really expected to warmly embrace an (unlicensed) plumber who owes back taxes and complains about the possibility of making a quarter million dollars a year?

And did McCain's aides really believe so little in John McCain's own likability that they thought Joe the Plumber would be more likable?

Apparently so. Which is sad.

In the end, it comes down to two candidates slugging it out. Either McCain pulls off a victory in the last round or he doesn't. And if he doesn't, he has nobody to blame but himself.

20081030-02	20:31	SteveB	"Raising Arizona"
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------

"Raising Arizona" by Richard Wolffe, Newsweek

Oct. 29, 2008, (http://www.democraticunderground.com/discuss/duboard.php?az=view_all&address=132x7674003)

Running against any other GOP candidate, the state of Arizona would be a natural battleground for Barack Obama, alongside other Western states that lean toward him, like New Mexico, Colorado and Nevada. But with John McCain as the Republican nominee, a serious push to win Arizona was off the table.

Until now.

Obama's senior aides are intrigued by several late polls that show a narrowing of the presidential contest in Arizona. Most recently, on Tuesday a Cronkite-Eight poll (named for Arizona State University's journalism school and the local PBS channel) showed the state a statistical tie, with the Arizona senator just 2 points ahead of Obama. That poll suggests Arizona is too close to call, with Obama making significant gains among women and independents.

The campaign is now seriously examining a late surge into the state. That may include ramping up TV advertising, on-the-ground staff or even deploying the candidate to stop there. Obama is scheduled to make a Western swing late this week, making an Arizona visit possible.

According to Pollster.com's averages, Arizona is a 6 point race in McCain's favor, compared to Pennsylvania—McCain's best hope of picking up a blue state—which is an 11-point race in Obama's favor. That means Obama has more reason to travel to Arizona than McCain does to Pennsylvania, no matter how far-fetched it once seemed to try to win McCain's home state.

Dear SteveM,

"Obama the Unruffled" by Anna Quindlen, Newsweek

Oct. 17, 2008, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/2008/10/17/obama-the-unruffled.html>)

(Americans look for the character trait that the times require. There's no question: this moment cries out for stability.)

When the term "character issue" first became the political lexicon's most persistent cliché, it seemed to mainly denote the seven deadly sins of presidential wannabes: drink, drugs, gambling, adultery, perjury, payola and an unsuitable spouse. But as elections have come and gone and imperfect people have done good things, even if they once smoked marijuana or danced with a lobbyist's lampshade on their heads, the issue has become more nuanced. Perhaps all along, without quite knowing it, voters sought a person who embodied in his character what was most needed in the country.

Franklin Roosevelt projected strength at a time when the nation required strength. John Kennedy epitomized vigor at a moment when America needed a second wind. Bill Clinton, for all his shortcomings, was a man who truly felt the pain of a country that was awash in therapy-speak and self-help books.

This effect explains how Barack Obama has captured the attention and the approval of even those who, a year ago, would have been skeptical or hostile. The guy is steady. His campaign has now made the word its mantra, and, boy, has he earned the right. There has rarely been a moment when the United States needed an unflappable leader more, and there has rarely been a candidate who has so steadfastly refused to rattle.

For nearly two years the man has played his own methodical game, ignoring the cries of pundits or party regulars. During those times when it looked as though he were faltering or fading, most conspicuously after the Republican convention, when Sarah Palin seemed like a bright idea instead of a "Saturday Night Live" skit, the Greek chorus rose: Strike out! Fight back! Be tough! Be rough! Obama proceeded apace.

Instead it was John McCain who steered in response to the potholes, and so drove into the ditch. What happened to the much-vaunted straight shooter? He found himself the headliner at what seemed to be reunions of the John Birch Society, forced to correct those who shouted that his opponent, child of Kansas, reared in Hawaii, living in Illinois, was an Arab or a terrorist. And at a moment when Wall Street seemed built on quicksand, Senator McCain was as unpredictable as the Dow, ricocheting from one set of talking points to another, abruptly dropping them when they got no traction.

The most useless line the McCain campaign tried was the existential question "Who is the real Barack Obama?" Despite attempts by the right wing to create a piñata Obama, improbable parts ambition, danger and socialism, the answer is clear: for whatever reason, he's a smart and temperate person who is really comfortable in his own skin. It's weird that this should be so, given his past. A teenage mother, an absent father, a peripatetic childhood, a black man raised by a white family, a blueprint for insecurity and anger. As a parent I would love to understand how instead he became someone conspicuously secure.

This was not how the play of personalities was supposed to go in this race. Obama started out as the shake-'em-up change agent, the newbie who hop scotched his way to the top. McCain was supposed to be the veteran with the steady hand who'd worked his way up the electoral ladder, a man of granite for rocky times. Those roles have now completely reversed. During the third debate the younger man appeared infinitely more mature than the elder. Obama was unshakable, almost preternaturally so, considering that his opponent interrupted him repeatedly, smirked at his answers and grimaced so oddly that at times he seemed deranged.

McCain has always been irascible and angry—his short fuse and barbed comebacks, more than his voting record, account for the "maverick" label—but rarely have voters seen this on such conspicuous display. As he rolled his eyes and chuckled bitterly at much of what the man across the table said, it was disconcerting to think of him doing the same with the leaders of Russia or Iran. When he ate up precious debate time complaining that his feelings had been hurt by criticism from an Obama supporter, it seemed that he thought the race was not about the people's business, but his.

The question now is "Who is the real John McCain?" For the sake of victory he sold his soul to the devil, to the Mephistophelean tactics of Karl Rove, which consist mainly of throwing mud until it sticks.

Americans are giddy believers in progress, but our presidential elections always seem to be fighting the last war; the post-Rovean era is upon us, and McCain was the last to know. When the smears revved up, his approval ratings sank. The red-meat Republicans yelling imprecations at McCain-Palin rallies are still stuck in the culture wars. Here's the thing: the culture wars are over. The liberal side won. How else to explain the spectacle of a conservative vice presidential candidate moved to confide during a debate that some of her best friends are gay?

In every election there is something intangible that speaks to voters apart from issues and positions. They search for a sense of how a candidate's character matches the times. Eight years ago, when things were booming, they decided to take a chance on a guy who seemed like a boffo guest at a barbecue, and they got burned. Now they are searching for a person who will remain unflappable in the face of crisis, who can deal calmly with the extraordinary challenges he will face in January. That is why John McCain has faltered in this race. That is why Barack Obama has surged.

20081031-01 16:15 SteveB "The Low Road Don't Lead to Nowhere"

They need a new country music song, "The Low Road Don't Lead to Nowhere".

from an AP story on the wire about Obama's speech in Youngstown, Ohio, today:

The Illinois senator said he admired a presidential candidate who said in 2000, "I will not take the low road to the highest office in this land."

"Those words were spoken eight years ago by my opponent, John McCain," Obama said. "But the high road didn't lead him to the White House then, so this time, he decided to take a different route."

20081031-02 16:32 SteveG Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear SteveB,

What happened to Bob, the demented?

20081031-03 17:37 SteveB Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Dear SteveG,

I hope he [Bob] just quietly went away. I wonder where any of that "n*gger" thinking could ever get you that would be a good place? Even if people were vastly more different than we are...maybe picture us like dogs...all colors, all sizes, all abilities, a very uneven distribution of abilities because of breeding, we'd all still be just people and still be here on this unique island planet in this unique universe, coping with the same problems and joys. And every one of those dogs would be full of love for their masters and could easily learn to be full of love for each other, not matter race, creed, or color. Our neighbors have a big boxer and a little Chihuahua (that look amazingly alike—just completely different size scales), and they get along great...really love each other. Yet strange dogs will also rip each other to pieces too, so this is just a rough analogy here. I'm just saying that we really aren't very different from each other at all, and we really should be able to get along well even if we were as different from each other as those dogs. And this "n*gger" thinking comes from so far in the deep, dark pre-history of man, when anything different could be a threat, so you had to be the most ultra conservative possible, and react negatively, maybe violently, to that perceived threat. Maybe the threat was even a Neanderthal, or some terrible extinct monkey, or a saber tooth tiger, or just someone from a different tribe.

Here we are, now victims of this now largely useless set of inborn ways of dealing with, well, differentness. We need to evolve to where we would be like all those dogs, but, for some reason, for many of us it's a tough battle. It's interesting that it is the most conservative elements of our society that have clung to this "conservative" set of reactions the longest and the hardest.

20081031-04 20:57 SteveB "Palin Misreads First Amendment; Eagleburger: 'Palin's not ready!'"

Dear Brian,

The campaign is fallin' apart and Palin still hasn't read the Constitution!

In case you forgot, the 1st Amendment to the Constitution reads: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

"Palin Misreads First Amendment; Eagleburger: 'Palin's not ready!'" posted by jgarofoli, San Francisco Chronicle

Oct. 31, 2008, (<http://blog.sfgate.com/nov05election/2008/10/31/palin-misreads-first-amendment-eagleburger-palins-not-ready/>)

First, she misstated the Vice President's role in the Senate, now Gov. Sarah Palin is misreading the First Amendment. That's OK—she was wrapping it in a criticism of the "mainstream media" so all is forgiven, right?

Is there a civics teacher in the house? We've got a code red.

Palin told a conservative radio host Friday that it's not a negative attack when she criticizes Obama's associations with 1960s radical Bill Ayers and the Rev. Jeremiah Wright. Instead, says Sarah P., journalists are threatening her free speech if they say she's going negative when she makes those assertions.

"If [the media] convince enough voters that that is negative campaigning, for me to call Barack Obama out on his associations," Palin told host Chris Plante, "then I don't know what the future of our country would be in terms of First Amendment rights and our ability to ask questions without fear of attacks by the mainstream media."

[So...she thinks the 1st Amendment protects her from criticism from the press. Welcome to the real world, Sarah. — SteveB]

Oh, Lordy. The beauty of the First Amendment is that the governor can say whatever she wants about The O and the press is free to point out—if necessary—any errors in what she says. Or critique her, without fear of retribution.

Salon's Glen Greenwald's reaction: "According to Palin, what the Founders intended with the First Amendment was that political candidates for the most powerful offices in the country and Governors of states would be free to say whatever they want without being criticized in the newspapers. The First Amendment was meant to ensure that powerful political officials would not be 'attacked' in the papers. Is it even possible to imagine more breathtaking ignorance from someone holding high office and running for even higher office?"

Perhaps that's why Lawrence Eagleburger, during what was billed an ahem, "making the case" appearance for McCain Friday on NPR, dissed Palin. When asked if Palin was ready to step in as Prez, Larry—one of the five secretaries of state McCain loves to tout that endorsed him—went rogue: "It is a very good question," he said, pausing a few seconds, then adding with a laugh: "I'm being facetious here. Look, of course not."

[Ya, I'd laugh too, a*s-wipe! —SteveB]

"I don't think at the moment she is prepared to take over the reins of the presidency," he said. "I can name for you any number of other vice presidents who were not particularly up to it either. So the question, I think, is can she learn and would she be tough enough under the circumstances if she were asked to become President, heaven forbid that that ever takes place?"

"Give her some time in the office and I think the answer would be, she will be [pause] adequate. I can't say that she would be a genius in the job. But I think she would be enough to get us through a four year... well I hope not... get us through whatever period of time was necessary. And I devoutly hope that it would never be tested."

[Yes, we will be devoutly hoping...but, by God, I might even go him one further and outright pray, that this thoughtless, selfish, unpatriotic, lazy disaster never holds national office. —SteveB]

I know it's The New York Times, but this has some interesting insights into what Americans are thinking—especially undecided ones.

"Sheepish, Proud or Set to Flip a Coin, They're Still Undecided" by Mark Leibovich, The New York Times

Nov. 1, 2008, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2008/11/02/us/politics/02undecided.html>)

(Holdouts still wrestle with 'Who are you voting for?' question.)

(WASHINGTON) Senators Barack Obama and John McCain have stood (or sat) for 36 debates, endured thousands of interviews, and spent hundreds of millions of dollars on advertisements and the better part of two years trying to convince voters that they are worthy of the presidency, or at least a vote. But with only days left until Election Day, a small cluster of holdouts—4 percent, according to a New York Times/CBS News poll—are still wrestling with the "Who are you voting for?" question.

Which raises a follow-up: What is up with these people?

"I do not like being an 'undecided,' " said a sheepish Doug Finke, a 66-year-old executive at an international relocation service in Louisville, Ky. "Last time at this point, I definitely was decided. Not this time. I find it unnerving."

Mr. Finke, a Republican, voted twice for George W. Bush. He describes himself as an economic conservative and said he had been "very impressed" with Senator John McCain. It sure sounds as if Mr. Finke is leaning toward Mr. McCain, the Arizona Republican, right? Not so fast.

"I'm socially more liberal," Mr. Finke said. "I think Obama is bright and has been very steady in this campaign." He added that it would be "very exciting for the United States to elect a black president." Besides, he does not think Mr. McCain's running mate, Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska, would be ready to step into the top job if something happened to Mr. McCain (who, Mr. Finke pointed out, "is pretty old"). Where does this leave Mr. Finke? "I plan on doing a lot of reading this weekend," he said.

The gray states

If the country is divided between red and blue, Mr. Finke resides in a gray state, along with a proud— or embarrassed— corps of undecideds. They are a shrinking cohort of confused, procrastinating, indifferent or just plain indecisive consumers of democracy.

Mr. Finke lives in a red state, Kentucky, with his wife, Shelley, who is also a gray state citizen. She works out of their home, where she helps manage her husband's second career as a jazz trombonist. "I tend to be a procrastinator," said Ms. Finke, 44, who said she operated best with deadlines.

She voted for Mr. Bush twice and describes herself as "a conservative person at heart." At the beginning of the campaign, she was suspicious of Mr. Obama "because of the whole Hollywood thing," but she has since warmed to him. "My opinion of Obama has definitely risen during this campaign," Ms. Finke said. "And my opinion of McCain has fallen."

So it sure sounds as if Ms. Finke is moving toward Mr. Obama, the Illinois Democrat, right?

Not so fast.

"I'd say I'm leaning towards McCain," she said. "For as awful as things are with this Republican administration, there's something about the whole conservative thing that appeals to me." Put her down as "leaning McCain" then. "But maybe I'll vote for Obama," she said. "How many days are left?"

Two, as of Sunday. While many people in this campaign-saturated country are relieved that the election will soon be over, some of the undecideds figure, What's the rush?

"Just an election"

"I might flip a coin," said Vasilios Gerovasiliou, 64, of Concordville, Pa. His two grown sons—like him, veterinarians—are split along party lines. His wife, Helen, said she was "disgusted with both sides." Mr. Gerovasiliou, who emigrated from Greece 35 years ago, said there were things he liked about both Mr. McCain and Mr. Obama. But he also believes that "neither of the candidates always speaks the truth" and that "none of them will be able to do all of the things they are promising."

Mr. Gerovasiliou supported Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, loved Bill Clinton and pretty much vowed to support anyone not named Barack Obama after he defeated Mrs. Clinton in the Democratic primaries. But the Clintons' endorsement of Mr. Obama went a long way. "Time healed things," Mr. Gerovasiliou said. Plus, he likes Mr. Obama's running mate, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of neighboring Delaware, who is "friends with a lot of the Greeks around here" and patronizes the local Greek diners. He likes Mr. McCain, too, however. He admires his service, patriotism, and grit, and also likes that Ms. Palin comes from a small town, just as he did from one in Greece.

Would he really flip a coin? No, he would not. "I will just have to make a decision," Mr. Gerovasiliou said. By the end of a 15-minute phone interview, he sounded a little closer to making one. "I think I am leaning a little bit to someone now," he said.

And that would be?

"Biden."

Chatting = confusion

Talking does not necessarily bring undecideds closer to deciding. "The more I chat, the more confused I get," said Laura Wolpo, a Brooklyn native who lives in Palm Beach Gardens, Fla. She was fresh from a golf outing that was filled with political conversation and left her head spinning. "People get so wacky about this stuff," she said.

Ms. Wolpo, 76, has usually picked a candidate by the end of the conventions. That was the Democrats Al Gore in 2000 and John Kerry in 2004.

Mr. Obama? "I have great misgivings," she said. "We are of the Jewish faith," she said, "and I don't really know his stance on the Middle East and Israel." She also worries about his "share the wealth ideas" and says that Michelle Obama comes on a little too strong. ("And someone should teach her how to dress, too.")

McCain? "I like the man," she said. "I have a great deal of respect for him." But she has problems with him, too, some big ones. First, she is a strong believer in abortion rights (which Mr. McCain is not.) "The government does not belong in our bedroom," she said.

And then there is Ms. Palin. "Oh, my God," Ms. Wolpo said. "Some of what she says is very stupid."

Ms. Wolpo vows to vote Tuesday. She raises the possibility of a "toss of the coin," but then rejects the notion. When pressed, Ms. Wolpo said there was probably a 60 percent chance she would support Mr. McCain. She does not buy the Obama campaign argument that Mr. McCain is just like Mr. Bush. "McCain knows in his heart that Bush is a loser," she said.

Either way, Ms. Wolpo said her decision did not keep her awake at night. "I have enough to worry about," she said, explaining that her youngest son, who is in his 40s, suffered a stroke last spring. He has good days and bad days, she said, and that puts everything else in perspective.

"This other thing is just an election," she said.

20081102-02	08:34	SteveB	"Spread It Around"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------

"Spread It Around" by Jacob Weisberg, Slate

Nov. 1, 2008, (http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/the_big_idea/2008/10/spread_it_around.html)

(Barack Obama favors redistributing wealth. So does John McCain.)

In the last lap of his limping campaign, John McCain is claiming that Barack Obama "believes in redistributing wealth." The problem with this charge is not that it's untrue. It's that McCain—and most of his supporters—favor redistribution, too.

Government redistributes wealth to some extent by its very existence, since it's impractical for citizens to pay for or benefit from it in equal proportion, even if that were desirable. So long as you have a system of taxation and a spending on public goods like education and roads, some people will do better in the bargain than others. The real questions are whether public policy consciously tries to affect the distribution of wealth, how much it tries to change it, and in what direction.

Redistribution has a "from" side—taxation—and a "to" side—spending. On the "from" side, the notion that government should use taxation to increase rather than decrease equality is hardly Marxist. In The Wealth of Nations, Adam Smith begins his section on taxation with the following maxim: "The subjects of every state ought to contribute towards the support of the government, as nearly as possible, in proportion to their respective abilities." To ask otherwise, Smith writes, would be obviously unfair.

Until the 20th century, the bulk of government revenues came from tariffs, which are regressive, meaning that they redistribute income away from the poor. The progressive principle was enshrined in American practice with the arrival of the federal income and inheritance taxes. The champion of these policies was none other than John McCain's hero, Teddy Roosevelt. We got progressive income taxes with the passage of the 16th Amendment in 1913. The federal estate tax we have today came in 1916.

Even in his current proposals, McCain adheres to his hero's principles. Unlike George W. Bush, John McCain supports the retention of an estate tax (he favors reducing it to 15 percent on estates above $5 million). McCain opposes the Flat Tax, which would repudiate progressivity (though with a $46,000 exemption, it would still redistribute income). Some of us still remember the John McCain who opposed Bush's 2001 tax cut on the argument that it was unfairly tilted toward the rich.

On the "to" side of the ledger, large-scale redistributive policies owe their existence to the other President Roosevelt. The biggest and most important of these is Social Security. FDR understood that an income support program that was too explicitly redistributionist would be unlikely to survive politically, which is why everyone who works and pays into the system has a right to benefits. But the Social Security Administration does quietly shift money from relatively richer to relatively poorer—even if recent research indicates that it may do so less than intended, largely because poor people have shorter life expectancies.

Curiously, the most prominent proponents of more-aggressive wealth redistribution have been Robin Hoods of the right. Milton Friedman is considered the father of the negative income tax, a 1960s-era proposal to simply give cash to the poor. Richard Nixon proposed a version of this plan in 1973. The idea was that simply writing checks would be preferable to more bureaucratic programs like welfare.

Our most explicit redistributive program today is probably the Earned Income Tax Credit [EITC], which supplements the incomes of people who work but don't earn enough to escape poverty on their own. Gerald Ford signed this bill into law, and Ronald Reagan greatly expanded it. [And what an incredibly efficient way to distribute help to the people who need it most. I'd like to see private enterprise concoct a more efficient system. —SteveB]

John McCain has long favored the EITC, calling it "a much-needed tax credit for working Americans." McCain doesn't support the repeal of Social Security, or Medicare, or a raft of other wealth-spreading programs like food stamps. McCain also supports new redistributive measures, such as a tax credit to help people with lower incomes purchase health insurance.

McCain might respond by saying it is not the principle of redistribution that makes Obama's policies objectionable but rather the extent of them. Socialistic Sweden, with its generous social benefits and a government consuming around 55 percent of GDP, exists on the same continuum with the mildly distributive United States, where you can't get by on welfare payments and where total government spending is in the range of 30 percent of GDP. McCain is trying to argue that an Obama presidency would lead us toward the Swedish model.

Perhaps, but there's little in Obama's background or writings to suggest that he favors more-ambitious redistributive policies. His most expensive new social program is an expansion of health care coverage that would not create a universal entitlement (as many Democrats want to do). It has been credibly priced at less, or only slightly more than McCain's plan. There's little reason to think that Obama would depart from the bipartisan consensus that has favored federal spending at approximately the same level for the past 40 years.

What has changed in that period is the way the market has distributed wealth. Since the 1970s, income inequality in the United States has increased dramatically. Obama, like a lot of his fellow liberals, wants to find ways to reverse that trend without diminishing overall economic growth. The old John McCain worried about that problem, too. We may see that guy again after the election.

20081103-01	07:59	SteveM	Fw: "The Standard Obama Response: 'I Didn't Know'"
-------------	-------	--------	--

[Source of original email unknown. Nothing found on Snopes.com —SteveB]

"The Standard Obama Response: 'I Didn't Know'", posted by Mondoreb

Nov. 2, 2008, (<http://deathby1000papercuts.com/2008/11/barack-obama-senator-i-didnt-know/>)

(Barrack Hussein must be senile or have Alzheimer's.)

Obama and Unpleasant Revelations

1. Zeituni Onyango

Barack Obama's aunt, who attended Obama's U.S. Senate swearing-in ceremony, was discovered living in a Boston slum. She's living in the U.S. illegally in public housing. Living in poverty, she still had the means to make a donation to her nephew's campaign—which was returned when the story got publicity.

Obama's response? "Senator Obama has no knowledge of her status but obviously believes that any and all appropriate laws be followed."

That was the Obama campaign's stock answer to any unpleasant news which makes its way into the Mainstream Media—a feat in itself.

The Associated Press found that Obama's aunt had been instructed to leave the country four years ago by an immigration judge who rejected her request for asylum from her native Kenya. The woman, Zeituni Onyango (zay-TUHN on-YANG-oh), is living in public housing in Boston and is the half-sister of Obama's late father.

Obama says he didn't know aunt's illegal status. The answer has been used before and seems to satisfy any MSM curiosity about Barack Obama's family and friends.

2. Rev. Jeremiah Wright

"No no no! God damn America!"

"The U.S. of K.K.K.A."

"We bombed Hiroshima, we bombed Nagasaki, and we nuked far more than the thousands in New York and the Pentagon, and we never batted an eye."

"We have supported state terrorism against the Palestinians and black South Africans, and now we are indignant because the stuff we have done overseas is now brought right back to our own front yards. America's chickens are coming home to roost." [Sept., 2001]

"Racism is how this country was founded and how this country is still run!...We [in the U.S.] believe in white supremacy and black inferiority and believe it more than we believe in God." "Hillary is married to Bill, and Bill has been good to us. No he ain't! Bill did us, just like he did Monica Lewinsky. He was riding dirty."

"The Israelis have illegally occupied Palestinian territories for over 40 years now. Divestment has now hit the table again as a strategy to wake the business community and wake up Americans concerning the injustice and the racism under which the Palestinians have lived because of Zionism."

The above are famous quotes by Rev. Jeremiah Wright, who for 20 years was Barack Obama's pastor— until Wright became politically inconvenient.

A Wright sermon called "The Audacity to Hope" inspired Barack Obama's remarks at the 2004 Democratic Convention and provided the title of Obama's second book.

Obama's response? "I didn't know about all these statements. I knew about one or two of these statements that had been made."

3. Bill Ayers

Bill Ayers was one of the leaders of the Weather Underground, a group that bombed the Pentagon and police stations. Ayers remains convinced that he "didn't do enough" during his bombing days.

Barack Obama worked with Bill Ayers for years. Obama was hired by Ayers. Obama helped Ayers distribute millions of dollars to many radical recipients. Ayers held one of the first fund-raisers for Barack Obama's Illinois state senate race.

When news of Obama's association and friendship with Ayers surfaced. The Obama responses were disingenuous.

"Just one of the thousands of people I know."

"Just some guy from the neighborhood."

Obama has lied repeatedly about his relationship with the unrepentant domestic terrorist. He spent years working for Ayers, promoting Ayers' causes. Even CNN won't buy the Obama line any longer. —CNN: Obama's lying about William Ayers

Obama's latest responses to the issue of Bill Ayers?

"When he went he certainly didn't know the history [of Ayers' domestic terrorism]." —chief Obama strategist David Axelrod to CNN—arguing for the first time since the story surfaced early this year that Obama was unaware of Ayers' past.

There have been other instances of Barack Obama pleading ignorance about unpleasant information once its reported (Father Michael Pflieger, for one). Which may lead some to affectionately refer to Barack Obama as "Senator I-Didn't-Know." On his release of medical, college and university records, Obama's answer is silence. When speaking of the future and his plans, Obama's rhetoric is precise. On information unearthed about his past, his response has many times been, "I didn't know."

20081103-02	12:20	SteveB	Re: "The Standard Obama Response: 'I Didn't Know'"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveM,

This is the lowest quality one yet, Stevie Boy!

And what do all these lies matter?

One man is smart and mature enough for the job, the other is...well...not!

One man is going to defeat the other in a landslide tomorrow, the other is...well, finally going to have to shut his lying mouth and go how to his however many houses and count his money and lament about how he lost even though he's a "hero" and the other guy was black! LOL!

20081104-01	07:17	SteveB	"If Obama Had Campaigned Like McCain..." [defense]
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Keith at his best...

"If Obama Had Campaigned Like McCain..." by Keith Olbermann, MSNBC

Nov. 3, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/27522443/ns/msnbc_tv-countdown_with_keith_olbermann/t/if-obama-had-campaigned-mccain/)

If Obama had campaigned like McCain...

Olbermann: The Democratic candidate would not have fared well.

I ask you to imagine an alternative universe where the candidates are the same, but what each has said and done, has been reversed. What would be happening tonight if Sen. Obama had stumbled, over everything from arcane details, to sweeping policies of the utmost importance, and not just once or twice, but endlessly? What if Sen. Obama couldn't tell Iran from Iraq? Iraq from Afghanistan? Sunni from Shi'a? Somalia from Sudan? What if Sen. Obama had gotten up before a crowd and started off by saying:

OBAMA: You know, I think you may have noticed that Sen. McCain's supporters have been saying some pretty nasty things about Western Pennsylvania lately.

And finished by saying,

OBAMA: I could not agree more. I could not disagree with him more. But I could not agree more with the explanation Sen. McCain offered a few weeks ago.

What would we be asking ourselves about his capabilities, if it had been Sen. Obama who had identified Gen. David Petraeus as the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff? And Vladimir Putin as the President of Germany? And Spain as a country in Latin America?

What if it had been Sen. Obama who not only used his POW experience at every turn, but wrote of giving to his captors, not the names of his fellow servicemen, but of the offensive line of the Green Bay Packers football team, only to, when he spoke in Western Pennsylvania, change the story so that he gave to his captors, the names of the offensive line of the Pittsburgh Steelers football team?

What if it had been Sen. Obama who, out of nowhere, had blurted out an inexplicable, perhaps Freudian, slip, while intending to say "My Fellow Americans?"

OBAMA: To Chairman Dean and the Senior Senator from Illinois Dick Durbin, and to my fellow prisoners I accept your nomination for president of the United States.

And what would be happening tonight in the minds of tens of millions of voters if it had been Sen. Obama who had his people negotiate, behind the scenes and off the record, to force favorable coverage of his campaign at three television networks?

Or if it had been Sen. Obama repeatedly mocking a research study on the DNA of bear until he was suddenly reminded he had voted for it?

Or if Sen. Obama had an advisor who claimed that Sen. Obama's work on a sub-committee had led to the invention of the blackberry?

Or if Sen. Obama had tried to get one of the presidential debates postponed or cancelled...and threatened to boycott another one, the Town Hall, because he didn't like the network the moderator worked for, all the while complaining that the other guy wouldn't debate him or agree to ten Town Halls.

What would be happening tonight in the souls of a nation, if after all that, at the first debate, it had been Sen. Obama who would not as much as look at Sen. McCain, and then finally addressed him, at the second one, in a weird and cryptic manner?

OBAMA: If we could have intervened in the Holocaust, who among us would say that we have a moral obligation not to go in? That one.

What would a country heading into the most important vote in its modern history be thinking tonight, if it had been Sen. Obama who viewed a collapsing economy and insisted that if in office, he would fire the head of the SEC (even though a president cannot) and then the next day tried to correct himself by calling on the head of the FEC to resign?

What if it had been Sen. Obama who, on Sept. 24th, had after having insisted that there was little wrong?

OBAMA: The truth is, the fundamentals of the economy are strong. We are just suffering from a mental recession, you nation of whiners.

Where would America's collective head be tonight, if it had been, in the middle of a campaign in part focused on elitism and celebrity and personal wealth, Sen. Obama who couldn't remember, or wouldn't admit, how many houses he owned?

QUESTION: How many houses do you have?

OBAMA: Uh, you know I think that's a good question to address to my staff...ah ah ah, I mean, you'd have to ask my staff.

What if Sen. Obama had deflected all serious questions about the troubled finances of a worried nation, by virtually concocting a preposterous every-man, a fictional character, a plumber without a license, a small businessman who owned no business, an average Joe who had a lawyer, a book agent, a publicist, and maybe a recording contract?

OBAMA: I would love to see the next three weeks devoted to talking about Joe the Plumber who is an American hero.

MCCAIN: No, he's not.

OBAMA: Yes, he is.

What would the national psyche be like tonight if it had been Sen. Obama who had sung a mocking song about "bombing Iran?"

What would be happening if Sen. Obama had accepted the endorsement of Pastor John Hagee, or Pastor Rod Parsley, or had a running mate who attributed their big break in politics to the laying on of hands by a minister who began his career in Kenya by slandering a woman as a "witch" and hounding her out of her home?

What would we be thinking if it had been Sen. Obama who, at a critical moment, exaggerated a public claim about the "suspension" of his campaign, and lied to a national television figure about it? And what if it had been Sen. Obama who had been somehow nominated by his party, months and months ago, even though it had been he who had not reproached the use of the rankest of sexist terms, in public, about Sen. Hillary Clinton?

OBAMA: Let's go to this lady here.

LADY: How do we beat the b*tch? That's why I have that stick!

We all know exactly what would be happening tonight if Sen. Obama had made all those mistakes, contradictions, gaffes, Freudian slips, and hypocritical pronouncements. He would have long since ceased to be taken seriously by any measurable part of the voting public, as a viable, responsible, self-aware, mentally vigorous, non-dangerous, non-risk.

We'd all be going home to our beds well before midnight tomorrow night. But while all that is hypothetical, this is not: This cascade of incompetence and irresponsibility I have enumerated tonight, all the sound bites, all the foot-in-mouth moments, all the no-brainers gone-wrong—all these, John McCain has said.

No hyperbole and no hypotheses are required. This is who John McCain has showed us he is.

20081105-01	08:55	SteveB	"Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Goodbye, Joe the Plumber, nice not knowin' ya!

"Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election" by Daniel Gross, Slate

Nov. 4, 2008, (http://www.slate.com/articles/business/moneybox/2008/11/sept_24_2008.html)

For Bill Clinton in 1992, it was the economy, stupid. For John McCain in 2008, it was the stupid economy. Exit polls showed that 62 percent of the electorate said the economy was the most important issue.

But when, precisely, did John McCain lose the narrative on the economy? Was it last July, when economic adviser Phil Gramm, discussing the "mental recession," noted that "we've sort of become a nation of whiners"? Perhaps it was back in Dec. 2007, when McCain said, "The issue of economics is not something I've understood as well as I should." Or was McCain's economic goose cooked long before the campaigns started? Ray Fair, the Yale professor who plugs macroeconomic data into an election-predicting model, said that "since Nov., 2006, the model has consistently been predicting that the Democratic candidate would get about 52 percent of the two-party vote."

McCain managed to give Obama a run for the money through mid-September. The polls began to turn (decisively, it turns out) against him when the global financial system suffered a run on the money. And with the acuity bestowed by six weeks of hindsight, I think it's possible to pinpoint three dates—Sept. 15, Sept. 24, and Oct. 15—that mark crucial turning points in the campaign.

On Sept. 15, Lehman Bros., having failed to convince the government it was worthy of a bailout, filed for bankruptcy. The same day, McCain proclaimed: "I think, still, the fundamentals of our economy are strong." A twin killer. Lehman's failure triggered a ferocious and unpredictable series of events—the freezing of money-market funds, a global credit seizure—that made it clear that 1) the fundamentals of our economy were anything but strong and 2) volatility was here to stay. McCain's ill-timed line, a longtime presidential staple, showed he had no intuitive feel for how to talk about the economy at large or about the crisis at hand.

On Sept. 24, as talks about a Washington bailout intensified, McCain announced he would suspend his campaign and fly to Washington. The theory: McCain would put country first, force Obama off the campaign trail, forge a bipartisan compromise, and alter the dynamics of the race. But McCain didn't have a game plan to triangulate effectively between the Republican gentry (the Bush administration, Wall Street, corporate America), who ardently demanded a bailout, and the pitchfork-toting peasants (House Republicans), who opposed it. He ended up leaving town and resuming campaigning without an agreement in place.

While McCain seemed detached, Obama caucused with financial graybeards and kept his campaign plane on the tarmac to get updates from his new speed-dialing buddy, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson. Self-serving? You betcha. But doggone successful. And the passage of the bailout bill, which McCain grudgingly supported, neutered the increasingly ideological economic warfare McCain waged in the closing weeks. At a time when the Bush administration was nationalizing big portions of the (grateful) financial services sector, charges that Obama was a socialist, the redistributor-in-chief, the second coming of Eugene V. Debs, failed to gain traction.

The third fatal date? Oct. 15, when the third debate took place. Throughout the fall, Obama had rounded up financial icons such as former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker and Warren Buffett to serve as surrogates. They could reassure Wall Street and Main Street that Obama could steer the nation through treacherous financial waters. Rather than enlist a respected businessperson such as Mitt Romney or former eBay CEO Meg Whitman as his chief economic surrogate, McCain turned to an unlicensed plumber from Ohio. McCain mentioned "Joe the Plumber" seven times in the Oct. 15 debate. In the ensuing weeks, McCain routinely trotted out Samuel J. Wurzelbacher's economic folk wisdom as gospel.

Warren the Investor and Paul the Central Banker vs. Joe the Plumber was never going to be much of a fair fight. Given the macroeconomic backdrop of recent years and the microeconomic disasters of recent weeks, neither was the presidential campaign, which is why Obama has won the White House.

20081105-02 11:47 Dennis Re: "Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election"

Dear SteveB,

Congratulations on helping me deliver Indiana! I know at least a couple of my relatives voted for Obama.

"Life is not measured by the number of breaths we take, but by the moments that take our breath away."

—George Carlin

20081105-03 12:54 Charlie "Living History"

Reading this through happy tears.

Hope you find this as inspiring as I (and the person who forwarded it to me) are. Of all I've read so far today about last night's victory... this is the best.

"Living History" by Anna Quindlen, Newsweek

Nov 17, 2008, (<http://www.highbeam.com/doc/1G1-188748506.html>)

(Occasionally America turns out to be every bit as good as its hype. It's thrilling to be around to witness one of those moments.)

The American Museum of Natural History threw a spectacular party on New Year's Eve 1999, but perhaps the millennium really arrived there just a few weeks ago. A group of New York City schoolchildren were at an event marking the 150th birthday of Theodore Roosevelt, naturalist and president, and at the end of the visit one of the kids raised his hand.

"I have a question," he said. "Was he black?"

History will record that on Nov. 4, 2008, Barack Hussein Obama was elected the first black president of the United States. It is impossible to overstate what that means to this nation.

America is as much a concept as it is a country, but it is a concept too often honored in the breach. The Statue of Liberty welcomes with the words "Give me your tired, your poor." Yet generation after generation of immigrants arrived here to face contempt and hatred until the passage of time, the flattening of accents, turned them into tolerated natives. The Declaration of Independence states unequivocally that all men are created equal. Yet for years the politicians and the powerful seemed to take the gender of that noun literally and denied all manner of rights to women.

But no injustice or prejudice brought to bear by this country against its own people can compare with how it has treated black men and women. Humiliation, degradation, lynchings, beatings, murders. The rights the United States pretended to confer upon all were unthinkingly and consistently denied them: the right to the franchise, to representation, to protection by the justice system.

Literal ownership gave way to something not so different: "When we are moved to better our lot," Richard Wright wrote in 1941, "we do not ask ourselves 'can we do it?' but 'will they let us do it?'" Henry Louis Gates Jr., in the memoir "Colored People," says simply, "For most of my childhood, we couldn't eat in restaurants or sleep in hotels, we couldn't use certain bathrooms or try on clothes in stores." Alice Walker left home for college on a bus and was ordered to move after a white woman complained that she was too near the front.

None of this was so very long ago.

Time passed. Things changed. John Lewis, a boy who loved books but was not permitted to enter the public library, a man whose skull was fractured by Alabama state troopers when he led a peaceful march across a bridge, now sits in Congress. Gates is a professor at Harvard, Walker a revered writer. Segregation as a matter of law has given way to segregation as a matter of class and custom. As President-elect Obama said when he gave a speech about race earlier this year, speaking of systemic poverty, bad schools and broken families, "Many of the disparities that exist in the African-American community today can be directly traced to inequalities passed on from an earlier generation that suffered under the brutal legacy of slavery and Jim Crow."

But Obama said something else in that speech, something both simpler and more profound that has special resonance now that his improbable candidacy has prevailed. He made the political spiritual. "In the end, then," he said, "what is called for is nothing more, and nothing less, than what all the world's great religions demand—that we do unto others as we would have them do unto us." He asked the American people to be fair and just, to be kind and generous, to put prejudice behind them and be one people because that is, not a legal or social imperative, but a moral one.

There will be learned discussion in the years to come about the specific meaning of this moment, about whether it will be more symbolic than substantive, about whether having a black president will lull Americans into believing that racism is a thing of the past. But for just a moment consider this small fact: for a long time a black man in many parts of the United States was denied even the honorific "Mister" by the white community, and was instead called by his first name, like a child, no matter how elderly and esteemed he might be.

Now a black man will be called Mr. President.

They never thought they would see the day, people said, especially the older ones, who could remember the murders of Martin Luther King Jr., Medgar Evers and Malcolm X. They wept, some of them, and so did I. Perhaps it was because this man seems so young and vigorous in a nation that seems old and tired. Perhaps it is because he promises change and hope, and both are so badly needed. He is the president for our children's generation, a more tolerant and diverse society, so insensible of bright dividing lines that one of them would idly wonder whether Theodore Roosevelt was a black man. They belie a time when there was a crayon labeled "flesh" in my Crayola box, a crayon that was a pale pink.

But I suspect that, like many others, I wept for myself, too, because I felt I was part of a country that was living its principles. Despite all our prejudices, seen and hidden, millions of citizens managed, in the words of Dr. King, to judge Barack Obama by the content of his character and not the color of his skin. There were many reasons to elect him president, but this was one collateral gift: to be able to watch America look an old evil in the eye and to say, no more. We must be better than that. We can be better than that. We are better than that.

20081106-01	08:33	SteveB	"Rifts Divided McCain, Palin Camps"
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------------

And these fools were going to unite the U.S. and solve our problems? LOL!

My favorite quote from today's article is this:

"If you can't run a campaign, how are you going to run the country?"

"Rifts Divided McCain, Palin Camps" by Elisabeth Bumiller, New York Times

Nov. 6, 2008, (<http://tipggita32.wordpress.com/2008/11/06/nyt-rifts-divided-mccain-palin-camps/>)

(Republican's running mate appeared to have been catalyst for infighting.)

(PHOENIX) As a top adviser in Senator John McCain's now-imploded campaign tells the story, it was bad enough that Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska unwittingly scheduled, and then took, a prank telephone call from a Canadian comedian posing as the president of France. Far worse, the adviser said, she failed to inform her ticketmate about her rogue diplomacy.

As a senior adviser in the Palin campaign tells the story, the charge is absurd. The call had been on Ms. Palin's schedule for three days and she should not have been faulted if the McCain campaign was too clueless to notice.

Whatever the truth, one thing is certain. Ms. Palin, who laughingly told the prankster that she could be president "maybe in eight years," was the catalyst for a civil war between her campaign and Mr. McCain's that raged from mid-September up until moments before Mr. McCain's concession speech on Tuesday night. By then, Ms. Palin was in only infrequent contact with Mr. McCain, top advisers said.

"I think it was a difficult relationship," said one top McCain campaign official, who, like almost all others interviewed, asked to remain anonymous. "McCain talked to her occasionally."

But Mr. McCain's advisers also described him as admiring of Ms. Palin's political skills. He was aware of the infighting, they said, but it is unclear how much he was inclined or able to stop it.

The tensions and their increasingly public airing provide a revealing coda to the ill-fated McCain-Palin ticket, hinting at the mounting turmoil of a campaign that was described even by many Republicans as incoherent, negative and badly run.

For her part, Ms. Palin told reporters in Arizona on Wednesday morning that "there is absolutely no diva in me."

Later in the day, she refused to address the strife within the campaigns. "I have absolutely no intention of engaging in any of the negativity because this has been all positive for me," she said, adding that it was time to savor President-elect Barack Obama's victory and "not let the pettiness or maybe internal workings of a campaign erode any of the recognition of this historic moment."

As the ticketmate with a potentially brighter political future, Ms. Palin has more at stake going forward than Mr. McCain, whose aides now have an interest in blaming outside factors for their loss, making Ms. Palin a tempting target. And even as the votes from the election were still being counted, there were new recriminations, with Mr. McCain's aides suggesting that a Palin aide had leaked damaging information about them to reporters. The tensions were described in interviews with top aides to the two campaigns who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as disloyal to Mr. McCain's effort at a difficult time.

Finger-pointing at the end of a losing campaign is traditional and to a large degree predictable, as Mr. McCain himself acknowledged in a prescient interview in July. "Every book I've read about a campaign is that the one that won, it was a perfect and beautifully run campaign with geniuses running it and incredible messaging, etcetera," Mr. McCain said then. "And always the one that lost, 'Oh, completely screwed up, too much infighting, bad people, etcetera.' So if I win, I believe that historians will say, 'Way to go, he fine-tuned that campaign, and he got the right people in the right place and as the campaign grew, he gave them more responsibility.' If I lose," people will say, "That campaign, always in disarray."

The disputes between the campaigns centered in large part on the Republican National Committee's $150,000 wardrobe for Ms. Palin and her family, but also on what McCain advisers considered Ms. Palin's lack of preparation for her disastrous interview with Katie Couric of CBS News and her refusal to take advice from Mr. McCain's campaign.

But behind those episodes may be a greater subtext: anger within the McCain camp that Ms. Palin harbored political ambitions beyond 2008.

As late as Tuesday night, a McCain adviser said, Ms. Palin was pushing to deliver her own speech just before Mr. McCain's concession speech, even though vice-presidential nominees do not traditionally speak on election night. But Ms. Palin met up with Mr. McCain with text in hand. She was told no by Mark Salter, one of Mr. McCain's closest advisers, and Steve Schmidt, Mr. McCain's top strategist.

On Wednesday, two top McCain campaign advisers said that the clothing purchases for Ms. Palin and her family were a particular source of outrage for them. As they portrayed it, Ms. Palin had been advised by Nicolle Wallace, a senior McCain aide, that she should buy three new suits for the Republican National Convention in St. Paul in September and three additional suits for the fall campaign. The budget for the clothes was anticipated to be from $20,000 to $25,000, the officials said.

Instead, in a public relations debacle undermining Ms. Palin's image as an everywoman "hockey mom," bills came in to the Republican National Committee for about $150,000, including charges of $75,062 at Neiman Marcus and $49,425 at Saks Fifth Avenue. The bills included clothing for Ms. Palin's family and purchases of shoes, luggage and jewelry, the advisers said.

The advisers described the McCain campaign as incredulous about the shopping spree and said Republican National Committee lawyers were likely to go to Alaska to conduct an inventory and try to account for all that was spent.

Ms. Palin has defended her wardrobe as the idea of the Republican National Committee and said that she would give it back.

"Those clothes, they are not my property," she said. "Just like the lighting and the staging and everything else that the R.N.C. purchased."

Advisers in the McCain campaign, in suggesting that Palin advisers had been leaking damaging information about the McCain campaign to the news media, said they were particularly suspicious of Randy Scheunemann, Mr. McCain's top foreign policy aide who had a central role in preparing Ms. Palin for the vice-presidential debate.

As a result, two senior members of the McCain campaign said on Wednesday that Mr. Scheunemann had been fired from the campaign in its final days. But Rick Davis, the McCain campaign manager, and Mr. Salter, one of Mr. McCain's closest advisers, said Wednesday that Mr. Scheunemann had in fact not been dismissed. Mr. Scheunemann, who picked up the phone in his office at McCain campaign headquarters on Wednesday afternoon, responded that "anybody who says I was fired is either lying or delusional or a whack job."

Mr. Scheunemann was referring to widely disseminated criticism by Mr. McCain's advisers in the final days of the campaign that Ms. Palin, as first reported in Politico, was a "whack job."

Whatever the permutations, the advisers said they strongly believed that Mr. Scheunemann was disclosing, as one put it, "a constant stream of poison" to William Kristol, the editor of the conservative Weekly Standard and a columnist for The New York Times.

Mr. Kristol, who wrote a column on Oct. 13 calling on Mr. McCain to fire his campaign because it was "close to being out-and-out dysfunctional," said in a telephone interview on Wednesday that the campaign advisers were paranoid. Mr. Kristol has been a strong supporter of Ms. Palin.

"I wasn't writing poison," Mr. Kristol said. He added: "Randy Scheunemann is a friend of mine and I think he did a good job. I talked to him, but I talked to a lot of people at the campaign."

The McCain camp was further upset about Ms. Palin's interview with Ms. Couric, which was broadcast at a time when Ms. Palin was meeting with foreign leaders at the United Nations and trying to establish some foreign policy credentials. Ms. Palin's wobbly and tongue-tied performance was mocked in an iconic impersonation on "Saturday Night Live" by Tina Fey.

Ms. Palin, who had prepared for and survived an initial interview with Charles Gibson of ABC News, did not have the time or focus to prepare for Ms. Couric, the McCain advisers said. "She did not say, 'I will not prepare,'" a McCain adviser said. "She just didn't have a bandwidth to do a mock interview session the way we had prepared before. She was just overloaded."

One of the last straws for the McCain advisers came just days before the election when news broke that Ms. Palin had taken a call made by Marc-Antoine Audette. Mr. Audette and his fellow comedian Sebastien Trudel are notorious for prank calls to celebrities and heads of state.

Ms. Palin appeared to believe that she was talking to President Nicolas Sarkozy of France, even though the prankster had a flamboyant French accent and spoke to her in a more personal way than would be protocol in such a call. At one point, he told Ms. Palin that she would make a good president some day. "Maybe in eight years," she replied.

Julie Bosman and Michael Cooper contributed reporting.

Copyright © 2008 The New York Times

20081108-01	08:55	SteveB	Re: "Sept. 24, 2008: The Day John McCain Lost the Election"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dennis,

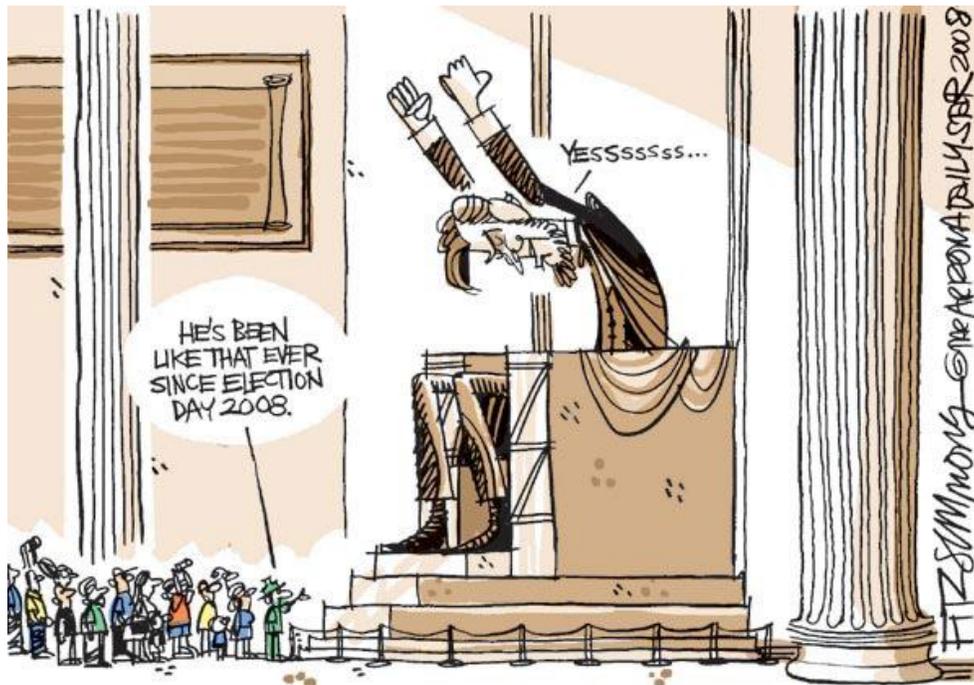

Hey, I worked on 'em! Good job there in Michigan and Indiana! We almost pulled-out Montana here. Montana is very conservative in a good way, but that tends to also make it conservative in a bad way sometimes. I guess they're a little like Alaska in that regard, huh?

Now, instead of trying to protect ourselves against the excesses of the Republicans, we'll have to start doing the same with the Democrats.

The nation has more serious problems than probably at any time in our lives. We baby boomers were handed the world, f*cked it up, and handed it off to the next generation. Ain't we slick? (That may be a bit of an oversimplification, but anything to highlight the truth.)

We have the right guy at the top, I think, but it's sure gonna be a long, hard road.

20081110-01 12:45 Ben Cartoon: Emancipation Proclamation, Part II

20081111-01 10:31 SteveM Re: Cartoon: Emancipation Proclamation, Part II

[In response to cartoon, above, I forwarded to SteveM from Ben. —SteveB]

Dear SteveB,

Wrong again. Once again your lack of research (along with cartoonist and the original sender) and your lack of knowledge of history past and current has let you down. (See below.)

Secondly, Obama's not a descendant of slaves, nor was his WHITE mother, nor his African-Arabic Father. And neither were his grandparents who raised him! Perhaps Lincoln's raised arms in the Cartoon you sent below, are a justification of Lincoln's strongly held beliefs, that it takes a white women to raise a politely acceptable black leader and that Jesse Jackson's tears on election night were his own realization of that fact! And that Jesse's enabling the victimization mentality of his constituency has and continues to the wrong way to social and politically integrate the races.

I expect better from you.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Abraham Lincoln, as cited in The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, Roy Basler, ed. 1953 New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press:

I will say, then, that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races—that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races from living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

Many Americans think of Abraham Lincoln, above all, as the president who freed the slaves. Immortalized as the "Great Emancipator," he is widely regarded as a champion of black freedom who supported social equality of the races, and who fought the American Civil War (1861-1865) to free the slaves.

While it is true that Lincoln regarded slavery as an evil and harmful institution, it also true, as this paper will show, that he shared the conviction of most Americans of his time, and of many prominent statesmen before and after him, that blacks could not be assimilated into white society. He rejected the notion of social equality of the races, and held to the view that blacks should be resettled abroad. As President, he supported projects to remove blacks from the United States.

On Aug. 14, 1862, Lincoln received a deputation of free Negroes at the White House to which he said, "But for your race there could not be war... It is better for us both, therefore, to be separated". He advocated colonization in Central America and promised them help in carrying out the project.

"What I would most desire would be the separation of the white and black races." From a speech in Springfield, IL, July 17, 1858

"Such separation ... must be effected by colonization ... to transfer the African to his native clime, and we shall find a way to do it, however great the task may be." —from a speech delivered in Springfield, IL, June 26, 1857.

20081111-02	11:57	SteveM	"White Guilt Is Dead"
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

"White Guilt Is Dead" by Tom Adkins, Philadelphia Inquirer

Nov. 11, 2008 (<http://www.freerepublic.com/focus/f-news/2130168/posts>)

Look at my fellow conservatives! There they go, glumly shuffling along, depressed by the election aftermath.

Not me. I'm virtually euphoric. Don't get me wrong. I'm not thrilled with America 's flirtation with neo-socialism.. But there's a massive silver lining in those magical clouds that lofted Barak Obama to the Presidency. For today, without a shred of intellectually legitimate opposition, I can loudly proclaim to America:

The Era of White Guilt is over.

This seemingly impossible event occurred because the vast majority of white Americans didn't give a fluff about skin color, and enthusiastically pulled the voting lever for a black man. Not just any black man. A very liberal black man who spent his early career race-hustling banks, praying in a racist church for 20 years, and actively worked with America-hating domestic terrorists. Wow! Some resume! Yet they made Barak Obama their leader.

Therefore, as of Nov 4th, 2008, white guilt is dead.

For over a century, the millstone of white guilt hung around our necks, retribution for slave-owning predecessors. In the 60s, American liberals began yanking that millstone while sticking a fork in the eye of black Americans, exacerbating the racial divide to extort a socialist solution. But if a black man can become President, exactly what significant barrier is left? The election of Barak Obama absolutely destroys the entire validation of liberal white guilt. The dragon is hereby slain.

So today, I'm feeling a little uppity, if you will. From this day forward, my tolerance level for having my skin color hustled is now exactly ZERO.. And it's time to clean house. No more Reverend Wright's God Damn America , Al Sharpton's Church of Perpetual Victimization , or Jesse Jackson's rainbow racism.

Cornell West? You're a fraud. Go home. All those black studies programs that taught kids to hate whitey? You must now thank Whitey. And I want that on the final. Congressional Black Caucus? Irrelevant. Maxine Waters? Shut up. ACORN? Outlawed. Black Panthers? Go home and pet your kitty. Black separatists? Find another nation that offers better dreams. Go ahead. I'm waiting.

Gangsta rappers? Start praising America . Begin with the Pledge of Allegiance. And please no more Ebonics. Speak English, and who knows where you might end up? Oh, yeah, pull up your pants. Your underwear is showing. You look stupid.

To those Eurosnots who forged entire careers hating America? I'm still waiting for the first black French President.

And let me offer an equal opportunity whooping. I've always despised lazy white people. Now, I can talk smack about lazy black people. You're poor because you quit school, did drugs, had three kids with three different fathers, and refuse to work. So when you plop your Colt 45-swilling, Oprah watching butt on the couch and complain Da Man is keeping me down, allow me to inform you: Da Man is now black. You have no excuses.

No more quotas. No more handouts. No more stealing my money because someone's great-great-great-great grandparents suffered actual pain and misery at the hands of people I have no relation to, and personally revile.

It's time to toss that massive, obsolete race-hustle machine upon the heap of the other stupid 60s ideas. Drag it over there, by wife swapping, next to dope smoking. Plenty of room right between free love and cop-killing. Careful don't trip on streaking. There ya go, don't be gentle. Just dump it. Wash your hands. It's filthy.

In fact, Obama's ascension created a gargantuan irony. How can you sell class envy and American unfairness when you and your black wife went to Ivy League schools, got high-paying jobs, became millionaires, bought a mansion, and got elected President? How unfair is that??? Now, like a delicious O'Henry tale, Obama's spread-the-wealth campaign rendered itself moot by its own victory! America is officially a meritocracy. Obama's election has validated American conservatism!

So, listen carefully Wham!!!

That's the sound of my foot kicking the door shut on the era of white guilt. The rites have been muttered, the carcass lowered, dirt shoveled, and tombstone erected. White guilt is dead and buried.

However, despite my glee, there's apparently one small, rabid bastion of American racism remaining. Black Americans voted 96% for Barak Obama. Hmmm. In a color-blind world, shouldn't that be 50-50. Tonight, every black person should ask forgiveness for their apparent racism and prejudice towards white people. Maybe it's time to start spreading the guilt around.

Tom Adkins is the publisher of CommonConservative.com, 610-888-7970.

20081111-03	16:17	SteveB	Re: Cartoon: Emancipation Proclamation, Part II
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveM,

You don't get it! We are all the descendents of slaves of one type or another (royalty excluded)...you just have to go back further in some people's family trees than in others. And nobody's saying that it makes any difference at all, at this point in time. Slavery is not the problem, social injustice is, whether the victim is black or Hispanic or white.

Racial problems are the smallest problems, by far, that America is facing right now, in my opinion. In fact, we seem to be kind of overcoming them a little (duh...don't we have a...oh my God, black President?). I don't consider race to be any kind of issue at all. Maybe, what? 10th or 12th on the list? 20th?

Dear SteveM,

This is pure trash, not worth the paper it's written on. Come to think of it, it isn't written on paper, or anything.

All the more reason why it isn't worth even as much as the cost of the paper it's written on. $0.00

Despite this, I'm still optimistic. Guardedly so.

"America the Illiterate" by Chris Hedges, TruthDig

Nov. 10, 2008, (http://www.truthdig.com/report/page2/20081110_america_the_illiterate/)

We live in two Americas. One America, now the minority, functions in a print-based, literate world. It can cope with complexity and has the intellectual tools to separate illusion from truth. The other America, which constitutes the majority, exists in a non-reality-based belief system. This America, dependent on skillfully manipulated images for information, has severed itself from the literate, print-based culture.

It cannot differentiate between lies and truth. It is informed by simplistic, childish narratives and clichés. It is thrown into confusion by ambiguity, nuance and self-reflection. This divide, more than race, class or gender, more than rural or urban, believer or nonbeliever, red state or blue state, has split the country into radically distinct, unbridgeable and antagonistic entities.

There are over 42 million American adults, 20 percent of whom hold high school diplomas, who cannot read, as well as the 50 million who read at a fourth- or fifth-grade level. Nearly a third of the nation's population is illiterate or barely literate. And their numbers are growing by an estimated 2 million a year. But even those who are supposedly literate retreat in huge numbers into this image-based existence. A third of high school graduates, along with 42 percent of college graduates, never read a book after they finish school. Eighty percent of the families in the United States last year did not buy a book.

The illiterate rarely vote, and when they do vote they do so without the ability to make decisions based on textual information. American political campaigns, which have learned to speak in the comforting epistemology of images, eschew real ideas and policy for cheap slogans and reassuring personal narratives. Political propaganda now masquerades as ideology. Political campaigns have become an experience. They do not require cognitive or self-critical skills. They are designed to ignite pseudo-religious feelings of euphoria, empowerment and collective salvation.

Campaigns that succeed are carefully constructed psychological instruments that manipulate fickle public moods, emotions and impulses, many of which are subliminal. They create a public ecstasy that annuls individuality and fosters a state of mindlessness. They thrust us into an eternal present. They cater to a nation that now lives in a state of permanent amnesia.

It is style and story, not content or history or reality, which inform our politics and our lives. We prefer happy illusions. And it works because so much of the American electorate, including those who should know better, blindly cast ballots for slogans, smiles, the cheerful family tableaux, narratives and the perceived sincerity and the attractiveness of candidates. We confuse how we feel with knowledge.

The illiterate and semi-literate, once the campaigns are over, remain powerless. They still cannot protect their children from dysfunctional public schools. They still cannot understand predatory loan deals, the intricacies of mortgage papers, credit card agreements and equity lines of credit that drive them into foreclosures and bankruptcies. They still struggle with the most basic chores of daily life from reading instructions on medicine bottles to filling out bank forms, car loan documents and unemployment benefit and insurance papers.

They watch helplessly and without comprehension as hundreds of thousands of jobs are shed. They are hostages to brands. Brands come with images and slogans. Images and slogans are all they understand. Many eat at fast food restaurants not only because it is cheap but because they can order from pictures rather than menus. And those who serve them, also semi-literate or illiterate, punch in orders on cash registers whose keys are marked with symbols and pictures. This is our brave new world.

Political leaders in our post-literate society no longer need to be competent, sincere or honest. They only need to appear to have these qualities. Most of all they need a story, a narrative. The reality of the narrative is irrelevant. It can be completely at odds with the facts. The consistency and emotional appeal of the story are paramount. The most essential skill in political theater and the consumer culture is artifice. Those who are best at artifice succeed. Those who have not mastered the art of artifice fail.

In an age of images and entertainment, in an age of instant emotional gratification, we do not seek or want honesty. We ask to be indulged and entertained by clichés, stereotypes and mythic narratives that tell us we can be whomever we want to be, that we live in the greatest country on Earth, that we are endowed with superior moral and physical qualities and that our glorious future is preordained, either because of our attributes as Americans or because we are blessed by God or both.

The ability to magnify these simple and childish lies, to repeat them and have surrogates repeat them in endless loops of news cycles, gives these lies the aura of an uncontested truth. We are repeatedly fed words or phrases like /yes we can/, /maverick/, /change/, /pro-life/, /hope/ or /war on terror./ It feels good not to think. All we have to do is visualize what we want, believe in ourselves and summon those hidden inner resources, whether divine or national, that make the world conform to our desires. Reality is never an impediment to our advancement.

The Princeton Review analyzed the transcripts of the Gore-Bush debates, the Clinton-Bush-Perot debates of 1992, the Kennedy-Nixon debates of 1960 and the Lincoln-Douglas debates of 1858. It reviewed these transcripts using a standard vocabulary test that indicates the minimum educational standard needed for a reader to grasp the text. During the 2000 debates George W. Bush spoke at a sixth-grade level (6.7) and Al Gore at a seventh-grade level (7.6). In the 1992 debates Bill Clinton spoke at a seventh-grade level (7.6), while George H.W. Bush spoke at a sixth-grade level (6.8), as did H. Ross Perot (6.3). In the debates between John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon the candidates spoke in language used by 10th-graders. In the debates of Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas the scores were respectively 11.2 and 12.0. In short, today's political rhetoric is designed to be comprehensible to a 10-year-old child or an adult with a sixth-grade reading level. It is fitted to this level of comprehension because most Americans speak, think and are entertained at this level. This is why serious film and theater and other serious artistic expression, as well as newspapers and books, are being pushed to the margins of American society. Voltaire was the most famous man of the 18th century. Today the most famous "person" is Mickey Mouse.

In our post-literate world, because ideas are inaccessible, there is a need for constant stimulus. News, political debate, theater, art and books are judged not on the power of their ideas but on their ability to entertain. Cultural products that force us to examine ourselves and our society are condemned as elitist and impenetrable. Hannah Arendt (<http://www.iep.utm.edu/a/arendt.htm>) warned that the marketization of culture leads to its degradation, that this marketization creates a new celebrity class of intellectuals who, although well read and informed themselves, see their role in society as persuading the masses that "Hamlet" can be as entertaining as "The Lion King" and perhaps as educational.

"Culture," she wrote, "is being destroyed in order to yield entertainment. There are many great authors of the past who have survived centuries of oblivion and neglect, but it is still an open question whether they will be able to survive an entertaining version of what they have to say."

The change from a print-based to an image-based society has transformed our nation. Huge segments of our population, especially those who live in the embrace of the Christian right and the consumer culture, are completely unmoored from reality. They lack the capacity to search for truth and cope rationally with our mounting social and economic ills. They seek clarity, entertainment and order. They are willing to use force to impose this clarity on others, especially those who do not speak as they speak and think as they think. All the traditional tools of democracies, including dispassionate scientific and historical truth, facts, news and rational debate, are useless instruments in a world that lacks the capacity to use them.

As we descend into a devastating economic crisis, one that Barack Obama cannot halt, there will be tens of millions of Americans who will be ruthlessly thrust aside. As their houses are foreclosed, as their jobs are lost, as they are forced to declare bankruptcy and watch their communities collapse, they will retreat even further into irrational fantasy. They will be led toward glittering and self-destructive illusions by our modern Pied Pipers, our corporate advertisers, our charlatan preachers, our television news celebrities, our self-help gurus, our entertainment industry and our political demagogues who will offer increasingly absurd forms of escapism.

The core values of our open society, the ability to think for oneself, to draw independent conclusions, to express dissent when judgment and common sense indicate something is wrong, to be self-critical, to challenge authority, to understand historical facts, to separate truth from lies, to advocate for change and to acknowledge that there are other views, different ways of being, that are morally and socially acceptable, are dying. Obama used hundreds of millions of dollars in campaign funds to appeal to and manipulate this illiteracy and irrationalism to his advantage, but these forces will prove to be his most deadly nemesis once they collide with the awful reality that awaits us.

Copyright © 2008, Truthdig, L.L.C.

(Chris Hedges is a leading writer on the subjects of religion, war and empire. His critically acclaimed books, such as "American Fascists," can be found here (<http://www.truthdig.com/bazaar/author/70>). Hedges' Truthdig column appears every Monday.)

"The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding."—Justice Louis Brandeis

20081114-01	13:34	Charlie	"The New Liberal Order"
-------------	-------	---------	-------------------------

The road ahead... Wow. Deep stuff.

A number of friends have suggested that I (and maybe a group) collect some of the emailed articles (and our discussions on them) into a blog somewhere. It would be difficult to do with copyrighted material (such as I assume this piece is) but it would be a fascinating and interesting collection.

Nov. 13, 2008, ...as seen by Peter Beinart, usually of The New Republic but writing here for Time. I too have thought of the odd but exhilarating symmetry involving Chicago's Grant Park at opposite ends of a dramatic, traumatic arc in the country's political culture. What a difference 40 years makes! Plenty of great historical context here for rumination—and ACTION.

"The New Liberal Order" by Peter Beinart, TIME

Nov. 13, 2008, (<http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,1858873,00.html>)

The death and rebirth of American liberalism both began with flags in Grant Park. On Aug. 28, 1968, 10,000 people gathered there to protest the Democratic Convention taking place a few blocks away, which was about to nominate Lyndon Johnson's Vice President, Hubert Humphrey, thus implicitly ratifying the hated Vietnam War. Chicago mayor Richard Daley had warned the protesters not to disrupt his city and denied them permits to assemble, but they came anyway. All afternoon, the protesters chanted and the police hovered, until about 3:30, when someone climbed a flagpole and began lowering the American flag.

Police went to arrest the offender and were pelted with eggs, chunks of concrete and balloons filled with paint and urine. The police responded by charging into the crowd, clubbing bystanders and yelling "Kill! Kill!" in what one report later termed a "police riot." Across the country, Americans watching on television gave their verdict: Serves the damn hippies right. Democrats, who had won seven of the previous nine presidential elections, went on to lose seven of the next 10.

Forty years later, happy liberals mobbed Grant Park, invited by another mayor named Richard Daley, to celebrate Barack Obama's election. This time the flags flew proudly at full mast, and the police were there to protect the crowd, not threaten it. Once again, Americans watched on television, and this time they didn't seethe. They wept.

The distance between those two Grant Park scenes says a lot about how American liberalism fell, and why in the Obama era it could become—once again—America's ruling creed. The coalition that carried Obama to victory is every bit as sturdy as America's last two dominant political coalitions: the ones that elected Franklin Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan. And the Obama majority is sturdy for one overriding reason: liberalism, which average Americans once associated with upheaval, now promises stability instead.

The Search for Order

In America, political majorities live or die at the intersection of two public yearnings: for freedom and for order. A century ago, in the Progressive Era, modern American liberalism was born, in historian Robert Wiebe's words, as a "search for order." America's giant industrial monopolies, the progressives believed, were turning capitalism into a jungle, a wild and lawless place where only the strong and savage survived. By the time Roosevelt took office during the Great Depression, the entire ecosystem appeared to be in a death spiral, with Americans crying out for government to take control. F.D.R. did—juicing the economy with unprecedented amounts of government cash, creating new protections for the unemployed and the elderly, and imposing rules for how industry was to behave. Conservatives wailed that economic freedom was under assault, but most ordinary Americans thanked God that Washington was securing their bank deposits, helping labor unions boost their wages, giving them a pension when they retired and pumping money into the economy to make sure it never fell into depression again. They didn't feel unfree; they felt secure. For three and a half decades, from the mid-1930s through the '60s, government imposed order on the market.

The jungle of American capitalism became a well-tended garden, a safe and pleasant place for ordinary folks to stroll. Americans responded by voting for F.D.R.-style liberalism—which even most Republican politicians came to accept—in election after election.

By the beginning of the 1960s, though, liberalism was becoming a victim of its own success. The post-World War II economic boom flooded America's colleges with the children of a rising middle class, and it was those children, who had never experienced life on an economic knife-edge, who began to question the status quo, the tidy, orderly society F.D.R. had built. For blacks in the South, they noted, order meant racial apartheid. For many women, it meant confinement to the home. For everyone, it meant stifling conformity, a society suffocated by rules about how people should dress, pray, imbibe and love. In 1962, Students for a Democratic Society spoke for what would become a new, baby-boom generation "bred in at least modest comfort," which wanted less order and more freedom. And it was this movement for racial, sexual and cultural liberation that bled into the movement against Vietnam and assembled in Aug., 1968 in Grant Park.

Traditional liberalism died there because Americans—who had once associated it with order—came to associate it with disorder instead. For a vast swath of the white working class, racial freedom came to mean riots and crime; sexual freedom came to mean divorce; and cultural freedom came to mean disrespect for family, church and flag. Richard Nixon and later Reagan won the presidency by promising a new order: not economic but cultural, not the taming of the market but the taming of the street.

The Receding Right

Flash forward to the evening of Nov. 4, and you can see why liberalism has sprung back to life. Ideologically, the crowds who assembled to hear Obama on election night were linear descendants of those egg throwers four decades before. They too believe in racial equality, gay rights, feminism, civil liberties and people's right to follow their own star.

But 40 years later, those ideas no longer seem disorderly. Crime is down and riots nonexistent; feminism is so mainstream that even Sarah Palin embraces the term; Chicago mayor Richard Daley, son of the man who told police to bash heads, marches in gay-rights parades. Culturally, liberalism isn't that scary anymore. Younger Americans—who voted overwhelmingly for Obama—largely embrace the legacy of the '60s, and yet they constitute one of the most obedient, least rebellious generations in memory. The culture war is ending because cultural freedom and cultural order—the two forces that faced off in Chicago in 1968—have turned out to be reconcilable after all.

The disorder that panics Americans now is not cultural but economic. If liberalism collapsed in the 1960s because its bid for cultural freedom became associated with cultural disorder, conservatism has collapsed today because its bid for economic freedom has become associated with economic disorder. When Reagan took power in 1981, he vowed to restore the economic liberty that a half-century of F.D.R.-style government intrusion had stifled. American capitalism had become so thoroughly domesticated, he argued, that it lost its capacity for dynamic growth.

For a time, a majority of Americans agreed. Taxes and regulations were cut and cut again, and for the most part, the economic pie grew. In the 1980s and '90s, the garden of American capitalism became a pretty energetic place. But it became a scarier place too. In the newly deregulated American economy, fewer people had job security or fixed-benefit pensions or reliable health care. Some got rich, but a lot went bankrupt, mostly because of health-care costs. As Yale University political scientist Jacob Hacker has noted, Americans today experience far-more-violent swings in household income than did their parents a generation ago.

Starting in the 1990s, average Americans began deciding that the conservative economic agenda was a bit like the liberal cultural agenda of the 1960s: less liberating than frightening. When the Gingrich Republicans tried to slash Medicare, the public turned on them en masse. A decade later, when George W. Bush tried to partially privatize Social Security, Americans rebelled once again. In 2005 a Pew Research Center survey identified a new group of voters that it called "pro-government conservatives." They were culturally conservative and hawkish on foreign policy, and they overwhelmingly supported Bush in 2004. But by large majorities, they endorsed government regulation and government spending. They didn't want to unleash the free market; they wanted to rein it in. Those voters were a time bomb in the Republican coalition, which detonated on Nov. 4. John McCain's promises to cut taxes, cut spending and get government out of the way left them cold. Among the almost half of voters who said they were "very worried" that the economic crisis would hurt their family, Obama beat McCain by 26 points.

The public mood on economics today is a lot like the public mood on culture 40 years ago: Americans want government to impose law and order—to keep their 401(k)s from going down, to keep their health-care premiums from going up, to keep their jobs from going overseas—and they don't much care whose heads Washington has to bash to do it.

Seizing the Moment

That is both Obama's great challenge and his great opportunity. If he can do what F.D.R. did—make American capitalism more stable and less savage—he will establish a Democratic majority that dominates U.S. politics for a generation. And despite the daunting problems he inherits, he's got an excellent chance. For one thing, taking aggressive action to stimulate the economy, regulate the financial industry and shore up the American welfare state won't divide his political coalition; it will divide the other side. On domestic economics, Democrats up and down the class ladder mostly agree. Even among Democratic Party economists, the divide that existed during the Clinton years between deficit hawks like Robert Rubin and free spenders like Robert Reich has largely evaporated, as everyone has embraced a bigger government role. Today it's Republicans who—though more unified on cultural issues—are split badly between upscale business types who want government out of the way and pro-government conservatives who want Washington's help. If Obama moves forcefully to restore economic order, the Wall Street Journal will squawk about creeping socialism, as it did in F.D.R.'s day, but many downscale Republicans will cheer. It's these working-class Reagan Democrats who could become tomorrow's Obama Republicans—a key component of a new liberal majority—if he alleviates their economic fears.

Obama doesn't have to turn the economy around overnight. After all, Roosevelt hadn't ended the Depression by 1936. Obama just needs modest economic improvement by the time he starts running for re-election and an image as someone relentlessly focused on fixing America's economic woes. In allocating his time in his first months as President, he should remember what voters told exit pollsters they cared about most—63% said the economy. (No other issue even exceeded 10%.)

In politics, crisis often brings opportunity. If Obama restores some measure of economic order, kick-starting U.S. capitalism and softening its hard edges, and if he develops the kind of personal rapport with ordinary Americans that F.D.R. and Reagan had—and he has the communication skills to do it—liberals will probably hold sway in Washington until Sasha and Malia have kids. As that happens, the arguments that have framed economic debate in recent times—for large upper-income tax cuts or the partial privatization of Social Security and Medicare—will fade into irrelevance. In an era of liberal hegemony, they will seem as archaic as defending the welfare system became when conservatives were on top.

A New Consensus

There are fault lines in the Obama coalition, to be sure. In a two-party system, it's impossible to construct a majority without bringing together people who disagree on big things. But Obama's majority is at least as cohesive as Reagan's or F.D.R.'s. The cultural issues that have long divided Democrats—gay marriage, gun control, abortion—are receding in importance as a post-'60s generation grows to adulthood. Foreign policy doesn't divide Democrats as bitterly as it used to either because, in the wake of Iraq, once-hawkish working-class whites have grown more skeptical of military force. In 2004, 22% of voters told exit pollsters that "moral values" were their top priority, and 19% said terrorism. This year terrorism got 9%, and no social issues even made the list.

The biggest potential land mine in the Obama coalition isn't the culture war or foreign policy; it's nationalism. On a range of issues, from global warming to immigration to trade to torture, college-educated liberals want to integrate more deeply America's economy, society and values with the rest of the world's. They want to make it easier for people and goods to legally cross America's borders, and they want global rules that govern how much America can pollute the atmosphere and how it conducts the war on terrorism. They believe that ceding some sovereignty is essential to making America prosperous, decent and safe.

When it comes to free trade, immigration and multilateralism, though, downscale Democrats are more skeptical. In the future, the old struggle between freedom and order may play itself out on a global scale, as liberal internationalists try to establish new rules for a more interconnected planet and working-class nationalists protest that foreign bureaucrats threaten America's freedom.

But that's in the future. If Obama begins restoring order to the economy, Democrats will reap the rewards for a long time. Forty years ago, liberalism looked like the problem in a nation spinning out of control. Today a new version of it may be the solution. It's a very different day in Grant Park.

(Beinart is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.)

20081116-01 06:03 Bob Re: You Really Need to Do Some Research!

Hey Steve, Dennis, and all my new friends!

Sorry all I have not been in touch for awhile. It has been because as I told you before I live in the Congo, and I don't know how much news you have seen, but here all the n*ggers are killing each other and with any luck maybe they will kill 50% or more, well we could only be so lucky!!! Anyway just goes to show you and just wait soon al the n*ggers will be in tribal warfare in the good ole U.S. soon.

Well you guys did it congratulations!!!

Actually I heard the other day Obama came out and admitted that he was not going to be able to fix the economy like he had promised, but he does still think he will be able to n*gger-rig it!!!

But really we need to thank all of you for voting for Obama. However, I look at my fellow conservatives! There they go, glumly shuffling along, depressed by the election aftermath. But not me!!!! I'm virtually euphoric.

Don't get me wrong. I'm not thrilled with America's flirtation with neo-socialism. But there's a massive silver lining in those magical clouds that lofted Barack Obama to the Presidency. For today, without a shred of intellectually legitimate opposition, I can loudly proclaim to America: The Era of White Guilt is over.

This seemingly impossible event occurred because the vast majority of white Americans didn't give a fluff about skin color, and enthusiastically pulled the voting lever for a black man. Not just any black man. A very liberal black man who spent his early career race hustling banks, praying in a racist church for 20 years, and actively worked with America hating domestic terrorists. Wow! Some resume! Yet they made Barack Obama their leader. Therefore, as of Nov. 4th, 2008, white guilt is dead.

For over a century, the millstone of white guilt hung around our necks, retribution for slave-owning predecessors. In the 60s, American liberals began yanking that millstone while sticking a fork in the eye of black Americans, exacerbating the racial divide to extort a socialist solution. But if a black man can become President, exactly what significant barrier is left? The election of Barack Obama absolutely destroys the entire validation of liberal white guilt. The dragon is hereby slain.

So today, I'm feeling a little "uppity," if you will. From this day forward, my tolerance level for having my skin color hustled is now exactly ZERO. And it's time to clean house. No more Reverend Wright's "God Damn America," Al Sharpton's Church of Perpetual Victimization, or Jesse Jackson's rainbow racism. Cornell West? You're a fraud. Go home. All those "black studies" programs that taught kids to hate whitey? You must now thank Whitey. And I want that on the final.

Congressional Black Caucus? Irrelevant. Maxine Waters? Shut up. ACORN? Outlawed. Black Panthers? Go home and pet your kitty. Black separatists? Find another nation that offers better dreams. Go ahead. I'm waiting.

Gangsta rappers? Start praising America. Begin with the Pledge of Allegiance. And please, no more Ebonics. Speak English, and who knows where you might end up? Oh, yeah, pull up your pants. Your underwear is showing. You look stupid.

Black Fraternities? Seek diversity. Race Card? It's now the joker. Miss Black America? Get in line with all the other lovely ladies. Reparations? Paid.

To those Eurosnots who forged entire careers hating America? I'm still waiting for the first black French President.

And let me offer an equal opportunity whooping. I've always despised lazy white people. Now, I can talk smack about lazy black people. You're poor because you quit school, did drugs, had three kids with three different fathers, and refuse to work. So when you plop your Colt 45-swilling, Oprah-watchin' butt on the couch and complain "Da Man is keepin' me down!!!" allow me to inform you: Da Man is now black. You have no excuses.

No more quotas. No more handouts. No more stealing my money because someone's great-great-great-great grandparents suffered actual pain and misery at the hands of people I have no relation to, and personally revile.

It's time to toss that massive, obsolete race-hustle machine upon the heap of the other stupid 60s ideas. Drag it over there, by wife swapping, next to dope-smoking. Plenty of room right between free love and cop-killing. Careful, don't trip on streaking. There ya go, don't be gentle. Just dump it. Wash your hands. It's filthy.

In fact, Obama's ascension created a gargantuan irony. How can you sell class envy and American unfairness when you and your black wife went to Ivy League schools, got high paying jobs, became millionaires, bought a mansion, and got elected President? How unfair is that??? Now, Like a delicious O'Henry tale, Obama's spread-the-wealth campaign rendered itself moot by its own victory! America is officially a meritocracy. Obama's election has validated American conservatism!

So, listen carefully ... "Wham!!!"

That's the sound of my foot kicking the door shut on the era of white guilt. The rites have been muttered, the carcass lowered, dirt shoveled, and tombstone erected. White guilt is dead and buried.

However, despite my glee, there's apparently one small, rabid bastion of American racism remaining. Black Americans voted 96% for Barack Obama. Hmmm. In a color-blind world, shouldn't that be 50-50? Tonight, every black person should ask forgiveness for their apparent racism and prejudice towards white people. Maybe it's time to start spreading that guilt around.

While the technician is more important than the technology it is good to remember that a 9mm might expand but a .45 won't shrink.

All the loving best to you stupid n*gger-rag head loving mother f*ckers, and when you are all eating dirt cookies and everybody is living like Africans don't go blaming the Republicans like you stupid f*cks always do!!!!

PS: Black Hurricanes.....

Well, it appears our African-American friends have found yet something else to be pi*sed about. A black congresswoman (this would be Sheila Jackson Lee, of Houston), reportedly complained that the names of hurricanes are all Caucasian sounding names.

She would prefer some names that reflect African-American culture such as Chamiqua, Tanisha, Woeisha, Shaqueal, and Jamal. I am NOT making this up! She would also like the weather reports to be broad cast in 'language' that street people can understand because one of the problems that happened in New Orleans was that black people couldn't understand the seriousness of the situation, due to the racially biased language of the weather report.

I guess if the weather person says that the winds are going to blow at 140+ MPH, that's too hard to understand. I can hear it now: A weatherman in New Orleans says... Wazzup, mutha-fukkas! Hehr-icane Chamiqua be headin' fo' yo a*s like Leroy on a crotch rocket! B*tch be a category fo'! So, turn off dem chitlin's, grab yo' chirren, leave yo crib, and head fo' de nearest FEMA office fo yo FREE sh*t!

20081116-02 06:37 India First Hologram on CNN

Dear SteveB,

According to David Bohm, the universe is a holographic projection. Right now I am reading The Holographic Universe by Michael Talbot and fascinated by the subject. Then yesterday, CNN did the first holographic transmission ever! A new step for humanity!

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0SIS2ZwkWDg>

20081117-01 09:58 Bill "The Wild Wordsmith of Wasilla"

"The Wild Wordsmith of Wasilla" by Dick Cavett, New York Times

Nov. 14, 2008, (<http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/11/14/the-wild-wordsmith-of-wasilla/>)

Electronic devices dislike me. There is never a day when something isn't ailing. Three out of these five implements—answering machine, fax machine, printer, phone and electric can-opener—all dropped dead on me in the past few days.

Now something has gone wrong with all three television sets. They will only get Sarah Palin.

I can play a kind of Alaskan roulette. Any random channel clicked on by the remote brings up that eager face, with its continuing assaults on the English language.

There she is with Larry and Matt and just about everyone else but Dr. Phil (so far). If she is not yet on "Judge Judy," I suspect it can't be for lack of trying.

What have we done to deserve this, this media blitz that the astute Andrea Mitchell has labeled "The Victory Tour"? I suppose it will be recorded as among political history's ironies that Palin was brought in to help John McCain. I can't blame feminists who might draw amusement from the fact that a woman managed to both cripple the male she was supposed to help while gleaning an almost Elvis-sized following for herself. Mac loses, Sarah wins big-time was the gist of headlines.

I feel a little sorry for John. He aimed low and missed.

What will ambitious politicians learn from this? That frayed syntax, bungled grammar and run-on sentences that ramble on long after thought has given out completely are a candidate's valuable traits?

And how much more of all that lies in our future if God points her to those open-a-crack doors she refers to? The ones she resolves to splinter and bulldoze her way through upon glimpsing the opportunities, revealed from on high.

What on earth are our underpaid teachers, laboring in the vineyards of education, supposed to tell students about the following sentence, committed by the serial syntax-killer from Wasilla High and gleaned by my colleague Maureen Dowd for preservation for those who ask, "How was it she talked?"

My concern has been the atrocities there in Darfur and the relevance to me with that issue as we spoke about Africa and some of the countries there that were kind of the people succumbing to the dictators and the corruption of some collapsed governments on the continent, the relevance was Alaska's investment in Darfur with some of our permanent fund dollars.

And, she concluded, "Never, ever did I talk about, well, gee, is it a country or a continent, I just don't know about this issue."

It's admittedly a rare gift to produce a paragraph in which whole clumps of words could be removed without noticeably affecting the sense, if any.

(A cynic might wonder if Wasilla High School's English and geography departments are draped in black.)

(How many contradictory and lying answers about The Empress's New Clothes have you collected? I've got, so far, only four. Your additional ones welcome.)

Matt Lauer asked her about her daughter's pregnancy and what went into the decision about how to handle it. Her "answer" did not contain the words "daughter," "pregnancy," "what to do about it" or, in fact, any two consecutive words related to Lauer's query.

I saw this as a brief clip, so I don't know whether Lauer recovered sufficiently to follow up, or could only sit there, covered in disbelief. If it happens again, Matt, I bequeath you what I heard myself say once to an elusive guest who stiffed me that way: "Were you able to hear any part of my question?"

At the risk of offending, well, you, for example, I worry about just what it is her hollering fans see in her that makes her the ideal choice to deal with the world's problems: collapsed economies, global warming, hostile enemies and our current and far-flung twin battlefronts, either of which may prove to be the world's second "30 Years' War."

Has there been a poll to see if the Sarah-ites are numbered among that baffling 26 percent of our population who, despite everything, still maintain that President George has done a heckuva job?

A woman in one of Palin's crowds praised her for being "a mom like me ... who thinks the way I do" and added, for ill measure, "That's what I want in the White House." Fine, but in what capacity?

Do this lady's like-minded folk wonder how, say, Jefferson, Lincoln, the Roosevelts, et al (add your own favorites) managed so well without being soccer moms? Without being whizzes in the kitchen, whipping up moose soufflés? Without executing and wounding wolves from the air and without promoting that sad, threadbare hoax—sexual abstinence—as the answer to the sizzling loins of the young?

(In passing, has anyone observed that hunting animals with high-powered guns could only be defined as sport if both sides were equally armed?)

I'd love to hear what you think has caused such an alarming number of our fellow Americans to fall into the Sarah Swoon.

Could the willingness to crown one who seems to have no first language have anything to do with the oft-lamented fact that we seem to be alone among nations in having made the word "intellectual" an insult? (And yet...and yet...we did elect Obama. Surely not despite his brains.)

Sorry about all of the foregoing, as if you didn't get enough of the lady every day in every medium but smoke signals. I do not wish her ill. But I also don't wish us ill. I hope she continues to find happiness in Alaska.

May I confess that upon first seeing her, I liked her looks? With the sound off, she presents a not uncomely frontal appearance.

But now, as the Brits say, "I'll be glad to see the back of her."

20081119-01	22:21	Dick	Fw: "A Letter to My Employees"
-------------	-------	------	--------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com knows nothing. See: <http://www.rense.com/general84/letter.htm>] — SteveB]

To All My Valued Employees:

There have been some rumblings around the office about the future of this company, and more specifically, your job. As you know, the economy has changed for the worse and presents many challenges. However, the good news is this: The economy doesn't pose a threat to your job. What does threaten your job however, is the changing political landscape in this country.

Of course, as your employer, I am forbidden to tell you whom to vote for—it is against the law to discriminate based on political affiliation, race, creed, religion, etc. Please vote who you think will serve your interests the best.

However, let me tell you some little tidbits of fact which might help you decide what is in your best interests. First, while it is easy to spew rhetoric that casts employers against employees, you have to understand that for every business owner there is a back story. This back story is often neglected and overshadowed by what you see and hear. Sure, you see me park my Mercedes outside. You've seen my big home at last year's Christmas party. I'm sure; all these flashy icons of luxury conjure up some idealized thoughts about my life.

However, what you don't see is the back story. I started this company 12 years ago. At that time, I lived in a 300 square foot studio apartment for 3 years. My entire living apartment was converted into an office so I could put forth 100% effort into building a company, which by the way, would eventually employ you.

My diet consisted of Ramen Pride noodles because every dollar I spent went back into this company. I drove a rusty Toyota Corolla with a defective transmission. I didn't have time to date. Often times, I stayed home on weekends, while my friends went out drinking and partying. In fact, I was married to my business—hard work, discipline, and sacrifice.

Meanwhile, my friends got jobs. They worked 40 hours a week and made a modest $50K a year and spent every dime they earned. They drove flashy cars and lived in expensive homes and wore fancy designer clothes. Instead of hitting the Nordstrom's for the latest hot fashion item, I was trolling through the Goodwill store extracting any clothing item that didn't look like it was birthed in the 70's. My friends refinanced their mortgages and lived a life of luxury. I, however, did not. I put my time, my money, and my life into a business with a vision that eventually, some day, I too, will be able to afford these luxuries my friends supposedly had.

So, while you physically arrive at the office at 9am, mentally check in at about noon, and then leave at 5pm, I don't. There is no "off" button for me. When you leave the office, you are done and you have a weekend all to yourself. I unfortunately do not have the freedom. I eat, sh*t, and breathe this company every minute of the day.

There is no rest. There is no weekend. There is no happy hour. Every day this business is attached to my hip like a 1 year old special-needs child. You, of course, only see the fruits of that garden—the nice house, the Mercedes, the vacations... you never realize the back story and the sacrifices I've made.

Now, the economy is falling apart and I, the guy that made all the right decisions and saved his money, have to bail-out all the people who didn't. The people that overspent their paychecks suddenly feel entitled to the same luxuries that I earned and sacrificed a decade of my life for.

Yes, business ownership has its benefits but the price I've paid is steep and without wounds. Unfortunately, the cost of running this business, and employing you, is starting to eclipse the threshold of marginal benefit and let me tell you why: I am being taxed to death and the government thinks I don't pay enough. I have state taxes. Federal taxes. Property taxes. Sales and use taxes. Payroll taxes. Workers compensation taxes. Unemployment taxes. Taxes on taxes. I have to hire a tax man to manage all these taxes and then guess what? I have to pay taxes for employing him.

[I have an idea for you, Mr. Businessman. Why don't you simply pass those taxes on to your customers in the price of your product or service? Your competitors face the same business environment, hence the same taxes. As to your allegations of problems with "uncertainty", I say you are a pu*sy. —SteveB]

Government mandates and regulations and all the accounting that goes with it, now occupy most of my time. [Ridiculous! —SteveB] On Oct 15th, I wrote a check to the U.S. Treasury for $288,000 for quarterly taxes. You know what my "stimulus" check was? Zero. Nada. Zilch. [Because you're rich! The stimulus part is that poor people will spend the money and stimulate demand for goods and services like yours, dummy businessman. What a whiner! —SteveB]

The question I have is this: Who is stimulating the economy? Me, the guy who has provided 14 people good paying jobs and serves over 2,200,000 people per year with a flourishing business? Or, the single mother sitting at home pregnant with her fourth child waiting for her next welfare check? Obviously, government feels the latter is the economic stimulus of this country.

The fact is, if I deducted (Read: Stole) 50% of your paycheck you'd quit and you wouldn't work here. I mean, why should you? That's nuts. Who wants to get rewarded only 50% of their hard work? Well, I agree which is why your job is in jeopardy.

Here is what many of you don't understand ... to stimulate the economy you need to stimulate what runs the economy. Had suddenly government mandated to me that I didn't need to pay taxes, guess what? Instead of depositing that $288,000 into the Washington black-hole, I would have spent it, hired more employees, and generated substantial economic growth. My employees would have enjoyed the wealth of that tax cut in the form of promotions and better salaries. But you can forget it now.

[Sorry. It doesn't and can't ever work like that, sucker. —SteveB]

When you have a comatose man on the verge of death, you don't defibrillate and shock his thumb thinking that will bring him back to life, do you? Or, do you defibrillate his heart? Business is at the heart of America and always has been. To restart it, you must stimulate it, not kill it.

Suddenly, the power brokers in Washington believe the mud of America are the essential drivers of the American economic engine. Nothing could be further from the truth and this is the type of change you can keep.

So where am I going with all this?

It's quite simple. If any new taxes are levied on me, or my company, my reaction will be swift and simple. I fire you. I fire your co-workers. You can then plead with the government to pay for your mortgage, your SUV, and your child's future. Frankly, it isn't my problem anymore.

Then, I will close this company down, move to another country, and retire. You see, I'm done. I'm done with a country that penalizes the productive and gives to the unproductive. My motivation to work and to provide jobs will be destroyed, and with it, will be my citizenship.

While tax cuts to 95% of America sounds great on paper, don't forget the back story: If there is no job, there is no income to tax. A tax cut on zero dollars is zero So, when you make your decision to vote, ask yourself, who understands the economics of business ownership and who doesn't? Whose policies will endanger your job?

Answer those questions and you should know who might be the one capable of saving your job. While the media wants to tell you "It's the economy stupid" I'm telling you it isn't.

If you lose your job, it won't be at the hands of the economy; it will be at the hands of a political hurricane that swept through this country, steamrolled the constitution, and will have changed its landscape forever. If that happens, you can find me in the South Caribbean sitting on a beach, retired, and with no employees to worry about.

Signed, Your Boss

20081120-01	10:35	Paul	Re: "A Letter to My Employees"
-----------------------------	-------	------	--------------------------------

Dear Dick,

Great letter. Glad to hear from you: it had seemed the jokes had stopped there. We need to remember that it is businessmen and entrepreneurs that we all depend on for the prosperity of this country. But I still wonder when the reports keep appearing about financial service company managers, who were responsible for "securitizing" those dubious mortgages, were collecting hundreds of millions of dollars in bonuses and salaries while the value of everyone's investments was slashed by a third. And the CEOs of companies being driven into the ground, who chopped health benefits and pensions for retirees, impoverishing them and their families, still walk away with their multi-million-dollar salaries. (I have a client in that exact situation: a man who was well qualified for his job but who was replaced by a substantially younger man who hadn't even applied.) So it is the same old story: how do we fairly and correctly distinguish the meritorious, like the author of the letter, from those who certainly appear to be looting the system. Like I was taught in college, all generalities are false, including this one. Keep the good reading coming.

20081120-02	16:02	SteveM	"Not the End of the World"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------------------------

"Not the End of the World" posted by: Steven Den Beste in Weird World

Nov. 4, 2008, (http://chizumatic.mee.nu/not_the_end_of_the_world)

It's easy to let yourself go in despair and start thinking things like "This is the worst of all possible outcomes". But it isn't true. I think this election is going to be a "coming of age" moment for a lot of people. They say, "Be careful what you wish for" and a lot of people got their wish yesterday. And now they're bound to be disappointed. Not even Jesus could satisfy all the expectations of Obama's most vocal supporters, or fulfill all the promises Obama has made.

I think Obama is going to turn out to be the worst president since Carter, and for the same reason: good intentions do not guarantee good results. Idealists often stub their toes on the wayward rocks of reality, and fall on their faces. And the world doesn't respond to benign behavior benignly.

But there's another reason why: Obama has been hiding his light under a basket. A lot of people bought a pig in a poke today, and now they're going to find out what they bought. Obama isn't what most of them think he is. The intoxication of the cult will wear off, leaving a monumental hangover. And four years from now they'll be older and much wiser.

A lot of bad things are going to happen during this term. But I don't think that this is an irreversible catastrophe for the union. I've lived long enough to absorb this basic truth: the U.S. is too large and too strong to destroy in just 4 years. Or even in 8. We survived 6 years of Nixon. We survived 4 years of Carter. We even survived 8 years of Clinton, God alone knows how. [Errrr...and Bush? Not survived? —SteveB]

The President of the United States is the most powerful political figure in the world, but as national executives go his powers are actually quite restricted. Obama will become President, but he won't be dictator or king, let alone deity. He still has to work with the House and the Senate, and he still has to live within Constitutional restrictions, and with a judiciary that he mostly didn't appoint.

The main reason this will be a "coming of age" moment is that now Obama and the Democrats have to put up or shut up. Obama got elected by making himself a blank slate, with vapid promises about "hope" and "change"—but now he actually has to do something. Now he has to reveal his true agenda. And with the Democrats also having a majority in both chambers of Congress, now the Democrats really have to lead. And they're not going to do a very good job of it. It's going to be amusing to watch.

And the people who fell for the demagoguery will learn an invaluable lesson. Oh, the Democrats try to blame failure on Republican filibusters, of which there will be many. But that's always been a factor in our system, and many people believe it's an important check on government excess. The tradition in the Senate is that it is supposed to be a buffer against transient political fads, and the filibuster is a major part of that.

If the Democrats go all in, and change the filibuster rule, then they'll have truly seized the nettle with both hands and won't have any excuses any longer. That's why they won't do it. It's their last fig-leaf. But even with the filibuster rule in place, they'll be stuck trying to deliver now on all the promises implied, or inferred, during this election. The Republicans can only filibuster on bills the Democrats have already proposed.

And it ain't possible for the Democrats to deliver what's been promised. Gonna be a hell of a lot of disillusioned lefties out there. A lot of people who felt they were deceived. A lot of people who will eventually realize that the Obama campaign was something of a cult. Disillusionment will turn to a feeling of betrayal. And that will, in turn, convert to anger. In the mean time, Obama and Congressional Democrats will do things that cause harm, but very little of it will be irreversible. I would have enjoyed watching lefty heads explode if McCain had won. But we're going to see lefty heads exploding anyway; it's just going to take longer.

In the mean time, those of us who didn't want Obama to be president have to accept that he is. And let's not give in to the kind of paranoid fever dreams that have consumed the left for the last 8 years. Let us collectively take a vow tonight: no "Obama derangement syndrome". Obama is a politician. He isn't the devil incarnate.

So what are the good sides of what just happened?

1. It is no longer possible for anyone to deny that the MSM (Main Stream Media) is heavily biased. The MSM have been biased for decades but managed an illusion of fairness. That is no longer possible; the MSM have squandered their credibility during this campaign. They'll never get that credibility back again. [Seriously? — SteveB]

2. Since the Democrats got nearly everything they hoped for in this campaign, they'll have no excuses and will have to produce. They'll have to reveal their true agenda—or else make clear that they don't really have any beyond gaining power.
3. Every few decades the American people have to be reminded that peace only comes with strength. The next four years will be this generation's lesson.

Now, a few predictions for the next four years:

1. Obama's "hold out your hand to everyone" foreign policy is going to be a catastrophe. They'll love it in Europe. They're probably laughing their heads off about it in the middle east already.
2. The U.S. hasn't suffered a terrorist attack by al Qaeda since 9/11, but we'll get at least one during Obama's term.
3. We're going to lose in Afghanistan.
4. Iran will get nuclear weapons. There will be nuclear war between Iran and Israel. (This is the only irreversibly terrible thing I see upcoming, and it's very bad indeed.)
5. There will eventually be a press backlash against Obama which will make their treatment of Bush look mild. Partly that's going to be because Obama is going to disappoint them just as much as all his other supporters. Partly it will be the MSM desperately trying to regain its own credibility, by trying to show that they're not in his tank any longer. And because of that they are eventually going to do the reporting they should have done during this campaign, about Obama's less-than savory friends, and about voter fraud, and about illegal fund-raising, and about a lot of other things.
6. Obama will not be re-elected in 2012. He may even end up doing an LBJ and not even running again.

One last thing: I'm not saying I'm happy with this outcome. I would much rather have had McCain win. But this is not the end of the world, or the end of this nation. We've survived much worse. And now we need to show the lefties how to lose. Our mission for the next four years is to be in opposition without becoming deranged.

UPDATE: One other good thing: no one will be spinning grand conspiracy theories about this administration's Vice President being an evil, conniving genius who is the true power behind the throne. [What a nice compliment for Mr. Biden! —SteveB]

20081121-01	09:22	SteveB	Re: "A Letter to My Employees"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------

Dear Dick,

I think it is very interesting that so many people are using recent events to try to promote class war and other discarded ideas from the last century that really have nothing to do with the current situation.

The hell with this businessman who has seen his taxes drastically reduced, gotten rich, and then can do nothing, apparently, but b*tch about taxes and threaten his workers. Ridiculous! Where would his company be without the education provided by the government for his workers, or without the police and fire departments to protect them, or the domestic peace, government regulation, etc., etc. that must be paid for with these taxes. I guess he wants to eliminate all that? Especially the regulation, I bet. Ya, right, we have way too much regulation of business in this country—that's why we all got raped while regulators slept!!!!

This is not the time to panic simply because a progressive black man has been elected President. Let us be true Americans and give the guy at least as much chance as we gave that idiot Bush!!!!!!

BUY AMERICAN!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

20081121-02 22:41 Dick Re: "A Letter to My Employees"

Dear SteveB,

I agree with your summation. What are your thoughts about the Big Three bail-out ? One side of me says let's help because for every job lost ,ten more get affected thus causing a tsunami effect in job losses. The old saying that a fish rots from the head down is the way I would describe the CEO's. Paul, if our tax dollars go to this bail-out then we definitely need a change @ the top. The other side of me says let them go into Bankruptcy & restructure in a way that they will be leaner, more profitable & build better energy efficient cars. Let the Free-Market work. The UAW needs to look at themselves & the lucrative retirement packages that they negotiated that added to the demise of the Big Three. There needs to be compromise on both sides. To my other friend SteveB, I would like to hear your comments on this "ECONOMIC FUBAR".

20081124-01 10:04 SteveB Re: "Not the End of the World"

Dear SteveM,

Well, gee. I'm happy to read that you've decided to give the guy a chance to show what he can do in the next four years, despite the fact that you consider the current economic catastrophe to somehow be the fault of the man you think of as an incompetent, inexperienced, do-nothing, junior Senator from Illinois. I mean, "empty suit" from Chicago.

Jeez! If Obama could manage to do so much as such a big nothing like that...he must be mystically powerful!!!! No, just kidding, we all know that it was idiot Bush and his buddies who had their heads totally up their asses instead of competently running the country.

EVERYBODY knows who slept at the wheel for 8 years...oh, except maybe for that fighting terrorism thing, and that really hasn't turned out too well in most Americans' eyes.

You may try, BUT YOU WILL NEVER MANAGE TO CHANGE HISTORY ON WHO GOT US INTO THIS MESS, my Republican friend! AND which ideology!!!!

20081126-01 16:53 SteveM Re: "Not the End of the World"

Dear SteveB,

You don't listen very well do you? BHO now says that a balanced budget takes a back seat to fixing the economy. And the raise in the market can be partly attributed to him saying he is re-thinking raising taxes on the rich, at least until 2010, I guess he got the message. Poor people never gave anyone a job!

Now I just wonder why he's not sending the girls to public school, like the ones that he the self avowed communist Aires tried so hard the get money for in Chicago. Doesn't he trust the community organizers in DC. Surely the black folk there would hurt their own kind, would they? Show us the trust, BHO! Never mind, he's read police reports too.

Get some sun light

20081126-02 17:47 SteveB Re: "Not the End of the World"

Dear SteveM,

You'd better be careful...

If you're going to blame Obama for the fall in the stock markets (how laughable anyway since idiot Bush, the last time I looked, is still President and will be for way too much longer!)

You're going to have to give him credit when the markets rise (especially markedly, like this past week)!

I wish you'd just set aside your ideology and look at the practical facts of the reality we face, but you're still lost in the Republican/right-wing bucket of lies and slander, which is business as usual with them.

Just like you followed the party line that McCain was going to win the election. That should be a lesson to you on how full of lies they are and that is just the least of it. I told you the election would be a landslide. The people have spoken and any true American will listen and work to help implement solutions to our problems instead of, like Rush Limbaugh, et al, who are hell-bent on nothing but blind contrarianism.

And, have you noticed lately that, unlike all your ideologues like idiot Bush and his pals, practical, intelligent Obama has been talking about what we need...tax cuts and spending cuts and a balanced budget. Blind ideology leads to blind injustice...every time.

20081126-03 20:03 SteveM Fw: Would You Run?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Imagine this happening to you...

One Sunday morning during service, a 2,000-member congregation was surprised to see two men enter...

...both covered from head to toe in black and carrying submachine guns.

One of the men proclaimed: "Anyone willing to take a bullet for Christ remain where you are!"

Immediately, the choir fled...

The deacons fled...

And most of the congregation fled...

Out of the 2,000 there only remained 20.

The man who had spoken took off his hood. He then looked at the pastor and said, "OK, Pastor, I got rid of all the hypocrites..."

"...now you may begin your service. Have a nice day!"

And the two men turned and walked out.

[Then, as the 20 were excitedly patting each other on the back, complementing each other on the strength of their faith, the two men walked back into the church and slaughtered them all, because that's what bad men do and nothing makes any sense, so we much protect and nurture each other with our love. That's what religion is all about. Not impossibly attempting to comprehend how many hairs in God's gray beard. Not trying to employ the secret of... —SteveB]

20081127-01 09:46 SteveB Re: "Not the End of the World"

Dear SteveM,

Of course balancing the budget takes a back seat. It did for "conservative" Bush too didn't it!!!!!!!!!!!!!! I'm completely done with this conversation. You are the most unreasonable of all my correspondents. No logic at all. Thanks.

20081127-02 23:01 SteveB Re: Would You Run?

Dear SteveM,

COME ON!!!!!!!!!!!!!! I myself greatly question a lot of what the Bible has to say!!!!!! Don't you?????????

Mary a virgin? Resurrection? Son of God? Heaven and Hell. A snake in the Garden? The great punishing Flood! Jonah and the Whale, etc., etc. Ya, it sure sounds like an old Mideast religion, doesn't it?

Now, I believe in God and I believe in Christ as a great man who was somehow too stupid to pick a disciple who could fricking write, so that Jesus could pass on his insights free from the censorship and distortion introduced by the early church. At this point, who really knows what Christ had to say? Maybe God alone?

No one knows what is true and not true in the Bible. These Fundamentalists who claim to know the mind of God are evil liars. They don't know any more about God than you or me. And even if we could say that someone's church or some demigod who is the head of a church is completely right. Which one is it? LOL!

As your friend, let me recommend that you not throw your life away on this total bullsh*t. It doesn't suit you or become you. Please be a bad motorcycle dude and not a Jesus-loving evangelical! Religion will get you nowhere good except maybe into the panties of evangelical chicks. That doesn't sound like much fun to me.

20081128-01	21:20	SteveB	"Mysterious Super Battery to Power Electric Cars This Year"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

The Ultra capacitor.

"Mysterious Super Battery to Power Electric Cars This Year" by Adam Turner, iTWire

Jan. 24, 2007, (<http://www.itwire.com/science-news/energy/8884-mysterious-super-battery-to-power-electric-cars-this-year>)

Texas-based developer EEstor has been extremely secretive about its ceramic Energy Storage Unit (ESU), but has revealed that the ESU has entered mass production and is set to power Toronto-based ZENN Motors' electric cars this year.

Constructed from barium nitrate powder, the ESU offers up to 10 time the energy density of lead-acid batteries or 2.5 times that of lithium ion batteries. EEstor is on target to provide 15 kilowatt per hour batteries to ZENN this year, weighing less than 45 kg and in operating in environments as severe as minus 20 to plus 65 degrees Celsius. The battery will have ability to be recharged in "a matter of minutes," according to EEstor, and will not degrade due to being fully discharged or recharged.

The technology can scale up to 52 kWh, according to EEstor's patent papers, charging in the range of four to six minutes with sufficient cooling of the power cables and connections. The batteries are not "explosive, corrosive, or hazardous" and EEstor also anticipates they could be used to store energy from solar panels for residential, commercial, or industrial applications.

20081130-01	08:35	SteveB	The GOP: Hijacked by Evangelicals
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

Dear SteveM,

Your party and political movement (such as they are) have been co-opted—stolen by the Fundamentalists who want to throw away the Constitution, establish a state religion, and force all of us to "know" the Earth is 6000 years old, there is no evolution, and Jesus said abortion is a sin. Oh, and you'd better kiss Wednesday nights goodbye—one day a week ain't nearly enough for the Lord. Amen! (LOL, if it weren't so serious!)

Your party sold itself out to these people for votes and money...but it all got out of control, didn't it? They moved your party in a direction that has been a disaster for your party and our country, so, finally, the people voted even for a black man to get the GOP as completely out of power as possible.

The Evangelicals want to invade our privacy guaranteed by the above mentioned Constitution (which even their VP candidate doesn't bother to read!), and enter our bedrooms to make sure we don't have oral sex. They are convinced all of us "normal" people are evil and must be made to be like them...a bunch of prayin' pu*sies!

Believe me, I know these people and so do you. They are nothing but stupid, ignorant A*S-HOLES!!!! Your friends?

20081202-01 09:47 SteveB "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"

Dear SteveM,

The blame comes home to roost. "Sorry..." idiot Bush says.

YOUR SOCIALIST-REPUBLICAN PRESIDENT ADMITS HE F*CKED UP!!!!!! Gee...thanks for the apology, a-hole!

It looks suspiciously like Obama has been telling the truth, while McCain was lying out his *ss!

Ignorance—the only refuge of the ignorant!

"Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks" by Deb Riechmann, AP

Dec. 1, 2008,

\(http://www.boston.com/news/nation/washington/articles/2008/12/01/bush_im_sorry_the_economic_crisis_is_occurring_1228158335/\)

(WASHINGTON) President George W. Bush expressed remorse that the global financial crisis has cost jobs and harmed retirement accounts and said he'll back more government intervention if needed to ease the recession.

"I'm sorry it's happening, of course," Bush said in a wide-ranging interview with ABC's "World News," which was airing Monday. "Obviously I don't like the idea of people losing jobs, or being worried about their 401(k)s. On the other hand, the American people got to know that we will safeguard the system. I mean, we're in. And if we need to be in more, we will."

The U.S. economy fell into a recession in Dec., 2007, the National Bureau of Economic Research reported on Monday. Many economists believe the current downturn will last until the middle of 2009 and will be the most severe slump since the 1981-82 Recession. [Don't they mean...since the Great Depression???

On the war in Iraq, Bush said the biggest regret of his presidency was the "intelligence failure" regarding the extent of the Saddam Hussein threat to the United States. With the support of Congress, Bush ordered the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in Mar., 2003—a decision largely justified on grounds—later proved false—that Saddam was building weapons of mass destruction.

Asked if he would have ordered the U.S.-led invasion if intelligence reports had accurately indicated that Saddam did not have the weapons, Bush replied: "You know, that's an interesting question. That is a do-over that I can't do. It's hard for me to speculate."

During a discussion about what Americans should know about what it is like to be president, Bush was asked what he was most unprepared for going into the office.

"I think I was unprepared for war," he said. "In other words, I didn't campaign and say, 'Please vote for me, I'll be able to handle an attack.' In other words, I didn't anticipate war. Presidents — one of the things about the modern presidency is that the unexpected will happen."

On the presidential election, Bush called Barack Obama's victory a "repudiation of Republicans."

"I'm sure some people voted for Barack Obama because of me," said Bush, who leaves office with low approval ratings. "I think most people voted for Barack Obama because they decided they wanted him to be in their living room for the next four years explaining policy. In other words, they made a conscious choice to put him in as president."

As he leaves office, Bush said he felt responsible for the economic downturn because it's occurring on his watch, but he added: "I think when the history of this period is written, people will realize a lot of the decisions that were made on Wall Street took place over a decade or so" before he became president.

He said he would like to see "instant liquidity" in the markets given the extent of the financial rescue plan, yet he understands that fear has paralyzed the markets.

"It is hard for the average citizen to understand how frozen the system became and how over-leveraged the system became," Bush said. "And so what we're watching is the de-leveraging of our financial markets, which is obviously affecting the growth of the economy."

Last week, the Bush administration and the Federal Reserve pledged $800 billion to break through blockades on credit cards, auto loans, mortgages and other borrowing. The latest moves raised U.S. commitments to contain the financial crisis to nearly $7 trillion — though no one thinks the government will actually spend that much.

The figures include loans that are expected to be repaid, loan authorities to back mortgages, purchases of stock in banks, guarantees to support loans among banks and pledges backing other transactions.

"This economy will recover," Bush said in the interview conducted last Wednesday at the Camp David, Md., presidential retreat. "And when it recovers, many of the assets backed by the government now will be redeemed, and we will — could conceivably — make money off of some of the holdings."

Later in the interview, he said: "I can't guarantee that we'll get all our money back, but it's conceivable we could."

[HA! HA! HA! HA! HA! BOO-HOO! —SteveB]

20081202-02 14:55 SteveG Re: "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"

Dear SteveB,

I really do not understand W. He is such a jerk for 7.5 plus years and trying to make nice in the last month and say he is sorry, he was not prepared for war, the intelligence information was bad, etc. All the stuff he has been told for over 7 years and now he is sorry.

20081202-03 15:17 SteveB Re: "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"

Dear SteveG,

I think history will reveal that this was a dual-Presidency, at best. Idiot Bush was both too lazy and too stupid, I'm afraid, to effectively run the government himself. Dick Cheney will be revealed to be the dark president in hiding...manipulating the puppets from kind of behind the scenes. Instead of being on the alert to what could help or hurt the economy, as we paid and/or elected them to do, the administration went to sleep. Cheney did what his rich buddies asked. Bush did essentially what Cheney told him to do.

Of course Bush is surprised and sorry to learn that things fell apart during his watch. He's just as surprised to hear we're in crisis as McCain was and probably still is. No crisis for him, right?

What sad times in American history. I sure hope we can somehow manage to dig our way out. I have my doubts, but am willing to be temporarily optimistic. [Because I think Sarah Palin is going to ride into Washington in four years on a bull moose and save us! LOL!]

But instead of slapping a tax on gasoline to keep it stable at $4.00/gallon, Bush and Congress panicked because of their short-sightedness—only to the next election—and sold the store and started the largest social/economic experiment in history with their multitrillion dollar bailouts. Printing fake money. How far can that really get us? How can alternative energy projects be viable in a climate of wildly fluctuating, often dirt-cheap oil? Believe me, the oil price swings are no accident, but carefully choreographed—and I'm no conspiracy theorist!

BUY AMERICAN!!!!!! A NEW CORVETTE IF YOU POSSIBLY CAN!!!! PASS IT ON!

20081202-04 15:32 SteveB "An Interview with Paul O'Neill"

Dear SteveM,

... Irresponsible Ideology and the Mess We're In

A little deep, but well worth reading at this juncture...

If Bush is apologizing, and we all know the country is already down the tubes as much as any possible administration could send us (good luck keeping your Big 3!), how is it that the intelligence, ideology, and actions of the Republican administration and the Republican philosophy should not be brought into question—especially by Republicans, who were sold out the most?

Why don't you question it in light of all the current evidence, Steve? You have been betrayed by your own Right! Now who do you trust? Idiot Rush?

"An Interview with Paul O'Neill" from the companion book to I.O.U.S.A., Daily Reckoning

Oct. 30, 2008, (<http://dailyreckoning.com/an-interview-with-paul-oneill/>)

(Paul O'Neill says he enjoyed being the 72nd secretary of the U.S. Treasury (2001—2002), even though the job lasted only 23 months. O'Neill, who has been analyzing the U.S. budget since he went to Washington, served in the Bureau of the Budget, which later became the Office of Management and Budget in the White House.)

(O'Neill came to American government in 1961 as a management intern, and stayed for 16 years through the Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, and Ford administrations. The last 10 years of his tenure were spent at what was the Bureau of the Budget, which became the Office of Management and Budget. There he became deeply involved in the issues of fiscal policy, budget balance, budget making, and helping presidents choose priorities for how we spend the nation's money.)

(Then he moved to the private sector in 1977. In 2000, he was asked by President Bush 43 to come back to the government and be the Secretary of the Treasury, which he did for 23 months before he got fired for having a difference of opinion.)

Q: When you took over at Treasury, how would you characterize the financial health of the United States? Are you surprised at where we are today?

Paul O'Neill: When I moved into the Treasury as the 72nd secretary, what we inherited from the Clinton administration was an economy that had been rolling itself into a modest recession for a year and a half. By that time, the dot-com bubble had burst and the economy had slowed down, and we actually had some negative quarters that we didn't really know about until Clinton was gone and Bush 43 was in charge. But on the fiscal policy front we were in a condition where we had, for the first time in a long time, a budget that was in surplus.

I have to hasten to add that while it was in surplus, it was not in surplus on a federal funds basis. It was only in surplus because the trust funds were bringing in a lot of money and together, with federal funds and the trust funds, the Clinton administration was able to claim three years of budget surpluses, which we hadn't seen since 1969. That was a year where we were in budget surplus with the use of the trust funds. The last year I think that we were actually in surplus on a federal funds basis, without using trust fund money, was in 1960, so we'd been at this now for 47 years of basically living beyond our means—especially if you think federal funds ought to be in surplus without using the trust fund money to calculate balance.

So in 2001, when Bush 43 took over and I took over at the Treasury, we were in a total surplus condition, and arguably (I think this was a correct argument) we needed to reduce taxes because taxes had crept up to the point where something like 20 or 21 percent of the GDP was being effectively taken by federal government. Traditionally, our level has been someplace around 18 percent or maybe 18.3. So I think it was correct to say that we could afford to have a tax cut, which President Bush 43 had run on in the 2000 election, and he set out to deliver what he promised in the election and I think that was okay. The reason that I agreed to come in as Treasury secretary was because I saw lots of things in our economy and our society that needed to be done, and I was encouraged to believe that Bush 43 was up for the difficult political things that needed to happen to make course corrections. Those course corrections still include fixing the Social Security and Medicare trust funds, and fundamentally redesigning the way the federal tax system works. I thought there was some prospect that President Bush would entertain the difficult political choices that needed to be made in order to act on these things, and I spent a lot of time thinking about these things over a period, better part of 40 years, so I was anxious to have a go at it.

Q: How did it go?

Paul O'Neill: The first part was the easiest part. Cutting taxes is always a cinch—it's only a debate about who gets the credit and how big the cut is. But then we had 9/11 and it really changed where we were. The economy was still slow, although we were actually having positive growth in the fourth quarter of 2001.

But there was still a lot of energy and President Bush himself was bringing this energy that we need additional tax cuts. I honestly didn't think that was the right thing to do, because I continue to believe we needed the revenue that we were then collecting to work on the Medicare/Social Security problems. To work on fundamental tax redesign after 9/11 while worrying about whether there was going to be another attack or a series of attacks would cost hundreds of billions of dollars. So I was against further tax reductions at the time, especially as we got into 2002, as I became more concerned that we were also going to need money since it looked to me like we were sliding into a war with Iraq. I argued during the second half of 2002 we should not have another tax cut because we need the money to work on important policy issues that would shape the nation going forward, and we needed to have, in effect, rainy day money for the prospect of Iraq and another set of attacks like 9/11.

That was not a popular view, and in fact, it led to a conversation with the vice president where he basically told me, "Don't worry about further tax cuts, it's okay. Ronald Reagan proved that we don't have to worry about deficits." Which is really a shock to me because whatever you may think about Ronald Reagan, I don't think he or anyone else has proved that it's possible to ignore not just deficits, but federal debt as well. I think it is true that you can be sanguine about deficits for a short period of time, but you can't be sanguine about mounting debt for the United States of America. When we, the Bush 43 administration took over, we had something over $ 5 trillion, maybe $ 5.6 trillion worth of national debt. Today [Fall 2007] I think the number's $ 8.8 trillion. That's not an innocent change, it is a monumental change in the debt service that we have to do in addition to and on top of all of the other things that our country needs to do.

Q: Toward the end of 2002, you wrote a report that said that the current debt wasn't the problem; it was the debt that we are stepping toward. Shortly thereafter you were asked to leave. Can you explain to me what happened the day you were fired?

Paul O'Neill: During 2002 I found myself being at odds with where policy seemed to be going, I kept arguing that we couldn't really afford another tax cut and that we didn't need one, since the economy was doing fine. But my problems were not just differences about tax policy and social policy and fixing Medicare and Social Security. I kept asking almost every week, of the people from the CIA who briefed me, you know, where's the evidence for weapons of mass destruction? I see all of these allegations and projections of trends from 1991 and what we knew in 1991, but I didn't see anything I considered to be evidence. One of the things I've been trained to do for a long period of time is to know what you know and to differentiate that from what you suspect or what someone alleges, so I kept being a pain in the neck and asking, "Where's the evidence? There's no evidence, there's nothing I believe."

Early in the administration, at a National Security Council briefing, there were a bunch of photos put on the table and it was alleged that this satellite picture of what looked like a warehouse that you could find anywhere in the world was a production center for weapons of mass destruction. I said, I've spent a lot of time going around the world, producing goods all over the world, and have seen a lot of factories and warehouses. How can you tell me this one is a center for producing weapons of mass destruction? There's nothing here that tells you that? You may assign it that, but there's nothing here that tells you that.

One of the things I found really interesting out of this experience is that even today, people that I have a lot of regard for their intellect, like Bill Clinton, still say they believed the evidence was there. I've never had this conversation with him, but it's hard for me to believe a guy who's as smart as he is doesn't know the difference between an allegation and evidence—especially someone who's trained as he is as a lawyer. I've been astounded, this is a bipartisan thing—people on both sides don't seem to get the difference between evidence and what they call intelligence, which I would call not intelligence, just a bunch of fabrications. So I was working my way to the margins of what endurance that people had for me, both in economic policy and in everything else I encountered. I have to admit some of the things that I said during this period probably ought to have been tempered. For example, we were struggling with trying to get the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank out of the business of effectively bailing out private sector lenders who'd given money to developing countries with the expectation that the people of the United States and other tax-paying people around the world would bail out the private sector lenders. I said (probably not very advisedly), "Before we give any more money to Argentina, we ought to make sure it's not going to go to a Swiss bank account." Which was, I admit, not very diplomatic, but it was true—and interestingly enough, in a few weeks a guy who had been the president of Argentina said, without any prompting from me, "Well it was true he had money in a Swiss bank account, but it was all his own."

So in any event, as we moved past the election in 2002 and we had this continued conversation, a really heated conversation with the vice president about what I considered to be the inadvisability of a further tax cut, I got a call, early in December. I was in my office having a meeting with a group of people and my secretary came in and said, "The vice president's on the phone and would like to talk to you. The vice president said, "The president's decided to make some changes, and you're one of the changes. What we'd like to do is have you come over and meet with the president and basically say that you've decided to go back to the private sector, that you're ready to quit your involvement with the Treasury."

I said I didn't think I needed another meeting with the president, thank you very much. I thought I'd had plenty of meetings, and I thought he probably didn't need a meeting and I certainly didn't need a meeting. And I also said to him, "You know, I've been going along now for 65 years or so and, you know, for me to say that I've decided to leave the Treasury to go back to the private sector is a lie, and I'm not into doing lies. And so what I want to do is issue a press release tomorrow morning before the markets open so that they'll have time to digest this news in case it creates any stir. And I'll send the president a note telling him I'm resigning."

And I think he was surprised by that. He didn't try to argue me out of it, I think probably because he'd known me long enough to know that it wouldn't do any good, that I'd made up my mind and that was it.

Q: What did it feel like to get fired?

Paul O'Neill: Well, it's a first in my life—I'd never been fired before, I'd only been promoted to ever higher levels of responsibility. But it was okay with me because I would have really been uncomfortable arguing for policies I didn't believe in. One of the things I actually said to President Bush and Vice President Cheney when they asked me to come and have lunch with them, and to ask me to serve as the secretary of the Treasury, was that I had reservations about doing this. And one of the reservations I had was that, having been the CEO of a very big corporation for 13 years and the president of a very big corporation for the period before that, I wasn't sure how easy it was going to be for me to knuckle under when I thought the policy was wrong. The thing I didn't know is how difficult it would be to knuckle under if you thought the policy was not well vetted, that it was decided on the basis of ideology instead of what was right for the country. At that point I really thought the decisions were not being made on the basis of what was right for the country, they were being made on the basis of what was right for getting reelected.

It's probably altruistic, but I thought for a long time we need presidents who are so devoted to doing the right thing with and for the American people that they're prepared to lose for their values and to hang their values out in public for everyone to see them.

Q: Let's revisit the conversation that you had with Vice President Cheney prior to you being fired. Can you discuss the difference of opinion that you had in regard to tax cuts and deficits?

Paul O'Neill: Sometime after the election—it must have been mid-November—there was a meeting of the Economic Policy Group, including the vice president. As we sat at the table in the Roosevelt Room, we talked about where we were and where we were going. If I remember right, Glenn Hubbard made a presentation that was displayed on the screen at the front of the Roosevelt Room and showed where we were going and what different tracks looked like and GDP growth and the rest, including the effects of the proposed third tax cut. I made the argument, which I had been making over and over again since maybe June or July, that it was not advisable to have another tax cut because of the need to fix Social Security and Medicare and to have some money to smooth the fundamental redesign of the tax system. We needed to have in effect rainy-day money in the event that we had another 9/11 event—and at that point it looked like maybe we were going to go to Iraq, and it was not going to be cheap to do that.

So I argued that we should not have another tax cut because the economy was going to be in positive territory and doing okay through the next couple of years anyway without another tax cut, and there were all of these other compelling reasons not to risk a deficit and not to risk adding more to the national debt. And the vice president basically said, "When Ronald Reagan was here, he proved that deficits don't really matter and so it's not a consideration or a good reason not to have an additional tax cut." I was honestly stunned by the idea that anyone believed that Ronald Reagan proved in any fashion, certainly not inconclusive fashion, that deficits don't matter. I think it is true on a temporary basis that a nation can have a deficit and have a good reason for having a deficit. I think the Second World War there was no way we could avoid having a deficit, but when we came out of the Second World War we started running budget surpluses again and did that through the '50s and into 1960. It's interesting, it's really only been in the last 40 years or so that we've accepted the notion that it's a bipartisan thing that we don't have to have fiscal discipline.

A year ago there was this signing ceremony in the Rose Garden for the new Medicare prescription drug entitlement, and it's going to cost us trillions of dollars. This event was not unlike any of the others in the Rose Garden on a nice sunny day, with the president sitting at the signing table with a bunch of grinning legislators behind him taking credit for this "great gift" they're giving the American people. But none of their money was going to get given to make this happen, because the federal government doesn't have any money that it doesn't first take away from the taxpayers.

There was no mention of the fact that this in effect was a new tax on the American people, and we didn't know how we were going to pay for it. It was only grinning presidents and legislators taking the credit for a gift, which strikes me as a ridiculous continuing characteristic of how we do political business in our country.

Q: If we couldn't afford it, why did we give it to the people?

Paul O'Neill: If you can get 51 percent of the people in the Congress to agree with the President's leadership initiative to say we ought to do this, that's all it takes. And I think it's regrettably true there are a lot of people who don't understand that when they get a gift from the American people, it's from the American people and it can only be paid for with taxes over time. I think the confusion is aided and abetted by the fact that it doesn't feel like we're paying for it. It's a lot like running up credit card debt:

As long as you can pay the interest charges on your credit card debt, you can live way beyond your means. In fact, we as a nation are living way beyond our means, and for a period of time, there's no doubt we've demonstrated you can get away with it. But I think we only need to look at the fate of other countries who've lived beyond their means for a long time to see you inevitably get into trouble. If you look at Germany in 1923, they got to a point where their currency was so worthless that you needed a wheelbarrow to haul the currency that was needed to buy a loaf of bread. You get inflation where people stop investing in your national debt, when they say, "We're not going to loan you money because you're not going to be able to pay it back." It's the same thing that happens to individuals and families. When you get extended to the point that you can't service your debt, you're finished.

You know, so you go through a calamity—either you go through a terrible inflation, which is a way of having a national bankruptcy, and you destroy accumulated income and wealth, and in fact you have a taking from all the people because suddenly their financial assets are worth nothing. You know, are we going to have that right away? No. But should the people who are in positions of political leadership know that and anticipate it and do something about it for the American people, you bet—and now is the time to begin doing something about it.

One of the difficult aspects of this debt problem is that it's not very transparent to people who are unschooled in fiscal and monetary policy. In a way, this problem's a little bit like the famous example of if you throwing a frog into boiling water. If you throw him into the already boiling water, he jumps out right away. But if you put the frog in the pot of cold water and turn the heat on under it, the frog will let itself be boiled because it doesn't respond to slow increase in temperature. Our debt problem is something like that. If we wait until we have a calamity and financial markets shut us off because we've exhausted their belief that we can service additional debt, it's too late.

This is a problem that we need to deal with without letting the heat be turned up some more.

I would hope we can demonstrate we're intelligent people that don't wait until they create a calamity in their country before they deal with problems that are obvious to anyone who's ever studied economic policy and fiscal policy and monetary policy. You only need to look around the world to see places like Argentina, Turkey, and Germany after World War II whose governments have effectively achieved a meltdown condition. Knowing this can happen to modern nations, we should not let it happen to ours.

Editor's Note: The above was taken from the companion book to the critically-acclaimed documentary I.O.U.S.A. . Included in the book you'll find interviews from some of the most revered voices in the nation, including Warren Buffett; former Treasury Secretaries Paul O'Neill and Robert Rubin; Pete Peterson, CEO of The Blackstone Group; Congressman Ron Paul (R-Texas); and bestselling Empire of Debt author Bill Bonner. Defiantly non-partisan, the empowering solutions outlined in these pages are a must-read for any American who wants to help change "business-as-usual" in Washington as a new administration heads towards the Oval Office.

20081203-01	12:41	SteveG	Re: "Bush Sorry Economic Crisis Has Cut Jobs, 401Ks"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveB,

I really do think W was picked for his last name only and the plan was carried out that Cheney and Rove ran the country with W as the front man. Have you read Dark Side by Jane Mayer? Hope I got the author's name right. Interesting reading.

20081203-02	18:16	Charlie	"Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"
-----------------------------	-------	---------	---

A very interesting proposal about a "Full Spectrum Economy". At OpEdNews, one of my favorite news sources these days.

I think she makes some great points, not the least of which is: what we have been using for the past 50 years obviously doesn't work and has reached its limit. NOW (while we're at a downturn with no end in sight) is the time to try new models.

As the quote at the end states:

As Buckminster Fuller said, 'You never change things by fighting the existing reality. To change something, build a new model that makes the existing model obsolete.' Let's try something new this time.....

"Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy" by Ann Kramer, OpEdNews.com

Dec. 3, 2008, (<http://www.opednews.com/articles/Try-something-else-A-Full-by-Ann-Kramer-081202-590.html>)

Paul Krugman, Nobel economist, acknowledges that the economy is in recession and says it will be a while until things turn around. Will it be 2010? 2011? 2013? He has no idea. He's also said that everything that's been tried so far to get the economy rolling again hasn't worked and that we're doing the same thing Japan did during its last major economic turndown—and it didn't work for them either.

Mr. Bernanke's outlook wasn't very upbeat either. "The likely duration of the financial turmoil is difficult to judge," he said. "But even if the functioning of financial markets continues to improve, economic conditions will probably remain weak for a time." Continuing, he said that "cumulating job losses, weak consumer confidence, and a lack of credit availability" would depress consumer spending, traditionally the engine of American economic growth, and noted that exports were "not likely to be as great a source of strength for U.S. economic activity in coming quarters as they had been earlier this year."

So, what's left to do but sit and wait it out? Or maybe this time we could try something else? As the world's economists sit in turmoil trying to get the old system running again—they are running up against new parameters that have never before been factored into the current 3 sector (government, markets and illegal) economic model: major resource depletion, global warming, and a 70% consumer economy that cannot be sustained. We all know it but our economists seem to be committed to long-term denial.

That's understandable—they're generally in their 50's or older and have made their fortunes in the 3 sector economy. Not hard to understand why they think this is a good system and is the only option possible. But there are cracks in the system. Even Greenspan admitted that his 40 year commitment to the 3 sector economy isn't working and he's totally stunned. It's clear that the imagination of the old guard is in a thinking block!

The old rules and the old system have run their course. This is a natural occurrence and shouldn't be viewed as a bad thing but welcomed as the opportunity it is for a new model to be designed. Welcome to a 6 sector economy—A Full Spectrum economy. A Full Spectrum economy enables the introduction of 3 new sectors to the current 3 sector economy.

Doing this will take the pressure off the government and market sectors to carry the entire burden of the economy. This is important because when these two sectors are strained, it results in an increase of the illegal sector of drugs/crime/prostitution to fill the void. Anyone would agree that this isn't the smartest way to go.

So a Full Spectrum economy makes sense! Adding these 3 new sectors—the household, unpaid volunteer and natural sectors as part of the measured/valued economy results in a more vibrant and active economy. These 3 new sectors have always been a part of the economy—in that massive quantities of 'work' have occurred in them and in fact the old 3 sectors could not have functioned without them. They've just never been monetized and valued and as a result, they've become invisible to the 3 sector economists.

Time to make the invisible visible! If we want a highly functional economy, designing the 6 sector Full Spectrum economy makes sense. Because the 3 new sectors foster a post-industrial service/knowledge economy into the areas that will be ever-more necessary now that consumption patterns are set to shift down.

For example, if we recognized the value of the 'household' sector—in that it produces a value of healthy, whole, strong children—we could pay those who do the high quality work in this sector. At the same time, thousands of other businesses would grow up around it. Not consumption businesses that lead to resource depletion—but new businesses in the service fields of education, health care, travel, art, creativity, music, environmental caring etc.

Household businesses are not 'paying people to make babies. Instead, the household sector is "whole person/optimal human development enterprises'. To be the best business they can be, "Optimal human development enterprises", like any business they would need to purchase services from other businesses. For example, as we know, today's traditional businesses pay for bookkeeping, legal fees, advertising costs, promotion, productions costs etc. all as a 'cost of doing business' on their way to success. Whole Person/optimal human development enterprises would do the same.

They would be looking for services that would enable them to foster the broadest 7 "intelligences" that foster optimal human development for their children. They might purchase services such as private art lessons, music, or other interests of their children. They'd purchase lots of the latest technology, preventative health care, and lifestyle support services. They would buy services from travel businesses that would provide 'real life' experiences both as 'adventure classes' that have children/families traveling the world—or in-home experiences using technology that enables us to 'be there' while sitting in our living rooms. The imagination runs wild when you build the household enterprises which become part of the B2B economy!

While this is happening in the household sector, the 'natural sector' will also be a source for new economic development. While factoring in 'true cost accounting' of the earth's resources will impact the 'market/consumption' costs/pricing to bring it into the balance that was missing in the 3 sector economy, working in this sector will provide much new and necessary work. Some will be in resource restoration but many new jobs will be created in work for caring for the planet in ways that benefit the household and market sectors too. It is a necessary new sector that, once monetized, has its value honored and respected within the 6 sector economy. It is another conscious step to again take pressure off the market/government sectors.

And the unpaid volunteer sector could be a method for 'banking volunteer time' (which is currently valued at $19.61 per hour!) that could be traded for future caring in one's senior years or in time of need. For example, imagine if a volunteer 'banked' enough hours a month to cover their 'health insurance' payment and this was connected to a local health system? Imagine it costs $1000 a month. That's 50 hours of volunteer time a month or about 11 hours a week. Doable? Certainly. There are all sorts of ways this could be 'banked' into the system within a community and result in a world that has everyone engaged and building a world that works.

We have a choice right now. We can sit on our butts and watch the chaos of the recession as we remain committed to the old 3 sector, imbalanced economy. We can understand why the current economists keep trying to fix a 3 sector economy but we can finally acknowledge that it's time for a new model.

We have a choice to create a Full Spectrum, 6 sector economy that holds the future brightly in front of us. Let's get off our butts and start designing this! It would put everyone to work and even the current economists would have something to do—writing books on why it is time to change to a 6 sector economy! I bet Paul Krugman could write that book!

As Buckminster Fuller said, "You never change things by fighting the existing reality. To change something, build a new model that makes the existing model obsolete." Let's try something new this time.....

20081204-01 13:00 SteveB Re: "Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"

Dear Charlie,

Great article (thanks!) and I agree in large measure...

1. And the place to start is to make it much harder to pay-off our politicians by reforming campaign finance laws—again!—this time, for real. Both parties have sold the people down the river in order to try to stay in power.
2. Then we must come to the real, realistic realization (haha) that, if we are to maintain any kind of American lifestyle, unilateral free trade and illegal immigration must go. An American MUST make more money than a Chinese or Indian worker for the same job. These countries have nearly-slave wages and terrible pollution, therefore no cost for abatement, which we rightfully impose on U.S. companies. Thinking we can compete as if the field were level has been proven to be ridiculous—our shrinking manufacturing, ballooning trade deficits, titanic foreign borrowing, aspects of the current crisis, etc. prove this beyond the shadow of a doubt.
3. Gasoline must be taxed to maintain at least a $4.00/gallon level at the pumps in order to kill the gasoline engine. The revenue from most of this tax should be used to develop alternative energy solutions. If Europe has the will to impose this tax, so should we (though note that Europe fritters away the revenue rather than developing any useful technology, but that's Europe for you). Believe me, this tax ain't nearly as painful as the alternatives. In certain situations, such as recently, this tax could even operate in a reverse fashion to stabilize prices wherever they serve the larger American interests best.
4. We must all, as much as possible, BUY AMERICAN!!!!!!!!!!!!!! If you have the means to go out right now and buy a new American car...especially a Cadillac, Lincoln, or Corvette...doing so might even help the economy enough for you rich folks to avoid paying higher taxes. With a thriving economy, those tax hikes might become a little less necessary. But seriously, there is nothing at all wrong with helping ourselves and maintaining a healthy prejudice against foreign goods and companies. We should be prejudiced as hell, for the sake of our children. I don't understand how this once-strong principle became lost. Besides, this may be your last chance at a true bargain. Spend!

To me, the odds of any of these things happening seem about nil.

20081204-02 18:16 SteveG Re: "Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"

Dear SteveB,

Fuel: we are all over the place - ethanol, electric cars, bio diesel, hydrogen, etc. No concentration by all in one direction. The "60 Minutes" segment on algae makes since. Concentrate in one direction. Most electricity is made from burning coal - dirtiest carbon fuel. No real talk of diesel engines which can get you 50-60 MPG>

What is American? Fords assembled in Mexico, GM and Chrysler assembled in Canada, Subaru's, Toyota's, and Honda's assembled in Indiana.

Consistently during my lifetime we have penalized people for saving - we tax the interest they make. We reward people for borrowing - used to be able to deduct interest - still can on student loans.

What manufacturing?

20081206-01 09:46 SteveB Re: "Try Something Else! A Full Spectrum Economy"

Dear SteveG

I looked up Dark Side and it sure looks like scary reading. She does seem to think Cheney was in charge too, right?

I have been so disappointed in Congress this past couple of weeks over the auto industry. Banks? "Oh, here's $700,000,000,000 with no strings attached and let us know if you want more." [It turned out to be more than $12 trillion, at least. —SteveB] It isn't keeping people employed because they didn't specify that the banks have to actually lend the money, which is what we need, rather than buy other banks or foreign stocks, apparently. Also note that the banks, etc. got themselves into trouble.

But the auto industry has been put into the current crisis largely because of the government's stupidity, but they have to beg and grovel for a few billion dollars tied to everything in the book. It may be right for Congress to do this, but not in light of the way Wall St. was treated.

Chris Dodd is a total, unmitigated a*s-hole!

You know, there are great and good men on both sides of the aisle that I support...I hope and believe Obama will turn out to be one of them...BUT I ACTUALLY, REALLY DISLIKE BOTH POLITICAL PARTIES!!!! Neither is better than the other. Both are totally self-serving. Neither can focus further ahead than the next bought-and-sold election. The whole system has been almost totally corrupt for a long time. It is time to recognize that, like the bankers, politicians will turn against you if you don't regulate them properly.

This is really why we are sinking...otherwise, I believe this crisis could have been prevented by politicians seeking the good of the people rather than power, money, and re-election.

Did you know that France—usually no shining example of anything but arrogance—made lobbying and lobbyists illegal years ago? Not a bad idea in my book, but it is the campaign financing and influencing that has to be fixed. A country must insure that it's government's only motivation be the good of its people and nothing else. Not the good of themselves or of any other people, especially those in other countries or here illegally.

20081206-02	10:21	SteveB	"Despite Earlier Furor, Palin Shopping Continued"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Obviously out just for herself...

If you want to see what a woman governor sounds like who is not a stupid b*tch, try to catch Michigan's governor, Jennifer Granholm. That's what an intelligent woman governor sounds like. Now she would have made a good VP pick for McCain. Maybe he would have been able to carry Michigan?

The number one qualification to be President is intelligence! If you ain't got it, nothing else matters.

"Despite Earlier Furor, Palin Shopping Continued" AP

Dec. 5, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/28077236/ns/politics-decision_08/t/despite-earlier-furor-palin-shopping-continued/#.TxhuMm9SQhI)

(GOP spent $4,383 at Saks, $34,384 for makeup artist in race's final weeks.)

(WASHINGTON) Despite the furor over a $150,000 campaign shopping spree for GOP vice-presidential nominee Sarah Palin, the Republican Party continued to spend money on clothing and accessories for her in the contest's final weeks, new campaign reports show.

The latest buys ranged from $4,383 at Saks Fifth Avenue and $2,130 at Nieman Marcus, to $148 at Victoria's Secret [but...we never got to see her in her new panties, so she should pay for this or give them back or "put them up on Ebay. LOL] locations in Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Another $430 was spent at Aldo, a shoe store. The buys were listed under the heading of "campaign accessories."

The party also paid $55,700 in "consulting" fees to Lisa Kline & Co., a New York fashion stylist. And the McCain-Palin presidential campaign, which was funded with $84 million in tax dollars under the presidential public campaign financing system, dispensed $34,384 to Amy Strozzi, a celebrity makeup artist. The campaign had previously paid Strozzi $36,000, disclosed in earlier campaign finance reports.

Party spokesman Alex Conant said the expenditures listed in the party's October and December reports "were the result of coordinated expenditures at the campaign's direction."

"Accessories have been returned, inventoried, and will be appropriately dispersed to various charities," Conant said.

20081206-03	11:09	SteveB	Alternative Energy Sources
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------

Dear SteveG,

In terms of energy, I think we HAVE to go in all directions because no one knows what the best solutions will be. Only the marketplace can decide, because we are a "free", "capitalist" country...mostly...partly.

I like the algae thing a lot better than using food to make fuel—that ain't ever gonna work well when you also have to feed people at as low a price as possible. Coal can be burned cleanly to generate electricity for transportation and the CO2 sequestered. We have the technology, plenty of coal, and an already existing power grid. Nuclear is a problem. Wind, cool. But it is much more efficient to generate power at a central location and distribute that, rather than distribute the fuel which is then used inefficiently to generate power for cars, etc. as we do now

The internal combustion engine is our bitter enemy and must be destroyed except for big trucks, locomotives, planes, ships, and motorcycles. Diesel doesn't really help us keep the environment clean or end our dependence on foreign oil. Oil must be saved for other uses like the vehicles just mentioned and making drugs, plastic, etc.

To me, hybrid cars are crap! Let's do it right with a ton more trains and public transportation and electric cars. We have the technology, we just need the will to use it and a controlled price for gasoline.

20081208-01	12:29	SteveB	"Liberals Voice Concerns About President-Elect Obama"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveM,

It looks like Obama is going to rule in a pragmatic, not an ideological, fashion, just as I predicted. That's exactly what we need. Now, if he will only quit smoking. What I don't understand is why you seem so afraid of some hypothetical disaster that might befall the country, rather than the actual catastrophe of our baby boomer lives that your friends have caused.

I don't see the use in worrying about some mythical disaster instead of the real thing we're immersed in. The Right blew it and are now unbelievably discredited. Your own people destroyed what you believed in. Your own conservative deficit cutters exploded the deficit.

I hope Bush, Cheney, McCain, Palin and all the rest just go "jump in the lake." What else are they good for? Not running the country, that's for sure!!!!!!!

"Liberals Voice Concerns About Obama" by Carol E. Lee and Nia-Malika Henderson, Politico

Dec 8, 2008, (<http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1208/16292.html>)

Liberals are growing increasingly nervous—and some just flat-out angry—that President-elect Barack Obama seems to be stiffing them on Cabinet jobs and policy choices.

Obama has reversed pledges to immediately repeal tax cuts for the wealthy and take on Big Oil. He's hedged his call for a quick drawdown in Iraq. And he's stocking his White House with anything but stalwarts of the left.

Now some are shedding a reluctance to puncture the liberal euphoria at being rid of President George W. Bush to say, in effect, that the new boss looks like the old boss. "He has confirmed what our suspicions were by surrounding himself with a centrist to right cabinet. But we do hope that before it's all over we can get at least one authentic progressive appointment," said Tim Carpenter, national director of the Progressive Democrats of America.

OpenLeft blogger Chris Bowers went so far as to issue this plaintive plea: "Isn't there ever a point when we can get an actual Democratic administration?"

Even supporters make clear they're on the lookout for backsliding. "There's a concern that he keep his basic promises and people are going to watch him," said Roger Hickey, a cofounder of Campaign for America's Future.

Obama insists he hasn't abandoned the goals that made him feel to some like a liberal savior. But the left's bill of particulars against Obama is long, and growing.

Obama drew rousing applause at campaign events when he vowed to tax the windfall profits of oil companies. As president-elect, Obama says he won't enact the tax.

Obama's pledge to repeal the Bush tax cuts and redistribute that money to the middle class made him a hero among Democrats who said the cuts favored the wealthy. But now he's struck a more cautious stance on rolling back tax cuts for people making over $250,000 a year, signaling he'll merely let them expire as scheduled at the end of 2010. Obama's post-election rhetoric on Iraq and choices for national security team have some liberal Democrats even more perplexed. As a candidate, Obama defined and separated himself from his challengers by highlighting his opposition to the war in Iraq from the start. He promised to begin to end the war on his first day in office.

Now Obama's says that on his first day in office he will begin to "design a plan for a responsible drawdown," as he told NBC's "Meet the Press" Sunday. Obama has also filled his national security positions with supporters of the Iraq war: Sen. Hillary Clinton, who voted to authorize force in Iraq, as his secretary of state; and President George W. Bush's defense secretary, Robert Gates, continuing in the same role.

The central premise of the left's criticism is direct—don't bite the hand that feeds, Mr. President-elect. The Internet that helped him so much during the election is lighting up with irritation and critiques.

"There don't seem to be any liberals in Obama's cabinet," writes John Aravosis, the editor of Americablog.com. "What does all of this mean for Obama's policies, and just as important, Obama Supreme Court announcements?"

"Actually, it reminds me a bit of the campaign, at least the beginning and the middle, when the Obama campaign didn't seem particularly interested in reaching out to progressives," Aravosis continues. "Once they realized that in order to win they needed to marshal everyone on their side, the reaching out began. I hope we're not seeing a similar 'we can do it alone' approach in the transition team."

This isn't the first liberal letdown over Obama, who promptly angered the left after winning the Democratic primary by announcing he backed a compromise that would allow warrantless wiretapping on U.S. soil to continue.

Now it's Obama's Cabinet moves that are drawing the most fire. It's not just that he's picked Clinton and Gates. It's that liberal Democrats say they're hard-pressed to find one of their own on Obama's team so far—particularly on the economic side, where people like Tim Geithner and Lawrence Summers are hardly viewed as pro-labor.

"At his announcement of an economic team there was no secretary of labor. If you don't think the labor secretary is on the same level as treasury secretary, that gives me pause," said Jonathan Tasini, who runs the website workinglife.org. "The president-elect wouldn't be president-elect without labor."

During the campaign Obama gained labor support by saying he favored legislation that would make it easier for unions to form inside companies. The "card check" bill would get rid of a secret-ballot method of voting to form a union and replace it with a system that would require companies to recognize unions simply if a majority of workers signed cards saying they want one. Obama still supports that legislation, aides say—but union leaders are worried that he no longer talks it up much as president-elect.

"It's complicated," said Tasini, who challenged Clinton for Senate in 2006. "On the one hand, the guy hasn't even taken office yet so it's a little hasty to be criticizing him. On the other hand, there is legitimate cause for concern. I think people are still waiting but there is some edginess about this."

That's a view that seems to have kept some progressive leaders holding their fire. There are signs of a struggle within the left wing of the Democratic Party about whether it's just too soon to criticize Obama—and if there's really anything to complain about just yet.

Case in point: One of the Campaign for America's Future blogs commented on Obama's decision not to tax oil companies' windfall profits saying, "Between this move and the move to wait to repeal the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy, it seems like the Obama team is buying into the right-wing frame that raising any taxes—even those on the richest citizens and wealthiest corporations—is bad for the economy."

Yet Campaign for America's Future will be join about 150 progressive organizations, economists and labor groups to release a statement Tuesday in support of a large economic stimulus package like the one Obama has proposed, said Hickey, a co-founder of the group.

"I've heard the most grouching about the windfall profits tax, but on the other hand, Obama has committed himself to a stimulus package that makes a down payment on energy efficiency and green jobs," Hickey said. "The old argument was, here's how we afford to make these investments—we tax the oil companies' windfall profits. ... The new argument is, in a bad economy that could get worse, we don't."

Obama is asking for patience—saying he's only shifting his stance on some issues because circumstances are shifting.

Aides say he backed off the windfall profits tax because oil prices have dropped below $80 a barrel. Obama also defended hedging on the Bush tax cuts.

"My economic team right now is examining, do we repeal that through legislation? Do we let it lapse so that, when the Bush tax cuts expire, they're not renewed when it comes to wealthiest Americans?" Obama said on "Meet the Press." "We don't yet know what the best approach is going to be."

On Iraq, he says he's just trying to make sure any U.S. pullout doesn't ignite "any resurgence of terrorism in Iraq that could threaten our interests."

Obama has told his supporters to look beyond his appointments, that the change he promised will come from him and that when his administration comes together they will be happy.

"I think that when you ultimately look at what this advisory board looks like, you'll say this is a cross-section of opinion that in some ways reinforces conventional wisdom, in some ways breaks with orthodoxy in all sorts of way," Obama recently said in response to questions about his appointments during a news conference on the economy.

The leaders of some liberal groups are willing to wait and see.

"He hasn't had a first day in office," said John Isaacs, the executive director for Council for Livable World. "To me it's not as important as who's there, than what kind of policies they carry out."

"These aren't out-and-out liberals on the national security team, but they may be successful implementers of what the Obama national security policy is," Isaacs added. "We want to see what policies are carried forward, as opposed to appointments."

Juan Cole, who runs a prominent anti-war blog called Informed Comment, said he worries Obama will get bad advice from Clinton on the Middle East, calling her too pro-Israel and "belligerent" toward Iran. "But overall, my estimation is that he has chosen competence over ideology, and I'm willing to cut him some slack," Cole said.

Other voices of the left don't like what they're seeing so far and aren't waiting for more before they speak up.

New York Times columnist Frank Rich warned that Obama's economic team of Summers and Geithner reminded him of John F. Kennedy's "best and the brightest" team, who blundered in Vietnam despite their blue-chip pedigrees.

David Corn, Washington bureau chief of the liberal magazine Mother Jones, wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that he is "not yet reaching for a pitchfork."

But the headline of his op-ed sums up his point about Obama's Cabinet appointments so far: "This Wasn't Quite the Change We Envisioned."

20081209-01 13:59 SteveB "Obama Derangement Syndrome"

Dear SteveM,

In my humble opinion, I think many of the issues at hand between us could be settled and agreed upon if you were ever able to give even one tiny inch.

For instance, Obama's birth certificate. Please read the article below. Surely, any reasonable person could agree that it is about time to get real. The rest of the world has—even most of the extreme right.

I think you need to realize before you get too testy (such as in your last email, my old friend) that it is not my opinions, but yours, that are out of the main stream. I think you would have to agree that, right or wrong, your thinking is radical, unusual, extreme, fringe, generally unaccepted, and marginal. The election certainly proved that, didn't it? I'm much nearer the center. I have been proven right in our disagreements time after time. When have you been proven right? Obama is a U.S. citizen. McCain and Palin are fools who have greatly harmed the GOP. McCain did not win the election as you said he would. Obama won as I predicted. Have you seen the Bush vs. Obama favorability ratings lately? Do you really not believe (as most of the rest of us do) that idiot Bush was the worst President maybe in forever?

So you are the one who should be offering proof of your extreme positions and you have not done that. Instead, I am the one who has been offering solid proof and evidence. Where is the rationale for your thinking? Is there one, or is it just extreme prejudice? That will get you nowhere.

You have so little to stand on with your discredited opinions and party...maybe you should try, at least, to understand the other side, maybe concede on a few reasonable points, and actually move a little toward the center from that extremely unhappy, rationally inconsistent, ultra-radical right wing stance. Huh? The world is a much bigger place than that. I'd give up that drive-time radio if I were you. Those folks are downright crazy and un-American.

If you love this country as you say you do and care about its future, those things above should not be that difficult. The article below gives plenty of reason to do so, and it was written by a well-respected man much further to the right than I am. Are you and your friends really out to save the country or to destroy it and the Constitution you say you honor? Funny to me that you seem to honor it in terms of guns, but not in terms of the right to privacy, separation of church and state, or the legitimate election of a President. Is war all you can conceive of? Do you really believe the Constitution should be followed only when it suits the extreme right?

Now your GOP buddies who killed the richest economy on Earth want to kill the auto industry. Wonderful! And you really think that I am the one who is misguided and brainwashed? I tow no party line at all, but you do. I see the problems with both parties, both ideologies, both extremes. Do you?

"Obama Derangement Syndrome" by David Horowitz, National Review

Dec. 8, 2008, (<http://www.nationalreview.com/articles/226474/obama-derangement-syndrome/david-horowitz>)

(Conservatives need to shut up about the birth certificate.)

The continuing efforts of a fringe group of conservatives to deny Obama his victory and to lay the basis for the claim that he is not a legitimate president is embarrassing and destructive. The fact that these efforts are being led by Alan Keyes, an unhinged demagogue on the political fringe who lost a senate election to the then unknown Obama by 42 points should be a warning in itself.

This tempest over whether Obama, the child of an American citizen, was born on American soil is tantamount to the Democrats' seditious claim that Bush "stole" the election in Florida and hence was not the legitimate president. This delusion helped to create the Democrats' Bush derangement syndrome and encouraged Democratic leaders to lie about the origins of the Iraq War, and regard it as illegitimate as Bush himself. It became "Bush's War" rather than an American War with destructive consequences for our troops and our cause.

The Birth Certificate zealots are essentially arguing that 64 million voters should be disenfranchised because of a contested technicality as to whether Obama was born on U.S. soil. (McCain narrowly escaped the problem by being born in the Panama Canal zone, which is no longer American.)

What difference does it make to the future of this country whether Obama was born on U.S. soil? Advocates of this destructive campaign will argue that the Constitutional principle regarding the qualifications for President trumps all others. But how viable will our Constitution be if 5 Supreme Court justices should decide to void 64 million ballots?

Conservatives are supposed to respect the organic nature of human societies. Ours has been riven by profound disagreements that have been deepening over many years. We are divided not only about political facts and social values, but also about what the Constitution itself means. The crusaders on this issue choose to ignore these problems and are proposing to deny the will of 64 million voters by appealing to 5 Supreme Court Justices (since no one is delusional enough to think that the 4 liberal justices are going to take the presidency away from Obama). What kind of conservatism is this?

It is not conservatism; it is sore loserism and quite radical in its intent. Respect for election results is one of the most durable bulwarks of our unity as a nation. Conservatives need to accept the fact that we lost the election, and get over it; and get on with the important business of reviving our country's economy and defending its citizens, and—by the way—its Constitution.

20081210-01 19:14 SteveM Gun Rights

Dear SteveB,

Watch this video.

How sad this Texas girl had the encroachment on her second amendment rights so graphically illustrated. I see the honorable senator from New York was getting a little uncomfortable in his chair. The gun banners are absolutely speechless as this little Texas gal chews them up and spits them out. She knows what the 2nd amendment is really all about.

Watch it. You will be glad you did. And pass it along. Here's a video that I guarantee you won't forget anytime soon!! She didn't cry, although she came close to losing it, and she gave those a reality check they dearly needed.....

<http://www.theabsurdreport.com/2011/suzanna-gratia-hupp-what-the-second-amendment-is-really-for-2/>

20081211-01 09:53 SteveB Re: Gun Rights

Dear SteveM,

This 2nd amendment cr*p is pure and simple deceit and paranoia.

You should be much more worried about the more fundamental rights that the right wants to steal—the right to privacy, the right to equality, the right to healthcare, the right to a brighter future, the right to peace, the right to habeas corpus, the right to trial, the right not to be tortured, the right to a good secular education, the right to have a government not controlled by some (any) stupid religion.

Now, I'm all for the 2nd Amendment and people owning guns. I own 3 myself. But, realistically, what good are your stupid guns ever going to be against tanks, planes, helicopters, bombs, cannon, flame throwers, etc. etc.???????

This issue is nothing but the biggest red herring the world has ever seen. The Right pretends to protect an obvious, innocuous right, while stealing the rest. Wake up!

20081211-02 10:03 SteveM Re: Gun Rights

Dear SteveB,

Do you have a tank?

20081211-03 10:06 SteveB "The Truth About Idiot Bush (What a Legacy!)"

Keith Olbermann at his best (ya gotta love him!).

"The Truth About Idiot Bush (What a Legacy!)" (from the 12/9/08 "Countdown" transcript)

OLBERMANN: ...and number one [Bush scandal of the day], IED-gate, one of the top ten most disturbing realities of the war in Iraq. The concept, evidently a surprise to all on our side, of the improvised explosive device. The use of roadside bombs by insurgents to kill Americans. Well, it was not a surprise after all. The Pentagon's inspector general has issued a 72-page report revealing that the military was aware of the threat posed by mines and improvised explosive devices and of the available of mine resistant vehicles years before the insurgent actions began in Iraq in 2003. Which makes the report's other finding, that Marine Corps leaders simply stopped processing an urgent process from combat commanders in Anbar Province, for MRAPs, the IED resistant vehicles in 2005, makes that even more heinous. So not only did the Bush administration and the Bush Pentagon ignore the prewar intel, that the WMD we sought to recover were not in Iraq. But the Bush administration and the Pentagon ignored that if we removed Saddam Hussein an insurgency of some sort would develop in Iraq. And now we learn the Bush administration and the Bush Pentagon ignored the prewar intel that when an insurgency did develop, it would use roadside bombs to kill the troops we needlessly sent there. I don't know what, if any religion you belong to but I suspect you will agree that people that ignored so many foretellings of preventable death should have a long time to think about it in hell!

President Bush tells interviewers he does not care how history will portray him but in our third story tonight, "The Los Angeles Times" has obtained an internal White House memo giving Cabinet members talking points for painting history a rosy portrait of Mr. Bush, even though his image will only get worse as new and damning facts emerge. What does the memo say and how are we obligated to correct its bizarre claims? To start it says Mr. Bush, quote, "Promised to raise standards and accountability in public schools and delivered the No Child Left Behind," an act so poorly received, "The Times" points out, that it became a standard applause line this year from Democrats. Also from the memo, "He curbed AIDS in Africa. Its spread has slowed and Mr. Bush has won phrase for this" but he has not won any praise from withholding funds from groups that prevent condom use, a proven life saver, in favor of abstinence only programs, which have also failed in this country.

Also, Mr. Bush's foreign aid puritan, Randall Tobias, quit last year after patronizing an escort service linked to prostitution. Also from the memo, "Mr. Bush lifted the economy with his tax cuts" and quote, "responded with bold measures to prevent an economic meltdown." In 2005 he told a 57-year-old single mother of three, one of the mentally challenged, that it was, quote, "fantastic, uniquely American that she had to work three jobs" unlike half a million people that have no job as of November in the first presidency for decades during which family earning power fell and income disparity continued to rise, the meltdown he prevented, now having claimed several Wall Street institutions, which had weathered 1929 and 9/11 or 43 And of course, the old stand-by quote, "He kept the American people safe." Not counting 20 percent of his first term, Jan. 1, 2001, until Sept. 11, 2001. On 9/11 he sat reading "My Pet Goat" for seven minutes after learning America was under attack and then covered up environmental danger at Ground Zero. And failed to provide for the health of rescue workers. He helped bin Laden's family flee the country, opposed the 9/11 Commission, opposed the Department of Homeland Security, tried to outsource American's port security to Dubai, did not keep us safe from the shoe bomber, alert passengers and crew did that, did not keep five Americans safe from anthrax and never caught their killer, still has not caught the killer of 17 sailors aboard the U.S.S. Coal, still has not caught the killer of 3,000 on 9/11, outsourcing that to Afghans, turning that country into a narcostate giving bin Laden a safe haven in the region of Waziristan by literally endorsing a truce that Pakistan signed with the Taliban there. And most of all, not keeping safe 4,200 Americans dead in his war, a war that made us less safe, invading a country that posed no grave or gathering threat, provided a check on Iraq and igniting insurrection by disbanding the Ba'athist Party, creating a Muslim theocracy purged of its moderate intelligentsia, one in which freedom has marched backwards for women and Lebanon too elected a Muslim theocracy run by Hamas (sic), no less. Keeping us safe? Terrorism is rising worldwide. The still thriving enemy has claimed Pakistan's Benazir Bhutto and thousands of people in India, including 200 in Mumbai just last month. Russia can now invade U.S. allies without fear of retribution. And Mr. Bush failed to prevent Kim Jong-Il from joining the ranks of nuclear powers, despite even more ample warning than he received prior to 9/11.

He lifted not a finger to keep a major American city safe from wind and water. And what, finally, of the claims of talking points that Mr. Bush has always upheld quote "the honor and dignity of his office." You must define dignity downward to find it in a lie. The lie of mission accomplished. Of upholding the Constitution or protecting Habeas Corpus. That we do not eavesdrop without warrants, we do not eavesdrop on Americans. The lie that we do not torture, that we do not play politics with justice, that we do not use the wheels of justice to crush dissent, that we do not betray those who serve us in secret, that we uphold rather than commute the penalties for those who do, that we do not stage fake news conferences, do not censor science, do not plant propaganda in Iraqi newspapers nor pay U.S. columnists who write it in American newspapers. Or push respected Americans to vaporize their honor and dignity with lies to the world. Or lie about the causes of the credit crisis, high gas prices or even that he watched the first plane hit the North Tower on TV. Where is the honor of vowing a crusade, of daring those that would kill American troops to "bring it on", of promising to care for the troops after you put them in harm's way without body armor or up-armored vehicles? Where was the honor, the dignity in giving a dead soldier's mother a presidential coin and telling her, "Don't sell it on eBay." His memo revealing yet another lie. He does care how history will portray him and now he knows.

20081211-04 10:11 SteveB Re: Gun Rights

Dear SteveM,

No, I tried to get a tank, but they wouldn't let me.

Remember, the reason the founding fathers put in the 2nd amendment was because they knew the government would need to be overthrown in the future and they wanted to ensure that citizens had the means. They considered, rightfully so, that government is inherently evil.

They don't seem to have ever had that first thought about things like home invasion or carrying a concealed weapon.

So the guns you have might protect your home (all well and good) but they will never protect your liberty! Only your brain can do that. Start using it!

20081212-01 10:50 SteveB Fw: Letter from John McCain to John Hinkley

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

You might recall that John Hinckley was a seriously deranged young man who shot President Reagan in the early 1980s. Hinckley was absolutely obsessed with movie star Jodie Foster, extremely jealous, and in his twisted mind, loved Jodie Foster to the point that to make himself well-known to her, he attempted to assassinate President Reagan. There is speculation Hinckley may soon be released as having been rehabilitated. Consequently, you may appreciate the following letter from John McCain that the staff at the mental facility, treating Hinckley, reports to have intercepted this past weekend:

To: John Hinckley
From: John McCain

Dear Mr. Hinkley,

My wife and I wanted to drop you a short note to tell you how pleased we are with the great strides you are making in your recovery. In our fine country's spirit of understanding and forgiveness, we want you to know there is a non-partisan consensus of compassion and forgiveness throughout.

My wife Cindy and I want you to know that no grudge is borne against you for shooting President Reagan. We, above all, are aware of how the mental stress and pain could have driven you to such an act of desperation. We are confident that you will soon make a complete recovery and return to your family to join the world again as a healthy and productive young man.

Best Wishes, John and Cindy McCain

PS: While you have been incarcerated, Barack Obama has been banging Jodie Foster like a screen door in a tornado. Just thought you should know.

20081212-02	10:51	SteveB	"Financial forecast: 11 bets for '09"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------------

I sure hope this guy is wrong, but his assessment certainly rings true to me. Unfortunately, he knows a hell of a lot and I've seen him be right in the past when I doubted him. Of course, no one is right all the time. Right? Just remember those famous last words, "The 'fundamentals' of this economy are strong!"

Must all be the UAW's fault, huh? LOL!

"Financial forecast: 11 bets for '09" by Jon Markman, MSN Money

Dec. 12, 2008, (<http://articles.moneycentral.msn.com/Investing/SuperModels/financial-forecast-11-bets-for-09.aspx>)

After a rocky 2008, it's tempting to believe that better times are just ahead, especially with the president-elect focusing on the economy. So what's next? (Hint: Watch out.)

If 2008 often felt like a nauseating but enduring ride, as government and banking authorities grappled with unseen forces that rocked the investment world, then 2009 will be the year that distress becomes so great that investors actually lose their stomachs.

The past year may have been about the loss of confidence, but the coming year will be about the loss of hope.

It's always tempting after a massive decline to look optimistically at the future and think about what might go right. And in this case, it's true that the next month might bring calm and higher prices to the stock market as investors gaze wistfully at a path ahead that the Federal Reserve, the Treasury and Congress have promised will be greased richly with public funds. Several prominent fund managers who have been bearish on stock valuations for years have reversed their views, going long the market.

Yet in time, all those promises of federal largesse will need to be transformed into enough high-paying jobs and high-quality earnings so that towers of individual and corporate debts can be repaid and balance sheets rebuilt, and that is where the trouble still lies. The concept of spending hundreds of billions of dollars on rebuilding roads, investing in renewable energy and strengthening hospitals sounds peppy on paper, but when you pencil out how many actual salaries it creates, it isn't much—and history shows that government-funded gains rarely last.

Someone please tell me how many roads can be built by journalists thrown out of work at bankrupt newspapers or how many solar panels can be assembled by former accounts-payable managers for bankrupt retail chains. Unless you're a construction worker or bio-energy scientist, the Obama reconstruction will likely leave you cold.

By proposing massive borrowing to battle a problem created by an excess of debt, the government has essentially proposed fighting fire with gasoline. So, lit by a bonfire of the inanities, I propose to you 11 fearless forecasts for 2009:

1: Infrastructure spending plans will bog down in Congress.

The president-elect has asked Congress to send him a bill to sign in his first week in office. This is already a bad idea, as haste makes waste in lawmaking. But the disbursement of $500 billion-plus would also generate an unseemly, partisan free-for-all in the Capitol, with powerful Democrats on the coasts hogging the best programs for their states and Republicans complaining about being shut out.

In short, passage of this noble yet spendthrift job-creation bill will drag out, blunting its effectiveness.

2: The unemployment rate will approach 10%.

Even if an infrastructure spending law dashes through Congress, it will be months before the money is spent and jobs are created. In the meantime, companies will see their borrowing costs rise even faster than their revenue shrinks—a toxic cocktail that leads to layoffs.

By the end of the year, the U.S. unemployment rate will rise from its current 6.7% to about 8.5%, en route to 10%-plus in 2010. The broadest measure of unemployment, which includes part-timers and discouraged job seekers, which is now at 12.5%, will approach 17% by 2010. In the spring, a single month will record a loss of 1 million jobs.

3: Weak second-quarter earnings will dash hopes.

Prayers for a swift end to the U.S. recession will go unanswered as investors come to realize that America can't spend its way out of a hole by itself. That will be clear in anemic corporate profits during the first half of next year. The driving force in 2009 will continue to be a forced reduction of leverage for all developed economies' big companies and elites combined with the relentless bursting of a global property and commodity bubble. The U.S. fiscal stimulus will soften the blow of the recession, but it will remain painful. By the time the recession ends, possibly in late 2009 or early 2010, it will eclipse the 1980 and 1973-75 recessions and be viewed as the second-worst of the past 100 years, after 1929-33.

4: Synchronized swoon will become an Olympic event.

No economic slowdown of the past 80 years has been so viciously coordinated among regions of the world and various industries that normally operate on different cycles. Past recessions have ended once one region's strength pulled up others, but Europe, Asia, the United States and Latin America will continue to pull each other down as monetary and fiscal stimuli fail to significantly erode debt loads.

The longer the recession, the more likely earnings will drop more than managements can handle, leading to accelerating bankruptcies and unemployment. Big companies will see earnings-per-share drops of 25%-plus.

5: Markets will reach lower lows.

The first bottom in 2008 was made on the failure of Bear Stearns in March at the 1,255 level of the S&P 500 Index ($INX). The second was made on the failure of Fannie Mae (FMN, news, msgs) and Freddie Mac (FRE, news, msgs) at 1,200 in July. The third was made on the failure of Lehman Bros. (LEHMQ, news, msgs) and stress in related bank funding at 840 in October. The fourth was made around the near failure of Citigroup (C, news, msgs) and in recognition of a plunge in the rate of fundamental business deterioration in November at 750.

In 2009, final lows will come at 550 to 700 as the absolute level of earnings estimates plunges amid despair over the lack of progress from federal stimulus efforts.

6: Chinese growth will slow to the 0%-to-4% range—or worse.

China's growth rate has been in the low double-digits for years, generating the commodity boom in the developing world. Now many experts believe that, at worst, China's growth rate will slow to 7% in 2007.

But veteran Hong Kong economist Jim Walker, the director of the Asianomics research firm, believes investment cycles don't slow—they disintegrate. Although Beijing will try to keep building public infrastructure, Walker's research indicates that a steep decline in private-sector demand from Europe and the U.S. will lop 7.5 percentage points off gross domestic product growth in 2009.

Walker thinks a crash in domestic consumption will lop an additional 2.5 percentage points off GDP growth. Thus Walker's best-case scenario is in the 0%-to-4.5% range, and he puts 30% odds on a contraction. "There has been an outrageous over-investment in property and factories, and much will be unwound," he says. The economist also believes that the growth in Chinese domestic consumption has been overblown and that despite a 50% decline this year, the Chinese stock market remains grossly overvalued.

7: Russian, Persian Gulf and Japanese investors won't bail out the U.S.

The decline in oil and gas prices will gut the Russian and Persian Gulf economies to the extent that their governments will be too focused on boosting domestic growth to bother with buying more U.S. and European assets.

Due to their higher savings rate, the Japanese might actually regain some of their pre-1990 stature and use their strengthening yen to make smart acquisitions even as their domestic economy falls back into its two-decade recession.

8: Treasuries will trump corporate debt.

The United States will find it can issue as much debt as it wants, even as yields on the 30-year bond approach zero, as the world prefers their safety over the volatility of corporate debt. Junk and low investment-grade bond yields will continue to advance—in defiance of bulls' expectations—making it harder for companies to finance operations. The Fed will ultimately step in to guarantee some corporate debt.

9: Market timing will beat buy-and-hold.

As the government helps some industries at the expense of others, distorting normal corporate cash flows and historical pricing gauges, investors focused on fundamentals and valuation metrics will face another frustrating year. Traders and timers will dominate just as they did in the 1970s—and in 2008—as they swear allegiance to no investment style except the Church of What's Working Now.

Investors who try to buy into infrastructure companies—gravel miners, engineers, cement truck makers, fiber optic line constructors and steel makers—will be frustrated as they discover government contracts are less lucrative than private-industry contracts and suffer more slowdowns due to red tape, incompetence and corruption.

10: Investors will seek low-risk growth.

Most companies will spend 2009 focused on survival. The best will also innovate, as new products are the surest path to higher margins. Tech companies with large cash positions, consumer focus and innovation records, such as Apple (AAPL, news, msgs), will stabilize, as will some makers of networking equipment.

Meanwhile, many commercial-real-estate trusts, retail chains and old-school industrial manufacturers, such as Unisys (UIS, news, msgs), will declare bankruptcy or disappear in no-premium mergers. Banks will be avoided as the government has taken over their financing function and has a lower cost of funds. Energy, metals and materials will stabilize and inch higher.

11: Russia will seek its own bailout.

High-priced commodity exports fueled a big boom in social programs in Russia and the strength of the ruble. As energy prices stabilize at a lower level, analyst Vitaliy N. Katsenelson says he believes the ruble will be smashed, undermining buying power and putting a big hole in the Moscow government's ability to pay for expensive social programs.

After Russia "de-privatized" (the government word for stealing) oil assets, the Minsk-born Denver investment manager says, it reinvested little in new production facilities or maintenance, which has led inevitably to declining production. He expects Russia to need to do an about-face and beg foreign investors, and possibly even the International Monetary Fund, for a bailout. Well, that ought to do it for 2009—another cheery 12 months in which global commerce continues to unwind in painful fashion.

I hope that I have gotten every one of these wrong and that the new year is the best ever for the nation and your families.

20081212-03	16:14	Ben	Re: "Financial forecast: 11 bets for '09"
-------------	-------	-----	---

SteveB,

This is observation from my buddy, who is VP of an investment bank that oversees the operations of the credit unions in the southwest region... his analysis makes your guy pretty good, because he usually finds much bigger holes in economic forecasts than he did for this.

But my buddy Brent brings up an important point that is overlooked, too...

from Brent:

He [Jon Markman] assumes that the new Fed, Treasury and SEC heads are buffoons like the current crop. I do not. Are his unemployment projections correct? Will Russia go hat in hand to the IMF for money, that's anybody's guess.

Overall I liked his writing style and his use of logic or outside experts to support his views. He was too light on counterpoints or intervening variables.

SteveB's laugh that it's the UAW's fault was probably tongue in cheek, but not far from the truth for the auto-industry.

What I am expecting, that he did not mention, is the only tool left in the whole government's toolbox to handle the current leveraged debt situation is "asset inflation." Double the price of everything on the planet, including wages, and you've halved the debt load. Too bad for the suckers that bought the debt.

When it comes to hard choices being made in Congress, as we saw with the failure of the bailout for the Big 3, they will take the easy "spend and inflate" route every time.

20081213-01 04:25 BrentR Re: Letter from John McCain to John Hinkley

Dear SteveB,

HAHAHA !!! What's funny about this email is this! As just today I heard something about Hinckley and I started thinking about my uncle and telling my wife about him. My Uncle Bill from Lubbock Tx used to be a gunsmith. He did a lot of work for the Lubbock Police and also for many pawn shops in Lubbock.. Shortly after Hinckley shot Reagan the FBI showed up at my uncle's house and shop. My uncle had actually worked on the gun that Hinckley used. (The FBI was tracing the records of where the gun had been, I guess to check if there were any connections.) But anyway, just thought I would share a bit with you., because it was funny you sent this to me today after we just talked about him.....

Well, I hope you all have a great Christmas and New Years there in Montana! Por favor mandar todos mis saludos a toda su familia desde Santa Cruz Bolivia.

20081214-01 10:46 SteveB "Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors"

Dear SteveM,

But, of course, to you he's just black. The "one drop" rule, right? The same rule that makes Dick Chaney and five former Presidents black (and perhaps even you and me, Blondie).

LOL!

Life and truth are so much more complex than your simplistic ideology makes them out to be.

I would think you right-wing extremists would love black people. They seem to embrace the love, proliferation, and use of guns just as much as you do. LOL again!

"Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors" by AP

Dec. 14, 2008, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/28216005/ns/us_news-life/t/obamas-true-colors-black-white-or-neither/)

(Many people insist that 'the first black president' is actually not black.)

(WASHINGTON) A perplexing new chapter is unfolding in Barack Obama's racial saga: Many people insist that "the first black president" is actually not black.

Debate over whether to call this son of a white Kansan and a black Kenyan biracial, African-American, mixed-race, half-and-half, multiracial—or, in Obama's own words, a "mutt"—has reached a crescendo since Obama's election shattered assumptions about race.

Obama has said, "I identify as African-American—that's how I'm treated and that's how I'm viewed. I'm proud of it." In other words, the world gave Obama no choice but to be black, and he was happy to oblige.

But the world has changed since the young Obama found his place in it.

Intermarriage and the decline of racism are dissolving ancient definitions. The candidate Obama, in achieving what many thought impossible, was treated differently from previous black generations. And many white and mixed-race people now view President-elect Obama as something other than black.

So what now for racial categories born of a time when those from far-off lands were property rather than people, or enemy instead of family?

"They're falling apart," said Marty Favor, a Dartmouth professor of African and African-American studies and author of the book Authentic Blackness.

"In 1903, W.E.B. DuBois said the question of the 20th century is the question of the color line, which is a simplistic black-white thing," said Favor, who is biracial. "This is the moment in the 21st century when we're stepping across that."

'Obama is whatever people project onto him'

Rebecca Walker, a 38-year-old writer with light brown skin who is of Russian, African, Irish, Scottish and Native American descent, said she used to identify herself as "human," which upset people of all backgrounds. So she went back to multiracial or biracial, "but only because there has yet to be a way of breaking through the need to racially identify and be identified by the culture at large."

"Of course Obama is black. And he's not black, too," Walker said. "He's white, and he's not white, too. Obama is whatever people project onto him ... he's a lot of things, and neither of them necessarily exclude the other."

But U.S. Rep. G. K. Butterfield, a black man who by all appearances is white, feels differently.

Butterfield, 61, grew up in a prominent black family in Wilson, N.C. Both of his parents had white forebears, "and those genes came together to produce me." He grew up on the black side of town, led civil rights marches as a young man, and to this day goes out of his way to inform people that he is certainly not white.

Butterfield has made his choice; he says let Obama do the same.

"Obama has chosen the heritage he feels comfortable with," he said. "His physical appearance is black. I don't know how he could have chosen to be any other race. Let's just say he decided to be white—people would have laughed at him."

"You are a product of your experience. I'm a U.S. congressman, and I feel some degree of discomfort when I'm in an all-white group. We don't have the same view of the world, our experiences have been different."

'One-drop' rule

The entire issue balances precariously on the "one-drop" rule, which sprang from the slave-owner habit of dropping by the slave quarters and producing brown babies. One drop of black blood meant that person, and his or her descendants, could never be a full citizen.

Today, the spectrum of skin tones among African-Americans—even those with two black parents—is evidence of widespread white ancestry. Also, since blacks were often light enough to pass for white, unknown numbers of white Americans today have blacks hidden in their family trees.

One book, Black People and their Place in World History, by Dr. Leroy Vaughn, even claims that five past presidents—Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, Warren Harding and Calvin Coolidge—had black ancestors, which would make Obama the sixth of his kind.

Mix in a few centuries' worth of Central, South and Native Americans, plus Asians, and untold millions of today's U.S. citizens need a DNA test to decipher their true colors. The melting pot is working.

Yet the world has never been confronted with such powerful evidence as Obama. So as soon as he was elected, the seeds of confusion began putting down roots.

"Let's not forget that he is not only the first African-American president, but the first biracial candidate. He was raised by a single white mother," a Fox News commentator said seven minutes after Obama was declared the winner.

"We do not have our first black president," the author Christopher Hitchens said on the BBC program "Newsnight." "He is not black. He is as black as he is white."

A Doonesbury comic strip that ran the day after the election showed several soldiers celebrating.

"He's half-white, you know," says a white soldier.

"You must be so proud," responds another.

Pride is the center of racial identity, and some white people seem insulted by a perception that Obama is rejecting his white mother (even though her family was a centerpiece of his campaign image-making) or baffled by the notion that someone would choose to be black instead of half-white.

"He can't be African-American. With race, white claims 50 percent of him and black 50 percent of him. Half a loaf is better than no loaf at all," Ron Wilson of Plantation, Fla., wrote in a letter to the Sun-Sentinel newspaper.

Attempts to whiten Obama leave a bitter taste for many African-Americans, who feel that at their moment of triumph, the rules are being changed to steal what once was deemed worthless—blackness itself.

"For some people it's honestly confusion," said Favor, the Dartmouth professor. "For others it's a ploy to sort of reclaim the presidency for whiteness, as though Obama's blackness is somehow mitigated by being biracial."

Then there are the questions remaining from Obama's entry into national politics, when some blacks were leery of this Hawaiian-born newcomer who did not share their history. Linda Bob, a black schoolteacher from Eustis, Fla., said that calling Obama black when he was raised in a white family and none of his ancestors experienced slavery could cause some to ignore or forget the history of racial injustice.

"It just seems unfair to totally label him African-American without acknowledging that he was born to a white mother," she said. "It makes you feel like he doesn't have a class, a group."

There is at least one group eagerly waiting for Obama to embrace them. "To me, as to increasing numbers of mixed-race people, Barack Obama is not our first black president. He is our first biracial, bicultural president ... a bridge between races, a living symbol of tolerance, a signal that strict racial categories must go," Marie Arana wrote in the Washington Post.

He's a bridge between eras as well. The multiracial category "wasn't there when I was growing up," said John McWhorter, a 43-year-old fellow at the Manhattan Institute's Center for Race and Ethnicity, who is black. "In the '70s and the '80s, if somebody had one white parent and one black parent, the idea was they were black and had better get used to it and develop this black identity. That's now changing."

'Transitional period'

Latinos, whom the census identifies as an ethnic group and not a race, were not counted separately by the government until the 1970s. After the 1990 census, many people complained that the four racial categories—white, black, Asian, and American Indian/Alaska native—did not fit them. The government then allowed people to check more than one box. (It also added a fifth category, for Hawaiian and Pacific Islanders.) Six million people, or 2 percent of the population, now say they belong to more than one race, according to the most recent census figures. Another 19 million people, or 6 percent of the population, identify themselves as "some other race" than the five available choices.

The White House Office of Management and Budget, which oversees the census, specifically decided not to add a "multiracial" category, deeming it not a race in and of itself.

"We are in a transitional period" regarding these labels, McWhorter said. "I think that in only 20 years, the notion that there are white people and there are black people and anyone in between has some explaining to do and an identity to come up with, that will all seem very old-fashioned."

The debate over Obama's identity is just the latest step in a journey he unflinchingly chronicled in his memoir, "Dreams from My Father."

As a teenager, grappling with the social separation of his white classmates, "I had no idea who my own self was," Obama wrote.

No single definition

In college in the 1970s, like millions of other dark-skinned Americans searching for self respect in a discriminatory nation, Obama found refuge in blackness. Classmates who sidestepped the label "black" in favor of "multiracial" chafed at Obama's newfound pride:

"They avoided black people," he wrote. "It wasn't a matter of conscious choice, necessarily, just a matter of gravitational pull, the way integration always worked, a one-way street. The minority assimilated into the dominant culture, not the other way around."

Fast-forward 30 years, to the early stages of Obama's presidential campaign. Minorities are on track to outnumber whites, to redefine the dominant American culture. And the black political establishment, firmly rooted in the civil rights movement, questioned whether the outsider Obama was "black enough."

Then came the primary and general elections, when white voters were essential for victory. "Now I'm too black," Obama joked in July before an audience of minority journalists.

"There is this sense of going back and forth depending on the time of day in terms of making assessments about my candidacy."

Today, it seems no single definition does justice to Obama—or to a nation where the revelation that Obama's eighth cousin is Dick Cheney, the white vice president from Wyoming, caused barely a ripple in the campaign.

In his memoir, Obama says he was deeply affected by reading that Malcolm X, the black nationalist-turned-humanist, once wished his white blood could be expunged.

"Traveling down the road to self-respect my own white blood would never recede into mere abstraction," Obama wrote. "I was left to wonder what else I would be severing if I left my mother and my grandparents at some uncharted border."

Copyright 2008 The Associated Press

20081214-02	10:56	SteveM	Re: "Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveB,

Wrong dummy, His Father was Muslim, Arabic, African. They only reason he's not dead or in jail is a white women took him in and raised him. She was probably a charitable Christen too!

He is only exploiting the blacks and your white guilt.

20081214-03	11:28	SteveB	Re: Letter from John McCain to John Hinkley
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear BrentR,

That is a funny coincidence!

It is -20 F. (-30 C) here this morning. So much for my banana plants!

I hope you and yours have the best Christmas ever! (Even though we may have more snow!) Hopefully, when Santa comes to Bolivia, he'll leave his sleigh behind and hitch up some oxen to his wagon. He may also want to wear some lighter clothes for Santa Cruz, unless he's a true cholo.

20081214-04 12:45 SteveB Re: "Defining 'Mutt' Obama's True Colors"

Dear SteveM,

I have zero white guilt.

20081219-01 12:54 Dennis "Change You Won't Believe"

"Change You Won't Believe" by James Howard Kunstler,

Dec. 15, 2008, (<http://www.kunstler.com/blog/2008/12/change-you-wont-believe.html>)

The peak oil story has not been nullified by the scramble to unload every asset for cash—including whopping gobs of oil contracts—during this desperate season of bank liquidation. The main implication of the peak oil story is that we won't be able to generate the kind of economic growth that defined our way of life for decades because the primary energy resources needed for it will be contracting.

Just as global oil production peaked, our economy evolved into a morbid hypertrophy, and the chief manifestation of it was the suburban sprawl-building fiesta that has now climaxed in the real estate bust. By the early 21st century, when so much American manufacturing had been swapped out to Asia, there was no business left except sprawl-building—a manifold tragedy which wrecked the banks that financed it, and left the ordinary people mortgaged to it with ruinous liabilities.

That economy is now in its death throes. The "normality" it represents to so many Americans is gone and can't be brought back, no matter how wistfully we watch it recede. Even so, it was obviously not good for the country. The terrain of North America has been left scarred by unlovable objects and baleful futureless vistas that, from now on, will shed whatever pecuniary value they once had. It represents the physical counterpart to the financial mess that has been left to the young generations to clean up—and the job will take a very long time.

We have to, so to speak, get to place mentally where we can face the kinds of change that are now necessary and unavoidable. We're not there yet. It's not clear whether the elected new national leadership knows just how severe the required changes will really be. Surely the public would be shocked to grasp what's in store. Probably the worst thing we can do now would be to mount a campaign to stay where we are, lost in raptures of happy motoring and blue-light-special shopping.

The economy we're evolving into will be un-global, necessarily local and regional, and austere. It won't support even our current population. This being the case, the political fallout is also liable to be severe. For one thing, we'll have to put aside our sentimental fantasies about immigration. This is almost impossible to imagine, since that narrative is especially potent among the Democratic Party members who are coming in to run things. A tough immigration policy is exactly the kind of difficult change we have to face. This is no longer the 19th century. The narrative has to change.

The new narrative has to be about a managed contraction—and by "managed" I mean a way that does not produce civil violence, starvation, and public health disasters. One of the telltale signs to look for will be whether the Obama administration bandies around the word "growth." If you hear them use it, it will indicate that they don't understand the kind of change we face.

It is hugely ironic that the U.S. automobile industry is collapsing at this very moment, and the ongoing debate about whether to “rescue” it or not is an obvious kabuki theater exercise because this industry is hopeless. It is headed into bankruptcy with one hundred percent certainty. The only thing in question is whether the news of its death will spoil the Christmas of those who draw a paycheck from it, or those whose hopes for an easy retirement are vested in it. But American political-economy being very Santa Claus oriented for recent generations, the gesture will be made. A single leaky little lifeboat will be lowered and the chiefs of the Big Three will be invited to go for a brief little row, and then they will sink, glug, glug, glug, while the rusty old Titanic of the car industry slides diagonally into the deep behind them, against a sickening greenish-orange sunset backdrop of the morbid economy.

A key concept of the economy to come is that size matters—everything organized at the giant scale will suffer dysfunction and failure. Giant companies, giant governments, giant institutions will all get into trouble. This, unfortunately, doesn’t bode so well for the Obama team and it is salient reason why they must not mount a campaign to keep things the way they are and support enterprises that have to be let go, including many of the government’s own operations. The best thing Mr. Obama can do is act as a wise counselor companion-in-chief to a people who now have to leave a lot behind in order to move forward into a plausible future. He seems well-suited to this task in sensibility and intelligence. The task will surely include a degree of pretense that he is holding some familiar things together and propping up some touchstones of the comfortable life. But the truth is we are all going to the same unfamiliar new territory.

The economy we’re moving into will have to be one of real work, producing real things of value, at a scale consistent with energy resource reality. I’m convinced that farming will come much closer to the center of economic life, as the death of petro-agribusiness makes food production a matter of life and death in America—as opposed to the disaster of metabolic entertainment it is now. Reorganizing the landscape itself for this finer-scaled new type of farming is a task fraught with political peril (land ownership questions being historically one of the main reasons that societies fall into revolution). The public is completely unprepared for this kind of change. We still think that “the path to success” is based on getting a college degree certifying people for a lifetime of sitting in an office cubicle. This is so far from the approaching reality that it will be eventually viewed as a sick joke—like those old 1912 lithographs of mega-cities with Zeppelins plying the air between Everest-size skyscrapers.

The crucial element in the transformation underway will be emotion. The American experience for a few generations has produced an adult population with very childish instincts, increasingly worse each decade. For instance, the desperate power fantasies among the younger tattooed lumpenproles—those with next-to-zero real economic power—suggest a certain unappetizing playing-out of resource competition when the supply of Cheez Doodles and Pepsi starts to dwindle. But even the heretofore gainfully employed middle classes are pretty lost in fantasies at least of comfort and convenience. For years now, I have wondered how their sense of grievance and resentment will be expressed when the supermarket shelves run bare and the cardboard signs get taped over the local gas pump and the cable TV gets cut off for non-payment. You wonder, to put it bluntly, how far gone we really are.

Comment from Gary Gibson, Managing Editor, Whiskey & Gunpowder

Okay, Whiskey Shooters, I suspect that there will be some underwear bunching up because Jim mentioned Mr. Obama again without calling for his resignation or his head. I can’t stop the angry comments from pouring in—and in truth they’re kind of entertaining—but let me make clear my position in advance.

A President who restricts his activities to hand-holding and nice speeches would be a boon. What worries me is when heads of state and their congresses and parliaments and other bands of meddlers get it into their heads to “do something” and to “fix things”... which this administration—like every single one before it—will no doubt do. A mitts-off policy with a few there-there’s wouldn’t be bad at all.

That’s right, Barack; just commiserate...and try not to touch anything.

A point Jim keeps trying to drive home is that the scale of things will contract—of their own accord—in an energy scarce world. Big government’s going to become increasingly impotent. We can’t (and shouldn’t) count on them to help reorganize our lives. This is going to be a bottoms-up, local undertaking. Things won’t be re-localizing because of the decrees of a progressive government; they’ll be re-localizing because they must.

Gloom? Doom? Where? The transition’s liable to be traumatic, but the world’s liable to be a better place in many ways after reality has its way with us. We’ll all be plenty busy with re-establishing local farming...and manufacturing right here on our own shores! Paper-pushing will just be a necessary adjunct to a real economy that produces the things we need, instead of the primary means of wealth generation. The financial tail will cease wagging the economic dog. Textiles! Commodities! Maybe even a commodity currency!

And you can say you saw it coming. You can even position yourself to make the most of it right now.

20081223-01 18:03 SteveB To: Pat Buchanan; Free Trade vs. Jobs

Dear Pat Buchanan:

I've enjoyed watching you throughout the campaigns and election, though I often completely disagreed with you.

Today, though, when you talked about our autoworkers, for example, having to compete with Chinese workers, you were exactly, completely right.

Speaking as a retired automation controls design engineer who has started up factories in the U.S., Canada, China, Indonesia, Mexico, Great Britain, and Germany, what I can't understand is how anyone can argue with this position.

As my old German calculus professor at Purdue University used to say, "It's intuitively obvious." There has been no such thing as a level playing field.

What these idiots don't understand is that a service economy is just about nothing, because only manufacturing, mining, and farming create enough wealth to keep a modern economy going. Do they think we should all live like the Chinese and Mexicans (though I mean them no offense and actually love the people of both nations)? Actually, I think it has done harm to the world to help all these Third World countries become like America. Have you been to any Asian cities lately? There's no local charm left, just "Californication".

What may not be so obvious is how we have come to this idiotic "level playing field" of globalization. Our politicians have been bought and sold and they have sold their own country and its workers down the river. Campaign finance and lobbying reform MUST go forward to a point where this becomes impossible. The problem is with both Republicans and Democrats.

But how do we get the very rascals who take the money to vote to give up the money? I would love to hear your ideas.

Meanwhile, keep up the good work. Thank you.

P.S. Wasn't it embarrassing the way McCain and Palin worked to destroy their own party, the mighty GOP, by lying throughout the entire campaign? What a couple of stupid people.

—SteveB

20081227-01 11:12 SteveB Reply to Some Jesus Email

Dear Rosali,

I have a very hard time believing that God created the entire universe simply to play a gigantic game with the "devil". (I thought gambling was forbidden? Then why would God gamble for our souls when they are His already?) Nor does a close reading of the Bible reveal this to be the case. The "devil" is merely a symbol for the evil in our hearts, just as "demon possession", we now know, does not cause human diseases such as cancer.

It is so very dangerous to take the Bible too literally.

P.S. This is not the "devil" talking. Peace and love...

20081229-01 13:01 SteveB "Happy Birthday, Dear Yeshua, Happy Birthday to You!"

Dear Rosali,

"Yeshua" would have been fine with me. I have to wonder...if they have had so much trouble with the Savior's name...how much else have they gotten wrong simply because of the translation? Like "I am a son of God," not "I am the Son of God."

"Happy Birthday, Dear Yeshua, Happy Birthday to You!" by Brian Palmer, Slate

Dec. 24, 2008, (Article URL: <http://www.slate.com/id/2207398/>)

(Was Jesus a common name at the beginning of the first century?)

On Thursday, Christians will celebrate the birth of Jesus Christ. Was the Christian Messiah the first to have that name, or were there a lot of Jesuses running around back then?

Many people shared the name. Christ's given name, commonly Romanized as Yeshua, was quite common in first-century Galilee. (Jesus comes from the transliteration of Yeshua into Greek and then English.) Archaeologists have unearthed the tombs of 71 Yeshuas from the period of Jesus' death. The name also appears 30 times in the Old Testament in reference to four separate characters—including a descendent of Aaron who helped to distribute offerings of grain (2 Chronicles 31:15) and a man who accompanied former captives of Nebuchadnezzar back to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:2).

The long version of the name, Yehoshua, appears another few hundred times, referring most notably to the legendary conqueror of Jericho (and the second most famous bearer of the name). So why do we call the Hebrew hero of Jericho Joshua and the Christian Messiah Jesus? Because the New Testament was originally written in Greek, not Hebrew or Aramaic. Greeks did not use the sound sh, so the evangelists substituted an S sound. Then, to make it a masculine name, they added another S sound at the end. The earliest written version of the name Jesus is Romanized today as Iesous. (Thus the crucifix inscription INRI: "Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum," or "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews.")

The initial J didn't come until much later. That sound was foreign to Aramaic, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Not even English distinguished J from I until the mid-17th century. Thus, the 1611 King James Bible refers to Jesus as "Iesus" and his father as "Ioseph." The current spelling likely came from Switzerland, where J sounds more like the English Y. When English Protestants fled to Switzerland during the reign of the Catholic Queen Mary I, they drafted the Geneva Bible and used the Swiss spelling. Translators in England adopted the Geneva spelling by 1769.

In contrast, the Old Testament was translated directly from the original Hebrew into English, rather than via Greek. So anyone named Yehoshua or Yeshua in the Old Testament became Joshua in English. Meanwhile, the holy book of the Syrian Orthodox church, known as the Syriac Bible, is written in Aramaic. While its Gospels were translated from the original Greek, the early scribes recognized that Iesous was a corruption of the original Aramaic. Thus, the Syriac text refers to Yeshua.

Bonus Explainer: What was Jesus' last name? It wasn't Christ. Contemporaries would have called him Yeshua Bar Yehosef or Yeshua Nasraya. (That's "Jesus, son of Joseph" or "Jesus of Nazareth.") Galileans distinguished themselves from others with the same first name by adding either "son of" and their father's name, or their birthplace. People who knew Jesus would not have called him Christ, which is the translation of a Greek word meaning "anointed one."

Brian Palmer is a freelance writer living in Columbia, Md.

20090107-01	19:05	SteveB	To Glenn Beck: Doom
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------

Dear Glenn Beck:

I caught some of your radio program yesterday.

Your shrill, panicky rhetoric on the most hellacious doom scenarios possible is unbelievably overblown and completely lacking in credibility. Everyone knows that if idiot, senile McCain had won, you and Rush and all the other right-wing extremists would be singing a different tune, even though the government would be pursuing the exact same strategies that they are under Bush and Obama.

I find your tone and words to be essentially un-American. You don't even offer any hope or solutions. None of you do. Only doom. Do you really think that helps?

You say you don't want the doom to come, but I sincerely question that. You are going to look pretty silly and stupid if the doom does not come about. I hope, at that time, you will be man enough to admit that you panicked like a chicken and that you were wrong. That America and Americans are stronger and better than you assumed.

I find it so exceedingly strange that none of you extreme right-wingers ever stray from the same "party line" concerning any issue. Where is the creative, independent thinking you say you so admire? Every extreme right-wing pundit always says exactly the same (excuse me) cr*p. I find that so exceedingly strange.

Also, please remember that your extreme views are held by probably only 5-10% of Americans, at most. You all need to be a little more humble and admit to yourselves that you might not know all there is to know. When you talk to Rush or Hannity or Laura or even Lou Dobbs, as you must do daily or hourly to get your stories aligned, you might try to convince them to do the same. Thank you.

20090109-01	12:09	SteveB	Christmas
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------

Dear Cândida,

I was there when all three of my children were born. Seeing their little heads peek out...seeing them nurse for the first time...seeing their mother hold them...holding them myself, and seeing that calm but sort of confused look in their eyes, like they don't know exactly which planet they have arrived on...were maybe the most wonderful moments of my life.

And you mothers are so much closer to the miracle than we guys are. I think Freud was wrong about that penis envy cr*p...where the real envy lies is the envy men have for women and the miracle of life that they make happen. But I am so happy for you, my friend!

We've been watching a TV series about the Seven Deadly Sins...haha—lust (my personal favorite!), gluttony, greed, sloth, wrath, envy, and pride. I'm sure you had to memorize them. We were talking about them and how so much of the sin part involves excess and not following the Middle Way.

But the most interesting thing is that the two most deadly sins are not on the Church's list—fear and guilt! The Church reserved those two for itself, to use against the people to try to make them subservient and obedient to the Church. I'm not sure anything could be more evil than that. Fear is our greatest enemy...an enemy we must all defeat, not nurture as if it were a kind little baby. Guilt in moderation can be OK, but when used to control people, it becomes a source of pain and pure destructive evil.

Then the Church (and other religions, especially Islam) also took two wonderful things—faith and hope—and turned those against the people too. If people did not believe and hope for a heaven after this life, all the religious wars would cease. No matter what happens after we die, and I am guilty of hoping for something myself, especially for others like my son, I will never believe that there can be anything so sweet and wonderful, so beyond price as this life here that we are blessed with.

I wish all of your family the sense of wonder, fulfillment, and love that this life deserves.

20090111-01	01:43	Charlie	"Inaugurate This: Waiting for Barack Obama"
-----------------------------	-------	---------	---

Another good OpEd News piece. I love the term "politricks", personally.

"Inaugurate This: Waiting for Barack Obama" by Danny Schechter, OpEd News

Jan. 9, 2009, <http://www.opednews.com/articles/INAUGURATE-THIS-WAITING-F-by-Danny-Schechter-090109-839.html>

The inauguration of a new President is drawing close and the excitement in our media is palpable. All the outlets are planning big coverage and newspapers are doing special sections, with full color pictures and endless memorabilia. In the midst of this midwinter depression/recession—whatever it is—many Americans want to celebrate the end of the Bush era and the coming of a President they believe they can believe in.

You would think that Barack Obama might tone down the festivities, given the hard times, but the millions on their way to Washington next week don't want to hear that. They want to mark a historical moment by investing hopes and hearts in Barack Obama's triumph, by hoping that change is coming and that he will and can deliver on all his promises, heal a troubled world, crush the fiscal crisis, and turn a very nasty political page for the better.

I share those hopes but also call on my fellow Obamacrats to recognize that it will take the power of people's power—the grass roots organizing, internet magicians, and You Tube guerillas who put Barack in office—to help him achieve the change he told us he wants to bring to America.

We have to stop looking at him and start looking to ourselves, the people who knocked on doors, raised money, reached out independently of the campaign, signed petitions, held up signs, registered voters around the clock, made media and organized the most amazing campaign in American history to see who has the leverage to defeat the lobbyists, special interests and Republican operatives who will do everything they can to derail any and all progressive change. That is if any makes its way out of the centrist bureaucrats and pols Barack has felt it necessary to appoint to navigate the shark infested waters in Washington politricks.

In the aftermath of the campaign, every network ran retrospectives, recapping their highlights of the campaign, the chronology, the endless primaries the ads, the oratory, the polls, the debates, Reverend Wright, Sarah Palin, Bill Ayers, Joe the Plumber, and all the familiar hot button issues and controversies that were recycled daily by pundits who were largely blatantly partisan and mostly wrong.

While politicians ran for office, the media ran for ratings and bragging rights about exclusives and "breaking" news. They all celebrated themselves as much as the victor.

What was most missed was the actual campaign and what made the difference. In partnership with Anant Singh's Videovision, I am directing a film that tells this story, that goes deeper than the hype. It shows how a former community organizer organized a community of believers that outworked their adversaries and did what was originally considered impossible by the cogniscenti: put a candidate of color in the highest office in the land.

How was this done? Who done it? We were unable to secure the campaign's support to tell this story—we were told they are in "lockdown,"— but we went ahead anyway with the enthusiastic cooperation of people who know Obama well and others who anonymously marched in his army as cogs in what became a well oiled machine. They think the real story must be told.

In many cases, these people were early converts, risking derision in their own communities and friends convinced by the media that the better-known front runners were unbeatable. These were people who followed their passion, invested time and money and in some cases gave up their normal lives to organize rallies, man (and wo-man) offices, make phone calls, send emails and work under the radar of a media that only focuses on events, celebrity candidates and political elites, rarely the people down below.

They held the faith when no one knew who Obama was or what he stood for. They stood by him when he was viciously attacked, denounced, lied about and maligned. They came from all races, all parts of the country, and many sacrificed jobs and income.

They were small d democrats in the sense that they showed us that grass roots democracy still has "legs." They were people who moved into high gear for many reasons—many because of a desire to end the war, or because he knew how to communicate with young people, or out of racial pride, or just plain disgust with the Busheviks and McNasties.

Some were political. Many were not. There was a wellspring of creativity. 1500 videos were made by the campaign along and probably twice as many by independent filmmakers, animators, and musicians. There was a rock musical, the Obama girl phenomenon (Yes, eat your hearts out (smile) I met her too,), Amigos De Obama, the Great Schlep, comedy, paintings, stickers, and endless emails. The social networking power of the internet was tapped with blogs, Flickr, Facebook, My Space. Twitter and texting. By the time it was through, Obama built a data base of ten million names, No one has ever done that. Half of his large war chest was raised on the internet in small donations.

More importantly, many of the campaign groups are still meeting sill organizing, still committed to the values Obama invoked. The world is waiting for Obama. I know many progressives, myself among them are disappointed by many Cabinet picks and cagey statement. I fear that many of the activists who have already opened up on Obama—who want him to be Hugo Chavez , not the centrist he is— risk alienating his supporters who have to be encouraged to stay engaged and press for the changes they worked for. Obama will need that kind of pressure, even if he won't always welcome it publicly. There will be a learning curve for all of us.

The democracy scholar and DEMOS fellow Ben Barber told us: "The world awaits Obama, there's no question about it. Everywhere I go, everyone I talk to, the expectations are just sky-high. And the sense that this is going to be a new kind of American President, a new face, a multicultural, a black face, a diplomatic face, an internationalist face of America is ever, so much so that you will certainly be disappointed."

I then asked, "Is there something about Washington, about politics, about special interests that is like a swamp, no matter what your intentions are, no matter what changes you wanna make, you get sucked into this vortex of a certain way of dealing, deference , playing to the power people, governed by the rules and protocols. I fear that no matter where, where you coming from you end up trapped in this machine."

He replied:

Cynics will tell you that Washington is a swamp and no matter where you come from, when you get there you get muddy, you're gonna get mired, you're gonna, get quick sand. Your gonna end up is dirty as everyone else...

(However) if you are a historian, you also look and say: wait a minute. Some people have come to Washington and have done better than others. Even the swamp can be changed, you can drain the swamp, you can spray the swamp ... you can dehydrate, there is a lot of things you can do about a swamp other than get sucked up by it, and there have been presidents who've been more successful and less successful doing it.

Will this be a period like the aftermaths of the civil war, like the New Deal, where America remakes itself, where it drains the swamp and fixes it and the answer to this is: it could happen, it could happen, we will see.

I will be sharing more of our insightful interviews as I cover the inauguration and its aftermath.

(News Dissector Danny Schechter is a filmmaker, editor of Mediachannel.org and the author of PLUNDER: Investigating Our Economic Calamity (Cosimo Books at Amazon). Comments to dissector@mediachannel.org.

20090116-01	08:07	SteveG	Fw: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson
-------------	-------	--------	--

[Source of original email unknown. Debunked by Snopes.com, see below. —SteveB]

Judy Wallman, a professional genealogy researcher in southern California , was doing some personal work on her own family tree. She discovered that Harry Reid's great-great uncle, Remus Reid, was hanged for horse stealing and train robbery in Montana in 1889. Both Judy and Harry Reid share this common ancestor: Harry Reid The only known photograph of Remus shows him standing on the gallows in Montana territory.

On the back of the picture Judy obtained during her research is this inscription: 'Remus Reid, horse thief, sent to Montana Territorial Prison 1885, escaped 1887, robbed the Montana Flyer six times. Caught by Pinkerton detectives, convicted and hanged in 1889.' So Judy recently e-mailed Congressman Harry Reid for information about their great great uncle.

Believe it or not, Harry Reid's staff sent back the following biographical sketch for her genealogy research: 'Remus Reid was a famous cowboy in the Montana Territory . His business empire grew to include acquisition of valuable equestrian assets and intimate dealings with the Montana railroad. Beginning in 1883, he devoted several years of his life to government service, finally taking leave to resume his dealings with the railroad. In 1887, he was a key player in a vital investigation run by the renowned Pinkerton Detective Agency. In 1889, Remus passed away during an important civic function held in his honor when the platform upon which he was standing collapsed.'

NOW THAT is how it's done folks! That's real SPIN.

20090116-02 08:26 SteveB Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

Dear SteveG,

People don't really believe all these Republican lies do they? I guess many people do—the Right are expert liars! The real story is here:

<http://www.snopes.com/politics/humor/horsethief.asp>

20090116-03 08:46 SteveG Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

Dear SteveB,

Ain't SPIN a grand thing????

So you people in Montana are really sitting in 80 degree weather than subzero an Florida is a—6, think that spin will work? Amazing!!!!!!

20090116-04 09:03 SteveB Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

Dear SteveG,

Spin? The whole story is an outright lie (see Snopes.com). Not that I am a big fan of Harry Reid.

Did you see Bush's speech last night? How embarrassing! He is unable to admit to a single mistake or misjudgment. No wonder he was such a failure—his ego keeps him out of touch with reality. It's probably a defense mechanism for being so stupid, I guess.

It's too bad we can't devise some sort of job application psychological test that could keep defective people like him from running for office in the future, and also to keep people like many of his buddies and appointments out of government service.

20090116-05 09:17 SteveG Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

Dear SteveB,

I didn't watch it, but heard clips here and there. Our son teaches logic, ethics, and intro to philosophy. He had his logic students watch the debates and gave extra credit for documented instances of faulty logic. All I could think of in hearing the clip was the faulty logic that was coming out of the guy's mouth.

Exceptionally embarrassing!!!!!! The whole 8 years have been a nightmare!

Did you hear the confirmation hearings on the attorney general candidate? Sounds good to me. Do you think anyone will file war crime charges?

20090116-06 09:46 SteveB Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

Dear SteveG,

Ya, I think Holder made a very good impression. He sure has a big job ahead of him in the nearly destroyed Justice Dept.

War crimes trials: boy, I'm really divided here. I keep thinking I'd love to see Cheney brought before a firing squad or sent to Guantanamo. I'm pretty convinced the Moslem radicals see us as weak anyway, they would really see us as weak if we did that. So what if the French would be pleased! But maybe the world would see us as just and fair once again. Bush, no. If our President was convicted of war crimes, no President would ever be fully trusted with war again.

I don't understand why these people and our radical Right, like Rush Limbaugh and Glenn Beck, don't see the danger we place our troops in by torturing anyone. (Except if we just make them listen to Brittany Spears or Megadeth or Snoop Dog 24 hours a day.)

This war trials issue is so tough for me that I'll just trust Obama to make the right decision.

20090116-07 10:10 SteveG Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

Dear SteveB,

It is a tough issue, but someone has to be held accountable. We impeached Clinton for getting a bl*w job and improper use of a cigar, and yet we have not done anything with Rumsfeld, Scooter, Cheney, Bush, Gonzalez, etc. We outsourced a lot of the war crimes portions to the Blackhawk group, and Cheney's old company. Accountability besides the little fiasco with Scooter has to come around some time.

Part of the problem is that both houses of congress and both parties went along with the Bush administration decisions. Only Dennis Kucinich of Ohio made a big effort to do something and people laughed at him. We have to do completely away with lobbying, have all elections the same everywhere, do away with pork, have tight control over junkets, and elect people to do what is right for the country.

20090116-08 10:25 SteveB Re: Harry Reid: Montana History Lesson

from SteveG:

We have to do completely away with lobbying, have all elections the same everywhere, do away with pork, have tight control over junkets, and elect people to do what is right for the country.

Dear SteveG,

I agree 1000%! It is so obvious how corrupt our system has become. To really fit it, though, might take the revolution we talked about in the '60's. It is so hard for the corrupt to remedy their own corruption. So far, they haven't been able to do anything except smoke and mirrors.

20090117-01 10:53 SteveB To Glenn Beck: Fired from CNN

Dear Glenn Beck:

I was so very happy at NOT finding your insane rantings any more on CNN! What an improvement in the TV/cable landscape!

Then I learned you were moving to FOX Faux News, where maybe you belong, if your crazy paranoia belongs anywhere.

You really need to chill-out, Mr. Nazi!

Jeez, your shrill whining gets so old so fast.

20090117-02 14:31 SteveB The Truth, with Love

Dear Rosali,

The Pope and his interpretation of the Bible were said to be infallible. We now know this was wrong. Or the Crusades, the Inquisition, the molestations, and all the other evils of the Church might not have happened.

If even the Pope is not infallible, how can any other man or woman know the mind of God in any perfect, infallible way? Why is one a perfect interpretation of the Bible and all others wrong? How can anyone know which is the perfect interpretation? Hence, we have an almost infinite number of churches—The First Baptist Church, The Ninth Baptist Church, etc. The faith, belief, and hope of each seems equally strong and firm, yet each stands on a different foundation.

A riddle with no solution...

Se dijo que el Papa y su interpretación de la Biblia era infalible. Ahora sabemos que este se equivocó. O las Cruzadas, la Inquisición, los violations, y todos los otros males de la Iglesia no habrían pasado.

¿Si hasta el Papa es bastante falible, cómo puede algún otro hombre o la mujer saben la mente de Dios de algún modo perfecto, infalible? ¿Por qué uno es una interpretación perfecta de la Biblia y todos los otros incorrectos? ¿Cómo puede alguien saber cual es la interpretación perfecta?

Un acertijo sin solución...

20090118-01 09:13 SteveB "Republicans, Democrats Differ on Creationism"

"Republicans, Democrats Differ on Creationism" by Frank Newport, Gallup

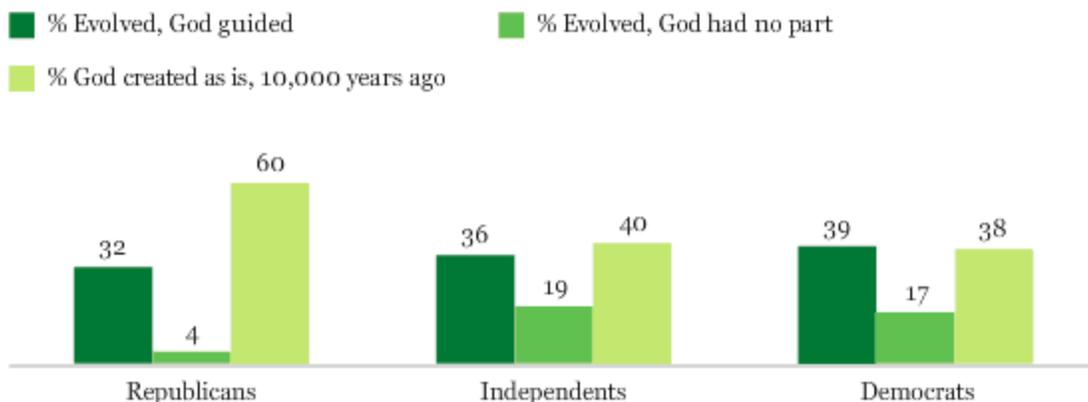

June 20, 2008, (<http://www.gallup.com/poll/108226/Republicans-Democrats-Differ-Creationism.aspx>)

Republicans much more likely than Democrats to believe humans created as-is 10,000 years ago

(PRINCETON, NJ) There is a significant political divide in beliefs about the origin of human beings, with 60% of Republicans saying humans were created in their present form by God 10,000 years ago, a belief shared by only 40% of independents and 38% of Democrats.

Which comes closest to your views: 1) Humans developed over millions of years, God guided, 2) Humans developed over millions of years, God had no part, 3) God created humans as is within the last 10,000 years

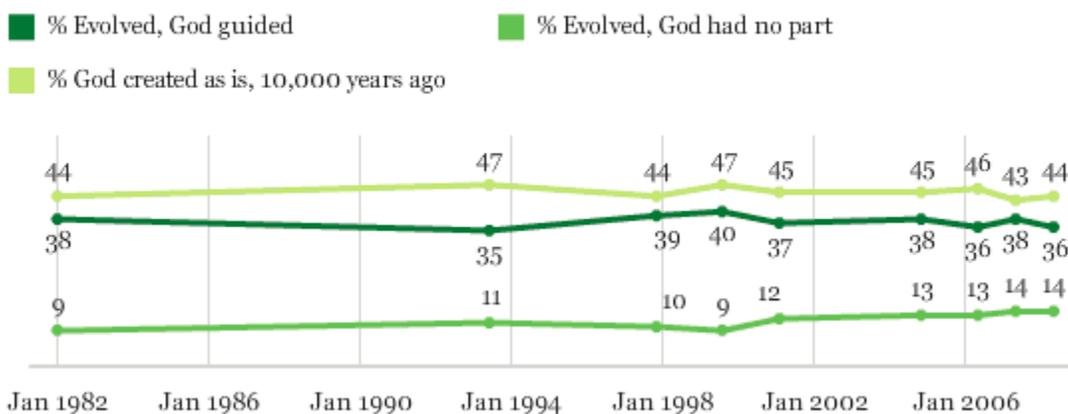

By party ID

GALLUP POLL

Gallup has been asking this three-part question about the origin of humans since 1982. Perhaps surprisingly to some, the results for the broad sample of adult Americans show very little change over the years.

Which comes closest to your views: 1) Humans developed over millions of years, God guided, 2) Humans developed over millions of years, God had no part, 3) God created humans as is within the last 10,000 years

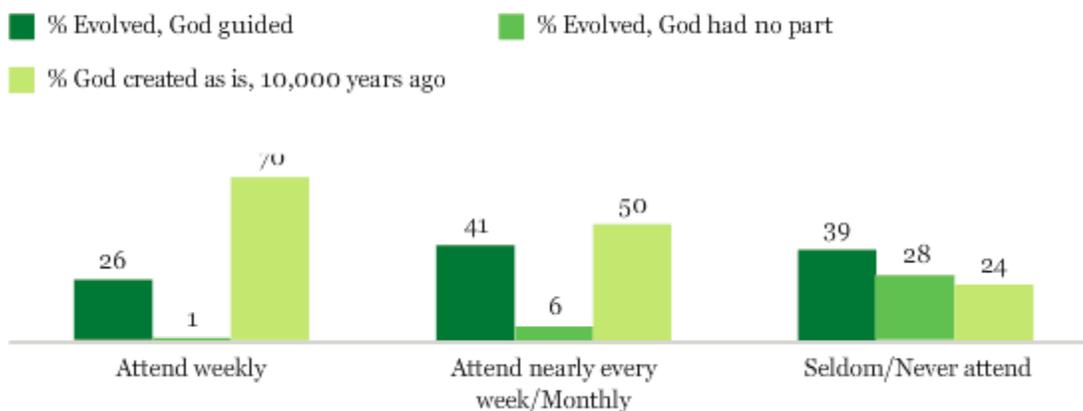

GALLUP POLL

Between 43% and 47% of Americans have agreed during this 26-year time period with the creationist view that God created human beings pretty much in their present form at one time within the last 10,000 years or so. Between 35% and 40% have agreed with the alternative explanation that humans evolved, but with God guiding the process, while 9% to 14% have chosen a pure secularist evolution perspective that humans evolved with no guidance by God.

The significantly higher percentage of Republicans who select the creationist view reflects in part the strong relationship between religion and views on the origin of humans. Republicans are significantly more likely to attend church weekly than are others, and Americans who attend church weekly are highly likely to select the creationist alternative for the origin of humans.

Which comes closest to your views: 1) Humans developed over millions of years, God guided, 2) Humans developed over millions of years, God had no part, 3) God created humans as is within last 10,000 years

By church attendance

GALLUP POLL

Implications

Although it is not a front-burner issue (particularly in light of the economy and the price of gasoline) the issue of teaching evolution in schools came up on the campaign trail last year, and could resurface in one way or the other between now and the November election.

Presumptive Republican nominee John McCain is facing the challenge of gaining the confidence and enthusiasm of conservative Republicans. Turnout among this group could be an important factor in determining the final vote outcome in a number of key swing states. As seen here, Republicans are in general sympathetic to the creationist explanation of the origin of humans, and if the issue of what is taught in schools relating to evolution and creationism surfaces as a campaign issue, McCain's response could turn out to be quite important.

Survey Methods

Results are based on telephone interviews with 1,017 national adults, aged 18 and older, conducted May 8-11, 2008. For results based on the total sample of national adults, one can say with 95% confidence that the maximum margin of sampling error is ± 3 percentage points.

20090119-01 12:56 G. Beck Re: Fired from CNN

[I love this! What a smart-a*s! —SteveB]

Dear SteveB:

You do have an off switch and a channel change button you can use.

20090120-01 10:41 SteveB Re: Fired from CNN

Dear Glenn Beck:

Gee, how clever! That, however, is hardly the point. The point is the senseless damage your gloom and doom does to the nation.

20090120-02 14:10 SteveB "Text of Obama's Speech for His Inauguration as 44th President"

"Text of Obama's Speech for His Inauguration as 44th President" by AP

Jan. 20, 2009, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2009/01/20/us/politics/20text-obama.html?pagewanted=all>)

(WASHINGTON) My fellow citizens,

I stand here today humbled by the task before us, grateful for the trust you have bestowed, mindful of the sacrifices borne by our ancestors. I thank President Bush for his service to our nation, as well as the generosity and cooperation he has shown throughout this transition.

Forty-four Americans have now taken the presidential oath. The words have been spoken during rising tides of prosperity and the still waters of peace. Yet, every so often the oath is taken amidst gathering clouds and raging storms. At these moments, America has carried on not simply because of the skill or vision of those in high office, but because We the People have remained faithful to the ideals of our forbearers, and true to our founding documents.

So it has been. So it must be with this generation of Americans.

That we are in the midst of crisis is now well understood. Our nation is at war, against a far-reaching network of violence and hatred. Our economy is badly weakened, a consequence of greed and irresponsibility on the part of some, but also our collective failure to make hard choices and prepare the nation for a new age. Homes have been lost; jobs shed; businesses shuttered. Our health care is too costly; our schools fail too many; and each day brings further evidence that the ways we use energy strengthen our adversaries and threaten our planet.

These are the indicators of crisis, subject to data and statistics. Less measurable but no less profound is a sapping of confidence across our land—a nagging fear that America's decline is inevitable, and that the next generation must lower its sights.

Today I say to you that the challenges we face are real. They are serious and they are many. They will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this, America— they will be met.

On this day, we gather because we have chosen hope over fear, unity of purpose over conflict and discord.

On this day, we come to proclaim an end to the petty grievances and false promises, the recriminations and worn out dogmas, that for far too long have strangled our politics. We remain a young nation, but in the words of Scripture, the time has come to set aside childish things. The time has come to reaffirm our enduring spirit; to choose our better history; to carry forward that precious gift, that noble idea, passed on from generation to generation: the God-given promise that all are equal, all are free, and all deserve a chance to pursue their full measure of happiness.

In reaffirming the greatness of our nation, we understand that greatness is never a given. It must be earned. Our journey has never been one of short-cuts or settling for less. It has not been the path for the faint-hearted—for those who prefer leisure over work, or seek only the pleasures of riches and fame. Rather, it has been the risk-takers, the doers, the makers of things—some celebrated but more often men and women obscure in their labor, who have carried us up the long, rugged path towards prosperity and freedom.

For us, they packed up their few worldly possessions and traveled across oceans in search of a new life.

For us, they toiled in sweatshops and settled the West; endured the lash of the whip and plowed the hard earth.

For us, they fought and died, in places like Concord and Gettysburg; Normandy and Khe Sahn.

Time and again these men and women struggled and sacrificed and worked till their hands were raw so that we might live a better life. They saw America as bigger than the sum of our individual ambitions; greater than all the differences of birth or wealth or faction.

This is the journey we continue today. We remain the most prosperous, powerful nation on Earth. Our workers are no less productive than when this crisis began. Our minds are no less inventive, our goods and services no less needed than they were last week or last month or last year. Our capacity remains undiminished. But our time of standing pat, of protecting narrow interests and putting off unpleasant decisions—that time has surely passed. Starting today, we must pick ourselves up, dust ourselves off, and begin again the work of remaking America.

For everywhere we look, there is work to be done. The state of the economy calls for action, bold and swift, and we will act—not only to create new jobs, but to lay a new foundation for growth. We will build the roads and bridges, the electric grids and digital lines that feed our commerce and bind us together. We will restore science to its rightful place, and wield technology's wonders to raise health care's quality and lower its cost. We will harness the sun and the winds and the soil to fuel our cars and run our factories.

And we will transform our schools and colleges and universities to meet the demands of a new age. All this we can do. All this we will do.

Now, there are some who question the scale of our ambitions—who suggest that our system cannot tolerate too many big plans. Their memories are short. For they have forgotten what this country has already done; what free men and women can achieve when imagination is joined to common purpose, and necessity to courage.

What the cynics fail to understand is that the ground has shifted beneath them—that the stale political arguments that have consumed us for so long no longer apply. The question we ask today is not whether our government is too big or too small, but whether it works—whether it helps families find jobs at a decent wage, care they can afford, a retirement that is dignified. Where the answer is yes, we intend to move forward. Where the answer is no, programs will end. And those of us who manage the public's dollars will be held to account—to spend wisely, reform bad habits, and do our business in the light of day—because only then can we restore the vital trust between a people and their government.

Nor is the question before us whether the market is a force for good or ill. Its power to generate wealth and expand freedom is unmatched, but this crisis has reminded us that without a watchful eye, the market can spin out of control—and that a nation cannot prosper long when it favors only the prosperous. The success of our economy has always depended not just on the size of our Gross Domestic Product, but on the reach of our prosperity; on the ability to extend opportunity to every willing heart—not out of charity, but because it is the surest route to our common good.

As for our common defense, we reject as false the choice between our safety and our ideals. Our Founding Fathers, faced with perils we can scarcely imagine, drafted a charter to assure the rule of law and the rights of man, a charter expanded by the blood of generations. Those ideals still light the world, and we will not give them up for expedience's sake. And so to all other peoples and governments who are watching today, from the grandest capitals to the small village where my father was born: know that America is a friend of each nation and every man, woman, and child who seeks a future of peace and dignity, and we are ready to lead once more.

Recall that earlier generations faced down fascism and communism not just with missiles and tanks, but with sturdy alliances and enduring convictions. They understood that our power alone cannot protect us, nor does it entitle us to do as we please. Instead, they knew that our power grows through its prudent use; our security emanates from the justness of our cause, the force of our example, the tempering qualities of humility and restraint.

We are the keepers of this legacy. Guided by these principles once more, we can meet those new threats that demand even greater effort—even greater cooperation and understanding between nations. We will begin to responsibly leave Iraq to its people, and forge a hard-earned peace in Afghanistan. With old friends and former foes, we will work tirelessly to lessen the nuclear threat, and roll back the specter of a warming planet. We will not apologize for our way of life, nor will we waver in its defense, and for those who seek to advance their aims by inducing terror and slaughtering innocents, we say to you now that our spirit is stronger and cannot be broken; you cannot outlast us, and we will defeat you.

For we know that our patchwork heritage is a strength, not a weakness. We are a nation of Christians and Muslims, Jews and Hindus—and non-believers. We are shaped by every language and culture, drawn from every end of this Earth; and because we have tasted the bitter swill of civil war and segregation, and emerged from that dark chapter stronger and more united, we cannot help but believe that the old hatreds shall someday pass; that the lines of tribe shall soon dissolve; that as the world grows smaller, our common humanity shall reveal itself; and that America must play its role in ushering in a new era of peace.

To the Muslim world, we seek a new way forward, based on mutual interest and mutual respect. To those leaders around the globe who seek to sow conflict, or blame their society's ills on the West—know that your people will judge you on what you can build, not what you destroy. To those who cling to power through corruption and deceit and the silencing of dissent, know that you are on the wrong side of history; but that we will extend a hand if you are willing to unclench your fist.

To the people of poor nations, we pledge to work alongside you to make your farms flourish and let clean waters flow; to nourish starved bodies and feed hungry minds. And to those nations like ours that enjoy relative plenty, we say we can no longer afford indifference to suffering outside our borders; nor can we consume the world's resources without regard to effect. For the world has changed, and we must change with it. As we consider the road that unfolds before us, we remember with humble gratitude those brave Americans who, at this very hour, patrol far-off deserts and distant mountains. They have something to tell us, just as the fallen heroes who lie in Arlington whisper through the ages. We honor them not only because they are guardians of our liberty, but because they embody the spirit of service; a willingness to find meaning in something greater than themselves. And yet, at this moment—a moment that will define a generation—it is precisely this spirit that must inhabit us all.

For as much as government can do and must do, it is ultimately the faith and determination of the American people upon which this nation relies. It is the kindness to take in a stranger when the levees break, the selflessness of workers who would rather cut their hours than see a friend lose their job which sees us through our darkest hours. It is the firefighter's courage to storm a stairway filled with smoke, but also a parent's willingness to nurture a child, that finally decides our fate.

Our challenges may be new. The instruments with which we meet them may be new. But those values upon which our success depends—honesty and hard work, courage and fair play, tolerance and curiosity, loyalty and patriotism—these things are old. These things are true. They have been the quiet force of progress throughout our history. What is demanded then is a return to these truths. What is required of us now is a new era of responsibility—a recognition, on the part of every American, that we have duties to ourselves, our nation, and the world, duties that we do not grudgingly accept but rather seize gladly, firm in the knowledge that there is nothing so satisfying to the spirit, so defining of our character, than giving our all to a difficult task.

This is the price and the promise of citizenship.

This is the source of our confidence—the knowledge that God calls on us to shape an uncertain destiny.

This is the meaning of our liberty and our creed—why men and women and children of every race and every faith can join in celebration across this magnificent mall, and why a man whose father less than sixty years ago might not have been served at a local restaurant can now stand before you to take a most sacred oath.

So let us mark this day with remembrance, of who we are and how far we have traveled. In the year of America's birth, in the coldest of months, a small band of patriots huddled by dying campfires on the shores of an icy river. The capital was abandoned. The enemy was advancing. The snow was stained with blood. At a moment when the outcome of our revolution was most in doubt, the father of our nation ordered these words be read to the people:

"Let it be told to the future world...that in the depth of winter, when nothing but hope and virtue could survive ... that the city and the country, alarmed at one common danger, came forth to meet [it]."

America. In the face of our common dangers, in this winter of our hardship, let us remember these timeless words. With hope and virtue, let us brave once more the icy currents, and endure what storms may come. Let it be said by our children's children that when we were tested we refused to let this journey end, that we did not turn back nor did we falter; and with eyes fixed on the horizon and God's grace upon us, we carried forth that great gift of freedom and delivered it safely to future generations.

Thank you. God bless you. And God bless the United States of America.

20090130-01	13:42	Dennis	"The Good War" (on Terror)
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------

"The Good War" by Bill Bonner, The Daily Reckoning

Jan. 30, 2009, (<http://dailyreckoning.com/the-good-war/>)

The Washington Post reports that the War on Terror is over. No armistice has been announced. No treaty has been signed. The whole thing is just being dropped quietly, like a burnt-out cigarette. Too bad. It was our favorite war.

In the few words that follow, we explain why. First, the background: "The history of the world is but the biography of great men," was Thomas Carlyle's contribution to the genre. But here at The Daily Reckoning we are more of the 'cometh the hour, cometh the man' school of history. When something needs doing...there is always some clown dim enough to do it. Osama bin Laden was that man.

"Bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy", was what he was up to, he said in a videotape. He even did the math. "Every dollar spent by al-Qaida in attacking the U.S. has cost Washington $1m (£545,000) in economic fallout and military spending," said the report. "We, alongside the mujahideen, bled Russia for 10 years, [in Afghanistan] until it went bankrupt ... So we are continuing this policy in bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy."

How many generations will still tell of bin Laden's triumph? He brought down not just one empire, but two. His band of terrorists leached the Soviets so thoroughly, they fainted. It was no coincidence that the Soviets lost Afghanistan in the same year their empire disintegrated. Then, he delivered a challenge to the America's 'amour propre.'

The attack on the World Trade Center incited a death wish. The feds flashed a Red Alert; Americans covered in their houses and sealed their windows and doors against biological attack. The 9/11 attackers could have been pursued by the usual gendarmes—at negligible cost. Instead, in the general panic, the Bush administration decided to go all out. Thus it was that the greatest stimulus package since WWII began—in haste and in delusion.

The federal budget went from its biggest surpluses to its biggest deficits. Interest rates were cut too—to an emergency rate of 1%. Within 24 months, the bubble in the Nasdaq was replaced by much bigger bubbles—in housing, finance, derivative debt, art, private equity, executive compensation, student loans and other forms of private debt. In effect, bin Laden suckered the fattest man on earth into having another éclair. The thunder coming from the financial markets for the past 18 months is the noise of his midriff exploding.

But we are not writing to complain about Osama bin Laden or the Bush Administration's reaction. When it comes to war and adultery, make-believe may be better than the real thing. Certainly, it is safer. In the War on Terror, the enemy had no tanks...no aircraft... no ships...no armies...no celebrated strategists...no famous generals...no sophisticated weapons...no military culture...no leather trench coats...no burnished helmets...no battle cries.... The problem was, it was hard to find the enemy at all. The Department of Homeland Security conducted 3 billion airport inspections looking for them. We remember getting patted down so thoroughly we felt we should leave a tip. But how many enemy combatants do you think they nabbed? Not a one.

There are two possibilities. The first is that the security procedures were so fearsome that terrorists dared not try anything funny. The second is that there weren't really many terrorists at large—at least, not in the United States of America.

But compare it to WWI or WWII...or even a penny ante affair like the Spanish American war. The War on Terror mobilized the whole nation in a Great National Cause...at much expense, much damage to the Constitution, and much inconvenience, but without actually causing much real suffering. Sure, a few hapless Muslims, caught in the wrong place at the wrong time, were put on the rack. And yes, the cops in London gunned down a Brazilian electrician. Back in the United States, young couples did not embrace as they had in WWII—that is, as if there would be no tomorrow. Instead, they spent money as if there would be no tomorrow! No doubt, the desperate spending contributed to the bankruptcy of the whole system of bubble finance. But compared to the pain of a shooting war; the War on Terror was a delight. As far as we know, the Department of Homeland Security suffered not a single casualty. Not even any self-inflicted wounds. No executions for treason. And hardly any reported cases, neither of fleeing in the face of the enemy...nor collaborating...nor sabotage.

What a shame to let such a marvelous war to end without even a victory parade. Some of the agents should at least get medals for courage under fire...or exceptional valor.

Perhaps some special award Such as the special agents who arrested Tamera Jo Freeman. A 'Black Heart' medal might be appropriate. The woman was on a flight to Denver when her children got into a squabble. She spanked them both...and then Homeland Security agents put the cuffs on her. Charged with committing an "act of terrorism" she spent three months in jail and lost custody of her children. And there ought to be some medal for the Pentagon flatfoot who put the long arm of American law all the way across the Atlantic and onto the shoulder of Gary McKinnon. Mr. McKinnon, as the mayor of London informed us on Tuesday, believes in UFOs. And to prove that the U.S. army is hiding information on extraterrestrials, he hacked into the Pentagon's computer...leaving his email address and a message: "Your security is cr*p."

Rather than thank him for this useful observation, the Defense Department no doubt put out a billion dollar consulting contract for someone to tell them their security is cr*p...and put out a warrant for Mr. McKinnon's arrest on a terrorism charge. That kind of service above and beyond the call of duty should be recognized.

So form up the battalions of veterans! Assemble the legions of luggage inspectors and metal detector operators...and all the thousands of investigators, worn down by five years of following leads to nowhere! Dress them up in bright, clean uniforms...and give them their moment of glory. Pin medals on their chests. Then have a jolly march down Fifth Avenue. Line the streets. Give them a hearty hoorah as they march by. Throw out the ticker tape. Young girls ...fling yourselves at them...and get a kiss! And then, send them home.

20090211-01 14:45 SteveB "Geithner's First Test Is a Disaster"
--

"Geithner's First Test Is a Disaster" by Jon Markman, MSN Money

Feb. 11, 2009, (<http://articles.moneycentral.msn.com/Investing/SuperModels/geithners-first-test-is-a-disaster.aspx>)

(In his initial public pronouncement on the government's financial bailout plans, the best the new Treasury secretary can offer is an uninspiring rehash.)

You know that awful feeling when you're the new guy and you've been working on a project for three months, and you've made no progress, and then the boss gives you a deadline? First you ask for one more day, but when the time finally comes that you've got to deliver, you've still got nothin', so you talk fast, use a lot of jargon, promise more details soon and hope no one notices you've got squat.

It's happened to all of us, but few have failed their first assignment on such an epic scale as Tim Geithner, the new Treasury secretary.

On Tuesday afternoon, he delivered the most remarkable "dog ate my homework" excuse in the history of the U.S. financial markets, making it more plain than ever that the government simply has no idea how to end the financial crisis or how to reassure the world that everything will be all right anyway.

The big idea was a vaguely described public-private partnership to acquire soured loans from banks that real-money investors have already said they would buy only if offered full guarantees against loss—and even then only with a gun at their heads.

"His speech was totally uninspiring. There was nothing new, no change," said Stan Shipley, a senior analyst at ISI Group in New York. Said David Kotok of Cumberland Advisors: "The proposal was nothing more than a promise to deliver a proposal. People are getting tired of this."

The lack of a detailed plan is important not just for investors but also for the average worker, mom and student because it means there really is no easy way out of the global economic crisis. It means we have assigned the job of fixing the banking system to the smartest guy the government could find and surrounded him with every possible resource, and given him plenty of time to think, and still he came up with bupkis.

That is scary to people, as well it should be. No one is going to cry crocodile tears for 30-year-old investment bankers who have lost their million-dollar jobs, but the impact on all Americans will be harsh and long-lasting.

Once the government truly socializes the banking system's losses by taking on the ruined loans, there will be little credit left for all the things that were so much fun in the past two decades. It will be hard to persuade banks to lend their precious money to dads for unproductive assets like leisure boats or even to real-estate investors for new apartment buildings, or to farmers for new tractors.

Salaries and living standards will come down, as instead of borrowing and spending we will have to develop a culture of saving and waiting.

Eventually, we will innovate and grow our way out of this hole, but it will take patience and time. Politicians don't want to tell us this, so they have planned a final $800 billion plus party paid for with taxpayer appropriation and borrowing.

But eventually, when that money is spent, there will be no other choice but to admit our mistakes and buckle down for a world with less credit and lower asset values. Call it a depression, a prolonged recession or a flat spot in the road, but it will likely lead to a string of one-term presidencies and the relegation of the name Tim Geithner to trivia contests.

That's part of the reason investors, who had shown remarkable restraint and hope in recent days as they awaited Geithner's plan, responded in the only way they knew how, which was with a giant raspberry: Shares of big companies were flung to their biggest losses in three months as a shiver of despair ripped through trading floors.

There was a slight lag of disbelief that the Treasury secretary had offered nothing but a rehash, a repackaging and renaming of old ideas, before markets tumbled with a great collective sigh in the afternoon, wiping out 10% of the total market value of major banks in four hours.

Though it may have seemed to casual observers that Geithner had offered a set of decisive options with a $1 trillion price tag, people in the investment industry realized all his ideas have already been tried and failed or have little support outside Washington intellectual circles.

"Geithner showed that not only does the emperor have no clothes, but he has nothing else either," said Satyajit Das, a global banking expert working in Australia. "He showed that the government has exhausted its ability to use monetary policy and has no new ideas to use alternative strategies, so-called quantitative easing, to relieve credit stresses either."

The problem, of course, is that there really is no neat, easy way to clean up the mess left behind by a multi-decade orgy of credit. Investors have suspected that, but now it's finally sinking in as true. Starting in the mid-1990s, mathematicians came up with incredible new ways to create money from thin air. Banks turned the theories into loans, dupes at ratings agencies blessed them as risk-free, and salesmen chopped them up and sold them to gullible investors.

These cheap, easy-to-get loans allowed people around the United States to buy much more home than they could really afford, as well as second homes, furniture, snowmobiles and the like, allowed businesses to expand much more than they could really afford and allowed governments to extend a lot more benefits to citizens than they could really afford. In essence, the new loan theory financed a false prosperity that went on for so long that people came to think of it as normal.

The underlying engine for all this credit growth was escalating home prices, and when that stopped the tower of credit came crashing down, leaving homeowners without the ability to pay their loans and banks holding the bag. The roughly $5 trillion in losses that financial institutions have on their books now are directly a result of this incredible error of judgment made when government regulators failed to rein in investment banks who competed with each other to make those loans and reward themselves richly in the process.

Realistic experts—at least the ones without political agendas—all agree that the only way to seriously deal with this colossal blunder is for the government to force banks to admit they screwed up and write the value of these loans down to zero. That would wipe out the assets of most major banks, making their equity worth nothing and their bonds worth little. They would be forced into bankruptcy, a process that would allow them to be recapitalized over time and then, later, re-privatized.

Nationalization would not be the end of the world, but it is a concept that is so anathema to Americans that it seemingly cannot be said in polite company. So instead we have this long, dragged-out Kabuki theater in which the banks have essentially been nationalized in everything but name, and yet no one will admit it to the American people. And the cost of this denial is another trillion-dollar program that will do nothing, most experts agree, except buy time until nationalization must be done later.

Government officials and economists hold up the example of the "lost decade" in Japan—a post-credit bubble era in which banks were allowed to cling to life but never regained enough strength to lend and help grow the economy—as an example of what they wish to avoid. The mantra in Washington is that policymakers won't make that mistake again. Yet New York private fund manager Craig Drill, who has studied the lost decade for years, says the situation we face today is really no different.

"Three years from now, people will decide that Japanese policymakers weren't so stupid after all," he said. "We're going to discover that there really was no solution, no way to snap your fingers and make it all better. The only solution is time."

20090214-01	12:25	SteveM	Fw: Jimmy Carter: The Worst President in American History
-------------	-------	--------	---

Profile in incompetence:

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

The Worst President in American History

Jimmy Carter became our 39th president at the young age of 52. He was a one-term governor from Plains, GA, where he managed the family peanut farm and taught Sunday school. He was also a graduate of the Naval Academy and served seven years in the Navy, leaving as a lieutenant.

He came to power in the aftermath of the Vietnam War and the resignation of President Nixon. The public wanted change and someone new, and Carter was an ambitious, hands-on politician who promised better days. As good as his intentions were, however, the things he tried were not successful. In fact, he created far more serious problems than he ever solved.

The centerpiece of Carter's foreign policy was human rights, and he did achieve one noble success—a peace treaty between Egypt 's Anwar Sadat and Israel 's Menachem Begin. Unfortunately, that later led to Sadat's assassination at the hands of Muslim radicals. [So? —SteveB]

Many people felt Carter was a good man who worked hard and meant well. But he was naive and incompetent in handling the enormous burdens and complex challenges of being president.

He wrongly believed Americans had an 'inordinate fear of communism,' so he lifted travel bans to Cuba , North Vietnam and Cambodia and pardoned draft evaders. He also stopped B-1 bomber production and gave away our strategically located Panama Canal.

His most damaging miscalculation was the withdrawal of U.S. support for the Shah of Iran , a strong and longtime military ally. Carter objected to the Shah's alleged mistreatment of imprisoned Soviet spies who were working to overthrow Iran's government. He thought the exiled Ayatollah Khomeini, being a religious man, would make a fairer leader.

Having lost U.S. support, the Shah was overthrown, the Ayatollah returned, Iran was declared an Islamic nation and Palestinian hit men were hired to eliminate opposition. The Ayatollah then introduced the idea of suicide bombers to the Palestine Liberation Organization, paying $35,000 to PLO families whose young people were brainwashed to kill as many Israelis as possible by blowing themselves up in crowded shopping areas. Next, the Ayatollah used Iran 's oil wealth to create, train and finance a new terrorist organization, Hezbollah, which later would attack Israel in 2006.

In Nov., 1979, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other Iranians stormed the U.S. embassy in Tehran and took 52 Americans hostage for 444 days. Not until six months into the ordeal did Carter attempt a rescue. But the mission, using just six Navy helicopters, was poorly executed. Three of the copters were disabled or lost in sandstorms. (Pilots weren't allowed to meet with weather forecasters because someone in authority worried about security.) Five airmen and three Marines lost their lives.

So, due to over confidence, inexperience and poor judgment, Carter undermined and lost a strong ally, Iran , that today aggressively threatens the U.S, Israel and the rest of the world with nuclear weapons.

But that's not all. After Carter met for the first time with Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, the U.S.S.R. promptly invaded Afghanistan . Carter, ever the naive appeaser, was shocked. 'I can't believe the Russians lied to me,' he said.

The invasion attracted a 23-year-old Saudi named Osama bin Laden to Afghanistan to recruit Muslim fighters and raise money for an anti-Soviet jihad. Part of that group eventually became al-Qaida, a terrorist organization that would declare war on America several times between 1996 and 1998 before attacking us on 9/11, killing more Americans than the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

On Carter's watch, the Soviet Union went on an unrestrained rampage in which it took over not only Afghanistan , but also Ethiopia , South Yemen, Angola , Cambodia , Mozambique , Grenada and Nicaragua.

In spite of this, Carter's last defense budget proposed spending 45% below pre- Vietnam levels for fighter aircraft, 75% for ships, 83% for attack submarines and 90% for helicopters.

Years later, as a civilian, Carter negotiated a peace agreement with North Korea to keep that communist country from developing nuclear weapons He also convinced President Clinton and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to go along with it. But the signed piece of paper proved worthless. The North Koreans deceived Carter and instead used our money, incentives and technical equipment to build nuclear weapons and pose the threat we face today.

Thus did Carter unwittingly become our Neville Chamberlain, creating with his well intended but inept, unrealistic and gullible actions the very conditions that led to the three most dangerous security threats we face today: Iran , al-Qaida and North Korea.

On the domestic side, Carter gave us inflation of 15%, the highest in 34 years; interest rates of 21%, the highest in 115 years; and a severe energy crisis with lines around the block at gas stations nationwide.

In 1977, Carter, along with a Democrat Congress, created a worthy project with noble intentions—the Community Reinvestment Act. Over strong industry objections, it mandated that all banks meet the credit needs of their entire communities.

In 1995, President Clinton imposed even stronger regulations and performance tests that coerced banks to substantially increase loans to low-income, poverty-area borrowers or face fines or possible restrictions on expansion. These revisions allowed for securitization of CRA loans containing subprime mortgages.

By 1997, good loans were bundled with poor ones and sold as prime packages to institutions here and abroad. That shifted risk from the loan originators, freeing banks to begin pyramiding and make more of these profitable subprime products.

Under two young, well-intended presidents, therefore, big-government plans and mandates played a significant role in the current subprime mortgage mess and its catastrophic consequences for the U.S. and international economies.

Hardest-hit by the mortgage foreclosures have been the citizens that Democrats always claim to help most—inner-city residents who fell victim to low or no down payment schemes, unexpected adjustable rates, deceptive loan applications and commission-hungry salespeople.

Now we're having to bail out at huge cost Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the very agencies that were supposed to stabilize the system. In time, this should improve the situation. But the party of Carter and Clinton that midwived our mortgage mess now wants to be trusted to take over and have the government run our entire system of health care!

And everyone is blaming Bush for our current problems. [Now, why would anybody do anything like that? LOL! We all know that Jimmy Carter is responsible for all the world's problems, including 9/11. And, for some reason, 12 years of republican administrations didn't undo anything Carter did. —SteveB]

20090214-02	15:02	SteveB	Re: Jimmy Carter; "The Violent Language of Right-Wing Pundits Poisons Our Democracy" Etc.
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveM,

I'm not at all interested in this partisan, ideological, anti-American (because it hopes for the failure of America, upon which the last, fading hopes of the right-wing now relies) drivel (BS). I thought I made that clear.

For "Violent" (in the title) substitute "Catastrophic" or "Doom-Mongering" or "Doom-Wishing".

"The Violent Language of Right-Wing Pundits Poisons Our Democracy" by Jeffrey Feldman, AlterNet

May 6, 2008, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/84490/>)

(The following is an excerpt from Jeffrey Feldmann's new book Outright Barbarous: How the Violent Language of the Right Poisons American Democracy (Ig Publishing, 2008).)

The emergence of a cohort of right-wing pundits who use violent logic, language and arguments in national political debate did not gradually take shape over a long stretch of time, but rose up at a startling speed in the lead-up to the national elections of 2004 and 2006. As the horrific extent of the Iraqi military occupation waxed and George W. Bush's popularity waned, a hitherto sarcastic right-wing punditry seemed all at once to step into a new rhetorical frame. Suddenly, with Bush's re-election in doubt, casualties spiraling out of control, and revelations of U.S. military human rights abuses popping up all over, rightwing pundits shifted their tone from critique to conspiracy. The shift is summed up best by the opening line in Dinesh D'Souza's book The Enemy at Home: "The cultural left in this country is responsible for causing 9/11."

As if that is not enough, D'Souza's book also accuses liberals of engaging in civil war with the rest of America and of harboring a violent dream that complements the terrorist goals of Osama Bin Laden, yearns for the destruction of U.S. military forces in Iraq and seeks the downfall of the United States. D'Souza's book filled mainstream bookstores, giving scholarly legitimacy to violent accusations of high treason against vast segments of the American population.

Violent language as a manner of speech amongst right-wing pundits reached a crescendo in the days leading up to the 2006 midterm elections. I remember flipping through TV channels one day, attempting to avoid pundits' violent rhetoric. But such language was everywhere. Anne Coulter joked about "nuking" Iran, Bill O'Reilly talked about the "war on Christmas," Pat Buchanan and Lou Dobbs spoke of the "invasion" and "conquest" of America by immigrants. I even came across a discussion of the "war against the war," in which an anti-war protest was discussed as if it was a war. Every political topic seemed clouded over by a right-wing pundit using violence language.

In the first few months after the 2006 mid-term elections, I penned several blog posts questioning whether the rise of violent rhetoric on the right might be a dangerous development that could possibly transform, through a sudden incident, into actual physical violence. Turning to the work of Hannah Arendt, in particular her masterful study of politics and violence, On Violence, I began to realize that the last significant violent turn in American political ideology and practice involved both the political right and the left. The late 1960s was a time, Arendt explained, where people increasingly believed that violence could actually produce controlled political outcomes.

The result was an era in U.S. politics where a broad range of different political organizations and movements each took up violence, a product of the widespread acceptance of Mao Tse-tung's aphorism "Political power grows at the barrel of a gun." Arendt watched this moment lead to assassinations and mass chaos in urban centers, and thus argued that violence was problematic because it led to outcomes in politics that could not be controlled. Violence, she explained, drawing on a famous quote from Karl Marx, may be the birth pang of a new political body, but we would never say that labor pains were the cause of a birth. The same is true with violence, which occasionally happens at times of great political change but is not the cause of such change.

Arendt's thoughts on violence helped me to clarify several aspects of the trend in rightwing violent language that I was tracking in the media. First, I realized that the use of violent language was not accidental, but was the product of a shift in the political philosophy on which the right-wing punditry built their ideas. The shift was from a rhetoric of parody and burlesque to one of violence and accusation. Second, Arendt helped me to clarify exactly what role "violence" was playing in the worldview of the right-wing pundits. Most right-wing pundits see the power of the state as residing ultimately in the monopoly over violence, an idea that comes from the writings of German philosopher Max Weber. This, however, is not the political philosophy that guided the framers of the U.S. Constitution. In other words, violent rhetoric is not just a question of linguistic style, but a sign that a political philosophy in conflict with American deliberative democracy has captured the imagination of many right-wing pundits. Many factors have led to the emergence of violence among right-wing pundits, but the events of 9/11 seem central. In the wake of the attacks, right-wing pundits grew ever more convinced that the continued survival of United States depended on its willingness to use violence. The more violent language filled the airwaves of America's broadcast media, the more this new and disturbing logic of violence and power seemed to saturate public thinking. Lastly, Arendt's writing helped me to see that the American form of deliberative democratic politics itself was a form of government crafted as a replacement for earlier forms of rule by violence.

In a discussion of American politics, the opposite of violence has never been nonviolence, but participation—specifically, participation in deliberative democracy. The quintessential American town hall meetings that Jefferson imagined happening amongst small, mostly agricultural communities in rural colonial America were not just a system for accomplishing the needs of the people but a bulwark against tyrannical rule that resulted from a royal monopoly on all forms of power.

After considering the violent language from right-wing pundits, I began to see the language of America's elected leaders in a new light, particularly the rhetoric of President Bush and Vice President Cheney. It was clear to me that from the start of its term in office, the Bush administration was unrivaled in its ability to manipulate the public via the media. As such, strong political ties to privately owned, right-wing broadcast media was its biggest political asset. Yet, beyond their ability to wield control of the means of communication in our country, President Bush and Vice President Cheney embraced violence as a structuring concept in their political speech.

President Bush first stepped in the direction of violent language in the week following the attacks of Sept. 11, when he gave a series of public statements during visits to the White House by foreign dignitaries and U.S. government employees. The stated theme of that week was the mounting of a campaign to fight terrorism on a global scale, but the agenda had much more to do with constructing a new persona for Bush through a series of violent statements threatening the perpetrators of the attacks of 9/11. Over and over again that week, Bush said, "We're going to smoke them out of their holes," talking about the impending operations to find the terrorists responsible for 9/11 as if he were a cowboy setting out to kill prairie animals. Attempting much more than a bad John Wayne impersonation in those speeches, Bush was boldly stepping across a line that most presidents rarely crossed: direct calls for the death of other human beings.

That was a week of unimaginable emotional anguish for most Americans, and Bush's foray into violent language was largely hailed as welcome bravado in response to an act of war. While researching my book on presidential speeches in the summer of 2006, I went back to the transcripts of Bush's post-9/11 appearances and found moments filled with glib references to death and killing. Speaking to employees at the Pentagon on Sept. 17, 2001, for example, Bush said the following in response to a reporter's question:

I know that this is a different type of enemy than we're used to. It's an enemy that likes to hide and burrow in, and their network is extensive. There are no rules. It's barbaric behavior. They slit throats of women on airplanes in order to achieve an objective that is beyond comprehension. And they like to hit, and then they like to hide out. But we're going to smoke them out. And we're adjusting our thinking to the new type of enemy.

A sitting U.S. president's using his own voice to advocate graphic violence to the public signaled a disturbing change in our political system. Events can be relayed in a variety of ways. President Bush chose violent descriptions to sum up the problem. At first glance, one would assume that his words had the obvious impact of injecting fear into American consciousness. Indeed, they did. In the months that followed Sept. 11, 2001, the country grew more and more afraid of knife-yielding terrorists on planes and more afraid of hidden threats, as waves of panic spread back and forth across the country.

President Bush's metaphoric description of terrorists as animals skilled at hiding and committing barbaric acts of murder led people to accept that safety and security could only be restored by an equally violent process of hunting and killing. The violence of 9/11 had made Americans nervous about danger from the skies. As President Bush began to describe hidden threats of "barbaric" violence, Americans began to worry about which dangerous persons might be hiding in their own communities, or standing behind them in the grocery store lines, or sitting one seat over on the subway.

President Bush's turn to violent language was foreshadowed by his prior interest in the bellicose foreign policy vision of right-wing think tanks that had been pushing violent foreign policy since the late 1990s, such as the Project For The New American Century. His speeches also served as a green light to right-wing pundits, inviting them to step into a violent political idiom. Perhaps nobody embodied this more than Anne Coulter. Having made a name for herself as a pundit willing to talk about sex, Coulter's first column after 9/11 called for Americans to "invade" Muslim nations, "kill" their leaders and "convert" foreign citizens to Christianity. Coulter had lost a close friend in one of the planes that crashed on 9/11. Angry rhetoric in response to personal loss was a form of expression that most Americans understood, even as they felt uncomfortable with it. Nonetheless, Coulter's violent language took mainstream American media to a place it had not been since at least the 1950s, if not the 1930s. Another important step was about to be taken, however, and in this case it would be prominent pundits in the media who took the lead.

Whereas Bush had turned to violent language as a technique for dehumanizing the enemy—talking about terrorists as if they were animals to be hunted and exterminated—rightwing pundits on radio, television and in print slowly infused violent language into domestic political debate. Radicalized right-wing activists calling Democrats "murderers" had been a familiar, albeit disturbing, aspect of the abortion right's debate. What changed, however, was the sudden linking of violent death in 9/11 to issues that had hitherto been discussed solely in terms of competing social agendas. Speaking in the days after the events of 9/11 on the 700 Club, the flagship daily broadcast of his Christian Broadcast Network, Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell blamed the death and destruction on liberal groups in America:

FALWELL: The ACLU's got to take a lot of blame for this.

ROBERTSON: Well, yes.

FALWELL: And, I know that I'll hear from them for this. But, throwing God out successfully with the help of the federal court system, throwing God out of the public square, out of the schools. The abortionists have got to bear some burden for this because God will not be mocked. And when we destroy 40 million little innocent babies, we make God mad. I really believe that the pagans, and the abortionists, and the feminists, and the gays and the lesbians who are actively trying to make that an alternative lifestyle, the ACLU, People For the American Way, all of them who have tried to secularize America. I point the finger in their face and say, "You helped this happen."

ROBERTSON: Well, I totally concur, and the problem is we have adopted that agenda at the highest levels of our government. And so we're responsible as a free society for what the top people do. And, the top people, of course, is the court system.

Falwell's idea that "we make God mad so God uses terrorists to exact revenge" found its correlate in equally shocking attempts by left-wing pundits and intellectuals to somehow blame the murders of 9/11 on social and economic conservatives. Political activist and professor Ward Churchill, for example, claimed infamously that the victims of the attacks were somehow responsible for their own deaths by virtue of their employment in a capitalist society and was deservedly excoriated for doing so. Nonetheless, the limited amount of violent rhetoric from the left that followed 9/11 quickly dissipated. Falwell's and Robertson's exchange, by contrast, nudged open a door that more and more pundits in the right-wing media began to walk through because of two additional factors that had set up a tectonic shift in right-wing rhetoric.

The first factor was that Falwell's and Robertson's comments happened in a post-2000 America where key evangelical leaders wield unprecedented national influence. Most notable among these evangelical leaders is James Dobson, founder and chairman of the Christian parenting organization Focus on the Family and a best-selling right-wing author who writes and speaks about the importance of using physical violence as a technique for disciplining children. Dobson played a prominent role in turning out the vote in the 2000 presidential election, and as a result, his authoritarian writing on parenting is now widely discussed in the mainstream media. In the period immediately after 9/11, however, the influence of Dobson went far beyond the question of raising children to the much broader issue of how the terrain of political debate in America had shifted in the months prior to the attacks of 2001. The Dobson era in the Republican Party, in other words, heralded a newfound comfort with the use of violent terms on a host of social issues, including homosexuality, the family and education.

The second factor was the resurgence of the National Rifle Association as a political force in right-wing politics. Most prominent of all, then NRA Vice President Wayne LaPierre had already employed violent language to argue against gun control laws in the year prior to Sept. 11. In mid-2000, for example, LaPierre accused Bill Clinton of having blood on his hands for not enforcing gun laws, pushing the argument that Democrats allowed violent crime to happen in order to advance a liberal agenda and deny gun owners their constitutional rights. LaPierre's rhetoric was so inflammatory that even then NRA president, Charlton Heston, felt the need to redress him. Nonetheless, with the election of George W. Bush, LaPierre emerged as the premier author and TV pundit on gun issues. The dual rise of authoritarian evangelicals and NRA leadership in the Republican Party and the media prepared American civic debate to acquiesce to a higher level of violent rhetoric in domestic politics.

The run up to the 2004 presidential election further increased the volume and frequency of violent rhetoric in right-wing media—a key transformation in the Republican Party that became embodied in the words and persona of Dick Cheney. Caught in a cycle of bad news from Iraq, human rights abuses, tales of secret prisons, and mounting corruption scandals, the Republican Party launched a PR campaign to equate a Democratic return to the White House with increased terrorist attacks. Speaking to a packed crowd in Des Moines, Iowa on Sept. 9, 2004, Cheney brought violence to the heart of his campaign rhetoric: It's absolutely essential that eight weeks from today, on Nov. 2, we make the right choice. Because if we make the wrong choice, then the danger is that we'll get hit again, that we'll be hit in a way that will be devastating from the standpoint of the United States, and that we'll fall back into the pre-9/11 mindset, if you will, that in fact these terrorist attacks are just criminal acts and that we're not really at war. I think that would be a terrible mistake for us. We have to understand it is a war.

Cheney proffered his violent theme to persuade voters. Rather than tone down his speeches in response to criticism, Cheney steeled his resolve and rallied the party faithful. By 2006, arguing that electoral victory for the Democrats would lead to the mass death of Americans by terrorists had become the core election strategy of the Republican Party. As election day neared, then Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman commissioned a political ad called "The Stakes," combining a ticking bomb soundtrack, images of Osama Bin Laden, video clips from terrorist training films and shots of exploding nuclear bombs. The violent message of the ad was that a vote for the Democrats was a vote for mass annihilation at the hands of nuclear-armed Al Qaeda terrorists. The arc that had begun with President Bush using violence to dehumanize terrorists was now complete.

At this point in the discussion, many people often mistake a concern for violent rhetoric with attempts to censor political speech or limit freedom of expression. It is an understandable reaction brought on by the deep affection Americans hold for the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. Freedom of speech—no matter how obscene, offensive or threatening that speech may be—cannot be limited, curtailed or regulated without violating civil rights, or so the argument goes.

In general, the American system recognizes that speech is not to be limited up to the point that it presents "a clear and present danger of action of the kind the state is empowered to prevent and punish." Shouting "Fire!" in a crowded theater, which we are not free to do, is the classic example. If we walk into a theater and cause mass hysteria by yelling "Fire!" without due cause, there will be a penalty for our destructive action. If someone says to a friend "Shoot that man there," and he does so—that speech is part of the crime and, thus falls under the criminal statutes against murder. Moreover, what we all too often forget in our rush to assert freedom of expression is the other side of the First Amendment, a side that is in many ways even more important: freedom from compulsion. Compelling individuals to speak or express themselves in a specific way, particularly by the state, damages the First Amendment as much if not more than limiting individual expression. If, for example, a newspaper editor were compelled to print the news each morning according to the dictates of the White House communications director, that compulsion would infringe upon the First Amendment rights of far more people than just the editor. Anyone who read or heard about the information in that paper—as government had compelled the editor to include it—would be deprived of his or her First Amendment rights. Moreover, when it comes to violence in speech, context is everything. Violent language appears in the Bible, in Homer's works and in fairy tales, for example, but our system would never tolerate laws limiting the circulation or reading of The Book of Job, The Iliad or Little Red Riding Hood.

Following these basic principles, the U.S. federal government and court system have treated broadcast media, with its unrivalled ability to penetrate every aspect of American life, as a medium with potential for endangering certain individuals if left completely unregulated. In 2007, for example, the Federal Communications Commission issued a report studying the effects of violent television on America's children. The FCC came to the conclusion that efforts should be made to "channel" violent programming into those times of the day when children were least likely to be exposed to it and, wherever possible, to notify viewers in advance of violent content through a ratings system. Most of us benefit from this two-pronged approach without even thinking about it. When it is time for certain entertainment shows to start, a viewer discretion screen appears long enough to alert us to any violent content, language or otherwise, and in that moment we decide whether to continue watching or to choose another program. Most importantly, if we have children, that warning gives us a chance to decide if the content of the show is appropriate for our families.

As much as our system cares about protecting children from unwittingly coming into content with violent language in entertainment, the American system bends over backwards to make sure that none of the same measures infringe upon political speech. When it comes to political speech, the concern over compulsion is so deeply rooted in our culture that most scheduling restrictions or viewer advisories are held at bay. The exception to that rule, of course, are political shows that step clearly into a potential danger zone by virtue of their use of adult language—i.e., swear words. The best example of a political show that has been time channeled and includes viewer advisories is Real Time with Bill Maher. Clearly, there are commercial disadvantages to airing a political talk show after 11 p.m., but they are balanced by the benefits of helping parents protect their children. That is not to say that Bill Maher's language is "bad" for children, but only that the content of the discussions he leads are widely viewed as inappropriate for audiences under a certain age. Viewer advisories and time channeling are widely seen as helpful precisely because it is so difficult to define "violence" in such a way that would allow producers of content to predictably comply with regulations limiting it.

While not a source of violent rhetoric, Bill Maher's show includes many adult themes. As such, it points to a question about political media rarely asked in discussions of regulatory efforts with respect to violent language in broadcast TV: Are most political talk shows news or entertainment? Maher's show, with its signature combination of comedy monologue and celebrity roundtable discussion, is clearly a form of entertainment designed to challenge viewers to think critically about politics. Its content is political, but Real Time is entertainment. For many other political talk shows on TV, particularly those on Fox News, the line between news and entertainment becomes blurry if not invisible altogether. For example, in Apr., 2007, on an episode of The O'Reilly Factor, host Bill O'Reilly and his guest Geraldo Rivera discussed the issue of drunk driving, crime and illegal immigration through an exchange of violent rhetoric that many viewers described as unprecedented on a "news" broadcast. Given how disconcerted so many viewers were in response to this particular episode of O'Reilly's show, it suggests that the type of violent exchange it featured warranted a viewer discretion advisory and time channeling required of a show more explicitly presented as entertainment. The question, in other words, is not one of censorship, but of the best way to protect viewers given the unprecedented power of broadcast media in our society and the number of political talk shows that inhabit the gray zone between news and entertainment.

(Jeffrey Feldman is editor-in-chief of Frameshop and author of Outright Barbarous: How the Violent Language of the Right Poisons American Democracy (Ig Publishing, 2008).)

20090214-03	20:19	SteveM	Re: Jimmy Carter; Etc.
-------------	-------	--------	------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Here's what you've made clear, that you only believe in free speech as long as you're doing the talking, hence you use of anti-American. No mention of hope for failure was made in the history lesson I sent you. It Freedom of speech, not from speech! Leave it to you to not read it.

The other thing you've made clear with your vicious personal attacks on candidates and me is the you have no problem dishing it out, but you can't take it, punk. Don't bother replying, we're done, F*cking with you no longer amuses me. You really turned out be a disappointment. As I'm sure you Montana neighbors feel the same.

20090215-01 06:07 SteveB Re: Jimmy Carter; Etc.

Dear SteveM,

So be it. You never could stick to the issues, my friend.

I wonder where the extreme right and the Republicans are going to be if the current crisis does NOT turn into another Great Depression? The trash can of history? They sure act as if they know it. Hence, the constant gloom and doom and fear-mongering, instead of solutions.

What I had sent you was something pretty much anti-Obama, though I support him. You sent me more partisan, anti-Democrat same-old-same-old, and then talked about freedom of speech. It is you who have robbed yourself of freedom of speech by refusing to ever consider anything not dictated by the radical right, the very dying sliver of the population that is the source of so many of America's problems, in my humble opinion.

Hope you have a nice life. Try to be positive. America ain't dead yet!

20090217-01 09:58 SteveB "Metrics of National Decline"

"Metrics of National Decline" by Patrick J. Buchanan, Human Events

Feb. 17, 2009, (<http://www.humanevents.com/article.php?id=30725>) (<http://buchanan.org/blog/2009/02/pjb-metrics-of-national-decline/>)

"Bush Boom Continues" trilled the headline over the Lawrence Kudlow column, as George W. Bush closed out his seventh year in office.

"You can call it Goldilocks 2.0," purred Kudlow.

Yes, you could. But what a difference 12 months can make.

Final returns are now in on the eight years of George Bush. Charles McMillion of MBG Information Services has crunched the numbers. And, pace Kudlow, the only relevant comparison is to Herbert Hoover.

From Jan., 2008, right after Kudlow's column ran, through Jan., 2009, the U.S. economy lost 3.5 million jobs. The private sector loss of 3.65 million jobs was slightly offset by 148,000 jobs created by federal, state and local governments. Say what you will, the Bush years were boom times for Big Government.

And the private sector? Beginning and ending in recession, the Bush presidency added a net of 407,000 private sector jobs over eight years, less than 51,000 a year, the worst eight-year record since 1927-35, which includes the first six years of the Great Depression.

By Jan., 2009, the average workweek had fallen to 33.3 hours, the lowest since record keeping began in 1964.

From Jan. 31, 2001, through Jan. 31, 2009, 4.4 million manufacturing jobs, 26 percent of all of the manufacturing jobs in the United States, disappeared.

Semiconductors and electronic component producers lost 42 percent of their jobs. Communications equipment producers lost 48 percent of their jobs. Textile and apparel producers lost, respectively, 63 percent and 61 percent of their jobs.

As a source of American jobs, manufacturing, for the first time in our history, fell below health care and education in 2001, below retail sales in 2002, below local government in 2006, below leisure and hospitality, i.e., restaurants and bars, in 2008.

Between this unprecedented loss in manufacturing capacity and jobs, and the $3.5 trillion in trade deficits in manufactured goods alone, run up by George W. Bush, the correlation is absolute.

Last week, final trade figures for 2008 came in. They make for riveting reading for Americans who yet believe that manufacturing is an indispensable element of national power.

With China exporting five times the dollar volume in goods to us as she imports from us, Beijing's trade surplus with the United States set yet another world record: $266 billion. In those critical items the Commerce Department defines as advanced technology products (ATP), our trade deficit with China in 2008 reached an astonishing $72 billion. Since Bush took office, our total trade deficit with China in ATP exceeds $300 billion. Which of us, China or America, has the trade profile of a mature industrial and technological power?

Americans deplore our deepening dependence on foreign regimes for the vital necessity of oil. Are they unaware that the U.S. trade deficit in manufactured goods, $440 billion, is $89 billion greater than our all-time record trade deficit of $351 billion in crude oil? Why is a dependence on Canada, Mexico, Venezuela or Saudi Arabia for oil a greater peril than a reliance on China and Asia for vital necessities upon which our prosperity and military depend?

A week ago, the Washington Times ("Volcker Blames Recession on Trade Imbalances") reported that ex-Fed Chair Paul Volcker told Congress the "massive trade-related imbalances in the United States economy were the source of the financial crisis." Pressed by Sen. Chris Dodd, Volcker said, "Go back to the imbalances in the economy. The United States has been consuming more than it has been producing for many years." What "imbalances" was Volcker referring to? Perhaps these.

Since 1982, the United States has run $5.7 trillion in trade deficits in manufactured goods, and $2.1 trillion in trade deficits in auto parts, trucks and automobiles. In the Bush years alone, the United States ran more than $1 trillion in trade deficits in auto parts, trucks and cars.

These statistics, these realities—factories closing in the United States, manufacturing jobs being outsourced in the millions to China and Asia, enormous, endless trade deficits in goods—testify to a painful truth: America is a receding and declining world power. And in dealing with this systemic crisis, Obama's stimulus package is as irrelevant as were the Bush tax cuts.

How do we correct those "trade-related imbalances" of which Volcker spoke? We must export more and import less, save more and spend less, produce more and consume less. We need to emulate the ants and behave less like the grasshoppers of summer.

But how do you tell that to two generations of Americans who have been raised in an era of entitlement?

America needs an Industrial Policy.

But how do you tell that to Americans indoctrinated in the hoary myth that Reed Smoot and Willis Hawley caused the Great Depression and anything that sounds like America First risks a rerun of the 1930s?

20090303-01	11:17	Dennis	Fw: The Current Economic Crisis According to the Three Stooges
-------------	-------	--------	--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

The Current Economic Crisis According to the Three Stooges

Curly says to Moe: "You owe me ten dollars." Moe says to Larry: "Hey! You owe me ten dollars!" Larry says to Curly: "And you owe me ten dollars!"

Curly to Larry: "All I got is a five. Here's five. I'll owe you five." Larry to Moe: "Here's five. I'll owe you five." Moe to Curly: "Here's five. I'll owe you five."

Curly to Larry: "Here's the five I owe you." Larry to Moe: "Here's the five I owe you." Moe to Curly: "Here's the five I owe you."

Altogether, Moe, Larry and Curly were responsible for $25 dollars of debt. All that debt was retired with a $5 bill.

Now, suppose that Moe, Larry and Curly had, in a flash of inspiration, decided to stop lending to each other.

Moe owes $10. Larry owes $10. Curly has five but owes $10.... a $5 deficit.

The plan is for each to declare insolvency and then apply to the government for bailouts. The government is hesitant, but Moe is too big to fail. So is Curly and so is Larry. Ya gonna settle for Shemp? The fate of The Three Stooges is at stake!

But wait! The Actor's Insurance Group has insured all three stooges for financial losses. AIG is in the red $25!

But, should AIG fail, it would be the end of all slapstick comedy as we know it! The Stooges are too big to fail! AIG is too big to fail!

The fate of our funny bones hang in the balance and the U.S. government is the only fiscal entity that can rob enough people, legally, to cover the losses. An enormous bailout is passed into law.

Moe gets $10. Larry gets $10. Curly gets $5. AIG gets $25 dollars.

And thus the economic crisis ends. The courageous and timely decisions that we have made will forever be on the minds of the generations to come, especially when they are a couple of dollars short.

20090304-01 10:02 Ben Video: "Shift Happens"

Take a look at the Shift Happens video. I think we've probably all seen one or both of the earlier versions; this one is new (to me) and just as intriguing.

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ljbI-363A2Q>

20090304-02 18:49 SteveB Re: "Shift Happens"

Dear Ben,

It's so intriguing to me that this is, I suppose, all pretty much true...yet how little the most important aspects of our lives here have changed. Love and happiness are still our goals, and still largely manage to escape most of us. Even if the universe is 13.5 billion years old and twice that many light years across, and even if there are uncounted dimensions, strings, and branes...the old mysteries remain unanswered. Who are we, really, within these bodies looking out? Why are we here? Is there a God? What happens after we die? How do we achieve good? How do we find that perfect peace and love we seem to instinctively assume exists? Etc.

20090305-01 08:22 Ben Re: "Shift Happens"

He's right. The non-material things are the same as always.

20090305-02 10:44 SteveB Re: "Shift Happens"

Dear Ben,

And even more pertinent, I think, is how can we use science to actually improve the important things in the human condition? We have managed to thwart death and some suffering with medical science. But the cost is also huge. I wonder sometimes if we are really better off. Have we been able to increase peace and happiness in the world? No as much as Buddha did. Have we even been able to successfully apply science to education so that we can teach our children more or better? To my mind, we're not any better than Aristotle, probably worse. Science doesn't even seem to work, at least yet, for the important things, and, instead, we seem to be getting further and further removed from them.

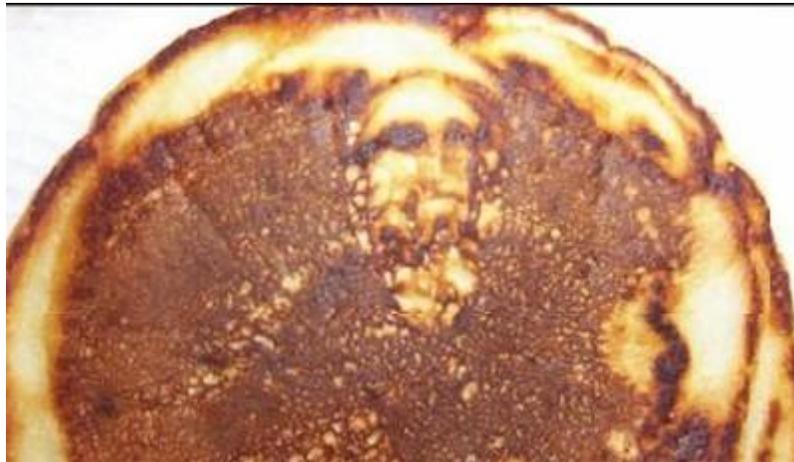

The American Indians had a better civilization than we do, yet we have always called them uncivilized savages. People with nothing, living in the Third World, seem happier to me than Americans in general. What has all of our scientific, material crap really gotten us? Not fricking much, I say! Not enough for the damage we're done and the even more huge damage coming down the pike. How have we really reduced human suffering when, inevitably, billion die at some point in the future?

The only thing that gives me any hope for our incredibly stupid species is that, maybe in the future, an asteroid or comet is heading to destroy our planet and, because of all our otherwise useless science and factories, we are able to send up a rocket and divert the sucker.

Otherwise, give me a hunting party consisting of my closest friends bringing home fresh venison to our lovely wives and beautiful, well-behaved children waiting at home for us in our comfortable little village.

20090504-01	11:03	SteveB	"Holy Pancakes! Virgin Mary Seen on Griddle"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Mexican wrestlers Renegado and Mr. Tempest look at an image of what they believe is "Our Lady of Guadalupe" on a griddle at Las Palmas restaurant in Calexico, Calif.

"Holy Pancakes! Virgin Mary Seen on Griddle" by Todd Krainin, AP

May 1, 2009, (<http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/30508304/?GT1-39001>)

(CALEXICO, Cal) The hottest thing on the griddle at the Las Palmas restaurant these days isn't the food — it's the image of Our Lady of Guadalupe that a cook says she saw on the griddle.

Restaurant manager Brenda Martinez says more than 100 people have flocked to the small town of Calexico on the California-Mexico border to gaze at the likeness of the Virgin Mary since it was discovered as the griddle was being cleaned.

Among the awe-struck was a group of masked Mexican wrestlers who arrived Thursday for an exhibition at a nearby swap meet.

One, known as Mr. Tempest, says: "This is amazing. It's a true miracle."

Since the discovery, the griddle has been taken out of service and placed in a shrine in a storage room.

20090616-01	15:53	SteveB	"Let's Get Real About Alternative Energy"
-------------	-------	--------	---

"Let's Get Real About Alternative Energy" by David MacKay, CNN

May 13, 2009, (http://articles.cnn.com/2009-05-13/tech/mackay.energy_1_fossil-fuels-heat-pumps-energy?s=PM:TECH)

(Editor's note: David MacKay is a professor of physics at the University of Cambridge. His book, Sustainable Energy - Without the Hot Air, is published by UIT Cambridge and is also available in electronic form for free from:

<http://www.withouthotair.com/> or <http://www.inference.phy.cam.ac.uk/sustainable/book/tex/sewtha.pdf>

We need to introduce simple arithmetic into our discussions of energy.

We need to understand how much energy our chosen lifestyles consume, we need to decide where we want that energy to come from, and we need to get on with building energy systems of sufficient size to match our desired consumption.

Our failure to talk straight about the numbers is allowing people to persist in wishful thinking, inspired by inane sayings such as "every little bit helps."

Assuming we are serious about getting off fossil fuels, the scale of building required should not be underestimated. Small actions alone will not deliver a solution.

Let's express energy consumption and energy production using simple personal units, namely kilowatt-hours. One kilowatt-hour (kWh) is the energy used by leaving a 40-watt bulb on for 24 hours. The chemical energy in the food we eat to stay alive amounts to about 3 kWh per day. Taking one hot bath uses about 5 kWh of heat. Driving an average European car 100 kilometers (roughly 62 miles) uses 80 kWh of fuel. With a few of these numbers in mind, we can start to evaluate some of the recommendations that people make about energy.

Take, for example, the idea that one of the top 10 things you should do to make a difference to your energy consumption is to unplug your cell-phone charger when you are not using it. The truth is that leaving a phone charger plugged in uses about 0.01 kWh per day, 1/100th of the power consumed by a light bulb.

This means that switching the phone charger off for a whole day saves the same energy as is used in driving an average car for one second. Switching off phone chargers is like bailing the Titanic with a teaspoon. I'm not saying you shouldn't unplug it, but please realize, when you do so, what a tiny fraction it is of your total energy footprint.

In total, the European lifestyle uses 125 kWh per day per person for transport, heating, manufacturing, and electricity. That's equivalent to every person having 125 light bulbs switched on all the time. The average American uses 250 kWh per day: 250 light bulbs.

And most of this energy today comes from fossil fuels. What are our post-fossil-fuel options?

Among the energy-saving options, two promising technology switches are the electrification of transportation (electric vehicles can be about four times as energy-efficient as standard fossil-fuel vehicles) and the use of electric-powered heat pumps to deliver winter heating and hot water (heat pumps can be four times as energy-efficient as standard heaters).

Among all the energy-supply technologies, the three with the biggest potential today are solar power, wind power and nuclear power.

As a thought-experiment, let's imagine that technology switches and lifestyle changes manage to halve American energy consumption to 125 kWh per day per person. How big would the solar, wind and nuclear facilities need to be to supply this halved consumption? For simplicity, let's imagine getting one-third of the energy supply from each.

To supply 42 kWh per day per person from solar power requires roughly 80 square meters per person of solar panels.

To deliver 42 kWh per day per person from wind for everyone in the United States would require wind farms with a total area roughly equal to the area of California, a 200-fold increase in United States wind power.

To get 42 kWh per day per person from nuclear power would require 525 one-gigawatt nuclear power stations, a roughly five-fold increase over today's levels.

I hope these numbers convey the scale of action required to put in place a sustainable energy solution. What about tidal power? What about wave power? What about geothermal energy, biofuels or hydroelectricity? In a short article, I can't discuss all the technology options.

But the sober message about wind and solar applies to all renewables: All renewables, much as I love them, deliver only a small power per unit area, so if we want renewable facilities to supply power on a scale at all comparable to our consumption, those facilities must be big.

If you don't want to build 1 million wind turbines, you can drill 1 million geothermal boreholes instead.

Before I close, I would like to say a few words about the idea that "the hydrogen economy" can magically solve our energy problems. The truth is that, in energy terms, today's hydrogen-powered vehicles don't help at all. Most prototype hydrogen-powered vehicles use more energy than the fossil-fuel vehicles they replace. The BMW Hydrogen 7, for example, uses 254 kWh per 100 km, but the average fossil car in Europe uses 80 kWh per 100 km.

In contrast, electric vehicles use far less energy: as little as 20 kWh per 100 km, or even 6 kWh per 100 km. The problem with hydrogen is that both the creation and the use of hydrogen are energy-inefficient steps. Adopting hydrogen as a transport fuel would increase our energy demand. And, as I hope the numbers above have shown, supplying energy to match our demand is not going to be easy.

The public discussion of energy options tends to be emotional, polarized, mistrustful and destructive. I hope that focusing attention on the numbers may make it possible to develop honest and constructive conversations about energy.

It's not going to be easy to make a energy plan that adds up, but it is possible. We need to get building.

20090616-02	13:38	SteveB	To: KLYQ AM Radio; Rush Limbaugh & Glenn Beck
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear KLYQ:

I have to tell you that I am starting to think that your syndicated program hosts, most notably Rush Limbaugh and Glenn Beck, are doing the Republican Party and the country as a whole a great disservice.

Their constant attempts at inducing panic, mistrust, and action(?) seem to me to be totally misguided. Have you listened to the stridency level on these programs lately? Truly appalling!

I will no longer listen to any of these charlatans who hope for the demise or ruin of the United States, merely for the sake of blind ideology.

I think it is time for you to consider alternative programming. This stuff is serving no good, only evil. Thank you.

20090625-01	11:52	SteveG	Fw: The Bakken Formation: "U. S. Oil Discovery—Largest Reserve in the World!"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Wonder if this is true?? I know there is a large reserve in Alberta, Canada in a "tar sands" formation.

Click on the link at the bottom to verify. Unbelievable!

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says it's a mix of true and false information:
<http://www.snopes.com/politics/gasoline/bakken.asp>. —SteveB]

OIL (not a joke)

The U. S. Geological Service issued a report in April ('08) that only scientists and oil men knew was coming, but man was it big. It was a revised report (hadn't been updated since '95) on how much oil was in this area of the western 2/3 of North Dakota; western South Dakota; and extreme eastern Montana..... check THIS out:

The Bakken is the largest domestic oil discovery since Alaska 's Prudhoe Bay , and has the potential to eliminate all American dependence on foreign oil. The Energy Information Administration (EIA) estimates it at 503 billion barrels. Even if just 10% of the oil is recoverable... at $107 a barrel, we're looking at a resource base worth more than $5.3 trillion.

'When I first briefed legislators on this, you could practically see their jaws hit the floor. They had no idea.' says Terry Johnson, the Montana Legislature's financial analyst.

"This sizable find is now the highest-producing onshore oil field found in the past 56 years." reports The Pittsburgh Post Gazette. It's a formation known as the Williston Basin , but is more commonly referred to as the 'Bakken.' And it stretches from Northern Montana, through North Dakota and into Canada . For years, U. S. oil exploration has been considered a dead end. Even the 'Big Oil' companies gave up searching for major oil wells decades ago. However, a recent technological breakthrough has opened up the Bakken's massive reserves.... and we now have access of up to 500 billion barrels. And because this is light, sweet oil, those billions of barrels will cost Americans just $16 PER BARREL!

That's enough crude to fully fuel the American economy for 2041 years straight.

And if THAT didn't throw you on the floor, then this next one should—because it's from TWO YEARS AGO!

"U. S. Oil Discovery—Largest Reserve in the World!" Stansberry Report Online (Apr. 20, 2006)

Hidden 1,000 feet beneath the surface of the Rocky Mountains lies the largest untapped oil reserve in the world. It is more than 2 TRILLION barrels. On August 8, 2005 President Bush mandated its extraction. In three and a half years of high oil prices none has been extracted. With this mother lode of oil, why are we still fighting over off-shore drilling?

They reported this stunning news: We have more oil inside our borders, than all the other proven reserves on earth. Here are the official estimates:

- 8-times as much oil as Saudi Arabia
- 18-times as much oil as Iraq
- 21-times as much oil as Kuwait
- 22-times as much oil as Iran
- 500-times as much oil as Yemen

...and it's all right here in the Western United States.

HOW can this BE? HOW can we NOT BE extracting this? Because the environmentalists and others have blocked all efforts to help America become independent of foreign oil! Again, we are letting a small group of people dictate our lives and our economy.....WHY?

James Bartis, lead researcher with the study says we've got more oil in this very compact area than the entire Middle East -more than 2 TRILLION barrels untapped. That's more than all the proven oil reserves of crude oil in the world today, reports The Denver Post.

Don't think 'OPEC' will drop its price - even with this find? Think again! It's all about the competitive marketplace, - it has to. Think OPEC just might be funding the environmentalists? Got your attention/ire up yet? Hope so! Now, while you're thinking about it and hopefully P.O'd, do this:

Pass this along. If you don't take a little time to do this, then you should stifle yourself the next time you want to complain about gas prices— because by doing NOTHING, you've forfeited your right to complain.

Now I just wonder what would happen in this country if every one of you sent this to everyone in your address book.

By the way...this is all true. Check it out at the link below!!!

GOOGLE it or follow this link. It will blow your mind.

<http://www.usgs.gov/newsroom/article.asp?ID=1911>

20090625-02	12:59	SteveB	Re: The Bakken Formation / Photo: Trapper Peak, Bitterroots, Montana
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveG,

I believe the article you and Dick (Aug. 19, 2008) refer to is completely true. There is that much oil there and they are getting some of it out.

Your link was a good one: <http://www.usgs.gov/newsroom/article.asp?ID=1911>.

But, of course, there is a little problem that I didn't see mentioned. Just as with the possibility of using hydrogen as fuel for cars (a terrible idea in my mind—they MUST be electric!), it takes a lot of energy to get this energy. The rocks must be heated to a high temperature, the way I understand it, to release their oil. Just as it takes a ton of electricity to release hydrogen from water.

You know, I'm not so sure technology is going to be able to save us this time. But...one never knows.

I think this whole energy thing, from the standpoint of physics, is a much more difficult problem than some want to make us believe.

Take care. Hope you're having a great summer. Here's my favorite mountain...climbed it last year...thought I'd die!

Trapper Peak, Montana (with Baker Point)

20090625-03 13:06 SteveG Re: The Bakken Formation; Electric Cars

Dear SteveB,

My only concern about electric vehicles is that most electricity is from burning carbon based fuels - coal, natural gas - and I really don't like the idea of nuclear.

Diesel vehicles make sense to me, but there doesn't seem to be that much interest in this country. Switch grass based bio fuel also makes sense.

But what the hell do I know.

20090625-04 13:59 SteveB Re: The Bakken Formation; Electric Cars

Dear SteveG,

Well...I agree with you about nuclear fission. Maybe someday we'll work out fusion, but that's not an easy one. It would provide almost unlimited energy though.

We have to figure out ways—and have—to burn coal, especially, with no emissions, not even CO₂. They are close. Oil must be preserved. Since we must burn something, it has to be coal burned cleanly in central locations, generating electricity for everything else possible. It's the only workable solution I can see. It is much easier to burn something cleanly in a few locations than in millions of locations. Hence, electric cars are a must. So are electric trains. Lawnmowers must all be electric. F*ck lawns, anyway! Let's all have little hay or wheat fields!

We must save all the oil we have to make drugs and chemicals and to power planes, maybe some trucks, definitely motorcycles. That's it!

We need trains and re-configured cities. Do we have the will to do what's necessary? These big bunch of pussies in the world today? I highly doubt it!

20090701-01 08:21 SteveG Alternative Energy: Algae

Dear SteveB,

I had forgotten about algae - that really makes sense!!. As I understand it takes carbon dioxide to grow algae and you could locate their growth area next to electric power plants.

If the government or auto manufacturers were smart, they would all combine efforts and concentrate on one fuel - switchgrass or algae. But, this will not happen in my lifetime,

I am not as adventuresome as you in the eating!!!!!!! Do remember my Dad eating cow brain sandwiches and thinking how gross that was. No sense eating anything creepy, crawly or organs!

Going back toward more fruits and veggies rather than meat items. Seafood the best.

20090701-02 10:35 SteveB Re: Alternative Energy: Algae

Dear SteveG,

Just one article:

<http://www.greentechmedia.com/green-light/post/open-pond-vs.-closed-bioreactors-4012/>.

20090703-01 12:02 SteveB "Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" Speculation

Dear Dennis,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I still think this crap needs to be made illegal and/or impossible. Energy is just too important for these kinds of games.

"Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" AP

July 3, 2009, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/31720243/ns/business-oil_and_energy)

(PVM blames unauthorized trades for spike in Brent crude markets.)

(LONDON) PVM Oil Associates, the world's biggest over-the-counter oil brokerage, says it lost nearly $10 million this week because of unauthorized trades that caused a temporary spike in Brent crude markets.

The firm said in a statement late Thursday that it was investigating the trades, which drove up the price of Brent futures by more than $2 in one hour early Tuesday London time. It did not identify the trader involved in the transactions.

The Financial Times reported that futures contracts for 16 million barrels of oil changed hands in one hour, compared to a typical volume of 500,000 barrels.

PVM said the trading had been reported to the Financial Services Authority, but the government agency declined to say on Friday whether it was investigating.

A statement issued by PVM's managing director, Robin Bieber, said that "as a result of a series of unauthorized trades, substantial volumes of futures contracts were held by PVM."

"When this was discovered, the positions were closed in an orderly fashion. PVM suffered a loss totaling a little under $10 million."

20090703-02 13:53 Dennis Re: "Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" Speculation

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

My daughter's wedding has been my only shoot this summer since coming back from a photo tour to Romania in April. Jialin and I will be leading a photo tour to China in September and going to a travel writers convention in Mexico in October. We've talked about going somewhere this summer (Calgary for the Stampede or Albuquerque), but not making much progress. I'm Photoshopping images daily to upload to a new cooperative stock photo agency where I'm now an owner/member, Picade.com, as well as planning tours for next year (maybe China again in April or October and Morocco/Tunisia in May). That is keeping me busy while Jialin is making some money doing medical interpreting for the UMich Health Care system. Good thing, since I'm not making diddly selling stock photos this year.

Speaking of the reunion, Norton and I considered going, but decided against it when we heard you weren't coming. I had just gone to a reunion of my cousins (the Thompsons) and brothers in Terre Haute last month. We stopped in for a few hours on the way to Champaign-Urbana where we went apartment shopping for Jialin's son who starts grad school in architecture at UI this fall. A few hours in Indiana were enough.

20090704-01 09:47 SteveB Re: "Oil Brokerage Loses $10 Million on Rogue Trades" Speculation

Dear Dennis,

Great to hear the news from you! It definitely sounds like you're keeping busy, even if your travels come after the summer.

Our fireworks here were canceled because of lack of money. They have to start so late that we don't feel like driving the 50 miles to Missoula just to see them, so staying close to home and cooking seems to be in order. We're probably going to turn our house into a restaurant when we get back to Bolivia later this year or next year. I'm planning a month there about September, but have no other travel plans except everywhere in Montana I can get to.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I had an interesting experience trying to purchase rights to a cover photo (last attachment) from a local photographer. I found the photo in an obscure Montana magazine, got in touch with the "photographer", negotiated and agreed to a price, but he didn't want to sign a simple contract stating that he actually owned the rights to the photo and was transferring single-use rights to me. He turned-out to be quite an a-hole, even though he is a neighbor. Unusual for Montana. Then I found that the photo is all over the internet and no one, apparently, knows who the photographer is.

So, to make a long story short, I'm just going to use one of my own photos, weak as they may be.

20090709-01 19:08 SteveB Fw: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

Dear SteveB:

Rampant oil-market speculation is driving up energy and food prices for the second year in a row. Just yesterday, the Wall Street Journal and other news media reported that continued speculation could "worsen the global economic downturn." We cannot allow this to happen.

Last year, you participated in the Stop Oil Speculation Now coalition, a multi-industry collection of businesses, labor groups, associations and concerned citizens united in support of responsible energy policies and prices. Thanks to your efforts, the threat of congressional action brought on by public outrage helped burst last summer's oil bubble and returned prices to reasonable levels.

Now that the speculators have returned, Congress and federal regulators again are considering action. Throughout this summer, we will keep you abreast of the latest news on this issue and let you know about the best opportunities to make your voice heard. By demanding that policymakers close known loopholes, increase market transparency and require strict limits on speculative trading, we can prevent future price spikes. These reforms, combined with increased domestic energy supply, exploration, alternative energy sources and conservation, will help lower prices for all Americans.

Now is the time to learn more about this important issue at:

<http://www.StopOilSpeculationNow.com>

and to encourage your friends to get involved at the S.O.S. Your Friends link on the Web site.

Together, we can help protect America's economic recovery.

Thank you, The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

20090709-02 19:12 Dennis Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

from SteveB:

Rampant oil-market speculation is driving up energy and food prices for the second year in a row.

Dear SteveB,

Geez, how am I gonna get back to even on my oil stocks without a little speculation to help me out? At least this group is only asking Congress to do something. That's a futile gesture that shouldn't hurt much.

20090710-01 08:37 SteveB Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

Dear Dennis,

As the article said:

At least this group is only asking Congress to do something. That's a futile gesture that shouldn't hurt much.

Ain't that the truth! The politicians are bought and sold...the whole system is corrupt and seems incapable of fixing itself or even taking appropriate actions.

Dennis: "...get back to even on my oil stocks"

I told you the price of oil was goin' down! I sure wish I could get all my commodity and stock predictions right!

20090710-02 08:50 Bill Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

Dear SteveB,

Yea, but how can a Wall Street greed head make a fast buck?

20090710-03 09:10 SteveB Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

Dear Bill,

Maybe they should be made to contribute to the good of society instead of acting like they're John Galt? Of course, the same thing could be said of Congress!

20090710-04 21:14 Bill Re: The Coalition to Stop Oil Speculation Now

Dear SteveB,

"Good of society?" What a quaint notion. Wall Street never gave a f*ck about Main Street, except to the extent it could extract lucre from it. There, I've exercised my cynicism for today and will be pacific and pleasant the remainder of the day.

20090712-01 19:14 SteveB Tesseract: 3-Dimensional Projections of Higher Dimensions

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tesseract>

20090718-01 20:28 SteveB Movie: Public Enemies

Fellow Hoosiers,

I highly recommend Johnny Depp's new John Dillinger movie, Public Enemies. They actually mention the name of Greencastle in it! I don't think that happens very often and, alone, is worth the price of admission. Oh, and the actin', writin', directin', and shootin' ain't bad either.

20090722-01 09:20 Ben Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?

The "More Orbiter?" paragraph on the last page has links to restored mission photos. The article is great reading.

http://www.theregister.co.uk/2009/07/22/destination_moon/

20090722-02 09:34 SteveB Re: Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?

I always believed that they actually went to the moon. Then I learned that, after years of searching, NASA couldn't locate the original hi-res videos. BS! I'm all for space, but I don't want those jokers (or the military, for that matter) spending so much of our tax dollars.

Also, I'm sorry to say that it looks like Obama is blowing the job badly—look at the lack of jobs creation or preservation despite $trillions. And he is nowhere on reducing the actual costs of health care, while expanding coverage in a halfway fair manner that doesn't burden business excessively. All we really need are a few changes to tort and insurance laws, if they can't do anything else.

But as long as the government is bought and sold by campaign contributions (totally corrupt), nothing is ever going to be fixed.

I'm moving back to Bolivia in October! Hope you're having a great summer.

20090722-03 12:10 Ben Re: Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?

Dear SteveB,

Oh, we went there, all right. But I see what you mean about losing the hi-res documentation.

I empathize with your feelings. To some extent, I share them. But still, I like it here. I don't doubt I could love Bolivia, too, but I still have hopes that Obama's path will effect at least some positive changes. It takes time to turn a ship with as much inertia as this. I agree that the forces of our embedded and corrupt system will conspire to thwart much of what he's attempting, and will doubtless wear him down considerably. But I still have hope.

20090722-04 13:28 SteveB Re: Apollo: The Most Successful Space Mission of All Time?

Dear Ben,

Even worse! I'm afraid that what He has attempted with the economy and what He is attempting to ram down our throats with healthcare (whatever it is He has in mind— maybe we're learn more tonight) is simply WRONG too!

I'm not about to side with the Ref*cklicans, but somebody is going to have to end up paying for all this! Gee, let's just print some more phony money!

20090723-01 13:44 Phil Fw: The Health Care Question

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

READ THIS, IT'S IMPORTANT.

I checked Snopes and in fact Rep John Fleming, a physician, (R, LA) introduced House Resolution 615, whereas all members voting for the bill would have to give up the Federal Health Insurance that Congressmen have and be the first customers of the new Health program. He has vowed that if the bill comes up for a floor vote he will add this language to the bill as an amendment. He says that if it is good enough for the people it should be good enough for congressmen. They are not better than the public.

[Yes, but Snopes.com says the bill is a "non-binding resolution" introduced in Jan., 2009, and never passed.

The exemption for congress is actually in the bill language. [In Obamacare? —SteveB]

The Health Care Question

Please pay attention to this.

FINALLY...THE $50,000 QUESTION WAS ASKED!!!!.....YESTERDAY ON THE "ABC..OBAMA SPECIAL ON HEALTH CARE".....OBAMA WAS ASKED, "MR. PRESIDENT WILL YOU AND YOUR FAMILY GIVE UP YOUR CURRENT HEALTH CARE PROGRAM AND JOIN THE NEW "UNIVERSAL HEALTH CARE PROGRAM" THAT THE REST OF US WILL BE ON ????".....OBAMA IGNORED THE QUESTION AND DIDN'T ANSWER IT!!!!.....A NUMBER OF SENATORS WERE ASKED THE SAME QUESTION AND THEIR RESPONSE WAS...WE WILL THINK ABOUT IT!!!!

IT WAS ALSO ANNOUNCED TODAY ON THE NEWS THAT THE "KENNEDY HEALTH CARE BILL"....HAS WRITTEN INTO IT THAT CONGRESS WILL BE (FROM THIS GREAT HEALTH CARE PLAN)....EXEMPT!!!!

HOW ABOUT THOSE APPLES.....NOT GOOD ENOUGH FOR OBAMA OR CONGRESS.....BUT "OK" FOR THE REST OF US?????????

WE....THE AMERICANS NEED TO STOP THIS...ASAP!!!!....AND REVOLT...THIS IS WRONG!!!! IF YOU AGREE PLEASE PASS THIS ON....AND "REVOLT"!!!

20090723-02 14:09 SteveB Re: The Health Care Question

Dear Phil,

I like it! What a mess our "leaders" are making of this issue!

I'm convinced that nothing will get done right until we stop the campaign finance corruption. Maybe we need a constitutional amendment that would allow ZERO contributions of any kind over, say, $100, and limit every single office—Senate, House, and President—to just one 4-year term, with never a re-election! Start fresh every time.

Maybe then they would stop selling the American people down the river! What we need is a true revolution. I'm sick of the Republicans and their demagoguery and their total inability to do anything right. I'm fed up with Democrats and their supreme ability to do everything wrong. I'm sick of the devotion of both parties to free trade, free immigration, and anyone other than the American people! And I don't mean just white American people, or white American people with guns, or giant corporations.

I'm heading for Bolivia in October! Take care, Phil. Hope you're having a great summer.

20090726-01 13:57 SteveB "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear Ben,

I see no excuse for this whatsoever! Why don't they just have one of those Texas oil pipeline companies build a big pipeline from the mouth of the nearby Mississippi and divert that water now being wasted into the sea? It will still get to the sea eventually anyway, but it might as well stop by Texas for a little vacation. What a ridiculously easy problem to solve. Granted...they needed to start on this project years ago, but why not do it now that the motivation is in plain sight? Get with it, Texans! Else move to where the water is.

"Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast" by AP

July 25, 2009, (<http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/32145286/ns/weather/t/drought-turning-texas-dry-toast/>)

(Water restrictions lead to extreme conservation efforts.)

DALLAS—Off-duty police officers are patrolling streets, looking for people illegally watering their lawns and gardens. Residents are encouraged to stealthily rat out water scofflaws on a 24-hour hot line. One Texas lake has dipped so low that stolen cars dumped years ago are peeking up through the waterline.

The nation's most drought-stricken state is deep-frying under relentless 100-degree days and waterways are drying up, especially in the hardest-hit area covering about 350 miles across south-central Texas. That's making folks worried about the water supply—and how long it might last.

"The water table's fallin' and fallin' and fallin,' like a whole lot of other people around here," said Wendell McLeod, general manager of Liberty Hill Water Supply Corp. and a 60-year resident of the town northwest of Austin. "This is the worst I can recall seeing it. I tell you, it's just pretty bleak."

There are 230 Texas public water systems under mandatory water restrictions, including those in and near San Antonio, Dallas, Houston and Austin. Another 60 or so have asked for voluntary cutbacks. Water levels are down significantly in lakes, rivers and wells around Texas.

Liberty Hill's Web site urges its 1,400 or so residents in all-red letters to stop using unnecessary water with this plea: "If we follow these strict guidelines, we may have drinking water." The town's shortage eased some with the arrival this week of 35,000 gallons a day from a nearby water system, but residents are still worried.

77 Texas counties in severe drought

According to drought statistics released by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, 77 of Texas' 254 counties are in extreme or exceptional drought, the most severe categories. No other state in the continental U.S. has even one area in those categories. John Nielsen-Gammon, the Texas state climatologist at Texas A&M University, said he expects harsh drought conditions to last at least another month.

In the bone-dry San Antonio-Austin area, the conditions that started in 2007 are being compared to the devastating drought of the 1950s. There have been 36 days of 100 degrees or more this year in an area where there are usually closer to 12.

Among the most obvious problems are the lack of water in Lake Travis and Lake Buchanan near Austin, two massive reservoirs along the Colorado River that provide drinking water for more than 1 million people and also are popular boating and swimming spots. Streams and tributaries that feed the lakes have "all but dried up," according to the Lower Colorado River Authority.

Lake Travis is more empty than full, down 54 percent. All but one of the 12 boating ramps are closed because they no longer reach the water, and the last may go soon. The receding waters have even revealed old stolen cars shoved into the lake years ago, authorities said.

There's no threat to the area's drinking water supply, Rose said, but there are increased boating hazards from the "sometimes islands" that pop up when the water's low, increased risk of wildfires, and more interactions between humans and wildlife.

"We're seeing deer and armadillo and other animals in places we don't typically see them," he said. "They're starving for water and food."

At the Oasis [ironic], a popular restaurant with a deck overlooking Lake Travis, the islands are even starting to grow heavy vegetation.

"You can see all the white on the rocks where the waterline used to be," said Becca Torbert, a server at the restaurant who says the boat traffic is down, but the water is down even more.

San Antonio policing water offenders

San Antonio, which relies on the Edwards Aquifer for its water, is enduring its driest 23-month period since weather data was recorded starting in 1885, according to the National Weather Service. The aquifer's been hovering just above 640 feet deep, and if it dips below that the city will issue its harshest watering restrictions yet.

The city's not just sitting around, though. A total of 30 off-duty officers and other employees are working overtime to patrol the city looking for people illegally watering. Since April, about 1,500 people have been cited and ordered to pay fines ranging from $50 to over $1,000. Residents also are encouraged to rat out water scofflaws on the 24-hour Water Waste Hot Line.

"We don't go out in a car with sirens blazing or anything like that, but we do take the report and send out a letter saying 'You've been reported for not following water rules,'" said Anne Hayden, spokeswoman for the San Antonio Water System.

There have been smatterings of light rain in the area this week, but not enough to make much difference. But hopefully, the end is in sight. Victor Murphy, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service, said an El Nino system is developing in the Pacific Ocean. That phenomenon is usually followed by increased rainfall in Texas in the fall.

McLeod, from Liberty City, hopes his little town can hang on till then. "I don't know how we can," he said. "I try not to look too far ahead."

20090727-01 13:18 DaveM Fw: "We the People Are Coming"

Letter read on Glenn Beck's show.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Democrat or Republican, most of us would agree, largely, in what she is asking for!

The following letter read on Glenn Beck's show is rapidly circulating around the country. Many Americans everywhere identify with this 53 year old woman. She has given us a voice. Please forward to your friends.

June 18, 2009, 10:01 pm

The woman who sent the long email letter below to Glenn Beck made her name known to him in a telephone interview the next night. She is Janet Contreras, a 53 year old woman in Phoenix, Arizona, a citizen fed up with the House, Senate, Administration, Democrats, Republicans.

During the interview she said "I don't want this. I don't want this fight, Glenn. I don't have the time, energy or financial resources for it but that no longer matters. It no longer matters if I'm able or if I want this fight. I have to take it on. It's not a matter of choice anymore, which is why I wrote the letter."

"The other part of this is that the invisible people who can and do represent my views need to come out of the shadows. I don't know who they are. They're going to get washed away with the rest of them if they don't have the courage to stand up against the Administration and those members of the House and Senate who are destroying our country and our values."

June 17, 2009

GLENN BECK: I got a letter from a woman in Arizona. She writes an open letter to our nation's leadership:

