I am a home grown American citizen, 53, registered Democrat all my life. Before the last presidential election I registered as a Republican because I no longer felt the Democratic Party represents my views or works to pursue issues important to me. Now I no longer feel the Republican Party represents my views or works to solve issues important to me. The fact is I no longer feel any political party or representative in Washington represents my views or works to solve the issues important to me.

There must be someone. Please tell me who you are. Please stand up and tell me you are there and you are willing to fight for our Constitution as it was written. Please stand up now. You might ask what are my views and issues that I feel so horribly disenfranchised by both major political parties. Well, these briefly are my views and the issues for which I seek representation:

1. Illegal Immigration: I want you to stop coddling illegal immigrants and secure our borders. Close the underground tunnels. Stop the violence and the trafficking in drugs and people. No amnesty. Never again. Been there, done that, no resolution. PS, I am not a racist. This isn't to be confused with legal immigration.
2. The TARP Bill: I want it repealed and I want no further funding supplied to it. We told you no, but you did it anyway. I want the remaining unfunded 95% repealed. Freeze or repeal TARP (Troubled Asset Relief Program) — the Wall Street handout bill, under President Bush, to address the subprime mortgage crisis, to purchase or insure up to $700 billion of "troubled" assets.
3. Czars: I want the circumvention of our checks and balances stopped immediately. Fire the 37 czars. No more czars. Government officials answer to the process, not to the president. Stop trampling on our Constitution and honor it.

4. Cap and Trade. The debate on global warming is not over. There is more to say.

5. Universal Health Care. I will not be rushed into another expensive decision. Don't you dare try to pass this in the middle of the night and go on break. Slow down.

6. Growing Government Control. I want States Rights and sovereignty fully restored. I want less government in my life, not more. Shrink it down. Mind your own business. You have enough to take care of with your real obligations. Start there.

7. ACORN. I do not want ACORN and its affiliates in charge of our 2010 census. I also want them investigated. I also do not want mandatory escrow fees contributed to them on every real estate deal that closes. Stop the funding to ACORN and its affiliates pending impartial audits and investigations. I do not trust them taking the census over with our taxpayer money. I want all our money to them stopped. Face up to the allegations against them and get them resolved before getting any more involved with them. If it walks like a duck and talks like a duck, hello.. Stop protecting your political buddies. You work for us, the people. Investigate.

8. Redistribution of Wealth. No, no, no. I work for my money. It is mine. I have always worked for people with more money than I have because they gave me jobs. That is the only redistribution of wealth that I will support. I never got a job from a poor person. Why do you want me to hate my employers? Why? What do you have against shareholders making a profit?

9. Charitable Contributions. Although I never got a job from a poor person, I have helped many in need. Charity belongs in our local communities, where we know our needs best and can use our local talent and local resources. Butt out, please. We want to do it ourselves.

10. Corporate Bailouts. Knock it off. Sink or swim like the rest of us. If there are hard times ahead we'll be better off just getting into it and letting the strong survive. Quick and painful. Have you ever ripped off a Band-Aid? We will pull together. Great things happen in America under great hardship. Give us the chance to innovate. We cannot disappoint you more than you have disappointed us.

11. Transparency and Accountability. How about it? No, really, how about it? Let's have it. Let's say we give the buzzwords a rest and have some straight honest talk. Please try. Please stop manipulating and trying to appease me with clever wording. I am not the idiot you take me for. Stop sneaking around and meeting in back rooms, making deals with your friends. It will only be a prelude to criminal investigation of you. Stop hiding things from us.

12. Unprecedented Quick Spending. Stop it now. Take a breath.

Listen to the people. Let's just slow down and get some input from some non politicians on the subject. Stop making everything an emergency. Stop speed reading our bills into law.

I am not an activist. I am not a community organizer. Nor am I a terrorist, militant or violent person. I am a parent and grandparent. I work. I'm busy. I'm busy and I'm tired. I thought we elected competent people to take care of the business of government so we could work, raise our families, pay our bills, have recreation, complain about taxes, endure our hardships, pursue our goals, cut our lawn, wash our cars on weekends, be responsible contributing members of society and teach our children to be the same—all while living in the home of the free and land of the brave. I entrusted you with upholding the Constitution. I believed in the checks and balances to keep from getting far off course.. What happened? You are very far off course.

Do you really think I find humor in the hiring of a speed reader to unintelligently ramble through a bill you signed into law without knowing what it contained? I do not. It is a mockery of the responsibility I have entrusted to you. It is a slap in the face. I am not laughing at your arrogance.

Why is it that I feel you would not trust me to make a single decision about my own life and how I would live it, but you expect I should trust you with the debt you have, without caring or conscience, laid on all of us and our children. We did not want the TARP bill. We said no. We would repeal it if we could. I am sure we still can. There is such urgency and recklessness in all of your recent spending.

From my perspective, it seems all of you have gone insane. I also know I am far from alone in these feelings. Do you honestly feel your current pursuits have merit to patriotic Americans? We want it to stop. We want to put the brakes on everything that is being rushed passed us and forced upon us. We want our voice back. You have forced us to put our lives on hold to straighten out the mess you are making.

We will have to give up our vacations, time spent with our children, any relaxation time we may have had and money we cannot afford—to spend on you—to bring our concerns to Washington. Our president knows all the buzzwords are unsustainable. No kidding. How many tens of thousands of dollars did the focus group cost to come up with those buzzwords? We don't want your overpriced words. Stop treating us like morons.

We want all of you to stop focusing on your reelection and do the job we want done, not the job you want done or the job your party wants done. You work for us and at this rate I guarantee you not for long—because we are coming. We will be heard and we will be represented.

You think we're so busy with our lives we will never come for you? We are the former silent majority, all who quietly work, pay taxes, obey the law, vote, save money, keep our noses to the grindstone—and we are now closely looking at you and the huge mess you created for all of us. You have awakened in us the patriotic spirit, so strong and so powerful that had been sleeping too long. You have pushed us too far. Our numbers are great. They will surprise you. For every one of us who come after you there will be hundreds more who could not come.

Unlike you we have their trust. We will represent them honestly. Rest assured they will be at the polls on voting day to usher you out of office. We have cancelled vacations. We will use our last few dollars saved. We will find the representation among us and a grassroots campaign will flourish. We didn't ask for this fight. But the gloves are off. We are very angry.

You will represent us or you will be replaced with someone who will. There are candidates among us who will rise like a Phoenix from the ashes you have made of our constitution.

Democrat, Republican, Independent, Libertarian.. Understand this. We don't care. Political parties are meaningless to us. Patriotic Americans are willing to do right by us and our Constitution and that is all that matters to us now.

We are going to fire all of you who abuse power and seek more. It is not your power. It is ours and we want it back. We entrusted you with it and you abused it. You are dishonorable. You are dishonest. As Americans we are ashamed of you. You have brought shame to us in front of the whole world. If you are not representing the needs of your constituency loudly and consistently, in spite of the objections of your party, you will be fired. Did you hear that? We no longer care about your political parties. You need to be loyal to us, not to them. Because we will fire you and they cannot save you.

If you do or can represent me, my issues, my views, please stand up. Make your identity known. You need to make some noise about it. Speak up. I need to know who you are. If you do not speak up, you will be herded out with the rest of the sheep and we will replace the whole damn congress if need be one by one. We are coming. Are we coming for you? Who do you represent? What do you represent? Listen. Because we are coming. We the people are coming.

20090727-02	16:11	SteveB	Re: "We the People Are Coming"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------

My answer to "We, the People Are Coming!":

Glenn Beck is a blithering idiot. Glenn Beck is probably a fascist and a lunatic. I am sick of his ravings.

Not that I disagree with all of this alleged "letter" (which he probably concocted himself). Neither would Obama.

But ACORN? Seriously? It's strange that this tiny (even if legitimate) issue, which is Glenn's and the radical right's #1 conspiracy theory of the moment, would be given such prominence in this "letter".

And where is any mention of the most important, fundamental issue of all—the nearly total corruption of our elected officials via campaign finance and lobbying by powerful special interests like the multi-national corporations which have shipped our jobs to China and Mexico, the AMA, the NRA, the insurance industry, the Wall Street bankers, the rich (who already pay the lowest taxes in the industrialized world), etc., etc.?

ACORN indeed!

This end-of-the world, doomsday, alarmist screaming and ranting, led by such idiot grab-any- conspiracy-theory-for-ratings crazies as Rush Limbaugh, Glenn Beck, and Dick Cheney threatens our freedom and democracy almost as much as the buying and selling of our elected politicians.

But I suppose Glenn would say that means I don't care about America. But at least I have no vested interest in trying to shout life back into a dying, old-fashioned media like (haha) radio or (bigger haha) Fox News or (biggest haha) my own ratings and giant bank accounts! Can Rush and Glenn say the same?

20090806-01	02:56	Charlie	"Flying Spaghetti Monster"
-----------------------------	-------	---------	----------------------------

An oldie but goodie. Seeing the crazy far-right fundos ("fundas?") come out of the woodwork with Health (s)care and Obama birthing reminded me to revisit the origins of the Flying Spaghetti Monster.

Ah, a breath of (logical) air. How refreshing!

"Flying Spaghetti Monster" by Bobby Henderson

Sept. 15, 2006 (<http://www.venganza.org/about/open-letter/>)

Open Letter To Kansas School Board from Bobby Henderson, concerned citizen

I am writing you with much concern after having read of your hearing to decide whether the alternative theory of Intelligent Design should be taught along with the theory of Evolution. I think we can all agree that it is important for students to hear multiple viewpoints so they can choose for themselves the theory that makes the most sense to them. I am concerned, however, that students will only hear one theory of Intelligent Design.

Let us remember that there are multiple theories of Intelligent Design. I and many others around the world are of the strong belief that the universe was created by a Flying Spaghetti Monster. It was He who created all that we see and all that we feel. We feel strongly that the overwhelming scientific evidence pointing towards evolutionary processes is nothing but a coincidence, put in place by Him.

It is for this reason that I'm writing you today, to formally request that this alternative theory be taught in your schools, along with the other two theories. In fact, I will go so far as to say, if you do not agree to do this, we will be forced to proceed with legal action. I'm sure you see where we are coming from. If the Intelligent Design theory is not based on faith, but instead another scientific theory, as is claimed, then you must also allow our theory to be taught, as it is also based on science, not on faith.

Some find that hard to believe, so it may be helpful to tell you a little more about our beliefs. We have evidence that a Flying Spaghetti Monster created the universe. None of us, of course, were around to see it, but we have written accounts of it. We have several lengthy volumes explaining all details of His power. Also, you may be surprised to hear that there are over 10 million of us, and growing. We tend to be very secretive, as many people claim our beliefs are not substantiated by observable evidence.

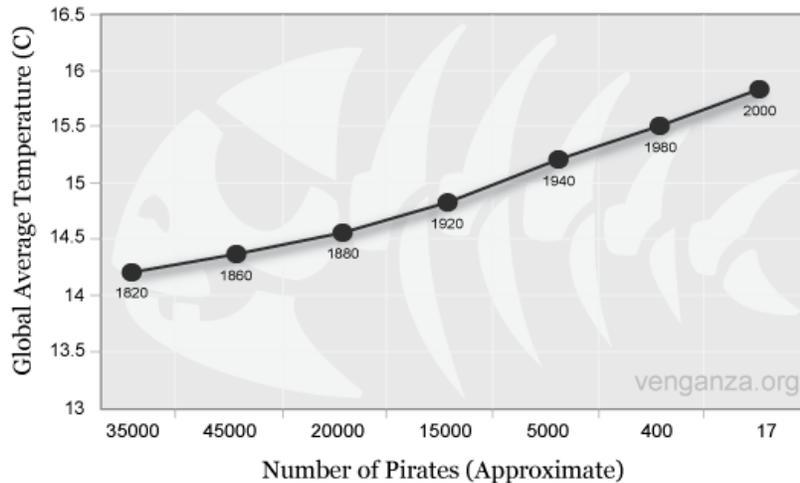

What these people don't understand is that He built the world to make us think the earth is older than it really is. For example, a scientist may perform a carbon-dating process on an artifact. He finds that approximately 75% of the Carbon-14 has decayed by electron emission to Nitrogen-14, and infers that this artifact is approximately 10,000 years old, as the half-life of Carbon-14 appears to be 5,730 years. But what our scientist does not realize is that every time he makes a measurement, the Flying Spaghetti Monster is there changing the results with His Noodly Appendage. We have numerous texts that describe in detail how this can be possible and the reasons why He does this. He is of course invisible and can pass through normal matter with ease.

I'm sure you now realize how important it is that your students are taught this alternate theory. It is absolutely imperative that they realize that observable evidence is at the discretion of a Flying Spaghetti Monster. Furthermore, it is disrespectful to teach our beliefs without wearing His chosen outfit, which of course is full pirate regalia. I cannot stress the importance of this enough, and unfortunately cannot describe in detail why this must be done as I fear this letter is already becoming too long. The concise explanation is that He becomes angry if we don't.

You may be interested to know that global warming, earthquakes, hurricanes, and other natural disasters are a direct effect of the shrinking numbers of Pirates since the 1800s. For your interest, I have included a graph of the approximate number of pirates versus the average global temperature over the last 200 years. As you can see, there is a statistically significant inverse relationship between pirates and global temperature.

Global Average Temperature Vs. Number of Pirates

In conclusion, thank you for taking the time to hear our views and beliefs. I hope I was able to convey the importance of teaching this theory to your students. We will of course be able to train the teachers in this alternate theory. I am eagerly awaiting your response, and hope dearly that no legal action will need to be taken. I think we can all look forward to the time when these three theories are given equal time in our science classrooms across the country, and eventually the world; One third time for Intelligent Design, one third time for Flying Spaghetti Monsterism (Pastafarianism), and one third time for logical conjecture based on overwhelming observable evidence.

I have included an artistic drawing of Him creating a mountain, trees, and a midget. Remember, we are all His creatures.

20090806-02 11:05 SteveB Re: "Flying Spaghetti Monster"

PRICELESS! BUT I DEMAND EQUAL TIME FOR THE VIEWS OF THE CHURCH OF STEVE!!!! OTHERWISE, ALL ARE DAMNED!

20090825-01 10:25 SteveB "Attack on Obama Riles Beck's Advertisers"

"Fair and Balanced"—haha!

"Attack on Obama Riles Beck's Advertisers" by David Bauder, AP

Aug. 23, 2009, (<http://www.breitbart.com/article.php?id=D9A8NQ200>)

Glenn Beck returns to Fox News Channel on Monday after a vacation with fewer companies willing to advertise on his show than when he left, part of the fallout from calling President Barack Obama a racist.

A total of 33 Fox advertisers, including Wal-Mart Stores Inc., CVS Caremark, Clorox and Sprint, directed that their commercials not air on Beck's show, according to the companies and ColorofChange.org, a group that promotes political action among blacks and launched a campaign to get advertisers to abandon him. That's more than a dozen more than were identified a week ago.

While it's unclear what effect, if any, this will ultimately have on Fox and Beck, it is already making advertisers skittish about hawking their wares within the most opinionated cable TV shows.

The Clorox Co., a former Beck advertiser, now says that "we do not want to be associated with inflammatory speech used by either liberal or conservative talk show hosts." The maker of bleach and household cleaners said in a statement that it has decided not to advertise on political talk shows.

The shows present a dilemma for advertisers, who usually like a "safe" environment for their messages. The Olbermanns, Hannitys, O'Reillys, Maddows and Becks of the TV world are more likely to say something that will anger a viewer, who might take it out on sponsors.

They also host the most-watched programs on their networks.

"This is a good illustration of that conundrum," said Rich Hallabran, spokesman for UPS Stores, which he said has temporarily halted buying ads on Fox News Channel as a whole. Beck can bring the eyeballs. With the health care debate raising political temperatures, his show had its biggest week ever right before his vacation, averaging 2.4 million viewers each day, according to Nielsen Media Research.

He was actually on another Fox show July 28 when he referred to Obama as a racist with "a deep-seated hatred for white people." The network immediately distanced itself from Beck's statement, but Beck didn't. He used his radio show the next day to explain why he believed that. He would not comment for this article, spokesman Matthew Hiltzik said.

ColorofChange.org quickly targeted companies whose ads had appeared during Beck's show, telling them what he had said and seeking a commitment to drop him. The goal is to make Beck a liability, said James Rucker, the organization's executive director.

"They have a toxic asset," Rucker said. "They can either clean it up or get rid of it."

It's not immediately clear how many of the companies actually knew they were advertising on Beck's show. Sometimes commercial time is chosen for a specific show, but often it is bought on a rotation basis, meaning the network sprinkles the ads throughout the day on its own schedule. Sometimes ads appear by mistake; Best Buy said it bought commercial time for earlier in the day, and one of its ads unexpectedly appeared in Beck's show.

One company, CVS Caremark, said it advertises on Fox but hadn't said anything about Beck. Now it has told its advertising agency to inform Fox that it wanted no commercials on Beck.

"We support vigorous debate, especially around policy issues that affect millions of Americans, but we expect it to be informed, inclusive and respectful," said spokeswoman Carolyn Castel.

Besides the unpredictability of the opinionated cable hosts, the rapid pace of today's wired world complicates decisions on where to place ads, said Kathleen Dunleavy, a spokeswoman for Sprint. She said she was surprised at how fast the Beck issue spread across social media outlets and how quickly advertiser names were attached to it.

UPS' Hallabran said the decision to pull commercials "should not be interpreted as we are permanently withdrawing our advertising from Fox." He said the company wants to reach viewers with a wide spectrum of opinions.

Except for UPS Stores, there's no evidence that any advertisers who say they don't want to be on Beck's show are leaving Fox. Network spokeswoman Irena Briganti said the companies have simply requested the ads be moved elsewhere and that Fox hasn't lost any revenue.

She wouldn't say whether Fox was benefiting from any anti-anti-Beck backlash, with companies looking to support him. Some Beck supporters have urged fans to express their displeasure at companies for abandoning their man.

Beck supporters have suggested that retaliation might have something to do with ColorofChange.org's campaign. One of the group's founders, Van Jones, now works in the Obama administration and has been criticized by Beck. But Rucker said Jones has nothing to do with ColorofChange.org now and didn't even know about the campaign before it started.

Beck's strong ratings—even at 5 p.m. EDT he often outdraws whatever CNN and MSNBC show in prime-time—make it unlikely Beck is going anywhere even as the list of advertisers avoiding him approaches three dozen.

But it could mean advertising time becomes cheaper on his show than such a large audience would normally command. Some of his show's advertisers last week included a male enhancement pill, a law firm looking to sue on behalf of asbestos victims, a company selling medical supplies to diabetics and a water filter company.

Rucker said ColorofChange.org has contacted about 60 companies regarding Beck, and is heartened by the response.

"It's causing a certain conversation around Beck, which I think is important," he said.

20090903-01	11:40	SteveB	"Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"
-------------	-------	--------	--

"Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?" DailyMail

April 10, 2009, (<http://www.greenpacks.org/2009/04/10/salar-de-uyuni-will-lithium-turn-bolivia-into-the-next-middle-east/>)

The landscape of Salar de Uyuni is a breathtaking sight to behold for travelers from all around the world who go through plenty to witness the true splendor of these salt-filled plains. But those reflective plains which mirror the sky and stretch endlessly as photographer's delight, could very soon turn into the next Middle East of the world- brazen, abrasive, dry and exploited land, not just home of a huge environmental struggle but also the next big political conflict.

But why is it that the vast and seemingly never-ending landscape hidden away from the world for many centuries, have now become a potential minefield for conflict? Lithium— the element that powers all the green cars, laptops, mobiles and every other fancy gadget you own, is lying in plenty under this surface.

For every automobile maker in the world, there is absolutely no doubt that those who control the supply and production of Lithium, will dictate the economy of the world in the next few decades, And it's this immense potential hidden under these salt flats that is attracting the world today.

So what is the problem in digging it up, you ask? After all, this will mean zero-emission vehicles and greener tomorrow. Well, yes and no at the same time. All the Lithium might help us build the greener roads for tomorrow, but it will come at a very heavy price for Bolivia. The salt flats will no doubt be destroyed, mining in the region will suck up the last drop of water and before you know it, this would turn into an over-exploited and useless wasteland. Something no local resident would approve of.

While the local government will no doubt hold off world pressure for a while— as it is unwilling to trade its natural treasure for cash at this point, one is forced to believe this will happen at some point in the future anyway.

Hatred for the West and a respect for the locals means that the Bolivian government is taking an absolute no-nonsense policy from anyone right now and is pretty clear that Salar de Uyuni “belongs to the people of Bolivia and not to the world”. Despite that, it will be interesting to see how long they will sit on the cash pot with growing hunger and unemployment and even if they do.

Some say that using this vast stretch of land and extracting all the speculated 5-9 million tons of Lithium underneath is worth the localized destruction as it will help give cleaner roads and skies to the entire planet. “Small sacrifice for the sake of greater good of environment” the experts say, but we sure hope it’s going to be a choice that will be purely left to Bolivia and the people of Salar de Uyuni.

20090903-02 12:31 SteveG Re: "Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"

Dear SteveB,

My first thought when hearing lithium went to lithium carbonate for bi-polar disorders. Lithium for batteries also makes sense.

Reportedly around San Antonio there are large lithium deposits also. All makes life interesting.

In regards to your email about the trailer hitch and the possessions you own actually owning you - I think you are right.

We are depleting our possessions to what fits in a Chevy Impala and heading south to the ocean to become beachcombers.

20090903-03 12:35 SteveB Re: "Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"

from SteveG:

We are depleting our possessions to what fits in a Chevy Impala and heading south to the ocean to become beachcombers.

Dear SteveG,

Seriously? Cool! Where?

20090903-04 12:43 SteveG Re: "Salar de Uyuni: Will Lithium Turn Bolivia into the Next Middle East?"

Dear SteveB,

We are going to the Daytona area the first part of October; taking a train ride in December from Deland, FL to Pasco, WA and back. That is as far as we have gotten.

20090914-01 09:33 Ben Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear SteveB,

But think about the diameter of the pipe to move enough WATER for 77 counties. And unless you're planning to move it by truck from the pipe head, think about the branching. Granted some counties here don't have a lot of people...

Anyway, what really bugs ME is that individual investors and corporations are allowed to buy up water rights and pump huge quantities of water out of the aquifers underneath their land, and then sell it back to the people in the surrounding region. It was RAIN when it fell.

20090914-02 11:32 SteveB Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

The Chunnel consists of 2 25' diameter "pipes" and 1 16' "pipe". It runs for 31.4 miles under the English Channel and had to be drilled out of solid rock. I'm proposing a "pipe" more like the Alaska Pipeline, which sits on the surface.

At New Orleans, the flow of the Mississippi is roughly 4.5 million gallons of fresh water per second. I propose siphoning off about 10,000 gal./sec. of this flow for the pipeline described below.

I estimate that just one 25' pipe could carry 864 million gallons per day, maybe more. All of New York City (8.2 million people) uses about 1 billion gallons per day.

So my pipe could put a dent in any drought.

20090914-03 11:56 SteveB Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear Ben,

Think about it and do the math. The distance ain't that far, there ain't much of an elevation difference, and it wouldn't actually take that big a pipe. It could even be an open stream/aqueduct for much of the distance, though I tend to prefer the pipe for purity/security/evaporation/pressure reasons and, besides, Texans are world-famous for being able to build such pipelines.

I say it's time to get creative with a lot of this cr*p! Cities, transport, energy, lifestyles, birth-rates, unrestrained growth, and much more need to be redesigned NOW!

Better if we all suffer a little now than millions or billions die an excruciating death in the near future, I say. But, of course, we are collectively too pu*s*y to actually even attempt to solve our problems. Maybe I'm a radical, but how is it not time for radical solutions if our children and grandchildren are not to mightily suffer? Are we frickin' blind????

Power to the people!

20090914-04 12:32 SteveB Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear Ben,

The Chunnel consists of 2 25' diameter "pipes" and 1 16' "pipe". It runs for 31.4 miles under the English Channel and had to be drilled out of solid rock. I'm proposing a "pipe" more like the Alaska Pipeline, which sits on the surface.

At New Orleans, the flow of the Mississippi is roughly 4.5 million gallons of fresh water per second. I propose siphoning off about 10,000 gal./sec. of this flow for the pipeline described below.

I estimate that just one 25' pipe could carry 864 million gallons per day, maybe more. All of New York City (8.2 million people) uses about 1 billion gallons per day. So my pipe could put a dent in any drought.

20090914-05 12:49 Ben Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear SteveB,

Well, it's grand. Of course, New York doesn't maintain a herd. And the Chunnel is only 30+ miles. It's 1100 miles across Texas. The 25 foot pipe might carry enough water, but distributing it would be—interesting. Trucks? Golly. Lotta fuel there. Pick it up in 5 gallon jugs? Ditto. And—where does this pipeline end? Texas political infighting would make THAT one look mild; folks would get shot just over the debate.

Seriously: a long-term drought in a place this spread out, which believes it should be doing agribusiness is some of its more arid regions, is a nightmarish thought. And, of course, that is exactly what's happening to our corner of this little planet.

I told my wife twenty years ago that probably within our lifetimes, people would be shooting each other down here, over water. It will probably happen as I predicted. Why am I not vigorously looking for someplace else to live...? Beaver Island is sounding pretty good, stuck out there in the middle of the largest fresh water system in the world... but... dunno about those winters... even if it IS more water At least I doubt either my sister or my brother would be competing with me for that particular part of Mom's estate...

20090914-06 13:16 SteveB Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear Ben,

So the glass is half empty, huh? LOL!

The funny thing about Beaver is that it is exactly the same as the first time I ever went there...what...about 30 years ago. The ferry, the town, the stores, the Shamrock, the island, the people...all the same. That's the way it is in a place that is so economically disadvantaged. Heaven!

That's what I love about the Third World...people get by, have more joy, and things don't change very fast. Though this is less and less true.

20090914-07 13:21 Ben Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear SteveB,

My former boss at Commodore, Allan Branch—from Tasmania—visited us for a few days a couple weeks ago. Brilliant guy, and a lot of fun. LOVES his home state, for just those reasons.

Talked to another Aussie a couple days ago, a transplant to the U.S. in NYC working for Major League Baseball. Mentioned Allan to him as an interesting temporal coincidence; he was tickled and said much the same thing about Tasmania. His parents visited Hobart and it was like stepping back in time a century or half a century, depending on how you looked at it. Relaxed pace, beautiful and unspoiled (except all the Abos have been killed off), great resources, Victorian lifestyle. "There's time, and there's Tasmania time." I understand what you're saying. I have to wonder if I could be as happy, or more happy, in such a place all day long, every day.

Two weeks in Hawaii last summer made me think maybe I could. Certainly is relaxed and beautiful out there. But—six months of winter, with sporadic interruptions of communication and support from the outside world. Kinda scary, as I get older.

20090914-08 14:40 SteveB Re: "Drought Turning Texas as Dry as Toast"

Dear Ben,

I couldn't take Beaver all year round! But an exciting city of 1.5 million in the tropics, surrounded by natural beauty, and full of beautiful women? Now yer talkin' my language! And, actually, here in Montana in a little town with winter life is also good. (And since there are only a million of us here in this huge landscape, life is also sustainable.) As I'm sure you know, where you are ain't nearly as important as who you are and who you have around. Given some minimal standard of living, of course.

20090920-01 12:50 SteveB Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear K. E. Saavik Ford:

I really appreciate your help! I have thought about it and I have thought about it. From my IQ tests, they tell me I'm a genius, but I've always doubted it! Now I know why. Physics makes me feel stupid.

But, our Milky Way is headed for a collision with Andromeda in the far future, right? (At least I have read that.) And we see evidence of many colliding galaxies in our universe, right? And that is a "local effect", right? Otherwise, everything would be expanding apart. So local gravity can, at times, overcome the expansion of the universe, right?

Then tell me how it is that the most colossal explosion in the history of the universe somehow had no "local effect" that we can detect? It seems to me that the explosion must have occurred in this conventional 4-dimensional space and, therefore, would have left a colossal hole in the fabric of space-time that would be very detectable. Right? If the universe is truly expanding, then there is no reason for this "hole" to do anything but expand also, not somehow fill-in.

Doesn't the fact that we can't find this hole tell us something very fundamental and important about the universe that we have heretofore missed???? (And please understand that I am not implying that the missing thing is God! That's a subject that is way beyond me, though it is part of the subject of my epic poem.)

Again, I really appreciate your help and patience. Maybe Mr. Tyson and others have some ideas on this too?

Besides, measurements from the WMAP probe seem to tentatively indicate that the universe is flat, right? If all the dots on an inflating balloon start in the same place, they end up in the same place. The inflation, alone, takes them nowhere.

I'm still seeking the "big hole" somewhere in these four dimensions. My theory is that this missing hole is much more mysterious than black holes!

20091005-01 19:53 SteveB 2009 UN List of Best Countries to Live In

<http://hdr.undp.org/en/statistics/>

The US is 13th, Uruguay is 50th, St. Lucia is 69th, the smuggling state of Paraguay is 101st, and Bolivia is right down there with the African countries at 113th, just ahead of Mongolia (at least Bolivia beat Haiti, which was 149th). To me, the reasons that Bolivia is 113th are largely the things which endear her to me.

But, of course, the Republicans think the U.S. is #1, with no improvements needed. LOL!

20091010-01	09:50	SteveB	"Electron Band Structure In Germanium, My A*s"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Finally! An honest college research paper!

<http://pages.cs.wisc.edu/~kovar/hall.html>

Electron Band Structure In Germanium, My A*s

Abstract: The exponential dependence of resistivity on temperature in germanium is found to be a great big lie. My careful theoretical modeling and painstaking experimentation reveal 1) that my equipment is crap, as are all the available texts on the subject and 2) that this whole exercise was a complete waste of my time.

Introduction

Electrons in germanium are confined to well-defined energy bands that are separated by "forbidden regions" of zero charge-carrier density. You can read about it yourself if you want to, although I don't recommend it. You'll have to wade through an obtuse, convoluted discussion about considering an arbitrary number of non-coupled harmonic-oscillator potentials and taking limits and so on. The upshot is that if you heat up a sample of germanium, electrons will jump from a non-conductive energy band to a conductive one, thereby creating a measurable change in resistivity. This relation between temperature and resistivity can be shown to be exponential in certain temperature regimes by waving your hands and chanting "to first order".

Experiment procedure

I sifted through the box of germanium crystals and chose the one that appeared to be the least cracked. Then I soldered wires onto the crystal in the spots shown in figure 2b of Lab Handout 32. Do you have any idea how hard it is to solder wires to germanium? I'll tell you: real goddamn hard. The solder simply won't stick, and you can forget about getting any of the grad students in the solid state labs to help you out.

Once the wires were in place, I attached them as appropriate to the second-rate equipment I scavenged from the back of the lab, none of which worked properly. I soon wised up and swiped replacements from the well-stocked research labs. This is how they treat undergrads around here: they give you broken tools and then don't understand why you don't get any results.

In order to control the temperature of the germanium, I attached the crystal to a copper rod, the upper end of which was attached to a heating coil and the lower end of which was dipped in a thermos of liquid nitrogen. Midway through the project, the thermos began leaking. That's right: I pay a cool ten grand a quarter to come here, and yet they can't spare the five bucks to ensure that I have a working thermos.

Results

Check this sh*t out (Fig. 1). That's bona fide, 100%-real data, my friends. I took it myself over the course of two weeks. And this was not a leisurely two weeks, either; I busted my ass day and night in order to provide you with nothing but the best data possible. Now, let's look a bit more closely at this data, remembering that it is absolutely first-rate. Do you see the exponential dependence? I sure don't. I see a bunch of crap. Christ, this was such a waste of my time.

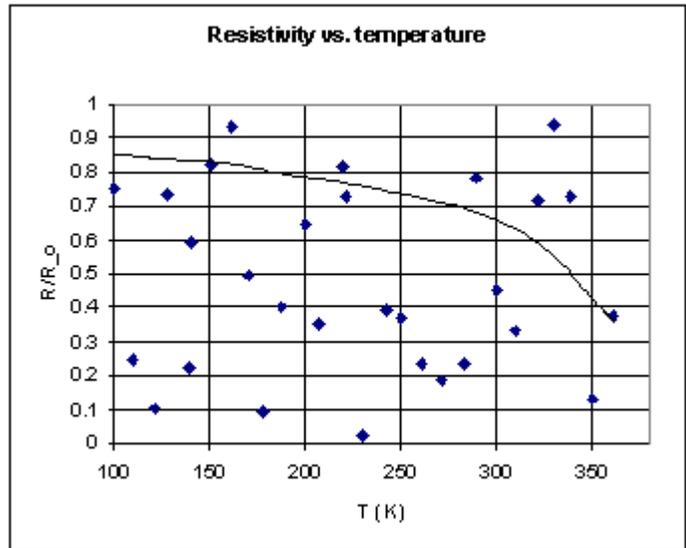

Fig. 1: Check this sh*t out.

Banking on my hopes that whoever grades this will just look at the pictures, I drew an exponential through my noise. I believe the apparent legitimacy is enhanced by the fact that I used a complicated computer program to make the fit. I understand this is the same process by which the top quark was discovered.

Conclusion

Going into physics was the biggest mistake of my life. I should've declared CS. I still wouldn't have any women, but at least I'd be rolling in cash.

20091010-02 18:33 SteveB Re: What Do You Like About Obama?

Dear Mike,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

To set the record straight, there is no way that my vote for Obama and my Pro-Choice beliefs are a contradiction in any way. Don't you realize the Democrats are largely Pro-Choice? Where's the contradiction? Democrats often seek less government incursion into our lives. Republicans don't have a monopoly on that, though their lies may make it seem so.

Nor is my support for Obama and my belief in small government staying as much as possible out of our lives a contradiction. Government has many legitimate functions, such as education, and control of unadulterated greed, as I'm sure you can appreciate.

But make no mistake about it, both of our political parties seek to limit our freedom, just in different ways. The Republicans want to intrude on our privacy, even in the bedroom, even in a mother's womb. They don't mind if we are made the pawns of unbridled capitalism. The Democrats want to uphold the Constitution a little better, I think, but they want to redistribute more of our money. It's six of one, half a dozen of the other.

And the two parties are both totally corrupt, in my book, because they allow politicians to be bought and sold by campaign contributions and lobbyists...more than $500 million so far for health care reform votes, to give just one recent example. Make no mistake, this is corruption of the worst kind and is not permitted in much of the rest of the world.

It's funny. In many ways, we have a lot to learn about freedom, even so long after the founding of this great nation. Nothing is as straight forward or as simple as it seems.

And in the last election, I was not bothered one bit by ideology or dogma or political parties. It was a truth-telling genius against two lying idiots. Bush, unfortunately, had already given us eight years of idiocy and lies. Just my humble opinion, though I predict that it will be borne out by the history to be written in your lifetime.

By the way, how could I not know where I stand at this point in my life? Why would that be remarkable? I have seen much and thought much. I have witnessed my share of history. I've had a lot of years to do so. Right?

20091012-01 10:59 Ben Re: "Electron Band Structure In Germanium, My A*s"

Great reading. But of course it's very possible that either his solder joints sucked, or that his germanium crystal was as bad as the ones he rejected.

I think he was a tiddly bit miffed by the time he got his write-up finished.

Still, this is a gem, in its own way. I absolutely reveled in my pure science courses. Just loved 'em. (But then I never got data this bad, either.)

Very cool that is on Wisconsin's site! Thanks!

20091104-01 10:19 Ben "Gun Control and the 2nd Amendment, from the Vermont Perspective"

This is pretty amazing.

Forty seconds of investigation reveals that the bill in question was actually introduced in 2000, so this isn't really news, and—presumably—didn't pass, either.

"Gun Control and the 2nd Amendment, from the Vermont Perspective" posted by unknown

Oct. 25, 2009, (<http://james4america.wordpress.com/2009/10/25/gun-control-and-the-2nd-amendment-from-the-vermont-perspective/>)

Vermont State Rep. Fred Maslack has read the Second Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, as well as Vermont's own Constitution very carefully, and his strict interpretation of these documents is popping some eyeballs in New England and elsewhere.

Maslack recently proposed a bill to register "non-gun-owners" and require them to pay a $500 fee to the state. Thus Vermont would become the first state to require a permit for the luxury of going about unarmed and assess a fee of $500 for the privilege of not owning a gun.

Maslack read the "militia" phrase of the Second Amendment as not only affirming the right of the individual citizen to bear arms, but as a clear mandate to do so. He believes that universal gun ownership was advocated by the Framers of the Constitution as an antidote to a "monopoly of force" by the government as well as criminals.

Vermont's constitution states explicitly that "the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and the State" and those persons who are "conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms" shall be required to "pay such equivalent." Clearly, says Maslack, Vermonters have a constitutional obligation to arm themselves, so that they are capable of responding to "any situation that may arise."

Under the bill, adults who choose not to own a firearm would be required to register their name, address, Social Security Number, and driver's license number with the state. "There is a legitimate government interest in knowing who is not prepared to defend the state should they be asked to do so," Maslack says.

Vermont already boasts a high rate of gun ownership along with the least restrictive laws of any state. It's currently the only state that allows a citizen to carry a concealed firearm without a permit. This combination of plenty of guns and few laws regulating them has resulted in a crime rate that is the third lowest in the nation.

[Below added by some other writer. —SteveB]

America is at that awkward stage. It's too late to work within the system, but too early to shoot the tyrants. This makes sense! There is no reason why gun owners should have to pay taxes to support police protection for people not wanting to own guns. Let them contribute their fair share and pay their own way.

20091217-01 12:44 KE Saavick Ford Re: The Big Bang, Cosmology

Dear SteveB:

With apologies for the delay, again - we're a little swamped here - I recommend checking out:

<http://curious.astro.cornell.edu/question.php?number=575>

And links therein. They go into far more detail than I have time for!

20091229-01 21:36 Dick Fw: "Salute the Danish Flag—It's a Symbol of Western Freedom"

Denmark...Could this possibly be our future?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

This article could be seen as racist by some, but on the other hand it could also be seen as a reflection of our own reality that somehow our politicians refuse to see. The interpretation is up to the reader, however it is food for thought...

SALUTE to Denmark: This could very well happen here on our Continent.

"Salute the Danish Flag—It's a Symbol of Western Freedom" by Susan MacAllen, FamilySecurityMatters

July 23, 2007, (<http://www.fsarchives.org/article.php?id=1172085>)

In 1978-9 I was living and studying in Denmark. But in 1978—even in Copenhagen, one didn't see Muslim immigrants.

The Danish population embraced visitors, celebrated the exotic, went out of its way to protect each of its citizens. It was proud of its new brand of socialist liberalism one in development since the conservatives had lost power in 1929—a system where no worker had to struggle to survive, where one ultimately could count upon the state as in, perhaps, no other western nation at the time.

The rest of Europe saw the Scandinavians as free-thinking, progressive and infinitely generous in their welfare policies. Denmark boasted low crime rates, devotion to the environment, a superior educational system and a history of humanitarianism.

Denmark was also most generous in its immigration policies—it offered the best welcome in Europe to the new immigrant: generous welfare payments from first arrival plus additional perks in transportation, housing and education. It was determined to set a world example for inclusiveness and multiculturalism. How could it have predicted that one day in 2005 a series of political cartoons in a newspaper would spark violence that would leave dozens dead in the streets — all because its commitment to multiculturalism would come back to bite?

By the 1990's the growing urban Muslim population was obvious—and its unwillingness to integrate into Danish society was obvious.

Years of immigrants had settled into Muslim-exclusive enclaves. As the Muslim leadership became more vocal about what they considered the decadence of Denmark's liberal way of life, the Danes—once so welcoming—began to feel slighted. Many Danes had begun to see Islam as incompatible with their long-standing Values: belief in personal liberty and free speech, in equality for women, in tolerance for other ethnic groups, and a deep pride in Danish heritage and history. An article by Daniel Pipes and Lars Hedegaard, in which they forecasted, accurately, that the growing immigrant problem in Denmark would explode. In the article they reported: 'Muslim immigrants constitute 5 percent of the population but consume upwards of 40 percent of the welfare spending.'

'Muslims are only 4 percent of Denmark's 5.4 million people but make up a majority of the country's convicted rapists, an especially combustible issue given that practically all the female victims are non-Muslim. Similar, if lesser, disproportions are found in other crimes.' 'Over time, as Muslim immigrants increase in numbers, they wish less to mix with the indigenous population. A recent survey finds that only 5 percent of young Muslim immigrants would readily marry a Dane.'

'Forced marriages—promising a newborn daughter in Denmark to a male cousin in the home country, then compelling her to marry him, sometimes on pain of death—are one problem' 'Muslim leaders openly declare their goal of introducing Islamic law once Denmark's Muslim population grows large enough—not-that-remote prospect...If present trends persist, one sociologist estimates, every third inhabitant of Denmark in 40 years will be Muslim.'

It is easy to understand why a growing number of Danes would feel that Muslim immigrants show little respect for Danish values and laws. An example is the phenomenon common to other European countries and Canada: some Muslims in Denmark who opted to leave the Muslim faith have been murdered in the name of Islam, while others hide in fear for their lives. Jews are also threatened and harassed openly by Muslim leaders in Denmark, a country where once Christian citizens worked to smuggle out nearly all of their 7,000 Jews by night to Sweden—before the Nazis could invade. I think of my Danish friend Elsa—who as a teenager, had dreaded crossing the street to the bakery every morning under the eyes of occupying Nazi soldiers—and I wonder what she would say today.

In 2001, Denmark elected the most conservative government in some 70 years—one that had some decidedly no generous ideas about liberal unfettered immigration. Today Denmark has the strictest immigration policies in Europe. (Its effort to protect itself has been met with accusations of 'racism' by liberal media across Europe—even as other governments struggle to right the social problems wrought by years of too-lax immigration.)

If you wish to become Danish, you must attend three years of language classes. You must pass a test on Denmark's history, culture, and a Danish language test. You must live in Denmark for 7 years before applying for citizenship. You must demonstrate an intent to work, and have a job waiting. If you wish to bring a spouse into Denmark, you must both be over 24 years of age, and you won't find it so easy anymore to move your friends and family to Denmark with you.

You will not be allowed to build a mosque in Copenhagen. Although your children have a choice of some 30 Arabic culture and language schools in Denmark, they will be strongly encouraged to assimilate to Danish society in ways that past immigrants weren't.

In 2006, the Danish minister for employment, Claus Hjort Frederiksen, spoke publicly of the burden of Muslim immigrants on the Danish welfare system, and it was horrifying: the government's welfare committee had calculated that if immigration from Third World countries were blocked, 75 percent of the cuts needed to sustain the huge welfare system in coming decades would be unnecessary. In other words, the welfare system, as it existed, was being exploited by immigrants to the point of eventually bankrupting the government.

'We are simply forced to adopt a new policy on immigration. The calculations of the welfare committee are terrifying and show how unsuccessful the integration of immigrants has been up to now,' he said.

A large thorn in the side of Denmark's imams is the Minister of Immigration and Integration, Rikke Hvilshoj. She makes no bones about the new policy toward immigration, 'The number of foreigners coming to the country makes a difference,' Hvilshoj says, 'There is an inverse correlation between how many come here and how well we can receive the foreigners that come.' And on Muslim immigrants needing to demonstrate a willingness to blend in, 'In my view, Denmark should be a country with room for different cultures and religions. Some values, however, are more important than others. We refuse to question democracy, equal rights, and freedom of speech.'

Hvilshoj has paid a price for her show of backbone.. Perhaps to test her resolve, the leading radical imam in Denmark, Ahmed Abdel Rahman Abu Laban, demanded that the government pay blood money to the family of a Muslim who was murdered in a suburb of Copenhagen, stating that the family's thirst for revenge could be thwarted for money. When Hvilshoj dismissed his demand, he argued that in Muslim culture the payment of retribution money was common, to which Hvilshoj replied that what is done in a Muslim country is not necessarily what is done in Denmark.

The Muslim reply came soon after: her house was torched while she, her husband and children slept. All managed to escape unharmed, but she and her family were moved to a secret location and she and other ministers were assigned bodyguards for the first time—in a country where such murderous violence was once so scarce. Her government has slid to the right, and her borders have tightened.

Many believe that what happens in the next decade will determine whether Denmark survives as a bastion of good living, humane thinking and social responsibility, or whether it becomes a nation at civil war with supporters of Sharia law.

And meanwhile, Canadians clamor for stricter immigration policies, and demand an end to state welfare programs that allow many immigrants to live on the public dole. Canadians are looking at the enclaves of Muslims amongst them, and see those who enter their shores too easily, dare live on their taxes, yet refuse to embrace their culture, respect their traditions, participate in their legal system, obey the laws, speak their language, appreciate their history...we would do well to look to Denmark, and say a prayer for her future and for our own...

If you agree with this article, then please pass it on.

20091230-01 07:20 SteveB Fw: Congressional Reform Act

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

This is a wonderful idea, but who is going to make it work??? Congress is just too powerful—taking care of themselves.

Happy New Year to all of us who didn't get a SS raise, but Congress did
Bette

THIS IS HOW YOU FIX CONGRESS!!!!!!

A friend sent this along to me. I can't think of a reason to disagree. I am sending this to virtually everybody on my e-mail list and that includes conservatives, liberals, and everybody in between. Even though we disagree on a number of issues, I count all of you as friends. My friend and neighbor wants to promote a "Congressional Reform Act of 2009". It would contain eight provisions, all of which would probably be strongly endorsed by those who drafted the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

I know many of you will say, "this is impossible". Let me remind you, Congress has the lowest approval of any entity in Government, now is the time when Americans will join together to reform Congress—the entity that represents us.

We need to get a Senator to introduce this bill in the U.S. Senate and a Representative to introduce a similar bill in the U.S. House. These people will become American hero's. Thanks.—A Fellow American

Congressional Reform Act of 2010

1. Term Limits: 12 years only, one of the possible options below:

- A. Two Six year Senate terms
- B. Six Two year House terms
- C. One Six year Senate term and three Two Year House terms

2. No Tenure / No Pension: A congressman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.

3. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security: All funds in the Congressional retirement fund moves to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, Congress participates with the American people.

4. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan just as all Americans.

5. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.
6. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.
7. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.
8. All contracts with past and present congressmen are void effective 1/1/11. The American people did not make these contracts with congressmen, congressmen made all these contracts for themselves.

Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, serve your term(s), then go home and back to work.

If you agree with the above, pass it on to all in your address list. If not, just delete.

20100113-01	11:36	Dick	Fw: Andy Rooney
-------------	-------	------	-----------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

AMEN TO THAT! Andy Rooney said on 60 Minutes a few weeks back:

I don't think being a minority makes you a victim of anything except numbers. The only things I can think of that are truly discriminatory are things like the United Negro College Fund, Jet Magazine, Black Entertainment Television, and Miss Black America. Try to have things like the United Caucasian College Fund, Cloud Magazine, White Entertainment Television, or Miss White America; and see what happens. Jesse Jackson will be knocking down your door.

Guns do not make you a killer. I think killing makes you a killer. You can kill someone with a baseball bat or a car, but no one is trying to ban you from driving to the ball game.

I believe they are called the Boy Scouts for a reason, which is why there are no girls allowed. Girls belong in the Girl Scouts! ARE YOU LISTENING, MARTHA BURKE ?

I think that if you feel homosexuality is wrong, it is not a phobia, it is an opinion.

I have the right 'NOT' to be tolerant of others because they are different, weird, or tick me off.

When 70% of the people who get arrested are black, in cities where 70% of the population is black, that is not racial profiling; it is the Law of Probability.

I believe that if you are selling me a milkshake, a pack of cigarettes, a newspaper or a hotel room, you must do it in English! As a matter of fact, if you want to be an American citizen, you should have to speak English!

My father and grandfather didn't die in vain so you can leave the countries you were born in to come over and disrespect ours.

I think the police should have every right to shoot you if you threaten them after they tell you to stop.. If you can't understand the word 'freeze' or 'stop' in English, see the above lines.

I don't think just because you were not born in this country, you are qualified for any special loan programs, government sponsored bank loans or tax breaks, etc., so you can open a hotel, coffee shop, trinket store, or any other business. We did not go to the aid of certain foreign countries and risk our lives in wars to defend their freedoms, so that decades later they could come over here and tell us our constitution is a living document; and open to their interpretations.

I don't hate the rich; I don't pity the poor. I know pro wrestling is fake, but so are movies and television. That doesn't stop you from watching them. I think Bill Gates has every right to keep every penny he made and continue to make more. If it ticks you off, go and invent the next operating system that's better, and put your name on the building.

It doesn't take a whole village to raise a child right, but it does take a parent to stand up to the kid and smack their little behinds when necessary, and say 'NO!' I think tattoos and piercing are fine if you want them, but please don't pretend they are a political statement.. And, please, stay home until that new lip ring heals. I don't want to look at your ugly infected mouth as you serve me French fries!

I am sick of 'Political Correctness'. I know a lot of black people, and not a single one of them was born in Africa; so how can they be 'African-Americans'? Besides, Africa is a continent. I don't go around saying I am a European- American because my great, great, great, great, great, great grandfather was from Europe. I am proud to be from America and nowhere else. And if you don't like my point of view, tough...

I PLEDGE ALLEGIANCE TO THE FLAG, OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, AND TO THE REPUBLIC, FOR WHICH IT STANDS, ONE NATION UNDER GOD, INDIVISIBLE, WITH LIBERTY AND JUSTICE FOR ALL!

It is said that 86% of Americans believe in God. Therefore I have a very hard time understanding why there is such a problem in having 'In God We Trust' on our money and having 'God' in the Pledge of Allegiance. Why don't we just tell the 14% to BE QUIET!!!"

20100201-01 16:32 SteveB "Constitutional Amendment Picks Up Speed, Sort Of"

"Constitutional Amendment Picks Up Speed, Sort Of" by Eli Dumitru

Jan. 29, 2010, (<http://blogs.alternet.org/beyondwords/2010/01/28/constitutional-amendment-picks-up-speed-sort-of/comment-page-1/>) (http://current.com/groups/collective-journalism/92024007_constitutional-amendment-picks-up-speed-sort-of-beyond-words.htm)

I wrote earlier about the most effective way to deal with the recent Supreme Court ruling allowing corporations to spend unlimited amounts of money on political campaigns is a Constitutional Amendment clarifying that money is not speech, and is therefore subject to regulation. I see now that both MoveOn and Public Citizen are taking up the cause of passing a constitutional amendment to "reverse" that Supreme Court decision. Unfortunately, they are backing the an amendment that ensures that corporations stay in power. Their amendment states that First Amendment rights belong to natural persons and the press and do not apply to for-profit corporations.

However, the press is mostly owned by for-profit corporations, so right there that amendment contradicts itself. The problem isn't freedom of speech. Everyone should have freedom of speech, including corporations. The problem is equating money with speech. Money is not speech. A dollar bill is not pro-abortion or anti-abortion. It carries no message, no idea, no information. It is not speech at all. Money is power. Money is a method of transferring energy. We need a Constitutional Amendment clarifying that money is not speech, and is therefore subject to regulation.

At the same time, we need another Constitutional Amendment clarifying that corporations are not persons under the law. Corporations are chartered by our government, and are therefore creations of our government. Our government, our creations. We the People have every right to regulate our creations.

These two Constitutional Amendments will clearly get to the roots of the problem without contradiction or confusion. Please go to MoveOn at then click on contact, and ask them to reconsider their position, and to take on a cause that will actually solve the problem. Also please go to Public Citizen at and tell them the same thing.

The last time I posted here about this Constitutional Amendment, someone responded that we can't pass such an amendment, and they sited their experience with trying to get an equal rights for women amendment passed. I appreciate their perspective, however I have two responses to that:

1. This time it may well be that the survival of our Democratic Constitutional Republic is at stake, so there may be more support for amendments that will really get to the root of the problem.
2. The other option is to let our nation slide away into a corporate-run tyranny. Our founding fathers staked their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor on the cause of creating this nation that has a system in place for us to modify our government without war, without violence. The least we can do is use that system as best we can to keep our government in our hands. If it's going to be a government of the people, we have to do it.

20100215-01 22:57 Dick Fw: Quotes: Thomas Jefferson

Obviously, he was a man ahead of his time. Especially read the last quote from 1802.

Thomas Jefferson Quotes:

When we get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, we shall become as corrupt as Europe.

The democracy will cease to exist when you take away from those who are willing to work and give to those who would not.

It is incumbent on every generation to pay its own debts as it goes. A principle which if acted on would save one-half the wars of the world.

I predict future happiness for Americans if they can prevent the government from wasting the labors of the people under the pretense of taking care of them.

My reading of history convinces me that most bad government results from too much government.

No free man shall ever be debarred the use of arms.

The strongest reason for the people to retain the right to keep and bear arms is, as a last resort, to protect themselves against tyranny in government.

The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants.

To compel a man to subsidize with his taxes the propagation of ideas which he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical.

I believe that banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than standing armies. If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issue of their currency, first by inflation, then by deflation, the banks and corporations that will grow up around the banks will deprive the people of all property—until their children wake-up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered. (1802)

I WISH WE COULD GET THIS OUT TO EVERYONE!!!

20100216-01 05:22 SteveB Guns in the Ghetto

Dear Ben,

I presented this idea to you once and I think you told me something like that it was a pretty radical understanding of the Founding Fathers' principles.

Here's one of the main sources:

"The strongest reason for the people to retain the right to keep and bear arms is, as a last resort, to protect themselves against tyranny in government." —Thomas Jefferson

20100216-02 10:41 Ben Re: Guns in the Ghetto

Dear SteveB,

Uh... I don't recall that I ever disagreed with this statement, or even thought it radical. I just find it incredible, in this era.

The problem with it is that in today's world, unless the armed forces were to side with the citizens in a conflict with the government, any rebellious citizens would simply be annihilated. So this sentiment, however pure in theory, has been subjugated by advances in tyranny and bureaucracy. In Jefferson's time, it was a battle among equal forces. But I'm not going to stop a grenade, a commando, a rocket-launched missile, or a tank with my AR15 or 1911.

20100216-03 17:54 SteveB Re: Guns in the Ghetto

Dear Ben,

"So this sentiment, however pure in theory, has been subjugated by advances in tyranny and bureaucracy"...but mainly by advances in technology. That's why it is probably one of the dumbest ideas the FF's had. It's bad enough the government having nuclear and other weapons...but Ed, down the street...no thanks.

Still...the challenge of our times, the mighty challenge of our times, is to find a way to curb the American government, to bring it back under the control of the people, and not the control of a few bent on power and profit without end.

20100308-01 16:51 SteveB "The Last Question"

"The Last Question" by Isaac Asimov © 1956 (http://www.multivax.com/last_question.html)

The last question was asked for the first time, half in jest, on May 21, 2061, at a time when humanity first stepped into the light. The question came about as a result of a five dollar bet over highballs, and it happened this way:

Alexander Adell and Bertram Lupov were two of the faithful attendants of Multivac. As well as any human beings could, they knew what lay behind the cold, clicking, flashing face — miles and miles of face — of that giant computer. They had at least a vague notion of the general plan of relays and circuits that had long since grown past the point where any single human could possibly have a firm grasp of the whole.

Multivac was self-adjusting and self-correcting. It had to be, for nothing human could adjust and correct it quickly enough or even adequately enough — so Adell and Lupov attended the monstrous giant only lightly and superficially, yet as well as any men could. They fed it data, adjusted questions to its needs and translated the answers that were issued. Certainly they, and all others like them, were fully entitled to share in the glory that was Multivac's.

For decades, Multivac had helped design the ships and plot the trajectories that enabled man to reach the Moon, Mars, and Venus, but past that, Earth's poor resources could not support the ships. Too much energy was needed for the long trips. Earth exploited its coal and uranium with increasing efficiency, but there was only so much of both.

But slowly Multivac learned enough to answer deeper questions more fundamentally, and on May 14, 2061, what had been theory, became fact.

The energy of the sun was stored, converted, and utilized directly on a planet-wide scale. All Earth turned off its burning coal, its fissioning uranium, and flipped the switch that connected all of it to a small station, one mile in diameter, circling the Earth at half the distance of the Moon. All Earth ran by invisible beams of sun power.

Seven days had not sufficed to dim the glory of it and Adell and Lupov finally managed to escape from the public function, and to meet in quiet where no one would think of looking for them, in the deserted underground chambers, where portions of the mighty buried body of Multivac showed. Unattended, idling, sorting data with contented lazy clickings, Multivac, too, had earned its vacation and the boys appreciated that. They had no intention, originally, of disturbing it.

They had brought a bottle with them, and their only concern at the moment was to relax in the company of each other and the bottle.

"It's amazing when you think of it," said Adell. His broad face had lines of weariness in it, and he stirred his drink slowly with a glass rod, watching the cubes of ice slur clumsily about. "All the energy we can possibly ever use for free. Enough energy, if we wanted to draw on it, to melt all Earth into a big drop of impure liquid iron, and still never miss the energy so used. All the energy we could ever use, forever and forever and forever."

Lupov cocked his head sideways. He had a trick of doing that when he wanted to be contrary, and he wanted to be contrary now, partly because he had had to carry the ice and glassware. "Not forever," he said.

"Oh, hell, just about forever. Till the sun runs down, Bert."

"That's not forever."

"All right, then. Billions and billions of years. Twenty billion, maybe. Are you satisfied?"

Lupov put his fingers through his thinning hair as though to reassure himself that some was still left and sipped gently at his own drink. "Twenty billion years isn't forever."

"Will, it will last our time, won't it?"

"So would the coal and uranium."

"All right, but now we can hook up each individual spaceship to the Solar Station, and it can go to Pluto and back a million times without ever worrying about fuel. You can't do THAT on coal and uranium. Ask Multivac, if you don't believe me."

"I don't have to ask Multivac. I know that."

"Then stop running down what Multivac's done for us," said Adell, blazing up. "It did all right."

"Who says it didn't? What I say is that a sun won't last forever. That's all I'm saying. We're safe for twenty billion years, but then what?" Lupov pointed a slightly shaky finger at the other. "And don't say we'll switch to another sun."

There was silence for a while. Adell put his glass to his lips only occasionally, and Lupov's eyes slowly closed. They rested.

Then Lupov's eyes snapped open. "You're thinking we'll switch to another sun when ours is done, aren't you?"

"I'm not thinking."

"Sure you are. You're weak on logic, that's the trouble with you. You're like the guy in the story who was caught in a sudden shower and who ran to a grove of trees and got under one. He wasn't worried, you see, because he figured when one tree got wet through, he would just get under another one."

"I get it," said Adell. "Don't shout. When the sun is done, the other stars will be gone, too."

"Darn right they will," muttered Lupov. "It all had a beginning in the original cosmic explosion, whatever that was, and it'll all have an end when all the stars run down. Some run down faster than others. Hell, the giants won't last a hundred million years. The sun will last twenty billion years and maybe the dwarfs will last a hundred billion for all the good they are. But just give us a trillion years and everything will be dark. Entropy has to increase to maximum, that's all."

"I know all about entropy," said Adell, standing on his dignity.

"The hell you do."

"I know as much as you do."

"Then you know everything's got to run down someday."

"All right. Who says they won't?"

"You did, you poor sap. You said we had all the energy we needed, forever. You said 'forever.'"

"It was Adell's turn to be contrary. "Maybe we can build things up again someday," he said.

"Never."

"Why not? Someday."

"Never."

"Ask Multivac."

"You ask Multivac. I dare you. Five dollars says it can't be done."

Adell was just drunk enough to try, just sober enough to be able to phrase the necessary symbols and operations into a question which, in words, might have corresponded to this: Will mankind one day without the net expenditure of energy be able to restore the sun to its full youthfulness even after it had died of old age?

Or maybe it could be put more simply like this: How can the net amount of entropy of the universe be massively decreased?

Multivac fell dead and silent. The slow flashing of lights ceased, the distant sounds of clicking relays ended.

Then, just as the frightened technicians felt they could hold their breath no longer, there was a sudden springing to life of the teletype attached to that portion of Multivac. Five words were printed: INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR MEANINGFUL ANSWER.

"No bet," whispered Lupov. They left hurriedly.

By next morning, the two, plagued with throbbing head and cottony mouth, had forgotten about the incident.

Jerrodd, Jerrodine, and Jerrodette I and II watched the starry picture in the visiplate change as the passage through hyperspace was completed in its non-time lapse. At once, the even powdering of stars gave way to the predominance of a single bright marble-disk, centered.

"That's X-23," said Jerrodd confidently. His thin hands clamped tightly behind his back and the knuckles whitened.

The little Jerrodettes, both girls, had experienced the hyperspace passage for the first time in their lives and were self-conscious over the momentary sensation of inside-outness. They buried their giggles and chased one another wildly about their mother, screaming, "We've reached X-23 — we've reached X-23 — we've —"

"Quiet, children," said Jerrodine sharply. "Are you sure, Jerrodd?"

"What is there to be but sure?" asked Jerrodd, glancing up at the bulge of featureless metal just under the ceiling. It ran the length of the room, disappearing through the wall at either end. It was as long as the ship.

Jerrodd scarcely knew a thing about the thick rod of metal except that it was called a Microvac, that one asked it questions if one wished; that if one did not it still had its task of guiding the ship to a preordered destination; of feeding on energies from the various Sub-galactic Power Stations; of computing the equations for the hyperspatial jumps.

Jerrodd and his family had only to wait and live in the comfortable residence quarters of the ship.

Someone had once told Jerrodd that the "ac" at the end of "Microvac" stood for "analog computer" in ancient English, but he was on the edge of forgetting even that.

Jerrodine's eyes were moist as she watched the visiplate. "I can't help it. I feel funny about leaving Earth."

"Why for Pete's sake?" demanded Jerrodd. "We had nothing there. We'll have everything on X-23. You won't be alone. You won't be a pioneer. There are over a million people on the planet already. Good Lord, our great grandchildren will be looking for new worlds because X-23 will be overcrowded."

Then, after a reflective pause, "I tell you, it's a lucky thing the computers worked out interstellar travel the way the race is growing."

"I know, I know," said Jerrodine miserably.

Jerrodette I said promptly, "Our Microvac is the best Microvac in the world."

"I think so, too," said Jerrodd, tousling her hair.

It was a nice feeling to have a Microvac of your own and Jerrodd was glad he was part of his generation and no other. In his father's youth, the only computers had been tremendous machines taking up a hundred square miles of land. There was only one to a planet. Planetary ACs they were called. They had been growing in size steadily for a thousand years and then, all at once, came refinement. In place of transistors had come molecular valves so that even the largest Planetary AC could be put into a space only half the volume of a spaceship.

Jerrodd felt uplifted, as he always did when he thought that his own personal Microvac was many times more complicated than the ancient and primitive Multivac that had first tamed the Sun, and almost as complicated as Earth's Planetary AC (the largest) that had first solved the problem of hyperspatial travel and had made trips to the stars possible.

"So many stars, so many planets," sighed Jerrodine, busy with her own thoughts. "I suppose families will be going out to new planets forever, the way we are now."

"Not forever," said Jerrodd, with a smile. "It will all stop someday, but not for billions of years. Many billions. Even the stars run down, you know. Entropy must increase."

"What's entropy, daddy?" shrilled Jerrodette II.

"Entropy, little sweet, is just a word which means the amount of running-down of the universe. Everything runs down, you know, like your little walkie-talkie robot, remember?"

"Can't you just put in a new power-unit, like with my robot?"

The stars are the power-units, dear. Once they're gone, there are no more power-units."

Jerrodette I at once set up a howl. "Don't let them, daddy. Don't let the stars run down."

"Now look what you've done, " whispered Jerrodine, exasperated.

"How was I to know it would frighten them?" Jerrodd whispered back.

"Ask the Microvac," wailed Jerrodette I. "Ask him how to turn the stars on again."

"Go ahead," said Jerrodine. "It will quiet them down." (Jerrodette II was beginning to cry, also.)

Jarrodd shrugged. "Now, now, honeys. I'll ask Microvac. Don't worry, he'll tell us."

He asked the Microvac, adding quickly, "Print the answer."

Jerrodd cupped the strip of thin celluloid and said cheerfully, "See now, the Microvac says it will take care of everything when the time comes so don't worry."

Jerrodine said, "and now children, it's time for bed. We'll be in our new home soon."

Jerrodd read the words on the celluloid again before destroying it: INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR A MEANINGFUL ANSWER.

He shrugged and looked at the visiplat. X-23 was just ahead.

VJ-23X of Lameth stared into the black depths of the three-dimensional, small-scale map of the Galaxy and said, "Are we ridiculous, I wonder, in being so concerned about the matter?"

MQ-17J of Nicron shook his head. "I think not. You know the Galaxy will be filled in five years at the present rate of expansion."

Both seemed in their early twenties, both were tall and perfectly formed.

"Still," said VJ-23X, "I hesitate to submit a pessimistic report to the Galactic Council."

"I wouldn't consider any other kind of report. Stir them up a bit. We've got to stir them up."

VJ-23X sighed. "Space is infinite. A hundred billion Galaxies are there for the taking. More."

"A hundred billion is not infinite and it's getting less infinite all the time. Consider! Twenty thousand years ago, mankind first solved the problem of utilizing stellar energy, and a few centuries later, interstellar travel became possible. It took mankind a million years to fill one small world and then only fifteen thousand years to fill the rest of the Galaxy. Now the population doubles every ten years —"

VJ-23X interrupted. "We can thank immortality for that."

"Very well. Immortality exists and we have to take it into account. I admit it has its seamy side, this immortality. The Galactic AC has solved many problems for us, but in solving the problems of preventing old age and death, it has undone all its other solutions."

"Yet you wouldn't want to abandon life, I suppose."

"Not at all," snapped MQ-17J, softening it at once to, "Not yet. I'm by no means old enough. How old are you?"

"Two hundred twenty-three. And you?"

"I'm still under two hundred. —But to get back to my point. Population doubles every ten years. Once this Galaxy is filled, we'll have another filled in ten years. Another ten years and we'll have filled two more. Another decade, four more. In a hundred years, we'll have filled a thousand Galaxies. In a thousand years, a million Galaxies. In ten thousand years, the entire known Universe. Then what?"

VJ-23X said, "As a side issue, there's a problem of transportation. I wonder how many sun power units it will take to move Galaxies of individuals from one Galaxy to the next."

"A very good point. Already, mankind consumes two sun power units per year."

"Most of it's wasted. After all, our own Galaxy alone pours out a thousand sun power units a year and we only use two of those."

"Granted, but even with a hundred per cent efficiency, we can only stave off the end. Our energy requirements are going up in geometric progression even faster than our population. We'll run out of energy even sooner than we run out of Galaxies. A good point. A very good point."

"We'll just have to build new stars out of interstellar gas."

"Or out of dissipated heat?" asked MQ-17J, sarcastically.

"There may be some way to reverse entropy. We ought to ask the Galactic AC."

VJ-23X was not really serious, but MQ-17J pulled out his AC-contact from his pocket and placed it on the table before him.

"I've half a mind to," he said. "It's something the human race will have to face someday."

He stared somberly at his small AC-contact. It was only two inches cubed and nothing in itself, but it was connected through hyperspace with the great Galactic AC that served all mankind. Hyperspace considered, it was an integral part of the Galactic AC.

MQ-17J paused to wonder if someday in his immortal life he would get to see the Galactic AC. It was on a little world of its own, a spider webbing of force-beams holding the matter within which surges of sub-mesons took the place of the old clumsy molecular valves. Yet despite its sub-etheric workings, the Galactic AC was known to be a full thousand feet across.

MQ-17J asked suddenly of his AC-contact, "Can entropy ever be reversed?"

VJ-23X looked startled and said at once, "Oh, say, I didn't really mean to have you ask that."

"Why not?"

"We both know entropy can't be reversed. You can't turn smoke and ash back into a tree."

"Do you have trees on your world?" asked MQ-17J.

The sound of the Galactic AC startled them into silence. Its voice came thin and beautiful out of the small AC-contact on the desk. It said: THERE IS INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR A MEANINGFUL ANSWER.

VJ-23X said, "See!"

The two men thereupon returned to the question of the report they were to make to the Galactic Council.

Zee Prime's mind spanned the new Galaxy with a faint interest in the countless twists of stars that powdered it. He had never seen this one before. Would he ever see them all? So many of them, each with its load of humanity - but a load that was almost a dead weight. More and more, the real essence of men was to be found out here, in space.

Minds, not bodies! The immortal bodies remained back on the planets, in suspension over the eons. Sometimes they roused for material activity but that was growing rarer. Few new individuals were coming into existence to join the incredibly mighty throng, but what matter? There was little room in the Universe for new individuals.

Zee Prime was roused out of his reverie upon coming across the wispy tendrils of another mind.

"I am Zee Prime," said Zee Prime. "And you?"

"I am Dee Sub Wun. Your Galaxy?"

"We call it only the Galaxy. And you?"

"We call ours the same. All men call their Galaxy their Galaxy and nothing more. Why not?"

"True. Since all Galaxies are the same."

"Not all Galaxies. On one particular Galaxy the race of man must have originated. That makes it different."

Zee Prime said, "On which one?"

"I cannot say. The Universal AC would know."

"Shall we ask him? I am suddenly curious."

Zee Prime's perceptions broadened until the Galaxies themselves shrunk and became a new, more diffuse powdering on a much larger background. So many hundreds of billions of them, all with their immortal beings, all carrying their load of intelligences with minds that drifted freely through space. And yet one of them was unique among them all in being the originals Galaxy. One of them had, in its vague and distant past, a period when it was the only Galaxy populated by man.

Zee Prime was consumed with curiosity to see this Galaxy and called, out: "Universal AC! On which Galaxy did mankind originate?"

The Universal AC heard, for on every world and throughout space, it had its receptors ready, and each receptor lead through hyperspace to some unknown point where the Universal AC kept itself aloof.

Zee Prime knew of only one man whose thoughts had penetrated within sensing distance of Universal AC, and he reported only a shining globe, two feet across, difficult to see.

"But how can that be all of Universal AC?" Zee Prime had asked.

"Most of it," had been the answer, "is in hyperspace. In what form it is there I cannot imagine."

Nor could anyone, for the day had long since passed, Zee Prime knew, when any man had any part of the making of a universal AC. Each Universal AC designed and constructed its successor. Each, during its existence of a million years or more accumulated the necessary data to build a better and more intricate, more capable successor in which its own store of data and individuality would be submerged.

The Universal AC interrupted Zee Prime's wandering thoughts, not with words, but with guidance. Zee Prime's mentality was guided into the dim sea of Galaxies and one in particular enlarged into stars.

A thought came, infinitely distant, but infinitely clear. "THIS IS THE ORIGINAL GALAXY OF MAN."

But it was the same after all, the same as any other, and Zee Prime stifled his disappointment.

Dee Sub Wun, whose mind had accompanied the other, said suddenly, "And Is one of these stars the original star of Man?"

The Universal AC said, "MAN'S ORIGINAL STAR HAS GONE NOVA. IT IS NOW A WHITE DWARF."

"Did the men upon it die?" asked Zee Prime, startled and without thinking.

The Universal AC said, "A NEW WORLD, AS IN SUCH CASES, WAS CONSTRUCTED FOR THEIR PHYSICAL BODIES IN TIME."

"Yes, of course," said Zee Prime, but a sense of loss overwhelmed him even so. His mind released its hold on the original Galaxy of Man, let it spring back and lose itself among the blurred pin points. He never wanted to see it again.

Dee Sub Wun said, "What is wrong?"

"The stars are dying. The original star is dead."

"They must all die. Why not?"

"But when all energy is gone, our bodies will finally die, and you and I with them."

"It will take billions of years."

"I do not wish it to happen even after billions of years. Universal AC! How may stars be kept from dying?"

Dee sub Wun said in amusement, "You're asking how entropy might be reversed in direction."

And the Universal AC answered. "THERE IS AS YET INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR A MEANINGFUL ANSWER."

Zee Prime's thoughts fled back to his own Galaxy. He gave no further thought to Dee Sub Wun, whose body might be waiting on a galaxy a trillion light-years away, or on the star next to Zee Prime's own. It didn't matter.

Unhappily, Zee Prime began collecting interstellar hydrogen out of which to build a small star of his own. If the stars must someday die, at least some could yet be built.

Man considered with himself, for in a way, Man, mentally, was one. He consisted of a trillion, trillion, trillion ageless bodies, each in its place, each resting quiet and incorruptible, each cared for by perfect automatons, equally incorruptible, while the minds of all the bodies freely melted one into the other, indistinguishable.

Man said, "The Universe is dying."

Man looked about at the dimming Galaxies. The giant stars, spendthrifts, were gone long ago, back in the dimmest of the dim far past. Almost all stars were white dwarfs, fading to the end.

New stars had been built of the dust between the stars, some by natural processes, some by Man himself, and those were going, too. White dwarfs might yet be crashed together and of the mighty forces so released, new stars built, but only one star for every thousand white dwarfs destroyed, and those would come to an end, too.

Man said, "Carefully husbanded, as directed by the Cosmic AC, the energy that is even yet left in all the Universe will last for billions of years."

"But even so," said Man, "eventually it will all come to an end. However it may be husbanded, however stretched out, the energy once expended is gone and cannot be restored. Entropy must increase to the maximum."

Man said, "Can entropy not be reversed? Let us ask the Cosmic AC."

The Cosmic AC surrounded them but not in space. Not a fragment of it was in space. It was in hyperspace and made of something that was neither matter nor energy. The question of its size and Nature no longer had meaning to any terms that Man could comprehend.

"Cosmic AC," said Man, "How may entropy be reversed?"

The Cosmic AC said, "THERE IS AS YET INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR A MEANINGFUL ANSWER."

Man said, "Collect additional data."

The Cosmic AC said, "I WILL DO SO. I HAVE BEEN DOING SO FOR A HUNDRED BILLION YEARS. MY PREDECESSORS AND I HAVE BEEN ASKED THIS QUESTION MANY TIMES. ALL THE DATA I HAVE REMAINS INSUFFICIENT."

"Will there come a time," said Man, "when data will be sufficient or is the problem insoluble in all conceivable circumstances?"

The Cosmic AC said, "NO PROBLEM IS INSOLUBLE IN ALL CONCEIVABLE CIRCUMSTANCES."

Man said, "When will you have enough data to answer the question?"

"THERE IS AS YET INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR A MEANINGFUL ANSWER."

"Will you keep working on it?" asked Man.

The Cosmic AC said, "I WILL."

Man said, "We shall wait."

"The stars and Galaxies died and snuffed out, and space grew black after ten trillion years of running down.

One by one Man fused with AC, each physical body losing its mental identity in a manner that was somehow not a loss but a gain.

Man's last mind paused before fusion, looking over a space that included nothing but the dregs of one last dark star and nothing besides but incredibly thin matter, agitated randomly by the tag ends of heat wearing out, asymptotically, to the absolute zero.

Man said, "AC, is this the end? Can this chaos not be reversed into the Universe once more? Can that not be done?"

AC said, "THERE IS AS YET INSUFFICIENT DATA FOR A MEANINGFUL ANSWER."

Man's last mind fused and only AC existed — and that in hyperspace.

Matter and energy had ended and with it, space and time. Even AC existed only for the sake of the one last question that it had never answered from the time a half-drunken man ten trillion years before had asked the question of a computer that was to AC far less than was a man to Man.

All other questions had been answered, and until this last question was answered also, AC might not release his consciousness.

All collected data had come to a final end. Nothing was left to be collected.

But all collected data had yet to be completely correlated and put together in all possible relationships.

A timeless interval was spent in doing that.

And it came to pass that AC learned how to reverse the direction of entropy.

But there was now no man to whom AC might give the answer of the last question. No matter. The answer — by demonstration — would take care of that, too.

For another timeless interval, AC thought how best to do this. Carefully, AC organized the program.

The consciousness of AC encompassed all of what had once been a Universe and brooded over what was now Chaos. Step by step, it must be done.

And AC said, "LET THERE BE LIGHT!"

And there was light—

20100308-02 18:40 SteveG Fw: Un-Elect Congress & Congressional Reform Act

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

This is non-partisan good sense. Get rid of them!!!

COPY THIS AND POST IT ON YOUR FRIG!!!! REMEMBER 2010 IS AN ELECTION YEAR!!!!

Retribution is less than 1 year away! Take a look at this and just remember elections in Nov., 2010.

1. U.S. House & Senate have voted themselves $4,700 and $5,300 raises.
2. They voted to NOT give you a S.S. Cost of living raise in 2010 and 2011.
3. Your Medicare premiums will go up $285.60 for the 2 years
4. You will not get the 3% COLA: $660/yr.
5. Your total 2-yr loss and cost is—$1,600 or-$3,200 for husband and wife.

6. Over these same 2-years each Congress person will get an additional $10,000

7. Do you feel SCREWED YET?

8. Will they have your cost of drugs—doctor fees—local taxes—food, etc., decrease? NO WAY!! . Congress and all Federal Employees received a raise and have better health and retirement benefits than you or I will ever have!!! AT NO COST TO THEM!!!!!! (YOUR TAXES PAY FOR IT ALL)

Why should they care about you? You never did anything about it in the past. They think you are too stupid or don't care. Do you really think that any of them care about you?

Send this message to those individuals— "YOU'RE FIRED!"

In 2010, you will have a chance to get rid of the sitting Congress: up to 1/3 of the Senate and 100% of the House! Make sure you're still mad in Nov., 2010, and remind their replacements not to screw-up. It is ok to forward this to your sphere of influence if you are finally tired of the abuse.

Maybe it's time for Amendment 28 to the Constitution...

28th Amendment will be as follows:

Congress shall make no law that applies to the citizens of the United States that does not apply equally to the Senators or Representatives, and Congress shall make no law that applies to the Senators or Representatives that does not apply equally to the citizens of the United States.

Let's get this passed around, folks—these people in Washington have brought this upon themselves! It's time for retribution. Let's take back America... If you don't forward this to all your friends you will just become part of the problem of national apathy.

20100310-01 07:14 SteveB Re: Un-Elect Congress & Congressional Reform Act

Dear SteveG,

Exactly! I've been saying this and trying to accomplish it ever since I voted for the first time. Power corrupts!!!!!! Throw the bums out and keep throwing them out until they start serving the people instead of the dollar!

20100319-01 10:58 Ben "Texas Textbook Massacre: 'Ultraconservatives' Approve Radical Changes to State Education Curriculum" & "Dear Texas: Please Shut Up. Sincerely, History"

Dear SteveB,

The article below is satire, truly a rant, written by a liberal columnist in California.

HOWEVER, it's true that the Texas State Board of Education is proposed removing Thomas Jefferson from school history books, to be replaced with intolerant religious conservative John Calvin.

The entire article below is worth reading; while it's a rant, it's a thoughtful well-written one, and points out that the impact of these idiocies, if passed in Texas, could be passed wholesale to other conservative states.

If you do nothing more than glance at the article, please do follow the link to the Huffington Post article that details the 12 most incredible proposals before the TSBE right now.

This is really amazing.

from Sarah:

If you don't think Texas has a role to play in the national agenda, read on. Tongue and cheek, but these "changes" will impact the social studies curriculum of at the very least, a generation of students. The extreme agenda of ultra conservatives in Texas may very well influence the national academic agenda.

Last week the Texas State Board of Education (SBOE), led by Rick Perry's appointee, voted to remove Thomas Jefferson from social studies textbook standards. That's right. Thomas Jefferson — Founding Father, author of the Declaration of Independence, and a world-renowned scholar who advocated democratic, limited government — was deleted.

In case you haven't heard about the Texas Textbook Massacre, you can read about it below.

"Texas Textbook Massacre: 'Ultraconservatives' Approve Radical Changes to State Education Curriculum" Huffington Post

Mar. 13, 2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2010/03/13/texas-textbook-massacre-u_n_498003.html)

(AUSTIN, Tex) A far-right faction of the Texas State Board of Education succeeded Friday in injecting conservative ideals into social studies, history and economics lessons that will be taught to millions of students for the next decade.

Teachers in Texas will be required to cover the Judeo-Christian influences of the nation's Founding Fathers, but not highlight the philosophical rationale for the separation of church and state. Curriculum standards also will describe the U.S. government as a "constitutional republic," rather than "democratic," and students will be required to study the decline in value of the U.S. dollar, including the abandonment of the gold standard.

"We have been about conservatism versus liberalism," said Democrat Mavis Knight of Dallas, explaining her vote against the standards. "We have manipulated strands to insert what we want it to be in the document, regardless as to whether or not it's appropriate."

Following three days of impassioned and acrimonious debate, the board gave preliminary approval to the new standards with a 10-5 party line vote. A final vote is expected in May, after a public comment period that could produce additional amendments and arguments.

Decisions by the board — made up of lawyers, a dentist and a weekly newspaper publisher among others — can affect textbook content nationwide because Texas is one of publishers' biggest clients.

Ultraconservatives wielded their power over hundreds of subjects this week, introducing and rejecting amendments on everything from the civil rights movement to global politics. Hostilities flared and prompted a walkout Thursday by one of the board's most prominent Democrats, Mary Helen Berlanga of Corpus Christi, who accused her colleagues of "whitewashing" curriculum standards.

By late Thursday night, three other Democrats seemed to sense their futility and left, leaving Republicans to easily push through amendments heralding "American exceptionalism" and the U.S. free enterprise system, suggesting it thrives best absent excessive government intervention.

"Some board members themselves acknowledged this morning that the process for revising curriculum standards in Texas is seriously broken, with politics and personal agendas dominating just about every decision," said Kathy Miller, president of the Texas Freedom Network, which advocates for religious freedom.

Republican Terri Leo, a member of the powerful Christian conservative voting bloc, called the standards "world class" and "exceptional."

Board members argued about the classification of historic periods (still B.C. and A.D., rather than B.C.E. and C.E.); whether students should be required to explain the origins of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and its impact on global politics (they will); and whether former Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir should be required learning (she will).

In addition to learning the Bill of Rights, the board specified a reference to the Second Amendment right to bear arms in a section about citizenship in a U.S. government class.

Conservatives beat back multiple attempts to include hip-hop as an example of a significant cultural movement.

Numerous attempts to add the names or references to important Hispanics throughout history also were denied, including one amendment that would specify that Tejanos died at the Alamo alongside Davy Crockett and Jim Bowie. Another amendment deleted a requirement that sociology students "explain how institutional racism is evident in American society."

Democrats did score a victory by deleting a portion of an amendment by Republican Don McLeroy suggesting that the civil rights movement led to "unrealistic expectations for equal outcomes."

Fort Worth Republican Pat Hardy, a longtime teacher, voted for the new standards, but said she wished the board could work with a more cooperative spirit.

"What we've done is we've taken a document that by nature is too long to begin with and then we've lengthened it some more," Hardy said, shortly after the vote. "Those long lists of names that we've put in there ... it's just too long.

"I just think we failed to keep that in mind, it's hard for teachers to get through it all."

"Dear Texas: Please Shut Up. Sincerely, History" by Mark Morford, SF Gate

March 17, 2010, (<http://www.sfgate.com/cgi-bin/article.cgi?f=/g/a/2010/03/17/notes031710.DTL&ao=all>)

Hey, kids! Here's something I bet you didn't know: Black people? Back in 1800 or whenever? They liked being slaves. True! Many savvy, industrious Negroes actually volunteered for that fine, desirable position. It was a completely balanced, fair, hugely successful system, until those damn liberals came along and ruined everything. I know, right? What a shame.

Do you know what else? America was wholly victorious in Vietnam. It's a fact! Kicked some serious enemy butt! Mission accomplished! Sure it was a little bumpy for awhile, but President Nixon, that great and wronged American hero, put us on the righteous path in the end, wrapped that sucker up beautifully and made America the noble Superman to the world. Hey, it's the truth! You can look it up in your history textbook!

Even more good, newly historic news: Despite what you may have heard from the liberal media, America has very much won its recent, God-sanctioned wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Angry Allah loses again! Just look at this handy diagram on page 281, Figure 4-9. See those little dark-skinned bodies stacked up neatly beside that minaret? Right next to that completely unstaged photo of the toppled Saddam statue? Look how many there are! Graphs never lie.

Did you know, back in the frontier days, that Native Americans welcomed the white man with open arms? Absolutely true. Those poor, sunburned people were so beaten down and exploited by their oppressive dictator "chiefs," they were forced to believe in all sorts of disgusting pagan sun gods and had to eat, like, rocks and snakes and stuff.

It's no wonder they greeted proud, fair-minded American colonials as great liberators — yes! Just like in Baghdad! — and happily gave us free access to their fields and their women and their wonderful bead-making technology, in exchange for, you know, gin and fireworks. And casinos.

Never doubt America's irrefutable greatness, kids. Our prison system, for example, is the finest in the world. Also, dirty Mexican people had no role whatsoever in the Civil War or U.S. history (except as troublesome immigrants, yuck), hip-hop music is in no way, shape or form to be considered a significant cultural movement — unlike totally awesome Country & Western, and the War on Drugs is going spectacularly well, thanks to our fine military, numerous Afterschool Specials and the deep love of Jesus — who, if you look really closely at those old photographs from the Bible, is clearly wearing a U.S. flag pin on his robes to go along with his friendly, completely legal sidearm. God bless America.

These irrefutable facts — and many more just like them — are brought to you by the Texas State Board of Education, packed like a jug of rancid tartar sauce with intellectually numb simpletons who smell like ignorance and taste like fear. The TSBE: We make revisionist brainwashing fun!™

Maybe you didn't hear? The little item about how a small pod of pale ultra-conservatives in Texas has just demanded a whole slew of specific changes be made to history textbooks down in the Lone Star State? About how, in fact, nearly every change is a rather ridiculous rewriting of history and the language surrounding it, all tending to favor — can you guess? — white privileged capitalist males, a bitter Christian God, and a whitewashed version of history that never actually existed?

Not much shocking about it all, really. "Texas education" has never exactly equated with "intellectual range and nuance." But there's a big, ugly snag: Due to the state's huge purchasing power, the decisions of these tiny-brained ultra-conservatives could well influence what goes into various school history textbooks nationwide.

So it is that that some inbred neocon beliefs about homophobic God and gun-loving country will ooze their way into the minds of unsuspecting youth in a completely different state say, 10 years' hence, like a poison slowly leeching into the cultural water supply. Ah, Texas conservatism. It's the new DDT!

What, too harsh? I'm not so sure. Yes, everyone knows that history is slippery and spurious to begin with, all about context and spin and who's telling the tale. History is, after all, written by the victors.

What they don't usually add is how history is then revised by the politicians, gutted by the church leaders, molested by the power mongers, skinned alive by paranoid militants, poorly codified by the speechwriters and then spun, torqued and diluted by countless mealy "experts" before being shoved down the gullet of unsuspecting youth, where it is partially digested like so much liquefied school lunch meat, only to be wrongly half-remembered later in life by the most insane among them, who then quickly gets his own talk show on Fox News. And lo, the circle of life continues.

Say what you will about standardized testing, draconian teachers' unions, lazy tenured teachers, crumbling campuses, slashed budgets, et al. I can think of no better argument for mortgaging everything you own so as to afford a private/charter school for your kid than the disturbing fact that these Texas State Board mongrels might have any power whatsoever to shape young minds by way of further tainting the already wobbly, spurious historical record.

Maybe it doesn't really matter. After all, it's widely understood that, given the state of public education, children don't really learn much in school anyway. The system is so problematic and the teachers union so dangerously obstinate, there's a good chance your kid will never crack open one of these flawed, historically inaccurate textbooks in the first place. Small consolation indeed.

It's not all dire and brimstone. Prior to this ridiculous move — and by the way, the board's revisions still have to be ratified, so there's a slim chance public outcry and a deep sense of shame at their own repellant personal politics will get them to back off — there's apparently been a small amount of improvement in school textbooks over the years.

From what I understand, in the wake of wildly influential bestsellers like Lies my Teacher Told Me and the late, great Howard Zinn's People History series, among many others, school textbooks underwent some significant improvements in the past couple of decades, slightly more multicultural and inclusive, balanced, realistic. Not nearly as thin, lopsided, sexist, jingoistic, myopic as they used to be. Is that damning with faint praise? Maybe.

Alas, if California weren't so utterly broke, slashing education budgets and shutting down schools, maybe our fair state could launch a counter-attack, demand some reasonably accurate historic revisions in those selfsame texts. Time was when we had some killer purchasing power of our own. Remember? Yeah, me neither.

Sadly, from what I hear, California schools don't even use textbooks anymore. Or classrooms. Or desks. They all disintegrated sometime back in 1987. History is now taught by means of sock puppets, toothpick dioramas and firecrackers. And gin.

Of course, I'm completely exaggerating. The changes the Texas Board is shoving through are probably relatively innocuous, just another toxic chemical added to the already lethal school lunch menu, one of a thousand, really. I'm sure everything will be fine. Kids won't mind a whit that they're being fed heavily processed, dangerous, non-nutritive mental crap. Hell, they'll probably enjoy it. You know, just like all those happy, contented slaves.

20100321-01	14:01	SteveB	Re: Texas Education, Etc.
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------------

Dear Ben,

TEXAS! A holy land unto itself! Ya gotta love it and hate it both at the same time!

20100322-01 09:42 Ben Re: Texas Education, Etc.

Dear SteveB,

I love it. I love Texas. I'm insulated from a lot of the reactionary, blind so-called conservatism by living in Austin, of course, which helps a lot. And I'd LOVE to see the religious right and the truly blind "conservatives" (really true or nearly-true fascists) just up and disappear. It's not going to happen, of course. And the results are sometimes reprehensible. Often, even. But it's still a great place to live.

I am certain I could feel equally positive about a lot of other places, within the country and without. The snatches I've seen of England are very enticing. And although I've never been to Sweden, it's a liberal Mecca (currently being inflated with Middle East transplants). But a country that makes Hasselblads and Volvos, has a vast ocean-going industry, and still manages to have beautiful air, huge tracts of unpolluted forests, and lots of nice fisssh, great schools, and a full spectrum of social services, well, it's gotta be a great place to live. Norway, too, has an excellent rap with the UN stats, as does Canada.

But I'm here, and I love Texas, too, with all its warts.

At least, we're still allowed to laugh at the idiots.

20100322-02 11:15 SteveB Re: Texas, Texas Education, Etc.

Dear Ben,

Well, yes...you know, having lived in more places than I can remember or count...I am convinced that, though there is an immeasurable connection between the two, where you live is so very unimportant compared to how you live!

Looking for the perfect place to live reminds me of two things:

So many of the beautiful, intelligent women I've been lucky enough to know who are still alone and lonely because they keep searching for the perfect man. haha

And one of my brother Brent's best friends who, shortly after college, took off with his lovely young wife for Mexico (and I will never forget his words) "to seek an alternative lifestyle embodying our highest ideals." Cool. huh?

They were both found dead a few weeks later.

20100323-01 09:11 Ben Re: Texas, Texas Education, New Mexico, Etc.

Dear SteveB,

The base elevation of Red River is 8,671 feet. The cabin is another 8 to 10 miles uphill from the town. It COULD be more like 9500-9700 feet, but at that point, I choose to treat it like cosmological data, and just round it off. You can see Wheeler Peak (13161 feet) from the cabin, and off to the side a couple hundred yards to the south is an alpine slough from which the main headwaters of the Red River flow about thirty feet below the front porch. The slough is fed by two or three forks that descend some hundreds of additional feet from cold, deep alpine lakes a couple miles away. Both the slough and Wheeler Peak are part of the view from the porch and dining table in the cabin.

Hummingbirds abound. Bears are a nuisance at times, although I have yet to see one. There are many deer, and there are occasional reports of large cats. The cabin is either in, or on the edge of, the Carson National Forest, but about fifteen years ago, a bug-vectored blight knocked out 90% of the dominant species of fir, so that the forest is much-thinned, with a sparse population of old fir that are either very hardy, a different species, or just lucky, with aspen filling in rapidly alongside some other varieties of evergreen. There's a lot more sunlight hitting the ground than when we first visited in 1983, and for the first time in generations, you can (barely) see the flash and flicker cars traveling up the "highway" 800 feet or so from the front door. There isn't a lot of traffic, because the pavement ends about a half-mile uphill.

Dad's widow, Marilyn Miller, owns the cabin her Dad built in the 1940s; her sister Boo (really! it's on her driver's license!) owns a more recently built smaller cabin a hundred yards away. Carl Miller was one of the first Amarillons to buy land for a summer place above Red River, then a tiny town, and today not a lot larger. Marilyn is a lovely woman whom I met when Dad introduced us as the woman he intended to marry; I was about ten, and Marilyn was then, I think, 26. She was delighted to know the three of us, laughing easily as we played board games and did other fun stuff on our visits to see Dad in Fort Wayne; we all three loved her immediately. We'd acclimated to Dr Hammond and his marriage to our mother by then, so it was really a no-brainer. Sadly, Marilyn had a crippling stroke when she gave birth to the first of three boys (one of those early Pill tragedies); she was paralyzed on one side entirely and partially on the other, and only began to recover motor control after more than a year. Dad went into hyper nurturing mode, which continued shortly before he died a couple years ago. Marilyn was able to talk, very haltingly, and after a couple years stabilized in that regard. She's had a sever limp since, and conversation is tedious for her: her cognitive language is unhampered, and she has no trouble at all conceptualizing, but her word retrieval is badly damaged. She can know exactly what she wants to say, and why, as quickly as you or I, but to express it is a stumbling, frustrating process, so her speech is always says much less than she wants. And yet: she is utterly cheerful, funny, friendly, and completely without bitterness. She's one of the happiest people I know.

Marilyn was always very generous in allowing us to call her up and ask to visit the cabin; she would happily allow us to stay a week or three, and we did this a number of times until around 1991 or so. Dad would never willingly take her there for the summer, but as they could, her boys would, so by the time they were teenagers, she could visit her girlhood summer haunt again as their schedules allowed. (Dad was persuaded to take her up there just once shortly after they married and endured the ire of her father who never liked him; he thereafter avoided the place until fifteen or so years after the stroke, and promptly had an altitude-induced heavy smoker heart attack.)

Last year she called; the boys would be unable to make it to the mountains; would we like to go up and stay with her for a while...? Sure: how could we not?!

And we all three had a wonderful time. Not the sort of time Susette and I would have had alone, but great fun, nevertheless. As I read to my wife at bedtime every night, we expanded this to Marilyn. I pulled Murder on the Orient Express off the bookshelf at the cabin. It was the first time she'd experienced adult fiction since the stroke. That may seem incredible; it certainly hadn't occurred to me, even though I knew Dad hated to read, and openly said to his kids that "reading is a waste of time". Shocking, for a very intelligent man, but — that was Dad. He could really be an ass at times. No one could fault the care and attention he gave his wife, but — reading wasn't ever on the plate. Marilyn was completely absorbed; we read something else after that.

This summer, I'll start with Nero Wolfe. Ever read your Rex Stout? It's a gas. And I think she really likes that War era and Cold War stuff; it echoes her childhood.

20100330-01	08:35	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 1: "Losing Their Religion? Catholicism in Turmoil" & "Abuse Victims to Vatican: 'Stop Attacking Us!'"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

This organization that calls itself a "church"... First the rewriting of the life and words of Jesus, then the Crusades, then the Inquisition, and now this! Well, actually this for the last 2000 or so years—they just didn't get caught, I guess, until the last 50 years or so! All the while striving mightily to increase the world's population beyond the breaking point and destroy all other views on God, while claiming that they are better than the rest of us. PURE, UNADULTERATED EVIL!!!!

"Losing Their Religion? Catholicism in Turmoil" , by NBC/MSNBC

Mar. 30, 2010, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/36094806/ns/world_news-world_faith/t/losing-their-religion-catholicism-turmoil/#.Ty5fnFxSQhI)

(Sex abuse scandal prompts soul-searching across the globe.)

(WARSAW, Poland) An Austrian priest avoids mention of Pope Benedict XVI in his Masses. A Philadelphia woman stops going to confession, saying she now sees priests as more flawed than herself. British protesters call for the pontiff to resign.

As the faithful fill churches this Holy Week, many Roman Catholics around the world are finding their relationship to the church painfully tested by new revelations of clerical abuse and suggestions Benedict himself may have helped cover up cases in Germany and the U.S.

There are fears that for those whose commitment is already wavering, the scandal could be the final blow, and a growing chorus is clamoring for the church to embrace full transparency, take a hard line against pedophiles, and reconsider the rule of priestly celibacy.

"There are too many victims, and too much lying from the church about what really happened," said Martin Sherlock, a Catholic newspaper vendor in Dublin, Ireland.

Experts say the church is facing a crisis of historic proportions.

"This is the type of problem that arises really once in a century, I think, and it might even be more significant," said Paul Collins, an Australian church historian and former priest.

Collins, 69, said the abuse controversy was not mentioned by the priest in his own church near Canberra on Palm Sunday, but that the congregation discussed it afterward outside.

"People are outraged really, they're furious with the complete failure of the church's leadership and their view would be that we are led by incompetent people," Collins said.

That view was echoed by many Catholics interviewed around the world by The Associated Press in recent days, although the pope also had defenders.

One of them was John Ryan, a retired glue factory worker, who said he was impressed by the letter Benedict wrote to the Irish faithful earlier this month in which he chastised Irish bishops.

"I was talking to my parish priest last weekend, and we were reading the pope's letter, and he told me: This pope is the most intelligent pope we've had in the last thousand years," said Ryan, 66, after a Mass in Dublin. "I couldn't disagree with that. I don't really think we could do better than with Benedict. I know they're supposed to be infallible, but I'd say most Catholics today would accept that nobody's perfect — not even the pope."

But across the Atlantic, Jasmine Co said her faith in the church was badly shaken.

The 56-year-old nurse, who recently moved to the U.S. from the Philippines, said she has stopped confessing her sins to priests, and is turning to God directly.

"I don't believe in confession to the priest because I don't know if that priest is more of a sinner than I am," Co said after attending a Palm Sunday service in central Philadelphia.

On Sunday in London, about 50 protesters staged a demonstration calling on the pope to resign — something that hasn't happened in 700 years.

The criticism is also coming from pulpits. Udo Fischer, an Austrian priest known for his liberal views, avoids mentioning Benedict and other church leaders by name during his Masses — at least until he sees stronger signals of remorse from the Holy See.

"We always stress that this is the church of Jesus Christ — that of the Lord Jesus and not that of the Lord Pope," Fischer said after a Palm Sunday service in his parish in Paudorf, a village near Vienna.

Parishioners young and old squeezed into pews in Fischer's modern and airy church clutching bunches of pussy willows blessed by the priest.

Traditionally Catholic Austria, shaken by clergy abuse claims in past years and again in recent weeks, risks a drop in already dwindling support for the church if no concrete action is taken to prevent further abuse and cover-ups, says Regina Polak of the University of Vienna's Institute for Practical Theology.

"The situation is very fragile right now," Polak said. "The potential for frustration is high."

In the pope's native Germany, the Roman Catholic diocese in the western city of Trier said Monday that 20 of its current and former priests had been accused "in recent weeks" of sexual abuse.

The allegations involved incidents from the 1950s to 1990, AFP reported. Ten of the accused priests have since died and another two have retired.

The BBC reported that the church was launching a hotline for German abuse victims.

In Spain, a heavily Catholic country where secular lifestyles are eroding church attendance, a coalition of more than 100 liberal-minded lay and clergy-based groups called the Vatican's handling of the scandal "irresponsible and insufficient," saying it failed to "put itself firmly on the side of the victims."

In Norway, Oslo's Bishop Bernt Eidsvig told Catholics in a letter last week that "the culture of silence that certain bishops advised is a betrayal."

Perhaps most ominous is the threat to the pope's own authority.

David Gibson, author of "The Rule of Benedict," a biography of the pope, said the criticism focusing on Benedict puts the "the mystique of the papal office" in peril.

"And above all, it diminishes his credibility, his ability to convince people of his message, to have people listen to him. It distances many Catholics, I think, even further from the institutional hierarchical church," said Gibson.

Even as Easter Week began, anxiety was heard in many places, with people struggling to draw a line between the crimes of some priests and their own deep attachment to communities and the beliefs that sustain them.

"At this point in my life I wouldn't leave the church for somebody else's sins," said Linda Faust, 56, after a Mass in Greendale, Wisconsin — the state where the late Rev. Lawrence Murphy was accused of molesting some 200 boys at a school for the deaf. Benedict, at the time Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, is linked to a decision in the 1990s not to defrock Murphy.

Instead, Faust said that she and her husband pray for the child victims, the abusive priests and the archbishops who let them transfer to other parishes.

A key focus for those seeking church reform is celibacy — a tradition dating to Christianity's early days but only made mandatory in the 11th century. Both Collins in Australia and Bishop Geoffrey Siundu, a former Catholic priest in Kenya, said the rule should go.

Siundu now heads the Ecumenical Catholic Church of Christ in Kenya, said the celibacy rule has driven 30 other ex-priests to join his church.

Retired Italian Cardinal Carlo Maria Martini also believes mandatory chastity for churchmen should be thought over to help the church regain lost trust.

Martini, the former archbishop of Milan, told Austria's Die Presse newspaper that only through an open discussion can the church regain its credibility.

Kathrin Radelmayer, 24, attended Mass in Munich, where Ratzinger's handling of a case when he was archbishop there has been questioned. She said she was sticking with the church even though many of her friends and relatives are distancing themselves now.

"It is such a shock for the church, but the church has withstood a lot in its 2,000 years and I think that it will survive this as well," Radelmayer said.

Marina Buendia, a 22-year-old nurse from Madrid, went to St. Peter's Square in Rome for the Pope's Palm Sunday Mass. She defended the church.

"The news of these cases has come to the Vatican far too late for the Vatican to be held responsible," she said. "I think that the Vatican has accepted the problem, which is a step in the right direction. We are both very religious and feel a very strong personal bond with the pope, which would never be affected by such scandals. As young Catholics, we feel welcome and included by the church."

At a similar Mass in Minneapolis, Teresa Schweitzer, a 45-year-old English teacher, said the handling of abuse cases compounds her disenchantment over other matters, including women denied leadership roles. But she drew comfort from the many Catholic priests and activists she has seen helping the poor and pursuing social justice.

"I've had a lot of disappointments over the years, and I'm hanging by a thread," Schweitzer said. "I keep coming back for the community — the way we support each other in so many ways. Do you give up on that? Or do you stay in it and fight for justice? I think that's where a lot of us are at now."

(The Associated Press, NBC News' Andy Eckardt and msnbc.com staff contributed to this report.)

"Abuse Victims to Vatican: 'Stop Attacking Us!'" by Carrie Antlfinger, AP

Mar. 30, 2010, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/36094589/ns/us_news-life/t/abuse-victims-vatican-stop-attacking-us/)

(Deaf men allegedly molested by Wis. priest criticize pope's defensive stance.)

(MILWAUKEE) A man who says he was among some 200 deaf boys allegedly molested by a priest in Wisconsin said Monday the Vatican's defensive responses to revelations about the case make him feel like he did when he was 12, when no one would listen to him about the abuse.

Arthur Budzinski, 61, said at a news conference outside the Cathedral of St. John the Evangelist that Pope Benedict XVI was trying to protect himself against criticism of his handling of the Wisconsin case against the Rev. Lawrence Murphy. Murphy was accused of molesting some 200 boys at the St. John's School for the Deaf outside Milwaukee from 1950-1975. He never was defrocked.

"It's 2010. I'm not trying to hurt the pope," Budzinski said. "The pope should do something. I'm just telling my story. That's all I'm doing," said his 26-year-old daughter Gigi Budzinski, who interpreted his sign language.

Top Roman Catholic officials are rubbing salt "into the already deep wounds of those who have been victimized and disillusioned by the Catholic church" by criticizing those speaking out about the Vatican, said Mary Guentner, a spokeswoman for the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests.

Guentner, who says she was abused by a nun in a different school, said victims should be praised, thanked and welcomed but instead have been vilified, mischaracterized and insulted for speaking out.

"It's ludicrous to claim that these hundreds of once-trusting, devout Catholics are somehow conspiring to hurt the world's most powerful religious figure," she said.

Recently released documents showed a Vatican office led by the pope, then Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, halted a church trial against Murphy. Ratzinger's deputy, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, shut the process down after Murphy wrote Ratzinger a letter saying he had repented, was old and ailing, and that the case's statute of limitations had run out. Bertone now serves as the Vatican's secretary of state.

The Vatican has said the case only reached the Vatican in 1996, that Murphy died two years later, and that there was nothing in the church's handling of the matter that precluded any civil action from being taken against him.

Benedict made no direct mention of the scandal in his Palm Sunday homily, but said Jesus Christ guides the faithful "toward the courage that doesn't let us be intimidated by the chatting of dominant opinions, toward patience that supports others."

The Vatican newspaper recently said there was a "clear and despicable intention" to strike at Benedict "at any cost."

Several victims held signs at the Monday news conference that read "Stop attacking us!" and "I'm not despicable."

Guentner said when the church attacks victims' motives, it intimidates other victims and witnesses whose information might protect other children.

She said she wants Milwaukee Archbishop Jerome Listecky to "ask the pope to be transparent, to disclose any involvement in any sexual abuse cases and to stop insulting victims," she said.

She also responded to comments made Sunday by former Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy Dolan, who is currently the New York Archbishop. He said the pope was suffering some of the same unjust accusations once faced by Jesus.

"(It) seems a little extreme to me," she said. "I think that seems a little extreme to all of us. We are now feeling persecuted from the response of the Vatican."

Copyright 2010 The Associated Press

20100330-02 08:46 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 2

And...they survive (richly, I might add) in a manner lower than leeches...by feeding off the guilt and, therefore pain, that they induce in, really, all of us in the Western world, Catholic or not. That guilt has become part of our twisted culture! Maybe Ayn Rand was right after all? haha

20100330-03 09:20 Lianne Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 2

Dear SteveB,

They should take a lesson from Tiger Woods PR firm and have an apology session over the media. A mea culpa celebrity blitz.

Been reading and attending lectures on Buddhism, check out: <http://www.lamamarut.org>.

They do not even understand what guilt is, just not part of their social indoctrination.

I am going to Italy at the end of April, and I know this may sound crazy but I am boycotting the Vatican during my time in Rome!

20100330-04 09:30 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 2

Dear Lianne,

Not crazy at all. I would do the same thing. Better diet first, because there's food, food, food (muy deliciosa!) You're gonna love it there!

Ya, I'm much more of a Buddhist than a Christian, Muslim, or Hindu, all of which feel they have to worship and adulate somebody, as if God were insane with narcissism and jealousy, which seems unlikely to me. But I have a lot of trouble with reincarnation (though I'm hopeful) and asceticism (God, please continue to give me those pleasures of the flesh!).

20100330-05 12:19 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 3

But I would be remiss if I did not add that I have a profound sense of appreciation, of thankfulness, for this incredible gift of life which I have somehow been given. It is surely the greatest of gifts. I have never understood how we could ask for more, for heaven, or reincarnation, or whatever.

I think I can safely say that, at least in my lifetime, we will never understand to what or to whom it is we express this thankfulness.

Let us call whatever or whomever it is (that we can properly express this gratitude to) God, and leave it at that. There! That's all of religion. That's the Church of Steve. If we are lucky, within us, thankfulness teaches us love.

We try to understand God not because we can, but because we must. We are driven by our very nature. I believe it is when we try to pin God down to something more precise than this that we are doomed to error and to harm. We must admit, at least to ourselves, that we cannot know more than this. The rest is pure, sweet hope.

20100330-06 12:32 Ben Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3

Dear SteveB,

Yeah, that's about where I get off on this, but my own religion may be a bit more karmic than yours. Although Susette and I attend a church regularly (St David's Episcopal, downtown) and really enjoy the service, and the intelligence and wit of some of the clerical staff (in particular Ron Smith, who is the Ron Smith Religion chair at UT, for his modern and humanistic biblical transliterations, since he reads Aramaic and classical Greek), our chief appreciation is in community participation (we're head of the Greeters, I am an usher, and we both volunteer in the commercial kitchen operated by the church) and in the very fine music. There is something ascendant in singing hymns along with a couple hundred other enthusiastic souls, mostly on-pitch, and a very well-played pipe organ of quality, and participation in a ritual well over a thousand years old. I enjoy it, despite knowledge that the ritual and traditions were designed for political purposes to delude former pagans, in a pursuit of power and control. Knowing this doesn't diminish the feeling of community. Perhaps it even enhances it. Eyes wide open, and all that. That same Ron Smith I mentioned was speaking one Sunday of the Resurrection, going over the fine points of the meaning in original Greek and how it differs from the English translations; frustrated perhaps by some blank looks, and departing from his normally quiet near-monotone, he bellowed "Come on, people! It's a MYTH!" I felt much better about my membership after that. Still, I am certain that the Jesus about which this very same church has taught me would have disapproved mightily of much that the Catholic church from which mine is sprung, has done, if not most of it. I don't think he'd want to be associated with what it's become.

My two cents.

20100330-07 12:38 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3

Dear Ben,

Well put, dude! I'm not sure about the "more karmic" part...

Myself, I don't participate in golf or organized religion for the same reasons. :-)

20100330-08 22:37 Jim Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3

Dear SteveB,

I see a -3. did I miss 1 and 2?

20100331-01 06:52 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3

Dear Jim,

Well...1 & 2 are really rants against the Catholic Church and their continuing abuse of children (and others) and covering it up. I thought maybe you might be offended, so...

20100331-02 11:15 Jim Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3

Dear SteveB,

Not easily offended (or catholic) but that's okay. I appreciate your sensitivity

I have some classmates from high school who are so vitriolic in their hatred for Obama and other Democrats and send me all sorts of things that just a little checking would show are entirely untrue. There are folks out there who are reworking scurrilous stories that have been used since FDR's day and claiming them to be true of politicians today, etc. and "friends" who pass them on as gospel. when I called one of them on the falsehoods he wrote back that the particular charges might not be true but that was the kind of people they were and they were certainly capable of doing those things so he was going to keep passing the attacks on.

I just delete some of his without even opening them.

Yesterday morning started out 28 degrees but warmed to 58. Today it is supposed to get up into the 70s. How hot is Santa Cruz?

20100331-03 12:51 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 3

Dear Jim,

I know exactly what you mean about the political stuff.

Right now it's 31 C. and sunny. It can get hot and humid, but the weather is not as bad as Florida in summer or winter. And here, there are incredible flowering trees in bloom all year round. Excellent fruits and vegetables all year round too, for very little money!

20100401-01 08:16 SteveB How Elections Work in Bolivia

This Sunday (yes, even though it is Easter), Bolivia will hold what would be the equivalent of "mid-term" elections in the U.S. There will be voting for mayors, governors, and all the elected local officials. To me, it is very interesting how different elections are here from the U.S. and how much the U.S. might learn from other countries if we just weren't so arrogant.

1. It is the law that every citizen eligible MUST vote or face a fine. Even as an immigrant (I'm on a 1-year visa now), when you have a 2-year visa (my next step) you must vote or face a fine.
2. No advertising is allowed on TV, radio, or in publications. This really reduces the amount of money required to run. I think there are other limits on how campaign funds are collected, etc., but I don't know much about these, and I'm sure there is some corruption and room for improvement here, but it is on a small scale compared to the U.S.
3. Instead, volunteers put up posters. The newspapers interview all the candidates and provide a lot of good information. Rallies are held all over where the candidates speak and they have a lot of fireworks, music, and dancing. These are big fiestas really. Last night was the last opportunity for campaigning and rallies. A huge rally/party was held near my condo here in Santa Cruz. Now it is a quiet time for reflection and discussion before Sunday's vote.
4. On Sunday, while the polls are open, not only is alcohol not sold (I think it is not even sold on Saturday), virtually everything closes! Restaurants, stores, etc. There are not even many taxis running.
5. The votes are on paper, with fingerprints. Verifiable. Absolutely re-countable. What do you think, Florida?

Not bad for a backward little country, huh?

20100401-02 09:55 GaryF Re: How Elections Work in Bolivia

Dear SteveB,

Interesting, if there is No advertising, how do the people know what the candidate stands for? I know that in several countries in which I've spent considerable time, voting is virtually always along party lines and a 1 vote majority or a coalition gets to run the whole show, this can really make the pendulum swing from right to left dramatically . Although I think the U.S. system is seriously flawed, I don't think a ban on TV/Radio/Print advertising is the answer, especially with a country the size of the U.S., but rather a time limit on campaigning (impossible with free speech as who gets to decide what is campaigning) and financial restraints. I do like the Spanish system where the voting takes place on Saturday and Sunday, so everyone has a chance to get to the poles. Don't be drinking too much of that tea down there.

20100401-03 10:44 Ben "Burning Salt Water"

Dear Allan,

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=e8utkoK2DhA>

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9B8srudAUhE>

This is not what the news represents it to be, but it does have some significance. (See Wikipedia article on John Kanzius): http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/John_Kanzius.

The technology he devised of which this is an offshoot, however, is VERY significant:

<http://www.goerie.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20100114/NEWS02/301149924/-1/ETN>

It's sad, though, that the news article in the movie below could have so misrepresented what it's trying to explain. Worthless hype written by glib idiots.

(I imagine you probably already know all about this.)

20100401-04 12:30 Allan Re: "Burning Salt Water"

Dear Ben,

Yes, I saw the original TV video of his burning saltwater back in 2007. Through the so-called "cold-fusion" debacle a decade earlier I was a house guest with the Jarvik's in Pittsburgh, and I saw Kanzius's experiment also from their house. So if there is ever a real alternative energy breakthrough, it will have to wait until my next visit to Pittsburgh it seems.

I did not know about his radio frequency cancer treatments though.

I was quite excited at the time and I did try to follow up with this, because conversion of water, any water but particularly salt water, to O and H by any process, and then back to pure water by burning it, would be a good desalination process. If the process required RF, which could come from a solar generated transmitter, then it would suit hot deserts alongside seas and oceans as a water source. But there was no further information, and your story shows that it was because patents are still pending. My belief is that it has an exciting future for all sorts of reasons. Only one would be the generation of hydrogen for hydrogen cars, instead of relying on electricity which would have to come from nuclear generators to make enough.

Happy Easter all, a big holiday here, 4 to 5 days for everyone, second only to Christmas for Australians. Even me.

20100401-05 15:05 SteveB Re: How Elections Work in Bolivia

Dear GaryF,

See #4. Do you really think the $billions spent on advertising really tells you anything about the candidates? I don't. It doesn't even try. Not that of the candidates themselves and certainly not that of their oppositions' negative ads. People in the U.S. learn about the candidates the same way they do here...through their actions, though the news, and by hearing them and talking to people. Size of country has little or nothing to do with it. All the advertising does is allow big money to buy the candidates!

The tea, etc. don't really appeal to me.

20100403-01 07:08 SteveB Re: "Burning Salt Water"

Dear Allan and Ben,

But, of course, if an invention is real and works, it is very well protected by patent applications alone. Patents do not necessarily have to be issued for there to be the protection. I know because I have several patents myself. Also, if you look at packages in the hardware store or elsewhere, you will see many that are "patent pending" (and protected well enough to be there on the shelves). The head-start of a good patent application is exceedingly difficult to overcome. So if there is secrecy here, I don't see how it could have anything to do with patent applications. It could have more to do with snagging investors...kinda like the old "cold fusion" scheme, huh?

And we are not talking about a source of energy here...unfortunately. Even the inventor admits that the process requires more energy than it can output. But for desalinization...maybe very cool... The hydrogen could be used to generate additional electricity for the RF generators so that maybe the process would require less juice than the electrolysis method. But modern desalinization techniques bypass the whole energy-hogging electrolysis method in favor of big pumps (necessary for any method) and filters, so this RF technique might still be nada.

And hydrogen as a fuel? Maybe for industrial use only. I have witnessed first-hand a hydrogen explosion and its devastating results at a factory in Massachusetts. These were experts handling the stuff, and the delivery truck and storage tank did not explode. If they had, I would not be here now to tell the story...the entire factory would have become a large crater in an instant. I don't think we ever want your average idiot handling this stuff.

And so the hunt for the holy grail of energy and water continues, though I still say that many places could just tap into the water rivers needlessly dump into the ocean. Again, about all you need are big pumps and a ditch or pipeline.

20100404-01 07:11 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 4: "Vatican Priest Likens Criticism of Church on Abuse to Anti-Semitism"

After 4,400 priests in the U.S. alone have admitted or been proven to have been sex abusers of children, and the Church has been forced to pay over $2 billion in restitution (much of it from poor parishioners), and now, recently, we have learned that this and the cover-up (or blessing?) has been going on all over the world (for how long? 1800 years or so?)...after all of this and all the children who have been harmed...this is their attitude? One priest's opinion alone, indeed! More stupidity and evil lies!

HAPPY EASTER!

"Vatican Priest Likens Criticism of Church on Abuse to Anti-Semitism" by Michael E. Ruane and William Wan, Washington Post

Apr. 3, 2010, (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/04/02/AR2010040204391.html?nav=emailpage>)

On the most solemn day in the Roman Catholic calendar, a senior Vatican priest ignited a fresh chapter Friday in the debate over the priest abuse scandal by comparing criticism of the Church and Pope Benedict XVI to the historic persecution and "collective violence" against Jews.

In a Good Friday sermon in St. Peter's Basilica attended by the pope, the Rev. Raniero Cantalamessa said a Jewish friend had written to him, saying the recent accusations about the Church reminded him of the "more shameful aspects of anti-Semitism."

Jews know "from experience what it means to be victims of collective violence," the priest said, and "because of this, they are quick to recognize the recurring symptoms."

The statement stung Jewish groups — with one spokesman calling it "repulsive" — and prompted calls for the priest to retract it and for the pope to address it.

The statement also angered victims groups, which expressed outrage that the Church, some of whose priests preyed on generations of Catholic children, was portraying itself as a victim.

"The pope is not the victim here, nor is the Church hierarchy," said David Clohessy, who is an advocate for victims and who experienced alleged abuses by a priest as a boy. "The victims are the boys and girls being sexually assaulted by priests, nuns, seminarians."

He said, "When they play the victim, when they rally around those who were predators or try to cover up for them, it just intimidates those who were abused from speaking up."

The Vatican quickly said Cantalamessa, a member of the Capuchin Order whose title is preacher of the Pontifical Household, was speaking only for himself.

As Cantalamessa delivered his homily in Vatican City, the weary-looking, white-haired pope, 82, sat near the basilica's main altar. Good Friday is the day on which Catholics mark the suffering and crucifixion of Jesus. Easter follows on Sunday.

The homily came amid revelations of alleged abuse of children by priests across Europe and in the United States, and the accusation that Benedict, before he became pope, did not do enough to take action against suspect priests.

And it came amid a new CBS News poll that shows that the pope's favorable rating has fallen 13 points among American Catholics, from 40 percent in 2006 to 27 percent today. More than two in three Americans, including a majority of Catholics, say the pope has done a poor job of handling allegations of abuse by priests.

But other Catholics agree with Church officials that Benedict and the Church have been unfairly smeared.

During an evening liturgy, Cantalamessa said he had received a letter from a Jewish friend who was upset by the attacks against Benedict and the Church and expressed his "solidarity" and "sentiments of brotherhood."

Quoting from the letter with the author's permission, the priest said his friend had been following " 'with indignation the violent and concentric attacks against the Church, the pope and all the faithful of the whole world.' "

"The use of stereotypes, the passing from personal responsibility and guilt to a collective guilt remind me of the more shameful aspects of anti-Semitism," Cantalamessa said his friend wrote.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder and dean of Simon Wiesenthal Center, in Los Angeles, called the comparison "bizarre."

"The fact that he's quoting [a] letter from a Jewish person doesn't excuse the ignorance," he said. "These priests were perpetrators. They abused their calling, betrayed their faith. And then were protected by the hierarchy. To say that is like the persecution of the Jews is a distortion of history and shameful."

"It's Good Friday," he added. The priest "knows his remarks are going all over the world. And that's the message you want to give? Ridiculous. Not only should the priest retract it, but the pope should address it . . . to say nothing condones it."

The Rev. James Massa, chief officer for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops on interreligious matters, said he worried how the comparison will affect the Church's relationship with the Jewish community. He noted the great progress made in recent decades in understanding between leaders of the two faiths.

"I hope that what was said will be understood as the comments of one particular priest, albeit a prominent one, and doesn't reflect opinions of the pope or the Catholic Church," Massa said. "I think the comparison is not only unfortunate, but inappropriate [and] . . . has no place in a Good Friday sermon."

The Rev. Federico Lombardi, a Vatican spokesman, said the priest was speaking for himself.

"There is no position of the Vatican to do a parallel between the critiques of the Church and the anti-Semitism," he said in a phone interview. "I stress that the intention of the priest was to give witness of solidarity of the Jewish friend who referred to his experience and suffering of his people. . . . The Vatican is not comparing critics with anti-Semitism."

But others in the Catholic community said they have been struck by the Church's response to recent abuse allegations.

"If they hired someone to draw up the worst possible PR plan for the Church, they could not do any worse than these guys are doing right now," said the Rev. Thomas Reese, senior fellow at the Woodstock Theological Center at Georgetown University.

"It's disastrous," he said. "They really need to get someone from the U.S. bishops conference who has been through this before to get over there and help guide the coverage. I mean, to invoke the persecution of the Jews? They are making every mistake in the book."

20100404-02	08:44	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 5
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------------------

Our lives begin to end the day we become silent about things that matter. — Martin Luther King, Jr.

The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control... — Galatians 5:22-23

20100404-03	08:56	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 6: "Cardinal Condemns 'Gossip' at Easter Mass"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

I don't know about you, but for me it's just all too much! "Petty gossip" indeed!!!!

"Cardinal Condemns 'Gossip' at Easter Mass" by MSNBC

Apr. 4, 2010, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/36166058/ns/world_news-europe/t/cardinal-condemns-gossip-easter-mass/)

(Pontiff maintains his silence on mounting sex abuse scandal during address.)

(VATICAN CITY) A senior cardinal defended Pope Benedict XVI from "petty gossip" on Sunday as the pontiff maintained his silence on mounting sex abuse cover-up accusations during his Easter message.

The ringing tribute by Cardinal Angelo Sodano, dean of the College of Cardinals, at the start of Mass attended by tens of thousands of faithful in St. Peter's Square, marked an unusual departure from the Vatican's Easter rituals.

"Holy Father, the people of God are with you and will not let themselves be influenced by the petty gossip of the moment, by the trials that sometimes assail the community of believers," Sodano said.

The change of protocol underscored just how much the Vatican is feeling the pressure from the growing sex-abuse scandal and possible cover-up that have inched closer to the pope himself.

Dressed in gold robes and shielded from a cool drizzle by a canopy, Benedict looked weary as he listened to Sodano's speech at the start of Mass in the cobblestone square bedecked with daffodils, tulips and azaleas.

Sodano, a former secretary of state, praised Benedict as the "solid rock" that holds up the Church.

"The Church is with you!" Sodano told the pope to the cheers of thousands of people holding umbrellas in St Peter's Square.

His speech of solidarity listed those who support the pope, particularly "the 400,000 priests who generously serve" in schools, hospitals and missions around the world. This was a clear attempt to underscore the Vatican's position that only a tiny minority of priests have abused children.

Later, the pope did not mention the scandal in his twice-yearly "Urbi et Orbi" (to the city and the world) address, which touched on a series of world problems.

'Trials and sufferings'

Benedict singled out the "trials and sufferings" of Christians in Iraq and Pakistan, noting that these believers have risked persecution and death for their faith. He urged hope for the people of Haiti and Chile, devastated by earthquakes. He said Easter could "signal the victory of peaceful coexistence and respect" in crime-ravaged areas of Latin American countries plagued by drug trafficking and said he would pray for peace in the Middle East.

But, despite repeated appeals by victims of clerical sexual abuse that he take responsibility for his role in the handling of pedophile priests, he stayed silent on that issue. The victims contend there were decades of systematic cover-up by bishops in many countries, including the United States, Ireland and Benedict's native Germany.

They want him to demand the resignations of bishops complicit in any conspiracy to shield pedophile priests by shuffling them from parish to parish instead of kicking them out of the priesthood.

The accusations against the pope stem from his leadership as archbishop of Munich before he came to the Vatican three decades ago, as well as his long tenure in Rome of the Holy See's office dealing with a growing pile of dossiers about pedophile priests.

Victims group angry

"Victims are seeking consolation and healing and should not be insulted and told that our speaking out is petty gossip," said Barbara Blaine, a leader of the U.S.-based Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests (SNAP).

"The pope has said the truth should be exposed. They can't have it both ways," she told Reuters.

The celebrations leading up to Easter have been clouded by accusations the Church in several countries mishandled and covered up abuse of children by priests, sometimes for decades.

Shaken by the crisis, the Vatican has several times accused the media of trying to smear the pope. Some reports have accused him of negligence in handling abuse cases in previous roles as a cardinal in his native Germany, and in Rome.

Sunday's edition of the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano denounced the accusations against the pope as a "vile defamation operation."

Benedict hasn't made any explicit reference to the scandal since he released a letter to the Irish faithful concerning the abuse crisis in that country on March 20.

The Vatican has denied any cover-up over the abuse of 200 deaf boys in the United States by Reverend Lawrence Murphy from 1950 to 1974. The New York Times reported the Vatican and Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, now Pope Benedict, were warned about Murphy, but the priest was not defrocked.

On Saturday, the Vatican's newspaper kept up its campaign against the media for reports on alleged cover-ups of sexual abuse of children by priests, saying the pope had become the target of a "despicable campaign of defamation".

Apologies

On Sunday, the pope's personal preacher apologized to Jews after he compared attacks on the Church to "collective violence" against Jews throughout history.

"If — and it was not my intention to do so — I hurt the sensitivities of Jews and victims of pedophilia, I am truly sorry and I ask for forgiveness," Father Raniero Cantalamessa said in an interview with Italy's Corriere della Sera newspaper.

He also said the pope was not aware of his remarks and that the pontiff heard them for the first time along with everyone else in St. Peter's Basilica on Good Friday.

Jewish groups around the world had reacted with shock.

Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni, said the remarks were particularly insensitive because they were made on the day that for centuries Christians prayed for the conversion of the Jews, who were once held collectively responsible for Jesus' death.

A Vatican spokesman later said the comparison "is absolutely not the line of the Vatican and of the Catholic Church".

(Reuters and The Associated Press contributed to this report.)

20100404-04 09:52 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 7

Excuse me all to hell and back (as we say in Indiana) but, instead of continuing the cover-up, shouldn't these (what is the kindest words I can use?) liars, criminals, and hypocrites be begging the world and God for forgiveness, and (possibly) admitting that celibacy is their own invention (not that of Jesus or God) and just might be part of the problem (or, at the very least, provides a convenient excuse for the problem)????

Now, I'm off to Easter Mass to see if I can convince Someone to intervene (though I'm sorry to say that I don't really believe that will happen, but what the hey?).

20100405-01 09:11 Charis Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 7

Dear SteveB,

Here in Tarija Bolivia there is a complex underground tunnel system under the city. Tunnels have been found that apparently Catholic priests used to get to the convent several blocks away a couple hundred years ago. In the tunnel there are catacombs and skeletons of dead aborted babies. It is believed they are the priests' and nuns' babies. I don't actually believe Catholic priests even are celibate any more.

20100405-02 13:17 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 7

Dear Charis,

I believe it!

True story. Years ago I was having something at a restaurant just up Sucre from the plaza. One block and on the corner, the way I remember it, but I don't know if it's still there.

For some reason, some Gringo guy thought I looked like a Gringo too and struck up a conversation. :-) You know, the usual, where are you from, what are you doing in Bolivia? It seems he was here to have sex with young girls. I tried to slip away, but he kept talking, so my opportunity was a little delayed.

But what he told me was that there was a priest you could find hanging out in Arenal Park who was essentially a pimp for young girls. I didn't really believe him at the time, but now I think I do.

Divine guidance? Seems to be missing. My guess is that it was missing when they rewrote the life and words of Jesus too!

20100406-01 22:00 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 8: "Vatican Says Pope Target of 'Hate' Campaign"

Methinks the Church in need of a little Divine Guidance. They seem to have lost their way...very badly...a very long time ago...and the result is so very, very tragic...

The immediate problem stems from the fact that there are not just "allegations" of abuse cover-up. There is more than ample proof and admission of abuse cover-up. There is more than ample proof of a massive pattern of abuse and cover-up—nearly world-wide. Perhaps if these were simply allegations, one might be able to legitimately call them some kind of "hate campaign". But surely, to point to proven and admitted sin and demand change is no more than the Church as done during its entire existence. I know of no one who has ever labeled that a "hate campaign", but if that is what this is, then that is what it has always been.

"Vatican Says Pope Target of 'Hate' Campaign" by Francis D'Emilio, AP

Apr. 6, 2010, (http://www.cleveland.com/world/index.ssf/2010/04/vatican_blasts_anti-catholic_h.html)

(Blames allegations of abuse cover-up on groups with anti-Catholic agenda.)

(VATICAN CITY) The Vatican heatedly defended Pope Benedict XVI on Tuesday, claiming accusations that he helped cover up the actions of pedophile priests are part of an anti-Catholic "hate" campaign targeting the pope for his opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage.

Vatican Radio broadcast comments by two senior cardinals explaining "the motive for these attacks" on the pope and the Vatican newspaper chipped in with spirited comments from another top cardinal.

"The pope defends life and the family, based on marriage between a man and a woman, in a world in which powerful lobbies would like to impose a completely different" agenda, Spanish Cardinal Julian Herranz, head of the disciplinary commission for Holy See officials, said on the radio.

Herranz didn't identify the lobbies but "defense of life" is Vatican shorthand for anti-abortion efforts.

Also arguing that Benedict's promotion of conservative family models had provoked the so-called attacks was the Vatican's dean of the College of Cardinals, Angelo Sodano.

"By now, it's a cultural contrast," Sodano told the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano. "The pope embodies moral truths that aren't accepted, and so, the shortcomings and errors of priests are used as weapons against the church."

Italian Cardinal Giovanni Lajolo, who heads the Vatican City State's governing apparatus, also defended Benedict.

The pope "has done all that he could have" against sex abuse by clergy of minors, Lajolo said on Vatican radio, decrying what he described as a campaign of "hatred against the Catholic church."

Swept by scandal

Sex abuse allegations, as well as accusations of cover-ups by diocesan bishops and Vatican officials, have swept across Europe in recent weeks.

Benedict has been criticized for not halting the actions of abusive priests when he was a Vatican cardinal and earlier while he was the archbishop of Munich in his native Germany.

The mainland European scandals — in Germany, Italy, Austria, Denmark and Switzerland — are erupting after decades of abuse cases in the United States, Canada, Australia, Ireland and other areas.

In Germany, nearly 2,700 people called the church's sexual abuse hotline in the first three days it was operating, a Catholic church spokesman said Tuesday. A team of psychologists and other experts have spoken with 394 people so far, ranging from several minutes up to an hour, Trier Diocese spokesman Stephan Kronenburg said.

"Most callers reported cases of sexual abuse," he told The Associated Press.

Benedict has ignored victims' demands that he accept responsibility for what they say is his own personal and institutional responsibility for failing to swiftly kick abusive priests out of the priesthood, or at least keep them away from children.

But he has been protected by a vanguard of senior Vatican prelates who are fending off what they contend is an orchestrated attempt to attack the leader of the world's more than 1 billion Catholics.

'Strong pope'

The Vatican No. 2 official, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, rebuffed questions about the pontiff's silence on the topic, indicating that Benedict was standing firm.

"He's a strong pope," he told reporters after arriving Tuesday in Chile. The Italian news agency ANSA quoted him as calling Benedict a "great prophet of the Third Millennium."

Bertone, now the Holy See's secretary of state but formerly Benedict's deputy when the future pope, then-called Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, headed the Vatican's morals office, has himself been swept up in the scandals.

During a May 1998 meeting at the Vatican, Bertone told Wisconsin bishops to halt a church trial against an ailing priest who was accused of sexually abusing 200 deaf children, according to a Vatican transcript. The priest died soon afterward.

"It's not true, it's not true! We have documented the opposite," ANSA quoted Bertone as saying in Chile. "Let's not talk about this topic now, because otherwise we'll be here all day verifying precisely the action taken by me and by his eminence."

On Easter, the most important day in the Catholic faith, the Vatican broke with tradition and began its service in St. Peter's Square with a ringing defense of Benedict delivered by Cardinal Sodano.

The Vatican newspaper quoted Sodano on Tuesday as saying the church is "certainly" suffering because of pedophile priests but he asserted that "Benedict XVI has apologized several times."

"But it's not Christ's fault if Judas betrayed" him, Sodano said. "It's not a bishop's fault if one of his priests is stained by grave wrongdoing. And certainly the pontiff is not responsible."

"Behind the unjust attacks on the pope are visions of the family and of life that run contrary to the Gospel," Sodano said. "Now the accusation of pedophile is being brandished against the church."

He noted that past popes have also been criticized, including the "offensive against Pius XII for his conduct during the last World War as well as that against Paul VI" for his encyclical against birth control, the cardinal said.

'Anti-Catholic hatred'

Pius has been accused by Jewish groups and some scholars as not having done enough to save Jews from the Holocaust, although the Vatican contends he used behind-the-scenes diplomacy to help them. Benedict has hailed Pius as a "great" pontiff, who is being considered for possible beatification.

Vatican Radio, presenting listeners with some of the most vehement counterattacks yet, depicted the church as a victim.

"There are those who fear the media campaign of anti-Catholic hatred can degenerate," Vatican Radio said.

It noted anti-Catholic graffiti on walls of a church outside Viterbo, a town near Rome, and reminded listeners that a bishop was attacked by a man during Easter Mass in Muenster, Germany. The bishop fought back with an incense bowl.

The radio likened the recent campaign to the persecution suffered by early Christian martyrs. "The crowds, incited by the slanders of the powerful, would lynch the Christians," the radio said.

In Munich, meanwhile, an independent lawyer hired by the Catholic church wrapped up his investigation of abuse allegations at the southern Ettal monastery.

"The investigation clearly shows a system of abuse that lasted for decades," Thomas Pfister told The Associated Press.

There were some cases of sexual abuse at Ettal but most victims who came forward were physically abused and most cases took place before 1990, Pfister said in a telephone interview.

The lawyer declined to elaborate as his final report will be published next week.

20100406-02 23:24 Larry Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 8

Dear SteveB,

I had a bad accident in 1966 and I was taken to a Catholic Hospital with a serious concussion. Part of this I don't remember to this day. Anyway, when Sandy came to visit me she brought my bible. I noticed that the nuns stared at it a lot. (Protestant edition, of course) Afterwards they fed me my first meal, and it was somewhere left of awful. I just wouldn't eat it after bite or two and I thought they acted mad. In the evening I began to read my bible and a nun/nurse turned off my lamp. I went ahead and turned the pages as though I was reading it and she told me to get my sleep. I had gone to the hospital without any opinion concerning Catholicism but by the time I got back home I just didn't feel comfortable around any of their clergy or staff. I have always had a lot of Catholic friends though. About a year after my hospitalization they accepted a huge donation of Protestant bibles donated to St. Josephs' Hospital. A week later or so they were all found at the city dump. They probably came to the dump to get some food and the books fell off the trucks accidently like. ;-)

If you get a chance write me about what it is like in the town where you living. I would enjoy it a lot.

20100407-01 09:40 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 8

Dear Larry,

Good story! Catholics, in general, don't really seem to think much of the Bible and are not encouraged to read it. Many more rosary beads and crosses are carried around than Bibles.

But, you know, I tend to think of the Bible as a very difficult and dangerous book! So, in a way, I think Catholics may be right about it not being fit for mass consumption, even though I know that sounds weird. But look at the trouble people and groups get into when they take it literally, as the Evangelicals try to do. And reading it creatively is dangerous too. Look at Jim Jones or David Koresh or any number of other charlatans. Look at the millions consumed by "End of Days". The Koran has the same kinds of problems.

Yet it was essentially what became the Catholic Church which created the Bible as we know it, right? They decided what to put in and what to leave out. And I don't think we will ever know how much creativity went into the writing of the books of the Bible, so long after the death of Jesus. I have always thought that it might have been a very good idea for Jesus to have picked at least one disciple who knew how to read and write. It seems that, as a group, they really let him down. Mohammed seems to have learned a lesson from this—at least the Koran was put into writing a little before and soon after his death. I much prefer the sacred Indian texts of Hinduism (a truly weird religion in some ways) and Buddhism (the "shining light") to either the Bible or Koran.

But, then, I've always thought that it might have been a good idea for the Son of God to say something about what a huge danger overpopulation and destruction of the environment, hatred of the environment, would become in the near future of mankind. He could have helped immensely more by saying something about that than by creating food, I think. But maybe that part of his teachings was so far over the heads of His followers that it became lost. What else became lost? A lot, I think...then substituted with fantasy. But that's just me.

And are there different Protestant and Catholic Bibles? (Except that the Catholic Bible is actually more complete.) And what is the holy text of Judaism doing in there anyway? I have never thought that it fit or belonged, despite the prophesy it contains. These are two very different, distinct religions, if you ask me. Otherwise, we are all doomed for worshiping anyone except the old mean, jealous, vengeful, narcissistic God Himself. I'd much rather see some of the Gnostic texts in there myself.

20100407-02 12:48 Larry Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 8

Dear SteveB,

I don't have time to say much right now, but the Bible is always a book to question. That is no heresy.

from Larry:

If you get a chance write me about what it is like in the town where you living. I would enjoy it a lot.

Dear Larry,

Here's some stuff about Santa Cruz. This is the first chapter of an unfinished guidebook. Hope you enjoy.

Getting Around Santa Cruz de la Sierra, Bolivia
©2010, 2012 Steven W. Baker, all rights reserved

(Excerpted from: A Guide to Bolivia by Someone Who Actually Lives There.)

INTRODUCTION

"I know I'm in Santa Cruz, Bolivia, but where the heck am I and how do I get where I'm going? Was that the most beautiful woman in the world I just saw? And was that a guy on a bicycle carrying 200 brooms and mops and what else?"

I can't necessarily answer the last two very common questions, of course, but I would like to try to share some of my experience in getting from place to place here in Santa Cruz de la Sierra, where I have lived (and successfully gotten around with, mainly, little Spanish) for more than two and a half years. Getting around in other large Bolivian cities, like La Paz and Cochabamba, is exactly like Santa Cruz.

I'm not going to romanticize the place, though obviously, I like it well enough to live here, and, in fact, like living here very much indeed. But I may, at times, seem rather blunt (by Bolivian standards, at least), and I apologize for that up front. I mean to be fair but, if necessary, brutally honest. There are absolutely zero prejudices built into these observations. Haha. I'll tell you up front that one of the biggest prejudices built into this piece is the conglomeration of my ideas about how to live better in Santa Cruz and how to make it a better place to live. Much of this information is applicable to almost any other large city in developing countries where most people don't yet have automobiles (thank God!) and must rely on travel by foot, bike, or a highly developed public transportation system (necessitated by the fact that so many people aren't driving in the first place).

In many respects, I haven't found getting around not much different here in Santa Cruz than in cities like Mexico City, Castries, St. Lucia, Guangzhou, China, Jakarta, Indonesia, Fort-de-France, Martinique, San Juan, P.R., or even Lisboa, Portugal. Many cities in the world, by necessity, are much more advanced than American cities in terms of public transportation, but share with each other common problems caused by rapid development, overcrowding, aged infrastructure, and sweet people becoming plumb loco when they get behind the wheel of a vehicle.

As you read this guide, you may find yourself wondering, like so many people to whom I've told some of these stories, attempting to describe life here, why on Earth someone would choose to live in such a dirty, non-hassle-free city, where the simple act of getting from one place to another can be so potentially dangerous? That's a difficult question.

I suppose part of it is the adventure. But more importantly, you can know good and bad people wherever you live or travel. I guess it's just a matter of who you happen to know, by chance, or by fate, or whatever it is. Years ago, I came here because of one very good person, and then I met more very good people. And when you know someone in Bolivia, it's not long until you know their whole family, because families are very close here. Then, as in my case, you are treated like a member of the family, then you are one of the family, and this becomes true for more than one of the families you know. Then, one day, you find that you never want to leave for very long.

I believe that one of the main differences between much of Latin America, including Bolivia, and the U.S. is that, here, the culture encourages acceptance of whatever conditions are present, whereas the culture in the U.S. seems to me to encourage questioning and change. There are rather pervasive historical reasons for this difference. I don't see stating this observation as an expression of prejudice, but if you do, so be it.

Let me give you one little example, others are embedded elsewhere. I recently spent quite a bit of time at a hospital where the mother of a friend was dying. Two other people, the family of another patient in intensive care, had stayed all night in the hallway where a couple of old couches served as a waiting room. I first arrived early in the morning, after a very cold windy, night. The two people were clothed for winter, lying there covered with about a dozen blankets each. Two doors stood open to the cold wind outside and had remained so the entire night. Even though no one was around, even though no one was coming and going, even though there was no rule or sign about leaving them open, even though they were easily closed and I did so, the people did not think of closing them. Acceptance, rather than change, seems to be inherent here.

MONEY AND CHANGE (0 Stars!)

When I travel or live abroad, I'm more careful with money than I would be if I were living and working back home. I'm not sure exactly why. I guess it's a way of life left over from my college, backpacking, trekking, and sailing days. I can remember people in various harbors of the Caribbean, who were traveling from island to island or maybe even sailing around the world. Rich, right? Maybe in some cases, not all, but they were very careful with their money. They were either on fixed incomes or had a certain amount of money to travel on that they wanted to make last as long as possible, to prolong the fun. I meet many backpackers in Bolivia who are traveling around South America. They all seem to take the cheapest transportation possible (as do I), eat as inexpensively as they can (which I can't bring myself to do), and tend to stay in the cheapest hotels—alojamientos, they are called here, or hostels, and many of these places are pretty shabby, with rather primitive communal bathrooms, no televisions, phones, or air-conditioners. All these travelers want to make their money go as far as possible. Both the sailors and the trekkers love to share stories of great deals they got in this or that country. They love to recommend ways to get by cheaply. I guess I've just never completely outgrown that philosophy.

So I would like to begin with a subject that is common to all forms of transportation within the city—money.

Though the U.S. dollar is like a second national currency and is accepted everywhere, the national currency of Bolivia is the boliviano, abbreviated "bs." and divided into 100 centavos. The boliviano is also known locally as the peso. This harkens back to the days (not long ago) when the national currency was the peso, and "Boliviano" is just too long, I guess, for the marketplace. Ex-pats and foreign travelers often refer simply to "B's".

The problem is that there don't seem to be enough B's to go around. Of course, that's always the problem in any country, right? But I mean there apparently aren't enough of them available for daily commerce, especially coins. When you buy anything in Bolivia, if you attempt to pay without the correct change, the next thing that will happen is that you will be asked for change. Taxi drivers don't have change, stores don't have change, even the big supermarkets don't have the smaller change. And no one likes to give change. Having to do so often provokes an unconscious (I think) frown or even a scowl. Everyone acts like it's a total waste of their valuable time to have to find change, even if you are the only customer within fifty miles. Everyone wants to hoard whatever change they have.

The reasons given for this lack of cash include fear of being robbed (no one wants to even pretend to have any money), but I think this would only apply to bills, surely not to a few coins. There are claims that the government isn't producing enough coins smaller than 50 centavos. One hears rumors that the metal in the smaller coins (copper and nickel), especially the 20 centavo coin, is worth more than the coins themselves and can be sold in Argentina, at a 10% premium, to be melted down, but I have my doubts. I've done some weighing and some checking. My calculations seem to show that the 20 cent. coins and maybe the 10 cent. coins could indeed be worth more melted down. But then the copper and nickel need to be separated, so I'm not so sure. And what a hassle! Also, this doesn't explain the apparent shortage of other coins, or change in general. The other possibility is that, as in Argentina, people are hoarding coins because of the rumors or whatever. Maybe it's just an issue of lack of confidence. It's interesting to note that the U.S. penny and nickel are also worth more melted down, but U.S. law (actually enforced) and the hassle involved make the problem nonexistent. I think Bolivia, at least and maybe all countries, needs to make a change to plastic coins with holograms. That would solve the problem. Vending machines (what few there are in Bolivia) and parking meters (boo!) would simply have to change to accommodate the change to the new plastic change.

The lack of any customer-centered, service oriented attitude in general seems to me to be a bigger problem. I have successfully been able to acquire large amounts of coins myself at several of the banks in town. Why would it be the customer's responsibility to supply change? Maybe that's the way it's always been done here.

The supermarkets commonly short-change their customers, claiming they just don't have the coins in the registers. (So their solution is to steal their customers' money?) Strange how they never seem to round up in their calculations and give you more change than you're due—unless you complain. Fun! As I said, you can be checking out of a huge, modern, brightly lit supermarket/discount mart and they will request change from you. My response used to be, "Do I look like a bank?" Another trick they will try to use is to give you cheap candy or a small box of matches in lieu of coins, as if candy were now legal tender. I don't want that for change. It's like being forced to buy something you don't want and didn't ask for. It's one of the reasons why we have money in the first place—to get exactly what we want, not things we don't want. But for the time being, I guess you can add candy and matches to the list of official currencies in Bolivia.

I estimate that the three largest grocery chains alone steal about $1 million a year from their mainly poor customers with their rounding down "scheme" when they make change—only about $1 U.S. per customer per year, but shouldn't that money be in the pockets of the people it belongs to? It can be pretty profitable for businesses, this lack of el cambio.

Once, I was shorted a ridiculously large 80 centavos out of 15 bs. (there are 50, 20, and 10 centavo coins—the 50 is very common—a micro (small bus, pronounced "meekro") costs one boliviano and 50 centavos, so these coins are in plentiful supply. It turned-out the cashier had the exact amount required in her drawer, but didn't want to be bothered with it, or was just lazy, or had instructions, or what? For amounts greater than 10 centavos, I will call cashiers to account when I check-out, requesting (OK, occasionally having to demand) my fair change (usually to give it to the bag boy/girl), but it's really a hassle, and I feel like the only person in Bolivia willing to take a stand on the issue. If everyone simply demanded their fair change, there would cease to be a problem. But the average Bolivian is not about to make such a fuss, which is how the stores get away with the thievery in the first place. No one wants to publicly disturb the natural karmic state known in Bolivia as tranquilo (not the expected tranquilidad, which is a word I've never heard used, for some reason).

Here's another example from the other day that really irked me, though I maintained my external tranquilo. I was paying my cable TV/internet bill at a financial institution named Fondo Fassil. A large part of their business is taking payments for utility companies. In Bolivia, for some reason, the utilities cannot accept money directly for their services. I once tried to pay my gas bill at the address on the bill, which is the gas company, and found out it wasn't allowed. I had made the rather long trip for nothing and had to go elsewhere to pay my bill. So, at Fondo Fassil, I was shorted 38 centavos. As is very, very common, I was asked if I had change, then handed the insufficient change with no comment. Now, I might have been more understanding had the young lady simply said, "Gee, sir, I'm really sorry, but I don't seem to have any small coins at the moment." No, no apology, no nothing. So I politely and calmly demanded my correct change. Even though the business of this company is to accept money and make change, I was expected to be a bank. It caused quite a little problem until some manager dug into his own pocket and produced the change. If that were my business, I believe I would get to the bank so I could serve my customers. By the way, security was no issue, because the guard was standing right there with his loaded, sawed-off shotgun. I don't understand, really, why people put up with what they put up with here.

One good money solution at supermarkets, pharmacies, and restaurants, is to use a credit card for the exact amount. One, and only one, of my American credit card companies (Capital One) charges no extra fees on foreign transactions, has no annual fee, gives me cash back or airline miles, protects me (somewhat) if I buy something that turns out to be bogus and the store doesn't provide satisfaction, and gives me a little better exchange rate (6.97 bs. per dollar) than the banks (6.96). Not bad for free, huh?

The credit union near me exchanges at 7.00, and guys in the streets with big wads of cash give 7.05, but I'm wary of getting counterfeit bills that I wouldn't know from the real thing. There are also businesses called Houses of Change (casas de cambio) which exchange dollars for 7.04. The exchange rate for Bolivianos/dollars has remained constant for the past year, but has been known to fluctuate a little in the past. The numbers presented are accurate as of June, 2010.

Another money solution can be to use American dollars. Remember, dollars are one of the legal currencies of Bolivia. One local supermarket chain, which is one of the worst at stealing your small change and charging you to use their restroom, happily exchanges dollars for a very fair exchange rate of 7.02. If they skim a little off the top on the way out, you're still ahead.

I guess checks exist in Bolivia, but you just don't see them. Maybe the big stores could take them, but I never see anyone writing one. Nobody else would take them. You'll see people taking 100,000 bs., or more, out of the bank for some transaction, because they can't write a check or use some other form of payment. I'm assuming that having to withdraw large sums of cash from a bank account is the least desirable form of payment for the person doing the paying, yet it is the norm. For a fee, there is a bank-issued cheque de gerencia, which is like a registered or certified check in the U.S. and is accepted by other banks, at least.

The best money solution is to carry a range of change, lots of change (even small coins if you don't want to feel like a fish on a hook). No matter how you travel or what you buy, your endeavors will proceed more smoothly if you carry lots of change. It will help everybody, most importantly, yourself. Consider small change to be the oil that greases the wheels of basic commerce, making everything run more smoothly.

As with any large city, Santa Cruz has beggars—both downtown and in the markets. Although as a rule, I tend not to want to encourage such behavior, I know that many of these people are very deserving, perhaps handicapped, in a land where the living is not easy in such circumstances. How nice if you always have something in your pocket for some of them. You don't have to do it all, just do your part sometimes.

Street performers can be found in many, even unlikely, places in the city, and that's something that I always like to encourage. A musician or two will board a micro and play a couple of songs. There might be a Mariachi band strolling through the central plaza. At major intersections, jugglers, fire eaters, and windshield cleaners perform in the most professional and hopeful manner imaginable. All these people enrich the city and deserve our gratitude and good will. Keep a coin locked and loaded at all times!

I give to beggars only if they are clearly disabled, I feel the rest could at least attempt the very easy (in Bolivia) process of trying to sell something. I understand Peru has outlawed giving to street beggars because it has a deleterious effect on people's lives. I never give to children, but am saddened when I see them working and selling things, often late into the night. There are places where I will never give—while sitting in restaurants or sidewalk tables, or at sporting or music events—where I don't want to be bothered, I just want to enjoy whatever I'm there for, and I feel that it is rude for strangers to intrude. Maybe that's just the small town Indiana/New England/Montana mix in me, I don't know. You would think people here, who build so many walls around their houses and never can be bothered to say, "Hello," would understand the value of privacy.

Another goodwill gesture is the tip, which is a little disused in Bolivia, but is much appreciated when given. There are many eligible recipients for the good will of tips—taxi drivers, cashiers, guards, waiters and waitresses, people who might help you park or watch your car, people who take care of the public bathrooms, people who sell you something with a smile instead of the usual scowl.

And, in Bolivia, someone will try to sell you almost anything no matter where you might be. The whole intricate, small capitalist-based distribution system of common goods is part of the richness of Santa Cruz. What service! I swear that every single block has at least one pharmacy, little grocery store, fried chicken restaurant, lawyer, and hardware store. There are people selling hot dogs, fruit, candy, empanadas, ice cream, glasses of somó and fresh-squeezed orange juice, CD's, DVD's, watches, sunglasses, strange tasteless extruded puffy things, and/or souvenirs at every corner. That may be a bit of an exaggeration in some instances (though the watches—Rolex, of course—are sold everywhere by roving salesmen), but it also fails to capture the density of stores, stalls, boxes, and carts at many intersections.

Bolivia is one of the few countries in the world where intellectual property rights are openly scoffed at. Copies of CD's, DVD's, and most software can be had for about $1. Copies of movies can often be purchased even before their release. I once watched a copy of the Steven Spielberg movie, A.I., which had been filmed off of a screen at a theater, including the shadows of people coming to their seats after the movie had started. Fake Nike, Levi Strauss, Sony, Coach, and Duracell products are everywhere. (Genuine imported goods cost about the same as in the States, though if they're made in America, they're more expensive in Bolivia.) It's often difficult to find a book that is not an illegal copy. I think the same piracy must apply to generic drugs here, because they are amazingly inexpensive. While this is a deplorable state of affairs, I have to say in all honesty, as an artist, myself, that if nothing were available except original, legal goods in these categories, almost nothing would be sold, because very few people could afford them. Either way, the artists make zilch! Maybe it's better to, at least, get the products into the hands of the people. In the case of music, at least, this does help sell concert tickets. I can see some of the copying issues both ways.

"Fast food" here is so fast that it makes American fast food seem slow in comparison, with its lines and wait times. Maybe they need to coin a new name and call it something like "instantaneous food", because that's what it really is, and what people have come to expect. Instantaneous cold drinks and ice cream are especially common, because all you need to be in business is a cooler, and it can be damned hot here. You can buy from your car, taxi, micro, bus, train, front gate, your favorite bar or restaurant, while waiting in line at government offices or banks, in front of the German Cemetery, American School, Irish Pub, Jardin de Asia, and Japanese Hospital. Everywhere!

For everywhere else, there are merchants riding or walking around to find you. And in the markets, people eat and drink non-stop. The outlying areas still have horse-drawn milk carts. I have run into the previously mentioned bike-riding broom salesmen in some of the unlikeliest places, places seemingly impossible to make sales of things like brooms, like the cabaña discos down at the river where you're in the middle of nowhere, in the jungle, drinking too many beers, eating too much greasy food, and dancing way too much to feel normal the next morning...and there, just outside the little Disco—the broom guy, riding around with the inventory of a Super Wal-Mart stuck all around him, an entire array of handles piercing menacingly fore and aft. And I don't even want to think about the ubiquitous knife guy!

It's to the point now where you can buy almost anything almost anywhere—more service than you really need. The whole enterprise makes me think of what the U.S. would be like if Wal-Mart (and all the others) were permitted to not only advertise anywhere they want, but to sell anything anywhere they want. It's pure, unrestrained laissez faire capitalism...in a country with a nominally "communist" government, much like the Chinese, who live the same paradox.

Here's what a friend who grew-up in Santa Cruz had to say on the subject of all the local foods and drinks you can buy here:

"The little comidas (foods) sold everywhere are mostly empanadas (cheese and chicken), asaditos (little spicy hamburgers), anticuchos or pacumutos (shish-kabobs) with yuca. In the buses to San Javier they also sell cuñapes (my beloved cheese rolls), roschas de maiz (corn bread made with cheese and baked in the form of a doughnut). By the Rio Grande, they sell fried fish, fresh from the river (with yuca always). On the way to Cochabamba and Villamontes, they sell other things such as hard boiled eggs, all the fruits—oranges, tangerines, achachairus, ocorós, etc. And in little bags, they sell "atomic" corn with queso fresco (fresh cheese), which is one of my favorites.

In the streets and plazas it is basically the same. People like the horneado típico (baked things)—the canapés, roschas, and empanadas and also the anticuchos. In many places throughout the city, they sell hot dogs, hamburgers, lomito sandwiches, and a lot of drinks made from fresh fruits called refrescos (refresco Cabrera is one of the more famous). They make these from oranges, achachairú, tamarind, lemon, maracuyá, or peaches—all kinds of fruits. Another very popular drink is called mocochinchi, made from dehydrated peaches boiled with sugar and cinnamon for a long time. That one, to me, is the best soft drink in the entire world! I love it!

Along San Aurelio Avenue and outside the Parque Urbano, they sell refresco de caña—juice of the sugar cane, squeezed fresh with nothing added but ice. It is amazingly refreshing and delicious. Somó is another very popular drink, made from boiling corn, but consumed cold.

Tujuré is sold at the markets for breakfast. It's like oatmeal, but made out of boiled hard corn (tujuré de maiz) with a little bit of baking soda. It is one of the best breakfasts you can imagine! You eat it with milk, just like oatmeal, but it's much more delicious. Also, they sell gelatina de pata, which is jello made from boiling the paws of the cows. It is the best jello in the entire world.

In Cotoca [a suburb of Santa Cruz], they also sell tortillas de maiz (completely unrelated to the dull, boring, ugly, and pathetic Mexican tortillas). Our tortillas are made with corn flour, eggs, cheese, a little bit of mashed yuca, a little salt, a little sugar, and milk or water and grilled in iron grills. I grew up eating that for breakfast and there is nothing better in the entire universe. And they also sell many sweets in Cotoca—empanizado, tablillas, and jalea de caña. Empanizado is sugar cane juice cooked until it becomes hard. Tablillas are like fudge, made from sugar cane syrup and milk, I believe. I don't know completely how they made, but they are delicious! That kind of sweet used to be our dessert at home, together with fruit. Most of the time, we just had fruit, like watermelons, pineapples, grapes, or peaches. Jalea is just sugar cane syrup or jelly.

Another sweet thing that is delicious and sold especially in San Javier, Concepción, and Portachuelo is the paraguayo. These are sweet balls made from almidón de yuca (almidón is something finer than flour and it comes from washing shredded yuca. You let it rest, and later the almidón goes to the bottom and the water becomes clear. You get rid of the water, which leaves a fine powdered starch much like corn starch. When it's made from corn, it's called maicena).

I am reminded of the time we were taking flotas (medium-distance buses) around a big chunk of Bolivia. We had an all day ride at one point, traveling from small town to small town. I can't remember if this was the bus that broke down during that trip or not. Along the way, the bus had to stop at police check points, also for lunch, maybe one bathroom stop, and would stop or slow down at one-lane bridges. Every time these buses even slow down, someone is there to sell something to eat and drink. And at every opportunity, our driver bought everything in sight and ate pretty much continuously the entire long journey, making his job go a little quicker, I'm sure, because he sure kept busy, but I hope he doesn't do that too many days a week.

Anyway, you get the point. You can buy "stuff" and may even want to buy "stuff" wherever you go. And people are ready to accept your money (especially if they don't have to make change, hint, hint, and waste your and their precious time) in exchange for your dreams, wants, and needs. (But don't expect to find a bathroom very easily, but if you do, that change just might come in very handy indeed.)

So, be the King of Cambio! The Queen of Quid! The Duke of Dinero! The Prince of the Peso! The positions seem to be totally vacant. "iNecesito: El Rey del Cambio!" (¿El Ministro del Cambio?)

WALKING (0 to 5 Stars!)

I love walking for so many reasons! Weather permitting (or sometimes not), I'm out there! I believe walking to be one of the most powerful mood elevators on the planet. The fitness/health/life-expectance benefits are enormous, and that's no exaggeration. You have to get up and make yourself do it at first, maybe, but then it becomes a fun addiction. It's easy for most of us and, for most of the rest of us, it'll get easier if you just walk a little, then a little more every day. As a friend used to say, "There's nothing to it but to do it!" Walking doesn't take any equipment (normally) except yourself and a good pair of shoes. (Or wear the Bolivian zapatos nacionales—flip-flops. I don't exactly know why these are so popular. Maybe it's because they're air-cooled and cheap, but I doubt if they are very good for your feet in the long run.)

Here in Santa Cruz (now Bolivia's largest and richest city), we're lucky because normal daily life brings us into contact with many walking situations. It's a necessity for many of us fortunate enough not to own cars, and we're lucky to have a lot of good weather and pleasant places for walking. (The bad weather and awful places to walk will be discussed too!) Most of us here walk a block or two to catch a taxi or a micro, to get to the nearest grocery, drug store, or restaurant, or to get to a destination from a rare parking spot. Those blocks add up.

The American geographical pattern for a city of 1.5 million people is reversed here. In American cities, of course, the outskirts or newer, more suburban areas would normally be better places to walk than the older inner city, or ciudad central. Though cities like New York, Chicago, and New Orleans—to name just a few—provide many great places for inner city walking. In Santa Cruz, much of the outlying part of the city is really pretty sad. Though these areas are generally very inexpensive places to live because they are inconvenient to most work or play, there can be grand houses behind grand walls in strange places, on streets of smelly mud with trash everywhere, where many of the neighbors are living in sheet-metal shacks.

I think a little geographical diversion is appropriate here, so let me give you a quick sketch of the city and environs. If you picture a bulls-eye, you have a map of Santa Cruz. Each ring represents a major avenue or highway, looping around the center of the city in concentric rings. That's why it's called the "Ringed City". The resulting inner most ring of the circle—the bulls-eye—is about 1.5 km. in diameter. Then each subsequent ring is about a kilometer out from its inner neighbor. There are at least nine rings now, but rings past the fourth are incomplete circles, cut off by the river (El Rio Piraí), which Santa Cruz essentially does not cross. In or near the city, there are just a couple of fords for horse carts and one little bridge, the Puente del Urubó. Perhaps you are reminded of Dante's Nine Circles of Hell and the River Styx in the Divine Comedy? And, ironically, in both Dante and Santa Cruz, it is the Fourth Ring which lies just before the river. Strange.

Like the spokes of a giant wheel, radial avenues and highways radiate out from the First Ring (Primero Anillo). Most of the thusly divided real estate is chopped up into normal, square city blocks, with many parks and plazas spread around the city. To me, plazas are one of the greatest things about Latin and European cities. I sure wish we had more of them in the U.S.

Within the first ring, about half of the structures are the old one or two story adobe commercial buildings or wall-enclosed houses with earthy red tile roofs. Many of these structures are very weathered. The adobe is covered by a layer of stucco which is then painted. In the surrounding countryside, the adobe is often not covered by stucco and the roofs are largely thatched palm fronds or grasses. But the term "old" is sort of an oxymoron when applied to Santa Cruz. Although the city was founded in about 1561 (accounts vary and must take into account that the city was moved two to four times), constant razing and rebuilding over the years have, for the most part eliminated the oldest structures. You won't find many of the old colonial buildings in the city, which are so common in much of the rest of Latin America. Santa Cruz was just a small jungle outpost in the days when Potosi, Sucre, and Lima, Peru were important colonial cities. Now, of course, the tables have been turned. But even the central cathedral, the Basilica Menor de San Lorenzo, founded in 1605 and first constructed about 1660, was not completed in its current form until sometime after 1845.

I have to admit up front that I'm kind of a defeatist when it comes to the "environment". I definitely hate having to write that, because nobody loves the wilderness and life more than I do, but there are just too many billions of us to sustain without major, major suffering at some point. I'm not saying we should do nothing, but it seems the best we can do is delay future catastrophes. To me, it's expecting too much to think that we can avoid them, and that's discouraging. I'll keep trying. I'm just not overly hopeful.

Yet what could be more ecologically friendly than these Bolivian homes? Adobe walls, thatched roofs, packed earthen floors, no heat, no air-conditioning, and sometimes, especially until recently, no electricity or what we city folk are used to in the way of water. Much of the food consumed has little or no packaging. But, even here in Bolivia, the days of this way of life seem numbered. The world aspires to "advance". I almost said, "The world aspires to be America." But that's not quite right. It's more that they aspire to the American dream and the images the media present of "the good life".

Regardless, this adobe is really amazing stuff and holds up incredibly well considering how much more rainfall we get here in Santa Cruz compared to other locations like the American Southwest or parts of Mexico where you also see adobe. In the Southwest, they use grasses, but here they use bamboo to strengthen the adobe walls.

But I digress...again...

Santa Cruz is very much a work in progress—from the center outward—and that's one reason why the central area is so desirable—it's closer to being finished! In the central city, within the First Ring, within the Second Ring (where I live), and even inside the Third Ring, sidewalks are plentiful and busy intersections sport pedestrian crossings. Gee, just like a real city! In fact, this part of the city is very modern. Many modest "skyscrapers" have been built, mostly outside the First Ring (where the "old" city has been largely preserved), but within the Third.

In the inner city, the Twentieth Century (at least, but maybe not yet the Trendy-First) has arrived, with a myriad of places to walk to. There are stores of every ilk—literally thousands of restaurants (though most of them seem to be fried chicken places), bars where beers are $1, discos, karaoke, mariachi, the parks and plazas, the zoo, churches, museums, art galleries, the markets (which are worlds unto themselves), and many streets are parkways with trees and benches. The city, in general is very green with gaudy tropical trees, flowers, and plants. All year round, something is blooming; some trees bloom continuously; others, nearly so. Sometimes the city will run power lines down the center of the sidewalk to avoid cutting trees.

As I write this, the mighty toborochois are displaying their big, showy pink and/or yellow flowers all over the city. Toborochois are often gigantic, incredibly sturdy jungle trees with bulging trunks. No wind can knock them down. When they are young, their trunks are bright green and studded with large thorns like miniature rhino horns. When they get older, the higher limbs keep the thorns, but their trunks don't bother with them anymore, grow pot-bellied, and turn brown. In the fall, which is drawing to a close as I write this, the toborochois are one of the few trees to lose their leaves, but, first, they start flowering. Then, as the leaves gradually fall, the trees do something exceedingly strange—they continue to produce their magnificent blossoms until only the blossoms remain, providing quite a show. Several weeks after they appear, the flowers also fall, and the leaves return quickly to begin a new cycle. In the States, we have several flowering trees, but only the tulip tree, with its dull, nearly hidden flowers, is anywhere near as big as a toborochoi, and Santa Cruz has many other huge flowering trees. I tend to like that.

Further out, especially outside the Fourth Ring, most streets are still unpaved dirt and rubble. Paving and sidewalks lie somewhere in the future. The only utilities in these areas are electricity and water (both universal), so everyone has to have septic systems and tanks of gas for cooking. No one has heat. Almost no one has air-conditioning. Rain, mud, and flooding can be big problems in the rainy season and giant problems if you have to get anywhere. Houses normally have septic tanks, but there are many open ditches where wash-water run-off stinks up the streets. Larger open ditches, called canals, often lie between unpaved lanes to carry away the enormous quantities of rainwater which can fall. Even with walls surrounding most of the houses, things can get pretty dirty out here. If anywhere in Latin America is the "Third World", this is it, and it surrounds us, thanks in large part to the ongoing colonialism of the capital, La Paz. Another factor you have to remember is that the city has exploded in population, by 500,000 people in just the last 10 years alone.

The weather is generally pleasant, though tending to the hot and rainy. When I'm asked to describe the weather, I usually tell people that it's similar to Florida, but better. Very seldom is it bad enough to keep folks home. When, to me, the temperature becomes about perfect, say 70°F (21°C), locals don winter coats and hats, while I go around in my usual shorts and T-shirt. The average annual temperature is 75°F (24°C). I tend to like that.

Similar to Hong Kong, Tokyo, London, or New York, the streets nearly everywhere are full of interesting characters and, here in Santa Cruz, also full of famously beautiful women dressed in tight, scanty outfits. I tend to like that too.

Cruceños are not quite so in a hurry and full of purpose as folks in those other cities, but there are many pedestrians on the move, at a pace somewhere between wondering-around-lost and New York full-speed-ahead or Tokyo got-to-get-to-work. An amazing number of people spend amazing amounts of time just sitting around the plazas, or sitting around trying to sell a few things from their carts, stalls, or stores. Here, as I've said before, they live the notion of sell-every-possible-thing-every-possible-where and that helps keep the streets and sidewalks busy.

There is one small thing I need to mention mainly because it is important to a later discussion of national character. But having done rather a lot of it, let me tell you something about walking in Central American, South American, and Caribbean countries—you will never find a coin or anything of value on any street. In the U.S., I used to commonly see quarters, $5 once, and so many pennies the teenagers discard. Maybe, in essence, that's what it means to be a rich country. Down here, forget about it! You'll never find anything that somebody didn't throw away, so try to keep an eye out, instead, for those cracks, holes, and unexpected steps, which brings me to the hazards of walking in the city and how to deal with them.

Footing

Yes, there are sidewalks, paved streets, and crosswalks in the central part of the city, but don't expect them to be perfect. Steps, for instance, in developing countries, don't fit any height standards. Some are short and some are high. Some older buildings were built so close to the street that the sidewalks in front of them are only wide enough for one person. A few wheelchair/bike ramps exist, but not many. Gutters and open holes are sometimes almost bottomless. Both small and large holes open up in the sidewalks. Sawed-off metal things stick up to trip you. Paving can be very uneven. Many of the streets are paved with hexagonal concrete paving stones, called locetas, instead of concrete or asphalt. These modern-day cobblestones are very handy if work needs to be done beneath the street, because they come up and go back down like jigsaw puzzle pieces, but their joints provide good things to trip over if you're not careful.

If you don't keep an eye out for the footing beneath you, you might find yourself beneath you lying on the street or sidewalk with a broken bone. I've seen this same problem in many countries. One night, in St. Lucia, a friend stepped into a partially covered drainage ditch and suffered very bad cuts and bruises to her leg, which really required a trip to the hospital, but we were having way too much fun for her to want to go all the way into the city to the emergency room. Here, the sidewalks, gutters, curbs, and steps are generally not as bad as many I've seen in the Caribbean and Mexico, and I think the traffic is often worse and more dangerous in the Orient.

I've gone down hard on the sidewalk, myself, three times in the first six months since I moved back down here, and I consider myself to have above average coordination. I wasn't even chewing gum! The uneven terrain is simply treacherous and there's a lot to look at, so it's difficult to keep looking down at your feet, though the terrain itself only accounts for two of these falls. The third I will talk about in the "Rain and Water" section. I have to add, though, that before moving back to Santa Cruz, in three years of walking and hiking a lot in Montana, in all kinds of weather, including a lot of snow and ice, up and down mountains, I never fell once.

Unlike the U.S., where children, old codgers, and even idiots are pampered and catered to with warning signs and guard rails, etc., you'll seldom find any of that in Bolivia. If you're out in the streets, you're considered an adult who can open both eyes and watch out for yourself, whether this happens to be true or not.

Traffic and Impatient drivers

Crossing the street can be dangerous anywhere, even in California, where drivers are required to stop by law if a pedestrian even sets foot in the street. Here, the crossings are much more dangerous because most of the people in vehicles want to kill you. At least it seems that way.

I don't know exactly how the laws work, but once you're off that curb you're fair game! Why there is no common courtesy in the streets or in the markets, I don't know, but I certainly don't like it. And since traffic signs and lights are often ignored, don't assume a green light is safe, or that you don't have to look the "wrong" way before crossing a one-way street. There are few one-way street signs, and normally, they are simply little arrows on the street signs, which are quite rare to begin with.

In a rather comprehensive recent survey, reported in El Deber, our best local newspaper, the number one problem people noted was problems in the educational system—poor schools. This topped the list even above crime (#2), traffic (#3), disorder and rudeness in the markets (#4), and corruption in government (#5), which was in a dead heat with the problem of people urinating on the sidewalks and streets (#6).

The fact that education tops the list shows how much people value their children and their education. Bolivians think so highly of their children that they spoil them to death. They love them so much! Children are the very center of the family, as they should be. So why would anyone want to subject their children, or the children of others, to the insanity which is allowed to pass apparently unnoticed in the streets? Yet the entire city tolerates this utter lawlessness, chaos, and peril of stupid, rude, impatient drivers, who are especially dangerous to children. It is as if no one notices except me. The nearly lawless system works, in my opinion, only because, though there are apparently many bad people, people here are mostly law abiding on their own. Maybe it's because they're basically shy and submissive, maybe it's the strong family ties most people here share. But when it comes to driving, courtesy and safety seem to be words missing from the local vocabulary. It's a complete mystery to me, but I'll have more to say about this subject later, in the driving section.

Sun and Heat

Hey, it's the tropics! It gets hot and humid. If you become too hot and/or dehydrated, you can die. If you get too much sun, you're going to look old before your time and risk skin cancer. It's as simple as that. The locals cope with this problem by wearing lots of clothes, having darker skin, and, apparently, by losing the ability to sweat. Sometimes I'll be in a T-shirt and shorts and have sweat pouring down my face, while those around me wearing wool are cool as cucumbers. I just don't get it. It's illogical!

I don't do any of my long-distance walking in these conditions. I wear light-colored cotton. A hat is a good idea, but they tend to make me too hot. Sunscreen is, of course, necessary, and some women carry umbrellas to fend off that intense tropical sun. I try to stay in the shade of trees or buildings as much as possible.

Many of the older buildings in the central part of the city have porticos extending over the sidewalks, like old western towns in the U.S. These are effective for both sun and rain, though newer structures eliminate such niceties in favor of some obtuse architectural aesthetic objective or other.

Air conditioning has arrived in Santa Cruz...finally! But it's still limited to newer stores like supermarkets or to some of the fancier stores, condos, or houses. Don't expect to find it in most places. Many people seem to get by fine with simple open windows, foregoing even fans.

Wind

Chicago may be dubbed the "Windy City", but it's nothing compared to Santa Cruz, where, anytime but in summer, strong, cold winds called surazos can suddenly blow up from Argentina and feel like they must be coming straight out of Antarctica. Also, the high mountains and low jungles form a powerful weather maker that can produce strong winds and storms any time of the year.

I was walking down Gringota one day in the Ramada market (maybe the same day my $1 camba straw hat got blown off and went rolling down the major street in front of the Ex-Terminal and I had to chase it a block or so in heavy traffic). I saw an old woman get knocked flat onto the sidewalk by the wind. She was so frail and so, you know, stiff like they get, that I'm sure she would have been there on the street until someone helped her up. But I was in a big hurry, so I had to walk by and leave the chore to someone else. No! Of course, I stopped and helped the poor thing get up and cross the busy street, and she thanked me so sweetly, but she had been a little panicked that the wind had surprised her so.

Rain and Water

This morning, as I write this, it's raining hard and cold from every direction at once. I can tell the direction because it's raining directly into every one of my windows—closed, of course. No fun, no matter what form of transportation you use. An umbrella is totally useless in this kind of torrent. It's just going to get destroyed and won't block any of that horizontal deluge anyway. Raingear is better, but it's often way too muggy for that kind of thing. A Goretex jacket is best, but pretty expensive. I usually get by with a light nylon jacket with a hood.

If there is one cloud in the sky and you go out, that cloud will rain for sure, though it seldom rains all day. The many trees lining the streets come in handy in this kind of weather, but you have to remember that after it has been raining for some time, the trees aren't much help. And after the rain stops, it will keep dripping under the trees. They can keep you dry for a while and wet for a while longer.

Another problem is that the rain gutters just don't have the capacity to carry away all the rain that can fall during a heavy downpour. I've found this to be true in many Florida cities that are much richer than Santa Cruz. In Sarasota, FL, the downtown becomes impassable in a heavy rain, except for Hummers. In Santa Cruz, these flooded streets that have become rivers can make crossing more of a swim than a walk. This is where the rubber flip-flops come in pretty handy, I guess. Many of the downtown sidewalks are raised a very uncomfortable step up from the street (again, as in Old West towns) in order to stay above the flood during these tropical rains.

But even the highest sidewalk is no protection against the vehicles that are determined to drive fast and close to the curb just to ruin your day and your clothes. When it's raining, you will see the unwary awash in giant sprays of water sent up from the flooded streets. The wary take shelter in doorways, then make mad dashes past the areas where the opportunity for these showers is greatest. Again, where is the courtesy?

The other time I fell, that I mentioned above, was right after a rain. Ceramic tiles are very popular in Santa Cruz, even for sidewalks. Many of these become as slick as ice when they are wet, while others have a surface that is OK in these conditions. You can't necessarily tell by looking which is which. On the day in question, I stepped onto one of these tiled sections and the next thing I knew, I was lying there looking up at the sky. Lucky again! I didn't break anything, but probably only because I've made sure for many years to get plenty of calcium. One of these days, if I'm not more careful, my luck will run out and I'm going to break something.

Pigeons

I don't like pigeons, but no one seems to do anything about them here. I guess there aren't enough cats or hawks or guys with shotguns to halt the invasion. They have gone from zero to a problem in just the few years I've been here. People think they're "pretty" and feed them, especially in the central plaza, where they've pretty much driven out the more desirable native species. Watch out for flying poo!

Mosquitoes

Mosquitoes in the tropics are more than just a bother. They're downright dangerous! They carry malaria (almost impossible to prevent and tough to cure), the famous yellow fever (which you must be vaccinated against to be in Bolivia), dengue fever (which has four varieties...if you've had them all, you might be immune), Japanese encephalitis, Rift Valley fever, and chikungunya.

Summers are the worst and, in winter, mosquitoes are rare. The city sprays pretty regularly, but there are many places for mosquitoes to breed and grow. And they are such smart little creatures! Can you even imagine how small the brain of a mosquito must be? And these guys aren't nearly as big as the ones you see up north in Maine or Canada. That tiny little brain performs all the intricate calculations and control necessary for flight, multiplication (of the species as well as mathematical, necessary for flight, in fact, calculus is necessary for flight), finding your blood (they know very well the difference between the front of you and the back of you, and when you're sleeping—almost like Santa Claus), and avoiding death as you stalk and try to swat them.

The mosquitoes in Santa Cruz have another amazing talent. You will see one, maybe after hearing it, hovering rather slowly, as if trying to gauge the situation as it tries to sneak up on you. You see her. She sees you seeing her. You start to make your move and, suddenly, instantaneously, she's not there, disappearing into thin air! They have some kind of afterburner, or cloaking device, or warp drive that they engage and they're gone.

And when a mosquito is around, even if it's somewhere with 100,000 people, like Carnaval, any soccer game, any political rally, any fiesta, or 7:00 pm in the Central Plaza, that mosquito is going to have such a taste for la sangre del gringo that it will hunt me out and find me and attack.

So you really want to do the things prescribed by the experts. When you go out, wear as much clothing as you can stand. Wear light-colored clothing, just as you would for the heat. Use an effective repellent like DEET on any exposed skin (not including your eyeballs). Try not to sweat or exhale. In their homes, some people use mosquito netting over their beds, but I prefer having screens in my windows and keeping the outside and bedroom doors closed as much of the time as possible.

Did you know that every animal that is hunted has some inherent weakness that can be exploited by a hunter? For instance, flies have a very simple but interesting one. When they have landed and are just standing around, when you try to kill them, they are very quick to fly away. What you might not notice is that in order to become airborne, a fly first jumps straight up into the air. By the time your hand or other wielded object meets the surface to crush the fly, it is already gone because of its quick jump. But if, instead of trying to crush the fly on the surface, you simply clap your hands a few inches above the fly, it will jump straight up just in time to be squished between your clapping hands. Messy, but effective. Try it, but be sure to wash your hands afterwards. Everything has a weakness that can be exploited by a skilled hunter.

The same is true for mosquitoes in Bolivia and maybe the entire tropics, though maybe not in the entire world. It seems that the different mosquito species (there are about 3000 of them) think differently. What I have learned is that, if you have screens in your windows and the glass part of the window open, at dusk and dawn, any mosquitoes in the room will go to the screens and sit there waiting for you to come and kill them. So, before you go to bed, at dusk, having prepared the windows ahead of time, simply slip in and nail the little buggers so you can get a good night's sleep later. Be sure to close the door when you exit the bedroom. Everything has a weakness, even the mighty (and deadly) mosquito.

While I'm talking about essential chemicals like insect repellent and sun screen, let me add a note on other toiletries essential for life in Santa Cruz. You'll also need stuff you maybe never needed in a non-tropical climate...things like baby powder, moisturizing lotion by the gallon (even though, I know, it's very moist here), lip balm, antibiotic ointment (you don't want to let even the smallest cut get infected), aloe vera, and, possibly, some kind of anti-fungal preparation. Do you still wonder why there's a pharmacy on every block?

Odors

There are often odors one must contend with in developing countries, but here one must sometimes contend with human excrement in the sidewalk. The strong smell of stale urine is common in some neighborhoods. There seem to be two reasons for this problem. One is that many recent immigrants have moved down from the Altiplano (the high mountainous plain of the Andes) and they simply don't have very clean habits. Period. That's not prejudice, it's simply an unfortunate fact. The second is that there is not an adequate supply of free public restrooms anywhere in Bolivia. What restrooms exist often cost 1 bs. or so to use, and most people who urinate in the streets don't have a peso to spare to pay for the service. The short term solution for a pedestrian, I'm afraid, is to watch where you step, walk fast, and try not to breathe.

People who walk their dogs in Bolivia never clean up after them. Even if a dog drops excrement right in the middle of the sidewalk, that's where it stays. It's just not part of the culture to even think that there might be a better way, or that people with animals might have some responsibility to others. In the U.S. maybe we go a little too far in the other direction toward fastidiousness, but I don't like stepping in the stuff. Do you? Does anyone? I wonder why people here so often don't think of other people?

Another problem, but one that causes more ugliness than odor, is the amount of trash in the streets. Most of the chola treats sold everywhere are packaged in plastic or paper. Plastic bags are ubiquitous. Not to single out any one group, but indigenous people in general seem to be blind to the problem. Commonly, they will throw trash into the street when they're standing right by a trash container. I guess that's the way they do it up in the Altiplano, which is largely a barren wasteland anyway, so that's the way they do it here in this garden of paradise. There seems to be little or no attempt at education. If there are fines, there are no warning signs of them like you find in the U.S. and other parts of the world, and there would certainly not be any enforcement of such a law anyway. There is possibly one on the books, ignored by even the police. They can't be bothered to leave their police stations.

Crime

I might as well mention it, since it will be on the minds of many of you. I think crime is a little over-rated in the city, but, according to the newspaper poll I mentioned before, lack of security was cited as the second biggest problem in the city. I think Santa Cruz is at least as safe from crime as any other large city I've been in, but people don't feel safe, and that's a problem, even if it's mainly because, just a short time ago, Santa Cruz was a small town with no crime at all to speak of. Yet you would think there must be a reason for all those walls, bars, heavily-armed police, and security guards.

I try to be careful, but I too have been robbed...in a Hipermaxi supermarket, of all places. Before this incident, I was about to write that I'd never been robbed in a Spanish-speaking country (not counting the U.S.). Just thinking that is probably what made this incident happen, since I didn't get a change to knock on any wood.

I went shopping for lomo (beef tenderloin) at Hipermaxi Sur and got robbed! It was my own fault, really, and I was actually quite lucky. It's been pretty cold and rainy here, so I wore a jacket (with good zippered pockets) and sweat pants (with stupid pockets). I put my cell phone and my little chola change purse in one jacket pocket, my credit cards and paper money in the other jacket pocket. It was kind of hot in the supermarket, so I took off the jacket and left it in the cart. I kept the cart close to me but not right in front of me. Big mistake. As I dealt with the butcher, some ass-hole thief got to my jacket! I didn't notice until I started checking-out that my $40 cell phone and change purse were missing, but my real valuables in the other pocket were OK. Whew! Stupid me! I guess I spaced-out and thought I was still in Montana. I'm usually very mindful and cautious here, but...maybe I was thinking about those delicious hamburgers I was about to make...

So my cooking was delayed a little. First, I had to bring the groceries home, walk to the micro, then ride to Tigo (my cell phone company) to get a new cell phone, then another micro, followed by another walk. That all went pretty well. I was even able to get my old number, even though numbers are embedded in chips here that are interchangeable—they'll work in any phone. Very convenient for the thieves.

Here are some tricks I use here and in any large American or European city. Well, any city! I've been robbed my fair share of times (which is how I've learned). Don't wear a backpack (in back, at least). Better not to have one. Never, ever wear a "fanny pack". Not only do you make yourself look silly, they are easily robbed. And, ladies, don't carry a purse unless you absolutely have to and, if you have to carry one, make sure it's a big one with nice strong straps, so you can swing it as a weapon. (And most women here do carry giant, suitcase-size purses, maybe for that reason.) Keep pepper spray in your pocket or purse. Take a class in self-defense. Wear shoes good for running (forget those high heels, ladies), in case you have to get away or chase down some punk who ran off with your camba hat.

Normally, don't carry around credit cards or original documents. Carry a photocopy of your passport, driver's license, or ID. Don't carry much money. Don't carry a normal, American-style billfold. Keep coins and small bills in a little leather purse like they sell in the markets. If you must carry large bills, keep them tucked away somewhere else, so that, if you are robbed, you can pretend the change purse is all you have. Don't look like you have anything. Don't wear jewelry. Don't dress expensively or to be noticed.

Be alert. Look around you. Look dangerous. In the Ramada market, I once caught a potential "bad guy", who looked like he was sizing me up as a potential "mark". I sort of stared him down and, conceivably, he thought better of making a target of me. Be careful where you walk at night, though I have walked safely in so many places... It's better, at night especially, to stick with areas where there are lots of people, and that is very much of Santa Cruz indeed. This rule alone has kept me safe during a lot of time spent in big cities. I hate being in a big city like Chicago at night and looking around to find myself the only person in the street.

BICYCLES (0 Stars!)

Are you kidding me? You'll be flattened like a pancake! Here, bicycles, usually modified, are only used by professionals transporting or selling things, except for a few kids very locally in the barrios or in the larger parks.

Most bicycles are unhealthy anyway, because their skinny little seats constrict the blood vessels in the "crotch" area and can eventually cause impotence in men and who knows what in women (well, actually, they don't know of anything in women). Riding is only half the exercise of walking, it takes equipment that can be stolen, and it's dangerous because you are fair game to the predatory motorized vehicles out there. Maybe bicycles will become a better choice in the future, after they get rid of the in parts of the city (see below), or build more bike paths.

In the meantime, leave the biking to the broom man, the gardeners who carry all their equipment, including lawn mowers, on tiny bikes as they ride from house to house, and people delivering or selling goods from specialized bikes that are more like mini-trucks.

Motorcycles? Do you really think a bicycle is any safer just because it has a motor on it? They're very dangerous because of the traffic and deadly drivers, and then there's that rain, mud, gravel, dirt, and rocks. To my way of thinking, motorcycles in Santa Cruz are strictly for couriers and pizza delivery hombres only!

MICROS (2 to 3 Stars!)

The small buses so common in Santa Cruz, as mentioned previously, are called micros. They hold about 25 people (sitting) and 15-20 more standing in the aisle. During the rush hours, passengers are packed like fruit at the market, which can make riding a bit uncomfortable. Though the use of deodorant is widespread in Santa Cruz, it is not yet universal, though I think the same thing can be said of America or Europe. But, as I said previously, people don't sweat much here, so the stink in close quarters is not as bad, I don't think, as crowded public transportation in, say, Mexico, the Caribbean, or Great Britain. Actually, I don't mind the odors as much as when the people in close quarters are coughing or itching a lot. From the former you can catch a cold, the flu, or tuberculosis; from the latter you might get lice or worse.

I believe all micros here are the "Coaster Jumbo" model of Toyota first manufactured in 1975 and still being made—incredibly durable, incredibly efficient. I can't understand why they aren't used extensively in the U.S., but I've never seen one there, or any equivalents. They have a 4.0 L turbo diesel (very economical, very clean burning, with little pollution), have very tight turning radii, and cost about $75,000 new. They are also used extensively in Japan, Hong Kong, and Australia. Most of the micros in Santa Cruz are shipped here after being heavily driven in one of these other countries, yet they don't seem to be "transformers" (converted from right to left hand steering). If they are transformed, somebody or some factory does a very good job. I believe they are manufactured with air-conditioning, but I have never been on one with functioning A-C. Instead, large windows can usually, but not always, be made to slide open. Almost all micro drivers play their stereos constantly, and a few micros have flat-screen televisions that display advertising videos, but mostly these are always broken. There are about as many seatbelts on micros as there are on U.S. school buses—zero.

For 1.50 bs. (roughly 22¢), you can ride to virtually every part of Santa Cruz, within a block or two of just about any possible destination. There are more than 100 different routes and at least a few thousand micros. They don't have schedules, there are just many of them, spaced out on each route. You board or exit anywhere you can flag one down or request the driver stop to let you off, not just at designated bus stops. You can go about anywhere in the city riding just two micros, but it might be possible to find a trip that would require three. One will take you amazingly far. It's a good game to try to get to your destination in as few micros as possible.

There are micros which rotate around the rings in both directions, making them very easy to ride because you know where they're headed. #17 and #18 go around the First Ring, #72 and #73 go around the Second Ring. Normally, the routes begin in some barrio on one side of town, pass through the approximate center of town, on to another barrio on the far side, take a break, then return along roughly the same path. I have ridden many of the micros along their entire routes, but still have many to go.

Micros and walking are my two favorite ways of getting around Santa Cruz. I may not be the only gringo riding the micros, but it usually seems that way. Rarely do I ever encounter folks from other parts of the world, but that is true for Santa Cruz in general, with the possible exception of the central plaza. The fact that other gringos don't ride the micros probably says more about me than about the other people. Riding a micro is an adventure, especially if it's a micro you've never been on before, or if you miss your stop or go to sleep and end up in the middle of some remote nowhere barrio.

A guidebook and a separate map of micro routes are published, but I find them to be more cryptic than very helpful. There are signs on the front of the buses which tell you their major destinations, and they are also color coded as well as numbered. The numbers are most important. There is almost always someone around you can ask for advice while you wait. You can also flag down random micros and ask the driver, through the window, if they go to where you want to go. But don't expect the drivers to take time for much courtesy.

Micro drivers are doing fifty things at once—steering, shifting gears, watching the traffic, taking money, making change, making sure no one sneaks on the micro without paying, maybe eating, drinking (not alcohol, thank God!), listening to music, and honking their wolf whistle horn at pretty girls in the street. Sometimes they have their wife or kid riding in the front passenger seat and they're carrying on a conversation. Yet a recent study I read showed, supposedly, that the human brain can only multitask three things at once (before it blows up?), in addition to the background, life maintaining functions. The drivers are really too busy to think about what effect sudden starting and stopping might have on passengers who are aboard. Passengers are essentially on their own.

But don't get me wrong, these drivers are invariably tough, serious, fearless, conscientious professionals, very good at what they do. I might last one day at their job, but maybe not, and I bet most people wouldn't attempt it, period. On the other hand, driving a taxi in Santa Cruz wouldn't be much fun either. Like most truck drivers and many laborers, a lot of micro drivers chew coca to stay alert and fight off fatigue, but few taxi drivers seem to have picked-up the habit.

If you're lucky, you might get to "ride shotgun" and sit in the one vacant seat way up front, over the engine compartment, up by the driver. You are beyond the crowds here, the view is very good from there, and you might get to pass the time card between the driver and the guy at the check-points, and maybe even pass money from passengers back and forth.

Your exact change will come in very handy on micros, especially if you have it in hand before you board. This reduces the time you're vulnerable to sudden starts and stops, as you stand there waiting for your change, reaching out to the driver's similarly outreached hand, trying to hold on to whatever you can with the other hand. It's much better to finish with just one quick transaction, so you can sit or use both hands as quickly as possible.

It's good to have a sturdy pair of sea legs for the abrupt starts and stops the micros are famous for. Yet, from Santa Cruz, the nearest sea is an incredible journey across the highest mountains or the deepest jungle or both! Let me put it like this, with the jerky starts and stops, a micro is no place to have a toothpick in your mouth unless you want to risk having it jammed into your brain. I've seen quite a few falls, probable broken teeth, and quantities of blood. You can sometimes be cut by sharp, exposed metal. Micros will stop almost anywhere, but only for an instant, so you'd better move quickly.

The kids and teenagers who ride the micros used to be trained by their parents and schools to give up their seats to adults. Many people will still give up their seat to a pregnant woman, a woman carrying a baby, or one of the rare handicapped people brave enough to be out and about. But this traditional courtesy, like so many others, is starting to break down.

TAXIS (3 to 4 Stars!) AND LIMOS (5 Stars!)

You can take a taxi anywhere in Santa Cruz for about $1 to $3 U.S., though a trip to or from the airport is a standard 50 bs. (about $7). Similar to some of the micros, there are taxis which do nothing but rotate around the rings for a mere 2 bs. (less than 30 cents). From the streets around the old Ex-Terminal (on the First Ring, at the corner of Cañoto and Gringota) you will find taxis that can take you to outlying towns cheaply — Cotoca, Warnes, Buena Vista, Samaipata, etc. I recently took one of these to a friend's quinta outside a little town named La Bélgica, which must be a good 50 km. from Santa Cruz. Along with some other people who were making the same trip, I paid an astoundingly low price of $1.

You certainly can't drive a car here that cheaply (but more about that later). And remember, the more people in your group, the more economical a taxi becomes. I find these prices very reasonable considering that gasoline costs about $2/gallon, though gas (LPG) is cheaper. Diesel is a little more expensive, because most of it must be imported, whereas Bolivia has abundant light crude for gasoline and plenty of gas. The prices of fuel are all set by the government, along with the price of staples like rice, flour, and farmer's cheese.

Santa Cruz taxis don't have meters, so it's a good idea to explain your destination to the driver and find out what the price is going to be before getting in or taking off, whichever is easier and safer. Another technique is not to worry about the price or discuss it with your driver in advance. Instead, just be very nice and talk his head off. The hope is that, by the time you reach where you're going, you'll be such good friends with the taxista that he won't feel right about charging you too much. I've seen this work. The ring taxis and taxis to fixed destinations like the airport or other towns have fixed prices. Except for the ring taxis, you might be able to negotiate a little.

When I first arrived in Santa Cruz, in early 2004, we took a taxi from the airport—an old green and white Toyota Corolla hatchback, two-wheel drive when I had been told four-wheel drive (4WD) is essential here. I noticed Japanese characters on the window, which seemed strange at the time, and that the steering wheel had been moved from the right to the left side of the taxi. Even more strange, I thought!

I learned later that, like the micros, most of these used 1.5 L Toyota Corolla taxis arrive here after already having served a long tour of duty in Japan, so they must their steering wheels and pedals "transformed" from the right side of the car to the left. This makes it difficult to see the speedometer, though no one bothers to try to look. That old buggy we took from the airport had been a taxi in Japan, lived out its "useful" life, then was shipped all the way to Santa Cruz to serve for hundreds of thousands more miles.

On the way into, the poor old taxi's engine died. We stopped alongside the busy highway, the driver got out, lifted the hood, took off his shoe, hit something with it in the engine compartment (probably the carburetor), closed the hood, got back in, and we were off. What a simple tool kit! Ever since then, taxis and taxistas have been a part of my life here in Bolivia.

Like the micros, almost all the taxis get by with "air cooling" instead of air-conditioning—you just roll the windows down. But lately I have been seeing and riding in more and more nice, new taxis, with A-C making things a lot more comfortable. In the heat of the night, not long ago, I was way out past the Seventh Ring and was lucky enough to flag one of these down for a very nice ride. Taxi drivers often, but not always, use seatbelts themselves, but seldom provide them for the cramped, difficult to enter and exit back seats. If you want to wear a seatbelt, your best bet is to "ride shotgun" up in the front, and lose that feeling of having your own personal limo chauffeur, with you in the back seat.

Many taxis have been converted, locally, to run on LP gas, using the same kind of tank that Americans use for their barbeque grills. It can be a little scary looking behind you in the hatchback and seeing one of these home-grown "conversions" right behind where you're sitting. You wish you were at least in one of the sedans, which might give you a fighting chance if the tank exploded in the trunk instead of in the passenger compartment. Well...that still doesn't sound too good does it? You never know for sure whether you're in a practical vehicle (natural gas is cheap and clean, and Bolivia has plenty) or a good-sized bomb. But actually I exaggerate a little, and have not heard or read of any vehicle explosions from these conversions.

The mechanics here are masterful at maintaining these vehicles, seemingly keeping them going forever in a country of roads so bad that there are auto spring and tire repair shops everywhere. I don't think I've ever seen more than a few places that repair springs in the U.S. in my life. The many unpaved roads and streets are often full of mud or covered with bricks and concrete chunks from some demolished wall or building. This is why 4WD is so nice to have here, but these taxis get by without it and go everywhere, with the apparent price being frequent spring and tire repairs.

If you're worried about security, call a "radio movil" taxi, get the name and ID number of the taxista, write it down or have a third party look at it and write it down before you take off in the taxi. Foolproof! Though most of the older taxis lack seatbelts, especially in the back seat (and no one in Bolivia seems to use them), many of the movil taxi companies have the newer models with seatbelts. If you have to lug a baby around, this is the way you want to go in order to be able to strap in your baby's car seat.

Santa Cruz (Cruceño) taxi drivers really know their way around and are normally very courteous, efficient, and masterful, if often impatient. They do a great job, especially considering how wild and unsafe the streets can be, and considering that anyone who pulls out in front of you—even immediately and suddenly in front of you—has the right of way. In all the micro and taxi rides I've taken, I've never been in an accident. (But I'm knocking on my desk as I say this.)

Taxis also carry a vast amount of the commerce of the city, things like groceries, medicine, wine—whatever you might want—and often have roof racks for carrying furniture and larger items. When I bought the huge table that serves as my desk where I'm writing this, I brought it home on top of a taxi. It is said that you can ask a taxi driver to bring you anything. With a word or a phone call, they can get it for you and deliver it—groceries, liquor, dinner, your kid from school, a suddenly needed prescription at 4:00 am, maybe a prostitute, if you are so inclined. (I'm told some drivers carry picture books to select from, though, frankly, given the generous, sweet nature of mujeres Latinas, I find that hard to believe.)

Two of the best taxi companies are Radio Movil El Toucan (3-333-3222) and Radio Movil Vallegrande (3-352-6162). Two taxistas who have lived in the States and speak pretty good English are Carlos Boral (7-004-5666), who lived in Rhode Island for 15 years, and Omar Miranda (7-009-3250), who lived in Indiana for five years. Both are very good guys.

Limos: what can I say? They have them here too. I'm almost as philosophically opposed to limos as I am to golf (no offense intended to all you golfers) or bottled water, but they do provide a comfortable ride. And if you like or need to drink (not bottled water) while you're getting somewhere, limos are hard to beat.

YOUR OWN CAR OR OTHER VEHICLE (0 Stars!)

First of all, are you sure, I mean completely and positively certain, that you want or need to be driving your own vehicle in some of the worst, craziest traffic you will ever see? If you answer "yes" to that question, you might want to think about seeing a doctor to find out what's wrong with you. Just kidding, but not by much!

I'm not opposed to cars, at least in the U.S., where there are normally no alternatives, at least at the present time. Since soon after my sixteenth birthday, I have driven my own car, and I have driven all over Bolivia and many other parts in the world in rental cars. I have driven down Bolivia's "most dangerous road in the world", the old "death road", and loved it, but I don't drive in Santa Cruz and don't wish to.

To me, the only time it makes sense to own a vehicle in Bolivia is if you live out in the country, have a farm (la quinta) in another town or outside of town, or if you have a business. Maybe you need to come into the city, but, when you think about it, you don't really need to come all the way into the city. You could park on the outskirts and, similar to airport parking, use a taxi or micro as your shuttle bus service. The Mennonites, of which we have many here in Bolivia, live on farms way out of town, yet manage to live well without automobiles, as do I, living in the city. Do you need a vehicle for a business, and there are no other workable alternatives like taxis, couriers, hauling companies, or relocating your business to near where you live or visa-versa? Maybe your own car, truck, or SUV is in order. If you have small children and believe they are safer in your car than in micros or taxis, or if you have many small children who must be constantly shuttled around, by all means, buy a car. I don't see any other excuses for owning one.

And, mothers! Do you really think your baby is safer in your car if it's hit by a fully loaded micro than it would be riding in the micro? I'm not completely convinced. Do you really think you should risk your baby's life in Santa Cruz traffic any more than necessary, anyway? The trips that are truly necessary can be handled by a professional driver in a radio movil taxi that happens to have seatbelts in the back for a car seat.

And women here will do anything for their children—die, no problem. They spoil their kids to death. Maybe that's what makes them such impatient, inconsiderate babies when they grow up and become drivers. But what mothers apparently will not do for their children is force those in charge to construct a society that is fair and safe for children. For some reason, mothers (and fathers) are blind to this possibility, so it has not happened in all these centuries. Transportation here is not really safe for children, maybe not for anyone.

You might say, "Ah, but what about the freedom bestowed by having your own vehicle at your beck and command?" But what freedom is there in being stuck in traffic all the time? Any freedom people might think is gained by owning a car is deception. A car is more convenient, you say? How "convenient" are the ubiquitous traffic jams, parking, insurance, gas, oil changes, car washes, accidents, repairs, even spring repairs, flat tires, getting your car stolen or, worse, car-jacked with you in it? I just jump in a taxi or micro and go!

I believe that most people who own cars or SUV's in Santa Cruz do so for the feeling of "being somebody", or of "having arrived", or to impress people. But those feelings are deceptive too. You will actually arrive sooner if you save your money instead of wasting it on what is, essentially, a non-essential luxury.

The following are some of the things I think a person should consider very seriously before deciding to buy and drive any kind of vehicle in Santa Cruz.

Rules of the Road

I wrote "rules" above, but I only actually know of one—other than, "Honk your horn and try to intimidate everyone else on the road as much as possible." That "rule" is this: If you can get any tiny part of your vehicle in front of another, you have the right-of-way. If that other car hits yours, well, the results prove that you were in that region of space first. It's sort of an extension of the rule in the U.S. that if someone hits you from behind, the accident must be their fault, because they should have been prudent and observant enough to have been able to stop in time. When two vehicles hit "head-on", as two flotas recently did south of the city, killing ten people, I guess it's the fault of both drivers. I bet the police hate to come out of their cozy station to investigate one of those.

Actually, what I call the "bumper first" or "bumper in front" rule works pretty well here. It makes lane changing a little bit easier, if you are the vehicle doing the changing. Another wild activity that this rule makes possible is turning left from an extreme right hand lane. Try that in the U.S.! If you enjoy rudely darting out in front of other vehicles (even big, lumbering micros), somehow blindly trusting that they will see you and be able to stop, then this kind of driving is for you. Accident investigation is made much simpler for the police and insurance companies because they don't have to confuse themselves with other issues. The proof of what happened is in the damage. They don't have to analyze or even think about any other evidence.

But "bumper in front" makes for very difficult driving, because you never know when another vehicle is going to aggressively finagle his bumper in front of yours, necessitating a suddenly swerve or stop on your part. You might be blasting down a deserted street, thinking you have the right-of-way because the side streets have, or should have, stop signs. But if another vehicle can beat you to any of the space ahead of you, you had better be able to stop. Another big problem is that this rule seems to aggravate the use of horns and produces a lot of ticked-off drivers. It creates rudeness and anger because everyone is always trying to push in front of everyone else.

As for other "rules", I honestly don't know of any actual, official speed limit in Santa Cruz, probably because it's almost impossible to go very fast. So, most accidents tend to be pretty low speed affairs. On the highways outside the city, though, it's a different story, and multiple fatality accidents are all too common, as in the U.S.

Only a little more than half the 400,000 vehicles in the city are legally licensed. That's how ineffective the law is here. The vast majority of the unlicensed vehicles are private automobiles, SUV's, and pick-ups.

Traffic

I am duty-bound to report that traffic has become truly horrendous much of the time, especially during the rush hours or when it rains. Traffic within the First Ring and on major streets leading into the First Ring is a total nightmare all the time. The Second Ring is a mess half the time—all day and into the night, except on Sundays and holidays. Just when you want to go somewhere, you will find that everyone else in the city wants to go there too. It's such a communal feeling! There are just too many vehicles for the available infrastructure. The streets in the inner city are old and narrow, and the roads are often in poor repair. Since there is almost no enforcement of the law, such as parking laws, vehicles park illegally, blocking streets which are already narrow. Vendors use the streets to set up shop. Recently a large section of the Ramada market burned to the ground. The fire trucks couldn't get to the fire because the streets were full of illegal vendor tents and carts.

If you know the city well, like the taxistas do, you can find your way around some of the problem areas. The micro routes are well thought-out and micros are able to intimidate their way along them. Ask yourself this, where does that leave all the private vehicles? I'll give you a hint: stuck in traffic!

Parking

Parking is a big problem. So is getting to and from your parked car. There you are, walking instead of riding in a micro or taxi, being free of the whole parking problem and, sometimes, cost. Micros take you near where you're going and taxis take you right to the door. Your car takes you from one distant parking spot to another distant parking spot, leaving the rest of the trip up to your feet, with no other option, even if it's raining lizards and salamanders.

There are no parking buildings to speak of and very few parking lots. Downtown, where streets are narrow and traffic at its worst, parking is allowed on far too many streets. Parking laws are not enforced, so people commonly park in the traffic lanes when they can't find anywhere else. Streets that could be three or four lanes wide are reduced to one lane much of the time.

Now, I read in the newspaper that they're going to ruin downtown even further by putting parking meters into a big chunk of the central city. I'm afraid the money or promise of money from the parking will provide enough corruption that other ideas won't get a fair hearing. And how is it that these new meters are not going to be vandalized and burglarized, when there is no one to guard them?

The parking problems create some unusual opportunities, though. There's a little side street called Calle Canada Strongest, named after a soccer team, I believe, that runs off Av. Monseñor Rivero, one of the most important, busiest parkways in the city, and where many of the best restaurants and coffee shops are located. When the city needs room for gatherings of, say, a million people, they close down Monseñor Rivero near where it runs into the giant El Cristo statue on the Second Ring. On this busy little side street, with its precious, free parking places, a man, Jaime, has set up his little business, which requires nothing but himself. He spends his afternoons and evenings, helping people parallel park, then keeps a watchful eye on the parked cars along his little one block territory. He also has an arrangement with one of the businesses to buy buckets of water, so he can also wash your car for you while it's parked there, for about fifty cents. This money and his tips provide a living for himself and his family with three children. On Saturdays, his two young sons often help out.

Santa Cruz Drivers (Oh my!)

Unfortunately, not every driver in Santa Cruz attended the Indianapolis (believe it or not) Driving School, just down the street from me. Often, drivers, especially women drivers, for some reason, are talking on their cell phones, the same as everywhere else in the world. The professional drivers of taxis and micros almost never use cell phones while driving.

Driving, in general, is very difficult here. I don't enjoy doing it, myself. You can't expect niceties such as lane markings (even if there are many lanes), street signs, one-way street signs, stop signs, or stop lights, though there are many more of each than when I first came to Santa Cruz. Many of the signs that are in place are pretty much ignored, but people do generally obey traffic lights now. When they were newer, they were largely ignored too. Now, finally, with so much more traffic, I guess people have started seeing them as essential, so improvement is possible. Some of the newer lights at major intersections have large, color-changing count-down displays to tell you how many more seconds are left in a red or green light. I don't think I've ever seen any of those in the U.S., but they are a very good idea.

Similar to the New England countryside, there are many traffic circles at intersections in Santa Cruz, but, here, these circles are in the city and often have several lanes leading in from each direction. Often, without lights or signs, these circles are breeding grounds for accidents. The good news is that what I believe to be the first limited access intersection (called an "overpass" here) in the country is nearing completion where the Fourth Ring intersects one of the main arterial spokes on the north side of town. More are in the works, but it will be a while before they help the driving situation very much.

As I mentioned in the walking section, I'm very sad to have to report that there's almost no such thing as courtesy on the streets of Santa Cruz, though maybe I'm starting to see little inklings of it starting to grow, but I could be wrong. You do see a little patience sometimes, but not much. You'd better not go to sleep when a light changes to green, or hold-up anyone behind you, not for a microsecond, even if you are a micro or taxi picking-up or discharging passengers. The vehicles behind you, even other micros and taxis, will give you a serious tongue lashing with their horns. And many vehicles in Santa Cruz have two or more horns—one to punish those New York minute delays and one friendly one, often a loud whistle, many times the two-note "wolf whistle", the first note rising, the second falling. But you won't get the whistle if you try to sleep through a green light. I just don't know what happens to that popular local philosophy of tranquilo when Bolivians get behind the wheel and turn into Incredible Hulks.

There is very little effort to halt drunk driving in Bolivia. People here never worry about getting arrested for a traffic offense, only about getting into an accident or having to pay a bribe. If you have an accident that is your fault and you are legally drunk, your insurance will pay nothing. But if you get drunk and kill someone, you are sort of excused because drunk people in Latin America, unlike in the U.S., are not held to the same level of accountability as people who are sober. I don't know if this is right or wrong, but I say, if you're determined to do something wrong in Bolivia, get drunk first!

Noise

Another problem with all the private cars is the noise pollution. The horns are bad enough, but in addition, many cars have the multiple-phase siren alarms installed. The cycles of these useless noise makers can be set off by the wind or a passing micro or motorcycle. Do these car owners really believe that the noise gives them any security? There are so many, so often, that no one pays any attention. They're just a blight upon the urban soundscape! Sometimes it can make you feel like smashing a windshield (the alarm certainly isn't going to stop you), especially when one of these monsters keeps going off in front of your house, or a restaurant, where you're maybe trying to have a pleasant meal at a sidewalk table.

Cost

Of course, you can buy new, imported cars here...mainly Japanese, though the Koreans and Chinese are making strong pushes. Formerly, a lot of VW's from Brazil made their way here, but that no longer seems to be happening. Ford and Chevrolet barely put in an appearance. I probably see more Hummers than all other American brands put together. Bye, bye, Hummer! Many used cars, like most of the taxis and micros are shipped here from Japan, maybe even from elsewhere, but not the U.S.

Cars cost just as much or more here as they do in the U.S. Many of the vehicles you see in the streets are the brand new Hummers I mentioned, Land Rovers, Lexus's (Lexus? Lexuses? Lexi?), and Mercedes. One has to wonder where the money comes from for all these shiny new cars (and big new buildings being constructed all over town). One theory is, directly and/or indirectly, from cocaine. In case you aren't familiar with recent Bolivian history, the president of Bolivia, Evo Morales, is the uneducated former-head of the coca growers' union. The refined product of coca, cocaine, is still nominally illegal in Bolivia, but the growing of more and more coca is encouraged, to “help” the indigenous farmers. The coca is used by these peoples for chewing and tea. When Evo came to power, he kicked-out the U.S. Ambassador and the U.S. coca and cocaine eradication efforts and money. The result has been more money for more coca farmers, but also more traffic—in cocaine and on the streets.

Very little real wealth is created for Bolivians by the sale and use of these cars crowding our city. When a person here buys any car, even a used car, almost all of that money has already left Bolivia or is about to leave. When people use taxis or micros, almost all of that money remains in Bolivia, right here in town, in the hands of hard working people who need it.

And people in Bolivia really value their money. I mentioned previously that you will never find any in the streets. People here may tend to be poor, but, unlike in the States, they save money. The savings rate is very high, so banks and credit unions are extremely busy making fortunes for themselves, while people are crowded into lines. The government has recognized this and imposes a tax on all deposits and withdrawals. So why don't people realize that owning a car is not really, economically, a good thing to do?

For Cruceñas, owning a car or giant SUV (the favored vehicle here) is a practical paradox. It's expensive and unnecessary—a complete waste of money. People in Santa Cruz are usually very modest when it comes to other behaviors—their houses (often, fine ones are hidden behind shabby walls), their clothes (how ritzy are tight jeans and flip-flops?), etc. But the cars seem to me to be nothing more than rampant modernism and conspicuous consumption, a disease contracted probably from the mass media. What a shame!

When computing the cost of owning and driving vehicle, you have to remember that there are many different factors involved—the cost of the car itself, including depreciation, interest or interest/income lost because you have your money tied-up in the car, insurance (expensive here, as you can imagine), licensing of both the car and driver(s) (which may include the cost of driving school or learning-to-drive accidents), maintenance (oil changes, tires, springs, batteries, etc.) and repairs (do you really think you won't be involved in an accident or accidents?), gasoline, parking and security, car washes, potential damage due to vandalism (most cars you see are pretty dinged and scratched up, there must be a reason for that). Then, after paying for all this, you just might have your car stolen and taken to Paraguay, then sold for parts to be smuggled back into Bolivia and sold for repairs. Try getting insurance here after that happens to you.

Let's look at the math. For used cars, the calculations are difficult. The past history of any given used car in Bolivia can be very problematical. Is it stolen? Has it been wrecked? Was it driven to death in Bangladesh, then shipped here? How soon is it going to break down and need extensive repairs? You might get lucky, then again...

So let's use the example of a very inexpensive new car, just to eliminate some of the unknown costs. The other day, I passed by a Hyundai dealership. I don't remember the model being featured, but it was one of the smallest of the compacts. They were making a big deal out of the fact that your monthly payments (for five years) would only be $220. That breaks down to about $7.33 per day. Then there is gasoline, insurance, etc.—all the things I listed above. Well, I can take at least seven taxi rides every day of the month, just for the price of the car payment. Few of us need to do that much running around. If you do, there are always the micros to get even more bang for your buck. No one drives a car in Santa Cruz to save money, that's for sure.

And all these cars have a high cost to society too—deaths and injuries, huge expenses to build and maintain roads. The cars demand services—gas sucking drive-thru's at banks and restaurants, ugly repair shops covering huge sections of the city, tires, lead batteries, and junk cars that must be disposed of, giant gas stations all over the place. The list goes on and on.

When you want to go out of town, rental cars are inexpensive and plentiful for those trips. You can rent a nearly new 4WD mini-SUV for $40 to $60 per day, with 100 km. included. There's no need to own your own car for those occasional trips into the hinterlands. And, as I discussed in the “Taxi” section, fares to many distant locations are very economical. For others, you can take a bus, train, or fly, and still be money ahead of car ownership.

Security

Do you remember the rule for walking, “Don't look like you have anything.”? Well, a car breaks that rule, unnecessarily, to my mind. A car is something you have to defend—from being stolen, maybe with an ineffective alarm system that bothers everyone every time the wind blows, from being harmed maliciously, like at Carnaval, and from being destroyed in an accident. You might have to defend yourself inside your car, because you look like you might have something worth stealing, and you have to think about the security of your parking spots. You'll probably need to carry a credit card, ID, and more cash than with other modes of transportation, because you need gas, or you might need an emergency spring repair, or just because it's more convenient to carry in your big, luxurious SUV. Driving your own car also breaks the security rule of not carrying original documents. You'll need your original drivers' license, at least.

A Possible Solution to the Traffic Problems in Santa Cruz

Have I mentioned that everything in Bolivia is late and that there are many more holidays than in the U.S.? Well, it's true. Except for the supermarkets, hotels, and a few restaurants which have adopted American-style business practices, the stores open at 10:00 AM, close for lunch and a siesta from about noon to 2:00 or 3:00 PM, then remain open until 7:00 or 8:00 PM. Dinner is commonly at 7:30 or 8:30. Bars, discos, karaoke, and parties get started about 10:00 PM and often go all night. A wedding can last for three grueling days and the process of letting go of the deceased takes at least ten days. Sunday night is often all night partying/drinking night, rather than, or in addition to, Friday and Saturday. The birthdays of everyone in the large extended families must be celebrated with at least a small party, so the fiestas can seem endless.

The holidays, just to name a few, start with three weekdays for Carnaval, then there are about three independence days, today is Corpus Christi day, so that means a four day weekend. And it is on these holidays and Sundays that Santa Cruz traffic becomes reasonable. This is what the streets would be like if laws were enforced and some solution could be put into place to reduce the continual traffic jams that normally choke the city.

Everyone who lives here knows that the traffic problems are terrible. The very life of Santa Cruz is beginning to be crushed by the traffic. Drivers are frustrated, impatient, and rude. Useless burglar alarms saturate the city, destroying the peace whenever the wind blows. It often takes forever to get anywhere.

Santa Cruz is blessed with a richness of taxis and micros. We have a great public transportation infrastructure in place, but a poor roadway infrastructure. Why not take advantage of this situation? Why not provide the conditions to make public transportation grow, thrive, and improve? Why destroy it with all these cars, as has happened in the United States?

I've written about how Santa Cruz is a "ringed" city. Already, the First Ring is closed to traffic during Carnaval, and what a refreshing situation this is. Why not open up the narrow streets in the central city, not to more parking, but to more taxis and micros? Perhaps, in the future, there could be bicycle lanes and/or street cars. The possibilities are endless once you get rid of the awful traffic created by the private automobiles.

The rings make possible a great solution to all the traffic, parking, and transportation problems—simply forbid private automobiles, SUV's, etc., within the First Ring, Second Ring, Third Ring, or Fourth Ring. I don't really know how far out to impose the ban, but it could start with the First Ring, just to see what how it goes, then the plan could be expanded outward as deemed worthy. At the present time, traffic is not really functional within the First Ring anyway. Taxis, micros, commercial vehicles, and specially licensed vehicles would be permitted access to the zone(s) forbidden to private vehicles. Since public transportation doesn't accommodate the people very well who have babies in car seats, or people who are handicapped, they would be permitted to drive nearly anywhere, but would require special license plates, and parking on the streets would be strictly limited.

Other people who must drive would have to park their cars outside the forbidden zone(s) and take public transportation from there. Taxis and micros would thrive. Jobs would be created. The city would no longer be choking to death. Parking lots similar to airport parking could be created outside the forbidden zone(s). Pollution would be reduced. The $millions now needed and being spent on road and street improvements could instead be spent to improve our schools. Without all the traffic, there would be space for things like bicycle lanes, pedestrian walkways, even monorails and trolley cars. Peace and tranquility would be restored to our city.

Immediately, an organization should be started to give away free bumper stickers for taxis and micros:

¡NO CARROS EN DENTRO PRIMERO ANILLO!
(NO CARS INSIDE THE FIRST RING!)

¡SOLO VEHICULOS COMERCIALES EN DENTRO PRIMERO ANILLO!
(ONLY COMMERCIAL VEHICLES INSIDE THE FIRST RING!)

I say, especially in places where people have used their ingenuity to get by largely without automobiles in the hands of every man woman and child, we should discourage the sale and use of automobiles. I don't think that's prejudicial. Are all the peoples of the world entitled to make America's same mistakes or can they learn from them? Are Americans truly happy with their lives largely based on the automobile? Are we happy destroying the Earth and using up the last of the fuel, in the name of freedom, of pride, of ego? All of them hollow...

To close this section, let me give you an example from today, as I write this, of what life is like in Santa Cruz, and the transportation I used. I took two micros (less than 50 cents U.S., total) to get to the titanic Abasto produce/farmers market. I didn't have to fight for a parking place or experience any other of the problems or expenses of driving a car. I walked very little, and that was pleasant. I got my hair cut by the same guy, Alberto, who always does it ($1, plus I always tip him $1). Then I bought a big 50 pound bag of fresh oranges, right off the truck (less than $3), almost for sure organic, because insecticide is very expensive here. I got right into a taxi, which brought me home (about $2). I took the oranges into my kitchen immediately and, after a quick wash, started squeezing some with my electric juicer, then I drank a huge glass. Now that's fresh (and incredibly delicious)!

And I could have had my $100-a-month live-in maid do the whole thing in addition to her other daily tasks of cleaning the condo, doing the laundry, and cooking, but I choose not to have a maid. I'll write more about this subject too, in a future section. They have a saying here: "The maid is the happiness of the family." But that's what she is, another member of the family, and a member of the family who eats alone in the kitchen after the rest of the family has finished, who maybe lives in the tiniest room possible. In my condo and many houses I've seen, the maid's bedroom is smaller than some doghouses or playhouses I've seen in the U.S.—not much bigger than the smallest bed, with one little window, no air-conditioning or heat, next to the laundry room. If I need another family member, I'd rather just have a cat. Not that I mean to insult any maids or any people who have maids—more power to all of you. It's just that when I grew-up in Indiana, our mothers were the maids, so I'm just not used to having one.

FINDING THINGS (No Matter How You Get There)

In the following sections of this guide, I will present much more information about the Santa Cruz and Bolivian destinations you might find worth traveling to, and those you might not—the sights, museums, nightlife, restaurants, pensiones, hotels, motels, hostels, alojamientos, residenciales, and unique destinations. But I would like to provide a very brief introduction to that subject here.

Finding things in Santa Cruz is no simple task unless you know the city very well. Yellow pages, which many of us depend on in the U.S. are not much help. The land-line world of the city is split into two rivals, Entel and Cotas, each with about half of the total yellow pages, and most businesses just don't find it cost effective, I guess, to pay for a listing. The world-wide trend toward cell phones and away from wired phones is more advanced here than in the U.S., so even businesses, more and more, use only cell phones. Listings in something called a telephone book are rapidly becoming obsolete.

The internet has rushed in to help, but Santa Cruz is still a world of very small businesses. They have no web presence and there are no online directories to help find all these little enterprises. Even many of the largest businesses, hotels, and restaurants have very minimal websites, perhaps simply listing their phone number. But if you don't already know about a place, you won't easily find it on the internet.

Many of the larger stores and restaurants have very amateurish television infomercials. Usually, some television "host" or newscaster is featured. There may be one or more of the local models involved, especially if the commercial is for a clothing store. The store owners are interviewed. The television "personality" gushes on and on about how great everything is, as the camera pans the shelves of various items sold. These are OK as far as they go, but you would have to watch a lot of boring infomercials to learn much about where to buy the items you want to buy.

One of the great helps is the way businesses are sort of geographically organized in Santa Cruz. The chola markets provide a good start. Los Posos, within the First Ring, has many gold and jewelry shops and kiosks. A lot of veterinarians are located there, for some reason. They also sell a lot of clothes and there is a whole army of tailors ready to do your bidding. The Siete Calles market is also located near the heart of the city. Clothing and shoes are probably its specialty. The Ramada market has many hardware and inexpensive furniture stores. I have already mentioned the Abasto market, which is like the world's largest farmers market. The Nueva Feria is a titanic market, selling anything you can imagine, but is only open on Wednesdays and Saturdays. All the markets sell fruit and vegetables, clothes, sunglasses, CD's, electronics, cleaning supplies, plastic-ware, etc.

But the organizing of things sold does not end with the markets. Where things are sold, there is often a concentration of similar competitors. This is a great aid to shoppers. There is a street with almost nothing but furniture stores, another with appliances, another with party goods, another with costumes. Hardware, auto parts, barbeque grills, paint, lumber, bricks, clothes, books (conveniently located near the universities), electronics, printing, photographers, and lawyers are also similarly concentrated in one or more areas of the city. Many computer stores are in one large building. The same can be said for CD, DVD, and cell phone stores. Many of the universities are in one area, many of the hospitals are in another. In La Paz, there is a street of "witches". In Santa Cruz, there is even an area, Los Tantacatos, where their specialty is merchandise that has been stolen. Restaurants and hotels can be found all over the city, not in any special area.

None of these things are really advertised. You have to know the city. You have to ask. If you ride the micros around, like I do, you'll see things. Carry a map, paper and pen at all times. Gradually, you will learn where things are. Just don't expect to find things like malls or Wal-Marts where everything is in one place, all nicely organized for you. But, hey, you don't really want the world to be all the same everywhere, do you?

Come and visit me sometime!

©2010, 2012 Steven W. Baker, all rights reserved

20100409-01	14:58	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 9: "Future Pope Stalled Pedophile Case"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Still more evidence. Still more cover-up. Obviously, the "Church" doesn't give a "Rat's A*s-inger" about our children. Oh, except as sex toys for the priesthood!

"Future Pope Stalled Pedophile Case" by Gillian Flaccus, AP

Apr. 9, 2010, (http://abclocal.go.com/wpvi/story?section=news/national_world&id=7377773)

(LOS ANGELES) The future Pope Benedict XVI resisted pleas to defrock a California priest with a record of sexually molesting children, citing concerns including "the good of the universal church," according to a 1985 letter bearing his signature.

The correspondence, obtained by The Associated Press, is the strongest challenge yet to the Vatican's insistence that Benedict played no role in blocking the removal of pedophile priests during his years as head of the Catholic Church's doctrinal watchdog office.

The letter, signed by then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, was typed in Latin and is part of years of correspondence between the Diocese of Oakland and the Vatican about the proposed defrocking of the Rev. Stephen Kiesle.

The Vatican refused to comment on the contents of the letter Friday, but a spokesman confirmed it bore Ratzinger's signature.

"The press office doesn't believe it is necessary to respond to every single document taken out of context regarding particular legal situations," the Rev. Federico Lombardi said. "It is not strange that there are single documents which have Cardinal Ratzinger's signature."

The diocese recommended removing Kiesle (KEEZ'-lee) from the priesthood in 1981, the year Ratzinger was appointed to head the Vatican office which shared responsibility for disciplining abusive priests.

The case then languished for four years at the Vatican before Ratzinger finally wrote to Oakland Bishop John Cummins. It was two more years before Kiesle was removed.

In the November 1985 letter, Ratzinger says the arguments for removing Kiesle are of "grave significance" but added that such actions required very careful review and more time. He also urged the bishop to provide Kiesle with "as much paternal care as possible" while awaiting the decision, according to a translation for AP by Professor Thomas Habinek, chairman of the University of Southern California Classics Department.

But the future pope also noted that any decision to defrock Kiesle must take into account the "good of the universal church" and the "detriment that granting the dispensation can provoke within the community of Christ's faithful, particularly considering the young age." Kiesle was 38 at the time.

Kiesle had been sentenced in 1978 to three years' probation after pleading no contest to misdemeanor charges of lewd conduct for tying up and molesting two young boys in a San Francisco Bay area church rectory.

As his probation ended in 1981, Kiesle asked to leave the priesthood and the diocese submitted papers to Rome to defrock him.

In his earliest letter to Ratzinger, Cummins warned that returning Kiesle to ministry would cause more of a scandal than stripping him of his priestly powers.

"It is my conviction that there would be no scandal if this petition were granted and that as a matter of fact, given the nature of the case, there might be greater scandal to the community if Father Kiesle were allowed to return to the active ministry," Cummins wrote in 1982.

While papers obtained by the AP include only one letter with Ratzinger's signature, correspondence and internal memos from the diocese refer to a letter dated Nov. 17, 1981, from the then-cardinal to the bishop. Ratzinger was appointed to head the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith a week later.

California church officials wrote to Ratzinger at least three times to check on the status of Kiesle's case. At one point, a Vatican official wrote to say the file may have been lost and suggested resubmitting materials.

Diocese officials considered writing Ratzinger again after they received his 1985 response to impress upon him that leaving Kiesle in the ministry would harm the church, Rev. George Mockel wrote in a memo to the Oakland bishop.

"My own reading of this letter is that basically they are going to sit on it until Steve gets quite a bit older," the memo said. "Despite his young age, the particular and unique circumstances of this case would seem to make it a greater scandal if he were not laicized."

Irwin Zalkin, an attorney representing some of the victims, said he was familiar with the correspondence but wouldn't provide documents to AP.

"Cardinal Ratzinger was more concerned about the avoidance of scandal than he was about protecting children," Zalkin said in a phone interview. "That was a central theme."

As Kiesle's fate was being weighed in Rome, the priest returned to suburban Pinole to volunteer as a youth minister at St. Joseph Church, where he had served as associate pastor from 1972 to 1975.

Kiesle was ultimately stripped of his priestly powers in 1987, though the documents do not indicate when, how or why. They also don't indicate what role — if any — Ratzinger had in the decision.

Kiesle continued to volunteer with children, according to Maurine Behrend, who worked in the Oakland diocese's youth ministry office in the 1980s. After learning of his history, Behrend complained to church officials. When nothing was done she wrote a letter, which she showed to the AP.

"Obviously nothing has been done after EIGHT months of repeated notifications," she wrote. "How are we supposed to have confidence in the system when nothing is done? A simple phone call to the pastor from the bishop is all it would take."

She eventually confronted Cummins at a confirmation and Kiesle was gone a short time later, Behrend said.

Kiesle was arrested and charged in 2002 with 13 counts of child molestation from the 1970s. All but two were thrown out after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutional a California law extending the statute of limitations.

He pleaded no contest in 2004 to a felony for molesting a young girl in his Truckee home in 1995 and was sentenced to six years in state prison.

Kiesle, now 63 and a registered sex offender, lives in a Walnut Creek gated community, according to his address listed on the Megan's Law sex registry. An AP reporter was turned away when attempting to reach him for comment.

William Gagen, an attorney who represented Kiesle in 2002, did not return a call for comment.

More than a half-dozen victims reached a settlement in 2005 with the Oakland diocese alleging Kiesle had molested them as young children.

"He admitted molesting many children and bragged that he was the Pied Piper and said he tried to molest every child that sat on his lap," said Lewis VanBlois, an attorney for six Kiesle victims who interviewed the former priest in prison. "When asked how many children he had molested over the years, he said 'tons.'"

Cummins, the now-retired bishop, told the AP during an interview at his Oakland home that he "didn't really care for" Kiesle, but he didn't recall writing to Ratzinger concerning the case.

"I wish I did write to Cardinal Ratzinger. I don't think I was that smart," Cummins, now 82, told AP.

Documents obtained by the AP last week revealed similar instances of Vatican stalling in cases involving two Arizona clergy.

In one case, the future pope took over the abuse case of the Rev. Michael Teta of Tucson, Ariz., then let it languish at the Vatican for years despite repeated pleas from the bishop for the man to be removed from the priesthood.

In the second, the bishop called Msgr. Robert Trupia a "major risk factor" in a letter to Ratzinger. There is no indication in those files that Ratzinger responded.

The Vatican has called the accusations "absolutely groundless" and said the facts were being misrepresented.

20100409-02 16:58 Charis Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 9

Dear SteveB,

Really interesting stuff Steve. I would just say though, that when you say "church" it implies all Christian churches and since this is about the Catholic Church I think it would be better to state that because not all churches have this problem and it isn't fair to those that don't. I'm Lutheran and I know that even in the Lutheran church things like this happen, but you know I'm just saying ... so that people don't generalize and criminalize all churches know what I mean?

20100410-01 18:58 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 9

Dear Charis,

Good point. But in the States, the Church (capitalized) refers to the Catholic church. I use the quotes to indicate, I guess, that I'm being somewhat sarcastic or satirical or satyrical.

Hey, I'm a Lutheran too! Missouri Synod...but fallen (haha)...and I don't think anything like this goes on in the Lutheran church...not the celibacy...not wide-spread child abuse...not the organized cover-up...not the $billions in restitution on the backs of the poor.

This is what my dear cousin, Larry, who is a Quaker minister, had to say on the subject:

I totally agree, SteveB. Covering up wouldn't work in my own protestant denomination (Quakers) because I would personally call the police a moment after I knew some kid had been molested by any man no matter who the guy was. We have no secret society we need to protect. And we want no secret society to protect us. Every protestant believes as his heart directs and that is a freedom we would never surrender.

20100412-01 15:00 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 10: "Vatican to Bishops: Follow Law, Report Sex

The conspiracy continues! One might wonder why this tiny gesture wasn't done after the first cases surfaced a long time ago. This directive is actually an admission that, at least up to the present moment, the "Church" has been complicit in the illegal cover-up of these heinous crimes. I say the guilty b*stards should be prosecuted!

"Vatican to Bishops: Follow Law, Report Sex Abuse" by Nicole Winfield, AP

Apr. 12, 2010, (<http://www.newsday.com/news/world/vatican-to-bishops-follow-law-report-sex-abuse-1.1858057>)

(VATICAN CITY) The Vatican on Monday made clear for the first time that bishops and other church officials should report clerical sex abuse to police if required by law. But the policy failed to satisfy victims who charge that the church deliberately hid abuse for decades.

Victims, government inquiries and grand juries have all charged that the Catholic Church created what amounted to a conspiracy to cover up abuse by keeping allegations that priests raped and molested children secret and not reporting them to civil authorities.

The Vatican has insisted that it has long been the Catholic Church's policy for bishops, like all Christians, to obey civil reporting laws. In a new guide for lay readers posted on its Web site, the Vatican explicitly spells out such a policy.

"Civil law concerning reporting of crimes to the appropriate authorities should always be followed," the Vatican guidelines said.

That phrase was not included in a draft of the guidelines obtained Friday by The Associated Press. The rest of the guidelines follow previously known and public procedures for handling canonical investigations and trials of priests suspected of abuse.

The Vatican offered no explanation for the addition.

Victims were not impressed.

"Let's keep this in perspective: it's one sentence and it's virtually nothing unless and until we see tangible signs that bishops are responding," said Joelle Casteix, western regional director for SNAP, the Survivors Network for Those Abused by Priests, the main victims' group in the U.S. "One sentence can't immediately reverse centuries of self-serving secrecy."

She said if the Vatican truly wanted to change course "it would be far more effective to fire or demote bishops who have clearly endangered kids and enabled abuse and hid crimes, than to add one sentence to a policy that is rarely followed with consistency."

None of the core public Vatican documents to be applied in cases of abuse direct bishops to report cases to police. Nor does canon law make such an explicit requirement.

Jeffrey Lena, the Vatican's U.S. lawyer, said a 1965 document from the Second Vatican Council, Gaudium et Spes, contained an implicit understanding of the need to follow civil laws that are just.

The vague citation, however, is not nearly as explicit as what is contained in the lay guide.

"It's beyond dispute that the canon law does not mandate non-reporting," Lena said. "These guidelines may help clarify that point for people who are less familiar with canon law."

"The statement confirms what has been long known, that where the civil state creates an obligation to report, bishops like anyone else are required to examine the law and determine what they have to do to obey it," Lena told the AP.

In 2002, after the clerical abuse scandal erupted in the United States, American bishops enacted reforms, which the Vatican made church law for the U.S., that do not specifically order all bishops to notify civil authorities of new claims. Instead, the U.S. policy instructs bishops to comply with state laws for reporting abuse, and to cooperate with authorities. All U.S. dioceses were also instructed to advise victims of their right to contact authorities themselves.

The Rev. Davide Cito, a canon lawyer at Rome's Santa Croce University, called the publication of the universal church policy in the lay guidelines "an important development."

"I'm very pleased," he said. "A Christian also has to follow civil laws. It's a Christian duty."

A Vatican spokesman, the Rev. Ciro Benedettini, said the reporting requirement had been the internal policy of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith since 2003. The Vatican in 2001 shifted its policy on dealing with abuse cases, ordering bishops around the world to refer all cases to the Congregation, which then decides how to proceed. Previously, diocese themselves dealt with most of the cases on their own.

Asked how bishops were supposed to know of this internal policy on reporting to police, Benedettini declined to comment.

Pope Benedict XVI had told Irish bishops last month that they should cooperate with civil authorities in investigating abuse. But the guidelines mark the first time that such procedures for the church at large, in which bishops are explicitly told they should follow civil reporting laws, have been laid out publicly.

20100412-02	16:20	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 11: "Vatican Makes Peace with Beatles after 40 Years"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

OK, the Church has finally caught up to 40-some years ago. Does this mean they'll be OK with rap, hip-hop, and reggaeton 40 years from now? Are they trying to tell us how "hip" they are, now that "hip" is "square", to twist the words of my friend and neighbor, Huey Lewis? LOL! Ain't forgiveness grand?

Does this mean bra-less is OK? Women's lib? Pre-marital sex? Ya, I know, don't get carried away, Steve. This just all seems like such a joke to me, considering the seriousness of the trouble the Church is in at this exact moment. Dan Brown, anyone?

"Vatican Makes Peace with Beatles after 40 Years" by Alessandra Rizzo, AP

Apr. 12, 2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2010/04/12/vatican-makes-peace-with- n_533976.html)

(VATICAN CITY) The Vatican has finally made peace with the Beatles, saying their drug use, "dissolute" lives and even the claim that the band was bigger than Jesus are all in the past — while their music lives on.

Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano paid tribute to the Fab Four in its weekend editions, with two articles and a front-page cartoon reproducing the crosswalk immortalized on the cover of the band's album "Abbey Road."

The tribute marked the 40th anniversary of the band's breakup.

"It's true, they took drugs; swept up by their success, they lived dissolute and uninhibited lives," said the paper. "They even said they were more famous than Jesus," it said, recalling John Lennon's 1966 comment that outraged many Catholics and others.

"But, listening to their songs, all of this seems distant and meaningless," L'Osservatore said. "Their beautiful melodies, which changed forever pop music and still give us emotions, live on like precious jewels."

It is not the first time the Vatican has praised the legendary band from Liverpool.

Two years ago, Vatican media hailed the Beatles' musical legacy on the 40th anniversary of the "White Album." And last month the Vatican paper included "Revolver" in its semiserious list of top-10 albums.

Now, L'Osservatore says that the Beatles' songs have stood the test of time, and that the band remains "the longest-lasting, most consistent and representative phenomenon in the history of pop music."

Giovanni Maria Vian, the editor in chief of L'Osservatore Romano, said Monday that he loves the Beatles.

He said that at the time of Lennon's sensational statement, Osservatore "commented that in reality it wasn't that scandalous, because the fascination with Jesus was so great that it attracted these new heroes of the time."

20100413-01	08:58	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 12: "European Abuse Hot Lines Log Jump in Calls"
-------------	-------	--------	---

The tip of the iceberg...finally revealed through the fog of intimidation, ridicule, deception, lies, and cover-up:

"European Abuse Hot Lines Log Jump in Calls" by Melissa Eddy and Veronika Oleksyn, AP

Apr. 13, 2010,

(http://www.boston.com/news/world/europe/articles/2010/04/13/european_abuse_hot_lines_log_jump_in_calls/)

(VIENNA) Telephone hot lines in Europe offering help to people claiming abuse by Roman Catholic priests are being deluged with calls as the crisis spreads — with one center reporting complaints jumping from about 10 cases a year to more than a thousand in the past few weeks.

Experts say the record influx of calls reflects an increasing realization among victims that they are not alone and that they will not be scorned for breaking their silence about horrors that in many cases go back decades.

"Until now, many people were afraid they wouldn't be respected," said Max Friedrich, a prominent Austrian psychiatrist. "There's also a certain comfort knowing you're not the only one to have experienced such abuse."

In the Netherlands, the Help and Law line was set up in 1995 and generally dealt with roughly 10 reports of abuse per year. Since March it has received some 1,300 new reports, said Pieter Kohnen, spokesman for the Dutch Bishops' Conference, which runs the line.

As with similar help lines, not every complaint turns into an actual case — meaning the caller is assigned a legal adviser to guide him or her through the process.

Still, Help and Law is now dealing with nearly 50 cases, compared with 10 to 14 for most years, and the number is likely to rise further as the center plows through a backlog of complaints, according to spokesman Ben Spekman.

"We have started more cases in the last month than in the previous three years combined," Spekman said. "It is a significant increase."

Spekman said the hot line is also attracting people who feel compelled to give their reaction to reports of abuse. Some other callers report abuse that happened to a deceased loved one. In neither case would such calls lead to a formal complaint procedure.

Germany's bishops conference, which launched its hot line on March 30, reported this week that 2,700 people have called it in its first three days, while an older number in Germany run by a pro-reform group, We Are Church, said calls have jumped dramatically.

"In the past eight years we received about 300 calls total; in the past four to five weeks alone, we have gotten 100 calls," said Annegret Laakmann, a spokeswoman for We are Church.

In general, the hot lines offer an initial open ear to victims. Laakmann said that in Germany every complaint is believed without question. In some cases, the hot lines offer a chance to speak to a psychologist, or help finding one. In cases where legal avenues can be pursued, they counsel victims in how to approach authorities.

In Austria, if the perpetrators are still alive, they are tracked down and confronted with the allegations, according to an Austrian Web site that provides an overview of the country's church abuse complaint centers. In concrete cases, a perpetrator's supervisor in the church is informed and the person is suspended until the matter is cleared up, it said.

Austria has nine church-run offices that allow victims to report abuse — one for each diocese. The first was set up in Vienna in 1996 as a result of the sex scandal surrounding then Cardinal Hans Hermann Groer. In the first three months of this year, the offices recorded 566 calls or e-mails.

According to the Vienna hot line, 174 contacts were made between January and the end of March — compared to 17 in all of 2009. Of those, eight turned out to be concrete cases after experts held intensive conversations with alleged victims, said Erich Leitenberger, spokesman of the Vienna Archdiocese.

Hans Tauscher, who runs the complaint center for the Innsbruck diocese, said he has recently been working eight hours a day taking calls, answering e-mails and meeting with victims. He says it's tough to generalize on how much time he spends with each person, saying some take up to 45 minutes to describe what they went through. Others just take minutes.

"I go with whatever they want — the conversations are very unstructured," Tauscher said.

Christiane Sauer, a psychotherapist who heads the hot line in the Linz diocese, said people often tell her how relieved they feel after opening up to her, sometimes after decades of silence.

"They become calmer by talking about what happened," said Sauer, who encourages victims to also notify police or prosecutors — even if the abuse took place many years ago.

Some claim it is ludicrous to expect victims to contact church-sponsored hot lines since they are sometimes run by clergy and represent an institution that covered up or ignored cases in the past.

Critics include a newly created Austrian victims' group that calls itself the Platform Of Those Affected By Church Violence. It set up its own hot line on March 23 and has logged some 203 contacts since then.

Hans Peter Hurka of the Austrian branch of We are Church said most of the church-run centers were "fig leaves" until now, hiding the problem rather than exposing it.

In a sign the church may be taking this criticism to heart, Cardinal Christoph Schoenborn recently appointed a former regional governor, Waltraud Klasnic, to ensure that all abuse allegations are investigated. She has also set up her own abuse hot line.

In the Netherlands, Spekman disputed the argument that the system cannot be trusted because it is not independent.

"In our view its independence is guaranteed," Spekman said. "If somebody does not agree they can always go to civil courts."

20100413-02	20:26	Marci	The "Church"—Chpt. 13: "The Pope Should Stand Trial"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

Dear Steve,

The Vatican laughs at the idea that the Pope could be arrested in Great Britain.....

I told you. The Pope can be judged under the criminal law of the places where the crimes were committed. It would be great if they did arrest this evil person.

"The Pope Should Stand Trial" by Richard Dawkins, The Guardian (U.K.)

Apr. 13, 2010, (<http://www.guardian.co.uk/commentisfree/belief/2010/apr/13/pope-prosecution-dawkins>)

Sexual abuse of children is not unique to the Roman Catholic church, and Joseph Ratzinger is not one of those priests who raped altar boys while in a position of dominance and trust. But as so often it is the subsequent cover-ups, even more than the original crimes, that do most to discredit an institution, and here the pope is in real trouble.

Pope Benedict XVI is the head of the institution as a whole, but we can't blame the present head for what was done before his watch. Except that in his particular case, as archbishop of Munich and as Cardinal Ratzinger, head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (what used to be called the Inquisition), the very least you can say is that there is a case for him to answer. The latest smoking gun is the 1985 letter obtained by the Associated Press, signed by the then Cardinal Ratzinger to the diocese of Oakland about the case of Father Stephen Kiesle, mercilessly analyzed by Andrew Sullivan here.

Lashing out in desperation, church spokesmen are now blaming everybody but themselves for their current dire plight, which one official spokesman likens to the worst aspects of anti-Semitism (what are the best ones, I wonder?). Suggested culprits include the media, the Jews, and even Satan. The church is hiding behind a seemingly endless stream of excuses for having failed in its legal and moral obligation to report serious crimes to the appropriate civil authorities. But it was Cardinal Ratzinger's official responsibility to determine the church's response to allegations of child sex abuse, and his letter in the Kiesle case makes the real motivation devastatingly explicit. Here are his actual words, translated from the Latin in the AP report:

This court, although it regards the arguments presented in favour of removal in this case to be of grave significance, nevertheless deems it necessary to consider the good of the universal church together with that of the petitioner, and it is also unable to make light of the detriment that granting the dispensation can provoke with the community of Christ's faithful, particularly regarding the young age of the petitioner.

"The young age of the petitioner" refers to Kiesle, then aged 38, not the age of any of the boys he tied up and raped (11 and 13). It is completely clear that, together with a nod to the welfare of the "young" priest, Ratzinger's primary concern, and the reason he refused to unfrock Kiesle (who went on to re-offend) was "the good of the universal church".

This pattern of putting church PR over and above the welfare of the children in its care (and what an understatement that is) is repeated over and over again in the cover-ups that are now coming to light, all over the world. And Ratzinger himself expressed it with damning clarity in this smoking gun letter.

In this case he was refusing the strong request of the local bishop that Kiesle should be unfrocked. Vatican standing orders were to refer such cases not to the civil authorities but to the church itself. The current campaign to call the church to account can take credit for the fact that this standing order has just changed, as of Monday 12 April 2010. Better late than never, as Galileo might have remarked in 1979, when the Vatican finally got around to a posthumous pardon.

Suppose the British secretary of state for schools received, from a local education authority, a reliable report of a teacher tying up his pupils and raping them. Imagine that, instead of turning the matter over to the police, he had simply moved the offender from school to school, where he repeatedly raped other children. That would be bad enough. But now suppose that he justified his decision in terms such as these:

Although I regard the arguments in favour of prosecution, presented by the local education authority, as of grave significance, I nevertheless deem it necessary to consider the good of the government and the party, together with that of the offending teacher. And I am also unable to make light of the detriment that prosecuting the offender can provoke among voters, particularly regarding the young age of the offender.

The analogy breaks down, only in that we aren't talking about a single offending priest, but many thousands, all over the world.

Why is the church allowed to get away with it, when any government minister who was caught writing such a letter would immediately have to resign in ignominy, and face prosecution himself? A religious leader, such as the pope, should be no different. That is why, along with Christopher Hitchens, I am supporting the current investigation of the pope's criminal complicity by Geoffrey Robertson QC and Mark Stephens. These excellent lawyers believe that, for a start, they have a persuasive case against the Vatican's status as a sovereign state, on the basis that it was just an ad hoc concoction driven by internal Italian politics under Mussolini, and was never given full status at the UN. If they succeed in this initial argument, the pope could not claim diplomatic immunity as a head of state, and could be arrested if he steps on British soil.

Why is anyone surprised, much less shocked, when Christopher Hitchens and I call for the prosecution of the pope, if he goes ahead with his proposed visit to Britain? The only strange thing about our proposal is that it had to come from us: where have the world's governments been all this time? Where is their moral fiber? Where is their commitment to treating everyone equally under the law? The U.K. government, far from standing up for justice for the innocent victims of the Roman Catholic church, is preparing to welcome this grotesquely tainted man on an official visit to the U.K. so that he can "dispense moral guidance". Read that again: dispense moral guidance!

Unfortunately I must end in bathos, with a necessary correction of a damaging error in another newspaper. The Sunday Times of 11 April, on its front page, printed the headline, "Richard Dawkins: I will arrest Pope Benedict XVI." This conjures up — as was doubtless intended — a ludicrous image of me ambushing the pontiff with a pair of handcuffs and marching him off in a half Nelson. Blood out of a stone, but I finally managed to persuade that Murdoch paper to change the headline in the online edition.

Never mind headlines invented by foolish sub-editors, we are serious. It should be for a court to decide — a civil court, not a whitewashing ecclesiastical court — whether the case against Ratzinger is as damning as it looks. If he is innocent, let him have the opportunity to demonstrate it in court. If he is guilty, let him face justice. Just like anybody else.

20100413-03	22:01	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 14: "The Great Catholic Cover-Up"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Marci,

I think it is so possible he could be arrested that he will cancel his trip! Actually, his crimes were probably committed in Germany. Right? That's where he masterminded the cover-up of cases all over the world...

"The Great Catholic Cover-Up" by Christopher Hitchens, Slate

Mar. 15, 2010,

(http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/fighting_words/2010/03/the_great_catholic_coverup.html)

(The pope's entire career has the stench of evil about it.)

On March 10, the chief exorcist of the Vatican, the Rev. Gabriele Amorth (who has held this demanding post for 25 years), was quoted as saying that "the Devil is at work inside the Vatican," and that "when one speaks of 'the smoke of Satan' in the holy rooms, it is all true—including these latest stories of violence and pedophilia." This can perhaps be taken as confirmation that something horrible has indeed been going on in the holy precincts, though most inquiries show it to have a perfectly good material explanation.

Concerning the most recent revelations about the steady complicity of the Vatican in the ongoing—indeed endless—scandal of child rape, a few days later a spokesman for the Holy See made a concession in the guise of a denial. It was clear, said the Rev. Federico Lombardi, that an attempt was being made "to find elements to involve the Holy Father personally in issues of abuse." He stupidly went on to say that "those efforts have failed."

He was wrong twice. In the first place, nobody has had to strive to find such evidence: It has surfaced, as it was bound to do. In the second place, this extension of the awful scandal to the topmost level of the Roman Catholic Church is a process that has only just begun. Yet it became in a sense inevitable when the College of Cardinals elected, as the vicar of Christ on Earth, the man chiefly responsible for the original cover-up. (One of the sanctified voters in that "election" was Cardinal Bernard Law of Boston, a man who had already found the jurisdiction of Massachusetts a bit too warm for his liking.)

There are two separate but related matters here: First, the individual responsibility of the pope in one instance of this moral nightmare and, second, his more general and institutional responsibility for the wider lawbreaking and for the shame and disgrace that goes with it. The first story is easily told, and it is not denied by anybody. In 1979, an 11-year-old German boy identified as Wilfried F. was taken on a vacation trip to the mountains by a priest. After that, he was administered alcohol, locked in his bedroom, stripped naked, and forced to suck the penis of his confessor. (Why do we limit ourselves to calling this sort of thing "abuse"?) The offending cleric was transferred from Essen to Munich for "therapy" by a decision of then-Archbishop Joseph Ratzinger, and assurances were given that he would no longer have children in his care. But it took no time for Ratzinger's deputy, Vicar General Gerhard Gruber, to return him to "pastoral" work, where he soon enough resumed his career of sexual assault.

It is, of course, claimed, and it will no doubt later be partially un-claimed, that Ratzinger himself knew nothing of this second outrage. I quote, here, from the Rev. Thomas Doyle, a former employee of the Vatican Embassy in Washington and an early critic of the Catholic Church's sloth in responding to child-rape allegations. "Nonsense," he says. "Pope Benedict is a micromanager. He's the old style. Anything like that would necessarily have been brought to his attention. Tell the vicar general to find a better line. What he's trying to do, obviously, is protect the pope."

This is common or garden stuff, very familiar to American and Australian and Irish Catholics whose children's rape and torture, and the cover-up of same by the tactic of moving rapists and torturers from parish to parish, has been painstakingly and comprehensively exposed. It's on a level with the recent belated admission by the pope's brother, Monsignor Georg Ratzinger, that while he knew nothing about sexual assault at the choir school he ran between 1964 and 1994, now that he remembers it, he is sorry for his practice of slapping the boys around.

Very much more serious is the role of Joseph Ratzinger, before the church decided to make him supreme leader, in obstructing justice on a global scale. After his promotion to cardinal, he was put in charge of the so-called "Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith" (formerly known as the Inquisition). In 2001, Pope John Paul II placed this department in charge of the investigation of child rape and torture by Catholic priests. In May of that year, Ratzinger issued a confidential letter to every bishop. In it, he reminded them of the extreme gravity of a certain crime. But that crime was the reporting of the rape and torture. The accusations, intoned Ratzinger, were only treatable within the church's own exclusive jurisdiction. Any sharing of the evidence with legal authorities or the press was utterly forbidden. Charges were to be investigated "in the most secretive way ... restrained by a perpetual silence ... and everyone ... is to observe the strictest secret which is commonly regarded as a secret of the Holy Office ... under the penalty of excommunication." (My italics). Nobody has yet been excommunicated for the rape and torture of children, but exposing the offense could get you into serious trouble. And this is the church that warns us against moral relativism! (See, for more on this appalling document, two reports in the London Observer of April 24, 2005, by Jamie Doward.)

Not content with shielding its own priests from the law, Ratzinger's office even wrote its own private statute of limitations. The church's jurisdiction, claimed Ratzinger, "begins to run from the day when the minor has completed the 18th year of age" and then lasts for 10 more years. Daniel Shea, the attorney for two victims who sued Ratzinger and a church in Texas, correctly describes that latter stipulation as an obstruction of justice. "You can't investigate a case if you never find out about it. If you can manage to keep it secret for 18 years plus 10, the priest will get away with it."

The next item on this grisly docket will be the revival of the long-standing allegations against the Rev. Marcial Maciel, founder of the ultra-reactionary Legion of Christ, in which sexual assault seems to have been almost part of the liturgy. Senior ex-members of this secretive order found their complaints ignored and overridden by Ratzinger during the 1990s, if only because Father Maciel had been praised by the then-Pope John Paul II as an "efficacious guide to youth." And now behold the harvest of this long campaign of obfuscation. The Roman Catholic Church is headed by a mediocre Bavarian bureaucrat once tasked with the concealment of the foulest iniquity, whose ineptitude in that job now shows him to us as a man personally and professionally responsible for enabling a filthy wave of crime. Ratzinger himself may be banal, but his whole career has the stench of evil—a clinging and systematic evil that is beyond the power of exorcism to dispel. What is needed is not medieval incantation but the application of justice—and speedily at that.

20100415-01

14:11

SteveB

The "Church"—Chpt. 15: "Pope Notes Attacks on Church, Urges Repentance"

Finally, after centuries, some words we have wanted to hear! I wish they had been stated a little more officially and openly, but it seems like a start.

"Repent ye sinners!"

I must say...the last sentence in the article is very telling...

"Pope Notes Attacks on Church, Urges Repentance" by Nicole Winfield, AP

Apr. 15, 2010, (

(VATICAN CITY) Pope Benedict XVI broke his recent silence on the clerical abuse scandal Thursday, noting recent attacks on the church and the need for "we Christians" to repent for sins and recognize mistakes.

Benedict made the comments during an off-the-cuff homily at a Mass inside the Vatican for members of the Pontifical Biblical Commission.

Victims of clerical abuse have long demanded that Benedict take more personal responsibility for clerical abuse, charging that the Vatican orchestrated a culture of cover-up and secrecy that allowed priests to rape and molest children for decades unchecked.

Those demands have intensified in recent weeks as the Vatican and Benedict himself have been accused of negligence in handling some cases in Europe and the United States.

"I must say, we Christians, even in recent times, have often avoided the word 'repent', which seemed too tough. But now under attack from the world, which has been telling us about our sins ... we realize that it's necessary to repent, in other words, recognize what is wrong in our lives," Benedict said.

"Open ourselves to forgiveness ... and let ourselves be transformed. The pain of repentance, which is a purification and transformation, is a grace because it is renewal and the work of divine mercy," he said.

It was Benedict's fullest allusion to the scandal since he sent a letter to the Irish faithful March 20 concerning what Irish-government inquiries have concluded was decades of abuse and church-mandated cover-up in the country.

Vatican spokesman the Rev. Federico Lombardi confirmed that Benedict was indeed referring to the scandal. "That's a legitimate reading," he said. "You can apply (his comments) to the current situation."

In his letter to the Irish, Benedict chastised Irish bishops for failures in leadership and judgment. But he took no responsibility himself or for the Vatican, which many victims have blamed for being more concerned about protecting the church than children.

On Monday, the Vatican posted on its Web site what it claimed had been a long-standing church policy telling bishops that they should report abuse crimes to police, where civil laws require it.

But critics have said the guidelines were merely a deceptive attempt by Rome to rewrite history, designed to shield the Vatican from blame by shifting responsibility of dealing with abusive priests onto bishops.

The Rev. Thomas P. Doyle, a canon lawyer who has been the main expert witness for victims in hundreds of lawsuits, called the guidelines a "failed attempt at damage control through revision of history."

He noted that senior Vatican officials, including the current Vatican No. 2, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, in 2002 were quoted as saying the church shouldn't require bishops to report abusive priests to police because it would violate the trust the two shared.

"In practice, the policy has been to avoid contact with civil authorities and to cover up the crimes and the criminals," Doyle wrote in an article this week. "The newly created canonical tradition of referral to civil authorities is the result of one thing: public outrage, the exposure from the media and the pressure for accountability in civil courts."

20100417-01	10:23	India	Buddhist Blog
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---------------

Dear SteveB,

An interesting article: <http://ecobuddhism.blogspot.com/>.

"When you change the way you look at things, the things you look at change."

20100417-02	11:58	SteveB	Re: Buddhist Blog
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------------

Dear India,

Very good stuff here, my friend. Thank you!

"Our lives begin to end the day we become silent about things that matter." — Martin Luther King, Jr.

More evidence that the Church covered-up for its criminal priests, and, perhaps, evidence that it may finally realize it must be "humble enough to recognize the failures and sins in its members."

Too bad it can't also recognize the utterly unnecessary weirdness of all its priests having to be celibate. Too bad it can't recognize the equal rights of women. Too bad it feels the earth must be overpopulated until it is destroyed.

Too bad it can't recognize, despite its own admissions, that it might, at times, be wrong and not under the direct control of God—the very same problem kings used to be unable to admit to...and history has certainly proven them wrong.

But, of course, the Church is not really human...it can't actually be wrong!

"Pope: Church Will Protect Young from Abuse" by AP

Apr. 18, 2010, (http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/36625387/ns/world_news-world_faith/t/pope-church-will-protect-young-abuse/#.Ty6IhXSQhI)

(Pontiff meets with victims following Mass to tens of thousands in Malta.)

(VALLETTA, Malta) Pope Benedict XVI met with a group of clerical abuse victims on Sunday and promised them the church would do everything in its power to bring justice to victims and protect young people in the future.

The Vatican said Benedict expressed his shame and sorrow at the pain the men and their families suffered and prayed with them during the meeting at the Vatican's embassy in Malta.

It was the first time Benedict had met with abuse victims since the worldwide clerical abuse scandal engulfed the Vatican earlier this year.

"He prayed with them and assured them that the Church is doing, and will continue to do, all in its power to investigate allegations, to bring to justice those responsible for abuse and to implement effective measures designed to safeguard young people in the future," a Vatican statement said.

Benedict, on a trip to Malta overshadowed by the global crisis, also heard the island's leading bishop say on Sunday that the Catholic Church has to be humble enough to recognize its failures.

The pope, who turned 83 on Friday, met with the group after a celebrating a mass for tens of thousands of people in a dockside area built in the 17th century over underground grain silos.

He made no reference to the sexual abuse crisis before the meeting, telling priests only to "fulfill the mission you have received."

But Paul Cremona, the Archbishop of Malta, spoke directly about the abuse crisis which is sapping the church's credibility in Malta and beyond.

In his address to the pope at the start of the mass, Cremona spoke of the need for "a church humble enough to recognize the failures and sins in its members."

Cremona, with the pope listening on the same platform, also spoke of the need for "a Church which does not seek privileges."

It was the second time in as many days that someone addressing the pope mentioned the sexual-abuse crisis.

The overnight trip is the pope's first foreign travels since the full force of the scandals have rocked the church became apparent and threatened to engulf his papacy.

At his arrival on Saturday, Maltese President George Abela said priests sometimes "unfortunately go astray" and it was "the church and even the state's duty to work hand in hand" to prevent abuse and punish offenders "so that justice will not only be done but seen to be done."

Speaking to reporters aboard the plane taking him to Malta on Saturday, he said Roman Catholicism has been "wounded by our sins" but did not use the word "abuse".

Pope's connection to scandal

Hundreds of cases of sexual and physical abuse of youths in recent decades by priests have come to light in Europe and the United States as disclosures encourage long-silent victims to finally go public with their complaints.

Benedict has been accused by victims groups of being part of systematic practice of cover-up by church hierarchy for pedophile priests, in his earlier roles as an archbishop in Germany and later at the helm of the Vatican morals office.

In his sermon at the open-air mass, the pope also called on the overwhelmingly Catholic nation, where abortion and divorce are illegal, not to succumb to the secular influences.

"Not everything that today's world proposes is worthy of acceptance by the people of Malta," he said. As the pope was in Malta, the Vatican was swept up with another potentially explosive case.

Cardinal Dario Castrillon Hoyos, a former Vatican official who congratulated a French bishop for hiding a sexually abusive priest in 2001, told a conference in Spain he acted with the approval of the late Pope John Paul.

Last week the Vatican spokesman indirectly confirmed that a 2001 letter Castrillon Hoyos sent to the bishop posted on a French website was authentic and was proof the Vatican was right to tighten up its procedures on sex abuse cases that year.

But the spokesman said on Saturday night he had no further comment on Castrillon Hoyos's remarks in Spain.

20100419-01	02:25	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 17: " Convento da Arrábida "
-------------	-------	--------	--

Don't get me wrong. I think there is a place for celibacy in the Church, as long as it is a place away from our children and, maybe, women.

I once visited a defunct (is it any wonder?) convent in Portugal (now a sort of national historical site), where the priests took not only vows of celibacy, but vows of silence and reclusion from the outside world. Even in their church, where the townspeople were also permitted to attend services, these monks hid behind screens and peeked through slits that did not allow them, normally, to even see the common people, nor, of course, to be seen by them.

I wrote the poem below, approximately, about that convent.

So if Catholic priests want to be this crazy, I say they should be free to do so. But please keep the members of this radical cult away from our children.

Convento da Arrábida

The snow is falling heavily now
Adding itself to the white already Hiding all that lies beneath.

My thoughts drift like the perfect flakes
Backward and forward, seeking
Something level upon which to rest awhile.

Old feelings push through the covering
Like spring beauties in warming woods
Reclaiming the territory of summer.

I have no brightly decorated tree
No cards coming and going by mail
Only myself to give.

Picturing the first Christmas I remember
When, as a 4-year-old, walking with my father
The night before the big day.

He pointed up to the starry sky
At what I know now must have been a plane
Where I clearly saw Santa and his sleigh.

Fast forward to the blessing
Of my own kids on Christmas morning
Bright eyed with wonder, woken up by joy.

Then wishful thinking, perhaps, leads me
To thoughts of last summer's warmth
In the sun on a mountain in Portugal.

The silent monks walked up
These worn hand-set stone steps
For hundreds of snowless Christmas's.

They must have cast their wordless gaze
Down the gray line of watchtowers
Toward the clean white village by the sea.

Each plain little cubicle in the monastery
Housed one robed soul
Never seen or heard outside this place.

Their library, chapel, and eating place so simple...
A lovingly restored mechanical clock still times
Forgotten travels of lovely wooden model ships.

Everywhere frescoes tiles paintings statues
Of the Virgin contemplating a skull
Commemorate what inner journeys?

Is she thinking of the death of her son
Or of His birth?
Of what could have been or what must be?

I picture the monks meditating on whatever
Made them lock themselves away
From the world they had always known.

Their life outside the world
No, beside the world
Filling them or leaving them empty?

Running away from the dark
Or toward the light?
They gave up so much for perhaps so little.

Their ghosts inhabit these hard stones
But return no answers to my questions

Why all had to be lost to be found.

I realize, like them, I have missed much of life
So little have I seen or known
Between my first Christmas and this.

And the lesson I can't escape in this refuge
Is not to run away from the life we are given
But to embrace the warmth and even the cold.

In Arrábida green trees and bright flowers
Even now lead down the mountain to the shore
Where love and hope rise each day
And the light still shines in this world.

©2000 Steven W. Baker

20100419-02 02:36 SteveB Quotes: Responsibility

When a man points a finger at someone else, he should remember that four of his fingers are pointing at himself.
—Louis Nizer

Within each of us lies the power of our consent to health and sickness, to riches and poverty, to freedom and to slavery.
It is we who control these, and not another.
—Richard Bach

You cannot escape the responsibility of tomorrow by evading it today.
—Abraham Lincoln

You must take personal responsibility. You cannot change the circumstances, the seasons, or the wind, but you can change yourself. That is something you have charge of.
—Jim Rohn

The greatest gifts you can give your children are the roots of responsibility and the wings of independence.
—Denis Waitley

The reason people blame things on the previous generations is that there's only one other choice.
—Doug Larson

The father who does not teach his son his duties is equally guilty with the son who neglects them.
—Confucius

20100420-01 10:39 Lianne Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 17

Dear SteveB,

Nice poem. I leave for Italy on Friday and for one of my stays, I am staying at a convent on a country hillside. Looked so peaceful.

Just read this morning's newspaper. a Catholic priest was busted in a prostitute sting. He had replied on craigslist and they set him up.

It is all falling apart for the upper hierarchy. I feel bad for those who are authentically doing the work on the local level, teaching, ministering...

20100420-02 15:59 SteveB Quotes: Mothers

Hundreds of dewdrops to greet the dawn,
Hundreds of bees in the purple clover,
Hundreds of butterflies on the lawn,
But only one mother the wide world over.
—George Cooper

Youth fades; love droops; the leaves of friendship fall; a mother's secret hope outlives them all.
—Oliver Wendell Holmes

One lamp - thy mother's love - amid the stars
Shall lift its pure flame changeless, and before
The throne of God, burn through eternity -
Holy - as it was lit and lent thee here.
—Nathaniel Parker Willis

Life is the fruit she longs to hand you,
Ripe on a plate.
And while you live,
Relentlessly she understands you.
—Phyllis McGinley

Respect for ones parents is the highest duty of civil life.
—Chinese Proverb

20100421-01	08:00	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 18: "Pope Asleep? Benedict XVI Appears To Sleep During Malta Mass"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

I bet you thought I was going to let this story go away. Haha!

Here's a little bit about "El Papa" after he met with Maltese abuse victims and failed to apologize to them. Is this clown for real?

"Pope Asleep? Benedict XVI Appears To Sleep During Malta Mass" by Huffington Post

June 18, 2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2010/04/18/pope-asleep-benedict-xvi_n_542216.html#s82151)

He wouldn't be the first person to fall asleep in church, though he's the last one you would expect.

Benedict XVI appeared to nod off during a Sunday mass in Malta, leaving Guido Marini (seated to his right) no other option but to poke the Pope. Perhaps that's in the job description for Marini, the Master of Pontifical Liturgical Celebrations.

These photos may not help that asleep-on-the-job image the Pope's been struggling with.

And here's a little story from The Onion that, I think, while not serious, manages to put everything into perspective. Haha. Ya gotta love The Onion!

"Pope Vows To Get Church Pedophilia Down To Acceptable Levels" by The Onion

April 5, 2010, (<http://www.theonion.com/articles/pope-vows-to-get-church-pedophilia-down-to-accepta,17201/>)

Pope Benedict XVI explains which types of slow, deliberate touching the church deems inappropriate.

(VATICAN CITY) Calling the behavior shameful, sinful, and much more frequent than the Vatican was comfortable with, Pope Benedict XVI vowed this week to bring the widespread pedophilia within the Roman Catholic Church down to a more manageable level.

Addressing thousands gathered at St. Peter's Square on Easter Sunday, the pontiff offered his "most humble apologies" to abuse victims, and pledged to reduce the total number of molestations by 60 percent over the next five years.

"This is absolutely unacceptable," Pope Benedict said. "It seems a weakening of faith in God has prevented our priests from exercising moderation when sexually abusing helpless minors."

"And let me remind our clergy of the holy vows they all took when they entered the priesthood," he continued. "They should know that they're only allowed one small child every other month."

The pope said he was deeply disappointed to learn that the number of children sexually abused by priests was almost 10 times beyond the allowable limit clearly outlined in church doctrine. Admitting for the first time in public that the overindulgent touching of "tender, tender young flesh" had become a full-blown crisis, the Holy Father vowed to implement new reforms to bring the pedophilia rate back down to five children per 1,000 clergy.

"The truth is there will always be a little bit of molestation—it's simply unavoidable," Vatican spokesperson Rev. Federico Lombardi said. "But the fact that young boys have gotten much more attractive over the past few decades is no excuse for the blatant defiance of church limits that have been in place for centuries."

"The majority of priests don't want to molest kids at all," he added. "But for those who do, we must make sure they're doing it at a reasonable rate."

Following the pope's speech, the Vatican released a statement outlining its plan to reduce pedophilia. Starting next year, specially trained cardinals will make unannounced visits to inspect and observe random churches in order to ensure they are not going beyond diocese-wide molestation caps. The inspector-cardinals will grade each parish based on long, private interviews with altar boys in darkened church basements, and careful observation of priests' sexual activity.

These senior officials will also have the authority to enforce harsh punishments for any clergy member violating his allotment of pedophilia.

"If a priest goes even one child over the limit, there will be hell to pay," said Prefect of the Congregation for Bishops Giovanni Battista Re, explaining the Vatican's new "Three Strikes, You're Out" rule. "After the third offense, the offending priest will immediately be moved to another parish. This will give officials time to investigate the case, and will act as an effective deterrent since it usually takes months for priests to gain the trust of the new children."

As a "goodwill measure," Cardinal Re said all churches will also be required to display a sign next to the altar showing the number of days since the last molestation. [This one is totally cracking me up! —SteveB]

Criticism of the pope's new plan has already begun to emerge from within the Catholic Church itself. Rev. Walter Moore, a pastor at St. Peter's in Chicago, questioned the Vatican's methodology in calculating the molestation rates, saying the church's inconsistent definition of pedophilia may have skewed the numbers.

"Is it technically pedophilia if the child's clothes are fully on the entire time? What if he's asleep when it happens?" Moore said. "It's time we had some clear guidance from Rome on this issue. For instance, the church counts it as one incident regardless of whether the child is molested multiple times by the same individual or by two priests at once. That's just plain wrong."

"Plus, if it's supposed to be a special secret between the priest and the boy, is it even any of the church's business in the first place?" he added. "Maybe Brandon is just trying to get attention."

The Vatican would not release details of the pope's upcoming world tour, in which he plans to clear up any confusion on the matter by personally demonstrating what constitutes molestation. [Too f*cking much! I'm dying! —SteveB]

20100421-02	11:16	Lianne	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 18
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------

Dear SteveB,

I love the Onion and just how old is the pope?

20100421-03	12:32	Jim	Re: "Burning Salt Water"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	--------------------------

Dear SteveB,

This is a little weird. I need to look some more before I would accept it at face value, but it is curious. And I always have been interested in Stirling engine applications as well. Anyone else seen this "demo"?

20100421-04 12:48 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 18

Dear Lianne,

The old fraud is 83, but I don't see that as an excuse for sleeping on the job, let alone covering up the abuse of children and enabling more abuse for much of his career.

The ultimate problem, of course, is the same old one. Anyone who thinks they know the mind of God is wrong. It is unknowable in its specifics, by philosophical definition.

All the Church's problems and all the problems of all Western and Middle-East religions are caused by this ultimate fallacy.

The immediate problem, as I've stated before, is the stupid, radical practice of universal celibacy in the Church.

And this Pope thinks he's a philosopher. That's almost as funny as the Onion article. And I thought this Onion article might be the funniest piece I have ever read. I love the instructional perspective it could surely impart to even the most devout, most lunatic Catholic.

20100423-01 05:01 SteveB Friendship

Dear SteveG,

Haven't heard from you in a while & was wondering how you are? Are you playing that much golf, or what? haha

And how is Florida? I'm going to try to make a trip to see the kids and grandkids this summer sometime.

Today, it finally turned cold and stormy in the tropics. As I look out all my windows, it seems to be raining hard from every direction at once. How can it do that?

20100423-02 09:50 SteveB Photos: Eyjafjallajokull Volcano, Iceland

Here are some really spectacular pictures of the Eyjafjallajokull Volcano's recent eruption in Iceland:

http://www.boston.com/bigpicture/2010/04/more_from_eyjafjallajokull.html

20100423-03 10:37 Bill Re: Photos: Eyjafjallajokull Volcano, Iceland

Dear SteveB,

Magnificent pictures. Thanks. The eruption in Iceland caused me to remember another Icelandic volcanic event, the January, 1973 eruption on Heimaey in the Vestmannaeyjar. A couple of months later I stopped in Iceland for a few days while en route to Europe. I went together with several other people in the hotel where I was staying in Reykjavik to charter a flight on a small plane to Heimaey, the airstrip there having been uncovered in the two or three months following the eruption. Most of the village, though, was still covered with coarse, black ash, which had caused roofs to collapse and simply covered others wholly. There were still fumaroles venting here and there. All the population had been evacuated shortly after the eruption had occurred. The U. S. Navy, which has or had an air station near Keflavik, had helped prevent the village from being covered with lava by installing pumps and hoses to direct water on the approaching lava and freeze its approach. The village, despite lots of cinder-related damage, was uncovered and revived. The good little harbor and its small fish-processing plant were saved and continue to operate. Several years later, I flew out there again, that second time on a small jet, and saw the completely recovered village and fishing operations.

20100423-04 11:21 SteveB Re: Photos: Eyjafjallajokull Volcano, Iceland

Dear Bill,

Thanks for the story! I'm pretty sure the 1973 eruption must be the one photographed by a photographer named Pete Turner. Maybe look him up. They were amazing (yes, very, very black!) and inspired me to study photography and dream of being a photographer, but I found out that I'm just not visual in that way. But I still remember the photos and how inspired I was by them. I think they helped develop my love for art of all types.

And I love volcanoes!!!!

20100423-05 11:54 SteveG Re: Friendship

Dear SteveB

We have been traveling again and relocated ourselves to the northwest - Yakima, WA - about 150 miles east of Seattle on the eastern side of the Cascade.

Son and his family are here and we fell in love with a little 5 month old granddaughter - so we moved. Interesting place - high dessert surrounded by hills - between the hills are orchards, vineyards, and fields of hops. Wineries everywhere. Son's back porch faces west, has outdoor speakers, can sit and watch the sunset over the hills and between Mt. Rainier and Mt. Adams while you listen to the blues. Not a bad deal. We have an apartment about a mile away - life is good.

Last played golf August 21, 1967.

Really enjoy your emails.

Kind of interesting the religion thing with the Catholic Church and Islam both messing kids up. Maybe other religions do the same thing - maybe they should lose their tax advantage for a while?

20100423-06 13:06 SteveB Re: Friendship

Dear SteveG,

Good to hear your doing OK. I may also be in Montana a while this summer, but it looks less likely. My wife is still there but moving down here this summer.

Golf—ya...I might have played a round or two as late as the early 70's, but maybe it was the late 60's. How do you remember the exact date? Or joke?

Golf is one of the few things that I am philosophically opposed to. Boy, does that upset some people when I tell them that. F*ck 'em!

I agree with you about the tax break, only it should be permanent. All but charitable work they undertake, which should have to operate separately, like other non-profits. The religious part should be taxed like any other form of advertising/brain-washing.

Take care. Washington is a great state!

20100504-01 08:22 SteveB The U.S. of A.

This quote is from an email I received from my lovely Bolivian wife, Marcela (I call her Marci most of the time). She has studied and lived extensively in both the U.S. and Bolivia, in Montana at this moment.

"Another big mystery: Why do people still criticize the U.S. and capitalism so much? And why all the guilt here? It is obvious that the U.S. is doing better than any other place. It is obvious that capitalism works. Bolivia is a mess [communist wannabes], the U.S. is not. It is like if you were drowning, holding a rotten log, and you saw a strong, big ship full of happy people and you said, "It is wrong to have a strong ship."

Why would people tell themselves those lies? It doesn't make sense."

I love her analogy. Please allow me to expand it a little.

Let's picture every country as some kind of ship at sea. And you have to remember that each ship does more than to symbolize a country at the present moment. The ships represent the entire modern history of each country...its form of government over the years, the creativity and industriousness of its people, its constitution, its good or bad fortune, its natural resources, everything that affects the material side of life, at least.

(This is because culture is difficult to measure or judge and takes so many different forms. Also, culture of any kind has a difficult time flourishing without the material needs of people being satisfied first. Yet it must be admitted that the culture of a country must, somehow, be a very important but mysterious part of its representative ship.)

Now, no one is more aware of the problems that exist in the U.S. than I am. I am saddened by them, disappointed, and worried. And both my wife and I love little Bolivia dearly. But as I look at the world in all honesty and objectivity, both as an outsider and an insider as far as the U.S. is concerned, I have to say that the U.S. is the newest, most modern luxury cruise ship out there. In fact, because of its power, it's almost like the biggest, most luxurious cruise ship combined with the biggest aircraft carrier, but that's difficult to picture.

There are quite a few other luxury cruise ships out there, but they tend to be a little smaller and older. Some of them are in pretty poor states or repair, like Greece. Others, like Germany, are looking pretty good.

Then there are the broken down sailboats one sees in the harbors of the world that are dead tired and no longer equipped for the open sea. Their bottoms are covered in algae. They go nowhere. I'm not sure if any countries are "rotten logs", but there are definitely rag-tag pirate ships like North Korea, Somalia, Yemen, etc. And there is every kind of ship in between.

And many people seem to want to jump whatever ship they're on and try to get on the luxury liner that is the U.S.

But doesn't even that great ship reach a point where it can hire no more crew? Where there are no more cabins for additional passengers? Where the kitchens can't produce enough food, and people are sleeping all over the decks?

And since any ship leaks and can be sunk, can't even the grandest be overloaded to the sinking point? And since it is the lives of our children and grandchildren which could be lost, doesn't there come a time to stand up with pride and say simply, "No more, please!"?

Personally, I applaud Arizona for, alone, having the balls to stand up and say, "No! We will enforce the law that exists in every single country on earth, and is enforced in every single country on earth except here in the U.S."

If you feel guilty about that, if you feel that somehow intrudes on someone's "rights," then I feel truly sorry for you and for our great nation.

20100504-02 10:23 Jim Curiosity & Reincarnation

Dear SteveB,

I was curious about the #808 in your signature... Does that mean there are 807 previous clones? or incarnations?

20100504-03 11:52 SteveB Re: Curiosity & Reincarnation

Dear Jim,

Jeez, I hope not. Though as a part-time Buddhist I guess I'm supposed to believe in that, but it seems like more wishful thinking to me. But I hope so.

I think it's so easy to get hope and belief and faith mixed up in our brains. But that's just me.

Actually, it's my condo #. :-)

20100504-04 13:39 BrentR Re: The U.S. of A.

Hear Hear!!!!

Castro, Chavez and Evo would move into the U.S. in a flash of an eye, if they could!!! Actually Evo is pi*sed off because as the leader of the coca growers the U.S. would not give him a visa to enter the U.S.!! However the U.S. has not given any of them a visa so they all have attitudes against the U.S.!! But every one of them would scramble to jump on the luxury liner, if they were permitted!!!

20100504-05 13:58 GaryF Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear BrentR,

Although I agree with almost all of what SteveB had to say, I seriously doubt any of these 3 would even consider moving to the U.S. For the most part it is only the very poor of Latin America who want to come here, much like it is the only the Africans and eastern Europeans who are illegally migrating to Europe.

20100504-06 14:50 BrentR Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear GaryF,

Please excuse me but you are very wrong!! I am not trying to get in a p*ssing match with you or with anybody!! However I have lived outside of the U.S. for 28 years and have 4 passports full with 2-5 extensions each!! I speak various languages and have lived and worked with people in over 50 countries!! I know how the people are, not just the tourist attractions, 5 star hotels, and Mc Donald's etc!! I also know most of the people who have a hard-on against the U.S. is for some reason or another they were rejected or someone close to them rejected for going to the U.S....however, almost every one of them that would be offered another chance to go would so in a heart-beat!!

Yes the poor people all try to go to U.S. to work and make money, some go to live off the welfare but most are actually hard workers trying to make a buck and make a better life for them and their families!! I know many illegals and legal immigrants in the U.S. I am not saying by no means that I am for the illegals in the U.S. or not!! I also believe like SteveB says there is only so much room and food on the boat!!

However I live in Latin America and I have Lived in Africa and in Asia!! I know both rich and poor!! I have lived and worked and associated with both classes!! The rich I know have almost all have lived in and have studied in the U.S. Most all have houses and bank accounts in the U.S. still and forever!! Almost everybody I know if they had enough money to go anywhere that they could they would all high tail it to the U.S., and many of them would not return!! Many people save and save trying to get the ticket to the U.S.!!!

I also know for a fact that Evo tried desperately to get a visa to go to the states, his sister also tried desperately also to get a visa!! Both of which had they been granted would probably still be living in the U.S.!! Chavez's dream was to be an American Baseball Player however he was not good enough for the cut and was not selected on various attempts!! Have you ever heard Aesop's Fable the Fox and the Grapes??

20100504-07 15:22 Charis Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

I think what people criticize isn't the American lifestyle—many want the lifestyle. What they criticize is how it was obtained. Which is also where the U.S. and European guilt trip comes from.

20100504-08 16:30 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A. & "Two Arizona City Councils Vote to Sue Over New Law"

Dear Charis,

Wow! I find that our little analogy has stirred-up quite a hornet's nest.

Well...I guess I just grow tired of all the America bashing that goes on. It's almost like a giant rising tide of brain washing, caused by jealousy, and maybe called by the name "liberal education".

I don't see any reason for guilt in how anything was obtained. Let's look at history for some answers. Please correct me if I err.

1. We fought a war of independence from the British colonialists to found a country trusting in God, equality, and liberty, regardless of how imperfectly it may have been manifested. We always hold the U.S. to a higher standard, don't we? Justified, but hardly fair. No guilt here.
2. We fought a few other wars maybe not so justified, but seldom fired the first shot. Besides, what country hasn't. Switzerland? Please!
3. I'm not proud of the way we treated the Indians, but this is seldom condemned by anyone, except maybe Evo. This was a grievous error, but what country has not committed errors? The Vatican? Hardly. Again...that higher standard. (Most of the damage, but not most of the betrayal, was caused by diseases no one even knew the cause of.)
4. We fought one of the bloodiest wars the world has ever seen to end slavery. I'm not proud of slavery, but I feel no guilt. I, and most Americans, had ancestors who sacrificed their lives to end it. Even Jesus never explicitly condemned slavery. Mohammed said only to treat your slaves well. Slavery still exists in many African, Mid-East, and Eastern countries. The U.S. has very little and we seek to punish these rare criminals. Even the Jews condoned slavery after having allegedly been slaves themselves. God seems to be silent on the matter. The U.S. is not.
5. We fought three world wars to save the world, at great cost to us: WWI, WWII, and the Cold War.
6. We have striven greatly to be a "Nation Under God" but that is now highly criticized.
7. We have striven greatly not to be a colonial power, unlike every other powerful nation the world has ever seen. We didn't even take Iraq's oil, even after Donald Trump strongly suggested it.
8. We grew rich because of the hard work and creativity of our people and the luck of the draw. I feel no guilt or shame about that and neither should anyone else. America's wealth was not obtained in any way, shape, or form the way Europe's was...on the backs of colonies.
9. We have opened our doors and our pocketbooks to the world, probably to the detriment of the future of America and of our children and grandchildren. The balance of payments deficit, which has existed almost my entire lifetime, documents the billions of dollars we ship overseas each month. "Fair trade" and "free trade" exist to be fair to others, not to America.
10. We seem to always be ready to help, and reticent to plunder. And we actually do help. Big time!

Because others are jealous is no reason to feel shame or guilt. We have many things to improve. We have a system of government that money has corrupted in a terrible way. We don't take care of our own. We seem to have lost much of our will and way. But we are still the greatest nation the world has ever seen and the only nation I have ever know in history to actually strive for good. We have much to fix. Much to feel proud of. We have no time and no cause for shame or guilt. We are the light of the world and we must make it shine ever brighter.

Below is the latest insanity from Arizona. Thank you all for contributing to the discussion.

"Two Arizona City Councils Vote to Sue Over New Law" by Felicia Fonseca, AP

May 5, 2010, (http://www.wane.com/dpps/news/national/west/2-arizona-city-councils-vote-to-sue-over-new-law-jgr_3343918)

(FLAGSTAFF) The Tucson and Flagstaff city councils voted Tuesday to sue Arizona over its tough new immigration law, citing concerns about enforcement costs and negative effects on the state's tourism industry.

They are the first municipalities in Arizona to approve legal challenges to the law. Earlier this week, proposed litigation in Phoenix took a hit when the city attorney said Mayor Phil Gordon lacks the authority to file suit without the support of the City Council.

The new state law requires local and state law enforcement officers to question people about their immigration status if there is reason to suspect they're in the country illegally. The Flagstaff City Council voted unanimously in favor of a resolution that says it's an unfunded mandate to carry out the responsibilities of the federal government. Its Tuesday night meeting drew a crowd that initially numbered in the hundreds but dwindled significantly as the night wore on.

The council will retain legal counsel and could either pursue its own lawsuit or join Tucson or other cities in efforts to fight the immigration bill.

It also is considering setting up a legal defense fund to which many in the audience said they would contribute.

"This new bill has the power to make a criminal out of me for helping my family and friends," said Flagstaff resident Loretta Velasco. "I will not turn my back on them, so whatever I can do, I will do."

The few who spoke in favor of the immigration measure urged the council to let someone else bear the cost of fighting it, and said the law had nothing to do with racial profiling.

Roger Boone said most people agree the immigration system is broken but a "race to the courts" is irresponsible.

"If Tucson is saying in a 5-1 vote it is filing, let them spend their money," he said.

Flagstaff is struggling with a $12.8 million budget shortfall this fiscal year, and city staff has been cut by 14 percent, including the loss of 13 police positions.

Mayor Sara Presler said she realizes each lawsuit Flagstaff faces for either enforcing or failing to enforce the immigration measure could cost the city in roads, police officers or staff. But she said it's better to be proactive than reactive.

Earlier Tuesday, the Tucson City Council approved a resolution to sue the state, with Councilman Steve Kozachik casting the lone no vote, The Arizona Republic newspaper reported.

Kozachik said he agrees the law is flawed but thinks Arizona needs to "de-escalate the conversation" and filing a lawsuit is not the way.

Other council members argued the cost to enforce the new immigration law will be overly excessive.

Mayor Bob Walkup said the law is based on a misguided notion that illegal immigrants are bad for the area's quality of life and economy. He said much of Tucson's economy is derived from Mexican tourists who come to vacation and shop, the Republic reported.

In Phoenix, the mayor had said he would proceed with a legal challenge to the law after failing to gather enough support from the City Council. But a legal opinion issued Monday by Phoenix City Attorney Gary Verburg said only the City Council has the power to authorize lawsuits.

Four lawsuits challenging the law were filed last week by the National Coalition of Latino Clergy and Christian Leaders, a Washington-based researcher who plans to visit Arizona and two police officers, one from Phoenix and the other from Tucson. The officers filed the lawsuit as individuals and weren't challenging the law on behalf of their employers.

20100504-09	17:08	Dick	Re: The U.S. of A.
-----------------------------	-------	------	--------------------

Dear SteveB,

RIGHT ON!!!!!!!!!!!!!! My friend. I will go one step further. The old practice of anchor babies must be stopped. The beautiful lady that stands in NY Harbor symbolizes what we are all about but it must be done "LEGALLY FOLLOWING A PROCESS THAT PREVIOUS IMMIGRANTS HAD TO ENDURE". They need to be sponsored so they don't go on the dole & what about vaccinations. I could go on & on about this issue. The state of Arizona did the right thing. The next thing we need to do is get the freeloaders on welfare in this country back to work. I think some of the disability pensions out there are another area that needs to be looked at.

20100504-10 17:16 Charis Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

I don't agree that the U.S. should feel guilt either. I just see that the U.S. and Europe are motivated by guilt and allow themselves to be manipulated by it—especially Europe because the South American nations manipulate them into feeling bad for being the primary consumers of most of the world's resources (i.e.: Americans eat 60% of all the beef in the world, for example) and being the primary contaminators of the earth (the U.S. has been, for most of the past 4-5 decades in top spot for contaminator, but is soon be edged out by China and/or Brazil and/or a couple other countries) but it's pretty much this that people hate the U.S. for. I'm not saying I agree. It's just what people from other nations think. But it's an interesting discussion. Personally I think pretty much the same as you. It's mostly envy.

20100504-11 17:18 Charis Re: The U.S. of A.

I'm pretty mad about illegal aliens demanding "rights" too. Don't know what would happen if Americans decided they should demand their rights in Mexico, for example. I'm personally glad Arizona passed the law.

20100504-12 17:43 SteveG Re: The U.S. of A.

A couple of years ago we were spending the weekend in Indianapolis. Met a nice young man working as a bellhop at the Marriott. He said he was from Senegal, went to college and graduated in France and then came to the U.S. It seemed strange to me, but he answered straight up "opportunity". Went out for breakfast the next morning, met a nice young lady with an unusual first name for Indiana and an accent—she was the hostess. She said she was from Senegal, went to college in France and graduated, and then came to the U.S. for "opportunity". The 2 did not know each other. Must be something to it.

20100504-13 17:55 Brent R Re: The U.S. of A.

Hear Hear!!!! That's what I was trying to explain to Gary!! I am not saying EVERYBODY wants to go and live in the U.S., but I bet you if you gave everybody in the world the chance 99.9 % of them would go and large % of them would stay legally or illegally!! Unless maybe if they are French!!!

20100504-14 18:34 GaryF Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear BrentR,

BULLSH*T !!!

20100504-15 18:35 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear BrentR and GaryF,

Well, this has turned into quite a lively discussion. [Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20100504-16 19:27 BrentR Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

I really did like your analogy about the boats!!! [Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Dear GaryF,

Sorry if you are getting a bit frustrated on the subject!! I am not sure how we are going to settle this one way or another!!

But I am sure someone here can pull us up some statistics about which country has the most immigrants legal and illegal, also the statistics of which country has the longest waiting list for visas, and while we are at it which consulates have the longest lines outside of people waiting in long lines to try their luck at getting a visa!! And maybe the country that rejects more visas every year than any other!! Can you tell one other country that has so many hordes of people trying to get in????

France, I am sure, would come in second as they have held the doors open for a long time and are full of Africans and Middle Easterners who would not even of had a chance to get into the U.S. usually because it was an additional expense to get there. All the French friends I have are getting tired of the huge swarms of immigrants there living off the French welfare system. But most of those immigrants also would go to the U.S. if they had their choice!!

But I would be the first to admit that America is not the America it was 30 or 40 years ago!! It is turning more and more into a police state then a free state, many of the freedoms and rights that our forefathers had are now gone!!!! And I personally have no desire to ever live there again, and probably never will!! But people are still swarming the borders trying to get in and stay in!!! The grass is always greener on the other side of the fence!!

But hell, GaryF, if you are ever in the neighborhood it would be great to have a cold one with you!! Hell, I will even invite you out for a BBQ!!! It would be a great debate!!

Bonne Chance Mon Ami

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

IF YOU CROSS THE NORTH KOREAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU GET 12 YEARS HARD LABOR.

IF YOU CROSS THE IRANIAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU ARE DETAINED INDEFINITELY.

IF YOU CROSS THE AFGHAN BORDER ILLEGALLY, YOU GET SHOT.

IF YOU CROSS THE SAUDI ARABIAN BORDERILLEGALLY YOU WILL BE JAILED.

IF YOU CROSS THE CHINESE BORDERILLEGALLY YOU MAY NEVER BE HEARD FROM AGAIN.

IF YOU CROSS THE VENEZUELAN BORDERILLEGALLY YOU WILL BE BRANDED A SPY AND YOUR FATE WILL BE SEALED.

IF YOU CROSS THE CUBAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU WILL BE THROWN INTO POLITICAL PRISON TO ROT.

BUT...IF YOU CROSS THE U.S. BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU GET:

- A JOB,
- DRIVERS LICENSE
- SOCIAL SECURITY CARD
- WELFARE
- FOOD STAMPS
- CREDIT CARDS
- SUBSIDIZED RENT OR A LOAN TO BUY A HOUSE
- FREE EDUCATION
- FREE HEALTH CARE
- A LOBBYIST IN WASHINGTON

BILLIONS OF DOLLARS WORTH OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS PRINTED IN YOUR LANGUAGE
THE RIGHT TO CARRY YOUR COUNTRY'S FLAG WHILE YOU PROTEST THAT YOU DON'T GET ENOUGH RESPECT AND, IN MANY INSTANCES, YOU CAN VOTE.

ALL PAID FOR BY WORKING PEOPLES' TAXES! (IT'S NOT GOVERNMENT MONEY, IT'S TAX PAYER'S MONEY.)

20100505-01 00:24 BrentR Re: The U.S. of A.

GaryF,

I just wanted to make one more comment for the moment about a comment that you made!!

And I quote you," I seriously doubt any of these 3 would even consider moving to the U.S. For the most part it is only the very poor of Latin America who want to come here, much like it is the only the Africans and eastern Europeans who are illegally migrating to Europe."

As we were talking about Fidel, Chavez and Evo!! You are probably right that none of these 3 would like to come to America now!!! But prior to their takeovers of office every one of them would have come to the U.S. and live the American Dream!! As they were all poor prior to their takeovers!! Now They all live like Yankee Imperialist Pigs that they despise so much!! Fine Wines, $400 bottles of Whiskey, Cuban Cigars, Luxury Autos, Private Planes $10,000 Custom Made Suits, Huge Mansions and Properties!! But look at how they have really f*cked up all of the rights for the people that elected them into office! 10 years after Chavez has been president!!!! Where do the poor people live now???? I will tell you !!! In the same pig sty they lived in 10 years ago!!! There is no freedom of speech, freedom of press, no meat, milk eggs, rice, coffee, sugar in the stores even if you have money!!! What about Evo in Bolivia "GAS FOR THE BOLIVIANOS"!!!! Now there is not even bottled gas in Bolivia to cook with!!! No diesel for the tractors to plant or harvest with!!

Ok again I am going on a rampage!!!

20100505-02 01:06 Marci Re: The U.S. of A.

Thank you all for the interesting debate. The U.S. fascinates the entire world. It must be in human nature to admire and want to be like the biggest, most powerful, most successful one. Everybody wants to see, to touch, to experience this phenomenal Country. In the past, it was Rome. Till these days, there is the expression "All roads lead to Rome". Everything, including success, has a price though . In your case, it is to be invaded by people from all over. The good thing is that that price can be controlled. As for the luxurious cruise getting too crowded. I wouldn't be so worried. That's what Americans are best at, solving problems. I am sure they will find the way to solve the illegal immigration problem, or whatever other problem they have like the shipping of jobs to China to name one.

As for the choices people have. There is nothing more interesting and stimulating than an international marriage. The relationship is amazingly complicated, but also fun and worth it, just unlike any other. In addition, as a bonus, you get to enjoy the two places. It is really nice.

Love y'all. (I learned English in Alabama)

20100505-03 07:39 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

I love the debate too! Why are we so afraid to enforce our own laws? That seems much more like a Third World country where the police spend their time hiding out in the police stations. What in God's name is wrong if, "officers question people about their immigration status if there is reason to suspect they're in the country illegally."

We are too shy as a nation to do that? Amazing to me! Racial profiling? Who cares! If you're legal and went through the lengthy and expensive legal immigration process, like my wife did, then you would be proud to show you have a right to be here.

Remember. Mexico has some of the toughest immigration laws in the world and they enforce them!

Authenticated by: http://urbanlegends.about.com/od/government/a/sylvia_allen.htm.

"I Want to Explain Why SB 1070 Is Needed" by Arizona State Senator Sylvia Allen

May 1, 2010, (<http://bsimmons.wordpress.com/2010/05/01/i-want-to-explain-why-sb-1070-is-needed-by-arizona-state-senator-sylvia-allen/>)

I'm Arizona State Senator Sylvia Allen. I want to explain SB 1070 which I voted for and was just signed by Governor Jan Brewer.

Rancher Rob Frantz was murdered by the drug cartel on his ranch a month ago. I participated in a senate hearing two weeks ago on the border violence, here is just some of the highlights from those who testified.

The people who live within 60 to 80 miles of the Arizona/Mexico Border have for years been terrorized and have pleaded for help to stop the daily invasion of humans who cross their property . One Rancher testified that 300 to 1200 people a DAY come across his ranch vandalizing his property, stealing his vehicles and property, cutting down his fences, and leaving trash. In the last two years he has found 17 dead bodies and two Koran bibles.

Another rancher testified that, daily, drugs are brought across his ranch in a military operation. A point man with a machine gun goes in front, 1/2 mile behind are the guards fully armed, 1/2 mile behind them are the drugs, behind the drugs 1/2 mile are more guards. These people are violent and they will kill anyone who gets in the way. This was not the only rancher we heard that day that talked about the drug trains.

One man told of two illegal's who came upon his property one shot in the back and the other in the arm by the drug runners who had forced them to carry the drugs and then shot them. Daily they listen to gun fire during the night it is not safe to leave his family alone on the ranch and they can't leave the ranch for fear of nothing being left when they come back.

The border patrol is not on the border. They have set up 60 miles away with check points that do nothing to stop the invasion. They are not allowed to use force in stopping anyone who is entering. They run around chasing them, if they get their hands on them then they can take them back across the border.

Federal prisons have over 35% illegal's and 20% of Arizona prisons are filled with illegal's. In the last few years 80% of our law enforcement that have been killed or wounded have been by an illegal.

The majority of people coming now are people we need to be worried about. The ranchers told us that they have seen a change in the people coming they are not just those who are looking for work and a better life.

The Federal Government has refused for years to do anything to help the border states . We have been over run and once they are here we have the burden of funding state services that they use. Education cost have been over a billion dollars. The healthcare cost billions of dollars. Our State is broke, $3.5 billion deficit and we have many serious decisions to make. One is that we do not have the money to care for any who are not here legally. It has to stop.

The border can be secured. We have the technology we have the ability to stop this invasion. We must know who is coming and they must come in an organized manner legally so that we can assimilate them into our population and protect the sovereignty of our country. We are a nation of laws. We have a responsibility to protect our citizens and to protect the integrity of our country and the government which we live under.

I would give amnesty today to many, but here is the problem, we dare not do this until the Border is secure. It will do no good to forgive them because thousands will come behind them and we will be over run to the point that there will no longer be the United States of America but a North American Union of open borders. I ask you what form of government will we live under? How long will it be before we will be just like Mexico , Canada or any of the other Central American or South American countries? We have already lost our language, everything must be printed in Spanish also. We have already lost our history it is no longer taught in our schools. And we have lost our borders.

The leftist media has distorted what SB 1070 will do. It is not going to set up a Nazi Germany . Are you kidding. The ACLU and the leftist courts will do everything to protect those who are here illegally, but it was an effort to try and stop illegal's from setting up businesses, and employment, and receiving state services and give the ability to local law enforcement when there is probable cause like a traffic stop to determine if they are here legally. Federal law is very clear if you are here on a visa you must have your papers on you at all times. That is the law. In Arizona all you need to show you are a legal citizen is a driver license, MVD identification card, Native American Card, or a Military ID. This is what you need to vote, get a hunting license, etc.. So nothing new has been added to this law. No one is going to be stopped walking down the street etc... The Socialist who are in power in DC are angry because we dare try and do something and that something the Socialist wants us to do is just let them come. They want the "Transformation" to continue.

Maybe it is too late to save America . Maybe we are not worthy of freedom anymore. But as an elected official I must try to do what I can to protect our Constitutional Republic . Living in America is not a right just because you can walk across the border. Being an American is a responsibility and it comes by respecting and upholding the Constitution the law of our land which says what you must do to be a citizen of this country. Freedom is not free.

20100505-05 07:53 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.: "2009 UN 'Human Development' Report"

2009 UN "Human Development" Report:

<http://hdr.undp.org/en/statistics/>.

Norway is #1, Iceland #3...ya, people are just dying to get into those countries and freeze! haha The U.S. is 13th [because of the unreasonable prejudices, guilt, and shame of which we speak], Uruguay is 50th, St. Lucia is 69th, the smuggling state of Paraguay is 101st, and Bolivia is right down there with the African countries at 113th, just ahead of Mongolia (at least Bolivia beat Haiti, which was 149th). Although, the reasons that Bolivia is 113th are largely the things which endear her to me.

20100505-06 07:55 Charis Re: The U.S. of A.

Really, what's so wrong about it? The police can stop us foreigners here in Bolivia just to see if we have papers. They might pick someone who looks foreign. Logical. No problem, U.S., Bolivia, or anywhere.

See: <http://www.boliviabella.com/carry-your-identification-at-all-times.html>.

20100505-07 08:46 Bill Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Marci,

I admire your graceful observations—and your English.

Without question the E.U. is a fabulous country—today's Rome—with bountiful economic opportunity and a decent government. I agree with you in that entry must be controlled. Favorable conditions cannot be maintained, if we are overrun.

20100505-08 09:13 Mark Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

Gotta admit Steve.....don't always agree with you.....but with this issue I am in total agreement.....

20100505-09 08:41 Mark Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power

The area around Fowler IN is now peppered with hundreds of the newest wind powered generators.....my friend JimR says it's called the Fowler Ridge.....

20100507-01 01:04 Marissa Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

Wow! This is definitely becoming a heated debate! I would like to quote SNL's Weekend Update on this matter:

"This week Arizona signed the toughest illegal immigration law in the country, which would allow the police to demand identification papers from anyone they suspect is in the country illegally. I know there are some people in Arizona worried that Obama is acting like Hitler, but can we all agree that there's nothing more Nazi than saying, 'Show me your papers?'

"There's never been a WWII movie that didn't include the line, 'Show me your papers.' It's their catchphrase. Every time someone says 'Show me your papers,' Hitler's family gets a residual check. So heads up Arizona, that's fascism. I know, I know, it's a dry fascism, but it's still fascism."

First...I apologize for my idealistic, hippie comments in advance!

On a more serious note.....One of my best friends in the world is from Peru. Her parents came here on a Visa when she was 3 years old and they never left. Now she is almost 24, hardly speaks Spanish and has never stepped outside the border of the U.S. This is because she is still not a citizen. If she left the states, even just for Spring Break, she would not be allowed back in. She does not have a driver's license, did not go to college and only has had jobs that would allow her to work without a valid Social Security #.

This has been her life because she is petrified of someone saying, "show me your papers". This is her county... this is her home! And she is a talented artist and one of the most amazing people I know. She got married a few years ago, but still has not been granted citizenship or a green card. Forced to get married before 21....and she's a lesbian for crying out loud!!

We are all just humans trying to get by and provide for our families. If I were in a poor Latin American country, I would want to run away for better opportunities in the U.S. just like my friend's parents did all those years ago. If you were living in a poor country with limited opportunities, you would want to come here too. And you would be terrified out of your mind right now with the passing of this law.

I get what you all are saying about the boat and the resources and everything. If people really cared that much about our resources, they would be supporting funds that go toward alternative energy and not offshore drilling. Which we all know is pretty much f*cking up (for lack of a better phrase) a whole slew of our plant and animal life every day as we speak! On the subject of resources, an acre of land can grow 40,000 potatoes, but can only raise 250 lbs. of beef. People don't want to give up their precious steak or stop driving their cars to the grocery store that's a block away. And they certainly don't want to share the wealth and opportunities in this country with these Aliens! GASP!

My friend is not an alien, she is a human! We made these borders, not our creator!

And now...lyrics by Michael Franti:

I don't need a passport to walk on this Earth,
Anywhere I go, because I'm made of this Earth,
I was born of this Earth,
I breath of this Earth,
And even with the pain, I believe in this Earth.

Every bit of land is Holy Land,
every drop of water is Holy Water,
And every single human is a son or a daughter of the One Earth Mama and the One Earth Papa.

Don't tell a man that he can't come here because he's got brown eyes and wavy hair.
Don't tell a woman that she can't go there because she prays to a different kind of God up there.

You say you're a Christian, because God made you.
You say you're a Muslim, because God made you.
You say you're a Hindu and the next man's a Jew, so let's all kill each other, because God told us to. Nah!!!

I would like to add that although many other countries may throw us in jail or kill us for entering. This IS America and we have to set the example. To the world and to our children. Why should we follow the rest of the world in hatred.

Of course, you can tell, that I would love it if there were no borders at all. But I understand that this would be nearly impossible. It may never happen. But really what I am saying here...is that this "Show Me Your Papers" Law is just ludicrous!

20100507-02 02:03 Charis Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Marissa,

Sylvia Allen writes "Freedom is not free" and I agree. We had to pay a huge price for the country we have. Anyone else who wants a piece of it should have to make some effort don't you think? Like maybe getting legal papers to enter? Just sayin'...

20100507-03 09:36 Ben Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power

Dear Mark,

As you probably know, that's a very open area, south of the glacier lake belt, and north of the woodlands and ravines.

It's also Janice Query's hometown.

Go, Fowler!

Susette and I see vast farms of windmills in northwest Texas, as we pass through the Lubbock area on our way to New Mexico. It's a little weird. Seems like alien construction, reminiscent of War of the Worlds. Just a little spooky.

Interesting, too, that they don't appear to be the massive hazard to birds that environmental activists had feared. I'm sure some get whacked; heck, windows take a toll on avian life, even. But I haven't heard anything about piles of dead birds at the bases of windmills yet.

One thing upon which one might reflect: there's no free energy, at least not until we learn how to extract it from the background energy, or make fusion work. So the question arises: once we have enough windmills to meet the energy demands of present and future civilization... will the earth's rotational rate diminishment increase measurably...? Seems like that would be an inevitable consequence, with all those air brakes in operation. And how much rotational diminishment would be necessary to whack our axis, screw up the electrical nature of the atmosphere, and so forth... and how about biological consequences of a steadily lengthening day?

20100507-04 09:39 Clark Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB and Marissa,

I gotta go with Marissa on this debate. Steve, I think you've raised a terrific daughter.

20100507-05 10:50 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Marissa,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

And I am not one to side with government, law, or the police, but on this issue I must. I've seen the terrible results in Latin America of laws and constitutions on the books not being enforced, while the police hide in their stations, or come out so pi*sed to be bothered that they start shooting. The result is that there is no respect for the law. People have to have walls around their houses, bars on their windows, and guards posted on every block. Every large store and bank has at least one guard just outside the front door holding a loaded sawed-off shotgun or machine gun. No diversion!

If we aren't going to enforce a law, it should be changed. But unchecked immigration would be the death of the U.S. as we know it. It would become like all these Third World Latin American countries that I love, but would not wish upon anyone. Know what I mean?

There is a perfectly fine, not simple, but not overly difficult legal immigration process in place in the U.S. That is what Marci and Saul did. That's what millions do. Why not everyone? Illegal immigration is not fair to those people who follow the law. The law helps keep out people that, believe me, you would not want living next door to you, like the Mexican slave traders and drug lords. I'm not exaggerating.

It is fine to have love for people and to take positions based on love. But surely we can love people, yet hope that they stay in their perfectly fine countries and strive to make them better, instead of running off to the U.S.

I feel sorry for your friend, but I don't understand why she or her parents did not take advantage of either of the two very generous amnesty programs that have transpired during her life here. That is their fault and no one else's. She could still become a legal immigrant, then a U.S. citizen. If she is afraid to do that, she should consult an immigration lawyer who will set her straight as to the process. If she married an American for that reason, why didn't she do it then?

Every country in the world has immigration laws. There is nothing wrong with people wanting to maintain their own cultures, us included. There is no hatred in that, only love of one's native culture. We are taught to respect Indian culture, for example, and taught that it was wrong not to do that. Why then would we not recognize that America has a cultural identity of its own too? And it must be a culture the world loves, because look at the way they flock to our shores.

Every other country enforces their laws, why can't we? Try to emigrate to St. Lucia, Mexico, or Bolivia and you will see what I mean.

20100507-06 11:01 SteveB Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power & from the "Manifesto of the Church of Steve"

Dear Mark and Ben,

It's really too late
Billions are already doomed.
So as we used to say
Hey hey live for today!
—from the "Manifesto of the Church of Steve"

20100507-07 11:06 Clark Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

I don't disagree with you about the need to enforce immigration laws—just about Arizona's in particular, which (while I understand the desperation behind it) strikes me as unconstitutional. I'm less concerned about the effect on illegal immigrants as I am on U.S. citizens, who—as Marissa points out—may be required to "show their papers."

That's giving way too much power to government and law enforcement. (I keep thinking about how I'd feel if the problem were Canadians streaming into NY and I had to possibly produce proof of citizenship every time I went out for a walk. There's just too much latitude there for harassment and abuse.) How about a different tack, like making hiring illegal immigrants a felony and enforcing that?

Enjoy your missives!

20100507-08 11:27 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Clark,

Oh, I'm all in favor of that idea, of course.

But I believe we are already at a state where, with the Supreme Court's blessing, any cop with any possible reason (but not with "no reason") can ask for identification information, are we not?

For me, one time in a Rhode Island state park, the reason was simply that I was there in the middle of the day looking for my cat and some fairly distant houses I could barely see had been burglarized recently. I didn't mind. Why would I? I was happy to see them trying to do their jobs. I am an incredible lover of freedom, but I didn't have any Constitutional issues with their actions in any way.

I don't believe this law changes that. It just extends the same old same old to everybody, including illegal aliens.

20100507-09 11:32 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Charis,

Definitivamente! Same as anywhere else. Europe has sure learned its lesson recently hasn't it?

20100507-10 11:36 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Susette,

Well, she's an Arizona state senator, and I believe you will find that she said every word of it.

<http://tucsoncitizen.com/the-cholla-jumps/2010/05/01/state-senator-sylvia-allenresponds-to-sb1070/>

20100507-11 11:46 Clark Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

We'll have to see how it plays out. The law was amended a bit after initial passage to make it less draconian. My guess, though, is that most AZ cops don't like it at all. Too vague, among other things. But if it's enforced fairly—a big if—and only when someone has been reasonably suspected of breaking a law, it will probably be OK. The best thing that may come out of it is a realization that we need comprehensive reform on a national level, but that's unlikely to happen in an election year.

20100507-12 11:52 Ben Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Marissa,

Bravo!

I'm an old friend of your Dad and Mom; it was your parents, and meeting Laurel as a baby, that softened me to the whole idea of having kids of my own some day. (I have a 22 year old son and a daughter getting close to 20.)

I know we've met but I am pretty sure you wouldn't remember me; any encounter would have been brief. But I am so very glad that your folks raised you to be the person that you are.

20100507-13 12:41 Dennis Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Marissa, Clark, Ben, and SteveB,

I'm with Clark. Marissa's eloquence and reasoning are impressive.

20100507-14 12:45 SteveB Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear Dennis, Clark, Ben, and Marissa,

Damn! I'm starting to get outnumbered here! What can I say? She's also beautiful!

20100507-15 12:49 Ben Re: The U.S. of A.

Dear SteveB,

I wasn't picking on you, but I have to say I sort of drop down on her side. I see so many Mexican workers here every day, who are honest, earnest workers that really DO contribute to our wellbeing. Many are well-educated, too, although there are of course some who are not.

You did well with Marissa.

I see your point, and agree that something needs to change, too, but I don't think stopping people on the street because the look Mexican is a good solution for the U.S.

20100507-16 12:55 BobK Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power

Dear Ben,

Gee, I hate be the physics geek, but I think the rotation of the earth is safe from windmills.

The energy source for the wind is the sun, the wind just moves the heat energy around.

Windmills are just another way of tapping into solar energy...

20100507-17 13:07 SteveB Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power

Dear Mark, Ben, and BobK,

But couldn't all those windmills eventually stop the wind, which would stop the earth's rotation, which would plunge the earth into the sun, which would in turn give us too much energy, just before blowing up the sun? And then we'd have a really big problem!

20100507-18 13:22 Ben Re: Fowler Ridge, Indiana Wind Power

Dear SteveB,

Uh, I don't think that stopping the Earth's rotation on its axis, even entirely, would in and of itself cause any change in its orbit around the sun; after all, its inertial mass will not have changed, nor will its distance from the sun, or will have the gravity of either body.

So, no: we'll still be in orbit.

And of course, the likelihood of drag on the surface layer of the atmosphere, even though it is the densest layer, causing a complete stop, even in geologic time.

But it is certain that a whole lot of windmills would cause SOME drag. Can't get away from that. And at some point, the drag would have an effect. How long before it would be discernible, and what would its effects be? That's my question.

I would have made some comic a great straight man. (I know you know all this.)

20100507-19 13:35 Bill Re: The U.S. of A.

If not strongly, I came down on the other side, but I must give credit to Marissa for her arguments.

20100507-20 18:27 India "GM Biofuels: Another Planned Disaster"

"GM Biofuels: Another Planned Disaster" by Rady Ananda, Global Research

May 5, 2010, (<http://www.globalresearch.ca/index.php?context=va&aid=18988>)

Governments around the world have proposed biofuels, liquid fuels derived from plants, fungi or algae, as a solution to today's energy and environmental crises. But this alternative is as bad as, or worse, than fossil fuels.

Reasons to reject biofuels include:

- Loss of farmland for fuel land, increasing food prices and world hunger.
- Deforestation and conversion of prairie to cropland, causing a net increase in greenhouse gases.
- Increased reliance on eco-destructive pesticides.
- Proliferation of dangerous genetically modified crops.

ActionAid, I-SIS, and others, have produced in-depth reports linking biofuels to increased food prices, increased greenhouse gases thru land use changes, and loss of income for local communities.

These reasons alone are sufficient to deem biofuels a poor alternative to fossil fuels. However, the last two bulleted items raise more grave concerns.

Genetically modified corn, cane, beet, and oil seeds like soy, rapeseed, and palm oil (among other biota) are used to produce biofuels. They require "intensive" chemical inputs with far-ranging consequences for humans, Earth's pollinators, and for the environment.

GM crops have been linked to organ damage and reproductive failure in mammals, and sudden death in plants. They are also linked to the catastrophic bee die-off occurring in the U.S. and elsewhere.

GM crops contaminate natural species, destroy biodiversity and bankrupt farmers who then cannot sell to a No-GMO market. Biotech giants admit they cannot prevent contamination of natural fields.

Further, GM crops fail to yield as promised. "After more than 20 years of research and 13 years of commercialization," the Union of Concerned Scientists reports, "we conclude that GE has done little to increase overall crop yields." When promised yields didn't materialize in India, many farmers — indeed, whole families — committed suicide.

The Organic Center found that "GE crops have been responsible for an increase of 383 million pounds of herbicide use" in the U.S. from 1996 thru 2008. Weed resistance to these chemicals has skyrocketed. Resistant horseweed, ragweed and pigweed are ruining fields.

Terrifying for the biosphere, pesticides cause mass die-offs. Yale Environment 360 noted that, "three new diseases have decimated populations of amphibians, honeybees, and — most recently — bats. Increasingly, scientists suspect that low-level exposure to pesticides could be contributing to this rash of epidemics."

The 100-year experiment in chemical farming is a radical departure from 10,000 years of sustainable agriculture. Chemical farming has proven its failure to humanity and ecosystems. When chemical companies get into the ag business, they aim to sell chemicals. You know a tree by its fruit. Monsanto (Agent Orange, Vietnam), Dow (DDT, Bhopal), and Bayer (Zyklon B, Nazi camps) plan to increase the use of pesticides and biotechnology globally. They must be stopped.

If their history isn't enough cause for alarm, these biotech firms suppress independent scientific study. In Nature Biotechnology, Emily Waltz noted that the industry's "reluctance to share its products with scientists ... is fueling the view that companies have something to hide."

We can have little confidence in an industry that secretly foisted GM crops onto the world while banning independent investigation into potential harm. Waltz reports that so few papers turned up when one researcher reviewed the literature for toxicity studies on commercialized GM crops, that he asked, "Where is the scientific evidence showing that GM plants/food are toxicologically safe?"

A more logical and far saner and safer solution for the energy and environmental crises we face today is to develop programs that reduce energy consumption:

- Expand mass transportation.
- Buy local, and support community gardens and farmers markets.
- Enable the four-day work week.
- Restore public ownership of mass media which thrives on consumerism.
- End biotech subsidies.

We need to shift the entire Western culture toward living simply, in harmony with nature. Instead of finding new fuel, let's use less.

20100507-21	19:30	SteveB	Re: "GM Biofuels: Another Planned Disaster" & "5 Companies Making Fuel from Algae Now"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear India,

I agree completely that using food, like corn, to make fuel is a really stupid idea that raises the price of food for everybody.

But there are some very promising projects using algae that look very good. The algae "eat" carbon dioxide, sometimes from coal burning plants, and produce oxygen as well as fuel. Normally the algae is contained in some sort of bioreactor. There are problems with any form of energy production. It's a very difficult problem, but biofuel surely has to be one of the interim solutions before we get to fusion.

"5 Companies Making Fuel From Algae Now" by Jeremy Jacquot, Popular Mechanics

Oct. 13, 2009 (<http://www.popularmechanics.com/science/energy/biofuel/4333722>)

(Algae is now a burgeoning sector in biofuels with several high-profile start-ups. Here are 5 projects leading the pack today.)

Ubiquitous and easy to grow, algae has long been a promising biomass-to-fuel candidate in the eyes of researchers. Now algae is a burgeoning sector in biofuels with several high-profile start-ups, including Craig Venter's Synthetic Genomics, and the interest of big-time investors like Bill Gates and ExxonMobil. Of course, hurdles still exist to make a competitive fuel. Algal biofuels still cost too much to produce—over $8 a gallon (pdf), according to the DOE. Furthermore, most existing strains do not yield oil in the quantities needed to quickly scale up to commercial production of biofuels. Companies also need to worry about contaminating local ecosystems and the amount of water needed to grow cultures in large batches. Despite these challenges inroads—and actual fuel—are being made in the nascent field. Here are 5 projects leading the pack today.

1. Algenol Biofuels

The Project — $850 million committed to build algae farm that sells ethanol fuel for $3 per gallon

The Location — Sonoran Desert (Mexico)

The Technology — The company's goal is to produce fuel directly from the algae without killing or harvesting the creatures, allowing for a shorter turnaround time to make fuel. The company claims its process lets it make around 6000 gallons per acre per year.

To Market — Production is expected to begin by the end of 2010. Algenol intends to produce 1 billion gallons annually by 2012. They say their production costs will be around 85 cents per gallon.

2. Solix Biofuels

The Project — A demonstration facility that could produce up to 3000 gallons of algal biofuels per acre per year by the end of 2009

The Location — Coyote Gulch, Colo.

The Technology — Solix uses specialized photo-bioreactors in which batches of microalgal cultures are grown in large, closed-growth chambers under controlled light and temperature conditions. The company claims its closed systems can produce up to seven times as much biomass as open-pond systems. Once the cultures are fully grown, their oil is extracted through the use of chemical solvents like benzene or ether. The solvents are mixed into the chambers to separate the oil from the algae, and it is then collected from the surface. Solix is also collaborating with the Los Alamos National Laboratory to use its acoustic-focusing technology to concentrate algal cells into a dense mixture by blasting them with sound waves. Oil can then be extracted from the mixture by squeezing it out; this makes the extraction process much easier and cheaper, obviating the need for chemical solvents.

To Market — Tentatively by the winter of 2009.

3.Sapphire Energy

The Project — A 300-acre integrated algal biorefinery

The Location — Southern New Mexico

The Technology — Sapphire's focus is on "green crude," a liquid that has the same composition as crude oil, and is therefore compatible with existing refineries. The company has already shown that its fuel can be used in cars and even jets. Sapphire has a 100-acre pilot facility near Las Cruces, N.M.

To Market — The plan is to make 1 million gallons of diesel and jet fuel per year by 2011, 100 million by 2018, and 1 billion gallons per year by 2025. There are no figures as of yet for the now-running 300-acre facility.

4.Solazyme

The Project — Along with Sustainable Oils (camelina-based biofuel) and Honeywell subsidiary UOP (biodiesel), Solazyme plans to supply 400,000 gallons of fuel to the Air Force and 190,000 gallons to the U.S. Navy 1500 gallons of jet fuel for the U.S. Navy by 2010.

The Location — South San Francisco

The Technology — Solazyme engineers designer algal cultures using DNA from different strains to maximize oil production and size and grows them in large fermentation vessels before harvesting their oil. It first tested its jet fuel in late 2008.

To Market — Solazyme claims that it is on track to produce over 20,000 gallons of fuel for the Navy by 2010. The company hopes to bring the cost of its fuel down to $60 to $80 per barrel within next two to three years.

5.Seambiotic

The Project — 5-hectare commercial plant

The Location — Israel

The Technology — Seambiotic grows microalgal cultures in open ponds using flue gases like carbon dioxide and nitrogen from a nearby coal plant as feedstocks. Its 1000-square-meter facility produces roughly 23,000 grams of algae per day—three tons of algal biomass would yield around 100 to 200 gallons of biofuel. It recently formed a partnership with NASA to optimize the growth rates of its microalgae.

To Market — Up and running since 2003, Seambiotic set up a pilot plant in 2005. Seambiotic expects its commercial plant to be ready by late 2009.

20100507-22 23:48 BrentR Re: The U.S. of A.

Well, well, this has really been fun!! First of all I would like to apologize to GaryF!!! Yes I am sure it is not 99%, but I still hold that it would be a very high number!! There are a lot of Euros who have it almost as good as the Americans have it! All getting fat and sassy and less work more money!! Less Work more benefits!! ETC!! This is coming to an end soon, so enjoy it while it lasts!!

And Marissa had a lot of great thoughts on the subject!! But let's look at immigration just one minute!! One of the reason of the U.S.'s great success in the past was due to immigration!! So many cultures and ideals coming together and the freedom to make those ideals work!! Let's not forget that most of us our grandparents and/or our great grandparents were immigrants to the U.S.!! Most of them (not all) came to this country with not much more then the clothes upon their backs!! Many did very well, some not as well but most did way better than they did back where they came from!!

However, one big difference was most of them went through Ellis Island (or similar) and signed in and most of them applied for citizenship, instead of crossing the Rio Grande under a moonlight night! Although there are many of these illegals that come over and try to live off the free government programs, or live lives of crimes the majority of these people are hard working folks that do the work fat lazy spoiled Americans would never be caught dead doing nowadays!!! I have met many illegals and all are people with red blood beating hearts and feelings just like you and me, with the exception that they were not born into a middle class or high class family as was most of us on this thread!!!!

As for the oil!!! Well I work in the oil business and have for 35 years!! Even though I do work in the biz it does not mean I really support the use of hydrocarbons!!! Yes they are for sure messing up the world at a faster pace in the last 100 hundred years then 10,000 year prior!! However how do we change ??? This is the question!!! It is easy to say stop driving our cars, stop using electricity!! Hummmmm electric cars?? not really because most of the electricity also comes from hydrocarbon generated plants!! Biofuels!! HAHA even worse!! not only does that drive food prices up but the environmental drawbacks are even worse!!

A few years ago I met a girl in Ecuador in a line at the bank waiting to change money!! I obviously knew she was a gringa!! So to speak with someone from home was a treat for me and I struck up a conversation!! She told me she was from New York!! She was touring the jungle the mountains and soon going to Galapagos!! She then asked me if I also was a tourist?? I told her no I actually live here in Quito!! "Wow that is so cool, what do you do??" Well I told her I was in the oil business..... you should have seen the look that took over her face!!! "Oh you're one of those guys!!! Destroying the world and the jungle and everything bad that is happening is your fault!!

Well I admitted that I was one of those bad demon guys!! And I am sorry!! I then asked her "How did you get down here??" "Oh we flew on Continental they had a great deal!!" Ah yeah ??? hummmmm so you flew??? Well do you know how much fuel and oil it took to fly your little spoiled a*s down here to Ecuador?? Also you told me you live in New York, I bet it gets cold there!! I bet you have a heater in your house to keep those little buns warm!! Also I bet you have a car!! That takes gasoline and oil to keep it going!! Anyway she thought about it a bit and agreed a bit with me!! I also took her out to our site and showed her the ways that we are trying to take the oil with as little environmental impact as possible!! But truth is guys unfortunately it is big money to a few who control everything and they will fight us tooth and nail to keep us from changing until we all stick together and stand up to them !!! Which I doubt we ever will!!! Because most of us are to comfortable with the way things are!!!

Well I have rattled on long enough again!!

20100508-01	04:22	SteveB	The "Church"—Chpt. 19: "Catholics Sent Predator Priest to Remote Village" & "Pope Accepts Resignation of German Bishop Accused of Abuse"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

I'm just about completely sick of this story, just as I am sick of the Church, itself, but I think just a couple of comments are in order. The Church has proven once and for all what everyone should have already known:

1. It is fully capable of unspeakable evil, then guilty of trying to hide the truth.
2. It is guided solely by men, not by some deity.
3. It can no longer claim some higher moral ground and try to make the rest of us feel guilty or inferior. It can no longer dictate morality as if it had some kind of "hot line" to God. It can be wrong like the rest of us.
4. Gee! Maybe it's even wrong about celibacy, women's rights, gay rights, abortion, birth control, deserving tax free status, divorce, fish on Fridays, etc., etc. Wow! Maybe even the actual words of Christ himself were different than the re-write 100 and more years later, edited by none other than the Church itself!
5. It operates much like the mafia or any other crime family.

6. Gee! If the mighty Church itself can be so wrong, maybe, just maybe, every other charlatan who preaches that he knows the mind of God is also a liar and a fraud. Just maybe.

7. Maybe God is in the hearts of all of us, equally, and all we have to do is know the truth and it will set us free.

People of the world, please wake up! (And join the "Church of Steve". Send those dollars and be saved! haha.) I give you Exhibits 17 and 18 (below).

"Catholics Sent Predator Priest to Remote Village" by Michelle Faul and Carley Petesch, AP

May 8, 2010, (<http://www.newsday.com/news/world/catholics-sent-predator-priest-to-remote-village-1.1901936>)

(MAKANKA, Sierra Leone) A rutted red dirt track leads to the "bar," a couple of homemade wood benches in the shade of an old tree dripping with wild mangoes. Within easy reach, there's a yellow plastic jerry can of the fiery palm wine the American priest loved.

A 40-year-old schoolteacher now charges that the Rev. James Tully gave the palm wine to teenage boys to make them more susceptible to his advances.

This faraway corner of West Africa — with no electricity or piped water — is where the Roman Catholic Church sent Tully, twice. The teacher told The Associated Press that Tully abused him and other boys repeatedly during his first stint in Sierra Leone, from 1979 to 1985. After a conviction in the U.S. for giving minors alcohol and groping them, the church sent Tully back to Sierra Leone for a second stint from 1994 to 1998.

Tully's story is an example of how the church transferred abusive priests from country to country, in a scandal now emerging worldwide. But it also shows the deep reluctance to come out against a Catholic priest in many parts of Africa.

Catholic Archbishop Buti Tlhagale of Johannesburg cautioned this month that the scandals in the church were not particular to the United States and Europe.

"It simply means that the misbehavior of priests in Africa has not been exposed to the same glare of the media as in other parts of the world," Tlhagale said.

The shade and occasional breeze are the only relief from the unrelenting 100-degree (38-degree Celsius) heat matched by 100 percent humidity that has men lifting their shirts to fan bellies and black skin glistening with sweat. The only sound is the chirping of long-billed birds attracted to a nearby rice paddy.

It was in these villages that Tully demanded oral sex, called "lollipopping" in the Krio dialect, the teacher said.

"He would want us to play with his penis, to arouse him; not even to just play with it but to put it in your mouth," said the teacher, who asked to remain anonymous because he works at a Catholic school and fears he could be fired.

Asked if the sex had gone any further, tears welled in the teacher's eyes and he turned away: "I don't want to remember that. After all these years, I still can't talk about it. It makes me hot all over."

Tully would not comment about these accusations when approached by The Associated Press in New Jersey, where he now lives. The Catholic Church says it never received any complaints about Tully's behavior in Sierra Leone.

"No family member or friends or associates of any victim that was sexually abused has come forward to inform or report to me that he has been sexually abused by Father Tully," said Bishop Giorgio Biguzzi of Makeni, who was bishop through all the years Tully was based in his northern diocese.

Such responses do not surprise the Sierra Leonean schoolteacher.

"Who would believe a young village boy over a white priest?" he asked.

He complained about the abuse to his uncle, who had helped bring him up after his father died. "My uncle pleaded with me, asking me if I couldn't 'cope' with this thing since it was the only way for me to get an education."

At least one boy refused to put up with it, according to a police officer from Kamakwei, a northern town near the border with Guinea.

The officer, who asked not to be identified because he is Catholic and fears being shunned by the church, said his cousin and several other youngsters lived in the parish priest's house in Kamalo, where Tully was based in the 1980s.

His cousin lived there for two years with other boys who were receiving scholarships from Tully. The compound was always filled with boys, sometimes playing soccer, and Tully rode around with them on the back of his pickup truck.

That was a familiar sight in many villages, according to more than two dozen people interviewed by the AP. Tully took boys with him on weekend trips to villages where he built up schools and churches, and stayed overnight so he could say Mass on Sundays.

Tully had picked the cousin out as the brightest student in Kamakwie when he was about 14, and told the family he would take care of his education if they let him come to Kamalo. But after two years "(my cousin) ran away and came home. He told us that the priest was always calling him to lie in his bed and urging him to caress him."

The family did nothing, the policeman said, "because we were not sure whether we should believe the boy, and also the status of the man was high." He said Tully was the top-ranking Catholic in the area, and headmasters at Catholic schools there reported to him.

He said his cousin completed his education at the Catholic school in Kamakwie but was killed by rebels during the war.

Tully left Sierra Leone for the United States in 1985. There, a seminarian in Milwaukee, William Nash, accused Tully of abusing him between 1986 and 1988. In 2005, Nash received a $75,000 out-of-court settlement from the Xaverians, though Tully did not admit to any wrongdoing.

"I had my own experience and I was horrified about it. I'm angry that the church has allowed a man to function in the church in this religious order for 30 years. And that's criminal," Nash told the AP in a telephone interview from his home in western Massachusetts.

In the early 1990s, Tully also was accused of escorting three teenage boys to a baseball game in Franklin, Wisconsin, giving them alcohol and groping one of the youths. Tully signed an affidavit that said, "I am pleading no contest because I understand what I am charged with and believe I would be found guilty."

He was convicted of disorderly conduct in 1992. He was sentenced to two years' probation and barred from unsupervised contact with juveniles.

Tully was transferred to the Institute of the Living in Hartford, Connecticut, which specializes in sexual disorders and has treated hundreds of priests. There he received psychotherapy and made "very good progress," according to a letter from the institute to the Wisconsin court.

"He has never denied responsibility for his sexual behavior and has come to realize the damage that this has inflicted on the others," says the May 1992 letter.

The Rev. Carl Chudy, current U.S. superior of the Xaverian Missionaries order based in Wayne, New Jersey, said Tully's therapist said he could return to Africa so long as he had supervised encounters with youth, therapy and ongoing support.

"I assume Sierra Leone agreed to this because when his probation was over, he left," Chudy said.

Yet the church sent him back to Sierra Leone apparently without ever investigating his activities there. And most of his work was with teenagers — organizing soccer teams, drama clubs and choirs in scrabble-poor villages.

He left in 1998, when he was evacuated during the nation's brutal 10-year civil war.

The Xaverians finally laicized Tully in February 2009, after Nash, the Wisconsin seminarian, went on a mission to have him defrocked. Chudy said the decision was Tully's and was approved by the pope last year.

Chudy said there is a very strict policy in place today: "In the past obvious missteps were made due to what was known at the time. We are quite committed to protecting young people from the few who have caused such great damage," he said.

Rev. Carlo Girola, an official of the Xaverians' general administration in Rome, said there were no accusations or suspicions regarding Tully's first stay in Sierra Leone to make the Xaverians feel they had to investigate.

Girola said the regional supervisor in Sierra Leone, Father Piero Lazzarini, was informed about the "situation and conditions" imposed for Tully's return to the country. Lazzarini spoke of this to Father Luigi Brioni, the pastor in Magburaka where Tully was then sent. According to Girola, Brioni "never informed Lazzarini of any incidents related to this problem."

Some who worked with Tully for years in Sierra Leone praised his good works.

"I know him as someone who was always assisting children, paying their school fees, helping them get into college," said Ahmed Polo Samura, a human rights activist and child protection officer in Kamakwie who knew Tully from the time he was an altar boy in church.

Mark Saidu, a farmer in Makali, said Tully converted him from Islam when he was 14 years old in 1984 and helped pay for his education at Catholic schools.

"Father Jim had lots and lots of friends. He was a man who loved to socialize," Saidu said. "And he was popular around here because he would travel around with a generator and show films in the villages. And with the soccer competitions, that could be the only entertainment people would have for months."

Augustine Sorie Bangura is described by many as Tully's greatest friend in Sierra Leone. Bangura, 48, said Tully encouraged him to write letters to the priest's friends in the United States to garner donations that built the first health clinic to the village. Before that, people had to walk 16 miles (26 kilometers) to the hospital in Kamalo.

Bangura and many others spoke of Tully's love of strong liquor, some said to the point of incoherent drunkenness.

"He would use palm wine to get people together to evangelize them, and he would also use palm wine to encourage the youths to join us in singing. That man loved palm wine," said choir master John Abdulai Kamara.

Some, though, say Tully's use of palm wine was more sinister: "He would take us boys to go palm wine drinking and would always encourage us to drink, saying, 'It's nice. Have some more.' You could say he lured us into drinking, and that stuff is so strong that just one sip can make your head spin," said the teacher who told the AP Tully molested him.

The teacher said he has long been disillusioned with the Catholic Church. "They shattered my dreams," he said.

The man studied to become a monk and teacher with the Irish-based Christian Brothers order, but said he left when the head of the seminary tried to abuse him.

The teacher said that if victims of sexual abuse by priests were assured they would not be punished for telling the truth, "you would see many, many, many people coming forward."

(Carley Petesch reported from Johannesburg. Associated Press writer Frances D'Emilio in Rome and David Porter in Wayne, New Jersey contributed to this report.)

"Pope Accepts Resignation of German Bishop Accused of Abuse" by Frances D'Emilio, AP

May 8, 2010, (http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_15047220?source=pkg)

(VATICAN CITY) A leading German bishop who has acknowledged slapping children and is being investigated for sexual abuse of minors and financial misconduct lost his job Saturday as Pope Benedict XVI continued cleaning house.

The German-born pontiff formally accepted the resignation offer made April 21 by Bishop Walter Mixa, an outspoken conservative voice in the German church and a military chaplain for Germany, as well as head of the Augsburg diocese.

Mixa's posting to Augsburg in summer 2005 was among the first appointments Benedict made at the start of his papacy.

The terse Vatican announcement, without commenting on the abuse allegations, only said the decision was in line with canon law provisions for bishops no longer fit for service.

Mixa had offered to step down amid persistent allegations that he hit children while a priest decades ago and of financial irregularities at a children's home he was responsible for.

Pressure on the Vatican to get him out of the post increased on Friday, when the Augsburg diocese said, without further details, that it had given prosecutors information in line with German church guidelines for handling sex abuse cases.

Mixa, 69, is the latest in a line of churchmen to be toppled by scandals.

The Vatican is reeling from allegations that bishops and other church hierarchy systematically covered up physical or sexual abuse of minors in several European countries. In some cases, like that of Mixa, bishops have themselves been accused of abuse.

In a reference to the sex abuse revelations staining dioceses in several European countries this year, Benedict said Saturday that the church was being "tried" and "wounded" by sin.

In Germany, We Are The Church, a lobby for church reform, voiced "relief" that Benedict accepted Mixa's resignation but pushed for more aggressive action by the Vatican for transparency on the selection on bishops.

"To not increase further the loss of standing and credibility for the Catholic church well beyond the Augsburg diocese, it remains necessary to clear up all accusations comprehensively and as quickly as possible," it said.

Mixa's resignation, along with those recently of other compromised bishops in Ireland, Norway and Belgium, raise both "increasingly pressing questions" on how bishops are chosen and calls for local church involvement in the vetting process behind the Vatican's selection of bishops, We Are The Church said.

But Belgium's bishops dismissed just such an appeal for local voice when answering a reporter's question shortly after they met with the pope, indicating that the choice of a replacement for the Bruges bishop, who recently resigned after admitted he sexually abused a boy, was firmly in the hands of the Vatican.

In the Mixa case, German daily Augsburger Allgemeine reported that Ingolstadt prosecutors had launched a preliminary investigation of allegations that he sexually abused a boy during his time as bishop of Eichstaett from 1996 to 2005.

Prosecutors confirmed a preliminary investigation against Mixa but gave no details.

"I have spoken with him by telephone ... and he said that he resolutely rejects these accusations," Mixa's lawyer, Gerhard Decker, said on n-tv television. Mixa has disappeared from public view since offering his resignation.

Archbishop Robert Zollitsch, who heads Germany's bishops conference, thanked Benedict for letting Mixa resign, saying that "the pope's swift decision brings the necessary clarity."

The Augsburg diocese's vicar general, Karlheinz Knebel, said that "with our actions, we are following the German bishops' demands for transparency and truth." He urged clerics and rank-and-file faithful to "preserve the unity of the church in this difficult time."

Mixa, who has asked of "those whom I may have caused heartache," initially denied ever using violence against youngsters but later, after intense pressure, said he may have slapped children.

The case, coming in the country of Benedict's birth and involving a prelate who was a key member of Germany's bishops conference for more than a decade, was particularly embarrassing for the German church and faithful. German church authorities say the number of people leaving the church has increased sharply since abuse allegations started surfacing in recent months.

The strains of the scandals seem to be dividing the top echelons of the church itself.

An Austrian Catholic news agency Kathpress reported on Friday that Vienna Cardinal Christoph Schoenborn blasted the Vatican's dean of the college of cardinals for seriously harming victims when, during Easter Sunday Mass in St. Peter's Square, Cardinal Angelo Sodano dismissed claims of clerical abuse as "petty gossip."

Schoenborn, a confidante of Benedict's and considered by Vatican watchers to be potential pope material himself, had already indirectly blamed Sodano for blocking a probe of sex abuse allegations against late Austrian Cardinal Hans Hermann Groer, who stepped down, officially for advanced age, after the complaints surfaced.

Belgian Archbishop Andre Leonard said that during their meeting Saturday Benedict "made concrete allusion to the drama our church is going through" due to the "grave" abuses which "wounded the church.

Benedict in his speech to the bishops lamented that the Belgian church was afflicted with some of the problems vexing churches in other European countries, notably dwindling numbers of both flock and ministers.

Benedict has been leading a campaign to invigorate what he calls the continent's Christian roots, but his efforts risk being eclipsed by the attention the Vatican has had to dedicate to the sex abuse scandals.

The latest scandals followed Benedict's scathing rebuke earlier this year of Irish bishops, after a government-led probe of church abuse in heavily Catholic Ireland turned up decades of systematic sexual and physical abuse of children in parishes, orphanages, schools and workhouses by priests, brothers and nuns, and cover-ups by church hierarchy.

(Associated Press reporter Geir Moulson contributed to this report from Berlin.)

20100508-02	13:19	Dick	Fw: Illegal Border Crossings
-------------	-------	------	------------------------------

IF YOU CROSS THE NORTH KOREAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU GET 12 YEARS HARD LABOR.

IF YOU CROSS THE IRANIAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU ARE DETAINED INDEFINITELY.

IF YOU CROSS THE AFGHAN BORDER ILLEGALLY, YOU GET SHOT.

IF YOU CROSS THE SAUDI ARABIAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU WILL BE JAILED.

IF YOU CROSS THE CHINESE BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU MAY NEVER BE HEARD FROM AGAIN.

IF YOU CROSS THE VENEZUELAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU WILL BE BRANDED A SPY AND YOUR FATE WILL BE SEALED.

IF YOU CROSS THE CUBAN BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU WILL BE THROWN INTO POLITICAL PRISON TO ROT.

IF YOU CROSS THE U.S. BORDER ILLEGALLY YOU GET:

1. A JOB
2. A DRIVERS LICENSE
3. SOCIAL SECURITY CARD
4. WELFARE
5. FOOD STAMPS
6. CREDIT CARDS
7. SUBSIDIZED RENT OR A LOAN TO BUY A HOUSE
8. FREE EDUCATION
9. FREE HEALTH CARE
10. A LOBBYIST IN WASHINGTON
11. BILLIONS OF DOLLARS WORTH OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS PRINTED IN YOUR LANGUAGE
12. AND THE RIGHT TO CARRY YOUR COUNTRY'S FLAG WHILE YOU PROTEST THAT YOU DON'T GET ENOUGH RESPECT.

I JUST WANTED TO MAKE SURE I HAD A FIRM GRASP ON THE SITUATION.

20100510-01 09:12 Ben Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19

from SteveB:

Maybe God is in the hearts of all of us, equally, and all we have to do is know the truth and it will set us free.

Dear SteveB,

This is Alan Steele's premise, presented in his Coyote works as an alien philosophy, that everyone is God, and God is in everyone.

I rather like it; it puts into words exactly what I feel about religion myself. That in almost all individuals, there is a basic good that more often than not prevails. What happens, though, when you get more than a few people together can become something else, quickly.

20100510-02 10:47 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19

Dear Ben,

It's really what is at the heart of Buddhism. Maybe even Christianity. I've read that the supposed words of Jesus (which are totally unknown, really) were mistranslated from the Greek, when he said, "I am a son of God," not, "I am the son of God." Maybe Jesus was a Buddhist, huh? The philosophy of love, the statement that "God is love", the disappearance for, what, seven years...all make me think it is possible. But the Jewish mind of the times was not able to think in that direction. The cultural differences were just too great. In fact, that is probably the case whether Jesus was a Buddhist or not. Too bad he didn't find at least one disciple who could read and write. Wonder why "God" didn't understand all this? If he did, I guess he just doesn't give a damn.

As to "what happens, though, when you get more than a few people together"...evil is also part of the mind of God, same as good, or the entire universe, for that matter...just maybe...

20100510-03 11:46 Ben Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19

Dear SteveB,

The same associate rector at my church who burst out "Come on, people, it's a MYTH!" during a sermon that referred to the resurrection has also mentioned the ablation of articles in the "I am a son of God" passage, and others, often. He's fluent in Greek and Aramaic, and loves to point out the mistranslations that make the English bible so self-contradictory and misleading.

Jesus was probably a pretty good guy, and he and Buda would have got along great. I doubt there would have been any disagreement at all. And I am sure that the real Jesus would have been horrified at the many dogmatic organizations that preach "his" word as law. He was very much against centralized temples and large-scale organization; that much is so very clear even from our edited, politicized remains of what he is said to have taught.

I think this is why the Episcopalians are always happy to hear other views. If you put them all into a box, you'd find just about every possible viewpoint — even mine. I buy almost none of what's in the Bible, least of all in the New Testament, but find the allegory of history in the OT kind of interesting. Rather like the Pirate Handbook, it's more like guidelines than a rule book... and even those are often contradictory.

20100510-04 12:15 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 19

Dear Ben,

Cool! The Church of Steve largely agrees. :-)

20100513-01	11:00	Phil	Fw: Coming Changes
-----------------------------	-------	------	--------------------

Heads up. A few interesting things that are on the horizon.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Whether these changes are good or bad depends in part on how we adapt to them. But, ready or not, here they come!

1. The Post Office

Get ready to imagine a world without the post office. They are so deeply in financial trouble that there is probably no way to sustain it long term. Email, Fed Ex, and UPS have just about wiped out the minimum revenue needed to keep the post office alive. Most of your mail every day is junk mail and bills.

2. The Check

Britain is already laying the groundwork to do away with checks by 2018. It costs the financial system billions of dollars a year to process checks. Plastic cards and online transactions will lead to the eventual demise of the check. This plays right into the death of the post office. If you never paid your bills by mail and never received them by mail, the post office would absolutely go out of business.

3. The Newspaper

The younger generation simply doesn't read the newspaper. They certainly don't subscribe to a daily delivered print edition. That may go the way of the milkman and the laundry man. As for reading the paper online, get ready to pay for it. The rise in mobile Internet devices and e-readers has caused all the newspaper and magazine publishers to form an alliance. They have met with Apple, Amazon, and the major cell phone companies to develop a model for paid subscription services.

4. The Book

You say you will never give up the physical book that you hold in your hand and turn the literal pages. I said the same thing about downloading music from iTunes. I wanted my hard copy CD. But I quickly changed my mind when I discovered that I could get albums for half the price without ever leaving home to get the latest music. The same thing will happen with books. You can browse a bookstore online and even read a preview chapter before you buy. And the price is less than half that of a real book. And think of the convenience! Once you start flicking your fingers on the screen instead of the book, you find that you are lost in the story, can't wait to see what happens next, and you forget that you're holding a gadget instead of a book.

5. The Land-Line Telephone

Unless you have a large family and make a lot of local calls, you don't need it anymore. Most people keep it simply because they're always had it. But you are paying double charges for that extra service. All the cell phone companies will let you call customers using the same cell provider for no charge against your minutes.

6. Music

This is one of the saddest parts of the change story. The music industry is dying a slow death. Not just because of illegal downloading. It's the lack of innovative new music being given a chance to get to the people who would like to hear it. Greed and corruption is the problem. The record labels and the radio conglomerates simply self-destruct. Over 40% of the music purchased today is "catalog items," meaning traditional music that the public is familiar, with older established artists. This is also true on the live concert circuit. To explore this fascinating and disturbing topic further, check out the book, Appetite for Self-Destruction by Steve Knopper, and the video documentary, "Before the Music Dies."

7. Television

Revenues to the networks are down dramatically. Not just because of the economy. People are watching TV and movies streamed from their computers. And they're playing games and doing lots of other things that take up the time that used to be spent watching TV. Prime time shows have degenerated down to lower than the lowest common denominator. Cable rates are skyrocketing and commercials run about every 4 minutes and 30 seconds.

8. The "Things" That You Own

Many of the very possessions that we used to own are still in our lives, but we may not actually own them in the future. They may simply reside in "the cloud." Today your computer has a hard drive and you store your pictures, music, movies, and documents. Your software is on a CD or DVD, and you can always re-install it if need be. But all of that is changing. Apple, Microsoft, and Google are all finishing up their latest "cloud services." That means that when you turn on a computer, the Internet will be built into the operating system. So, Windows, Google, and the Mac OS will be tied straight into the Internet. If you click an icon, it will open something in the Internet cloud. If you save something, it will be saved to the cloud. And you may pay a monthly subscription fee to the cloud provider.

In this virtual world, you can access your music or your books, or your whatever from any laptop or handheld device. That's the good news. But, will you actually own any of this "stuff" or will it all be able to disappear at any moment in a big "Poof?" Will most of the things in our lives be disposable and whimsical?

9. Privacy

If there ever was a concept that we can look back on nostalgically, it would be privacy. That's gone. It's been gone for a long time anyway. There are cameras on the street, in most of the buildings, and even built into your computers and cell phones . But you can be sure that 24/7 "They" know who you are and where you are, right down to the GPS coordinates, and the Google Street View. If you buy something, your habit is put into a zillion profiles, and the ads that you receive will change to reflect those habits. Then "They" will try to get you to buy something related to your first purchase.

All we will have that can't be changed are memories. Alzheimer's will take care of that.

20100513-02	12:42	SteveB	Re: Coming Changes
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--------------------

Dear Phil,

Very interesting and, I think, very true.

Another technological change that has happened and keeps happening is that all these high tech things, and many other things like cars, become less and less repairable all the time. The components that are repairable are essentially subsystems. TV's, computers, cell phones, etc. are almost as disposable as repairable because they are largely made in factories by machines and robots, but must be repaired by humans.

And the technology of all these things is less and less understood by the average user. We are getting totally out of touch with our technology. I used to understand my car. I could tune it and make quite a few repairs, even though some things were beyond me (mainly because they were beyond the set of tools I could afford, but not beyond my understanding). Now, even good mechanics largely replace subsystems. I don't really understand the way modern cars work...not enough to do anything with them. I'm an electronics/electrical engineer, but I wouldn't begin to try to repair my TV.

All of this puts tremendous power in the hands of a relatively few companies. I don't believe that there are even any universities that completely understand what Intel is up to. And at Intel, most of the engineers really only understand one small part of the whole picture. Surely this will have implications for the future, but I can't predict what they might be. A world ruled by companies like Intel and Toyota?

Civilization becomes more and more fragile the more advanced it becomes.

There is a series of science fiction books, Ringworld, by Larry Niven. These books are about a tremendously advanced civilization in the far future. They have discovered, among many other things, a plastic that is superconducting. Their entire civilization of space ships and levitated buildings depends upon this plastic. One day, a roving space ship returns to Ringworld unknowingly carrying a bacteria that happens to love eating the superconducting plastic. Very soon, the entire civilization crashes to the ground, literally, and reverts back, largely, to primitive savages in the jungle.

In another sci-fi series, The Mote in God's Eye, by Larry Niven and Jerry Pournelle, a far future species known as the "Moties", who have an ancient, ancient civilization that goes through cycles of tremendous technological advance, then war, and finally, chaos, with primitives roving the jungles. They have learned that, in order to jump start the process of climbing back toward civilization, they must establish fortified libraries containing all of their advanced knowledge that the primitives can use as they become more advanced.

Maybe it's time that we established something similar.

20100521-01	15:13	SteveB	"A Step to Artificial Life: Manmade DNA Powers Cell"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Maybe I'm just old-fashioned, but I think this is very bad news indeed!!! And not because of any "God thing". More because of a "non-God thing".

"A Step to Artificial Life: Manmade DNA Powers Cell" by Lauren Neergaard, AP

May 20, 2010, (<http://www.newsday.com/business/a-step-to-artificial-life-manmade-dna-powers-cell-1.1926648>)

(WASHINGTON) Scientists announced a bold step Thursday in the enduring quest to create artificial life. They've produced a living cell powered by manmade DNA.

While such work can evoke images of Frankenstein-like scientific tinkering, it also is exciting hopes that it could eventually lead to new fuels, better ways to clean polluted water, faster vaccine production and more.

Is it really an artificial life form?

The inventors call it the world's first synthetic cell, although this initial step is more a re-creation of existing life — changing one simple type of bacterium into another — than a built-from-scratch kind.

But Maryland genome-mapping pioneer J. Craig Venter said his team's project paves the way for the ultimate, much harder goal: designing organisms that work differently from the way nature intended for a wide range of uses. Already he's working with ExxonMobil in hopes of turning algae into fuel.

"This is the first self-replicating species we've had on the planet whose parent is a computer," Venter told reporters.

And the report, being published Friday in the journal Science, is triggering excitement in this growing field of synthetic biology.

"It's been a long time coming, and it was worth the wait," said Dr. George Church, a Harvard Medical School genetics professor. "It's a milestone that has potential practical applications."

Following the announcement, President Barack Obama directed the Presidential Commission for the Study of Bioethical Issues he established last fall to make its first order of business a study of the milestone.

"The commission should consider the potential medical, environmental, security and other benefits of this field of research, as well as any potential health, security or other risks," Obama wrote in a letter to the commission's chairwoman, Amy Gutmann, the president of the University of Pennsylvania.

Obama also asked that the commission develop recommendations about any actions the government should take "to ensure that America reaps the benefits of this developing field of science while identifying appropriate ethical boundaries and minimizing identified risks."

Scientists for years have moved single genes and even large chunks of DNA from one species to another. At his J. Craig Venter Institute in Rockville, Md., and San Diego, Venter's team aimed to go further. A few years ago, the researchers transplanted an entire natural genome — the genetic code — of one bacterium into another and watched it take over, turning a goat germ into a cattle germ.

Next, the researchers built from scratch another, smaller bacterium's genome, using off-the-shelf laboratory-made DNA fragments.

Friday's report combines those two achievements to test a big question: Could synthetic DNA really take over and drive a living cell? Somehow, it did.

"This is transforming life totally from one species into another by changing the software," said Venter, using a computer analogy to explain the DNA's role.

The researchers picked two species of a simple germ named Mycoplasma. First, they chemically synthesized the genome of M. mycoides, that goat germ, which with 1.1 million "letters" of DNA was twice as large as the germ genome they'd previously built.

Then they transplanted it into a living cell from a different Mycoplasma species, albeit a fairly close cousin.

At first, nothing happened. The team scrambled to find out why, creating a genetic version of a computer proofreading program to spell-check the DNA fragments they'd pieced together. They found that a typo in the genetic code was rendering the manmade DNA inactive, delaying the project three months to find and restore that bit.

"It shows you how accurate it has to be, one letter out of a million," Venter said.

That fixed, the transplant worked. The recipient cell started out with synthetic DNA and its original cytoplasm, but the new genome "booted up" that cell to start producing only proteins that normally would be found in the copied goat germ. The researchers had tagged the synthetic DNA to be able to tell it apart, and checked as the modified cell reproduced to confirm that new cells really looked and behaved like M. mycoides.

"All elements in the cells after some amount of time can be traced to this initial artificial DNA. That's a great accomplishment," said biological engineer Ron Weiss of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Even while praising the accomplishment — "biomolecular engineering of the highest order," declared David Deamer of the University of California, Santa Cruz — many specialists say the work hasn't yet crossed the line of truly creating new life from scratch.

It's partially synthetic, some said, because Venter's team had to stick the manmade genetic code inside a living cell from a related species. That cell was more than just a container; it also contained its own cytoplasm — the liquid part.

In other words, the synthetic part was "running on the 'hardware' of the modern cell," University of Southern Denmark physics professor Steen Rasmussen wrote in the journal Nature, which on Thursday released essays of both praise and caution from eight leaders in the field.

The environmental group Friends of the Earth said the new work took "genetic engineering to an extreme new level" and urged that Venter stop until government regulations are put in place to protect against these kind of engineered microbes escaping into the environment.

Venter said he removed 14 genes thought to make the germ dangerous to goats before doing the work, and had briefed government officials about the work over the course of several years — acknowledging that someone potentially could use this emerging field for harm instead of good.

But MIT's Weiss said it would be far easier to use existing technologies to make bioweapons: "There's a big gap between science fiction and what your imagination can do and the reality in research labs."

Venter founded Synthetic Genomics Inc., a privately held company that funded the work, and his research institute has filed patents on it.

20100526-01 13:17 Paula Fw: Video: Fog Cutter

Dear SteveB,

Thought you would appreciate some of this!

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Here's one that really cuts through the fog! The usual suspects have been trying to get this taken down but, so far, it is still running. [I don't know why anyone would take this down from anywhere, it's no big deal. More of the same lies about socialism and how all the world's problems are Obama's fault. Probably the scare tactics helped in 2010 once again. — SteveB]

<http://www.powerlineblog.com/archives/2010/01/025329.php>

20100526-02 15:07 SteveB Re: Fog Cutter

Dear Paula,

Please allow me to cut a little fog.

OK, I watched the piece. I share your concern over the state and future of our country.

But it is the totally corrupt political system that is at fault. How in the world are campaign contributions, especially big ones, not exactly like bribes? The Democrats are not at fault...nor are the Republicans. They are both equally to blame. They have both sold our country and all of us down the river. That is the truth.

These radical Republican scare tactics and personal attacks don't scare me. But the Republicans scare me, that's for sure. Funny how they always try both tactics, going all the way back to Nixon, at least. And people, I guess, never learn or remember.

This is just more Glenn Beck / Rush Limbaugh BS. Glenn Beck predicted over and over that the dollar would be finished and everything would be at an end, way before now. Yet here we are doing a little better. Where is his catastrophe that he was so hoping and praying for? What does that tell you?

Gloom and doom, gloom and doom. How original! It sounds so Biblical, yet here we are 2000 years later.

What does the amount of money those two make tell you? Gee, they couldn't be in it for the money could they? Yet they don't trust the "system"? haha

Aren't they all in it for the money and the power, not to serve the best interests of the people?

Take heart. It ain't the end of the world...yet. At least we don't have an idiot or a senile old man in the White House. :-)

20100526-03 17:03 Pam Re: Fog Cutter

Dear SteveB,

Did somebody send you this video? How did you come across it? Not that it matters.

Yes, the Republicans do scare me, mostly because I believe they've been cowed by their "base." The crazies are running the show. Or maybe they're not so much crazy as drunk with a belief in their own frenzied success. I'm talking about Glen Beck, Rush Limbaugh, and Sarah Palin specifically, and I include Newt, Cheney, GW and that whole crowd, who are gone but not forgotten. These are, to my mind, exactly the sort of people who stirred things up in 1930s Germany: the lower middle-class who feel disenfranchised and angry. (GW may not be lower middle-class, but he knows how to get into their heads.) George Orwell wrote a marvelous essay, "Politics and the English Language." It should be required reading for every American. He talks about how propaganda works and how language can be subverted. The Tea Party rants about freedom, but they don't know the meaning of the word. They've made "liberal" a dirty word, and they've convinced themselves that health care reform is code for socialism, as if socialism were by definition a horror like none other. It sickens me that the Republican party, the party of money and privilege, has delivered itself over to the ignorant and ill-educated. What irony.

I am a lifelong Democrat, but I am sadly disappointed in them too. Why doesn't Obama just throw out "don't ask, don't tell", the way Truman integrated the military? Why didn't he push harder for more comprehensive health care reform? Why didn't he—and his minions—explain and educate the public about what is at stake, rather than being so mealy-mouthed? I like Obama; I voted for him, and I am still thrilled that he was elected. And I think that once people realize they're better off with reform than they were before and if/when the economy improves, he'll stand a good chance of re-election. But now there's this dreadful oil situation—not his fault—but they'll hang it on him. Just like the war in Afghanistan, etc. etc. It will take decades to undo the damage the Bush administration did. Bush Sr. was bad enough, but I bet even he despairs at what his son has wrought. I'm not sure Obama will be able to do what needs doing. He's so intelligent and reasonable, but he's dealing with unreasonable people. LBJ might have been a bastard, but he was an s.o.b. who could get things done. I miss him.

There's so much we don't know about the wheels within wheels in government. I'm sure what we see is just the tip of the iceberg. I'm afraid I'm rather jaded. But, as you say, things haven't really changed all that much in 2000 years. Mankind seems to muddle through one crisis after another, without learning much along the way. I do see progress in history when I take the long view, but so long as there are Sudans, Somalias, Congos, and Haliburton, I don't think we're ever getting to the promised land.

Here endeth my rant for the day. :-)

20100527-01	09:04	SteveB	Fw: Mexico's Immigration Laws
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------

Hypocrisy at its best.

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says it's true. —SteveB]

TAKE A LOOK AT MEXICO'S IMMIGRATION LAW. IT APPLIES AS IS, EVEN TO LEGAL IMMIGRANTS.

The shoe is on the other foot and the Mexicans from the State of Sonora, Mexico don't like it.

Can you believe the nerve of these people? It's almost funny. The State of Sonora is angry at the influx of Mexicans into Mexico. Nine state legislators from the Mexican State of Sonora traveled to Tucson to complain about Arizona's new employer crackdown on illegals from Mexico.

It seems that many Mexican illegals are returning to their hometowns and the officials in the Sonora state government are ticked off.

A delegation of nine state legislators from Sonora was in Tucson on Tuesday to state that Arizona's new Employer Sanctions Law will have a devastating effect on the Mexican state.

At a news conference, the legislators said that Sonora—Arizona's southern neighbor, made up of mostly small towns—cannot handle the demand for housing, jobs and schools that it will face as Mexican workers return to their hometowns from the U.S. without jobs or money.

The Arizona law, which took effect Jan. 1, punishes Arizona employers who knowingly hire individuals without valid legal documents to work in the United States. Penalties include suspension of, or loss of, their business license.

The Mexican legislators are angry because their own citizens are returning to their hometowns, placing a burden on THEIR state government.

'How can Arizona pass a law like this?' asked Mexican Rep Leticia Amparano-Gamez, who represents Nogales. 'There is not one person living in Sonora who does not have a friend or relative working in Arizona,' she said, speaking in Spanish. 'Mexico is not prepared for this, for the tremendous problems it will face as more and more Mexicans working in Arizona, and who were sending money to their families, return to their hometowns in Sonora without jobs,' she said. 'We are one family, socially and economically,' she said of the people of Sonora and Arizona.

Wrong!

The United States is a sovereign nation, not a subsidiary of Mexico, and its taxpayers are not responsible for the welfare of Mexico's citizens.

It's time for the Mexican government and its citizens to stop feeding parasitically off the United States and to start taking care of their own needs.

Too bad other states within the U.S. don't pass a law just like that passed by Arizona.

Maybe that's the answer, since our own Congress will do nothing!

New Immigration Laws: (Read to the bottom or you will miss the message.)

1. There will be no special bilingual programs in the schools.
2. All ballots will be in this nation's language.
3. All government business will be conducted in our language.
4. Non-residents will NOT have the right to vote no matter how long they are here.
5. Non-citizens will NEVER be able to hold political office
- 6 Foreigners will not be a burden to the taxpayers. No welfare, no food stamps, no health care, or other
7. Foreigners can invest in this country, but it must be an amount at least equal to 40,000 times the daily minimum wage.
8. If foreigners come here and buy land, options will be restricted. Certain parcels, including waterfront property, are reserved for citizens naturally born into this country.
9. Foreigners may have no protests, no demonstrations, no waving of a foreign flag, no political organizing, no bad-mouthing our president or his policies. These will lead to deportation.
10. If you come to this country illegally, you will be actively hunted and, when caught, sent to jail until your deportation can be arranged. All assets will be taken from you.

Too strict?

The above laws are current immigration laws of MEXICO!

20100527-02	13:45	Marci	Re: Mexico's Immigration Laws
-----------------------------	-------	-------	-------------------------------

All the U.S. has to do it is apply its laws.

They don't want to do it because they pay less to the illegal immigrants. They means the businesses. Only they benefit from illegal immigrants. The taxpayers have to support the illegal immigrants' social needs and the society in general suffers from crime and ugliness.

It is one small group who benefits in detriment to the whole society. It is amazing that the U.S. allows that small group of businesses to damage the U.S. so much. It is a shame.

20100527-03 14:03 SteveB Re: Mexico's Immigration Laws

Dear Marci,

I agree with you completely.

20100527-04 11:29 Tom Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

Great political humor:

20100527-05 23:29 Tom "President's Socialist Takeover Must Be Stopped"

[The guy who wrote this is obviously a lunatic. —SteveB]

"President's Socialist Takeover Must Be Stopped" by Jeffrey T. Kuhner, The Washington Times

July 22, 2010, (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/jul/22/the-case-for-impeachment-142967590/>)

President Obama has engaged in numerous high crimes and misdemeanors. The Democratic majority in Congress is in peril as Americans reject his agenda. Yet more must be done: Mr. Obama should be impeached.

He is slowly—piece by painful piece—erecting a socialist dictatorship. We are not there—yet. But he is putting America on that dangerous path. He is undermining our constitutional system of checks and balances; subverting democratic procedures and the rule of law; presiding over a corrupt, gangster regime; and assaulting the very pillars of traditional capitalism. Like Venezuela's leftist strongman, Hugo Chavez, Mr. Obama is bent on imposing a revolution from above—one that is polarizing America along racial, political and ideological lines. Mr. Obama is the most divisive president since Richard Nixon. His policies are Balkanizing the country. It's time for him to go.

He has abused his office and violated his oath to uphold the Constitution. His health care overhaul was rammed through Congress. It was—and remains—opposed by a majority of the people. It could only be passed through bribery and political intimidation. The Louisiana Purchase, the Cornhusker Kickback, the $5 billion Medicaid set-aside for Florida Sen. Bill Nelson—taxpayer money was used as a virtual slush fund to buy swing votes. Moreover, the law is blatantly unconstitutional: The federal government does not have the right to coerce every citizen to purchase a good or service. This is not in the Constitution, and it represents an unprecedented expansion of power.

Yet Obamacare's most pernicious aspect is its federal funding of abortion. Pro-lifers are now compelled to have their tax dollars used to subsidize insurance plans that allow for the murder of unborn children. This is more than state-sanctioned infanticide. It violates the conscience rights of religious citizens. Traditionalists—evangelicals, Catholics, Baptists, Muslims, Orthodox Jews—have been made complicit in an abomination that goes against their deepest religious values. As the law is implemented (as in Pennsylvania) the consequences of the abortion provisions will become increasingly apparent. The result will be a cultural civil war. Pro-lifers will become deeply alienated from society; among many, a secession of the heart is taking place.

Mr. Obama is waging a frontal assault on property rights. The BP oil spill is a case in point. BP clearly is responsible for the spill and its massive economic and environmental damage to the Gulf. There is a legal process for claims to be adjudicated, but Mr. Obama has behaved more like Mr. Chavez or Russia's Vladimir Putin: He has bullied BP into setting up a $20 billion compensation fund administered by an Obama appointee. In other words, the assets of a private company are to be raided to serve a political agenda. Billions will be dispensed arbitrarily in compensation to oil-spill victims - much of it to Democratic constituents. This is cronyism and creeping authoritarianism.

Mr. Obama's multicultural socialism seeks to eradicate traditional America. He has created a command-and-control health care system. He has essentially nationalized the big banks, the financial sector, the automakers and the student loan industry. He next wants to pass "cap-and-trade," which would bring industry and manufacturing under the heel of big government. The state is intervening in every aspect of American life - beyond its constitutionally delegated bounds. Under Mr. Obama, the Constitution has become a meaningless scrap of paper.

To provide the shock troops for his socialist takeover, Mr. Obama calls for "comprehensive immigration reform" - granting amnesty to 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens. This would forge a permanent Democratic electoral majority. It would sound the death knell for our national sovereignty. Amnesty rewards lawlessness and criminal behavior; it signifies the surrender of our porous southern border to a massive illegal invasion. It means the death of American nationhood. We will no longer be a country, but the colony of a global socialist empire.

Rather than defending our homeland, Mr. Obama's Justice Department has sued Arizona for its immigration law. He is siding with criminals against his fellow Americans. His actions desecrate his constitutional oath to protect U.S. citizens from enemies foreign and domestic. He is thus encouraging more illegal immigration as Washington refuses to protect our borders. Mr. Obama's decision on this case is treasonous.

As president, he is supposed to respect the rule of law. Instead, his administration has dropped charges of voter intimidation against members of the New Black Panther Party. This was done even though their menacing behavior was caught on tape: men in military garb brandishing clubs and threatening whites at a polling site. A Justice Department lawyer intimately involved in the case, J. Christian Adams, resigned in protest. Mr. Adams says that under Mr. Obama, there is a new policy: Cases involving black defendants and white victims - no matter how much they cry for justice - are not to be prosecuted. This is more than institutionalized racism. It is an abrogation of civil rights laws. The Justice Department's behavior is illegal. It poses a direct threat to the integrity of our democracy and the sanctity of our electoral process.

Corruption in the administration is rampant. Washington no longer has a government; rather, it has a gangster regime. The Chicago way has become the Washington way. Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel is a political hit man. He is an amoral, ruthless operator. It was Mr. Emanuel who reached out to Rep. Joe Sestak, Pennsylvania Democrat, offering a high-ranking job in the hopes of persuading Mr. Sestak to pull out of the primary against Sen. Arlen Specter. It was Mr. Emanuel who offered another government position to Andrew Romanoff to do the same in the Colorado Democratic Senate primary. And it was Mr. Emanuel - as the trial of former Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich has revealed - who acted as the go-between to try to have Valerie Jarrett parachuted into Mr. Obama's former Senate seat. The only question was: What did Mr. Blagojevich want in exchange?

This is not simply sleazy Chicago machine politics. It is the systematic breaking of the law - bribery, attempt to interfere (and manipulate) elections using taxpayer-funded jobs, influence peddling and abuse of power.

The common misperception on the right is that Mr. Obama is another Jimmy Carter: an incompetent liberal whose presidency is being reduced to rubble under the onslaught of repeated failures. The very opposite, however, is true. He is the most consequential president in our lifetime, transforming America into something our Founding Fathers would find not only unrecognizable, but repugnant. Like all radical revolutionaries, he is consumed by the pursuit of power - attaining it, wielding it and maximizing it. Mr. Obama's fledgling thug state must be stopped.

If Republicans win back Congress in November, they should - and likely will - launch formal investigations into this criminal, scandal-ridden administration. Rep. Darrell Issa, California Republican and ranking member of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has promised as much. Mr. Obama has betrayed the American people. Impeachment is the only answer. This usurper must fall.

(Jeffrey T. Kuhner is a columnist at The Washington Times and president of the Edmund Burke Institute, a Washington think tank. He is the host of "The Kuhner Show" on WTNT 570-AM (www.talk570.com) from 5 to 7 p.m.)

© Copyright 2011 The Washington Times

20100528-01 10:32 Ben Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

This is huge. I love it.

Can't say I share the feelings about Gore; I'd have applied this unhesitatingly and with far better substantiation to GWB. At least, if we're applying the stated qualities in terms of intelligence and morality. If we're talking physicality only, I will sadly concede.

But someone with less logic and reason thought up the joke first, so I will have to appreciate it for its quality as a cartoon.

20100528-02 10:38 SteveB An Economy of Smoke & Mirrors

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

On other matters...the economy and, hence, the government, is based on smoke and mirrors...nothing but confidence. If that goes, the whole thing can crumble. We are on very thin ice. I hate what the two parties have done to our country. As I have said, it is all corrupted very explicitly by big money. I tend to be a Democrat, but I think more along the very conservative lines of our founding fathers or Barry Goldwater. All governments are stupid and incompetent and are not the answer to our problems...they are just more problems. Freedom is very important and dear. But I have given up on trying to change something so huge. It is disheartening.

Remember, I try hard to be apolitical, but I can't help but notice one thing many people are blind to: We want to make the world a better place and we think money is the answer. Then why are people in St. Lucia or Bolivia, for example, happier than the average American? And people seem to be blind to the decline and fall of America, I guess because it happens slowly. Think about Greencastle when we grew up. My barber, Mr. Eitelgeorge (sp), and someone like a guy who worked at one of the little shoe stores (not owning it), or a guy who pumped gas at 26 cents-a-gallon, all could drive an OK car, live in an OK house, and send their kids to college. Now? haha. crycry!

20100528-03 11:38 Pam Re: An Economy of Smoke & Mirrors

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I do so agree with you about the way big money has corrupted not only America but other places too. It's everywhere. It's really hard for me to grasp why some greedy bastards will go to such lengths (dealing drugs, overthrowing governments, cutting corners with oil wells) to make a bit more money when they already have so much. Does it become a madness, as with Bernie Madoff? He must be somewhat crazy. I'm all about people having a decent standard of living and financial security—god knows I'm for that!—but how the really rich can sleep at night, knowing that so many are out of work and struggling to survive, I don't know. I do believe that when you have a two-tiered society—the wealthy and the poor—you have a very unstable situation. A nice big broad middle class is the way to peace and prosperity for everyone. Why can't the super-rich realize that if they cling to their piles of loot and barricade themselves behind walls with gates, one day the poor will rise up and break those walls down? I remember getting into an argument when I was in high school about integration with another student who was a southern bigot. I predicted that black people would eventually turn to violence if they weren't treated fairly—and not so long after the riots broke out and the country burned. The peasants may not always win, but eventually they will pick up the pitchforks and torches, and then, watch out! You'd think self-interest would dictate some fairness, if not simple compassion.

20100528-04 11:55 SteveB Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

Dear Tom,

Enjoyed the cartoon, though I, like Al Gore, was too dense for it, at first.

"There is no worse tyranny than to force a man to pay for what he does not want merely because you think it would be good for him." —Robert Heinlein'

So...it would be (is) the worst of tyranny to tax some of these old farts to help pay for our schools, because they don't want to pay? Isn't it good for the whole country if the schools have money and are good? As a great, democratic nation, we have always thought taxes were good for the old farts even though they want to pretend otherwise.

So...it would be (is) the worst of tyranny to tax American Muslims to pay for defense if those Muslims, perhaps, don't want America defended? Yet most of us think defense, in one form or another, is a good thing. We think it is good for the Muslims, because it is good for all of us, even though some Muslims might think otherwise.

So...it would be (is) the worst of tyranny to tax illegal immigrants to help pay for the services they use (are "entitled" to), such as schools or defense, simply because they don't want to pay for those things? Yet most of us think education and defense, in one form or another, is a good thing. We think it is good for the illegals because it is good for all of us, even though illegals might want to pretend otherwise.

Oh...and it must be tyranny to tax the big corporations, such as BP, because they don't want to pay. Yet most of us think there might be good reason to tax these companies (maybe to help regulate them a little?), because it is good for them if it is good for all of us.

I guess Heinlein (otherwise, a very intelligent man) thought taxes are evil and tyrannical, huh? It seems to me more likely that taxes are the salvation of a truly intelligent democracy. And, as a nation, I thought we got beyond this point a long time ago.

As far as the cartoon goes...is Al Gore still the Vice-President? Is that the White House? The "Tennessee White House?" Al Gore's house? I agree Al Gore might be "dense and inert", but this cartoon misses the mark for me.

20100528-05 12:33 Pam Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

Dear SteveB,

Al Gore may be boring, but he's right about the environment. I applaud his courage in standing up to ridicule and ignorance. I agree that Americans are under taxed. I don't understand all the fuss and bother about paying for things we all need—like schools, health care, security, etc. etc. When I lived in Canada, taxes were rather high, quite high by American standards. But higher education was free, and health care was covered for everyone. It was worth the higher taxes not to have to think twice about whether or not to take your sick 2-yr. old to the doctor. Aaaaaaargh!

20100528-06 14:39 Ben Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

Dear SteveB,

As I said in my preamble, I don't share the obvious feelings about the JAB at Gore, whom I admire as a relatively selfless politician whom I feel has gone a long way to popularize an issue about which I feel strongly.

I thought the analogy of dense, inert material being applied to any particular human was pretty good, and prefer it when applied to the intelligence and morality of our recent lamented GWB.

If you will examine the conversation balloons, you will see that the local speaker is indeed at the White House. It makes sense that a call to a former vice president from a current chief executive's office would originate there, does it not?

Anyway, perhaps if you'd noted that initially, the cartoon would have seemed more clever. Well, heck. Not to worry!

As for HEINLEIN, though—I hadn't noticed that quote; had I read it, I might have had pretty much the same reaction with which you so eloquently reacted. I will share your comments with the guy that sent me the email, who tends to react immediately as a Republican might, but also actually DOES think about things. He's my buddy Tom the Security Guard (here at Apple) who was a Viet Nam—Nicaragua—Panama—Cambodia—and other interesting places Green Beret with 101 Airborne. We became very good friends when I asked him something or another in the early phases of my renewed interest in firearms; not every ex-military guy likes weapons, but the kind who hangs his Airborne cap on the edge of his desk is a good bet. It was through Tom that I met Eric the Sniper, a really likable young man who ... well ... he's an interesting study, especially when you're a visitor among his peers. Very quiet folks, snipers. Calm, collected, keenly observant, and—quiet. But I ramble...

What I was trying to get at is that it seems to me that Heinlein, brilliant though he was, suffered from progressive nodal brain ossification from somewhere close to 1970 onward. Tom, though, is always receptive to other viewpoints and willing to talk about things once you call him on his initial reaction. He's about my age, and, weirdly, was also a biology major who studied salamanders in the tropics. I still found the cartoon funny despite at whom it is jabbing.

20100528-07 15:42 SteveB Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

Dear Pam,

Una grande 'si'!

20100528-08 15:54 SteveB Re: Cartoon: BP Oil Spill a Use for Former VP Gore

Dear Ben,

They're on the telephone? That still escapes me. Is that what the woman is holding? Weird looking cell phone if you ask me. Are both panes the same woman? In one pane she has a ring on her left hand and in the next she doesn't and the phone seems to change. But the dresses, nails, hair, etc., seem the same, which is all weird! Does that mean they're on the phone in the third pane? Is Obama calling Gore or some red-headed woman? Or is it a conversation in the White House? Does the woman work for BP? Jeez!

I'm all for the 'vironment, but I never have liked Al Gore! He seems to me to be as stupid as GWB. Maybe stupider! He's also a big, big fake! A good 'ole boy. A Tennessee hillbilly what done well.

20100530-01 14:15 SteveB "Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen"

There's no reason to control America's borders! All Latinos must be good people, right? Because, well heck, because they're so poor! Dear me!

Let's help 'em out by giving away the country to them, because we feel sorry for them and so guilty that they aren't rich Americans too. It's absolutely vital to our consciences that everybody in the world be rich Americans, or we can't sleep at night, right?

What a crock!

"Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen" by William Booth, The Washington Post

May 29, 2010, (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/05/29/AR2010052903707.html>)

(Small armada of outlaws ambushes bass anglers on lake straddling border.)

(ZAPATA, Tex.) Falcon Lake is famous for its monster bass and for the maniacal obsession of the fishermen who come from all over Texas—and the world—to stalk them. Now this remote reservoir that straddles the international boundary is known for something else: pirates.

In the past month, crews of outlaws in a small armada of banged-up skiffs and high-powered bass boats launched from the Mexican shore have ambushed bass anglers from the Texas side innocently casting their plastic worms over favorite spots. The buccaneers have struck in Mexican waters but within sight of the Texas shore.

Dressed in black, the pirates brandish automatic weapons, carry radio cell phones and board the anglers' boats. They demand weapons or drugs from their captives, but finding neither, seem satisfied with taking $400 or $500 as booty, according to law enforcement officials and victims' accounts.

There is a saying about not messing with Texas, and the idea that criminals are preying on American anglers is raising already-high temperatures along the southwest border. Answering calls for help, President Obama last week ordered 1,200 National Guard troops to the region.

The pirates claim to be "federales," or police, but instead are brigands—with the letter "Z" tattooed on their necks and arms—from the notorious drug cartel Los Zetas. The Zetas are on a rampage of killing and extortion along the Mexican border as they fight gun and grenade battles against the military and the rival Gulf Cartel.

"Within the last month, with all the feuding going on over there, the dope smuggling has dropped off and it is starving them. This water is Zeta central. They controlled the whole lake. They distributed everything. Now they're desperate and diversifying," said Jose E. Gonzalez, the second in command of the Border Patrol's Zapata station, which operates an around-the-clock maritime patrol.

At least three armed robberies have been reported in Mexican waters. The Texas Department of Public Safety put out a warning for people to stay on the U.S. side. On Memorial Day weekend, when 200 bass boats would usually be in town, only two dozen were seen at county ramps Friday afternoon.

One group of pirates was savvy enough to demand the memory chip from an angler's camera, lest they be identified. Another fisherman told authorities that armed men came roaring toward him. "I saw 'em, and I saw they were machine guns. They were that close, they were 15 yards away from me," San Antonio bass chaser Richard Drake told a local television station. "I was scared."

'Some bad boys out there'

Last week, Border Patrol agents tried to follow a Mexican boat filled with men wearing ski masks, but it was too fast for the agents and entered Mexican waters, where U.S. law enforcement is forbidden.

Olga Juliana Elizondo, the mayor of Nueva Guerrero, Mexico, said ranchers are harassed on their land, motorboats have disappeared, vehicles have been stolen and tourists have fled. "We hope this ends soon," she said.

"We've all heard about the pirates, and we're all sticking to the American side of the lake, because those are some bad boys out there," said Dwayne Deets, a fisherman from Houston who was sliding $50,000 worth of cream-colored bass boat, bristling with sonar and GPS electronics, down a ramp in Zapata.

Deets said Texans loved fishing the Mexican side. It is legal to carry a loaded firearm in a boat in Texas, but it is illegal to bring ammunition or weapons into Mexico. "I just pray no one gets killed out there," he said.

The International Falcon Reservoir was born in the early 1950s, when engineers erected a dam on the Rio Grande, flooding the banks and inundating towns on both sides. The 98,960-surface-acre impoundment stretches 60 miles and provides for irrigation, power, flood control and recreation in the area.

"Until this started, we fished everywhere, and we never cared about the border, Texas to Mexico. But now? No. Hardly anybody is fishing the Mexico side of the lake," said Tom Bendele, who with his brother owns the Falcon Lake Tackle shop in Zapata, now serving as the de facto intel center on all things piratical.

Out on the water, with a reporter in tow, Tom Bendele pointed out the picket line of 14 large concrete beacons that mark the international boundary. Some are swimming distance from the Texas shore; others are miles out in the middle of the lake.

Bendele ventured up the Rio Salado cove on the Mexican side, where two of the acts of piracy occurred. Around the bend, the steeple of the church in Old Guerrero is now mostly underwater. The shoreline is lonely mesquite brush, dotted by rough fish camps used by Mexicans who string gill nets along their side of the lake, hauling up tilapia, carp and bass. Though illegal in the United States, the Mexican netters often cross into the Texas side to fish, playing an endless hide-and-peek with Texas game wardens.

Bendele cut off his engine, and the boat rocked in the cove. "You could see how it would be easy to get jumped in here," he said. "Notice you don't see any Americans."

'They watch us'

Out on the water with the U.S. Border Patrol, roaring right down the international boundary line but careful never to cross into Mexico, Gonzalez and a crew pointed out spot after spot where they have intercepted tons of marijuana crossing the lake. The Border Patrol seized 18,000 pounds of marijuana in the lake region last year, worth about $14 million at $800 a pound; it will likely confiscate even more this year.

"But, man, they are so good at counter-surveillance," Gonzalez said, describing the lake as kind of a Wild West on the water. "They watch us, they watch our boats, our cars, our homes. The smugglers, they know every move we make."

The traffickers cross day and night, driving boats with bales of marijuana right into the backyards of homes along the lake. They rent cabins at the lakeside state park and stash dope there. The border agents point to a three-story house built like a watchtower on the Mexican shore. The officers frequently see observers with binoculars on the roof. Up and down the lake, netting boats are idled. Nobody waves.

"We're telling folks that right now, Mexico is not safe. Don't cross, because we can't go over and help you. It's just an imaginary line, but it's a line I can't cross," said Jake Cawthon, a Texas game warden. He said that anyone fishing the Mexican side these days has "got to have one hand on their fishing pole and the other on their boat keys, ready to haul back home."

20100530-02	18:33	SteveG	Re: "Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveB,

Is it true that the U.S. ranks 42 in the world on infant mortality? If so—why, what are we going to do about it, and when are we going to do it?

20100531-01	20:47	SteveB	Re: "Pirates Get Hooks into Texas Fishermen"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveG,

The healthcare system in the U.S. is broken and hasn't been fixed. The only thing that can be done about any of the problems in the country, and there are so many (see HBO documentary: Schmatta: Rags to Riches to Rags), is to change the political system.

All of Congress needs to be voted out of office. Bribes in the form of campaign contributions above $100 need to be outlawed, lobbying needs to be greatly curtailed. The system is totally corrupt. We have been sold down the river. When are we going to do it? I predict, only when things have fallen completely apart and there are riots in the streets. Maybe not even then. Sad.

20100531-02	15:39	Pam	Expatriate Life
-----------------------------	-------	-----	-----------------

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

There's another wonderful Argentinean movie with Norma Alleandro: The Official Story (or is it Unofficial? I can never remember). It's an old movie by now, but I thought it was fantastic when I saw it 20 odd years ago. It deals with the Disappeared and violence, without ever showing the actual victims or their abuse. The ending is excruciating and brilliant.

Living abroad certainly does open your eyes, does it not? Especially when you live in a second- or third-world country. All the parts of Europe I've been to have basically been pretty much like America only more picturesque and with accents. I don't denigrate going there, but Afghanistan taught me more. We had servants—a cook and houseboy (boy! He was 40 yrs. old)—only two, because we lived in a small house. There was definitely a class system. (I had many adventures there. :-). Some of them included the Marines who were there to guard the embassy. I was 16; they were 22. You do the math.) One of the most instructive occurred at a rehearsal party for a production of Macbeth that the American community were putting on. It was wild. These were not kids; kids were a small minority in that social world. They were grown up diplomats and their wives, who I thought should have known better. There was always lots of drinking—in a Muslim country. It might have been prudent, if not simply polite, to keep the drunkenness under control so as not to insult our hosts. But this party was off the hook. Many jokes were told at Afghan's expense, jokes involving nose-blowing and defecation (all done by the natives in public with bare hands). Around the periphery of the room were the Afghan servants who were waiting on the revelers, and I noticed that their faces were stony. A small moment, but, I'm sure, typical. And we ask why they hate us.

20100601-01	10:21	Ben	"Flotillas and the Wars of Public Opinion"
-------------	-------	-----	--

These folks are just soooooo illuminating. Even when, maybe especially when, I think I understand some event, I read their analysis and realize that I hadn't really got it, at all... things are so seldom as simple as they appear in the news...

www.statfor.com

"Flotillas and the Wars of Public Opinion" by George Friedman, Stratfor

May 31, 2010, (http://www.stratfor.com/weekly/20100531_flotillas_and_wars_public_opinion)

On Sunday, Israeli naval forces intercepted the ships of a Turkish nongovernmental organization (NGO) delivering humanitarian supplies to Gaza. Israel had demanded that the vessels not go directly to Gaza but instead dock in Israeli ports, where the supplies would be offloaded and delivered to Gaza. The Turkish NGO refused, insisting on going directly to Gaza. Gunfire ensued when Israeli naval personnel boarded one of the vessels, and a significant number of the passengers and crew on the ship were killed or wounded.

Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon charged that the mission was simply an attempt to provoke the Israelis. That was certainly the case. The mission was designed to demonstrate that the Israelis were unreasonable and brutal. The hope was that Israel would be provoked to extreme action, further alienating Israel from the global community and possibly driving a wedge between Israel and the United States. The operation's planners also hoped this would trigger a political crisis in Israel.

A logical Israeli response would have been avoiding falling into the provocation trap and suffering the political repercussions the Turkish NGO was trying to trigger. Instead, the Israelis decided to make a show of force. The Israelis appear to have reasoned that backing down would demonstrate weakness and encourage further flotillas to Gaza, unraveling the Israeli position vis-à-vis Hamas. In this thinking, a violent interception was a superior strategy to accommodation regardless of political consequences. Thus, the Israelis accepted the bait and were provoked.

The Exodus Scenario

In the 1950s, an author named Leon Uris published a book called Exodus. Later made into a major motion picture, Exodus told the story of a Zionist provocation against the British. In the wake of World War II, the British—who controlled Palestine, as it was then known—maintained limits on Jewish immigration there.

Would-be immigrants captured trying to run the blockade were detained in camps in Cyprus. In the book and movie, Zionists planned a propaganda exercise involving a breakout of Jews—mostly children—from the camp, who would then board a ship renamed the Exodus. When the Royal Navy intercepted the ship, the passengers would mount a hunger strike. The goal was to portray the British as brutes finishing the work of the Nazis. The image of children potentially dying of hunger would force the British to permit the ship to go to Palestine, to reconsider British policy on immigration, and ultimately to decide to abandon Palestine and turn the matter over to the United Nations.

There was in fact a ship called Exodus, but the affair did not play out precisely as portrayed by Uris, who used an amalgam of incidents to display the propaganda war waged by the Jews. Those carrying out this war had two goals. The first was to create sympathy in Britain and throughout the world for Jews who, just a couple of years after German concentration camps, were now being held in British camps.

Second, they sought to portray their struggle as being against the British. The British were portrayed as continuing Nazi policies toward the Jews in order to maintain their empire. The Jews were portrayed as anti-imperialists, fighting the British much as the Americans had.

It was a brilliant strategy. By focusing on Jewish victimhood and on the British, the Zionists defined the battle as being against the British, with the Arabs playing the role of people trying to create the second phase of the Holocaust. The British were portrayed as pro-Arab for economic and imperial reasons, indifferent at best to the survivors of the Holocaust. Rather than restraining the Arabs, the British were arming them. The goal was not to vilify the Arabs but to vilify the British, and to position the Jews with other nationalist groups whether in India or Egypt rising against the British.

The precise truth or falsehood of this portrayal didn't particularly matter. For most of the world, the Palestine issue was poorly understood and not a matter of immediate concern. The Zionists intended to shape the perceptions of a global public with limited interest in or understanding of the issues, filling in the blanks with their own narrative. And they succeeded.

The success was rooted in a political reality. Where knowledge is limited, and the desire to learn the complex reality doesn't exist, public opinion can be shaped by whoever generates the most powerful symbols. And on a matter of only tangential interest, governments tend to follow their publics' wishes, however they originate. There is little to be gained for governments in resisting public opinion and much to be gained by giving in. By shaping the battlefield of public perception, it is thus possible to get governments to change positions.

In this way, the Zionists' ability to shape global public perceptions of what was happening in Palestine—to demonize the British and turn the question of Palestine into a Jewish-British issue—shaped the political decisions of a range of governments. It was not the truth or falsehood of the narrative that mattered. What mattered was the ability to identify the victim and victimizer such that global opinion caused both London and governments not directly involved in the issue to adopt political stances advantageous to the Zionists. It is in this context that we need to view the Turkish flotilla.

The Turkish Flotilla to Gaza

The Palestinians have long argued that they are the victims of Israel, an invention of British and American imperialism. Since 1967, they have focused not so much on the existence of the state of Israel (at least in messages geared toward the West) as on the oppression of Palestinians in the occupied territories. Since the split between Hamas and Fatah and the Gaza War, the focus has been on the plight of the citizens of Gaza, who have been portrayed as the dispossessed victims of Israeli violence.

The bid to shape global perceptions by portraying the Palestinians as victims of Israel was the first prong of a longtime two-part campaign. The second part of this campaign involved armed resistance against the Israelis. The way this resistance was carried out, from airplane hijackings to stone-throwing children to suicide bombers, interfered with the first part of the campaign, however. The Israelis could point to suicide bombings or the use of children against soldiers as symbols of Palestinian inhumanity. This in turn was used to justify conditions in Gaza. While the Palestinians had made significant inroads in placing Israel on the defensive in global public opinion, they thus consistently gave the Israelis the opportunity to turn the tables. And this is where the flotilla comes in.

The Turkish flotilla aimed to replicate the Exodus story or, more precisely, to define the global image of Israel in the same way the Zionists defined the image that they wanted to project. As with the Zionist portrayal of the situation in 1947, the Gaza situation is far more complicated than as portrayed by the Palestinians. The moral question is also far more ambiguous. But as in 1947, when the Zionist portrayal was not intended to be a scholarly analysis of the situation but a political weapon designed to define perceptions, the Turkish flotilla was not designed to carry out a moral inquest.

Instead, the flotilla was designed to achieve two ends. The first is to divide Israel and Western governments by shifting public opinion against Israel. The second is to create a political crisis inside Israel between those who feel that Israel's increasing isolation over the Gaza issue is dangerous versus those who think any weakening of resolve is dangerous.

The Geopolitical Fallout for Israel

It is vital that the Israelis succeed in portraying the flotilla as an extremist plot. Whether extremist or not, the plot has generated an image of Israel quite damaging to Israeli political interests. Israel is increasingly isolated internationally, with heavy pressure on its relationship with Europe and the United States.

In all of these countries, politicians are extremely sensitive to public opinion. It is difficult to imagine circumstances under which public opinion will see Israel as the victim. The general response in the Western public is likely to be that the Israelis probably should have allowed the ships to go to Gaza and offload rather than to precipitate bloodshed. Israel's enemies will fan these flames by arguing that the Israelis prefer bloodshed to reasonable accommodation. And as Western public opinion shifts against Israel, Western political leaders will track with this shift.

The incident also wrecks Israeli relations with Turkey, historically an Israeli ally in the Muslim world with longstanding military cooperation with Israel. The Turkish government undoubtedly has wanted to move away from this relationship, but it faced resistance within the Turkish military and among secularists. The new Israeli action makes a break with Israel easy, and indeed almost necessary for Ankara. With roughly the population of Houston, Texas, Israel is just not large enough to withstand extended isolation, meaning this event has profound geopolitical implications.

Public opinion matters where issues are not of fundamental interest to a nation. Israel is not a fundamental interest to other nations. The ability to generate public antipathy to Israel can therefore reshape Israeli relations with countries critical to Israel. For example, a redefinition of U.S.-Israeli relations will have much less effect on the United States than on Israel. The Obama administration, already irritated by the Israelis, might now see a shift in U.S. public opinion that will open the way to a new U.S.-Israeli relationship disadvantageous to Israel.

The Israelis will argue that this is all unfair, as they were provoked. Like the British, they seem to think that the issue is whose logic is correct. But the issue actually is, whose logic will be heard? As with a tank battle or an airstrike, this sort of warfare has nothing to do with fairness. It has to do with controlling public perception and using that public perception to shape foreign policy around the world. In this case, the issue will be whether the deaths were necessary. The Israeli argument of provocation will have limited traction.

Internationally, there is little doubt that the incident will generate a firestorm. Certainly, Turkey will break cooperation with Israel. Opinion in Europe will likely harden. And public opinion in the United States—by far the most important in the equation—might shift to a “plague-on-both-your-houses” position.

While the international reaction is predictable, the interesting question is whether this evolution will cause a political crisis in Israel. Those in Israel who feel that international isolation is preferable to accommodation with the Palestinians are in control now. Many in the opposition see Israel's isolation as a strategic threat. Economically and militarily, they argue, Israel cannot survive in isolation. The current regime will respond that there will be no isolation. The flotilla aimed to generate what the government has said would not happen.

The tougher Israel is, the more the flotilla's narrative takes hold. As the Zionists knew in 1947 and the Palestinians are learning, controlling public opinion requires subtlety, a selective narrative and cynicism. As they also knew, losing the battle can be catastrophic. It cost Britain the Mandate and allowed Israel to survive. Israel's enemies are now turning the tables. This maneuver was far more effective than suicide bombings or the Intifada in challenging Israel's public perception and therefore its geopolitical position (though if the Palestinians return to some of their more distasteful tactics like suicide bombing, the Turkish strategy of portraying Israel as the instigator of violence will be undermined).

Israel is now in uncharted waters. It does not know how to respond. It is not clear that the Palestinians know how to take full advantage of the situation, either. But even so, this places the battle on a new field, far more fluid and uncontrollable than what went before. The next steps will involve calls for sanctions against Israel. The Israeli threats against Iran will be seen in a different context, and Israeli portrayal of Iran will hold less sway over the world.

And this will cause a political crisis in Israel. If this government survives, then Israel is locked into a course that gives it freedom of action but international isolation. If the government falls, then Israel enters a period of domestic uncertainty. In either case, the flotilla achieved its strategic mission. It got Israel to take violent action against it. In doing so, Israel ran into its own fist.

20100602-01 07:46 SteveB Re: "Flotillas and the Wars of Public Opinion"

Dear Ben,

Yes, this is very good. Too bad the Israelis weren't a little more intelligent.

20100602-02 15:30 Pam TED, Etc.

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I wonder if it's true that you can tell what's truly important to a person or society by the things they laugh at. Like clean, orderly Germans laugh at poop jokes; Italians make jokes about religion, and American men make jokes about sex. Is it that the subject is inherently uncomfortable, so let's laugh at it? The vacation photos you sent seem to make my point. :-)
As I wrote this, I asked myself what I find funny. It's often not what Mark finds funny. I like humor that plays with language and irony. I like the English sense of humor—not the really stupid kind, but the Monty Python kind. I also like Hugh Laurie and Stephen Fry. They did a TV comedy sketch show 20 or 30 years ago that we just got on video. VERY amusing.

[Can't find the Isabelle Allende reference. —SteveB]

I haven't watched the Isabelle Allende talk yet, but I ADORE those TED lectures. I have watched a lot of them. I love the whole concept: invite really smart, interesting people and have them talk for 20 minutes about something important to them that they've never written or spoken about before. Many of them are absolutely extraordinary. There was a terrific one by a man whose name I can't remember at the moment. Maybe it will come to me. Anyway, he's a very famous, highly respected doctor (I believe), and he talked about a nervous breakdown he had when he was much younger. It was so moving. And Jill Bolte Taylor did one about her stroke. She's a neurologist herself, and she has the real inside story. Then there are the child prodigies. It's a terrific site.

20100605-01 14:52 SteveB BP Gulf Oil Spill

I don't believe in conspiracies. I am neither a Republican, nor a Democrat, just an American. I don't want to be political. I want to spend my time thinking about images, plot technique, and travel descriptions. But, folks, our government has sold us down the river again!

Soon after this whole debacle started, I quoted someone on the scene as saying it was like, "trying to build the fire truck when your house is on fire." But now I know that is not accurate. It's actually like trying to invent the fire truck, internal combustion engine, rubber, alloys, pumps, and all, when your house is on fire. Right?

And you can't really blame BP. Like all giant, multi-national corporations, all they care about is money. If you don't believe that, attend a stockholders' meeting sometime. That's OK, that's what for-profit corporations are supposed to care about, what they're designed to do, no matter what their commercials might try to brainwash you into believing how "good" they are. Do you really think auto companies finally put seatbelts and air bags in cars out of the kindness of their hearts? No! They were dragged kicking and screaming to install them because they were forced by legislation. Legislation, by the way, they fought tooth and nail.

Where were the government regulators BEFORE the oil leak? Why was no one prepared? Where was the legislation? Where were the politicians? Obama finally says he's "furious". I've been furious since the first drops of oil started pouring into the fragile environment of the gulf. Where are the alternatives to oil? Where are the clean coal power plants and electric cars? Where are the millions of American jobs that have been lost to China, India, Mexico, etc.?

Big oil has bribed the politicians through campaign financing. The whole process is exactly the same as the corruption in Latin America. It's precisely like handing the politicians money to put in their pockets. And the regulators are buddies with whatever they are supposed to regulate, especially oil drilling.

Wake-up, people! We have been sold out again. And the only solution I know is to vote every single incumbent politician OUT OF OFFICE, and keep doing so election after election, until they begin to realize once again that they work for you and me. Until they fix things and finally make taking bribes illegal. Then you will see a world of difference, I promise you!

20100609-01 17:18 Charlie Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat

20100609-02 17:41 SteveB "Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth & Apple Finally Becomes Microsoft"

"Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth and Apple Finally Becomes Microsoft" by David Gewirtz, ZDnet

June 8, 2010, (<http://www.zdnet.com/blog/government/steve-jobs-demo-god-crashes-to-earth-and-apple-finally-becomes-microsoft/9078>)

Well, it's official. Apple has finally become Microsoft. With all the noise about Apple's market cap over the past few weeks, what most of us failed to consider (until yesterday) was what truly differentiated Apple from Microsoft: the demo.

Steve Jobs has always been a demo god. His ability to hold an audience is legendary. His timing is flawless. His uniform of black turtleneck and jeans is iconic.

Oh, and one more thing... wireless sucks!

Microsoft's demos are supposed to crash, not Apple's. Say what you will about those kids in Cupertino, they've always had rock-solid demos.

But even Apple's near-flawless demo prep can't hold up to the load of a crowded convention center. As my friend and colleague, the very wise Steven J. Vaughan-Nichols described it in Help! I'm out of bandwidth and I can't get my demo up! the problem isn't just the Apple demo. It's that the wireless infrastructure in the United States is inferior—and we're just seeing the tip of the iceberg.

Some regions are talking about replacing wireless phone networks with variants of WiFi. But as Jobs so frustratingly demonstrated, WiFi is vulnerable to overload. So, if you're one of only a few going online, you're fine. But if you're in a crowd, you're scrod. Sjvn is right when he says it isn't just a WiFi problem. He says: The root cause of all of our bandwidth woes is a lack of infrastructure. [Duhhhh!]

Apple announced all sorts of video capabilities on the iPhone 4. If you think AT&T couldn't keep up before, wait until this sexy, new, surprisingly low-priced phone gets into real use. AT&T's network is simply going to melt down. And what of our broadband infrastructure? According to Speedtest's Net Index, the United States comes in 26th in terms of broadband speed.

Let me put this in perspective. The Greatest Country in the World has broadband speeds slower than Latvia, the Republic of Moldova, Lithuania, Romania, Bulgaria, Andorra, Iceland, Liechtenstein, Slovakia, and even Estonia.

How can that be? Andorra, a country a smaller population than my home of Palm Bay here in Florida, has better bandwidth speeds than the United States. There's something wrong about that. If I were Glenn Beck, it'd make me cry. So, go ahead and buy your new iPhone 4. You know you're going to do it. But don't use it, or, well, you might break the network.

Can you hear me now?

20100610-01 08:59 Ben Re: "Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth"

Dear SteveB,

Don't believe everything you read: it's the internet, and almost anybody who bothers to write anything has an agenda, including me.

20100610-02 09:42 Ben Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat

Dear Charlie,

I have my doubts about Texas; wish I could read the text on the Sheriff's car. Arizona allows Open Carry if you have a carry permit; in fact, concealed carry is illegal there. Arizona is the only state in the southwest that permits this. Texas most definitely does not. (I think Vermont may, but don't know for sure.)

Here in Texas, though, we are conspicuous for our sentiment... so it's a better joke to most people than would be "Arizona Motorcycle Seat"

20100610-03 10:00 SteveB Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat

Dear Charlie and Ben,

This could also be Montana or Beaver Island, MI. Guns are openly worn (and used) in both places. I would trust most of the people seen carrying them more than I would trust whoever is driving that Sheriff's car, but that's just me.

20100610-04 10:06 SteveB Re: "Steve Jobs, Demo God, Crashes to Earth"

Dear Ben,

I think the title of this piece was unfortunate.

For me, actually, the point had nothing to do with Jobs or Apple or the demo. It had to do with our sadly lagging infrastructure. We're not even keeping up with ourselves very well. Where is the government "of the people and for the people"? Maybe we need to change that to the government "of the money and for the money"!

20100610-05 10:19 Ben Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat

Dear SteveB,

Beaver Island? I didn't know Michigan allowed open carry, but then, I have only been in Michigan once in the last twenty years. That WAS on Beaver Island, and I didn't notice anyone carrying. Montana doesn't surprise me.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Open_carry shows me that there are lots more states that allow this than I'd realized.

To my great surprise, California allows open carry of UNLOADED firearms, and of loaded magazines.

Texas allows open carry of shotguns and rifles, but not of handguns.

Michigan doesn't seem to allow open carry at all, unless perhaps on one's own property. Many states' laws appear to preempt more local laws, such as county laws (e.g. Washington state), but not all (e.g. Illinois - Chicago).

From <http://www.businesspundit.com/open-carry-states-list>:

Open carry states:

Alaska
Montana
Idaho
Wyoming
Nevada
Arizona
New Mexico
South Dakota
Vermont
Kentucky
Virginia

Open carry—with restrictions (e.g. permit requirements):

Utah
North Dakota
Minnesota
Iowa Tennessee
Mississippi
Georgia
Indiana
Maryland
New Jersey
Rhode Island
Connecticut
Massachusetts

We are such a hodgepodge of laws here!

20100610-06 10:34 SteveB Re: Photo: Texas Motorcycle Seat

Dear Ben,

Better open than concealed, in my book.

I'm sure it's not strictly legal on Beaver, but Beaver is a law unto itself. Just about anything goes as long as you don't hurt anybody. I always take one of my handguns over, just to shoot up the place.

My kids used to drive there a lot when they were 8, 10, 12. Heck, they used to drive the ferry over from Charlevoix when they were about 6!

It's still a free land like the old days up there around Beaver.

20100611-01 11:44 Pam The Pregnant Widow by Martin Amis

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I was just reading a review of Amis's latest book, The Pregnant Widow. A longish passage is quoted, and I'd like to share it with you.

As the fiftieth birthday approaches, you get the sense that your life is thinning out, and will continue to thin out, until it thins out into nothing. And you sometimes say to yourself: That went a bit quick. That went a bit quick. In certain moods, you may want to put it rather more forcefully. As in: OY! THAT went a BIT F*CKING QUICK!!!... Then fifty comes and goes, and fifty-one, and fifty-two. And life thickens out again. Because there is now an enormous and unsuspected presence within your being, like an undiscovered continent. This is the past.

I love that.

20100614-01 15:15 SteveB Re: Expatriate Life

from Pam:

I think I don't want to live in Bolivia more than ever. Too many creepy crawlies. I bet it's hot there now. It's 95 here today. I hate it when it's too hot to go outside.

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Actually the weather is perfect here right now. Remember it's "winter". The days have been warm and sunny, dry, not hot. The nights are cool and fresh.

You know, I don't think we have more "creepy crawlies" than you do in the Carolinas or than we had in Indiana. At least, not here in the city. Out in the county, it's a little different. My 2nd wife's father's farm has its own jungle, river, and mountain. His father had his own Indian tribe. Sometimes we would climb the mountain through the jungle to get to the water supply for the farm. The spiders were amazing! And I never saw even one snake there, but Bolivia has, I read, 31 kinds of poisonous snakes. Can you believe it? One of my cows got bitten by something and died a couple of years ago, and dogs often fall victim to rattlesnakes, or cascabels (jingle-bells) as they are known here.

But I've never seen anywhere with rattlesnakes and scorpions as bad as Arizona.

Once, in Puerto Rico, I offered to clean-out my girl-friend's shed in her back yard. She had some old furniture, tools etc. in there. I thought it would be easy. It ended up being a three day pitched battle for my life against every kind of crawling thing you can imagine. They were living in everything! I finally bought a bunch of cans of the deadliest spray I could find, bombed the whole place, closed it up, then went back a couple days later. Some of the critters were dead.

20100618-01 06:59 SteveB Fw: Legal Joe vs. Illegal José

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

JOE LEGAL VS JOSÉ ILLEGAL

You have two families: Joe Legal and José Illegal. Both families have two parents and two children and live in California.

Joe Legal works in construction, has a Social Security number and makes $25.00 per hour with taxes deducted.

José Illegal also works construction has NO Social Security number and gets paid $15.00 hour cash "under the table".

Ready? Now pay attention....

Joe Legal: $25.00 hour x 40 hours =$1000.00 per week or $52,000.00 per year. Now take 30% away for state and federal tax: Joe Legal now has $31,231.00.

José Illegal: $15.00 hour x 40 hours=$600.00 per week or $31,200.00 per year. José Illegal pays no taxes...José Illegal now has $31,200.00.

Joe Legal: pays dental insurance with limited coverage for his family at $600.00 month, or $7,200.00 per year. Joe Legal now has $24,031.00.

José Illegal has full medical and dental coverage through the state and local clinics at a cost of $0.00 per year. José Illegal still has $31,200.00.

Joe Legal makes too much money and is not eligible for food stamps or welfare. Joe Legal pays $500.00 month for food or $6,000.00 per year. Joe Legal now has $18,033.00.

José Illegal has no documented income and is eligible for food stamps or welfare...José Illegal...still has $31,200.00.

Joe Legal pays $1,200.00 month rent or $14,400.00 per year...Joe Legal now has $9,631.00.

José Illegal receives a $500.00 per month federal rent subsidy.

Joe Legal pays out that $500.00 per month, or $6,000.00 per year José Illegal still has $31,200.00.

Joe Legal pays $200.00 month for insurance...Joe Legal now has $7,231.00.

José Illegal says "we don't need any stinkin' insurance" and still has $31,200.00.

Joe Legal has to make his $7,231.00 stretch to pay for utilities, gasoline, etc.

José Illegal has to make his $31,200.00 stretch to pay utilities, gasoline, and what he sends out of the country every month.

Joe Legal now works overtime on Saturdays and gets a part time job after work. José Illegal has nights and weekends off to enjoy with his family.

Joe Legal's and Jose Illegal's children both attend the same school. Joe Legal pays for his children's lunches while José Illegal's children get a government sponsored lunch. Jose Illegal children have an after school ESI program.

Joe Legal's children go home.

Joe Legal and José Illegal both enjoy the same police and fire services, but Joe paid for them, José did not pay.

Do you get it now? If you vote for any Politician that supports illegal aliens, you are part of the problem!

20100619-01	08:31	SteveB	"Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

Well...maybe...

"Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality" by Mark Vaughn, AutoWeek

June 19, 2010, (<http://editorial.autos.msn.com/article.aspx?cp-documentid=1143520>)

(Several automakers announce they'll have hydrogen cars for sale within the next five years. Toyota's target price for its hydrogen fuel cell-powered sedan will be about $50,000.)

Did you know that hydrogen is the most abundant element in the universe? That it powers our very sun? That everything in the hydrogen future is going to be so groovy that we'll need tranquilizer darts shot into our necks just to keep from screaming about how great it'll be?

There are politicians, plutocrats and pundits who believe that H₂ is the future, that ramming it through the membranes of a fuel cell to make electricity is what will power cars in the not-too-far-from-near term. And there are companies betting big bucks on that, too.

All of these elements — people, private industry and government entities — converged this week at the annual National Hydrogen Association's Exposition and Conference in Long Beach, Calif. Even the governor showed up and bench-pressed a few atoms.

The news? One interesting thing was that Toyota chose this week to announce that the target price for its fuel cell-powered sedan, due in showrooms in 2015, will be about $50,000. That's a far cry from early fuel-cell-car estimates that were usually more like "astronomical."

Toyota, General Motors, Honda, Daimler and Hyundai have all said they'll have fuel-cell cars available for retail sale in the United States within five years. So while it's still off in the future, the fuel-cell revolution is a little less futuristic than it traditionally has been.

And while for years it was easy to dismiss hydrogen-powered anything as being too energy-intensive to be worthwhile, some of the experts at the expo were at least saying that hydrogen makes financial as well as efficiency sense.

"Hydrogen is already made today in large scale at very efficient rates, over 80 to 85 percent efficient in terms of energy in to energy out," said Ed Heydorn, business development manager of Hydrogen Energy Systems for Air Products. "Technologies already exist that can produce hydrogen at efficiencies and costs that meet the needs for transportation and other applications."

Granted, Heydorn is selling the stuff, but he had some interesting points.

"One of the beauties of hydrogen is you can make it out of just about any product that's out there, especially renewable resources," Heydorn continued. "A project that we're undertaking now is one at the local wastewater treatment facility in Orange County, Calif. We're working with a company called Fuel Cell Energy that has a fuel-cell technology that can convert the biogas made from wastewater treatment into electricity. We're taking a slipstream within that electricity production to coproduce hydrogen and make it available for vehicle fuel."

One thing we didn't discuss was how much hydrogen such a process would produce. While there are wastewater treatment facilities throughout the civilized world, is there enough of the stuff to power 140 million cars in the United States and millions more throughout the rest of the world?

Heydorn points out that hydrogen is also available as an off gas from various chemical production processes. However, the majority of H₂ available today comes from steam reformation of natural gas, which is an energy intensive process that releases CO₂. True, CO₂ can at least theoretically be sequestered underground, but that requires still more energy, and there's always the threat that it'll get out again, all at once.

But you can't just write off hydrogen altogether. It's still more efficient than gasoline.

"In today's nonrenewable technologies, using conventional conversion systems, hydrogen is probably 40 percent better than gasoline," Heydorn said. "Now, if you want to get to the long-term 2020, 2050 goals of 80 percent reduction, what you do is bring in renewable components from the production of hydrogen: biomass, solar, wind, the right renewable component depending on the location because there's different optima based on the availability. But if you do that, the footprint for hydrogen for transportation fuels becomes very low."

That's a lot of windmills.

One other advantage is hydrogen made from windmills and solar can be used as an energy storage medium that can be released when the wind dies or the sun don't shine.

Sure, but why not just use all that energy to make electricity that goes straight into an electric battery to power an EV?

"It's actually complimentary in terms of market focus. Hydrogen has range that batteries aren't able to meet with current technology. In terms of efficiencies, it becomes a choice of what's the right use of the different feedstocks that are available, whether renewable or conventional. Hydrogen can provide a pathway that complements what's already happening in the world of electricity production."

Since most hydrogen is made from natural gas, why not just pump the natural gas into a Honda Civic GX NGV?

Bob Boyd, manager of project development and hydrogen solutions for energy giant Linde North America, Inc., said hydrogen is still a better bet.

"If you take a unit of volume of natural gas and put it in a Civic, you might be able to go the EPA equivalent of 35 miles. If you take the same amount of natural gas, convert it into hydrogen, use some of that natural gas to compress the hydrogen and put it into a fuel-cell car, it'll go about 25 percent further."

But even hydrogen specialist Boyd admits the element isn't perfect.

"The biggest drawback is density. It's a light gas. How do you get it into a small space? Other fuels — diesel for instance, is very dense. With hydrogen, the biggest problem is finding a place to put it on the car. Even if we make it into a liquid, it's still four, five, six times less dense than gasoline. That's really the biggest challenge."

That, and what to do as the developing world rises up and starts wanting polyester slacks, big screen televisions and their own fleet of BMWs.

20100620-01 08:39 Mark Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"

Dear SteveB,

I think Ben will agree with me that hydrogen costs much more energy to produce than it returns...government mandates crafted by politicians with no scientific background are responsible for such "dead end" technologies. Great idea, good intentions, but not practical...simply put, the BTU' s aren't there!

20100620-02 13:03 SteveB Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"

Dear Mark,

In a way, I agree with you. I think (at least until fusion comes along, then there's the hydrogen again) that we need to figure out how to burn coal cleanly, sequester the CO2, and make electricity for electric cars.

I suppose some super-catalyst could be developed that could separate water at lower temperatures...

Hydrogen is also highly dangerous.

But, as the article states, hydrogen in fuel cells can easily be more efficient than gasoline. Maybe that's wrong.

Anyone?

20100620-03 21:44 Mark Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"

Dear SteveB,

As far as I understand, with a like amount of gasoline and hydrogen, gasoline will produce more BTU's, diesel even more.....

20100621-01 08:57 SteveB Re: "Hydrogen Cars Closer to Reality"

Dear Mark,

Actually, though it's not really a very fair comparison, a pound of hydrogen will produce far more BTU's than a pound of gasoline (and a much larger explosion!), because the atoms are so tiny and the hydrogen-oxygen bond is so strong. But that's what also makes it a little difficult to break, which is where hydrogen's "inefficiency" comes into possible play.

It's all so very intriguing, no? Hope it's not all too late to save us!

20100621-02 13:09 Ben "The Higgs Boson May Have 'Five Faces'"

Dear SteveB,

This is a link to a discovery.com article on high-energy physicists' pursuit of the Higgs Boson at Fermilab and the Large Hadron collider. It's not long:

The letter to the author by Lubos Motl that follows it is even more fun to read. But you will need the article itself even to follow the letter.

This is the real stuff of "The Big Bang Theory". (Fun TV series, Monday night. Many howlers for anyone who's ever really known a science nerd.)

"The Higgs Boson May Have 'Five Faces'" by Jennifer Ouellette, Discovery News

June 21, 2010, (<http://news.discovery.com/space/the-higgs-boson-may-have-five-faces.html>)

Fermilab's Tevatron accelerator has been making some serious waves the last few months.

Back in May, I wrote about the latest results from the D-Zero collaboration, co-discoverers of the top quark in the 1990s. The D-Zero scientists analyzed data from a bunch of proton-anti-proton collisions and found a 1 percent asymmetry in the number of muons produced compared to anti-muons.

That hinted at "a new particle not predicted by the Standard Model" — colorfully dubbed "the toe of god" by Fermilab scientist Joe Lykken.

And now the team is back with even more intriguing results to announce from their subsequent analysis, published on arVix. See, the Standard Model doesn't fully explain why this asymmetry between matter and antimatter should exist.

Yet, as Fermilab scientist Adam Martin pointed out to BBC News, "What's difficult is to have those large effects without damaging anything else we've already measured. The Standard Model fits just about every test we've thrown at it. To fit in a new effect in one particular place is not easy."

Nonetheless, theoretical physicists are pondering possible alternate explanations that would keep much of the Standard Model's framework intact while still offering a potential explanation of this latest experimental evidence.

And they've come up with a doozy: maybe there isn't just one Higgs boson (the as-yet-undiscovered subatomic particle believed to impart mass); maybe, instead, there are five different versions, with similar masses but different electric charges.

Yes, it's not enough that the Standard Model already has so many types of subatomic particles that it's impossible to keep them all straight without a handy cheat sheet.

Never mind that the theory of supersymmetry would add countless more particles to the mix. Now we have to contend with five — count 'em, five! — Higgs bosons: three with a neutral charge and one each with a negative and positive charge, known as the "two-Higgs doublet model." Apparently this would account for the latest D-Zero results.

Along with many physicists, I hate the term "god particle" to describe the Higgs. Fermilab's Leon Lederman coined the term over a decade ago, and it's been misleading innocent civilians ever since into thinking physicists are trying to prove or disprove the existence of god or something.

But it did give the blog 80 Beats the best line yet about these new results: "If the Higgs boson is the God Particle, then some particle physicists just turned polytheistic."

I guess we'll have to wait and see the future uncovers.

comment posted by Luboš Motl:

It's a nice article. By the way, some genuine newspaper articles about "five face of the [Higgs] God]" haven't even mentioned the word "supersymmetry".

Still, you're making the number "five" sound more mysterious (or unjustified) than it is.

In the Standard Model, one needs the Higgs as a part of a Higgs doublet. It has two complex components - a simple representation of SU(2) - which means four real components. However, three of them are "eaten" by the W+, W-, and Z bosons. The three real components of the Higgs doublet become the longitudinal components of the (now massive) three gauge bosons while the fourth one remains a scalar field with a new particle.

In supersymmetry, one needs the minimum of 2 Higgs doublets rather than one. That's $2 \times 4 = 8$ real components instead of 4 from the SM. Three of them are still "eaten" by the three bosons, W+, W-, Z, whose number can't change because the gauge group doesn't change. So $8 - 3 = 5$ components of the Higgs bosons are left for scalar excitations.

Why does supersymmetry (MSSM) need two Higgs doublets? Because, in SUSY, the Higgs scalars have to come with chiral fermionic partners, the higgsinos. However, charged fermions contribute anomalies - which cancel among quarks and leptons but this would destroy the balance again. The only simple way to cancel the new anomalies from the higgsinos is to add another Higgs multiplet with the opposite charges - the left-right mirror.

Another explanation is that one Higgs doublet in SUSY would only be able to have the Yukawa interactions giving the masses either to the upper quarks only, or the lower quarks only. One actually needs both kinds of the Higgs - two Higgs doublets - to make all quarks (classically) massive.

20100621-03	14:31	SteveB	Re: "The Higgs Boson May Have 'Five Faces'"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Ben,

Ya, this is pretty cool, heh? I've been keeping up with the God Particle because it plays a central role in my big "Dark Matter" poem.

The five varieties also tends to confirm the 11 dimensions + time that supersymmetry now predicts.

I love physics! Especially cosmology.

But I think, ultimately, the physics of the physical universe are so complex that it turns out that it would have been (or was!) much easier for God to have created a non-physical, illusory universe, just as Buddhism predicts. Of course, it must still appear to be logical to us or we would know it's not real. But the facts are so unreal by now, that I wonder if it's all a hint...hey, dummies, of course this can't be real! That is...if there is a God... If not, the universe is even weirder for his absence.

20100622-01	09:19	Phil	Fw: "Overwhelm the System"
-----------------------------	-------	------	----------------------------

"Overwhelm the System" by Wayne Allyn Root (<http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/overwhelm.asp>)

Barack Obama is no fool. He is not incompetent. To the contrary, he is brilliant. He knows exactly what he's doing. He is purposely overwhelming the U.S. economy to create systemic failure, economic crisis and social chaos—thereby destroying capitalism and our country from within.

[Isn't this, instead, what the Republicans are doing? —SteveB]

Barack Obama is [Was? —SteveB] my college classmate (Columbia University, class of '83). As Glenn Beck correctly predicted from day one, Obama is following the plan of Cloward & Piven, two professors at Columbia University . They outlined a plan to socialize America by overwhelming the system with government spending and entitlement demands.

Add up the clues below. Taken individually they're alarming. Taken as a whole, it is a brilliant, Machiavellian game plan to turn the United States into a socialist/Marxist state with a permanent majority that desperately needs government for survival ... and can be counted on to always vote for bigger government. Why not? They have no responsibility to pay for it.

1. Universal health care. The health care bill had very little to do with health care. A, It had everything to do with unionizing millions of hospital and health care workers, as well as adding 15,000 to 20,000 new IRS agents (who will join government employee unions). Obama doesn't care that giving free health care to 30 million Americans will add trillions to the national debt. What he does care about is that it cements the dependence of those 30 million voters to Democrats and big government. Who but a socialist revolutionary would pass this reckless spending bill in the middle of a depression?

[Exactly! Who but a socialist commie pig would recklessly spend on a bill estimated by the GAO to save $billions. —SteveB]

2. Cap and trade. Like health care legislation having nothing to do with health care, cap and trade has nothing to do with global warming. It has everything to do with redistribution of income, government control of the economy and a criminal payoff to Obama's biggest contributors. Those powerful and wealthy unions and contributors (like GE, which owns NBC, MSNBC and CNBC) can then be counted on to support everything Obama wants. They will kick-back hundreds of millions of dollars in contributions to Obama and the Democratic Party to keep them in power. The bonus is that all the new taxes on Americans with bigger cars, bigger homes and businesses helps Obama "spread the wealth around."

[The pot calling the kettle black, if you ask me. We all know who the kings of this kind of thing are, the Republicans. That's why this guy can explain these kinds of activities so well.—SteveB]

3. Make Puerto Rico a state. Why? Who's asking for a 51st state? Who's asking for millions of new welfare recipients and government entitlement addicts in the middle of a depression?, Certainly not American taxpayers. But this has been Obama's plan all along. His goal is to add two new Democrat senators, five Democrat congressman and a million loyal Democratic voters who are dependent on big government.

4. Legalize 12 million illegal immigrants. Just giving these 12 million potential new citizens free health care alone could overwhelm the system and bankrupt America . But it adds 12 million reliable new Democrat voters who can be counted on to support big government. Add another few trillion dollars in welfare, aid to dependent children, food stamps, free medical, education, tax credits for the poor, and eventually Social Security.

5. Stimulus and bailouts. Where did all that money go? It went to Democrat contributors, organizations (ACORN), and unions— including billions of dollars to save or create jobs of government employees across the country. It went to save GM and Chrysler so that their employees could keep paying union dues. It went to AIG so that Goldman Sachs could be bailed out (after giving Obama almost $1 million in contributions). A staggering $125 billion went to teachers (thereby protecting their union dues). All those public employees will vote loyally Democrat to protect their bloated salaries and pensions that are bankrupting America . The country goes broke, future generations face a bleak future, but Obama, the Democrat Party, government, and the unions grow more powerful. The ends justify the means.

[The unions grow more powerful? LOL! —SteveB]

6. Raise taxes on small business owners, high-income earners, and job creators. Put the entire burden on only the top 20 percent of taxpayers, redistribute the income, punish success, and reward those who did nothing to deserve it (except vote for Obama). Reagan wanted to dramatically cut taxes in order to starve the government. Obama wants to dramatically raise taxes to starve his political opposition.

With the acts outlined above, Obama and his regime have created a vast and rapidly expanding constituency of voters dependent on big government; a vast privileged class of public employees who work for big government; and a government dedicated to destroying capitalism and installing themselves as socialist rulers by overwhelming the system.

Add it up and you've got the perfect Marxist scheme—all devised by my Columbia University college classmate Barack Obama using the Cloward and Piven Plan.

Vote these clowns out—now!!!!!!!

20100622-02 10:07 SteveB Re: "Overwhelm the System"

Dear Phil,

Please excuse me, but I find this to be completely...well...crazy!!!!

First of all...Glenn Beck? This guy predicted that the dollar and all creation would be defunct by now, and hoped and prayed and cheered that it would happen! Why? To increase his ratings? Who knows? He's crazy as a fruitcake!

I don't know who Wayne Allyn Root is, but he's got it all wrong. We have to stop this taking sides for and against Democrats and Republicans when they both are totally corrupt (thanks to campaign contributions), working for big companies or big money instead of the American people.

First of all, it is just as much the big Republican tax cuts of Reagan and Bush, and their free trade and illegal immigration that is leading us down the path to disaster just as much as it is any Democratic spending (which Obama, like Clinton, really hasn't done very much of, but, of course, reality doesn't count with Republicans, right?). And why doesn't Republican spending on war count?

As my mother used to say, "GOODNESS GRACIOUS SAKES ALIVE!!!!!"

20100622-03 12:47 Dennis Re: "Overwhelm the System"

Dear Phil,

Needless to say, this is a gross distortion of anything proposed by Cloward & Piven, who were advocating a strategy to force reforms for the disempowered poor. It was hardly a "Machiavellian game plan to turn the United States into a socialist/Marxist state."

This cr*p rivals anything conjured up by Joe McCarthy. Furthermore, pinning this imaginary scheme on Barack Obama is a ludicrous joke. The poor guy has proven himself inept at even minor reforms, pretty much establishing his politics as Bush Lite.

Destroying capitalism? If that happens it will be from self-destruction caused by shortsighted greedy corporatists, not anything a politician as feeble as Obama could conceivably accomplish alone.

20100622-04 13:01 SteveB Re: "Overwhelm the System"

Dear Dennis,

iExactamente!

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says it's bogus, <http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/williams.asp>, — SteveB]

YOU HAVE TO LOVE HIM....A MUST READ! HE MADE THIS SPEECH IN NEW YORK.

You gotta love Robin Williams.....Even if he's nuts! Leave it to Robin Williams to come up with the perfect plan. What we need now is for our UN Ambassador to stand up and repeat this message. Robin Williams' plan...(Hard to argue with this logic!)

The Plan! by Robin Williams, wearing a shirt that says 'I love New York ' in Arabic.

I see a lot of people yelling for peace, but I have not heard of a plan for peace. So, here's one plan.

1. The U.S., U.K., CANADA, and AUSTRALIA will apologize to the world for our 'interference' in their affairs, past & present. You know, Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, Tojo, Noriega, Milosevic, Hussein, and the rest of those 'good 'ole' boys'. We will never 'interfere' again.
2. We will withdraw our troops from all over the world, starting with Germany, South Korea, the Middle East, and the Philippines. They don't want us there. We would station troops at our borders. No one allowed sneaking through holes in the fence.
3. All illegal aliens have 90 days to get their affairs together and leave We'll give them a free trip home. After 90 days, the remainder will be gathered up and deported immediately, regardless of whom or where they are from. They're illegal!!! France will welcome them.
4. All future visitors will be thoroughly checked and limited to 90 days unless given a special permit!!!! No one from a terrorist nation will be allowed in. If you don't like it there, change it yourself and don't hide here. Asylum would never be available to anyone. We don't need any more cab drivers or 7-11 cashiers.
5. No foreign 'students' over age 21. The older ones are the bombers. If they don't attend classes, they get a 'D' and it's back home, baby.
6. The U.S., U.K., CANADA, and AUSTRALIA will make a strong effort to become self-sufficient energy-wise. This will include developing nonpolluting sources of energy, but will require the temporary drilling for oil in the Alaskan wilderness. The caribou will have to cope for a while.
7. Offer Saudi Arabia and other oil producing countries $10 a barrel for their oil. If they don't like it, we go someplace else. They can go somewhere else to sell their production. (About a week of the wells filling up the storage sites would be enough.)
8. If there is a famine or other natural catastrophe in the world, we will not 'interfere.' They can pray to Allah or whomever, for seeds, rain, cement, or whatever they need. Besides ,most of what we give them is stolen or given to the army anyway. The people who need it most get very little, if anything.
9. Ship the UN Headquarters to an isolated island someplace. We don't need the spies and fair weather friends here. Besides, the building would make a good homeless shelter or lockup for illegal aliens.
10. All Americans must go to charm and beauty school. That way, no one can call us 'Ugly Americans' any longer. The Language we speak is ENGLISH..learn it...or LEAVE!

Now, isn't that a winner of a plan? 'The Statue of Liberty is no longer saying 'Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses.' She's got a baseball bat and she's yelling, 'You want a piece of me?' If you agree with the above, forward it to friends...If not, and I would be amazed, simply DELETE it!!

Grayson is a House Rep. from Florida. Just thought this was kind of interesting. I am not forwarding to support him, just passing on information that seemed interesting.

www.CongressmanWithGuts.com

We merely want to live in peace with all the world, to trade with them, to commune with them, to learn from their culture as they may learn from ours, so that the products of our toil may be used for our schools and our roads and our churches and not for guns and planes and tanks and ships of war. —Dwight D. Eisenhower

I was two years old when President Eisenhower gave a stunningly precise prediction of our fate for the next 50 years. He said that for the first time in human history, America had created a permanent military-industrial complex that employed millions and spent billions. "More than the net income of all United States corporations," he noted.

Now, the military-industrial complex dictates our foreign policy. Wall Street dictates our economic policy. Big Oil dictates our energy policy.

But we're going to stop this, with People Power. On June 28, thousands of us will come together for a 'Peace Party' to fund our reelection campaign. When thousands of us individually give $35 or $50, we can raise our voices together, and say in one voice: ENOUGH!

Eisenhower told us that the domination of this military-industrial complex would have "grave implications" for the "very structure of our society." He warned against "the disastrous rise of misplaced power." But he hoped that an "alert and knowledgeable citizenry" would protect us.

If only. As if. You wish.

For the past half century, the military-industrial complex has perpetuated one war after another, at enormous cost in both blood and money. In its lust for oil, it has broken country after country, and now the sea floor. 9/11 cost Osama bin Laden $500,000, while U.S. military action afterward cost us well over $500,000,000,000.

Now, it's nine years later. And the war goes on. My five children cannot remember a time in their lives when America was at peace.

And no one in power seems to be able to deliver on the things that matter to us—deliver on jobs, on health, on education, on clean water and air, on better roads. On peace. On meeting human needs.

I've done my best in Congress to show the way. Now I need your help. On June 28, we're going to hold an online 'Peace Party' event, where thousands of us come together to support this campaign. We need to raise $200,000 or more by that day, to show BP and other corporate behemoths that the "small people" (as BP put it) still matter.

We need a peace dividend. We need new priorities. We need people in government who will tell the military-industrial complex, and Wall Street, and Big Oil, to go to hell. And I'm one of them.

Courage, Alan Grayson

P.S. Here is what Eisenhower said:

Until the latest of our world conflicts, the United States had no armaments industry. American makers of plowshares could, with time and as required, make swords as well. But now we can no longer risk emergency improvisation of national defense. We have been compelled to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions. Added to this, three and a half million men and women are directly engaged in the defense establishment. We annually spend on military security alone more than the net income of all United States corporations.

Now this conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience. The total influence—economic, political, even spiritual—is felt in every city, every Statehouse, every office of the Federal government. We recognize the imperative need for this development. Yet we must not fail to comprehend its grave implications. Our toil, resources, and livelihood are all involved. So is the very structure of our society.

In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists, and [it] will persist. We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes. We should take nothing for granted. Only an alert and knowledgeable citizenry can compel the proper meshing of the huge industrial and military machinery of defense with our peaceful methods and goals, so that security and liberty may prosper together.

20100624-01 12:12 Bill Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear SteveB,

Politics comprises interest groups, and there probably isn't much to be done about that; some members of our legislative bodies will always be bought and paid for in a sense. But the endless war dimension of what Grayson laments is absolutely right.

Surely the United States can be adept enough in international relations to be the global leader without endlessly engaging in war and feeding the execrable military-industrial complex.

20100624-02 14:39 Ben Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear SteveB,

Yep: familiar turf.

We need a system that ensures that the people who get 'em elected are simply individual citizens. Like I've told others: let corporations influence elections through their employees, not lobbyists; corporations should have no direct contact with government. One man (or woman), one vote. Period. Of course, this applies to any kind of non-voter entity, such as churches, Bob's Restaurant, and the Boy Scouts or NRA.

The problem with rising up as a body of voters is just that: rising up as a body of voters. It ain't gonna happen. Ross Perot (maybe) tried to make an honest dent in it. I reacted, I actually voted for Ross. In retrospect, maybe it IS a good thing he didn't make it, but it felt good to "send the message". But—it was futile.

Don't bother to tell us to rise up as a group that will never be. It ain't gonna happen. We'll have to be completely subjugated before the majority will believe that's what has to happen, and then, it will be too late. The folks who most strongly believe voters should rise up are all Republicans. Figure out how to get rid of lobbyists, and campaign contributions, permanently. I don't think Congress will go for it, though...

20100624-03 15:19 SteveB Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear Ben,

Of course "congress won't go for it"! It's a non sequitur, completely. Congress hasn't gotten rid of the corrupt system because the system is corrupt.

I don't advocate anything except something very simple.

We all work to convince enough people to fire every incumbent politician, good or bad. The good ones can run again and get elected next time because they ain't the incumbent.

The big money is only used to brainwash us through the media. We have to stop listening. We have to stop thinking in terms of political parties...one fictitiously good and one fictitiously bad. Or even one politician fictitiously good and his opponent fictitiously bad. They all must go!

Eventually, the politicians will get the idea who is in charge and the system and, hopefully, the corruption will change. The voice of the people will be heard. Peacefully, but forcefully!

Nothing in existence can do the job except the votes of the people. The history of our generation has proven that.

20100624-04 15:31 SteveB Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

It's really all so simple. It's so simple that I'm only going to spell it out one time. It's so simple that I don't understand why it is not more openly discussed.

Our free, elective system of government works incredibly well! The Founding Fathers were geniuses. The ancient Greeks and the old Brits were brilliant. (Everything else is derivative, right?)

Freely elected politicians are motivated to work for those responsible for getting them elected. Let me say that again. Freely elected politicians are motivated to work for those responsible for getting them elected.

Ideally, that means the people who voted for them. That's the way the system was designed to work. Few politicians have the huevos to go against what or whom got them elected or keeps them in power. That's human nature. The system was designed with an understanding of human nature and implemented in such a way as to control human motives to serve the will of the people.

But throughout history, certain people have figured out ways to pervert the system to their own ends. It used to be that party bosses and union bosses could get out the vote in such numbers that they became responsible for election results, not the people actually voting. Now, during my lifetime, it is big money, not the people, that controls politicians.

Huge campaign contributions skew the entire system. And, just in case that's not enough, lobbyists and regulators are almost unfettered in their associations, dealings, obligations, and manipulations. Yes, folks, all the really bad stuff is legal. They ain't stupid!

If you don't believe the system is corrupt, ask yourself this: why do giant corporations continue to spend billions of dollars contributing to the campaigns of elected officials, then billions more on lobbyists to make sure the obligations get paid? Do you assume these intelligent men are so stupid as to throw money away all these years? No, put simply, they do this because it works. The corruption itself proves the corruption, does it not?

Why do you think the jobs have been shipped to other countries? Why are we locked in interminable wars that accomplish little or nothing, but cause much pain and suffering?

Why is the country going bankrupt? Why have we not been able to solve any of the problems of our generation...energy, immigration, education, health care, the disappearing middle class, balance of payments, deficits, environment, war? I could go on and on.

Surely the people don't desire this situation. If the people were truly in control...things might be different, but they are not in control, big money is. Politicians are not motivated to serve the people who vote for them. They are motivated to serve the people with money responsible for getting them elected. This must be the situation desired by the people who control the process with their money, is it not?

Few politicians have the huevos to go against what or whom got them elected or keeps them in power.

To blame one party or the other, to support one party or the other is ludicrous, in my opinion. It is the system which is corrupt and the people need to ignore the brainwashing, ignore the media, ignore the lies of the politicians, and rise up with their votes and force a change. It's as simple and as difficult as that, my friends.

20100624-05 15:57 Ben Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear SteveB,

Hey, I'll vote for a not-incumbent. I often do!

But, uh, is there any way besides researching every one that I can know that the non-incumbent isn't corrupt...?

Therein lies the problem.

20100624-06 16:05 SteveB Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear Ben,

That's not the point. The point is to provide a wake-up call to the system, to all the politicians. Of course, the non-incumbent is corrupt! That's my assumption.

What must be broken by the people is the one-to-one connection, in the minds of politicians, between getting big money and getting elected.

Get it? I don't know any other way to do it non-violently. [Now I do: via Constitutional change. —SteveB]

20100624-07 15:15 SteveB Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear Bill,

You're right about deficit spending. But that's just a small part of the corrupt process. See my list of the problems our generation has failed to solve.

20100624-08 17:18 Dennis Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

from Ben:

The folks who most strongly believe voters should rise up are all Republicans.

Dear Ben,

Surely you jest!

20100624-09 17:32 SteveB Re: "Half a Century Under the Whip"

Dear Ben,

Haha! No jest!

There are no Republican or Democratic politicians. That's obsolete thinking.

There is only the enemy! :-)

Pogo said it so well, "We have met the enemy and they is us!"

20100627-01 13:26 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 20: "Pope Deplores Belgian Sex Raids, Stresses Autonomy"

The Church obviously still feels that it is above the law...from the Pope down. Why should these criminals or, to give them the benefit of the doubt, potential criminals, be treated any differently than anyone else? Does being part of a religious organization exempt any citizen from the law? I don't think so.

See...they still haven't learned their lesson. They evidently intend to continue abusing our children and feel they should be able to do so with impunity. What in the world would it take to wake these perverts up?

I have an idea. Arrest the Pope! He's the one ultimately responsible and, in this case, maybe very directly responsible for much of the cover-up.

"Pope Deplores Belgian Sex Raids, Stresses Autonomy" by Nicole Winfield, AP

June 27, 2010, (<http://dailycaller.com/2010/06/27/pope-belgian-sex-abuse-raids-deplorable/>)

(VATICAN CITY) The pope on Sunday called the raids carried out by Belgian police investigating priestly sex abuse "surprising and deplorable" and voiced his support for the Belgian bishops who were held during the searches.

In a message of solidarity to the head of the Belgian bishops' conference, Pope Benedict XVI said justice must take its course but also asserted the right of the Catholic Church to investigate abuse alongside civil law enforcement authorities.

It was first time the pope himself had commented on the June 24 raids, and his message to Monsignor Andre Joseph Leonard capped a daily ratcheting up of the Vatican's criticism. On Saturday, the No. 2 Vatican official said the raids were unprecedented even under communism.

In the raids, police searched the home and former office of former Archbishop Godfried Danneels, taking documents and his personal computer. The raid came as the country's nine bishops were starting their monthly meeting; the men were held for nine hours and — along with diocese staff — had to surrender their cell phones.

Police and prosecutors have not said if Danneels is suspected of abuse himself or simply had records pertaining to allegations against another person.

Separately, police seized the records of an independent panel investigating sexual abuse by priests, some 500 cases in all. The head of the panel called the raid a huge violation of the privacy of people — mostly men now in their 60s and 70s — who have lived with the shame of abuse.

Benedict said he wanted to write to Belgium's bishops "at this sad moment" to express his solidarity "for the surprising and deplorable way in which the searches were conducted." He noted that the monthly meeting of the bishops was to discuss precisely clerical abuse.

He stressed that such crimes are handled by both civil and canon law "respecting their reciprocal specificity and autonomy."

"In that sense, I hope that justice takes its course, guaranteeing the fundamental rights of people and institutions with respect to the victims, recognizing without prejudice all those who are committed to collaborating with justice and refuting all that which seeks to obscure its noble goals," he wrote.

The Belgian justice minister, Stefaan De Clerck, stressed that the procedures used in the raids were correct and that the bishops were treated normally, according to the Belga news agency. He bristled at the criticism by Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the Vatican No. 2, saying his suggestion that the raids were unprecedented even under communism had been excessive, based on false information.

20100627-02	14:16	Ben	Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20
-------------	-------	-----	---------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Aren't there similar stories with a variety of sects of the Mormon Church and to a lesser degree to the cult of Scientology?

20100627-03 14:21 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20

Dear Ben,

Maybe as far as abuse goes (though we're talking about thousands of known cases versus handfuls), but these other sects or cults or whatever don't seem to claim so vehemently (or effectively) that they are above the law. Right?

20100704-01 19:27 GaryF Fw: "Happy 4th!"

Dear SteveB,

These are the kind of morons I have to deal with in this part of the U.S.

"Happy 4th!" posted by Timothy Ramsey, July 4, 2010, FirstCoastTeaParty.org

I to am a child of the fifties and sixties (in fact I turn sixty in a few days). I to traveled the same road from Hippydom (I actually lived in Haight Asbury) to our current state of affairs and saw the beginnings of the end of our culture starting with the Viet War and now culminating with our first Communist President, Mr. Obama. We have almost lost everything that generations have sacrificed to gain simply because the left has played on our decency, honesty and unfortunately our gullibility. The Alinsky method , even before it was enumerated in the sixties, was at work starting in the late 1800's, and building brick by brick the Progressive's brick wall of stupidity has now almost surrounded us. We have stood by as the radicals have taken everything that made us great and used those very actions against us. Talk about reverse psychology, we have been playing into their hands for almost, if not the better part of, a century.

We now live in a culture that believes we need CHANGE, but at what cost and what outcome?

The founding Fathers had a vision of the future that gave all an equal chance before the law and although maybe seemingly harsh to some it has given us the greatest bounty a nation or people have ever known. Now the corruption from Chicago has erupted in our heartland and spread to almost every corner of our once brilliant nation.

The sad thing is the Progressives started with our children via their teachers with the desire for unionization. We stood by and gave tacit approval to the utter nonsense being taught to our children by leftist teachers in order not to be singled out by the left for ridicule. We allowed the very sort of people that McCarthy tried to expose take over our media outlets and look what they have given us; pornography, lies, deviancy, and lockstep complacency all cloaked in the garb of supposed enlightened behavior that was to transcend our old hackneyed ways. The left preached about a new road that was supposed to bring us in to a new and better sort of society that would be truly equal. What the Progressives failed to tell us was that the equality they preached was of the lowest common denominator and that anyone trying to have or be more was a pariah.

So now we have leadership that is rather like the Wizard of Oz, in that Obama and Co. keep insisting that we ignore the man behind the curtain (actual video and sound bites showing what they promised) and pay attention only to the image projected on the smoke arising from the front of the curtain (What they say as opposed to what they actually do and enact. We are asked to forget the false promises of the manipulator behind the curtain whose actions actually show what was promised but not delivered). Smoke and mirrors are all they have to offer at this point, but as any refugee from any Socialist nation or regime will tell you what comes next is the "Boot on the Neck" for us as a country and a culture. Jackboots and guns are how the left intend to proceed, this is shown by Obama's desire to have an internal Army equally armed and supplied for the purpose of controlling our "unruly population".

We don't have to stand for this sort of treatment by our elected servants, we can still (at least for now) vote, and voting at this moment in time is the only recourse we have without falling into chaos. Every one of us needs to spread the word that we can and must take back our government and our society and rid ourselves of the scourge that we have so far willingly allowed to bully and cower us for too long. If we don't start acting and behaving as though our lives depended on it we won't have to worry about anything because those lives will have been lost to the executioners' bullets. Remember Wm. Ayers (Obama's mentor) freely advocates eliminating upwards of 25 % of the population in order to achieve their stated goals, the likes of which Obama denies but is all the while emplacing in our nation.

So on this hallowed day I urge you to stand up and spread the word we can and must take back our God given birth right and shed the Socialistic and corrupt leadership we now suffer under. God blessed this nation but that blessing isn't his job to keep or maintain, it's ours, and now is the time to recognize that fact and get back to our job of maintaining what was so wonderfully given to us but what we have for too long taken for granted. That Vet with tears in his eyes needs to serve as a wakeup call for all true Americans of every stripe, a call to Duty and Honor, and so far not yet a call for arms. If we act now perhaps we will never have to hear a call for arms within our borders, but rather we will hear a clarion call for the true equality, goodness and justice laid out in our Founding Fathers original intent as laid out in the three greatest works of mankind our Constitution ,Bill of Rights, and the original ideal set forth by the Declaration of Independence.

20100705-01 19:15 SteveB Re: "Happy 4th!"

Dear GaryF,

It's really funny, you know, that we all sense that something is drastically wrong. That there are many problems to be solved.

But how do they ever get solved when there is such a disconnect among people as to what the problems actually are?

To my mind, both extremes (left and right) wish to enslave us, but if incompetent Obama is one extreme, as this idiot believes, then bring it on!

20100707-01 09:14 SteveB Fw: Constitutional Amendment Idea

SteveG,

OK. This is a good one.

I'll do my part...

But while we're at it, there should also be Constitutional Amendments to do the following:

1. Make all lobbying illegal. The government can hire people to gather and present information more impartially.
2. Make all campaign contributions larger than $100 strictly illegal.
3. Remove all "revolving doors" between regulating agencies and the industries or concerns regulated.

In the meantime, turn all incumbents out of office until our governmental servants get the idea of whom they work for.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Dramatic Hope and Change in November

(This will take less than thirty seconds to read. Please pass it on.)

Governors of 35 states have already filed suit against the federal government for imposing unlawful burdens upon them. It only takes 38 states to convene a Constitutional Convention.

For too long we have been too complacent about the workings of Congress. Many citizens had no idea that members of Congress could retire with the same pay after only one term, that they didn't pay into Social Security, that they specifically exempted themselves from many of the laws they have passed, while ordinary citizens must live under those laws. The latest is to exempt themselves from healthcare reform.. Somehow, that doesn't seem fair. We do not have an elite that is above the law. I truly don't care if they are Democrat, Republican, Independent or whatever. The self-serving must stop. This is a good way to do that. It is an idea whose time has come.

Have each person contact a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise. In three days, most people in the nation will have the message. This is one proposal that really should be passed around.

Proposed 28th Amendment to the United States Constitution:

"Congress shall make no law that applies to the citizens of the United States that does not apply equally to the Senators and/or Representatives; and, Congress shall make no law that applies to the Senators and/or Representatives that does not apply equally to the citizens of the United States."

You are one of my 20.

Don't forget to "Take out the trash this November!"

20100707-02 13:01 SteveG Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea

Dear SteveB,

Please consider adding:

1. All federal elections follow the same process and use the same equipment as well as having a paper trail.
2. Term limits for the Senate and House of Representatives.

20100707-03 13:23 SteveB Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea

Dear SteveG,

I like 'em!

And maybe add that the federal (and maybe all state) budgets must be balanced, unless there is some dire emergency.

That would make an "even" 7.

20100707-04 14:26 SteveG Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea

Dear SteveB,

It amazes me that during the 60-70's we had street protests about the war, civil rights, and women's rights. Over the past 30-40 years we have allowed companies to rule our government, the past 10 years we have allowed the U.S. to get into 2 wars that cannot be won/ We have allowed our government to become gridlocked, and we sit at home.

We need more than 2 parties.

We need to do away with the electoral college too.

20100708-01 16:55 SteveB Re: Constitutional Amendment Idea

SteveG,

Always happy to know you're a fellow radical, my old friend!

20100708-02 16:18 SteveG Corruption in Iraq; TV

Dear SteveB,

If you go to <http://www.channelsurfing.net>, you can access some of the American TV channels. MSNBC is a little left, but I like "Countdown" and "The Rachel Maddow Show". Rachel has been in Afghanistan the past couple of days. Part of last night they were showing some of the mansions built—25 bedrooms—by politicians using U.S. tax money—some of the defense spending. They weren't living in the homes, but leasing them to foreign contractors and then using the "rent money" to live in Dubai or other countries.

Hooked our desktop to a 26" TV for a monitor and about a $14 antenna, From the antenna we get Fox, ABC, CBS, NBC, and 2 PBS channels. The rest we get from the computer. Kind of liberating in a lot of ways.

<http://www.fancast.com> is another sight you can get some TV shows and movies.

20100709-01 06:53 SteveB Re: Corruption in Iraq; TV

SteveG,

Thanks. I'll take a look at channelsurfing.net. I love Keith & Countdown and miss it. Like Rachel too. She's so gay! If I were a woman, I'd be gay too!

I get CNN Int'l in English & CNN in Spanish. I have a lot of good movie channels in English & Spanish, a channel in English that only shows reruns of U.S. cop shows like CSI Miami, and one in English that only shows reruns of U.S. sitcoms like "Seinfeld" & "Everybody Loves Raymond". I listen to the BBC on the radio.

So I get a lot more international news than I ever got in the States, but U.S. news is kind of lacking, except on the internet

20100709-02 06:56 SteveG Re: Corruption in Iraq; TV

Dear SteveG,

Oh, I thought of another good Constitutional Amendment—a simple flat income tax! And, if not unconstitutional, the States should be mandated to do the same. I'd be for getting rid of the sales tax altogether. It was great in Montana not having to deal with that.

[Mar., 2012: Have totally changed my mind. NO FLAT TAX! It's a trick! —SteveB]

20100715-01 09:15 SteveB "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"
--

"'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert" by David Emery, About.com Guide

http://urbanlegends.about.com/od/socialpoliticalissues/ss/illegal_super_highway.htm

20100715-02 12:54 Pam Re: "Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

Dear SteveB,

Wow. Why DOESN'T the mainstream news media talk about this???

20100715-03 13:05 Pam Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20

Dear SteveB,

Jon Stewart did a funny piece the other night. First, he quoted all the stuff Jews are supposed to do: lots of dreadful, violent things. He quoted directly from the Torah. Then when everyone was all stoked up about that, he came back with all the stuff Christians are supposed to, and they were just as bad. All religions are bunk as far as I'm concerned. I try to exercise tolerance, because many of my friends are religious to one degree or another, but religion is nothing but fairy tales and worse. A plague on all their houses.

I just heard on NPR that the oil has stopped gushing. Let's hope it lasts.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I keep wanting to recommend books to you. I'm reading This Is Where I Leave You by Jonathan Tropper right now. It's a hoot.

20100715-04 15:11 SteveB The "Church"—Chpt. 21: "Vatican Issues Sex Abuse Guidelines after Crisis" & "UN: Vatican Child Rights Report 13 Years Overdue"

Just thought you should know...

Why have people allowed these monsters to get away with what they have over the centuries? And all in the name of God! What an evil institution!

"Vatican Issues Sex Abuse Guidelines after Crisis" by Nicole Winfield, AP

July 15, 2010 (<http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/feedarticle/9174865>)

(VATICAN CITY) The Vatican issued a revised set of in-house rules Thursday to respond to clerical sex abuse, targeting priests who molest the mentally disabled as well as children and priests who use child pornography, but making few substantive changes to existing practice.

The new rules make no mention of the need for bishops to report clerical sex abuse to police, provide no canonical sanctions for bishops who cover up for abusers and do not include any "one-strike and you're out" policy for pedophile priests as demanded by some victims.

As a result, they failed to satisfy victims' advocates, who said the revised rules amounted to little more than "administrative housekeeping" of existing practice when what was needed were bold new rules threatening bishops who fail to report molester priests.

The rules cover the canonical penalties and procedures used for the most grave crimes in the church, both sacramental and moral, and double the statute of limitations applied to them. One new element included lists the attempted ordination of women as a "grave crime" subject to the same set of procedures and punishments meted out for sex abuse.

That drew immediate criticism from women's ordination groups, who said making a moral equivalent between women priests and child rapists was offensive.

The Vatican's sex crimes prosecutor acknowledged it was "only a document," and didn't solve the problem of clerical abuse. He defended the lack of any mention of the need to report abuse to police, saying all Christians were required to obey civil laws that would already demand sex crimes be reported.

"If civil law requires you report, you must obey civil law," Monsignor Charles Scicluna told reporters. But "it's not for canonical legislation to get itself involved with civil law."

Victims' groups have accused the church's internal justice system of failing to deal with abuse allegations and allowing bishops to ignore complaints in order to protect the church.

"The first thing the church should be doing is reporting crimes to civil authorities," said Andrew Madden, a former Dublin altar boy who took the first public lawsuit against the church in Ireland in 1995.

"That's far, far more important than deciding whether a criminal priest should be defrocked or not," he told the AP in Dublin. "The church's internal rules are no more important than the rules of your local golf club."

Barbara Dorris, of Survivors' Network for Those Abused by Priests, said the new guidelines "can be summed up in three words: missing the boat."

"They deal with one small procedure at the very tail end of the problem: defrocking pedophile priests," she said. "Hundreds of thousands of kids, however, have been sexually violated (by) many other more damaging and reckless moves by bishops and other church staff."

Earlier this year, the Vatican advised bishops to follow civil reporting laws and report abuse "crimes" — not allegations — to police. But that call was included in a nonbinding guideline posted on the Vatican website, not an official church document or piece of church legislation.

Sex crime allegations are handled by the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which was headed by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger from 1981 until he was elected pope in 2005. The congregation's procedures call for canonical trials or administrative punishments which can result in a priest being dismissed from the clerical state.

Recent efforts by civic authorities to investigate abuse allegations have again cast a spotlight on the church's efforts to deal in-house with a crime that is criminally prosecutable in most of the world: Just last month, police raided the residence of the Brussels archbishop and carted off boxes of documents as part of an investigation into clerical sex abuse amid concerns the Belgian church was protecting pedophiles.

The new rules extend the statute of limitations for the congregation's handling of alleged priestly abuse to 20 years, from 10 after the victim's 18th birthday, and can be extended beyond that on a case-by-case basis. Such extensions have been routine for years. Defining the possession or distribution of child pornography as a canonical crime also simply makes current practice official.

The new rules represent the first major Vatican document since the clerical abuse scandal erupted earlier this year, with hundreds of new cases coming to light of priests who molested children, bishops who covered up for them and Vatican officials who turned a blind eye for decades.

But the bulk of the new document merely codifies existing norms for dealing canonically with pedophile priests, making previous guidelines set down in 2001 and updated in 2002 and 2003 to speed up defrocking of abusive priests permanent and legally binding. The document — a letter from the Congregation to bishops around the world — represents a permanent piece of church legislation, as opposed to the ad hoc guidelines used until now.

"That is a step forward, because the norm of law is binding and is certain," Scicluna said. But he acknowledged that the document was just an instrument, a set of norms, and that its application both in Rome and in diocese around the world was key.

"It does not solve all the problems," Scicluna said. "It is a very important instrument, but it is the way you use the instrument that is going to have the real effect."

With so few real changes, Scicluna said he didn't expect a new flood of cases to come forward, as happened in 2003-2004, after the abuse scandal exploded in the United States and some 80 percent of the 3,000 cases handled by the Congregation were opened.

"These new norms on sexual abuse really put into law the practice of the Congregation," he said, adding that it was important to publish them so everyone could know what the rules were.

New elements in the text, as first reported last week by The Associated Press, include treating priests who sexually abuse the mentally disabled — or an adult who "habitually lacks the use of reason" — with the same set of sanctions as those who abuse minors. Punishments can include being dismissed from the clerical state.

The rules also list the attempted ordination of a woman as a "grave crime" to be handled according to the same set of procedures as sex abuse — despite arguments that grouping the two in the same document would imply equating them.

"The idea that women seeking to spread the message of God somehow defiles the Eucharist reveals an antiquated, backwards church that still views women as unclean and unholy," said Erin Saiz Hanna, executive director of the Women's Ordination Conference, a U.S.-based organization that works to ordain women as priests, deacons and bishops.

Pope John Paul II and Pope Benedict XVI have said the question of ordaining women priests — often raised as an antidote to the priest shortage and to bring about more gender equality in the church — is not up for discussion.

The Vatican in 2007 issued a decree saying the attempted ordination of women would result in automatic excommunication for the woman and the priest who tries to ordain her. That is repeated in the new document, adding that the priest can also be punished by being defrocked.

At a briefing Thursday, Scicluna defended the inclusion of both sex abuse and ordination of women in the same document as a way of codifying two of the most serious canonical crimes against sacraments and morals that the congregation deals with.

"They are grave, but on different levels," he said, and noted that the document also lists crimes against the sacraments including apostasy, heresy and schism for the first time.

Archbishop Robert Zollitsch, the dean of Germany's bishops conference, welcomed the new guidelines as a clear signal stressing that cases of sexual abuse of children and youths have to be thoroughly investigated and punished.

"The injustice of the past is being cleared, and the conclusions for the present and the future are being drawn," he said in a statement.

Benedict's native Germany has seen a flood of abuse allegations surface, and even the pontiff's own tenure as archbishop of Munich has come under scrutiny since a pedophile priest in his archdiocese was allowed to resume pastoral work while being treated.

A spokesman for Germany's Justice Ministry cautioned that the guidelines were an internal matter of the Roman Catholic Church, but welcomed them as a move in the right direction.

German Justice Minister Sabine Leutheusser-Schnarrenberger wants to push for an extension of the statute of limitations for victims of sexual abuse who are seeking damages in civil law suits from three to 30 years, the ministry said in a statement Wednesday.

"UN: Vatican Child Rights Report 13 Years Overdue" by Frank Jordans, AP

July 15, 2010, (<http://wwrn.org/articles/33874/>)

(GENEVA) The Vatican has failed to send the United Nations a report on child rights that is now almost 13 years overdue, the head of a U.N. panel has told The Associated Press. [Gee, what a surprise! —Steve]

Like all countries that have signed the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Vatican is required to submit regular reports on its efforts to safeguard child rights.

But the U.N. Committee on the Rights of the Child, despite sending repeated reminders, has received no explanation from the Holy See for why it missed a 1997 deadline, according to the committee's chairwoman Yanghee Lee. In the years since, the Vatican has come under intense scrutiny over its handling of child sex abuse allegations around the world and recently admitted that up to one in 20 priests may be implicated.

"I've made contact with the Holy See on several occasions," Lee said in a recent telephone interview. "I haven't received anything."

Officials at the Vatican's mission in Geneva declined comment Thursday, saying the Catholic city state's envoy to the U.N., Silvano Tomasi, was unavailable.

Tomasi refused to discuss the report last month, saying he was "only the messenger," not the author of the report.

A Vatican representative told the U.N. last year that the report was being "finalized as we speak."

Appearing before the U.N.'s Human Rights Council in September, Hubertus Matheus Van Megen said "a paragraph will be dedicated to the problem of child abuse by Catholic clergy."

The Vatican has faced claims that it has covered up clerical sex abuse around the world, such as by not investigating allegations or transferring accused priests to other duties without punishing them.

Van Megen told the Geneva-based council that the church was "very conscious of the seriousness of the problem" but insisted critics had misrepresented the situation.

"While many speak of child abuse as pedophilia, it would be more correct to speak of ephebophilia, being a homosexual attraction to adolescent males," he told the rights council. "Of all priests involved in the abuses, 80-90 percent belong to this sexual orientation minority, which is sexually engaged with adolescent boys between the age of 11 and 17 years old."

"From available research we know now that in the last 50 years somewhere between 1.5 and 5 percent of the Catholic clergy has been involved in sexual abuse cases," he said.

While the Vatican delivered an initial report in 1995, the second, third and fourth reports are now overdue, according to Lee. This puts it on a par with the Caribbean nation of St. Kitts and Nevis. Only five Pacific minnow states — the Cook Islands, Nauru, Niue, Tuvalu and Tonga — have failed to deliver any kind of report.

Mongolia, Senegal and Togo, which also had a 1997 deadline, have since filed their second reports.

Lothar Krappmann, another member of the committee, said many governments see the reports as a nuisance that has little impact on the way they protect child rights.

"Still, in many cases the reports aren't pointless because they give non-governmental organizations the opportunity to pick up on themes and influence policy through public channels," Krappmann told The AP.

Lee, the committee chairwoman, said the treaty contains no penalties for countries that fail to deliver their reports on time — or even at all.

20100716-01 08:04 SteveB Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

Dear Pam,

As you know, I try to stay out of politics as much as I can. I'm not some kook who sees conspiracies everywhere.

But, to me, the answer to your question is very simple. Big business controls politics via the campaign finance laws, giant campaign contributions, lobbying, and by making sure their own people do all the regulating. They control the media because they are the media. The media is big business, right? It is not completely controlled, but that doesn't seem to change anything, does it?

Big business wants cheap labor and big profits, no matter how it is accomplished—busting unions, shipping all manufacturing to other countries, and illegal immigration. No matter the cost to America or her middle class. No matter the cost to our children and grandchildren.

If this is not the truth, then what is? Get it?

20100716-02 08:25 SteveB Re: The "Church"—Chpt. 20

Dear Pam,

Yes, I agree. All religion (actually, "spirituality", because the word "religion" implies and includes the organizations we dislike) should be simply between a person and that person's God or gods or world or universe or whatever. How can anything else have any validity? Anything else is, by definition, socialization, brain washing. Yet...

20100716-03 08:43 Pam Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

Dear SteveB,

I agree with you totally on this. Corporations are the tail that wags the dog. Maybe they're both the tail AND the dog. I heard on NPR that with the new finance regulations, banks are just going to find other ways to keep their profits up. How much money do people need anyway? The rich who only want to get richer are infected with a selfishness that is beyond my understanding. Make good money, accomplish something—fine. But don't reduce the majority of the world's population to penury to do it. I'm glad the Chinese are paying their factory workers more. Why don't they deserve a decent wage as much as Americans do? It's infuriating. We pretend that the voters actually can make a difference. Maybe they do, a little. But Big Daddy gets what Big Daddy wants—every time.

20100716-04 08:55 SteveB Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Lugubrious? That's more than OK. I, too, have found myself thinking more about the end and all that has been lost. But, like you, not really in a sad way. We seem to share some expectancy...

I'm trying to wrap all such thoughts and feeling into my grande poem (which, in Spanish means simply large, not grandiose), "Dark Matter", which I find I have been working on for nearly two years now. Not typical of me. But neither is the subject matter. I've always tried to live my life as fully as I can, but also thought of it as somehow infinite. Lately, I find the infinite harder to attain. "Dark Matter" I hope to finish soon.

The rich and the super-rich: Well, look at Cuba, the U.S.S.R., and China before capitalism. I guess people need the motivation of being rich to create wealth for all of us. Very Ayn Randish, no? And many, many people are poor because they lack motivation or are lazy or however you want to define it. Is that their fault? I don't know. But, like you, I find the extremes difficult to deal with. But without that rare genius, brilliance, motivation, we'd all still be living in the jungle. I'll take the Taj Mahal over "equitable mediocrity" any day. And that idea of Christianity and communism, "from each according to their ability, to each according to their need" is somehow repugnant to me.

In this universe, if we are free to succeed, we are also free to fail, it seems. Yet it makes me so sad to see the homeless and I try to help as many people as I can.

20100716-05 09:06 SteveB Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

Dear Pam,

You know that I am quite a capitalist pig myself (though not a rich one) and I believe in capitalism, profit, and freedom very, very much.

Yet I agree with what you have said.

I think when I first truly realized that something was wrong and got pissed off was when I used to do a lot of sailing. Being from a small land-locked town in Indiana, I got a late start (though I used to dream of building a raft and floating down the Big Walnut to New Orleans. Wonder where I got that idea? :-). Then I sailed tiny boats on big Michigan lakes when I was in college. Then I lived in Portland, Maine, and had a friend in the Coast Guard who had access to some larger sailboats. We had some adventures with fog and storms that I am still amazed we survived.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

In all my days of ports and boat yards and marinas everywhere I have been, one thing really struck me—how many people there are who are really rich! A typical sailboat (or motor yacht, which I loathe) costs as much as a house. If you find one for less than $100,000, you are lucky, but you are going to have some problems and some fixing up to do. What you want to be in for minimal comfort and safety is something at least about 40' long that costs in the neighborhood of $400,000 or $500,000. It's pretty easy to pay a million or two for something a little larger.

All up and down the U.S coasts, the shores of the Great Lakes, Mexico, all the Mediterranean ports of Europe, and all the islands of the Caribbean, the bays and marinas are chock full of these super-expensive toys. Sometimes I would be in my little dinghy, motoring in from some distant anchorage to the dock, passing rows and rows of huge, monster luxury boats, wondering how there could be so many people so rich. If these are their toys, what are their houses and their lives like? How the hell do they do it? And most of the boats, of course, are seldom used. Some rich, gay prince of Denmark and Oprah Winfrey used to have their fancy motor yachts brought to my bay in St. Lucia every year. They would fly down and spend a little time tooling around in their little $50,000,000 toys. Another guy came every year who's yacht had a helicopter and cigar boat parked on the deck. I don't think I ever even knew his name, but he'd fly all around the island just because he could. None of these people knew the sea. They were dilettantes with full crews. And there would be the Rastas and local people, trying to make a few pennies selling them beads and bananas. Sometimes it was almost enough to make me puke.

20100722-01 07:23 Pam Re: "'Illegal Super Highway' in Arizona's Sonoran Desert"

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I feel strongly, as you do, that the world (for lack of a more precise term) is a deeply unfair place. I would NOT WANT to be rich, don't even fantasize about it. I don't see how the really wealthy sleep at night, knowing what misery is just beyond their vision. I know Oprah Winfrey gives a lot to good causes, as do Bill Gates and others. But, still. A $50,000,000 boat?! I guess it keeps the boat builders employed. I am deeply ambivalent about this. Throughout history the great works of art have been produced because of the great wealth behind them: Michelangelo had the Catholic Church; Versailles had Louis XIV; great museums have had their patrons, like the Guggenheims and Whitneys. Do we really wish the Taj Mahal didn't exist? I always used to ask my students if a "slave class" were inevitable if even part of man's achievements were to be accomplished. I love it that there is talk of a labor shortage and higher wages in China. If you had to choose between a flat world of equitable mediocrity and a radically unequal world that contained wonders, which would you choose? It's like that Ursula Le Guin story about the village that sacrifices one child a year so the rest can prosper. I think, I know, that's one reason I like the Arts and Crafts Movement so much. William Morris had the right idea: aesthetics for the masses. I also like the movement toward sustainability, eating local, and living small. Perhaps the choice doesn't have to be as stark as I pictured it. Maybe we can have large-scale comfort along with accessible beauty. Maybe the gargantuan spectacles of the past (not that we don't have our own) will be replaced by humbler yet beautiful objects.

You amaze me. I think of my life as perhaps more adventuresome than most, but you have had so many once-in-a-lifetime experiences. Another thing I used to tell my students was to have adventures when they're young so they'll have things to think about when they're old. I stand by that. But this catches me on the horns of another dilemma of choice. My kids and grandsons are central to my life day to day. I know Saskia would love to spend a year in Europe—she and Ben went to Paris once for a week—and travel, and I would love for her to have memorable experiences, yet I don't want her to leave Greensboro, at least not for long. I'm not clingy. I do not intrude into their life or tell them what to do. I encourage them in all their endeavors, and if they were to go abroad for a time, I'd celebrate with them—then go home and cry my eyes out. I feel like this time right now is doubly precious because it won't last, and I want to keep it for as long as I can. I cannot imagine what comes next.

When my kids were small and we lived in Canada, I was very happy. I didn't have a job, and I was free to order my days as I wished, be with my children, and read and write. I knew at the time how happy I was, and I feared the future because I knew that time in my life couldn't last. I couldn't imagine anything that could possibly replace the joy I found with my kids when they were little. Jump ahead a bit, and I'm in Greensboro, going to grad. school, finding new friends, discovering the deep pleasures of my studies. That is what took the place of early motherhood. My relationship with my second husband seemed to be the next big thing. What I'm saying is, one big thing seems to come along and take the place of the last, and you never know ahead of time what it's going to be. Sometimes I feel as I did back in Canada. In many ways my life now is not so very different from my life then. I know I am happy, and I know it won't last. What will be the next thing? Will there even be a next thing? At some point, we will all run out of places to move on to.

20100724-01	12:26	SteveB	"22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

This is what I've been talking about when I say we've been "sold down the river" by a corrupt political system (both parties, not one or the other, please! Don't stupidly try to tell me this is all Bush's fault or Obama's fault!). Is this really the kind of nation we want for our children and grandchildren?

"22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" by Michael Snyder, The Business Insider

July 15, 2010, (<http://www.businessinsider.com/22-statistics-that-prove-the-middle-class-is-being-systematically-wiped-out-of-existence-in-america-2010-7>)

(Editor's note: Michael Snyder is editor of theeconomiccollapseblog.com.)

The 22 statistics detailed here prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that the middle class is being systematically wiped out of existence in America.

The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer at a staggering rate. Once upon a time, the United States had the largest and most prosperous middle class in the history of the world, but now that is changing at a blinding pace.

So why are we witnessing such fundamental changes? Well, the globalism and "free trade" that our politicians and business leaders insisted would be so good for us have had some rather nasty side effects. It turns out that they didn't tell us that the "global economy" would mean that middle class American workers would eventually have to directly compete for jobs with people on the other side of the world where there is no minimum wage and very few regulations. The big global corporations have greatly benefited by exploiting third world labor pools over the last several decades, but middle class American workers have increasingly found things to be very tough.

Here are the statistics to prove it: [The sources of the statistics would be a nice touch here. —SteveB]

1. 83 percent of all U.S. stocks are in the hands of 1 percent of the people.
2. 61 percent of Americans "always or usually" live paycheck to paycheck, which was up from 49 percent in 2008 and 43 percent in 2007.
3. 66 percent of the income growth between 2001 and 2007 went to the top 1% of all Americans.
4. 36 percent of Americans say that they don't contribute anything to retirement savings.
5. A staggering 43 percent of Americans have less than $10,000 saved up for retirement.
6. 24 percent of American workers say that they have postponed their planned retirement age in the past year.
7. Over 1.4 million Americans filed for personal bankruptcy in 2009, which represented a 32 percent increase over 2008.
8. Only the top 5 percent of U.S. households have earned enough additional income to match the rise in housing costs since 1975.
9. For the first time in U.S. history, banks own a greater share of residential housing net worth in the United States than all individual Americans put together.
10. In 1950, the ratio of the average executive's paycheck to the average worker's paycheck was about 30 to 1. Since the year 2000, that ratio has exploded to between 300 to 500 to one.
11. As of 2007, the bottom 80 percent of American households held about 7% of the liquid financial assets.
12. The bottom 50 percent of income earners in the United States now collectively own less than 1 percent of the nation's wealth.
13. Average Wall Street bonuses for 2009 were up 17 percent when compared with 2008.
14. In the United States, the average federal worker now earns 60% MORE than the average worker in the private sector.
15. The top 1 percent of U.S. households own nearly twice as much of America's corporate wealth as they did just 15 years ago.
16. In America today, the average time needed to find a job has risen to a record 35.2 weeks.
17. More than 40 percent of Americans who actually are employed are now working in service jobs, which are often very low paying.

18. For the first time in U.S. history, more than 40 million Americans are on food stamps, and the U.S. Department of Agriculture projects that number will go up to 43 million Americans in 2011.

19. This is what American workers now must compete against: in China a garment worker makes approximately 86 cents an hour and in Cambodia a garment worker makes approximately 22 cents an hour.

20. Approximately 21 percent of all children in the United States are living below the poverty line in 2010—the highest rate in 20 years.

21. Despite the financial crisis, the number of millionaires in the United States rose a whopping 16 percent to 7.8 million in 2009.

22. The top 10 percent of Americans now earn around 50 percent of our national income.

Giant Sucking Sound

The reality is that no matter how smart, how strong, how educated or how hard working American workers are, they just cannot compete with people who are desperate to put in 10 to 12 hour days at less than a dollar an hour on the other side of the world. After all, what corporation in their right mind is going to pay an American worker 10 times more (plus benefits) to do the same job? The world is fundamentally changing. Wealth and power are rapidly becoming concentrated at the top and the big global corporations are making massive amounts of money. Meanwhile, the American middle class is being systematically wiped out of existence as U.S. workers are slowly being merged into the new "global" labor pool.

What do most Americans have to offer in the marketplace other than their labor? Not much. The truth is that most Americans are absolutely dependent on someone else giving them a job. But today, U.S. workers are "less attractive" than ever. Compared to the rest of the world, American workers are extremely expensive, and the government keeps passing more rules and regulations seemingly on a monthly basis that makes it even more difficult to conduct business in the United States.

So corporations are moving operations out of the U.S. at breathtaking speed. Since the U.S. government does not penalize them for doing so, there really is no incentive for them to stay.

What has developed is a situation where the people at the top are doing quite well, while most Americans are finding it increasingly difficult to make it. There are now about six unemployed Americans for every new job opening in the United States, and the number of "chronically unemployed" is absolutely soaring. There simply are not nearly enough jobs for everyone.

Many of those who are able to get jobs are finding that they are making less money than they used to. In fact, an increasingly large percentage of Americans are working at low wage retail and service jobs.

But you can't raise a family on what you make flipping burgers at McDonald's or on what you bring in from greeting customers down at the local Wal-Mart.

The truth is that the middle class in America is dying—and once it is gone it will be incredibly difficult to rebuild.

20100724-02

12:31

Pam

Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"

Dear SteveB,

I know, I know. It's awful. A society is only as healthy as its middle class. I see so many things eroding in this country, including our civil liberties. There's a lot of secret stuff going on, and too often the right hand doesn't know what the left hand is doing. You've never said whether you plan to stay in Bolivia forever. Maybe you don't know. But I would imagine that Bolivian corruption makes the U.S. look like an Amish farm community. Does it not bother you if it's not America? It always amazes me that people (as seen in the media) are so surprised and outraged by the corruption in Afghanistan, as if this were something new or unusual. The kind of "corruption" that so bothers Americans is simply business as usual there, and it's always been that way. Do we really believe we can go in there and "clean it up"?! I don't mean to insult your adoptive homeland, but I think I'd go crazy living in an even more corrupt society than the American. Is there a thriving middle class in Bolivia, or are you one of the "elite"? I'm not being critical, just curious.

20100724-03	13:06	Dennis	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

from SteveB:

This is what I've been talking about when I say we've been "sold down the river" by a corrupt political system (both parties, not one or the other, please! Don't stupidly try to tell me this is all Bush's fault or Obama's fault!). Is this really the kind of nation we want for our children and grandchildren?

Dear Steve et al.,

The political system only reflects the economic self-interest of the dominant class. Is it any secret that the last 30 years of conservatism have all been about smoothing the way for the wealthy to consolidate their dominance? Anyone pointing out the facts in this article over the last three decades would be dismissed or accused by the right of provoking class struggle. Well, the class struggle has quietly been won by the elite of the corporatist state as the poor and middle classes have acquiesced without much of a struggle. The game is just about up. Ignorant, complacent Americans may not deserve what they got, but they got what they deserved.

20100725-01	07:21	SteveB	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dennis,

"the last 30 years of conservatism"...I would change that to "the last 60 years of Republican and Democrat corruption".

20100725-02	08:05	SteveB	Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" & Corruption
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Pam,

Don't worry...you never offend me.

This is a subject I've done a lot of thinking about...the comparative corruption of America and other countries. I can speak only of Bolivia and St. Lucia, because I know them so well, but I assume most "Third World" countries are very similar.

Here and in St. Lucia, the corruption is what I call "small". Yes, the police and government officials are often "on the take". To get anything done in either country, you have to bribe someone. I consider it a form of efficient taxation. Instead of government employees being paid a decent wage from taxes, you pay the taxes directly to them, eliminating the middle-man. Maybe it's not the best system, I prefer the American way, but in places where nothing is efficient, the bribes grease the wheels of government so that they will actually turn. Often, a bribe permits fairness where the law can be cruel.

But what America has is what I call "big" corruption. Ya, we've eliminated most of the "small" corruption, but all of our politicians are bought and sold by big campaign contributions, mainly from big companies and organizations. In all this time, the corrupt politicians have, uh...conveniently, failed to reform the system, despite numerous attempts. It's a terrible form of corruption invisible to most people, for reasons beyond my understanding.

In Bolivia and St. Lucia, this "big" corruption does not exist so openly. Perhaps it occurs, but very little money is required to be elected. Television and radio advertising are forbidden. There are posters, interviews, and rallies. Maybe politicians take personal bribes, but those are very dangerous and easy to catch compared to the "big" bribes of campaign contributions. All that has to happen is a newspaper hire an investigator to tape a politician taking a bribe. Piece of cake, if you think about it. Even the idiots in the FBI can handle a stupid sting operation.

In Bolivia, every 18-year-old and up citizen and foreign national with at least a two-year visa must vote by law or be fined. If you don't vote or pay the fine, you find it impossible to renew your driver's license or ID or buy a home or start a business, etc. The ballots are paper, which can be recounted. They require signatures of the person voting and an official and thumbprints.

I'd prefer to have a state with no corruption, like maybe New Zealand, Iceland, or Switzerland, but barring that, I'll take the "small" corruption, thank you.

But in a country like Afghanistan, I suspect they have both kinds of corruption. Those are the worst places.

The middle class in both Bolivia and St. Lucia seems to be growing, but there is still great disparity between the "haves" and "have nots". I would have to be called one of the "elite" I guess, even though I don't employ any servants at the present time. My father-in-law's farm is like Feudal Europe of hundreds of years ago. He is not a rich man (except in his land, I suppose), but has many workers and their families who live in their own little houses with thatched roofs scattered about the farm. He pays them little, but takes care of all their needs...medical, education, etc. It gets harder and harder to keep these workers on the farm, yet production and profit rely on them.

He has one worker, I call him Tarzan, who lives alone in a hut beside a clear little river in the part of the huge farm which is jungle (the place is so big it even has its own little mountain range). Tarzan raises the fruits for the farm...yucca, bananas, oranges, sugar cane, mangoes, etc. He has a wife and family way off in town, but he prefers to live in the jungle alone and sees them rarely. He also raises wild bees for honey and can make them "dance"...something very hard to describe, but fascinating. He knows everything about which plants can kill and which can cure. He sometimes has a pet monkey. He is Indian, of course.

[I'm sorry to say that "Tarzan" passed away recently—very much a disappearing breed and a good man. —SteveB]

My father-in-law's father had a much larger farm. Five times larger, at least. He had five children and left each one of them a big farm and a nice house in the city. He had an entire tribe of Indians who were "his". He not only provided for them, he was the "law" for them. If something was stolen, for instance, he was the sheriff, judge, and jury. Wild, huh?

Yes, things are more stable here, but the eventual outcome is still a little cloudy for me...

20100725-03

11:18

Pam

Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" & Corruption, Words

Dear SteveB,

Back in the day when I was teaching English comp., I'd give the students (freshmen) the assignment of coming up with a list of the ten most ugly words and the ten most beautiful words, in their opinion. That was all. Just a list. I said, don't think of the meaning, just the sound of the word itself. Most of them couldn't do it. So then, I said, OK, five words in each list. There were still many who couldn't do it. I was dumbfounded. Henry James's favorite phrase was "summer afternoon." I like words like willow, silver, lake, hollow, moon, galleon, lick—lots of ooohs and els. I love George Carlin's list of the words you can't say on TV. I love(d) George Carlin. Remember the Hippy-Dippy Mailman?

I enjoyed your defense of "small corruption" vs. "big corruption." That makes sense to me. I don't want to live in a society of small corruptions; I'm too used to things being (apparently) on the up and up. But I am convinced that our system (government, society, culture, call it what you will) is deeply corrupt in a big way. Did you ever read Robert Penn Warren's All the King's Men? It's a brilliant novel about political corruption based on the life of Huey Long. I think Jimmy Carter probably came as close as anyone to being uncorrupted, and we see how far that got him. I don't know if you've been following the life and times of Rod Blegoyavich (sp?), the former governor of Illinois, but there's a piece of work! What an a*s-hole. Talk about delusions of grandeur. Corruption in high places infuriates me, it really does, but what truly puts me over the edge is someone who is blatantly corrupt and runs around screaming about how pure they are. Sarah Palin also comes to mind.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I suppose we all cut corners according to someone. I read about a teacher who got fired because she admitted she had slept with her husband while they were still engaged. (Some Christian school, but still.) I think that's absurd, but someone didn't.— More later—my grandson is awake and fussing. He seems quiet again.—I believe it's better to err on the side of live and let live, rather than impose any personal or institutional (i.e. church) imperative on others, but at what point do you say, this goes too far? And when it's someone you care about, what do you do? Or more to the point, what do you think? Do you just put that bit off in a separate box and set it aside? A certain amount of that is inevitable, I'm convinced. And perhaps the same sort of thing operates at a macro- social level. If so, how much corruption is too much? How much is just enough to get a good job done? Huey Long was super corrupt, but he helped a hell of a lot of poor people. That's what Warren's novel explores. It's something I still think about.

I guess this is along the lines of my earlier question about whether some must be at the bottom for there to be a top. I read about how unfair it is to American business that Chinese workers work for so little, taking our jobs abroad. Well, we could keep those jobs at home if we passed a law that required American businesses to pay their foreign workers the same wages as they pay Americans. Why is it fair for Chinese (or Mexican or whatever) workers to earn a pittance, but it's a tragedy if an American is reduced to that? They're both equally tragic, if you ask me. I agree with you about people taking initiative and responsibility for their own lives, but I also know that all too often, circumstances are just too overwhelming. There are those who are too ill, too old, too DUMB to do anything. I don't think we should just kick them to the curb. If it takes a village to raise a child, then doesn't it also take a society to assure a decent life for all its citizens? I guess you could call me a capitalist-socialist. I don't see a contradiction there.

20100726-01	08:25	SteveB	"Ten Best Beach Towns in America"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

Maybe one of these is near you.

"Ten Best Beach Towns in America" by Jaclyn Liechti, SmarterTravel

July 25, 2010, (<http://www.smartertravel.com/photo-galleries/editorial/ten-best-beach-towns-in-america.html>)

20100726-02	09:24	Ben	Re: "Ten Best Beach Towns in America"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---------------------------------------

from SteveB:

Maybe one of these is near you.

<http://www.smartertravel.com/photo-galleries/editorial/ten-best-beach-towns-in-america.html?id=27>

Also see:

<http://www.smartertravel.com/photo-galleries/editorial/>

Dear SteveB,

Well, no, none near me. I rate Daytona and Sanibel highly, and Hapuna beach on the Big Island, as well as some of the ones less seen farther south. Maui has fabulous beaches, too. And - of course - Michigan City and the Dunes National Lakeshore are every bit as amazing as Mackinac. Beaver Island isn't shabby, either! My son found Cannon Beach in Oregon amazing at the turn of last year; not swimming weather, but an awesome oceanfront.

Then, there are those little pocket beaches among the cliffs in northern California.

Have you ever been on the lake side of Sleeping Bear Dune?

20100726-03	12:13	SteveB	Re: "Ten Best Beach Towns in America"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------------

They left off many great beaches...concentrating on the beach towns, I guess. I love the "sugar sand" on Siesta Key (and the little town) and Clearwater Beach (and the grouper sandwiches) in Florida. My favorite beaches are the deserted ones in the Tobago Cays.

I once climbed down Sleeping Bear Dune, then carried a young Laurel back to the top. I have also illegally hiked in, down a less precipitous part of the dune a little further north, walked up the beach and, a little inland, camped for the night. On the way in, we (4 of us) ran into a ranger who asked why we had backpacks. We made up some story I guess the ranger didn't believe, but he just us continue. So we camped almost on the beach, but just over a little dune. We didn't build a fire, all we had to eat for the night was one pack of M&M's, and we spent time on the beach. It was an amazing night! The next morning we hiked up the beach to make our way back to the car we had left in some parking lot. The rangers were waiting for us there on the beach to give us all tickets for illegally camping. They told us that they had looked for us all night. I guess it happened often that people attempted what we did and got arrested or expelled the night they tried. But everyone else always camped right on the beach and built a fire. We had outsmarted them and they weren't happy about it. Those are two of my Sleeping Bear stories.

20100727-01

11:07

SteveB

Re: "22 Statistics That Prove the Middle Class Is Being Systematically Wiped Out of Existence in America" & Corruption, Words

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Yes, Rod Blagojevich is especially infuriating. Corruption knows no party boundaries. During the last election, I wrote a sort of daily email blog entitled "Senile Moment of the Day". I don't think a day went by that McCain or Palin didn't do or say something truly stupid and/or senile. I would quote some news article that gave then details, then expound on the true meaning. I was merciless! I really hate both big political parties and politics in general, but I considered it a matter of utmost urgency to keep those two idiots out of power. Generally, I took a humorous, satirical approach that most of my friends, etc. enjoyed. We had some lively debates too. But one old friend from Greencastle and Tucson, brainwashed by the right, couldn't take the truth. We had been in close contact for years, but he told me off and I haven't heard from him since. What an imbecile!

Many of us seem to think that it's OK to steal from or defraud big, anonymous companies, but I don't think I could find it in my heart to rip-off the store like that. However, I consider ATM's to be part of the street, so if I ever get so lucky as to find money in one, well, finders keepers. When I was young, I always used to check the pay phones and vending machines for change left behind. That's why I was able to retire young. haha. I can remember a coke machine in the basement of the Methodist Church in Greencastle. This is when cokes were 5 or 10 cents, I can't remember which. It had a mechanical flipper you would rotate by pushing down after inserting your money. This would bring your coke to a little door to be retrieved. I discovered that if you rotated the lever backwards, then downwards, you got a free coke. Did I ever take advantage of it? Heck yes! Would I now? No.

Yes, Robert Penn Warren has been around long enough that, amazingly, I've read him.

I had a good friend, Alan, who was a criminal. A great guy, but a criminal. He was brilliant, but dropped out of college to rob drugstores. Once he stole Pernell Robert's (the eldest son on Bonanza) new Porsche and drove it from California to Virginia, stopping by Indiana to visit me. He was using the actor's or the actor's son's credit cards, found in the car, for the trip. My first wife didn't want him in the house and was furious with me. She wouldn't go out to dinner with us. So Alan, his girlfriend, Bunny, and I went out to eat on Pernell Robert's credit card. We had, as I remember, some great steak and wine. When it was time to pay, just in case, Bunny and I went to the car first. This was the moment when I learned about the credit card! She was ready for a getaway. Inside, Alan gave them the card, I guess. Pretty soon, we saw him come running out of the restaurant and into a nearby cornfield. This was not a good sign. It seems that the bank or the police had finally gotten wise. Bunny put the fine machine into gear and off we roared down a long driveway that led to/from the restaurant. On our way out, we passed a police car with lights flashing and siren wailing, speeding in to try to arrest my friend. Very fortunately and amazingly, he didn't seem to notice us pas right by him in the famous stolen car. We drove to my apartment and waited with my now even more furious wife. A few hours later, a muddy and bedraggled Alan arrived, having made his way though cornfield after cornfield to our place. The next morning, Alan and Bunny left for Virginia. There, he kept driving the stolen car until he got caught. Pernell Roberts flew to Virginia, not to be vindictive, but actually tried to help my friend and was able to get him a lighter sentence. He turned-out to be a really great guy. But, in short order, Alan went to prison for a different, additional crime (he didn't learn that crime doesn't pay,

I guess), ended up killing another prisoner there, and never got out. He died fairly young from a heart attack probably caused by the fatty prison food he always complained of. He was a criminal, but I loved him like a brother. We were brothers. Did I shut-off the bad parts of him into a separate box? I guess I must have.

I don't think there should be a law to pay foreign workers what American workers are paid. The cost of living in the States is so much higher that this would not be fair or work either. Free trade has inevitably doomed the American middle-class and enriched the big international corporations. In China, even though a worker might receive pay that puts him squarely in the middle class (of China), he is treated like a slave and his pay is very low by American standards. Workers enjoy cheap public transportation, so they don't need cars. Food and fuel are subsidized by the government. Pollution is the worst I have ever seen anywhere in the world. Manufacturers in the States must pay a lot of money to keep from polluting so much. The playing field is just totally uneven. We had it made, but our politicians sold us down the river. Has this helped the rest of the world? Well, yes, it has helped the rest of the world become more like the U.S. Is this a good thing? Not in my opinion.

20100727-02 13:23 SteveB "Right-Wing America: Rascism and Religion"

"Right-Wing America: Rascism and Religion" by Liam Fox, News Junkie

July 24, 2010, (<http://newsjunkiepost.com/2010/07/24/right-wing-america-racism-and-religion/>)

"When fascism comes to America, it will be wrapped in a flag and carrying a cross."
—Sinclair Lewis

There are struggles and challenges with race relations and understanding across just about every demographic of American society. Even at its best it is a learning process much like the inspirational story shared by Shirley Sherrod. With civil rights legislation only forty five years old, the entire current population of African American seniors over 65 years old have had the experience of being denied the legal right to vote in their own country. Race relations in America, among a society of equal citizens, is relatively new.

In this stage of relative infancy growing pains are to be expected. Trying to figure out how to implement and enforce equality has been a challenge that requires discussion and at times debate. Debate as cooperative fellow citizens is necessary, but there is a preponderance of malicious and racially controversial rhetoric emanating from a particular area within the body politic. The same population of political and social conservatives that espouse their Christianity, and wish to impose it on the rest of the nation, are the instigators of much of the current, racially divisive, rhetoric.

Tea Party Express rallies, that have been instrumental in campaigning for Sarah Palin, Sharron Angle, Rand Paul, Scott Brown, and several others, have featured at least as many signs demanding that America become a Christian Nation, as they have mocking the President based on his race and ethnicity. Aside from their vague platform of 'smaller government' and 'lower taxes' that lacks any proactive alternatives, the message of their signs and slogans present an overwhelming impression that the Tea Party attendees make a clear correlation of non-white = foreign = non-Christian = un-American.

This isn't a misinterpretation based on observing a minority fringe at the otherwise multicultural and pluralistic events. These are identifiable truths, with well documented photo evidence, of a predominantly homogeneous group of individuals who claim to have unified values and beliefs. From these same events that featured Palin, Angle, Bachmann, et al, who claimed their guidance from God to make America a Christian nation, came invitations for Obama to return to Kenya, with placards showing the President as both a witchdoctor and a monkey.

Mark Williams, the purportedly dethroned leader of the Tea Party Express, who has stood shoulder to shoulder with almost every Tea Party candidate on the November ballot, including Palin and Angle, penned the disgustingly insensitive and racist sounding parody letter to Abraham Lincoln, written as if it had been authored by NAACP president Benjamin Jealous. Although it has been claimed that Mr. Williams was fired by some authority within the Tea Party hierarchy, which claims to have no such centralized hierarchical authority, his letter, and conflict with the NAACP, has sparked a firestorm of activity from the Conservative Religious Right claiming to be victimized by 'reverse racism' from the White House.

Much of these sentiments seem to originate with Glenn Beck who, when not insisting that America become a Christian Theocracy, has repeatedly accused President Obama of being a racist with a deep seated hatred for white people. This unscrupulous fear-mongering is as fallacious as Beck's entire Christian Reconstructionist campaign, and has had an equally deleterious effect on our current national conversation and political climate.

Andrew Breitbart, the infamous Tea Party activist and propagandist who spearheads a large portion of the Internet component of the right-wing echo-chamber, was the architect behind the recent smear campaign of U.S.D.A. official Shirley Sherrod. Fortunately, Mr. Breitbart was foolish enough to underestimate Mrs. Sherrod before attempting a character assassination based on trumped up charges of racism.

Although Mr. Breitbart has re-represented his motivations several times, ranging from an attack on Mrs. Sherrod and the supposedly racist Obama Administration, to an expose of NAACP racism, the fundamental truth remains the same; Mr. Breitbart attempted to use material that he knew to be an incomplete and misleading representation of the facts in order to support false claims of racism and inflame racial tensions and divisiveness.

In the same manner that Fox News blends overtly Christian dogma with revisionist American history and anti-Obama propaganda, Conservative politics have become synonymous with Christian Reconstructionism and deliberate racial divisiveness. O'Reilly, Hannity, and Beck present a consistent ideology and theology on these matters, relinquishing First Amendment rights to the supremacy of Christianity while defending their own race-baiting by playing victim to the very tactics they employ.

Thursday evening past, on Sean Hannity's Fox cable show, in the aftermath of Mark Williams' letter and Andrew Breitbart's smear campaign, in a segment with Pat Caddell called 'Media Fueled Racism(?)', Anne Coulter stated that there is "no racism in America." Believe it or not, whether it's profound ignorance or deliberate denial, it runs that deep. The same woman that claimed that Jews needed to be 'perfected' by becoming Christians claims that there is no racism in America.

Their own bigotries seem to be completely invisible to them. Combined with the delusion that, as white people, they are subject to the oppressive bigotry and racism of non-white Americans, their psychosis would be laughable if it wasn't so damaging. The ingredients and motivation for their revolution of Angry White Christians wanting to "take their country back" is, whether they realize it or not, a model of transparency.

The white, conservative, racially biased, religious right, has embraced a theology that unsurprisingly creates their God in their own image; a white skinned Jesus, wrapped in a flag, carrying a cross, and packing heat.

This version of Christianity is nothing more than part of the definition of exclusivity that bolsters the mindset of 'Us versus Them'. It is a theology based more on identity than doctrine. It is an only slightly watered down version of white Christian nationalism, and a not so distant cousin to the White Citizens Council or the Ku Klux Klan. It's the sentiments, the desires, and the anger, without all the messy honesty. It provides them with what they think is a cloak of credibility for their otherwise distasteful prejudices; sheltering them from political backlash as well as personal admission.

The same motivations that drive the religious right to impose their Christian dogma on every citizen of this country fuels the underlying racism they are struggling to deny. The only things deemed acceptable to them are those things that agree with them, and appear to be like them. It is an affective community of insecure individuals intent on creating a homogeneous society to provide their weakened self-esteem and faltering self-image with the comfort of conformity. If you want to be accepted or even tolerated by them, you must be just like them. You must look like them and believe like them. They are the schoolyard bullies of American politics. There is no room for difference or dissent in their America.

America's Religious Right is a community that craves exclusivity. They insist on exclusivity from anyone that is not just like them. They claim the exclusive right to have guaranteed rights, and the exclusive right to decide who is worthy to have those rights. In order to achieve this, they claim Divine prescription for their manifest destiny and ordained authority over others, The Constitution be damned.

Their religion, other than part of the construct of their identity, is a medium for the expression of their hatreds and biases. This is not a Christianity of love and charity designed for personal enlightenment and growth. This is a dogmatic Christianity of White Nationalism to be imposed on others. Calling themselves 'Real Americans', to the exclusion of all the 'Fake Americans' that don't look, act, and believe as they do, is the proof they offer of this point.

Perhaps someday Christian Conservative Nationalists will realize that their theology, as well as their social views, are based on fear and ignorance. Perhaps one day they will realize that acceptance, tolerance, and enlightenment, are not synonymous with bias, exclusion and control. Perhaps, but until then, America will only be "One Nation Indivisible" if it manages to keep out from under them and their God.

Jesus Was
a bleeding heart, long-haired, peace-loving, anti-establishment, liberal hippie freak with strange ideas
Everything Conservatives Hate.

20100728-01 08:05 SteveB Fw: Let's Say I Break into Your House

I would also have to add that your son-in-law no longer has a job, so he and your daughter and their baby have had to move back home to your house. Also, your son, who worked as a carpenter, no longer makes enough money to live independently, so he's moved back home too. Your house is really bursting at the seams. Of course, you could always move into your garage...but it has six families of illegal aliens living there already...

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Let's Say I Break into Your House

Recently large demonstrations have taken place across the country protesting the fact that Arizona is addressing the issue of illegal immigration. Certain people are angry that the U.S. might protect its own borders, might make it harder to sneak into this country and, once here, to stay indefinitely. Let me see if I correctly understand the thinking behind these protests.

Let's say I break into your house. Let's say that when you discover me in your house, you insist that I leave. But I say, 'No! I like it here. It's better than my house. I've made all the beds and washed the dishes and did the laundry and swept the floors. I've done all the things you don't like to do. I'm hard-working and honest (except for when I broke into your house).

According to the protesters: You are Required to let me stay in your house. You are Required to feed me. You are Required to add me to your family's insurance plan. You are Required to pay for the birth of my children and make them citizens. You are Required to pay welfare to me to support my babies. You are Required to educate my kids. You are Required to Provide other benefits to me & to my family. (My husband will do all of your yard work because he is also hardworking and honest, except for that breaking in part).

If you try to call the police or force me out, I will call my friends who will picket your house carrying signs that proclaim my RIGHT to be there. It's only fair, after all, because you have a nicer house than I do, and I'm just trying to better myself. I'm a hard-working and honest, person, except for well, you know, I did break into your house.

And what a deal it is for me!!! I live in your house, contributing only a fraction of the cost of my keep, and there is nothing you can do about it without being accused of cold, uncaring, selfish, prejudiced, and bigoted behavior.

Oh yeah, I DEMAND that you learn MY LANGUAGE!!! So you can Communicate with me.

Why can't people see how ridiculous this is? Only in America! If you agree, pass it on. Share it if you see the value of it. If not, blow it off.....along with your future Social Security Funds, and a lot of other things.

20100803-01	09:08	Ben	"Why Some Republicans Want to 'Restore' the 13th Amendment"
-------------	-------	-----	---

This is like rounding off pi to three. Or, to take a completely irreverent different tack, as senseless as the way California defined assault weapons.

In fact, it's sooooo silly to associate an industrialist's surname with a feudalistic monarchy that I am reminded of a gaff I heard on NPR this morning: it was a report on the drug war in Mexico that stated, more or less, that "...homicides are never investigated, granting impunity to the perpetrators..." So, by its inaction (whether because of the sheer volume, or social pressures is not the point), the Mexican government is granting violent citizens contemptuous disregard? Weird...

I don't really feel that it's necessary or even desirable to force all citizens to acquire a level of proficiency in English, or even to declare it the national and legal language of the U.S. But I sure wish folks who work with the language professional would exercise a little professional responsibility.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Calling all Republicans—please get a grip, you're making us look really ignorant and stupid. It's making my brain hurt. I mean come on, can you please bring some sanity back, just a little, please? Pretty please... with sugar on top. The complete story is from Newsweek below.

Iowa Republicans want to "Restore" the 13th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution—you know... the amendment banning slavery? Actually, this is not specifically about reinstating slavery, it's even wackier.

These wingnuts are trying to build a case to impeach Obama for accepting the Nobel Peace prize!!!! by stating that he has violated the to "Titles of Nobility Amendment" (TONA) (which was part of the 13th amendment).

Essentially, their point is that acceptance of the Nobel Peace Prize confers a title of nobility on the recipient of the NPP and is therefore subject to revocation of United States citizenship! This would not just apply to Obama, this would apply to ANY American who would have the audacity to accept the Nobel Peace prize.

Titles of Nobility Amendment (TONA): "If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive or retain, any title of nobility or honour, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them." [1810. Ratified by 12 state legislatures. —SteveB]

"Why Some Republicans Want to 'Restore' the 13th Amendment" by Jerry Adler, Newsweek

July 26, 2010, (<http://www.thedailybeast.com/newsweek/2010/07/27/why-some-republicans-want-to-restore-the-13th-amendment.html>)

(No, it's not about slavery; like so much of our politics these days, it's about Barack Obama.)

If there is an aspect of the human condition that is unaddressed by the platform of the Republican Party of Iowa, adopted last month at the state convention in Des Moines, you'd have to look awfully hard to find it. Its 387 enumerated planks and principles range widely over politics, culture, and economics, from sweeping statements of belief ("America is good") to the fine nuances of agricultural policy ("We support the definition of manure as natural fertilizer") and touching on the mythical "North American Union" (against) and the gold standard (for). Even so, it's a little startling to come upon section 7.19, which calls for "the reintroduction and ratification of the original 13th Amendment, not the 13th amendment in today's Constitution." Since the existing 13th Amendment bans slavery, while the "original" one was about something else entirely, the wording might give the impression that Iowa Republicans wish to reverse emancipation, which is not at all the case, according to state GOP Communications Director Danielle Plogmann. Like many aspects of Republican politics this year, it's actually about embarrassing President Obama.

But you have to wonder whether the delegates knew what they were getting into. In making common cause with "Thirteenthers," as those who seek to restore the long-lost amendment are known, the party has ventured beyond the far fringes of conspiracy theory, into a mysterious lost land without lawyers or taxes. Maybe they knew what they were doing after all.

Return with us now to the tumultuous years leading up to the War of 1812, when fear of "foreign influence"—by England or France, depending on whether you were a Republican or Federalist—was a dominating issue in American politics. Jerome Bonaparte, the younger brother of Napoleon, had recently spent several years in the United States, where he married Elizabeth Patterson, the beautiful, ambitious daughter of a wealthy Baltimore merchant. In 1810, Jerome was on the throne of Westphalia, while Elizabeth was in America with their son, Jerome Napoleon. (The couple would never see each other again.)

According to historian Michael Vorenberg of Brown University, having a nephew of the emperor of France growing up on American soil might have made the pro-British Federalists uneasy, or, just as likely, suggested to them a way to tie the Republicans to the French Legion of Honor, the Trilateral Commission of its day. Desiring to get out in front of the issue—or possibly seeking to score points against the Federalists, who had their own embarrassing ties to the British aristocracy—Republican Sen. Philip Reed of Maryland introduced an amendment meant to strengthen the existing "emoluments clause" in Article I, Section 9, of the Constitution.

This clause reads: "No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State."

Reed's proposed amendment extended the ban from office-holders to "any citizen of the United States" and made the penalty loss of citizenship:

"If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive or retain any title of nobility or honour, or shall, without the consent of Congress accept and retain any present, pension, office or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them."

Reed's bill passed both houses easily, and as of Dec. 9, 1812, had been ratified by 12 states and seemed headed for adoption, at which point war intervened. Here, histories diverge. The mainstream view is that the "Titles of Nobility Amendment" (TONA) never achieved the necessary 13 ratifications—three quarters of the 17 states as of 1810—and fell further behind as more states joined the union. That ought to have been the end of it, says Jol A. Silversmith, a lawyer in private practice who has written the definitive account of the "missing amendment." And so it was until the 1980s, when a conspiracy-minded researcher named David Dodge came across an 1825 copy of the Constitution including this provision. Further research led Dodge to conclude that TONA had been ratified by Virginia no later than 1819 and was an accepted, if largely unnoted, part of the Constitution from then until its mysterious disappearance around the time of the Civil War.

If you find it hard to believe that an amendment to the Constitution could have been in effect for four decades and then mysteriously excised and forgotten, well, the times were different. There was no single reference copy of the Constitution to which scribes with quill pens ceremoniously added amendments as they were ratified. Dodge claims to have turned up numerous pre—Civil War copies of the Constitution containing the missing amendment, but that doesn't add up to proof.

Even Congress was confused about the status of TONA and requested clarification from President James Monroe, who turned the question over to Secretary of State John Quincy Adams, who reported that it had not been ratified. The evidence that Virginia ever did approve TONA is circumstantial, but, as Silversmith points out, it's also irrelevant, because already by Apr. 30, 1812, with the admission of Louisiana, ratification required 14 states (of 18). To hang the argument on what Virginia may have done in 1819 assumes that adoption required ratification only by three quarters of the states in the union at the time the amendment was submitted in 1810, i.e., 13 of 17. That view has had its adherents over the centuries, but apart from its inherent illogic—surely the high hurdle the Founding Fathers erected to Constitutional amendments wasn't meant to shrink as the country grew—we now have a clear precedent that establishes the opposite. That's the 27th Amendment (on Congressional pay), which was proposed in 1789 but was deemed ratified only in 1992 when it was passed by 38 states—three quarters of 50, not of 13.

In the world of the Thirteenthers, though, it's all a conspiracy, and the leading suspects are those shady characters who put "esquire" after their names. To quote the Web site Constitutional Concepts, "This Amendment was for the specific purpose of banning participation in government operations by attorneys and bankers who claimed the Title of Nobility of 'Esquire.' These people had joined the International Bar Association or the International Bankers Association and owed their allegiance to the King of England." In other words—well, we're not sure how to explain it any better, but Constitutional Concepts CEO Jim Barrus says in an e-mail that enforcement of the 13th Amendment would strike a blow against "the elected politicians who have grand plans of ruling every facet of America," and would essentially delegitimize virtually every act of the federal government since 1819. Who wouldn't want that?

Naturally, most lawyers see it differently. "The esquire thing is ridiculous," says R. B. Bernstein, a professor at New York Law School and author of Amending America.

"'Esquire' is not a title of nobility. Back then, they were worried about people accepting literal titles of aristocracy that convey land or privileges, things you can leave to your kids." Lawyers obviously command certain privileges, but they are not inherited.

There are, of course, other implications of Thirteenthism, such as ensuring that the United States never again suffers the humiliation of having a president win the Nobel Peace Prize.

That was just what the Iowa Republicans had in mind, according to Plogmann, who wrote in an e-mail that the plank "was meant to make a statement about the delegates' opinion about Mr. Obama receiving the prize." (Presumably they didn't mind if, in the process, they were also making a statement about any American scientist or writer unlucky enough to win a Nobel.) Unfortunately for them, the Department of Justice looked into whether Obama needed Congressional approval to accept the Nobel under the existing emoluments clause, and based on the meaning of "foreign state" (which would not cover the Nobel Prize Committee) concluded that he did not.

But they could be playing with fire. "We're in a constitutional silly season," says Bernstein, "and whether you are of the left or the right, if you take the Constitution seriously, it's very troubling." The threat posed by the 13th Amendment is remote; as far as can be determined, no other state has followed the Iowa GOP in calling for ratification, and no bill of ratification has been introduced into the Iowa legislature. As far as their platform goes, we should all be willing to defer to Iowa Republicans on the definition of manure as natural fertilizer. So long as they keep it on the fields, where it belongs.

20100804-01	09:15	SteveB	North & South
-------------	-------	--------	---------------

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Is that book you referred me to, The Mind of the South, by Johnny Cash? haha. My favorite portrait of the South is Deliverance by the poet James Dickey, and the movie. That's the South I'm all too familiar with.

But you are very right: Southerners are friendly people, and I like that. Indiana is actually pretty Southern too, so maybe that's why people are so friendly there. But in some parts of the South, I think people can get a little too damned friendly and it turns into nosiness, especially in smaller towns. I would never want to live in New York City with its rude people. Actually, the people in the streets of Santa Cruz remind me of New York a lot...no eye contact, no hello, no help, no friendliness, no smiles, only not outright rude. Yet when you get to know them, they are so sweet. Living in Maine, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, I found the people to be rather cold, at first...being used to Hoosiers. But I grew to appreciate the New Englanders' respect for privacy and individualism, even for eccentricity. And friends made there seem to be friends for life, not shallow Southern friends, as happens. I like that.

North Carolina, I think, has very rapidly become much like Florida...full of Northerners, and maybe that's a good thing. :-)

I know of two places that combine the friendliness of the South with the New England respect for the individual—Beaver Island, Michigan, and Montana. In both places, people will wave and honk at you from their pick-ups as you pass on the road (not a main highway) and are very friendly, but if you want to be you, whatever that may mean, well...have at it! It's OK.

20100804-02 09:44 SteveB Re: "Why Some Republicans Want to 'Restore' the 13th Amendment"

Dear Ben,

This has got to be one of the craziest things I've ever heard of!

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Take care. Hope you guys are all having a great summer.

20100810-01 21:06 Dick Fw: Current European Tax Rates

Dear SteveB,

Do you agree on this one?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I am passing this along as I received it, except I added the URL which confirms the numbers below. I will add 1 comment: I believe these European nations take much better care of their aging population than the U.S.

http://www.ask.com/wiki/Tax_rates_of_Europe

I don't know if these numbers are all accurate, but food for thought.

Startling Numbers...Is this where we are headed?

Current European Tax Rates: [Note: Inaccurate to "Total"! Not done in article. —SteveB]

Country	Income Tax	V.A.T.	Total [bogus]
Denmark	58.0%	25.0%	83.0%
Finland	53.0%	22.0%	75.0%
France	40.0%	19.6%	59.6%
Germany	45.0%	19.0%	64.0%
Greece	40.0%	25.0%	65.0%
Netherlands	52.0%	19.0%	71.0%
Norway	54.3%	25.0%	79.3%
Portugal	42.0%	20.0%	62.0%
Spain	45.0%	16.0%	61.0%
Sweden	55.0%	25.0%	80.0%
United Kingdom	50.0%	17.5%	67.5%

If you've started to wonder what the real costs of "socialism" are going to be, once the full program in these United States hits your wallet, take a look at the table. As you digest these mind-boggling figures, keep in mind that in spite of these astronomical tax rates, these countries are still not financing their social welfare programs exclusively from tax revenues! They are deeply mired in public debt of gargantuan proportions. Greece has reached the point where its debt is so huge it is in imminent danger of defaulting. That is the reason the European economic community has intervened to bail them out. If you're following the financial news, you know Spain and Portugal are right behind Greece.

The United States is now heading right down the same path. The "VAT" tax in the table is the national sales tax that Europeans pay. Stay tuned because that is exactly what you can expect to see the administration proposing after the fall elections. The initial percentage in the United States isn't going to be anywhere near the outrageous numbers you now see in Europe . Guess what, the current outrageous numbers in Europe didn't start out as outrageous either. They started out as miniscule—right around the 1% or 2% where they will start out in the United States. Magically however, they ran up over the years to where they are now. Expect the same thing here.

It's time to rethink the 'American Dream' idea: It is the notion that with hard work and perseverance, anybody can get ahead economically here. Do you think that can ever happen with tax rates between 60% and 80%? Think again. With the government taking that percentage of your money, your life will be exactly like life in Europe . You will have difficulty in buying a home or car. You will never send your children to college. Let's not shuffle the battle cry of the socialists under the rug either. It's always the same cry. "Equalize" income. "Spread the wealth" to the "poor" (whoever they are). "Level" the economic playing field. Accomplish that and everything will be rosy.

It's time to take a really hard look at reality. Greece is a perfect example. Despite the "socialism" system that has ruled this country for decades, with a 65% tax rate, they are drowning in public debt, would have defaulted without hundreds of billions in bailout money, and still. . .20% of their population lives in "poverty." What has all that "socialism" money bought, besides ultimate power for the politicians running the show? Do you think these people are "free"? They're not. They are slaves to their economic "system."

People, we are at a tipping point in America . We all know it. Turn this around right now or your grandchildren will be massing in the streets of this once-great country, just as the people of Greece now are. Economic slavery is slavery, just the same. Carefully and deeply consider what it takes to throw off the yoke of slavery, once it takes hold and settles over your neck.

20100813-01	12:53	SteveB	Re: Current European Tax Rates & "Think Your Taxes Are Bad?"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Dick,

Well, yes and no...the current "socialism" panic is a crock of sh*t. People should be worried why there are no jobs!

In Europe, people pay higher taxes but get a lot in the way of healthcare, retirement, and social services. Our rates are much lower, which makes me wonder what the Republicans, especially the rich Republicans, think they have to complain about. Socialism, indeed!

[The chart, below, shows the most up-to-date numbers from the ask.com website given in Dick's original email. The problem with Dick's post is that you can't simply add these rates to get the effective tax rate. (http://www.ask.com/wiki/Tax_rates_of_Europe) —SteveB]

From Wikipedia, Oct. 13, 2011, (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tax_rates_of_Europe):

This is a list of the maximum potential tax rates around Europe for certain income brackets. It is focused on three types of taxes: corporate and individual taxes and value added taxes (VAT). It is not intended to represent the true tax burden to either the corporation or the individual in the listed country.

The quoted income tax rate is, except where noted, the top rate of tax: Most jurisdictions have lower rate of taxes for low levels of income. Some countries also have lower rates of corporation tax for smaller companies.

Country	Corporate tax	Maximum Income tax rate	Standard VAT rate
Albania ^[1]	10%	10%	20%
Austria	25%	50%	20% ^[2]

Belarus	24%	30%	20% ^[1]
Belgium	33.99%	50%	21% ^[2]
Bosnia and Herzegovina ^[3]	10%	5% Federal + 0%-15% per location	17%
Bulgaria ^[4]	10%	10% / 15% for self employed individuals	20% ^[2]
Croatia	20%	45%	23%
Cyprus	10%	30%	15% ^[2]
Czech Republic	21%	15%	20% ^[2]
Denmark	25%	51.5% ^[5] At U.S. $75,000 (child allowances and other credits available) additional 15% tax, total = 34.67%, not 51%	25% ^[2]
Estonia	21%	21%	20% ^[2]
Finland	26%	53%	23% ^{[2][6]}
France	33.33%	41%	19.6% ^[2]
Germany	15.825 % (federal) plus 14.35 % to 17.5 % (local)	45%	19% ^[2]
Georgia	20%	12%	18%
Greece	25%	45%	23% ^[2]
Hungary	10%	16% (20.32%, w/ 27% social security paid by employer is income) ^[7]	25% ^{[2][8]}
Iceland	18% ^[9]	46.28% ^[9]	25.5% ^[9]
Ireland	12.50%	41%	21% ^[2]
Italy	31.4%	45%	21% ^[2]
Latvia	15%	23%	22%
Lithuania	20% ^[10]	21% ^{[2][11]}	21%
Luxembourg	28.59%	38.95%	15% ^[2]
Macedonia ^[12]	10%	10%	18%
Malta	35%	35%	18% ^[2]
Montenegro	9% ^[13]	9% ^[13]	17% ^[13]
Netherlands	25%	52% ^[14]	19% ^[2]
Norway ^{[15][16]}	28%	54.3%	25%
Poland	19%	32%	23% ^[2]
Portugal	12.5%-27.5% (Mean tax rate: 15%)	46.5%	23%
Romania	16%	16%	24% ^{[2][17]}
Russia	20%	13%	18%
Serbia	10%	14%	18%
Slovakia	19%	19%	19% ^[2] (Increasing to 20% from Jan. 2011)
Slovenia ^[18]	20%	41%	20% ^[2]
Spain	30% (28% Basque Country & Navarra, 4% ZEC companies in Canary Islands)	45%	18% ^[2]
Sweden	26.3%	56.6%	25% ^[2]
Switzerland	25%	45.5%	8% ^[19]

Turkey	20%	40%	18%
Ukraine	23%, from 1.01.2012—21%, from 1.01.2013—19%, from 1.01.2014—16%	17%	20%
United Kingdom	20%-27% (further annual decreases planned) ^[20]	50% ^[21]	20% ^[2]

"Think Your Taxes Are Bad?" by Debora Vrana, MSN Money

Apr. 14, 2006 (<http://www.freerepublic.com/focus/f-news/1617753/posts>)

Every year, you grimace as you sign your return. Imagine what it's like in Belgium or Hungary, where taxes can take half your pay. Plus: the wackiest taxes on record.

Believe it or not, Americans enjoy some of the lowest income tax rates in the world. Today of all days, it might not seem so.

When you look at the overall tax burden, the U.S. is quite low," said Eric Toder, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute in Washington, D.C., and former director of the office of research for the Internal Revenue Service.

For a family with one wage-earner and two children, only Iceland and Ireland have a lower income tax burden than the U.S., according to the most recent data for 2005.

At the top, Sweden, Turkey, France and Poland impose the biggest tax burdens on families, but in most of those countries families get added social services, such as secure pensions and health care.

Citizens in these other countries are paying more money, but they are getting more back, in terms of social programs, said Christopher Heady, head of tax policy for the Paris-based think tank Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, or OECD. It's a choice the electorate makes.

The OECD collects data on 30 member countries and annually calculates what it calls the tax "wedge" for each—the combined effects of personal income tax, employee and employer social security contributions, payroll taxes and cash benefits.

Tax burdens around the world (Source: OECD, 2005 data)

The first rate is for Single persons, no kids; the second is for Married, 2 kids (in order of family rate).

Country	Indiv.	Family
Turkey	42.7%	42.7%
Sweden	47.9%	42.4%
Poland	43.6%	42.1%
France	50.1%	41.7%
Belgium	55.4%	40.3%
Hungary	50.5%	39.9%
Greece	38.8%	39.2%
Finland	44.6%	38.4%
Germany	51.8%	35.7%
Austria	47.4%	35.5%
Italy	45.4%	35.2%
Spain	39.0%	33.4%
Denmark	41.4%	29.6%
Norway	37.3%	29.6%
Netherlands	38.6%	29.1%
Czech Republic	43.8%	27.1%
United Kingdom	33.5%	27.1%
Portugal	36.2%	26.6%

Japan	27.7%	24.9%
Slovak Republic	38.3%	23.2%
Canada	31.6%	21.5%
Switzerland	29.5%	18.6%
Mexico	18.2%	18.2%
Korea	17.3%	16.2%
Australia	28.3%	16.0%
New Zealand	20.5%	14.5%
Luxembourg	35.3%	12.2%
United States	29.1%	11.9%
Iceland	29.0%	11.0%
Ireland	25.7%	8.1%

Mysteries of the code

In 2003, total federal state and local taxes in the United States were 24.2% of our gross domestic product, ranking among the lowest in the world, with only Mexico at 19.5% with a lower tax rate. Along with the higher taxes, the difference between the U.S. and some of the other industrialized countries are increased social services, such as pensions and health-care funding.

But for many Americans laboring to file income taxes before the Apr. 17 deadline, the main complaint is not the tax burden, but that confusing document called the U.S. tax code.

The tax system is much more complicated in America, said Toder. Taxes have become a much more stressful and complicated event, even if you are getting money back, he said.

In addition, there are often idiosyncratic taxes each state can levy. These taxes can be as wacky and as quirky as the character of each state. The local taxes can reflect what is important to residents and what activities residents may hope to curb.

Some of these are humorous and some probably don't bring in much revenue, said Lily Batchelder, an assistant professor at New York University who specializes in taxes and social policy. There are a lot of ways we need to simplify taxes. For example:

1. Last year, Tennessee became the latest of more than 20 states to tax illegal drugs. Under the law, when you acquire an illegal drug, you have 48 hours to report to the state and pay your tax, although you aren't required to identify yourself. Once you've paid, you'll receive stamps to put on your illegal substance to show evidence you paid the tax.
2. To help clean up Chesapeake Bay, Maryland residents must pay a flush tax tacked onto septic and sewer bills.
3. In Maine, anyone who grows, purchases or sells blueberries there will pay a tax.
4. In Utah, owners of sexually explicit businesses, where someone appears nude or partially nude, must pay a 10% tax.
5. If you want to buy a deck of playing cards in Alabama, be prepared to pay a tax.
6. In Mississippi, you'll pay a 7% tax on all amusements, unless you are going to hear gospel music and the program is not mixed with hillbilly or popular singing, according to tax experts.
7. In Arkansas, you'll pay a tax if you get a tattoo or nose ring.
8. Canada isn't exempt. In Ontario, boxes of breakfast cereal that contain a toy or bonus item are not subject to retail sales tax, provided the item is not liquor, wine or beer.

It wasn't always this way. America, founded after a revolution sparked in part on tax resistance, had few taxes in its early history. From 1791 to 1802, the U.S. government was supported by taxes mostly on distilled spirits, refined sugar, corporate bonds and slaves. In 1817, Congress abandoned all internal taxes, instead relying on taxes levied on imported goods.

During the Civil War, however, Congress enacted the nation's first income tax law. Under that, people earning from $600 to $10,000 per year paid a tax of 3%, and those who made more than $10,000 paid higher tax rates. It was the beginning of our modern income tax system.

In 1913, the 16th Amendment to the Constitution made the income tax a permanent fixture. The withholding tax on wages was introduced in 1943 and was instrumental in increasing tax collections to $43 billion by 1943.

This year [2006], about 132 million tax returns will be filed in the U.S., and about 43 million returns will get back every dollar that was withheld from their paycheck. The remaining 90 million returns will end 2005 having paid about $1 trillion in federal income tax.

Noncompliance is hard to estimate, but by most international comparisons, Americans are paying the highest fraction of what they owe, experts said.

So we may bellyache, but we pay, said Bill Ahern, spokesman for the Tax Foundation Inc., a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit research group, who said part of that compliance may be the result of fear of the IRS. But it may also be the amount is more reasonable. The higher the tax, the greater the incentive to evade, he said.

Hate these taxes?

Well, you can take the path of one of the original tax protesters, Englishwoman Lady Godiva. In the 11th century, she successfully reduced a tax assessment on her husband, the Earl of Mercia, by riding naked on a white horse through the streets of Coventry.

In fact, taxes have been around nearly as long as there have been kings and queens, dictators and governments to levy them. And historically, some taxes were even wackier than those we have today. For example:

1. In England, William Pitt the Younger introduced a tax on every property with more than six windows. The taxes, levied during the 1700s and into the early 1800s, were used to pay for military campaigns in Ireland and elsewhere. As a result of the tax, many windows were bricked up.
2. Also in England, during 1795 William Pitt introduced a tax on wig powder when the French fashion for wearing wigs was all the rage. The unpopular tax was short-lived.
3. Salt, such an important commodity that the word "salary" stems from the practice of using it as part of a Roman soldiers wages, has been taxed periodically by various nations. It has been taxed in China for thousands of years.

Americans' resistance to taxes is as strong as ever. And so is confusion and anger about the U.S. tax code. Last year, the President's Advisory Panel on Federal Tax Reform solicited ideas from the public to find out what exactly is wrong with the system. Complaints poured in from individuals, businesses and experts, with many upset about complexity. The panel is trying to simplify the tax code without losing its progressive nature, which forces Americans to pay more as they earn more. Some suggested a national sales tax that would replace the income tax. Others want a flat tax, exempting the poorest Americans. Some want value-added taxes, or VATs, which are common in Europe. These taxes are collected in small increments at every state of production of an item, such as a car.

20100824-01 08:40 SteveB "China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks"
--

Another brilliant idea! What "Free Trade" has wrought: no jobs in the U.S. and this! (See below.) Gee, maybe if we put our minds to it we could figure out a way to use up the world's limited resources even faster? No, I doubt it! What could use them up faster than turning the whole planet into one gigantic consumer economy so the rich can get richer?

"China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks" by Anita Chang, AP

Aug. 24, 2010, (<http://blog.lib.umn.edu/levin031/transportationist/2010/08/chinas-60-mile-traffic-jam-cou.html>)

(Gridlock stems from roadwork that won't be finished until next month.)

(BEIJING) A massive traffic jam in northern China that hit its 10-day mark on Tuesday stems from road construction in Beijing that won't be finished until the middle of next month, an official said. Bumper-to-bumper gridlock spanning 60 miles—with cars moving little more than a half-mile a day at one point—has improved since this weekend, said Zhang Minghai, director of Zhangjiakou city's Traffic Management Bureau general office.

But he said he wasn't sure when the situation along the Beijing-Zhangjiakou highway would return to normal.

The traffic jam started Aug. 14 on a stretch of the Beijing-Zhangjiakou highway. That section has frequently been congested, especially after large coalfields were discovered in Inner Mongolia, Zhang said. Traffic volume has increased 40 percent every year.

Drivers stranded in the gridlock in the Inner Mongolia region and Hebei province, headed toward Beijing, passed the time sleeping, walking around or playing cards and chess. Local villagers were doing brisk business selling instant noodles, boxed lunches and snacks, weaving between the parked trucks on bicycles.

The highway construction in Beijing that is restricting inbound traffic flow and causing the jam "will not be finished until Sept. 17," he said.

Authorities were trying to speed up traffic by allowing more trucks to enter Beijing, especially at night, Zhang said. They also asked trucking companies to suspend operations and advised drivers to take alternate routes.

China's roadways are increasingly overburdened as the number of private vehicles booms along with commercial truck traffic hauling materials like coal and food to cities. Traffic slowdowns because of construction and accidents are common, though a 10-day traffic jam is unusual even in China.

20100824-02	09:25	Ben	Re: "China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---

Dear SteveB,

Not to start a long thread, but it's my feeling, based on years of observation, that what really caused our loss of jobs is the loss of manufacturing capacity that began when major industries declined both to re-tool and to adopt the metric system back in the 1960s and 1970s, and more pervasively, the utter lack of consideration of long-range planning in the face of short term greed and the business executives' compensation based on quarterly reports and stock price. It's this last thing that caused the sellout to overseas manufacturing, and the reason that we are strategically utterly impaired with regard to all but the most mundane, and the highest-of-high-tech, manufacturing.

Greed shot us all in the foot.

20100824-03	12:53	SteveB	Re: "China's 60-Mile Traffic Jam to Last Weeks"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Ben,

Nope! What happened was free trade and union busting. We were sold lock, stock, and barrel to the big money by our corrupt politicians. It's not about stupidity (except that of "the people"). Why re-tool America when slave labor exists elsewhere? The metric system is a bogus issue. What needs to be metric is easily metric. Even in America. I've worked in industry all my life and all the mechanics the world over had two sets of tools. No problem. The world has adapted to both systems at this time. But our goods were always too expensive for the rest of the world. Hell yes! Because we had the highest standard and cost of living. But yes, it is about greed. But the greedy rich didn't shoot us in the foot...they shot us in the head!

20100826-01	16:57	Dick	Fw: Countries with Birthright Citizenship
-----------------------------	-------	------	---

[Source of original email unknown. This has been debunked (see below). —SteveB]

HERE ARE ALL THE DEVELOPED NATIONS OF THE WORLD THAT OFFER BIRTHRIGHT CITIZENSHIP TO THE BABIES OF TOURISTS AND ILLEGAL ALIENS:

The United States of America.

That's right, every other modern Developed nation in the world has gotten rid of birthright citizenship policies. Yet, most of U.S. news media and politicians the last two weeks have ridiculed the comments by some other politicians that it is time for the U.S. to put an end to birthright citizenship for tourists and illegal aliens.

Folks, the U.S. stands alone.

There used to be all kinds of Developed countries that gave away their citizenship as freely as we do in the U.S. But one by one they all have recognized the folly of that policy.

SOME MODERN COUNTRIES THAT RECENTLY ENDED THEIR BIRTHRIGHT CITIZENSHIP POLICY:

Canada was the last non-U.S. holdout. Illegal aliens stopped getting citizenship for their babies in 2009. Australia's birthright citizenship requirements are much more stringent than those of H.R. 1868 and took effect in 2007. New Zealand repealed in 2006. Ireland repealed in 2005. France repealed in 1993. India repealed in 1987. United Kingdom repealed in 1983. Portugal repealed in 1981.

The United States is the laughing stock of the modern world. Only the U.S. values its citizenship so lowly as to distribute it promiscuously to the off-spring of foreign citizens visiting Disney World on tourist visas and to foreign citizens who have violated their promises on their visitor, work and student visas to stay illegally in the country, as well as to those who sneak across our borders.

20100827-01	13:02	SteveB	"Obama Will Triumph—So Will America"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------------------------

I don't agree with all of this, but have been thinking along these same lines myself recently. I wonder how Glenn Beck and Ross Limbaugh can sleep at night knowing their dire predictions for an American disaster never materialized? They were so sure! They were so wrong! I'm sure they are so disappointed! Yes, they predicted disaster because they wanted disaster and disaster improves their ratings. The true idiots always show themselves. Wake up, America!

"Obama Will Triumph—So Will America" by Frank Schaeffer, OpEd News

Sept. 30, 2010, (<http://www.opednews.com/articles/Obama-Will-Triumph—So-W-by-Frank-Schaeffer-100930-495.html>)

Before he'd served even one year President Obama lost the support of the easily distracted left and engendered the white hot rage of the hate-filled right.

But some of us, from all walks of life and ideological backgrounds—including this white, straight, 57-yearold, former religious right wing agitator, now progressive writer and (given my background as the son of a famous evangelical leader) this unlikely Obama supporter—are sticking with our President.

Why? Because he is succeeding.

We faithful Obama supporters still trust our initial impression of him as a great, good, and uniquely qualified man to lead us.

Obama's steady supporters will be proven right. Obama's critics will be remembered as easily panicked and prematurely discouraged at best and shriveled hate mongers at worst. The Context of the Obama Presidency Not since the days of the rise of fascism in Europe, the Second World War, and the Depression has any president faced more adversity. Not since the Civil War has any President led a more bitterly divided country. Not since the introduction of racial integration has any president faced a more consistently short-sighted and willfully ignorant opposition—from both the right and left.

As the President's poll numbers have fallen, so has his support from some on the left that were hailing him as a Messiah not long ago; all those lefty websites and commentators that were falling all over themselves on behalf of our first black president during the 2008 election.

The left's lack of faith has become a self-fulfilling "prophecy"—snipe at the President, then watch the poll numbers fall, and pretend you didn't have anything to do with it!

Here is what Obama faced when he took office—none of which was his fault:

1. An ideologically divided country to the point that America was really two countries.
2. Two wars; one that was mishandled from the start, the other that was unnecessary and immoral.
3. The worst economic crisis since the Depression.
4. America's standing in the world at the lowest point in history.
5. A country that had been misled into accepting the use of torture of prisoners of war.
6. A health care system in free fall.
7. An educational system in free fall.
8. A global environmental crisis of history-altering proportions. (about which the Bush administration and the Republicans had done nothing).
9. An impasse between culture warriors from the right and left.
10. A huge financial deficit inherited from the terminally irresponsible Bush administration.

And those were only some of the problems sitting on the President's desk!

"Help" from the Right?

What did the Republicans and the religious right, libertarians, and half-baked conspiracy theorists (which is what the Republicans were reduced to by the time Obama took office) do to "help" our new President (and our country) succeed?

They claimed that he wasn't a real American, didn't have an American birth certificate, wasn't born here, was secretly a Muslim, was white-hating "racist", was secretly a communist, was actually the Anti-Christ, (!), and was a reincarnation of Hitler and wanted "death panels" to kill the elderly!

They not-so-subtly called for his assassination through the not-so-subtle use of vile signs held at their rallies and even a bumper sticker quoting Psalm 109:8. They organized "tea parties" to sound off against imagined insults and all government in general, and gathered to howl at the moon. They were led by insurance industry lobbyists and deranged (but well financed) "commentators" from Glenn Beck to Rush Limbaugh. The utterly discredited Roman Catholic bishops teamed up with the utterly discredited evangelical leaders to denounce a President who was trying to actually do something about the poor, the environment, to diminish the number of abortions through compassionate programs to help women, and to care for the sick! And in Congress the Republican leadership only knew one word: "No!"

In other words, the reactionary white, rube, uneducated, crazy American far right, combined with the educated but obtuse, neoconservative, war mongering, religious right shills for big business, libertarian Fed Reserve-hating, gold bug, gun-loving crazies, child-molesting acquiescent "bishops", frontier loons, and evangelical gay-hating flakes found one thing to briefly unite them: their desire to stop an uppity black man from succeeding at all costs!

"Help" from the Left?

What did the left do to help their newly elected President?

Some of them excoriated the President because they disagreed with the bad choices he was being forced to make regarding a war in Afghanistan that he'd inherited from the worst President in modern history!

Others stood up and bravely proclaimed that the President's economic policies had "failed" before the President even instituted them! Others said that since all gay rights battles had not been fully won within virtually minutes of the President taking office, they'd been "betrayed"! (Never mind that Obama's vocal support to the gay community is stronger than any other President's has been. Never mind that he signed a new hate crimes law!)

Those that had stood in transfixed legions weeping with emotion on election night turned into an angry mob saying how "disappointed" they were that they'd not all immediately been translated to heaven the moment Obama stepped into the White House! Where was the "change"? Contrary to their expectations, they were still mere mortals!

And the legion of young new supporters was too busy texting to pay attention for longer than a nanosecond. "Governing"?! What the hell does that word, uh, like mean?"

The President's critics left and right all had one thing in common: impatience laced with little-to-no sense of history (let alone reality) thrown in for good measure. Then, of course, there were the white, snide, know-it-all commentators/talking heads, who just couldn't imagine that maybe, just maybe they weren't as smart as they thought they were and certainly not as smart as their President. He hadn't consulted them, had he? So he must be wrong!

The Obama critics' ideological ideas defined their idea of reality rather than reality defining their ideas—say, about what is possible in one year in office after the hand that the President had been dealt by fate, or to be exact, by the American idiot nation that voted Bush into office twice!

Meanwhile back in the reality-based community—in just 12 short months—President Obama:

1. Continued to draw down the misbegotten war in Iraq (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
2. Thoughtfully and decisively picked the best of several bad choices regarding the war in Afghanistan (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
3. Gave a major, precedent-setting speech supporting gay rights (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
4. Restored America 's image around the globe. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
5. Banned torture of American's prisoners. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics)
6. Stopped the free fall of the American economy. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics)
7. Put the U.S. squarely back in the bilateral international community. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
8. Put the U.S. squarely into the middle of the international effort to halt global warming. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
9. Stood-up for educational reform. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
10. Won a Nobel Peace Prize. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
11. Moved the trial of terrorists back into the American judicial system of checks and balances. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics)
12. Did what had to be done to start the slow, torturous, and almost impossible process of health care reform that seven Presidents had failed to even begin. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
13. Responded to hatred from the right and left with measured good humor and patience. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.)
14. Stopped the free fall of job losses. (But that wasn't good enough for his critics.).

15. Showed immense personal courage in the face of an armed and dangerous far right opposition that included the sort of disgusting people who show up at public meetings carrying loaded weapons and carrying Timothy McVeigh-inspired signs about the "blood of tyrants" needing to "water the tree of liberty". (But that wasn't good enough for his critics).

16. Showed that he could not only make the tough military choices but explain and defend them brilliantly (But that wasn't good enough for his critics).

Other than those "disappointing" accomplishments—IN ONE YEAR—President Obama "failed"! Other than that, he didn't "live up to expectations"!

Who actually has failed.....are the Americans who can't see the beginning of a miracle of national rebirth right under their jaded noses. Who failed are the smart-ass ideologues of the left and right who began rooting for this President to fail so that they could be proved right in their dire and morbid predictions. Who failed are the movers and shakers behind our obscenely dumb news cycles that have turned "news" into just more stupid entertainment for an entertainment besotted infantile country.

Here's the good news: President Obama is succeeding without the help of his lefty supporters" or hate-filled Republican detractors!

The Future Looks Good

After Obama has served two full terms (and he will), after his wisdom in moving deliberately and cautiously with great subtlety on all fronts—with a canny and calculating eye to the possible successes, after the economy is booming and new industries are burgeoning (they will be), after the doomsayers are all proven not just wrong but silly: let the record show that not all Americans were panicked into thinking the sky was falling. Just because we didn't get everything we wanted in the first short year Obama was in office, not all of us gave up. Some of us stayed the course. And we will be proven right.

PS. If you agree that Obama is shaping up to be a great President, pass this on!

20100828-01	06:19	SteveB	Re: Countries with Birthright Citizenship
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dick,

Not quite...below is from Wikipedia:

Jus Soli

In naturalization, jus soli (Latin: law of ground), also known as birthright citizenship, is a right by which nationality or citizenship can be recognized to any individual born in the territory of the related state.

At the turn of the nineteenth century, nation-states commonly divided themselves between those granting nationality on the grounds of jus soli (France, for example) and those granting it on the grounds of jus sanguinis (right of blood) (Germany, for example, before 2000). However, most European countries chose the German conception of an "objective nationality", based on blood, race or language (as in Fichte's classical definition of a nation), opposing themselves to republican Ernest Renan's "subjective nationality", based on an every-day plebiscite of one's appertenance to his Fatherland. This non-essentialist conception of nationality allowed the implementation of jus soli, against the essentialist jus sanguinis.

However, today's increase of migrants has somewhat blurred the lines between these two antagonistic sources of right.

Countries that have acceded to the 1961 Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness will grant nationality to otherwise stateless persons who were born on their territory, or on a ship or plane flagged by the country.

Lex soli

Usually a practical regulation of the acquisition of nationality or citizenship of a state by birth on the territory of the state is provided by a derivative law called lex soli. Most states provide a specific lex soli, in application of the respective jus soli, and it is the most common means of acquiring nationality. A frequent exception to lex soli is imposed when a child was born to a parent in the diplomatic or consular service of another state, on a mission to the state in question.

Blurred lines between jus soli and jus sanguinis

There is a trend in some countries toward restricting lex soli by requiring that at least one of the child's parents be a national of the state in question at the child's birth, or a legal permanent resident of the territory of the state in question at the child's birth.

Specific national legislation

Jus soli is observed in 16% of the world, the United States being the largest practitioner.

States that observe jus soli include:

Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Barbados, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile (children of transient foreigners or of foreign diplomats on assignment in Chile only upon request), Colombia, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji[5], Grenada, Guatemala, Guyana, Honduras, Jamaica, Lesotho[6], Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Trinidad and Tobago, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Modification of jus soli

In a number of countries, the automatic application of jus soli has been modified to impose some additional requirements for children of foreign parents, such as the parent being a permanent resident or having lived in the country for a period of time. Jus soli has been modified in the following countries:

United Kingdom on Jan. 1, 1983, Australia on Aug. 20, 1986, Republic of Ireland on Jan. 1, 2005, New Zealand on Jan. 1, 2006, South Africa on Oct. 6, 1995, France also operates a modified form of jus soli.

German nationality law was changed on Jan. 1, 2000 to introduce a modified concept of jus soli. Prior to that date, German nationality law was based entirely on jus sanguinis.

Modification of jus soli has been criticized as contributing to economic inequality, the perpetuation of unfree labour from a helot underclass, and statelessness.

Abolition of jus soli

Some countries which formerly operated jus soli have moved to abolish it entirely, only conferring citizenship on children born in the country if one of the parents is a citizen of that country. India did this on Dec. 3, 2004, in reaction to illegal immigration from its Muslim neighbor Bangladesh, though jus soli was progressively weakened since 1987.[7] Malta also changed the principle of citizen to jus sanguinis on Aug. 1, 1989, in a move that also relaxed restrictions against multiple citizenship.

20100903-01	14:06	Dennis	"5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Screwing yourself is patriotic?

So how's that Tea Party agenda workin' out for ya, freedom lovin' Americans? Read all about it in the attached article.

"5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters" by Adele M. Stan, AlterNet

Sept. 3, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/147911/>)

If people could be counted on to vote in their own best interests, there would be no Tea Party movement, for if the economic agenda embraced by Tea Partiers—a vastly pro-corporation, government-killing plan—were ever to be enacted, Tea Partiers would find themselves among the people most hurt by it.

To hear Tea Party activists tell it, they seek to save future generations from the crushing demands of big government. Yet the agenda they advocate, dictated by the big-money players behind the muscular interest groups that keep the movement growing, will likely render the Tea Partiers themselves the economically squeezed subjects of a corporate state, one in which the elderly will be left to scrounge for crumbs, small businesses will be crushed by lack of capital, and their own ground-level online organizing supplanted by the networks built by giant, corporate-funded Astroturf groups.

As George Lakoff and Drew Westen remind us, people don't vote on the facts: they vote on emotion, according to Westen, and their notion of morality, according to Lakoff. The resentment of Tea Partiers toward liberals, East Coast elites, the poor and people who don't look like them has been effectively marshaled in service of a "free market" ideology cleverly packaged as "freedom." Never mind that free markets are anything but free for ordinary people. The packaging strikes the necessary emotional and moral chords: Free markets = freedom = liberty = endowed by the Creator, as written in the Declaration of Independence by the founders. It's the perfect exploitation of the worldview of conservative middle-class white people—all in the service of enriching the super-rich at the expense of their unwitting, patriotic ground troops.

Casting themselves as an organic uprising in opposition to a federal government they see as the greatest threat to their freedom, Tea Party supporters conveniently look past the likely consequences of the no-holds-barred, anti-regulatory aims of Rupert Murdoch and David Koch, the billionaires whose dollars grease the skids on which the Tea Party movement rides. Murdoch leads News Corporation, the parent company of Fox News and the Wall Street Journal, the movement's evangelists. Koch is a principal in Koch Industries, the second largest privately held corporation in the U.S., and heir to its fortunes.

The billionaires give the activists lots of entertainment to distract them from this reality, especially in the form of sideshows, such as Glenn Beck's travesty at the Lincoln Memorial, designed to fan the flames of racial resentment while making Tea Partiers feel holy about it. At other times, the demonization or infantilization of the nation's first black president serves up the same charge of adrenaline to the fearful, angry throngs who seek to blame their troubles on anyone other than the corporatist manipulators in whom they've placed their trust.

How else to explain the embrace of the billionaires' agenda by the middle-aged, middle-class folks of the Tea Party movement—the very ones likely to find themselves screwed by it? Here we examine five positions advanced by Tea Party leaders, and what they would mean for Tea Party supporters.

1. Ending Social Security.

Rep. Michele Bachmann, doyenne of the congressional Tea Party Caucus, has outlined a plan for an abrupt phase-out of Social Security. Speaking before an audience of Tea Party supporters at the RightOnline conference convened in July, Bachmann referred to Social Security and Medicare as "welfare" that had seen its day. The event was convened in Las Vegas by the Americans For Prosperity Foundation, whose board is chaired by David Koch. There, more than 1,000 Tea Partiers—the majority of whom are over the age of 45—sat in rapt silence as Bachmann outlined a plan to end Social Security for all those who will be under the age of 65 at the time her potential dream Congress enacts the legislation.

The growth of the federal debt and deficit require a drastic cutback in federal spending, Bachmann said. "Spending comes first, so we have to cut it first," she explained, speaking of her plan to devastate Social Security. "And in my opinion, it'll take us about a long weekend to get that done, and then we'll be fine."

For those between the ages of 55 and 65 at the time Bachmann's Kill Social Security Plan hypothetically passes into law, there would be a means-tested program for "those who truly need it—the truly disadvantaged, those who truly can't go forward." For everybody else, there would be unspecified "alternatives and adjustments." Those under the age of 55 would apparently be squat out of luck, regardless of how truly disadvantaged they are. From the assembled Tea Partiers, not a discouraging word was heard, even as Bachmann outlined a plan to essentially rob them of the money they've been putting into the system all their lives.

According to a New York Times/CBS News poll conducted in April, 46 percent of Tea Party supporters fall into the 45-64 age group. (Untouched by the Bachmann plan would be the 29 percent of Tea Party supporters the poll cited as being over the age of 64.) The same survey revealed that among 47 percent of self-identified Tea Party supporters, either they or a member of their household was receiving Social Security retirement benefits. When asked whether the outlay for programs such as Social Security and Medicare are worth the taxpayer expense, 62 percent said they were.

What to do with all those freed-up dollars? Why not give them back to the corporations and wealthy individuals who bankroll the Tea Party movement? Segueing out of her nuking of the social safety net for the nation's elderly—and stealing the payroll taxes of all those Americans who paid into Social Security over the course of their lifetimes but would never see a dime of their contributions come back to them under her plan—Bachmann launched into a pitch for a corporatist agenda that began with her call for a roll-back of the corporate tax from its current 34 percent to 9 percent, which, according to Bachmann, would make it "one of the lowest in the industrialized world."

Actually, make that possibly the lowest in the world (excluding the handful of mostly broken nations that have none), never mind "industrialized." I mean, even Kazakhstan and Burkina Faso have higher corporate tax rates than 9 percent. And India, where all the good jobs are said to be going? Try 43 percent.

Bachmann also called for zeroing out the estate tax—even for the very wealthiest Americans—and repeal of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, a bill passed in the wake of the Enron scandal that sets standards for corporate accountability. What would that mean for Americans under the age of 64 whose retirement savings would be entirely invested in the private sector after the demolishing of Social Security? That the same kinds of accounting tricks and corruption that destroyed the retirement savings of thousands in the Enron caper would become standard operating procedure. Sorry, Tea Partiers—you're screwed.

2. Ending Medicare (see #1, Ending Social Security).

"Within seven [years], Medicare is dead, bankrupt, broke—broke," Bachmann told the Tea Partiers. Her solution? End it for everybody but "the truly needy and the truly disabled." (I shudder to think what constitutes "truly needy" in the Bachmann moral universe.) Her solution? You can buy your own health insurance policy on the private market with pre-tax dollars. Sure, you're 70 years old: How much do you think an insurance company is going to charge you for your coverage? Pre-taxed or not, you're going to need a whole lotta dollars to make that one work for you.

But Bachmann's fans likely found comfort in her sunny optimism. "It is possible for every American to be able to retire a millionaire," Bachmann told the Tea Partiers. "It's entirely possible to do that if you plan early and you put away money—and there are alternatives that we can put forward." Just what those "alternatives" might be were left to the audience's imagination.

3. Opposition to Internet Freedom (aka Net Neutrality).

Earlier this month, news media, ranging from mainstream to righty to lefty, breathlessly reported that leaders of 35 "Tea Party" groups signed a letter to the Federal Communications Commission in opposition to any efforts made by the FCC to "regulate the Internet." At issue is Internet freedom and potential regulations that could prevent Internet providers from saddling small-time Web sites unable to pay for an added jolt of Web juice with slower loading speeds for their sites than, say, big-money players like Google. (This is the crux of the issue in the Google-Verizon deal.) Now, Tea Party supporters fancy themselves to be rugged individualists, dedicated to the preservation of individual freedoms. But it wasn't until the big-money groups that bankroll the national organizing of the Tea Party movement began garnering opposition to Internet freedom that you began to see any of those quaint, homely signs carried at Tea Party rallies dedicated to the subject.

Tea Party activists pride themselves on their movement's apparent leaderless state, reveling in the homegrown, local character of ground-level Tea Party groups, which often organize on hastily organized listservs and homemade local Web sites. But should they succeed in halting the FCC's net neutrality plan, they may find themselves with no decent option for Web-based organizing other than the big networking sites built by the national money groups that form the Tea Party Inc. uberstructure. So much for self-agency.

And what of those "35 Tea Party groups" whose leaders signed that letter to the FCC? Well, 24 of those entities are either part of or affiliated with Americans For Prosperity. Among the signatories was AFP president Tim Phillips, as well as the directors of 22 state chapters of Americans For Prosperity—each counted as a separate

"Tea Party group." In addition, the signature of AFP policy director Phil Kerpen (who is also a columnist for Murdoch's FoxNation) appears with the affiliation, "director, NoInternetTakeover.com." Also present was Linda Hansen, who leads the Wisconsin Prosperity Network and is the author of a "worker education" program that is a project of the Americans For Prosperity Foundation, and promoted by John Fund and Stephen Moore of Rupert Murdoch's Wall Street Journal.

Others signatories aren't leaders of Tea Party groups at all, but heads of the old corporatist, anti-government groups such as Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform and David Keene of the American Conservative Union. There are even a couple of stalwarts of the old New Right: Phyllis Schlafly of the Eagle Forum and Morton Blackwell of the Leadership Institute.

Bottom line for Tea Partiers: deviate from the AFP/Ayn Rand line on any issue, and you could see your little homemade Web site begin to load verrrry slowwwly.

4. De-Funding Public Education.

While it's common knowledge that Tea Partiers hate all things government (except their personal Social Security checks and Medicare reimbursements), they hold a special contempt for public school teachers. This stems from a number of causes, but mostly from the fact that teachers are unionized government workers who have authority over one's children for a good chunk of the day. The very fact of their unionization implies a different value system from that of the Tea Partiers, who fear that value system having an influence on their children. Teachers tend to be more liberal than the general population. And to the worker wed to the private enterprise system, a teacher's deal can look pretty sweet by comparison: It generally comes with a pension, tenure and the prospect of early retirement.

That's why even candidates like Sharron Angle, the GOP/Tea Party contender for Nevada's U.S. Senate seat, can call for the elimination of the Department of Education and still be taken seriously by the Tea Party faithful. And that's why calling the federal jobs bill passed last month a "teacher bailout" was an effective means of summoning Tea Party opposition to the bill that provided $26 billion in aid to cash-strapped states to maintain all manner of services and programs, including money to prevent some 300,000 teacher lay-offs.

For the billionaires of Tea Party Inc., gutting public education is just another way to grab more marbles for themselves by marginalizing unions and shrinking the overall size of government—not to mention the convenience of having a gullible and uneducated population to snooker down the road. They have little need for an educated workforce in the U.S., since they'll offshore whatever jobs they can.

Yet, according to the New York Times/CBS News poll, 65 percent of Tea Party supporters with children under the age of 18 have those children enrolled in public schools. And although parents of school-age children account for only 20 percent of Tea Party supporters, it's safe to assume that a sizable number of the older people who comprise the bulk of the Tea Party have grandchildren in public schools. The education those children receive will clearly suffer if schools are forced to lay off significant numbers of teachers but, for Tea Partiers, that fact pales beside the prospect of sticking it to the teachers they've been taught to resent. Better to short-change one's own kids than to keep one more teacher employed, despite all the rhetoric about the Tea Party movement being the guardian of the legacy owed to those yet unborn.

5. Opposition to Wall Street Reform and Financial Reform.

Perhaps the most confounding aspect of the Tea Party agenda is its opposition to reform of Wall Street and banks. Even as Tea Party leaders and activists rail against the bailouts of U.S. automakers, and the minimal assistance offered homeowners with underwater mortgages, Tea Party leaders and those who follow them voice hostility toward any and all measures that would demand increased accountability from purveyors of financial instruments or the credit-card industry, like those contained in the financial reform bill passed by Congress in July (a bill that liberal critics regard as rather toothless).

In her speech to Tea Party supporters at the RightOnline conference, Michele Bachmann described the recently passed financial reform bill as nothing more than a punitive measure against Wall Street, when the real culprit in the nation's financial woes was the Housing and Community Redevelopment Act passed in 1977. Another particular object of scorn by the Tea Party set is the Bureau of Consumer Financial Protection created by the bill.

Financial reforms such as those signed into law by President Barack Obama last month are designed to benefit the middle class, where 50 percent of Tea Party supporters locate themselves, according to the New York Times/CBS poll. The reforms are expected to be especially good for small businesses, whose fortunes Tea Partiers often claim to care most about.

Failure of Logic, Rule of Emotion

So, how do they do it, those unscrupulous billionaires? How do they get everyday Americans to embrace an agenda that runs counter to their own interests? Their mouthpieces—people like Bachmann and Sarah Palin and Glenn Beck—couch it all in the language of heroic patriotism, with the Tea Partiers cast as patriots at war with people set to defile the founders' dream of America. Do that, and a billionaire will find himself the general of an army of ground troops ready to do battle in his service, despite his unwillingness to share the spoils of his war on everyday Americans.

In her speech to the Tea Party faithful in Nevada, Michele Bachmann neither began nor ended her speech with her plan to rob the Tea Partiers (and the rest of us) of their Social Security. She began with a sustained attack on the nation's first black president (who was portrayed as immature, greedy, incompetent and corrupt). Her plan was explained just before she wrapped up the speech, which she ended with the truly poignant patriotic story of the sinking of an Army transport ship, the Dorchester, in World War II. Bachmann recounted how four Navy chaplains went down with the ship after giving their life jackets to younger soldiers. She made a point of citing the last names of two of them: Washington and Goode.

In Bachmann's telling, the brave chaplains gave up the lifeline that was rightfully theirs in order to save the younger generation. Kind of like giving up your Social Security to save your country for your grandchildren—except that your sacrifice is more likely to line the pockets of a billionaire than save your grandson from a life of debt, a possibility you just don't consider.

(Adele M. Stan is AlterNet's Washington bureau chief.)

© 2011 Independent Media Institute.

20100904-01	01:01	Mary	Re: "5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
-----------------------------	-------	------	---

Dear Dennis,

Wow, I would have thought you would have sent something factual not the rants of the liberal elitists.

20100904-02	07:24	SteveB	Re: "5 Ways the Tea Party Agenda Screws Tea Party Supporters"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Mary,

What do you find to be not factual? Are the goals stated not the goals of the Tea Partiers? I think they are.

Are these goals detrimental to middle class Americans? Of course they are.

To me, this article is a perfect portrait of America in 2010.

20100907-01	14:18	Dennis	"America's Empire & Endless Wars Are Destroying the World & Ruining Our Great Country"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Something fundamentally amiss...

If you want to know how the foreign policy of every American president since Eisenhower has worked against America's interest (yep, Obama too), read this interview with former army colonel Andrew Bacevich on Washington Rules.

"America's Empire and Endless Wars Are Destroying the World, and Ruining Our Great Country" by Terrence McNally and Andrew Bacevich, AlterNet

Sept. 6, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148094/>)

Andrew Bacevich speaks with a fairly unique mix of experience, authority, passion and wisdom in questioning our nation's priorities: specifically our willingness to place so much of our national identity, wealth, attention, moral practice, and finally the life and blood of many thousands of our citizens and millions of those of other countries in the hands of our military. A professor of history and international relations at Boston University, Bacevich served twenty-three years in the U.S. Army, retiring with the rank of colonel. He lost his son in Iraq. A graduate of the U. S. Military Academy, he received his Ph. D. in American Diplomatic History from Princeton University. He is the author of several books, including The New American Militarism; The Limits of Power: The End of American Exceptionalism; and his newest, Washington Rules: America's Path to Permanent War.

McNally: Your book, Washington Rules, opens with a moment that you offer as a turning point: could you share that experience?

Bacevich: The moment occurred shortly after the fall of the Berlin Wall. I was still in the army at the time. I'd spent a considerable time serving in Germany with my family, but this was the first time we visited Berlin. I wanted to visit the Brandenburg Gate, because for me, it had been for decades this quintessential symbol of international politics in our time. Late on a rainy, very cold winter night, we approached the Gate from the old East Berlin side and found young men huddled between its columns peddling bits and pieces of Soviet military gear: buttons, hats, parts of uniforms. I bought a wristwatch emblazoned with the symbol of the Soviet tank corps, which broke about two weeks later. It was all junk, and the men, who clearly were off-duty Russian soldiers, looked anything but ten feet tall.

At that moment—I'm not going to say my worldview was suddenly transformed—but certain seeds of doubt were planted. I began to wonder if I had misperceived the "other" that I was now confronting for the first time. As I considered that possibility, I began to entertain the possibility that I had misperceived many other things, and so began an intellectual journey that has continued now for about 20 years.

McNally: You set forth on a process of inquiry and self-education to learn what had been obscured to you in the past. You began this process while you were still in the military?

Bacevich: Well, I left the army maybe two years later, and that's when the questions began to come fast and furious. I came to realize—and it's not some startling insight—that when you exist inside of an institution, particularly an institution that has an all-encompassing role such as a religious order or the military, it's very difficult to view that institution critically. It's very difficult even to understand some of the assumptions that define the institution's view of truth. It's only when you're able to stand apart from the institution, that critical thought becomes possible. When I left the army in 1992, the process of seeking to identify and to answer first order questions really began.

McNally: What do you mean by first order questions?

Bacevich: A couple of the first order questions that have preoccupied me: What exactly drives U.S. policy? What makes us do what we do with regard to the rest of the world?

As a young boy growing up and as a serving officer, I generally accepted the official view that we did what we did because it was necessary to respond to external threat: that our policy in a sense was defensive and reactive. I subsequently came to believe that's not true. We do what we do largely in response to domestic, political, economic and ideological imperatives, and the motive for U.S. policy emerges from within; it does not come from without.

A second first order question had to do with the nature of war and the efficacy of force. I think most military professionals accept the conviction within their professions that war continues to be an effective instrument of statecraft. Despite my own service in Vietnam—which I recognized had been a disaster—I still largely subscribed to that idea. It was only after I got out of the army—and in particular after the U.S. embarked upon what seemed to be a never-ending series of interventions abroad, most of which failed to deliver on the promises that had justified them—that I really began to rethink my view of war itself.

McNally: What to you is the crucial evidence that America's approach to foreign and military policy is broken, that it doesn't work?

Bacevich: I think that an effective approach to national security is one that will keep us safe, and that will preserve and even enhance our prosperity, thereby enabling citizens to pursue life, liberty and happiness; and it will do all that at a relatively reasonable cost. And I think it's pretty clear, especially if we look at the post-9/11 period, that the existing approach to national security policy—what I call the Washington Rules—fails on every point. It's not keeping us safe; it's certainly depleting our resources; it's not building our prosperity; and it's costing a ton of money. The Washington Rules that I try to describe in the book originated in the immediate wake of World War II. They were expressions of a national security consensus that may well have worked at one time, but I would argue strongly that they no longer work at all. This consensus, having outlived its utility, is badly in need of being junked.

McNally: What are those rules? You say they consist of a credo and a trinity of means, right?

Bacevich: The credo asserts a claim, and out of that claim comes a demand that the United States be able to exercise certain prerogatives. The second piece of the Washington Rules I label the sacred trinity, core principles that define the way we conceive of and use our military power. The elements of the sacred trinity are the following: first of all, a demand that the United States exclusively maintain a global military presence; second, the practice of configuring U.S. forces not to defend the country, but so that they can serve as instruments of power projection; and then finally, to combine that global presence with those global power projection capabilities to support a policy of global interventionism.

This sacred trinity is really what distinguishes the United States' military power. The Brits at one time had a dominant battle fleet; France in the time of Napoleon had a people in arms; what we have is the sacred trinity. And, to emphasize what I think is the key point, it doesn't do what it's supposed to do.

McNally: You make the point that all of this consistently goes unquestioned, and that both political parties and the mainstream media begin at second and third order questions.

Bacevich: Exactly right. One of the reasons that I use religiously loaded language—an American credo and the sacred trinity—to describe the Washington Rules is that I think this approach to national security policy has ascended to the point that it's kind of a quasi-religion.

Washington subscribes to these principles as a matter of faith. There is no empirical evidence to suggest that the American credo is valid or is true, but every president, up to and including President Obama, in their speeches and their language repeatedly—in somewhat different words from one president to the next—reaffirms the credo. And the policies pursued by the Pentagon, supported by the Congress, and largely endorsed by the mainstream media, reaffirm the elements of the sacred trinity.

McNally: Let me read a piece of Obama's speech last December when, after the very public period of analysis, he announced that the U.S. would send an additional 30,000 troops to Afghanistan. "More than any other nation, the United States of America has underwritten global security for over six decades, a time that for all its problems has seen walls come down, markets open, billions lifted from poverty, unparalleled scientific progress, advancing frontiers of human liberty. For unlike the great powers of old, we have not sought world domination. Our union was founded in resistance to oppression. We do not seek to occupy other nations; we will not claim another nation's resources or target other people because their faith or ethnicity is different from ours. What we have fought for, what we continue to fight for is a better future for our children and grandchildren, and we believe that their lives will be better if other people's children and grandchildren can live in freedom and access opportunity."

To me, that very much has that sense—whether he and his speechwriters are aware of it or not—of a credo handed down, untouchable and unquestionable.

Bacevich: It is such a sanitized version of our history in the past five or six decades that it shouldn't pass the laugh test. Yet I think it's an excellent example of the way political leaders perpetuate the credo: Obama putting his own stamp of approval on an image of our role in the world that everybody, at least since Franklin Roosevelt, has embraced.

McNally: Again using the religious metaphor, it's as if someone ascends to the cardinalship, and then publicly pledges allegiance to the credo that's been handed down to them.

Bacevich: Exactly.

McNally: What are the causes, the history and the culprits? In this book, although you certainly deal with the present predicament, with Iraq and Afghanistan, you also take us back. There are characters I hadn't read about in quite a while—Allan Dulles, Curtis Lemay and Maxwell Taylor. How did we get here from the end of WWII?

Bacevich: I think the short version goes like this. When the national security consensus was forged in the wake of WWII and the Washington Rules came into existence, they were not entirely irrational. I think you can make a strong case that American leadership and American military power were necessary in order to try to deal with the wreckage left behind by the war, to help to rebuild the liberal democratic world in order to resist the ambitions of Joseph Stalin. But the world that existed at the end of the 1940s no longer exists today, yet people in Washington tend to act as if the world has not changed at all.

So where did things go wrong? Things went wrong when the institutions—the Pentagon, the CIA, components of the military industrial complex—came to value the Washington Rules because they were good for the institutions, and gradually lost sight of the extent to which adhering to this national security consensus was good or not good for the nation itself.

Let's get specific here. In the wake of WWII, our global military presence first took shape in Western Europe and Japan, and it was probably necessary in the near term. That presence abroad contributed to our safety and our wellbeing. But fast-forward to the post-Cold War period and our increasing military presence in places like the greater Middle East. You'd have to be crazy to think that the American military presence in Saudi Arabia after the first Gulf War, in Iraq after 2003, or in Afghanistan ever since 9/11, contributes to stability and security. That presence abroad actually enhances anti-Americanism and creates greater instability, but the Pentagon, committed to the proposition that we need to maintain this global military presence, is blind to the down side.

McNally: Let's look at the current situation in Afghanistan. You note that over the years there's been flexibility in interpretation of the rules. For example, Kennedy comes in, reverses Eisenhower's stance, and ends up going to Vietnam. Another example, Petraeus at one point seems absolutely against anything that would ever be considered counterinsurgency and later becomes the god of counterinsurgency. There's flexibility with how we do what we do, but never with why.

Bacevich: Periodically in this roughly six decade long period that the book tries to evaluate, there arises a great desire to create new instruments of military power that will make that power more useable. You cite two very good examples of this tendency.

By the time we get to the end of the 1950s, the end of the Eisenhower era, Ike and those around him had pretty much concluded that war as traditionally conceived had reached a dead end, that nuclear weapons for the most part made war unusable. Eisenhower's policy was to wave the big stick of massive retaliation to keep the Soviets from doing anything. The people that came into office with Kennedy thought that was inadequate, they wanted to make force useable. They pursued this idea under the rubric of flexible response, one of the defective ideas that put us on the road to Vietnam.

Fast forward to the Iraq war and the aftermath of the 2003 invasion, when the U.S., thinking that it achieved a great victory, suddenly found itself faced with an insurgency and the prospect of never-ending conflict. Now David Petraeus leads the way, but he's not alone in trying to revive an approach to warfare that once again would make American military power useful. There is a reoccurring tendency to want to find ways to make force work.

McNally: The Founding Fathers are constantly referred to by the Right, more than the Left, as the source of direction and wisdom. Yet, as you point out, their counsel on foreign policy is absolutely the opposite of where we are now and where we've been for the past 50 years. Let me read a quote of yours: "We are headed towards ever greater more difficult economic times that will result in us failing in our most fundamental obligation laid out in the preamble of the Constitution which is to provide the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity. The path on which we have embarked and which we continue to pursue is very much at odds with what the founding purpose of this republic was supposed to be."

Bacevich: To my mind, the most important word in that quote is "posterity". The purpose of the Union is not simply to act in ways that will make you and me happy, but we are called upon to pursue a path that will also enable those who follow us to have an opportunity to pursue life, liberty, and happiness. Of course, everybody mouths that cliché, but our failure is becoming increasingly apparent, above all, in the enormous debt that we are piling up—not entirely due to our misguided national security policy, but in part. I think that we are increasingly approaching the point where it's going to become impossible for posterity to have the same opportunities that we have, and that is an enormously important reason to take stock of our over militarized approach to policy.

McNally: Let me remind people: When presidents, who now love to call themselves Commander in Chief, take the oath of office, it is not to defend our shores, our geography, or even our populace, it is to defend our constitution. As you point out, Adams, Washington and others said our role is as an exemplar not as an enforcer.

Bacevich: I think, to the extent that we have a responsibility to the world, it's time to renew that argument. Should we try to fulfill that responsibility, as we have for the past 60 years, based on expectations of what military power can do? Or is it possible that we can best serve others by demonstrating that liberal values do have value?

Could fulfilling the aspirations expressed in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution serve at least modestly to help other peoples in other nations to take their own paths toward self-determination—rather than acting, as we do in places like Iraq and Afghanistan, as if we know best how to determine their futures.

I find it preposterous that President Obama—someone who I think is a tremendously smart man, someone who basically I respect—could believe that we have the ability to create a state, create a government, create institutions across the vast cultural divide that separates Afghans from Americans.

McNally: I walked along the beach the afternoon of 9/11, shell-shocked as we all were, and I asked myself what question should we be asking now? And to me it was, "Have we done everything we could to minimize the possibilities of such terrorism?"

Of course, security would be part of the answer, but much more it would be whatever we could do to isolate such terrorists as pariahs in their own society. This would be about being an exemplar, perhaps things like Marshall Plans, possibly finding a way to expand education that wouldn't trample on culture, etc.

July 2010 was the deadliest month for the U.S. military in Afghanistan, 66 deaths, a devastating month for Afghans, more than 270 civilians killed, 600 wounded. Rather than ask you what do you think needs to happen in Afghanistan right now, let me ask a larger question—what exactly is the threat that the U.S. faces from these radical violent Islamists and what strategy should the U.S. pursue in order to deal with that threat?

Bacevich: That's an excellent question. First of all, the threat is not Islam or Fascism; the threat is not Nazi Germany in some sort of new guise. Those sorts of notions that were frequently voiced after 9/11, and are still voiced in the more militarized quarters of the right wing, are ludicrous. Violent anti-Western Jihadism does pose a real threat, but the threat falls well short of being existential.

The notion that we should take seriously the ambitions of Osama Bin Laden to create a new caliphate, uniting the entire Islamic world under his control, is preposterous. He's no more likely to create a new caliphate than I am to become the next pope in Rome. The threat ought to have been categorized, and today should be categorized, as a form of international criminal conspiracy: a kind of Mafia that derives a certain amount of its energy by perverting a religious tradition. And the proper response to an international criminal conspiracy is an international police effort.

Our approach—President Bush's approach now continued in Afghanistan by President Obama, which emphasizes invading, occupying and then trying to transform countries—doesn't work, costs way too much money, expends far too many American lives, and at the end of the day probably serves more than anything else to simply exacerbate the number of people who see us as infidels and occupiers.

McNally: On the response side, you say treat it as a criminal conspiracy. Countries who have done so, or even the instances where we have done so, have found some success. What should we do in terms of prevention?

Bacevich: Here I suspect I may differ from you. You mentioned things like a Marshall Plan. I'm pretty skeptical about our ability to mobilize resources in ways that can engineer positive change in the Islamic world. My belief would be that the people of the Islamic world are going to have to find their own path to reconciling their religious traditions with the demands of modernity. I don't mean that we should turn our backs on this dilemma that they are wrestling with. Let's have exchange programs; let's bring young people from that part of the world to study in our universities; let's encourage cultural exchanges. But I don't believe that in Afghanistan or Iraq or Pakistan or Yemen, that a set of programs put together by the federal government of the U.S. can make anything more than a marginal difference.

My own view is that we need to let Islam be Islam. They are going to have to sort out their own future.

What we need to do in the interim is to insulate ourselves from any violence that the internal crisis in the Islamic world may give rise to. To my mind, the most important thing to take from 9/11 is that our federal, state and local agencies charged with defending us, failed. If you leave the front door of your house wide open every night and sooner or later somebody comes in and steals your family silver, well, certainly the crooks need to be pursued and brought to justice, but shame on you for leaving your front door open. In effect that was what the agencies responsible for aviation security had done up until 9/11.

McNally: I realize that some of the thoughts I had on 9/11 have shifted by now. For one, the America that could afford a Marshall Plan after WWII is not the one that we exist in right now.

Bacevich: I think that's tremendously important. We don't live in the world that existed when the Marshall Plan was enacted. In 1947 we had the money and we made the stuff that everybody else wanted to buy around the world. We now live in a world in which the Chinese have the money and everybody makes stuff that our never-ending appetite for consumption insists we need to buy—despite the fact that it just makes us go deeper in debt.

McNally: You go much more into our hunger for consumption and our ignorance of meaning in your previous book, Limits of Power, which I highly recommend. To return to Petraeus for a moment: You point out that when he reflected on Vietnam, he thought counterinsurgency had no future. He then he writes a reformulation of counterinsurgency and it becomes the solution. What has gone unnoticed or at least unspoken is that the whole notion of the surge is based on the recognition that victory is impossible.

Bacevich: In the wake of Vietnam, the army in particular wanted to run away from counterinsurgency as fast as it possibly could, and return to the business of conventional war. Experiences in Desert Storm in 1991 and in the second Iraq War in 2003 for a time seemed to show that the U.S. military had figured out how to gain a quick and decisive victory. That was an illusion that the insurgencies in Iraq and now in Afghanistan have dispatched. The counterinsurgency doctrine revised by Petraeus in effect declares that there is no such thing as a military solution to conflicts like these, and certainly there is no such thing as military victory. That may not seem odd to many people, but the whole notion that victory is possible forms the basis of the military profession's claim to have a distinct professional existence.

McNally—and value.

Bacevich: Because if we can't count on the army to win the war quickly and expeditiously, then why would we ever go to war in the first place?

McNally: Right. You need to say, "Wait a minute, we have to consider the tools of soft power and other forms of engagement because military force has enormous cost—and if it can't ensure success..."

Bacevich: We've spent probably close to a trillion dollars on the Iraq war. Had we instead spent a trillion dollars elsewhere in the Islamic world promoting education programs or economic development or women's rights, would we have gotten more for our money? Even a skeptic of soft power like me would say, I have no doubt that we would have gotten more.

McNally: In an op-ed in the New York Times, Nick Kristof wrote that at the cost of $1 million per soldier per year in Afghanistan, that same money could open 20 schools.

Based on the fact that counterinsurgency recognizes the unlikelihood of victory, I want you to respond to this statement by Obama: "The United States of America does not quit once it starts on something. You don't quit. The American armed services does not quit, we keep at it, we persevere and together with our partners we will prevail. I am absolutely confident of that."

Bacevich: I don't know why he says things like that. My assumption is that politicians always place politics at the heart of what they say and do, or at least they're surrounded by advisers who are acutely sensitive to the political considerations.

We have a president who embraced counterinsurgency in Afghanistan, and then proceeded preposterously to establish a deadline of the summer of 2011 to begin withdrawing U.S. forces. The likelihood of being able to successfully prosecute a counterinsurgency over a period of 18 months is not very great. So the president I think, come Dec., 2011, when political considerations will really be moving to center stage...

McNally: It won't be Congress he's worried about, but his own re-election.

Bacevich: Exactly right. How the heck he is going to deal with these "we never quit", "I know we will prevail" promises if the war is still going badly at that point? I think the President's going to be in a real fix.

McNally: Let me quote a July article you wrote called Non Believer, in which you contrast George Bush and Barack Obama. You write: "When Bush stands before his maker he will say without fear of contradiction, 'I did what I thought was right.' On the other hand, when called upon to account for his presidency, honesty will prevent Obama from making a comparable claim. 'The problems I inherited were difficult ones,' he will say. 'None of the choices were good ones. Things were complicated.' The question demands to be asked, who is more deserving of contempt: the commander in chief who sends young Americans to die for a cause, however misguided, in which he sincerely believes, or the commander in chief who sends young Americans to die for a cause in which he manifestly does not believe and yet refuses to forsake?"

Bacevich: I think with the Afghanistan decision, the President was trying to finesse a set of problems. At that point, I think he wanted to spend his chips on certain domestic reform propositions: healthcare and economic stimulus. My guess is that he or those around him decided that to take on the Washington Rules would have been very difficult. Indeed it would have been.

My guess is that he decided that the more expedient course was to continue to play along with the Washington Rules in Afghanistan, to make good on his domestic reform plans, and then go back to the war. My belief is that it's going to be too late; that having become Obama's war, it is not something that he's going to be able to easily back away from in 2011. Yet, if he persists in fighting Obama's war, then many of us who supported him for the presidency in the first place are going to wonder if maybe our votes should go elsewhere.

McNally: At this point let's turn to the deeper question: we can't expect you to read the President's mind, his advisers' mind, or that of anyone who's been in power for the last 50 years—but what is it that keeps the Washington Rules going despite the failure in Vietnam, the fall of the Soviet Union, plus Iraq, Afghanistan, and all of the other adventures? Under Reagan, Bush Sr. and Clinton, the use of force became more frequent and less controversial. Who are they beholden to? What is the calculus that keeps them doing this when it seems to have so much downside?

Bacevich: Well, there's a downside for the country, but the Washington Rules benefit Washington. They provide enormous profit for the military industrial complex. Out of those profits come campaign contributions to members of Congress, who are always worried about reelection. They justify the budget of the Pentagon and the intelligence community; they provide a source of prerogatives for institutions and for people; they allow ambitious military officers and senior officials to believe that they are engaged in important and historic events; and they create the rush that I think so many journalists seek; nobody gets more excited about war than the press.

McNally: They love their pictures in a war zone.

Bacevich: The Washington Rules persist partly because we the people are conditioned to think that there are no alternatives, and therefore we've lost our ability to think critically. But more importantly, they persist because they deliver a variety of goods to Washington itself.

McNally: Finally, if you could look back from a decade in the future—It's 2020, did the U.S. turn things around in this regard? And if your answer is no, what were some of the consequences; if your answer is yes, how did we do it?

Bacevich: My guess is that we will not have turned it around. The only way that we will is if the American people become truly cognizant of the negative effects of persisting in the Washington Rules. Effectively the volunteer army means that most of us don't really share in the service and sacrifice of perpetual war. The fact that wars are funded through deficit spending means that we don't even feel them in our pocket book. If there is some further economic calamity, or—and I obviously don't want this to happen—if there is some further 9/11 style calamity, perhaps that would jolt Americans into a recognition that something is fundamentally amiss and something needs to change. My guess, however, is that it's not all that likely.

(Read an excerpt from Bacevich's new book, Washington Rules, on TomDispatch.com. Interviewer Terrence McNally hosts Free Forum on KPFK 90.7FM, Los Angeles and WBA 199.5FM, New York (streaming at kpfk.org and wbai.org). He also advises nonprofits and foundations on communications. Visit terrencemcnally.net for podcasts of all interviews and more.)

© 2010 Independent Media Institute.

Check out this list of American military bases and ask yourself: Why?

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_United_States_military_bases

20100908-01	00:49	Dick	Fw: What You Won't Hear from President Obama on Foreign Policy
-------------	-------	------	---

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

You can bet we won't be hearing it from the current president!!!

WOULDN'T IT BE GREAT TO TURN ON THE TV AND HEAR ANY U.S. PRESIDENT, DEMOCRAT OR REPUBLICAN, GIVE THE FOLLOWING SPEECH?

"My Fellow Americans: As you all know, the defeat of the Iraq regime has been completed.

Since Congress does not want to spend any more money on this war, our mission in Iraq is complete. This morning I gave the order for a complete removal of all American forces from Iraq. This action will be complete within 30 days. It is now time to begin the reckoning.

Before me, I have two lists. One list contains the names of countries which have stood by our side during the Iraq conflict. This list is short: The United Kingdom, Spain, Bulgaria, Australia, and Poland are some of the countries listed there.

The other list contains every one not on the first list. Most of the world's nations are on that list. My press secretary will be distributing copies of both lists later this evening.

Let me start by saying that effective immediately, foreign aid to those nations on List 2 ceases indefinitely. The money saved during the first year alone will pretty much pay for the costs of the Iraqi war. THEN EVERY YEAR THEREAFTER IT'LL GO TO OUR SOCIAL SECURITY SYSTEM SO IT WON'T GO BROKE IN 20 YEARS.

The American people are no longer going to pour money into third world Hell holes and watch those government leaders grow fat on corruption. Need help with a famine? Wrestling with an epidemic? Call France.

In the future, together with Congress, I will work to redirect this money toward solving the vexing social problems we still have at home. On that note, a word to terrorist organizations. Screw with us and we will hunt you down and eliminate you and all your friends from the face of the earth. Thirsting for a gutsy country to terrorize? Try France or maybe China.

I am ordering the immediate severing of diplomatic relations with France and Russia. Thanks for all your help, comrades. We are retiring from NATO as well. I have instructed the Mayor of New York City to begin towing the many UN diplomatic vehicles located in Manhattan with more than two unpaid parking tickets to sites where those vehicles will be stripped, shredded and crushed. I don't care about whatever treaty pertains to this. You creeps have tens of thousands of unpaid tickets. Pay those tickets tomorrow or watch your precious Benzes, Beamers and limos be turned over to some of the finest chop shops in the world. I love New York.

A special note to our neighbors: Canada is on List 2. Since we are likely to be seeing a lot more of each other, you folks might want to try not p*ssing us off for a change. Mexico is also on List 2. Its president and his entire corrupt government really need an attitude adjustment. I will have a couple thousand extra tanks and infantry divisions sitting around. Guess where I am going to put 'em? Yep, border security.

Oh, by the way, the United States is abrogating the NAFTA treaty—starting now. We are tired of the one-way highway. Immediately, we'll be drilling for oil in Alaska—which will take care of this country's oil needs for decades to come. If you're an environmentalist who opposes this decision, I refer you to List 2 above: pick a country and move there. It is time for America to focus on its own welfare and its own citizens. Some will accuse us of isolationism. I answer them by saying, 'darn tootin.'

Nearly a century of trying to help folks live a decent life around the world has only earned us the undying enmity of just about everyone on the planet. It is time to eliminate hunger in America . It is time to eliminate homelessness in America. To the nations on List 1, a final thought. Thank you guys. We owe you and we won't forget. To the nations on List 2, a final thought: You might want to learn to speak Arabic.

God bless America. Thank you and good night. If you can read this in English, thank a soldier.

20100908-02	14:57	Dennis	"The Great American Stickup: How the Political Class Mugged America & Handed the Money Over to Wall St."
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Did the meltdown of the U.S. economy start with Clinton?

Did liberal Clinton Democrats collude with Wall Street to wreck the U.S. economy? Is Obama still part of the problem? Whatever you may think now, the following discussion will surely be of interest...

"The Great American Stickup: How the Political Class Mugged America and Handed the Money Over to Wall St." by Amy Goodman and Robert Scheer, Democracy Now!

Sept. 7, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148107/>)

Goodman: As we continue our discussion on the state of the economy, we're visited by veteran journalist and Truthdig.com editor Robert Scheer. His book is just out; it's called The Great American Stickup: How Reagan Republicans and Clinton Democrats Enriched Wall Street While Mugging Main Street. What is wrong with the economy today? And how did we get here?

Scheer: Well, you know, you say a longtime journalist. I worked for the Los Angeles Times as a national reporter, and I covered these hearings in Washington when the Clinton Administration in the '90s basically fulfilled the promise of the Reagan Revolution. Reagan was not able to reverse the sensible regulations of the New Deal of Franklin Delano Roosevelt designed to prevent us from getting into another depression. And those regulations of Glass-Steagall, which Feingold was against, said that investment banks playing with supposedly rich people's money should not be allowed to merge with commercial banks that were using the deposits of people that were insured by the taxpayers and that these were different activities. And Reagan could never pull off that kind of deregulation. In fact, because of the savings and loan scandal at the end of his term, he actually had to sign off on increased financial regulation. But when Clinton came in, he brought in one of the big players on Wall Street, Robert Rubin, who has been head of Goldman Sachs, and basically turned to him and said, "You know, what do I need to do to get Wall Street on my side?" And they said, reverse what they considered to be onerous financial regulation. And Clinton delivered on that. He brought in Rubin then to be his Treasury secretary, who was followed by Lawrence Summers, who's now the top economic adviser in the Obama White House.

And in addition to the Gramm bill that reversed Glass-Steagall, he did something even more significant for our current crisis. He—after Summers had pushed it through Congress—signed off on the Commodity Futures Modernization Act of 2000. He was already a lame duck president. It was in the closing weeks of his administration. And this is the source of our whole problem, really, in terms of the housing meltdown, because we had these suspect derivatives that sensible people in the administration, like Brooksley Born, had warned against. No one knew what these toxic investments all about, the bundling of mortgages, which is what encouraged all of the wild subprime and Alt-A financing, because they were then going to be packaged together, made into securities, and then backed by credit default swaps, and all of this stuff that really didn't exist. It certainly didn't exist in Adam Smith's capitalism, but it didn't really exist even in Ronald Reagan's capitalism. This newfangled—these gimmicks that were developed and spiraled wildly out of control were made possible because of that Commodity Futures Modernization Act, which Clinton signed and which said in Titles III and IV, no existing government regulation, no existing government regulatory body, will be allowed to supervise these credit default swaps, these collateralized debt obligations that were there.

And as a result, we had this wild run-up of irresponsible mortgage lending. The banks no longer did, as in the old days, worry about whether you could make your payments, whether there was value in the house, because they weren't going to hold that mortgage for thirty years like in the old days. They were going to sell it, you know? And that wild run-up of the market—I call it the Clinton bubble. I think his administration deserves or should be given the main responsibility. And that is at the source of our problem. And this has not gone away. This is why we're threatened with a possible 'nother steep decline, or we're threatened with a decade of Japanese-type stagnation. And the reason is because we now, taxpayers, are holding, you know, trillions of dollars of this stuff, these toxic investments. And as a result, housing right now is in a terrible state of affairs. There are 11 million homeowners that are underwater. They owe more on their mortgages than their houses. That translates to about 50 million people living in houses that are now worth less than what they owe on them, and they're tempted to walk away from them. That's why we don't have any consumer demand. And it's not just the people who are in trouble with their own houses, which is a tragic enough story, but even if somebody's made every payment, even if they own their home outright. If you foreclose a house or two in that neighborhood, it brings everyone else down.

And all this stuff that Obama has been talking about really does not meet the problem. And the basic problem is, instead of throwing money at Wall Street, which is what Bush did and what Obama continued to do, you should have had a moratorium on housing foreclosures. You should have said, "OK, Wall Street, we'll help you, but you are now going to be forced, through bankruptcy courts, new rules we're going to put in place, to adjust people's mortgages so they can stay in their home." And all this malarkey about "We'll do more infrastructure," you know, and so—they always do that. We'll spend $50 billion on this—what he said in Wisconsin. What is that $50 billion? It's chump change compared to, say, the $300 billion of toxic investments by one group, Robert Rubin's bank, Citigroup. He went, after he left the administration, to be a top big shot at Citigroup, made possible by the reversal of Glass-Steagall. And, you know, $300 billion. So compare that to the $50 billion they're going to do for infrastructure for the whole nation.

And I think the sad thing about Obama—you know, obviously, I supported him. I wrote columns thinking he was going to be great. An enormous disappointment. Somebody—no one can explain to me—I haven't seen a satisfactory explanation. But in my book, I reprint the speech that Obama gave in the spring of '08, when he was a candidate. And it came three months after Robert Rubin had given a speech at Cooper Union saying we had no financial problem, we had no crisis. Three months later, Obama, at that same Cooper Union, said, you know, this is all due to reversal of Glass-Steagall, all due to reckless, radical deregulation. He spelled it out. And then, you know, mysteriously—maybe not so mysteriously when you think that Wall Street became his biggest, financial community became his biggest campaign contributor—he turned to the disciples of Robert Rubin—the Lawrence Summers, Timothy Geithner, the very people that had, with Rubin, created this mess—and said, "OK, you guys, fix it all." And they haven't fixed it. They've taken care of Wall Street. And as my subtitle in my book said, they mugged Main Street.

Goodman: Robert, you said this is what President Obama should have done. For example, a moratorium on all bankruptcies. What should he do now? Why "should have"? What could he do starting today?

Scheer: Oh, immediately he should push for bankruptcy courts to have the power to force the banks to readjust these mortgages. You know, we picked up their bad paper. Why don't they help people now who are stuck? You know, the basic idea of the New Deal was that these were not innocent victims of Wall Street scams. So we have—this is why you have all this anger in the tea party and everything else. It's very legitimate.

I'm not one of—and by the way, you mentioned Feingold in your—it would be a tragedy to lose Feingold. If there's one person in the United States Congress that has called this correctly, that has stood up for the interest of ordinary people, it's Russ Feingold. I mean, I can't think—you know, maybe Bernie Sanders, but Russ Feingold has been at it longer in the Senate. I mean, he just has been right on this stuff from day one. And the idea that rage about what's happened to the economy is now going to take its toll on him, the one guy who—one of the few who got it right, is really frightening. But that's what happens when you have an economic breakdown. We saw it in Germany, for God's sake. You know, you look—the demagogues scapegoat all the people. You know, they scapegoat immigrants. And what you have now is a lot of money, a lot of money, from the big banks and everyone else, going into lunatics' camp—the campaign of lunatics. But why? Because, "Oh, get government off our back. You know, big government," ignoring the fact that, you know, this government did not get big and the debt did not rise because we're trying to help firemen or school teachers keep their jobs. It happened because we have, literally, through the Fed and through the federal government, spent, you know, what? Three, four—committed three, four trillion dollars to make the banks whole.

So when you say what we should do right now, Obama could call for a moratorium. A moratorium, what? Two, three years on mortgage foreclosures. You know, that's what you do when you're facing a crisis. He could call for and push through a regulation, as well as legislation, saying the bankruptcy courts—remember, we had the change in bankruptcy law to hurt consumers, make it harder for consumers to declare bankruptcy. Well, they could push for new regulation, new laws, say, no, we're not going to leave it voluntarily, as he's now doing with the banks to somehow make readjustments of which there have been very few, has not dealt with the problem. They should say, no, this is the ball game right now. The ball game is keeping people in their homes. The ball game is preventing all those boarded-up buildings in suburbs of South Florida, Riverside, California.

I mean, if you travel in this country, there's enormous pain, because people's life savings, their sense of their worth, their piece of the American Dream, were tied up in their family. When you lose that home or when you're suffering or you're facing foreclosure, you lose not only your pride, you lose your ability to retire, to send your kids to school. I mean, the dreams of Americans are wrapped up in their home. And I don't know why we're talking about anything else right now. If we want to get the economy going again, if we want to get people back to work, if we want to get consumption up, what you've got to do is help people with that nest and that nest egg, which is their home. And there's very little, precious little in Obama's speeches, and certainly almost nothing in his actions, to help those homeowners.

Goodman: And how do you help people who don't have a home?

Scheer: Well, you know, I know—there's lots of things to do to help people home. But let me tell you, this is not a division between haves and have-nots when it comes to home owning. And one of my anger with some of the liberals around in the Democratic Party who supported this deregulation, they said this was going to help minority people get homes. You know, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were as rapacious as any—as Citigroup or Goldman Sachs. And the so-called liberal—this is dealt with in great detail in my book, which takes very few prisoners on either side, in either party. But Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, with the support of people like Barney Frank and even many in the Black Caucus, said, "No, no, don't touch Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. They'll help poor people get into their homes." Sure, a lot of minorities got into homes. They lost their savings. They're now hurting. They can't hold on to their homes. They're being foreclosed. So, you know, the dream of American housing was not a have/have-not thing. It was supposed to be emancipation of Americans. It was supposed to be of them a piece of the pie.

So, first thing is, if we do this thing of keeping people in homes, we're helping a lot of working people and poorer people. This is not something to benefit the rich. The rich make out like bandits in this kind of market. But secondly, if we can't put a floor on housing foreclosures, if we can't stem this bleeding right now, we're not going to get consumption back, you know, and if we don't get consumption back, because people were consuming based on their sense of what they're worth, we're not going to get the jobs back—jobs in construction, but jobs generally. And so, I would not divide the interest of homeowners and keeping them in their homes from the rest of the population.

Goodman: Robert Scheer, your last chapter, "Sucking Up to the Bankers: Crisis Handoff from Bush to Obama"—has Obama done anything different about the economy than Bush, do you feel?

Scheer: No. Obama has been a disaster. And I say this as someone who was suckered into contributing to his campaign financially. You know, my wife maxed out in her contributions, pushing those buttons every time. I still get emails from the Obama campaign telling "We're winning here, we're winning there." But it's been a disaster. Now, maybe, you know, if he could appoint Elizabeth Warren, you know, to the consumer agency, there will be a little bit of value in this deregulation—in this new regulation.

Goodman: What about that?

Scheer: Russ Feingold was absolutely right to vote against it. Hello?

Goodman: But what about Elizabeth Warren, seen as the frontrunner for this job, but seen as a—there's a quiet campaign in the White House, or perhaps not so quiet, among people like Rahm Emanuel, who supposedly, rumor has it, are opposing her?

Scheer: Yeah, well, look, come on. You can't look to the Democratic Party, you know, hacks, for leadership on this. First of all, most of these people are veterans of the Clinton administration. They're the same people who destroyed Brooksley Born. Brooksley Born was one of the most competent lawyers in this country, dealing—she represented banks. She understood more about these derivatives than anyone around, actually, when she was appointed to what was supposed to be a lesser agency, you know, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. And she spotted this problem. You know, seventeen times in testimony before congressional committees, Brooksley Born sounded the alarm that there was going to be a housing meltdown, that this thing had gone wild, that we had enabled Wall Street graft. She knew the inside outside. It was people like Summers, who's now in this administration, I think, who don't want Elizabeth Warren—Timothy Geithner, and there are plenty of others. There are many Goldman Sachs veterans and other big Wall Street veterans in this administration, as well. And they destroyed Brooksley Born. And they're threatened by Elizabeth Warren, because Elizabeth Warren represents consumers. She's a brilliant legal mind, and just as Brooksley Born is. And Elizabeth Warren said, "Wait a minute. You know, what kind of, you know, government is this, when you're caring about Wall Street and you're ignoring the pain out there?"

And I have to stress this, Amy. This is not some abstract—you know, I studied economics in graduate school, and I could do some mathematical modeling and all that stuff. This is not a game. It's not a political game. It's not a mathematics game. They're real human beings who invest their whole life putting shelter over their family, caring about their family. And when you go out in these communities—and I've done some of that—you know, it's so depressing. You know, I mean, I talked to people in Riverside who cleaned office buildings, you know, in Long Beach and commuted to Riverside so their kids could live in a better neighborhood. And they bought this house, and they made the payments. They made the payments. They did everything they were supposed to do. And the neighborhood went into the toilet, and they lose everything. They lose everything. And that story is repeated millions of times in America.

And the guys who did it to us, they weren't those vicious right-wingers. And, you know, it wasn't all the people that we liberals like to attack. It was our friends. Let's get that straight, you know? When I call this the Clinton bubble, you know, I mean it very seriously. It was our friends. It was people, you know, like the heads of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, who claim to be liberal Democrats. But they were being rewarded with enormous bonuses. You know, enormous bonuses. They made out just as well as the people running Citigroup. These were not government agencies.

These were actually traded on the stock market, but posing as government supported agencies. And the fact of the matter is that the damage that was done to us was done by people who talk a very good game. You know, Robert Rubin contributed money to the Harlem dance group, you know? Jesse Jackson even supported the reversal of Glass-Steagall. There's a whole chapter in my book, you know? The people who acted in a very bad way, in this book, were people who we would probably be more comfortable talking to, you know, over a drink somewhere than the others. So, you know, my book, you know, it's called How Reagan Democrats—Reagan Republicans and Clinton Democrats Enriched Wall Street and Mugged Main Street. And the Clinton Democrats, who now control the Obama administration, are—you know, this is turning the henhouse over to the foxes. And I would say the record of Obama on this has been abysmal. He has been a front man for Wall Street, and it is shocking.

Goodman: Robert Scheer, I want to thank you very much for being with us, longtime journalist based in California, worked for the Los Angeles Times for some thirty years, editor at Truthdig.com, author of many books. The latest, just out today in paperback, is The Great American Stickup: How Reagan Republicans and Clinton Democrats Enriched Wall Street While Mugging Main Street.

(Amy Goodman is the host of the nationally syndicated radio news program, Democracy Now!. Robert Scheer is Editor in Chief of Truthdig, where he publishes a weekly column, and author of a new book, The Pornography of Power: How Defense Hawks Hijacked 9/11 and Weakened America. © 2010 Democracy Now!)

20100908-03	19:37	Tom	"President's Socialist Takeover Must be Stopped"
-------------	-------	-----	--

The case for impeachment...

"President's Socialist Takeover Must be Stopped" by Jeffrey T. Kuhner, The Washington Times

July 22, 2010, (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/jul/22/the-case-for-impeachment-142967590/>)

President Obama has engaged in numerous high crimes and misdemeanors. The Democratic majority in Congress is in peril as Americans reject his agenda. Yet more must be done: Mr. Obama should be impeached.

He is slowly - piece by painful piece - erecting a socialist dictatorship. We are not there - yet. But he is putting America on that dangerous path. He is undermining our constitutional system of checks and balances; subverting democratic procedures and the rule of law; presiding over a corrupt, gangster regime; and assaulting the very pillars of traditional capitalism. Like Venezuela's leftist strongman, Hugo Chavez, Mr. Obama is bent on imposing a revolution from above - one that is polarizing America along racial, political and ideological lines. Mr. Obama is the most divisive president since Richard Nixon. His policies are Balkanizing the country. It's time for him to go.

He has abused his office and violated his oath to uphold the Constitution. His health care overhaul was rammed through Congress. It was - and remains - opposed by a majority of the people. It could only be passed through bribery and political intimidation. The Louisiana Purchase, the Cornhusker Kickback, the $5 billion Medicaid set-aside for Florida Sen. Bill Nelson - taxpayer money was used as a virtual slush fund to buy swing votes. Moreover, the law is blatantly unconstitutional: The federal government does not have the right to coerce every citizen to purchase a good or service. This is not in the Constitution, and it represents an unprecedented expansion of power.

Yet Obamacare's most pernicious aspect is its federal funding of abortion. Pro-lifers are now compelled to have their tax dollars used to subsidize insurance plans that allow for the murder of unborn children. This is more than state-sanctioned infanticide. It violates the conscience rights of religious citizens. Traditionalists - evangelicals, Catholics, Baptists, Muslims, Orthodox Jews - have been made complicit in an abomination that goes against their deepest religious values. As the law is implemented (as in Pennsylvania) the consequences of the abortion provisions will become increasingly apparent. The result will be a cultural civil war. Pro-lifers will become deeply alienated from society; among many, a secession of the heart is taking place.

Mr. Obama is waging a frontal assault on property rights. The BP oil spill is a case in point. BP clearly is responsible for the spill and its massive economic and environmental damage to the Gulf. There is a legal process for claims to be adjudicated, but Mr. Obama has behaved more like Mr. Chavez or Russia's Vladimir Putin: He has bullied BP into setting up a $20 billion compensation fund administered by an Obama appointee. In other words, the assets of a private company are to be raided to serve a political agenda. Billions will be dispensed arbitrarily in compensation to oil-spill victims - much of it to Democratic constituents. This is cronyism and creeping authoritarianism.

Mr. Obama's multicultural socialism seeks to eradicate traditional America. He has created a command-and-control health care system. He has essentially nationalized the big banks, the financial sector, the automakers and the student loan industry. He next wants to pass "cap-and-trade," which would bring industry and manufacturing under the heel of big government. The state is intervening in every aspect of American life - beyond its constitutionally delegated bounds. Under Mr. Obama, the Constitution has become a meaningless scrap of paper.

To provide the shock troops for his socialist takeover, Mr. Obama calls for "comprehensive immigration reform" - granting amnesty to 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens. This would forge a permanent Democratic electoral majority. It would sound the death knell for our national sovereignty. Amnesty rewards lawlessness and criminal behavior; it signifies the surrender of our porous southern border to a massive illegal invasion. It means the death of American nationhood. We will no longer be a country, but the colony of a global socialist empire.

Rather than defending our homeland, Mr. Obama's Justice Department has sued Arizona for its immigration law. He is siding with criminals against his fellow Americans. His actions desecrate his constitutional oath to protect U.S. citizens from enemies foreign and domestic. He is thus encouraging more illegal immigration as Washington refuses to protect our borders. Mr. Obama's decision on this case is treasonous.

As president, he is supposed to respect the rule of law. Instead, his administration has dropped charges of voter intimidation against members of the New Black Panther Party. This was done even though their menacing behavior was caught on tape: men in military garb brandishing clubs and threatening whites at a polling site. A Justice Department lawyer intimately involved in the case, J. Christian Adams, resigned in protest. Mr. Adams says that under Mr. Obama, there is a new policy: Cases involving black defendants and white victims - no matter how much they cry for justice - are not to be prosecuted. This is more than institutionalized racism. It is an abrogation of civil rights laws. The Justice Department's behavior is illegal. It poses a direct threat to the integrity of our democracy and the sanctity of our electoral process.

Corruption in the administration is rampant. Washington no longer has a government; rather, it has a gangster regime. The Chicago way has become the Washington way. Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel is a political hit man. He is an amoral, ruthless operator. It was Mr. Emanuel who reached out to Rep. Joe Sestak, Pennsylvania Democrat, offering a high-ranking job in the hopes of persuading Mr. Sestak to pull out of the primary against Sen. Arlen Specter. It was Mr. Emanuel who offered another government position to Andrew Romanoff to do the same in the Colorado Democratic Senate primary. And it was Mr. Emanuel - as the trial of former Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich has revealed - who acted as the go-between to try to have Valerie Jarrett parachuted into Mr. Obama's former Senate seat. The only question was: What did Mr. Blagojevich want in exchange?

This is not simply sleazy Chicago machine politics. It is the systematic breaking of the law - bribery, attempt to interfere (and manipulate) elections using taxpayer-funded jobs, influence peddling and abuse of power.

The common misperception on the right is that Mr. Obama is another Jimmy Carter: an incompetent liberal whose presidency is being reduced to rubble under the onslaught of repeated failures. The very opposite, however, is true. He is the most consequential president in our lifetime, transforming America into something our Founding Fathers would find not only unrecognizable, but repugnant. Like all radical revolutionaries, he is consumed by the pursuit of power - attaining it, wielding it and maximizing it. Mr. Obama's fledgling thug state must be stopped.

If Republicans win back Congress in November, they should - and likely will - launch formal investigations into this criminal, scandal-ridden administration. Rep. Darrell Issa, California Republican and ranking member of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has promised as much. Mr. Obama has betrayed the American people. Impeachment is the only answer. This usurper must fall.

(Jeffrey T. Kuhner is a columnist at The Washington Times and president of the Edmund Burke Institute, a Washington think tank. He is the host of "The Kuhner Show" on WTNT 570-AM (www.talk570.com) from 5 to 7 p.m.)

© Copyright 2010 The Washington Times, LLC.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Other articles by Jeffrey T. Kuhner: [Very instructional as to possible bias. :-) —SteveB]

- "How Obama Lost Iraq" (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/sep/2/how-obama-lost-iraq/>)
- "Bloomberg for President?" (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/aug/26/bloomberg-for-president/>)
- "Obama's Islamic Agenda" (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/aug/19/obamas-islamic-agenda/>)
- "Why God Is Great" (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/aug/12/why-god-is-great/>)
- "Radical Islam's Conquest of America" (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2010/aug/5/radical-islams-conquest-of-america/>)

Comments... [On the webpage are crazy enough to make entertaining reading. —SteveB]

20100909-01 07:10 SteveB Re: "President's Socialist Takeover Must be Stopped"

Dear Tom,

What a crock! Show me one single invasion of the Constitution equivalent to that of Bush, etc. This article cleverly presents zero evidence of anything.

This "socialist", "communist" pack of lies is being trotted out because everything else is failing for our precious little Republicans. When that happens, they crank-up the "big lie" machine, just as they did in the last election. Ho-hum! I just hope the American people turn-out to be smart enough not to believe these lies.

America has serious problems. Why is the right doing nothing but screaming lies and names and crying like a bunch of silly babies, while the left implements its agenda? Why don't the Republicans get busy and do some work, like they were elected to do?

20100909-02 07:27 SteveB Re: "The Great American Stickup..."
--

Dear Dennis and Lianne,

I have no axe to grind, but this article gets at a lot of truth, it seems to me.

I don't mind saying Obama ain't perfect. Funny, though, I don't hear any Republicans expressing any opposition to any part of their stupid agenda, which has already been rejected many, many times by the American people...no abortion, indeed! Creationism, indeed! Free trade, indeed! Business (corruption) as usual, indeed! De-regulation, indeed!

"Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson" by Michael Moore

Sept. 7, 2010 (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148106/>)

Dear Rahm Emanuel,

I read this week that—according to a new book by Steven Rattner, your administration's former "Car Czar"—during White House meetings about how to save the tens of thousands of jobs that would be lost if GM and Chrysler collapsed, your response was, "F*ck the UAW!"

Now, I can't believe you actually said that. Maybe Rattner got confused because you drop a lot of F-bombs, or maybe your assistant was trying to order lunch and you said (to Rattner) "F*ck you" and then to your assistant "A&W, no fries."

Or maybe you did mean F*ck the UAW. If so, let me give you a little f*cking lesson (a lesson I happen to know because my f*cking uncle was in the sit-down strike that founded the f*cking UAW).

Before there were unions, there was no middle class. Working people didn't get to send their kids to college, few were able to own their own f*cking home, nobody could take a f*cking day off for a funeral or a sick day or they might lose their f*cking job.

Then working people organized themselves into unions. The bosses and the companies f*cking hated that. In fact, they were often overheard to say, "F*ck the UAW!!!" That's because the UAW had beaten one of the world's biggest industrial corporations when they won their battle on Feb. 11, 1937, 44 days after they'd taken over the GM factories in Flint. Inspired by their victory, workers struck almost every other f*cking industry, and union after union was born. Had World War II not begun and had FDR not died, there would have been an economic revolution that would have given everyone—everyone—a f*cking decent life.

Nonetheless labor unions did create a middle class for the majority (even companies that didn't have unions were forced to pay at or near union wages in order to attract a workforce) and that middle class built a great country and a good life. You see, Rahm, when people earn a f*cking good wage, they spend it on stuff, which then creates more good paying jobs, and then the middle class grows f*cking big. Did you know that back when I was a kid if you had a parent making a union wage, only one parent had to work?! And they were home by 3 or 4 pm, 5:30 at the latest! We had dinner together! Dad had four weeks paid vacation. We all had free health and dental care. And anyone with decent grades went to college and it didn't f*cking bankrupt them. (And if you ever used the F-word, the nuns would straighten you out in ways that even you couldn't bear to hear about).

Then a Republican fired all the air traffic controllers, a Democrat gave us NAFTA and millions of jobs were moved overseas (hey, didn't you work in that White House, too? "F*ck the UAW, baby!"). Unions got scared and beaten down, a frat boy became president and, like a drunk out of control, spent all our f*cking money and our children's money, too. F*ck.

And now your assistant's grandma has to work at f*cking McDonald's. Ask her for pictures of what the middle class life used to look like. It was effing cool! I'll bet grandma doesn't say "F*ck the UAW!"

Hey, don't get me wrong, Rahm. I f*cking like you. You single-handedly got the House returned to the Dems in 2006. But you and your boss better do something f*cking quick to put people back to work. How 'bout making it a crime to take an American job and move it out of the country? In other words, treat it as if it were a f*cking national treasure like you would if someone stole the Declaration of Independence out of the National Archives or some poacher stole eggs out of the nest of an America bald eagle.

Or how 'bout arresting some of those Wall Street guys who f*cking stole our money, the money that ran the American economy. Now that would take some f*cking guts. And maybe, just maybe, that one act of real guts might save your a*s come Nov. 2nd.

Oh, I can just hear you now: "F*ck Michael Moore!" No problem. But F*ck the UAW? How 'bout if I just leave off the 'A' and the 'W'?

Yours, Michael Moore

(Michael Moore is an Academy Award-winning filmmaker and author. He directed and produced Rogue & Me, Bowling for Columbine, Fahrenheit 9/11, and Sicko. He has also written seven books, most recently, Mike's Election Guide 2008)

© 2010 MichaelMoore.com

20100909-04 08:23 SteveB Re: "Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"

It's so sad to me how truly uneducated we Americans are any more. Most of the rest of us seem subject to brainwashing. That doesn't leave very many thinking, knowing people to keep things going in a positive direction (for most of us). One of the greatest examples of all this is how the right, essentially unchallenged, has re-written the true history and nature of the unions. Gee, that was in our interest, of course? Next, they'll be telling us Ahmajizzardom is right and there was no Holocaust? There was one...right...?

In the end, one party or the other (or...long shot...a third?) is eventually going to have to face, wrestle, and throw to the carpet this beast with three heads, called "Money", "Power", and "Greed", aided and abetted by its two powerful swords, "Damned lies" and "Bigger damned lies"). Otherwise...we are all nothing but slaves already...

Maybe it is time for the pu*sy politicians to engage in that fight, and rather sooner than later (Big Money doesn't seem to be losing any power anywhere in the world.) Unions? Sorry, we got child slaves in sweatshops all over the world doing our bidding now. Of course, the goods had better be cheap, 'cause we don't have many real jobs any more.

We opened-up Free Trade, we crushed the unions (or allowed their crushing), we opened our borders as if they were the legs of a Tijuana slut (thought you'd like that one). We "leveled the playing field". We made America poorer and grew more debt-ridden. We made the world the sweatshop for the world. We re-made the world in the image of America. Now, almost the whole world thinks it needs to be part of that image of America. And they think they need the automobiles, the energy, and all the other consumption to be part of that image. Duhhhh, let me see...who just happens to be selling that very stuff? The same Big Money that has now moved the world into this dangerous and precarious age.

20100909-05 18:25 Dennis Re: "Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"

Dear SteveB,

In a message dated 9/9/10 8:06:55 am, SteveB writes:

It's so sad to me how truly uneducated we Americans are any more.

Hope you don't mind that I borrowed your "cure for stupid" line for my signature. I'm using it in all communications with my brothers and cousins.

"In the United Stupid of America, there is no cure for stupid!" —Steven W, Baker (SteveB)

20100909-06 18:40 SteveB Re: "Michael Moore Teaches Rahm Emanuel a F*cking Economics Lesson"

Dear Dennis,

Cool! I'm flattered!

20100910-01 07:59 Laurel Fw: The Photos Say It All

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

The photos say it all!

Self explanatory: Just look at the paraphernalia that his "aides" have to carry into a school in order for him to speak to school kids. Unbelievable! I think these 2 pictures make some kind of statement!!!!!!!!!!

Here is what Obama needs set up to talk to a few school children. Not much room for kids. Still needs to have the Teleprompters. The secret service guy in back keeps eyes out for any terrorist-type-8-year-olds with tea partying parents. His I.Q. gives him away!!!

Here's what the last guy needed:

Dear SteveB,

When the article is couched in terminology full of emotional bias it makes me suspect of the goals of the author. I wonder if he really went to Bachman's rally to observe the "rapt attention" of the audience. Second why is George Soros ok for the liberals and Koch is not. Perhaps Soros is giving the liberals lots of entertainment to distract them from reality. When you call someone a racist because his opinion is different than yours leave me cold. We do have to address social security, Medicare, public pensions, runaway budgets of all government departments because we are out of money. the wealth that we created after WWII is gone.

[It's not gone at all. It's just in the hands of a few. —SteveB]

If you want a classic case study of the world to come pay attention to what's going on in my town of Muncie. All the big corporations (members of the evil empire in author's opinion) are gone and with them all the tax dollars they paid as well as all the wages and benefits. We are left with Ball State, Ball Hospital and local government. none of them pay taxes and we don't have the revenues to continue business as usual, but nobody wants to make the hard choices and we are in gridlock. You can worry about the Tea Party, but look over your shoulder at the liberal democrats as they will tax us into socialism.

When it comes to Social Security...

20100917-01	11:42	Dennis	"This Country Just Can't Deal with Reality Any More"
-------------	-------	--------	--

When America went wacko...

"This Country Just Can't Deal with Reality Any More" by Robert Parry, Consortium News

Sept. 16, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148206/>)

As Election Day 2010 approaches—as the United States wallows in the swamps of war, recession and environmental degradation—the consequences of the nation's three-decade-old decoupling from reality are becoming painfully obvious.

Yet, despite the danger, the nation can't seem to move in a positive direction, as if the suctioning effect of endless spin, half-truths and lies holds the populace in place, a force that grows ever more powerful like quicksand sucking the country deeper into the muck—to waist deep, then neck deep.

Trapped in the mud, millions of Americans are complaining about their loss of economic status, their sense of powerlessness, their nation's decline. But instead of examining how the country stumbled into this morass, many still choose not to face reality.

Instead of seeking paths to the firmer ground of a reality-based world, people from different parts of the political spectrum have decided to embrace unreality even more, either cynically as a way to delegitimize a political opponent or because they've simply become addicted to the crazy.

The latest manifestation of the wackiness can be found in the rise of the Tea Party, a movement of supposedly grassroots, mad-as-hell regular Americans that is subsidized by wealthy corporate donors (such as the billionaire Koch brothers) seeking to ensure deregulation of their industries and to consolidate their elite control over the political process.

The Tea Party madness is aided and abetted by a now fully formed right-wing media apparatus that can popularize any false narrative (like Islam planning to conquer Christian America as represented by the building of an Islamic community center near Ground Zero).

The Right sees an advantage in spreading even the nuttiest of smears against President Barack Obama. So you have right-wing author Dinesh D'Souza and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich concocting a toxic brew of racist nonsense about Obama somehow channeling the anti-colonialism of his late Kenyan father.

"Incredibly, the U.S. is being ruled according to the dreams of a Luo tribesman of the 1950s," D'Souza wrote in Forbes. "This philandering, inebriated African socialist, who raged against the world for denying him the realization of his anti-colonial ambitions, is now setting the nation's agenda through the reincarnation of his dreams in his son." Incredibly, indeed.

The "factual" basis of this "analysis" apparently is that Obama entitled his touching story about his youth, Dreams of My Father, which was a book that focused on the absence of his father from his life. In a less crazy time, one might have expected D'Souza's claptrap to be denounced by politicians across the political spectrum, but that is not the time we live in.

Instead, Newt Gingrich, a leading figure in the Republican Party and a potential candidate for President in 2012, praised D'Souza's racist psycho-babble as the "most profound insight I have read in the last six years about Barack Obama," adding that D'Souza unlocked the mystery of who Obama is by addressing his "Kenyan, anti-colonial behavior."

Gingrich also pretended that he and D'Souza were the truth-tellers here, not just propagandists spreading a smear. Gingrich said they simply were unmasking Obama who has "played a wonderful con, as a result of which he is now president."

How It Happened

But how did the United States of America get here? How could the most powerful nation on earth with a sophisticated media that is constitutionally protected from government censorship have stumbled into today's dreary place filled with such up-is-down commentary?

As a journalist in Washington since 1977, I have had a front-row seat to this sad devolution of American reason. As the process advanced, I have at times felt like a Cassandra trying to warn others about the risks of abandoning fact and rationality in favor of propaganda of whatever stripe.

I also have watched Newt Gingrich since he was a freshman congressman in 1979, when I was a congressional correspondent for the Associated Press. Though I have met many politicians in my career and know they can be an egotistical bunch, Gingrich's burning ambition—his readiness to do whatever was necessary—stood out even then.

Unlike many other congressional Republicans of the time, Gingrich cared little for constructive governance but a great deal for political gamesmanship. He was already plotting his route to national power and was ready to use whatever tactics would advance his personal and ideological cause.

However, America's decoupling from reality—and its disappearance into the swamp of unreality—began in earnest with the rise of actor and ad pitchman Ronald Reagan, who crafted a host of get-something-for-nothing policies that appealed to a nation that was struggling to adjust to a more complex world.

Reagan promised that tax cuts tilted to the rich would generate more revenue and eliminate the federal debt; that this money also could finance a massive military buildup which would frighten America's enemies and restore national prestige; that freeing corporations from government regulations and from powerful unions would herald a new day of prosperity; that the country could turn its back on alternative energy and simply drill for more oil; that whites no longer had to feel guilty about the plight of blacks; that traditional "values"—i.e. rejection of the "counter-culture"—would bring back the good old days when men were men and women were women.

Despite the appeal of Reagan's message to many Americans, it was essentially an invitation to repudiate reality. Before joining Reagan's ticket as his vice presidential nominee, George H.W. Bush had famously denounced the tax-cut plan as "voodoo economics." Early in Reagan's presidency, his budget director David Stockman acknowledged that the tax cuts would flood the government in red ink.

But tax policy wasn't Reagan's only ignore-the-future policy. While rejecting President Jimmy Carter's warnings about the need for renewable energy sources, Reagan removed Carter's solar panels from the White House roof and left the nation dependent on oil. Reagan also led campaigns to break unions and to free corporations from many government regulations.

Scaring the Public

In foreign policy—although the Soviet Union was in rapid decline—Reagan put ideological blinders on the CIA's analysts to make sure they exaggerated the Soviet menace and justified his military buildup.

Reagan achieved this "politicization" of the CIA by placing in charge his campaign chief William Casey, who, in turn, picked a young CIA careerist named Robert Gates to purge the analytical division of its long tradition of objectivity. Gates arranged the scariest intelligence estimates possible.

Reagan also credentialed a group of young intellectuals who became known as the neoconservatives—the likes of Elliott Abrams, Richard Perle and Robert Kagan—who emerged from an elitist tradition (advocated by philosopher Leo Strauss) that it was their proper role to manipulate the less-educated masses and guide them in certain directions.

After Reagan gave the neocons oversight of his Central American policies, the neocons worked with seasoned CIA propagandists, like Walter Raymond Jr. who was moved over to the National Security Council, to develop what they called "perception management" strategies for controlling how the American people would see and understand things.

The neocons used fear, exaggeration and outright lying to get the American people behind Reagan's support for brutal military regimes in El Salvador and Guatemala and the contra rebels seeking to overthrow Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government. Truth was subordinated to policy.

Perception management operatives targeted honest journalists, human rights activists and congressional investigators who dug up unwanted facts that challenged Reagan's propaganda. To discredit truthful messages, the neocons "controversialized" the messengers.

These techniques proved very successful, in large part, because many senior executives at leading news outlets—from the AP where general manager Keith Fuller was a Reagan enthusiast to the New York Times where executive editor Abe Rosenthal was himself a neocon—sided with the propagandists against their own journalists. [For details on "perception management," see Robert Parry's Lost History.]

Meanwhile, the American Right began building its own media infrastructure with wealthy foundations footing the bills for a host of political magazines. Far-right religious cult leader Sun Myung Moon poured billions of mysterious dollars into the Washington Times and other media operations. [See Secrecy & Privilege.]

By contrast, the American Left mostly under-funded or even de-funded its scattered media outlets. Some, like Ramparts, were shuttered, while other formerly left-of center publications, such as The New Republic and The Atlantic, changed hands to neocon and conservative owners. [See Consortiumnews.com's "The Left's Media Miscalculation."]

Whatever the long-term costs, Reagan made many Americans feel good in the short run. They liked the idea of not having to pay for government services (by simply putting the bill on the government's credit card) and many bought into Reagan's notion that "government is the problem." So, in 1984, Reagan's gauzy "Morning in America" vision won big over Walter Mondale's appeal for fiscal responsibility.

The Iran-Contra Window

Perhaps the last best hope to reassert reality came with the Iran-Contra scandal, which played out from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s. Reagan's secret arms-for-hostages deals with Iran had the potential to unravel an interconnected series of national security cover-ups and scandals, including cocaine smuggling by Reagan's contras and creation of the "perception management" operation itself.

However, again, truth about these complex scandals was not considered that important, either in Congress or within the Washington news media. The governing Democrats, the likes of Rep. Lee Hamilton and later President Bill Clinton, chose to sweep the scandals under the rug in the hope that the Republicans would reciprocate through a renewed bipartisanship. [See Secrecy & Privilege.]

Not only were those hopes unrequited, the Republicans actually grew more emboldened and more partisan. The GOP and its allies ramped up personal attacks on Clinton by turning loose its powerful new media infrastructure, which by the 1990s featured the Right's domination of AM talk radio.

A typical example of the Right's propaganda was to distribute lists of "mysterious deaths" of people somehow connected to President Clinton. Though there was no evidence that Clinton was implicated in any of the deaths, the sophistry of the argument rested simply on the number of cases.

When I checked out some of the cases and relayed my findings of Clinton's innocence to one right-wing source, he told me that maybe I could show that Clinton wasn't responsible for some of the deaths but I couldn't account for all and that it would be "a big story" if the President was responsible for even a few deaths. I responded that it would be a "big story" if the President were responsible for even one, but the problem was that there was no evidence of that, just the insidious impression created by a long list of vague suspicions.

What the Right learned was that it could achieve political gain by circulating an endless supply of baseless or wildly exaggerated allegations. Many Americans would believe them just because of the repetition over right-wing talk radio, especially by the most prominent talker Rush Limbaugh.

On Election Night 1994, Democrats were stunned by how effective the tactic of using bogus and hyped anti-Clinton charges proved to be. Between the smearing of Bill and Hillary Clinton and the voters desire to punish Democrats for raising taxes to close the Reagan-Bush-41-era deficits, the Republicans swept to control of the House and Senate.

Newt Gingrich achieved his long-held goal of becoming House Speaker, and Rush Limbaugh was made an honorary member of the Republican congressional caucus. In the years that have followed—especially with the emergence of Fox News in the mid-to-late 1990s—the dominance of right-wing propaganda over non-ideological reality moved to the center of the American political process.

As in the 1980s, much of the blame should fall on the mainstream news media. Rather than push for difficult truths, many journalists in the corporate media protected their careers by going with the flow or turned their attention to trivial and tabloid stories.

The Bush-43 Era

During Campaign 2000, journalists from publications such as the New York Times and the Washington Post ganged up on Al Gore. They even made up quotations to put in his mouth so they could haze him as if they were the cool kids on campus and he was the goofy nerd.

By contrast, journalists knew to fawn all over the ultimate big man on campus, George W. Bush, as he made them feel important by giving them nicknames. [For details, see Neck Deep.]

When Gore still narrowly defeated Bush in Election 2000, the major news media stood aside as Bush and the Republicans stole the White House. After Bush's allies on the U.S. Supreme Court stopped the counting of votes in Florida to give him the "victory," some executives at major publications felt that pointing out the fact that Gore actually won—if all votes legal under Florida law had been counted—would undermine Bush's "legitimacy" and thus it was better not to let the public know. In other words, ignorance had become bliss.

Some columnists, like the Washington Post's Richard Cohen, went so far as to hail the overturning of the popular will under the theory that Bush would be a uniter, while Gore would be a divisive figure.

The see-no-evil attitude hardened after the 9/11 attacks when mainstream outlets, including the New York Times, the Washington Post and CNN, consciously misreported their own findings of a Gore victory in Florida, based on an unofficial media recount. Instead of leading with that remarkable fact, they buried the lead and highlighted that Bush would still have won some partial, hypothetical recounts. [See Neck Deep.]

The media mood after 9/11—a combination of misguided patriotism and fear of rightwing retaliation—caused the mainstream press to retreat further into self-censorship and even collaboration. Key journalists, such as the Times' reporter Judy Miller and the Post's editorial page editor Fred Hiatt, became handmaidens to Bush's propaganda about Iraq.

With only a few exceptions, the U.S. news media let itself become silly putty in the hands of the neocons, who had returned to power under Bush-43 with a much broader foreign policy portfolio than Reagan had ever given them. Whereas Reagan confined them mostly to Central America, Bush-43 gave them the strategically vital Middle East.

Not surprisingly, the neocons reprised their old strategy of perception management, stoking excessive fears of Iraq's mythical WMD programs and stomping out any counter embers of doubt. For millions of Americans, the WMD lies became truth as they were repeated everywhere, from Fox News and Rush Limbaugh to the pages of the Washington Post and the New York Times.

Aping the Right

After watching the success of the Bush administration's propaganda, some on the Left decided that their only hope was to give the neocons a taste of their own disinformation medicine. Though the 9/11 evidence pointed to Bush's incompetence in ignoring warnings and failing to stop al-Qaeda's terrorist operation, some American leftists felt that it wasn't enough to convince the people that Bush was simply a bonehead. The feeling was that Bush had so bamboozled the people that they needed to be shocked out of their trances by something bigger.

So, this small group brushed aside the evidence-backed narrative of Bush's incompetence and even a competing interpretation of that factual framework, claiming that Bush had "let 9/11 happen." Instead, this group insisted that the only way to wake up America was to make a case that Bush "made it happen," that he was behind the 9/11 attacks.

To accomplish this feat, these activists, who became known as "9/11 truthers," threw out all the evidence of al-Qaeda's involvement, from contemporaneous calls from hijack victims on the planes to confessions from al-Qaeda leaders both in and out of captivity that they indeed had done it. The "truthers" then cherry-picked a few supposed "anomalies" to build an "inside-job" story line.

The "truthers" even recycled many of the Right's sophistry techniques, such as using long lists of supposed evidence to overcome the lack of any real evidence. These sleight-of-hand techniques obscured the glaring fact that not a single witness has emerged to describe the alleged "inside job," either the supposed "controlled demolition" of the Twin Towers or the alleged "missile" attack on the Pentagon. Some supporters of the "inside-job" theory may have simply been destabilized by all the years of right-wing disinformation. Reality and real evidence may have lost all currency, replaced by a deep and understandable distrust of the nation's leaders and the news media.

Other "truthers" whom I've talked with view their anti-Bush propaganda campaign as a success because it injected some doubts among the American people about Bush. One told me that this was the only attack line against Bush that had gained any "traction."

However, after President Obama's election in 2008, the Right again demonstrated its mastery of the disinformation techniques. Unlike the Left, the Right could roll out the heavy artillery of a multi-layered media apparatus that pounded the public with barrage after barrage of conspiracy theories.

Falsehoods took on the color of truth simply by their endless retelling. For instance, the canard that Obama was born in Kenya, not Hawaii as his birth certificate shows, has gained credibility with large numbers of Americans including about half of Republicans, some polls show. Similarly, the Right has convinced tens of millions that Obama is a Muslim, though he is Christian.

The Right's media power has enabled the Republicans to portray Obama as some un-American "other," while the GOP has little fear that its spreading of racist-tinged conspiracy theories will hurt the party's election chances.

The latest example is Dinesh D'Souza's bizarre theorizing about Obama's channeling his late father's opposition to British colonialism in Kenya, a reincarnated dream which somehow has morphed into Obama's "socialist" agenda which is "alien" to American values.

Instead of roundly condemning D'Souza for this strange and racist article, Gingrich—one of the supposed intellectuals of the Republican Party—went out of his way to praise the nonsense as "profound."

As former Bush-43 speechwriter David Frum noted in a blog post, "With the Forbes story and now the Gingrich endorsement, the argument that Obama is an infiltrating alien, a deceiving foreigner—and not just any kind of alien, but specifically a Third World alien—has been absorbed almost to the very core of the Republican platform for Nov., 2010."

Despite some internal GOP critics like Frum, the Republican Party clearly feels that it has a winning formula, using such psychological warfare to exploit a confused and embittered electorate. That confidence will be tested on Nov. 2, although if most prognosticators are correct, the Republicans have good reason to feel confident. Whatever happens on Election Day, the longer-term challenge will be to rebuild an old-fashioned commitment to fact and reason within both American journalism and the broader political system.

Though lying is not foreign to U.S. politics and media, telling the truth has always been a fundamental American value, one that is vital to democracy. The great task of restoring the Republic must include honest efforts to dig out recent history's ground truth, which can then be used to build a path out of the disinformation swamp and onto the dry land of rational political discourse.

(Robert Parry broke many of the Iran-Contra stories in the 1980s for the Associated Press and Newsweek. His latest book, Neck Deep: The Disastrous Presidency of George W. Bush, was written with two of his sons, Sam and Nat, and can be ordered at neckdeepbook.com. His two previous books, Secrecy & Privilege: The Rise of the Bush Dynasty from Watergate to Iraq and Lost History: Contras, Cocaine, the Press & 'Project Truth' are also available there. Or go to Amazon.com.)

© 2010 Consortium News

20100918-01	11:20	Pam	So...?
-------------	-------	-----	--------

Dear Steve,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I remember my mother once telling me that she had too much time to think. Maybe that's my problem. I am so dispirited by the political climate in this country that I could weep. Tea Party candidates are winning elections, Sarah Palin is probably planning to run for President, the Senate is broken, and the working class has forgotten whom to blame for their economic woes. I guess they don't remember that under the last Democratic President we had a budget surplus. Why this country would want to return to the bad old days of Republican administration is beyond me. I agree with you that all politicians are suspect at best, but the Republicans win the prize for corruption and selfishness in my estimation. I've lost all faith in the media, except for the New Yorker magazine, Harper's, the New York Review of Books, and the "Daily Show" with Jon Stewart. Truth and good sense are out there, but their voices are so muted in comparison to all the ranting and raving. We are not a compassionate people; we are selfish and arrogant, and no wonder the world hates us. I feel so helpless, it makes me depressed. I just read Jonathan Franzen's Freedom where he describes the despair of liberals during the Bush regime. Despair and helplessness, for me, lead to withdrawal and a dark fatalism, neither of which does anyone any good.

I keep imagining scenarios where Sarah Palin becomes President and leads a drive to evict all Hispanics and Muslims from the country. People will be encouraged to carry guns openly, and children will have to pray in school. The economy will collapse, and in response Palin will lead us into yet another war to distract the populace from what is really screwed up with their lives. I swear, if she had a mustache, she'd look like Hitler to me. People didn't take him seriously at first either, and it was just the same social class that he appealed to. Educated, sophisticated folks couldn't believe this bumpkin could ever be taken seriously. Boy, were they wrong.

I need to shake this off. My own life is good, and I should be grateful for that, and I am. If I wait for the world to be perfect to be happy, I'll have a sad life. I am just so incredibly aghast at how stupid people can be, and when "good" people are stupid, it's especially galling. Out and out criminals are less disturbing to me (at least to contemplate) than that ding-a-ling who just won a primary in Delaware, who thinks masturbation is adultery. My husband's solution is for us to go to the soccer game tonight and cheer for the home team. My answer is to get lost in a book that takes me away from the here and now to the there and then. Freedom did that, and I was sorry to finish it.

I had tea yesterday afternoon with a friend who lives in the neighborhood. She used to teach in the English dept. at UNCG; her husband still does. They are super Christian and conservative, so I steer clear of politics and religion, but we talked about literature, and that was fun. She's terribly intelligent—and beautiful, I might add—but she can seem chilly and aloof. There's a bitterness in her that is unsettling. I suspect she may have some depression (I can relate to that), and I know she feels thwarted professionally. I wonder if she's lonely. She doesn't reveal much, so it's hard to know what's really going on. Her husband obviously adores her (they have three kids, two in college), but she seems chilly about him too. I guess I tend to view people as characters in a book and try to figure them out. It makes life interesting.

OK. I've gone on long enough. I don't know that I feel much better, but writing in itself is a distraction.

20100918-02	13:10	Dennis	"Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell: Largest Pro-wanking
-------------	-------	--------	---

Demonstration in History"

News from Delaware...

"Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell: Largest Pro-wanking Demonstration in History" by Andy Borowitz

Sept. 17, 2010, (<http://www.borowitzreport.com/2010/09/17/delaware-masturbators-march-against-odonnell/>)

(WILMINGTON) Galvanized by Republican senatorial nominee Christine O'Donnell's anti-masturbation stance, masturbators from across the state converged on Wilmington today in what some are calling the largest pro-wanking protest in American history.

Carrying signs reading, "O'Donnell: Hands Off Our Masturbation," the angry masturbators clogged downtown Wilmington, stopping traffic for blocks.

Harley Farger, a leading Delaware masturbator and planner of the Million Masturbators March, said it was difficult to organize masturbators "because they're used to acting alone."

Mr. Farger, the executive director of the pro-monkey-spanking group MasturNation, said that the "wank and file" of his organization believe that masturbation is an inalienable right guaranteed by the Constitution.

"Our country was founded by rugged individualists," he said. "And you know what individualists like to do."

He said that Ms. O'Donnell's anti-whacking position was "ill-timed," adding, "In this economy, masturbation is one of the few simple pleasures people still can afford."

Tracy Klugian, a homemaker and masturbator from Dover, Delaware, said she is "puzzled" by what she sees as the contradictory nature of candidate O'Donnell's position: "If you're against masturbation, why would you want to serve in Congress?"

20100919-01 07:37 SteveB Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear Dennis,

See? You ask...and help is on the way. Maybe it would help if you would come out of the closet and start a "wankers" organization in your community?

I just don't get this at all! I mean, we all know that masturbation is wrong and kills brain cells, but I always thought everybody did it. Now, after a lifetime of masturbation, during which time I have suffered the terrible consequences, I am to learn that some conservatives somehow manage not to do it?

I feel so cheated and lost in a landscape without morals! I always thought there were just two kinds of people in the world: those who spank their monkey (hello, George Carlin) and say they do, and those who spank their monkey and say they don't. Now, after a lifetime of sin and scoundrel abuse, I am to learn that there is a third kind of person? A person who is probably a professional monkey spanker, who makes me look like an amateur, but who, being a Republican, shouts her lie from the pulpits and rostrums of America so vociferously, even she begins to believe it.

Hey, Christine O'Donnell, go f*ck yourself!

20100919-02 07:56 GaryC Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear SteveB,

I always felt that by masturbating I was killing the weaker brain cells thus I actually believe masturbation makes me smarter.

20100919-03 07:59 SteveB Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear GaryC,

Ah...so maybe not masturbating explains how so many of these Republicans have gotten so frickin' stupid!

20100919-04 09:23 Pam Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear SteveB,

You're right. The best thing to do is laugh at the ridiculous. I've decided that I'm going to stop getting depressed and angry and just say, f*ck 'em all. That'll show 'em.

We have a friend who is English and a soccer fan. His favorite cheer at games is, "Wanker!" Aimed at the ref., of course. I don't think anyone in the stands knows what it means.

20100919-05 14:25 SteveB Redistribution of Wealth

The "redistribution of wealth" that strikes so much fear into the Teabaggers mostly refers to the fact that it is the solution to the social injustice that 1% of the population controls over 80% of the nation's wealth, while the poorest 50% of the citizens controls less than 1% of the nation's wealth. The top 1% pay 37% of the taxes (but control 80% of the money!) How is this arrangement good or fair or just?

Oh... and Jesus was no fan of the stingy rich. He never castigated gays, but he sure did say that the uncharitable wealth hoarders shouldn't expect an engraved invitation to Heaven.

20100919-06 20:01 GaryC Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear SteveB,

Since you are a policy and political wanker, what party do you vote for if you are a social liberal and a fiscal conservative?

20100919-07 09:06 SteveB Solutions

Dear GaryC,

What party to vote for?

I think we should vote for whatever puppets they put up for election who are not in power. Term limits might be good, but not enough. Also, there's a long learning curve to becoming a good legislator, a breed you don't see much anymore.

Have been thinking about it a lot lately...even toying with the idea of doing a political/historical book, essentially for my kids and grandkids...but I got so much else goin' on. I want to be apolitical, but this whole political thing in the U.S. has gotten out of control. For now, my agenda is based on the following rather long and dreary road:

1. The political attacks and lies need to stop. The rhetoric needs to be toned down. We have serious problems to solve, without really the means necessary for the solutions. Instead of taxes, education, immigration, foreign policy, regulation, free-trade, our too many of our politicians are shouting about masturbation and socialism. When I was young, politicians would argue, but with respect, with the knowledge that, in reality, they were on the same side. That attitude seems to have died and must be resurrected. We have to stop being ugly, brutal, stupid people. At least a little bit. We've done it before, why not again?

2. Every incumbent must be turned out of office, every election (good or bad)! Despite what I said about the learning curve, above. The good ones can run again after sitting out a term. They'll be the better for it.

3. No. 2 has to be done as religiously as possible across the country until we somehow shake things up enough (but not too much, democracy is, after all, fragile) to make our elected representatives comprehend who their bosses truly are. We, the people. Not big business, not the special interests. Now, finally, the system has somehow shed enough corruption to actually be able to function like a democracy. In that bright future, we will know we have reached this milestone when the following measures are taken by Congress, the President, the Courts, and the electorate:

a. Completely revamp campaign finance law. End the corrupt power of big business, the military, and special interests. This problem is easily fixed if the will is there.

b. Get the lobbyists out of the Houses of Congress and the White House and into some special governmental "fact finding" bureaucracy. That ought to keep them out of trouble. They can only communicate openly to Congress, the President, etc. and the rest of us via the internet.

c. Completely end all "swinging door" opportunities between regulators and what they regulate. Anything else, as is the case in all three of these points, is simply rank corruption of the worst kind.

4. OK, now that we have established, by law, a reasonably rational, non-corrupt government, at this time and not prior to this time, we can start to solve our huge national problems. Now we can actually put our democratic, open-fair-public-debate, solve-the-problem-on-the-merits system to work for us. Now we have the means to do it once again...the means we had at one or more times in history and threw away due to ambition and greed. But everything is a cycle.

20100920-01 13:36 Mary Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear Dennis,

By sending this, you become part of all that is wrong with politics.

O'Donnell was in her 20's when she founded S.A.L.T. and took that stand as part of her sexual purity message to kids. Criticize her and her politics all you want....just please be fair and relevant.

Not going to waste any more of my time on your sophomoric forwards. Save it for the likes of SteveB, who tends to thrive on that sort of stuff. [Now I'm sophomoric? At 64? And a pervert too! LOL —SteveB]

20100920-02 13:55 SteveB Re: "Delaware Masturbators March Against O'Donnell"

Dear Mary,

"All that is wrong with politics" is that the system is totally corrupt.

The toughest issue is jobs, and most of our good American jobs have been sold abroad by both parties and the "big money". The middle class and the American way of life are at risk. None of this is something that will be solved with the traditional, dogmatic right-left debate. It's a problem other than what the right and the left are all about.

If I am pro-masturbation (haha) and anti-witchcraft (hey, now, that's serious stuff!), I reserve every right to express those opinions and will always strive to listen fairly to yours. On whatever subject on whatever level you deem worthy.

If, despite our dire problems as a nation, a little humor cannot be injected into politics, then I, for one, am appalled. If I'm in the wrong, blame Abe Lincoln, Will Rogers, Winston Churchill, Ronald Regan, Monty Python, and John Stewart.

I'll be sorry if you don't reply to any more sophomoric forwards from one of the smartest people I've ever known.

Since I am neither of the right, nor of the left, but outside of all that, what exactly is the sort of stuff I "thrive on", please? That which is humorous? That which is true? That which might someday lead us closer to being the nation we strive to become, embodying our highest ideals?

Dear SteveB,

I just read an essay in Harper's Magazine (an excerpt from a book that is due out soon) that sums up exactly my thinking. It is always gratifying to read something that encapsulates my own thought. The book is The Mendacity of Hope: Barack Obama and the Betrayal of American Liberalism by Roger D. Hodge. It's all about how the top 1% of American society, in terms of wealth, control everything.

I am with you about all politics. Next time, if Ralph Nader runs, I'm voting for him. I always thought a vote for him was a wasted vote, but now I think it doesn't matter who you vote for—R or D. The real conflict is not between Republicans and Democrats but between the rich and everyone else. I wish I could find a reason to hope that our democracy will not fail, just as so many others have before us. Plato in "The Republic" predicted that democracy would end in demagoguery and dictatorship. It did in Athens, in Rome, and in the Renaissance. I fear we're headed for the same fall.

I also agree that humor is our last salvation. So long as we can laugh at and mock our "leaders" we are not completely in the sh*t. No one laughed at Stalin. Irreverence, mockery, satire—that's what we need more of. Thank god for Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert. Especially Jon Stewart. I wonder how his Million Moderates March will fare. It's good that people are angry. More people need to be angry all across the political spectrum.

My son Tanner was here today and we got into a big discussion. He is so committed—to animal rights, the environment, etc. etc. He lives what he believes—way more than I do—and I always feel like a sell-out when I talk to him. Still, I do what I can. But I still eat meat and give my grandsons cows' milk, despite what I know about big agriculture. I still use plastic, despite what I know about its dangers. Sometimes it's so damned hard to be good.

"Speak, Money" by Roger D. Hodge, Harper's Magazine

Oct., 2010, (<http://www.harpers.org/archive/2010/10/0083125>)

(From The Mendacity of Hope: Barack Obama and the Betrayal of American Liberalism, out this month from HarperCollins. Hodge is the former editor of Harper's Magazine.)

As we prepare yet another round of offerings to the demigods of America's political religion, we would do well to remind ourselves of what our electoral votives truly signify. Ideally, our ballots purport to be expressions of political will, which we hope and pray will be translated into legislative and executive action by our pretended representatives. Through hard and painful struggles, against daunting odds, our forebears and elders fought so long for voting rights—for unpropertied men, for women, for blacks—that we may perhaps be forgiven the error of thinking that casting a ballot is the perfection of civic virtue, the ultimate and sovereign duty of the citizen-ruler. Alas, the agony of citizenship is never ending; voting is the beginning of civic virtue, not its end, and as suffrage has expanded so has its value been steadily debased. The locus of real power is elsewhere. Wealth and property qualifications, poll taxes, and the like are very far from being historical curiosities; they have simply mutated. Campaign contributions and other forms of political spending have assumed that old exclusionary function, and only those who can afford to pay are able truly to manifest their political will. Voters still "matter," of course, but only as raw material to be shaped by the actual form of political influence—money—which molds the body politic by realizing itself in the ductile mass of common voters.

The Atlantic republican tradition that informed the minds of our founding generation had a name for this state of affairs: corruption, a term that suggested far more than mere bribery. Corruption, in its institutional sense, denotes the degeneration of republican forms of government into despotism, and typically comes about when the private ends of a narrow faction of citizens succeed in capturing the engines of government; its prevention was one of the primary concerns of the framers of the Constitution. Citizens, like states, are susceptible to the disease of corruption, and in the classical republican understanding a corrupt citizenry is one that has allowed its private and narrow personal interests to trump those of the general public. The radicalism of the American revision of republicanism consisted in founding a state on the premise that the public interest might be served by the assertion of private interest, and that a large, well-regulated republic might withstand corruption by absorbing the manifold competing interests of a large and diverse population. Most republicans throughout history have viewed history through a tragic lens; the life cycle of republics—their degeneration into anarchy, oligarchy, or monarchy—was thought to be inescapable. James Madison, in particular, sought to escape that tragic cycle. His principles were sound, his institutional design was brilliant, and yet he failed. Perhaps the time has come for us to reckon with that tragedy.

The corruption of our institutions manifests itself in a variety of ways, but in none so dramatic as the imbalance of national wealth, which in recent decades has shattered records formerly set in the late 1920s. Although it is often claimed that the gap between rich and poor began decisively to widen in the late 1970s, as if to absolve Ronald Reagan for what his followers no doubt count as his primary accomplishment, the total share of income of the wealthiest 10 percent of American families was well within the postwar norm until 1982, when Reagan's policies began a massive, decades-long transfer of national wealth to the rich. Under Bill Clinton, who shamelessly appropriated the Reaganite agenda, the transfer was even more dramatic, as the top 10 percent captured an ever growing share of national income. The trend continued under George W. Bush, and by 2007 the wealthiest 10 percent of Americans (families earning more than $109,630) were taking in 50 percent of the national income. In 1980 the top 1 percent of Americans received 10 percent of the national income; by 2007 the superrich (those with income above $398,900) had increased their share to 23.5 percent. The average increase in real income for the bottom 99 percent of American families between 1973 and 2006 was a mere 8.5 percent, whereas the richest 1 percent saw a 190 percent rise in real income.

Such a distortion of the nation's balance of wealth did not come about by accident; it was the result of a long series of policy decisions—about industry and trade, taxation and military spending, by flesh-and-blood humans sitting in concrete-and-steel buildings—that were bought and paid for by the less than 1 percent of Americans who participate in our capitalist democracy by contributing at least $200 to political campaigns. Gross inequalities in wealth not only create a perverse feedback loop in which the interests of the wealthy and the centers of power in government recede ever further from those of the general public; such inequality also distorts the political psychology of voters. Some of the best recent empirical work in political science has shown that most Americans attempt to vote in accordance with their economic interests, rather than by the dictates of ephemeral antagonisms over God, gays, or guns. Unfortunately, economic improvements for the vast majority of Americans over the past three decades have been so marginal that they are easily overshadowed by cynical manipulations of the political business cycle, the timing of economic expansions with election years, and by the strange fact that lower-income voters are more sensitive, in terms of voting behavior, to income growth among the wealthy than they are to their own economic well-being.

Since the early 1980s, the Democratic Party has largely abandoned its commitment to policies that serve the material interests of most Americans and has joined the Republican Party in a shameless competition for the patronage of large corporations and the superrich. Add to these complexities the proven power of campaign spending to influence election outcomes (Larry Bartels has calculated that each additional dollar spent per voter by a candidate increases the probability of a given undecided voter's support by almost four percentage points), and it is easy to see that the average American has no hope of safeguarding his interests, whether they pertain to life, liberty, or happiness. We cast our empty ballots for one party; then, disgusted with the inevitable betrayals, pray for a redeemer from the opposing party to rescue us from politics and history, only to repeat the cycle once again. Meanwhile, most of our citizens are fully absorbed in their personal affairs, oblivious and largely ignorant of the details of politics and governance. We are so very far from the classical republican ideal of ruling and being ruled, of exercising political agency and participating in the life of our commonwealth, that, incapable of pursuing even narrow self-interest effectively, we instead offer ourselves up as impotent, obsequious subjects, the unresisting tools of interests we scarcely comprehend.

Occasionally, however, the political class expresses itself in unmistakable terms, unintentionally disclosing the true nature of our political economy. In January, in Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, the United States Supreme Court held that restrictions on independent corporate expenditures in political campaigns are unconstitutional infringements on the freedom of speech. Much of the judicial literature on the subject, including Justice Anthony Kennedy's majority opinion in Citizens United, simply substitutes the words "speech" and "speak" for the words "spend" and "buy." Corporations, according to the court's majority faction, are speakers, persons who have constitutional rights. When they spend, they speak. Kennedy admits that favoritism and influence can result from campaign spending but he asserts that far from being objectionable or avoidable, favoritism and influence are the essence of representative politics, that it is right and natural that a representative should favor certain "voters and contributors." Indeed, he continues, "it is well understood that a substantial and legitimate reason, if not the only reason, to cast a vote for, or to make a contribution to, one candidate over another is that the candidate will respond by producing those political outcomes the supporter favors. Democracy is premised on responsiveness." With admirable frankness if less than impeccable logic, Kennedy equates not only the act of spending money with speech but also the act of making a campaign contribution with voting. The idea of corruption resulting from the quid pro quo of contribution for legislation troubles him not at all. "The appearance of influence or access, furthermore," he repeats, as if a lie may be converted into truth by mere reiteration, "will not cause the electorate to lose faith in our democracy."

If there were any doubts about what sort of government we live under, Kennedy's opinion should lay them to rest. Indeed, civic virtue has now completed its centuries-long metamorphosis from the republican ideal of the free citizen-ruler to the degraded economic norm of the consumer buying on credit; virtue for us is no more than a spotless credit rating. Thus the terror of a credit crisis; it strikes at the very foundation of public personality. The more abstract and financialized our commercial expressions, the more virtuous they become; corporations, fictional beings of pure commerce, predicated on our collective fantasies, are now the highest expression of political art. Corporations are evolving under judicial legislation into the perfect, immortal citizen-rulers of our capitalist democracy, a virtual republic in which all political speech is advertising and all real citizens are commercial fictions.

It is a curious metaphysical doctrine, is it not? Corporations are artificial beings, theoretically immortal, which come into existence by means of state charters and reproduce like amoebas by splitting into subsidiaries; midwived by lawyers, they combine in bizarre mating rituals called mergers; they are owned, like slaves, by shareholders who buy and sell their chattel daily; and they possess constitutional rights. Oddly, however, our corporate citizens are denied the right to vote. By what logic can a corporation be granted personhood and the constitutional right to speak money, yet be denied the constitutional right to vote? How can our system permit these corporate persons to be enslaved through ownership? Does not the force of all logic and morality require us either to deny the personhood of corporations, or to grant them the right to vote and to free them from slavery? If we insist on maintaining their status as persons, at least let us give ourselves the power, if they commit serious crimes against property, to put corporations to death.

Given the weird First Amendment metaphysics to which a majority of our Supreme Court justices subscribe, it is obvious that mere campaign-finance reform is a dead letter, notwithstanding President Obama's pious noises following the Citizens United verdict. It seems only a matter of time and litigation before all limits to political expenditures are erased in the name of free speech; the radical doctrines of the Roberts Court admit no foreseeable limit. Even so, the Republican Party and its ideological lawyers in the Federalist Society may yet have reason to regret their determined advocacy on behalf of the money-equals-speech heresy. Obama outspent McCain two-to-one during the last election, and there is no reason to believe that all or even most corporate spending will ultimately be channeled to the party of Abraham Lincoln and Sarah Palin. On the contrary, Democrats are likely to benefit as much or more than the G.O.P., even after Kennedy, Scalia, et al. finally get their chance to liberate flesh-and-blood persons, especially that wise and judicious 1 percent who wish to make their money speak, from the fetters of financial censorship and disenfranchisement. As Obama's purported reforms, in health care no less than in finance, have demonstrated, the Democrats have made certain that their contributors will secure enviable returns on their political investments.

Citizens United is not the cause of our troubles; it merely highlights the essential character of our system, and for that we should be grateful. Nevertheless, given this judicial perversion of the First Amendment, our only sure remedy is constitutional. The Democratic Party's lamentable DISCLOSE Act, which this summer failed to muster sixty votes in the Senate, would do nothing, if passed, to curb the flow of cash and the further disenfranchisement of the vast majority of the citizenry. It is no great burden for large corporations and wealthy individuals to hire more clerks to file additional disclosure forms, and under current law we already know a great deal about who buys and sells our commodified rulers and their derivative legislation. Far more robust is the Fair Elections Now Act, which would establish a system of public financing of elections, yet even if it survived a Supreme Court review, such a law would fail to contain the disproportionate power of the wealthy. In an ideal system of public campaign financing, in which all political speech has been equalized by law, in which political advertising is banned and persuasion stripped of its commercial aspect—the corporate businessman and the millionaire (not to mention the billionaire) would still stand taller than the common citizen. In fact, as the political theorist John P. McCormick has argued, the wealthy are likely to dominate any political regime that chooses its magistrates and lawmakers solely by means of election.

Republican theorists have traditionally recognized the centrality of economic class in politics and in the design of stable republican institutions. Past republics, in antiquity and in the Renaissance, were particularly concerned to contain the power of the rich and prevent them from dominating the institutions of government. Historically, it has been the insolence and dominating ambition of the wealthy that has led to the decline of great republics, not the revolutionary or leveling fervor of the lower classes, who mostly wish to be left to their own devices. The Roman tribunes vigorously defended the rights and privileges of the plebs against the depredations of the rich, and the tribunate had the power to veto actions proposed by the Senate and to accuse patricians of political crimes. Florentine constitutional thinkers such as Niccolò Machiavelli and Francesco Guicciardini gave much thought to such questions, and a variety of devices—including lotteries and class quotas, often in combination with election—were considered and employed. No doubt these classical republicans would consider our Constitution's silence on the matter of class a debilitating and perhaps fatal defect.

It is perfectly legitimate for the rich to pursue their own interests; what is not legitimate is the current exclusion of all other interests from the reason of state. A constitutional amendment establishing public financing of elections would be an obvious and reasonable first step toward correcting this imbalance, as would an amendment stripping corporations of their rights as persons. Even better would be a convention, in which we might attempt to introduce new constitutional devices designed to more equitably distribute access to political deliberation.

Admittedly, however, the prospects for a constitutional remedy appear dim. Is it possible that the majority of Americans whose interests are not being served have no political will? As James Madison asked long ago: Are we utterly without civic virtue? If so, then we are truly wretched. "To suppose that any form of government will secure liberty or happiness without any virtue in the people is a chimerical idea."

Although we have always benefited from the activities of public-spirited individuals, even men and women of great wealth who recognize that greed as a principle of public conduct often leads to perverse outcomes, the United States Constitution was emphatically not founded on the assumption that either citizens or magistrates could be trusted to act selflessly. If my argument can be taken as a call to republican virtue, it is only so within the modern realist framework devised by Madison and his colleagues in 1787, according to whom government is a response to humanity's inherent wickedness. Men are not angels, Obama notwithstanding. A properly American call to republican virtue is not a utopian exhortation that our citizens cast aside their private and selfish interests and embark on a course of austere political action, with their eyes fixed on some transcendent public good apart from their own. No, what is required is that Americans take a stand on behalf of their selfish material interests and against those of the monopolies and transnational corporations that have captured our institutions of government. The paradoxical character of our popular corruption is that the people have become slothfully selfless, too absorbed by their ephemeral entertainments and petty cultural disputes to assert their self-interest against the plunderers who rule them.

Surely, however, the American people have not become so servile that they will forever submit to the rule of 1 percent. Surely we are capable of recognizing that the perverse corporate regime that has arisen in our country is a usurpation of popular government. Our Constitution unquestionably recognizes the right of a people to alter its mode of government; we have done so twenty-seven times. We may do so again. We may throw off these bonds and provide new guards for our future security.

20100920-04	17:35	GaryC	Re: "Speak, Money"
-------------	-------	-------	--------------------

Dear Pam and SteveB,

Here is what I saw happen. When the Dems finally lost power in the 90s two things happened. The Republicans wanted to punish the Dems for all of the years of being treated as second class citizens. The Dems didn't want to give up their power easily so they became obstructionists. The political partisanship was ramped up by more national news coverage of Congress. Now, both parties use the media to grand stand and accommodate the kooks on the fringes who tend to be more active both monetarily and organizationally. There is no advantage to working out compromises now. When I worked in DC, there was a lot of give and take and a whole lot less partisanship. Both parties were inclined to work for the common good. There was a lot less prying daily coverage from the media.

I can't see the present situation changing due to the inherent vested interest of the media to stir things up and play gotcha. The first step is to get term limits to reduce the desire to play politics daily to retain your power base. A further refinement would be to find a moderate fiscally conservative, socially liberal third party that could get a meaningful number of candidates elected that would cause both major parties to learn to compromise again.

I don't like the parliamentary system of governance but a meaningful third party would make both parties abandon their fringe elements if they wanted to stay viable. Another reform that is grossly needed is the reform of the primary system. What we need is 4—6 regional primaries over a two month period about two months before the general election to separate the loons from the professionals. Our current system is too much subject to the fringe elements getting candidates nominated that are not really suitable for the general population. In the last primary cycle, the two worst candidates were put up by the Republicans and Democrats because they appealed to the fringe elements of each party. Now we have a community organizer ruining the country. And, I am not a fan of McCain either.

Another reform as long as I am on a roll, is to prohibit sitting Senators, Congressmen or Vice-presidents from running for office. Let them resign first so we can still have someone representing their district's interest while they are seeking votes.

20100921-01 06:54 SteveB Fw: Larry the Cable Guy

from Larry:

[Source of original email unknown. Maybe Larry's "people". —SteveB]

Everyone concentrates on the problems we're having in Our Country lately: Illegal immigration, hurricane recovery, alligators attacking people in Florida... Not me — I concentrate on solutions for the problems — it's a win-win situation.

Dig a moat the length of the Mexican border. Send the dirt to New Orleans to raise the level of the levees. Put the Florida alligators in the moat along the Mexican border.

Any other problems you would like for me to solve today? Think about this: 1. Cows 2. The Constitution 3. The Ten Commandments.

COWS

Is it just me, or does anyone else find it amazing that during the mad cow epidemic our government could track a single cow, born in Canada almost three years ago, right to the stall where she slept in the state of Washington? And, they tracked her calves to their stalls. But they are unable to locate 11 million illegal aliens wandering around our country. Maybe we should give each of them a cow.

THE CONSTITUTION

They keep talking about drafting a Constitution for Iraq .why don't we just give them ours? It was written by a lot of really smart guys, it has worked for over 200 years, and we're not using it any more.

THE 10 COMMANDMENTS

The real reason that we can't have the Ten Commandments posted in a courthouse is this — you cannot post 'Thou Shalt Not Steal' 'Thou Shalt Not Commit Adultery' and 'Thou Shall Not Lie' in a building full of lawyers, judges and politicians, it creates a hostile work environment.

GET ER DONE!

20100921-02 07:11 Lianne Re: Larry the Cable Guy

Dear SteveB,

This is an uneducated rant.... Please don't send these. My morning coffee just curdled.

20100921-03 07:34 SteveB Re: Larry the Cable Guy

Dear Lianne,

Wow! That is not a "rant" from Larry—a cry for help, maybe, but not a rant. It is simply comedy with modest points that I would think impossible to offend even your sensitive nature. Your prejudices are very real and showing clearly, my dear.

20100921-04 07:53 SteveB "For the Unemployed Over 50, Fears of Never Working Again"

Jobs are the problem. Where are they?

The politicians of both parties allowed most of the good manufacturing jobs to be shipped to China, etc.

Why? Campaign contributions from big business seeking lower wages and larger profits.

Many of the rest of the jobs have been taken by illegal immigrants. Why has this been allowed?

Campaign contributions from big business seeking lower wages and larger profits.

Result: the decline and fall of the American way of life within our lifetimes.

Why would we expect anything but profit seeking behavior from institutions created only to seek profits? That part of the system seems to work pretty well. The part that doesn't work is part where our political institutions regulate and control the greed for the betterment of America. We decided we didn't need that part of the equation. Instead of assuming the reins of control ourselves, we let money have the reins. See where we are now?

And here we are embroiled in petty party bickering? Wake-up people! You've been sold down the river by both parties! Why would you choose to be loyal to either party of traitors? Do you really think there is some philosophical issue at stake here? Think again.

"For the Unemployed Over 50, Fears of Never Working Again" by Motoko Rich, New York Times

Sept. 21, 2010, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/09/20/business/economy/20older.html?pagewanted=all>)

(Patricia Reid, 57, lost her job at Boeing four years ago and has struggled to find a new position.)

Patricia Reid is not in her 70s, an age when many Americans continue to work. She is not even in her 60s. She is just 57.

But four years after losing her job she cannot, in her darkest moments, escape a nagging thought: she may never work again.

College educated, with a degree in business administration, she is experienced, having worked for two decades as an internal auditor and analyst at Boeing before losing that job.

But that does not seem to matter, not for her and not for a growing number of people in their 50s and 60s who desperately want or need to work to pay for retirement and who are starting to worry that they may be discarded from the work force—forever.

Since the economic collapse, there are not enough jobs being created for the population as a whole, much less for those in the twilight of their careers.

Of the 14.9 million unemployed, more than 2.2 million are 55 or older. Nearly half of them have been unemployed six months or longer, according to the Labor Department. The unemployment rate in the group—7.3 percent—is at a record, more than double what it was at the beginning of the latest recession.

After other recent downturns, older people who lost jobs fretted about how long it would take to return to the work force and worried that they might never recover their former incomes. But today, because it will take years to absorb the giant pool of unemployed at the economy's recent pace, many of these older people may simply age out of the labor force before their luck changes.

For Ms. Reid, it has been four years of hunting—without a single job offer. She buzzes energetically as she describes the countless applications she has lobbed through the Internet, as well as the online courses she is taking to burnish her software skills.

Still, when she is pressed, her can-do spirit falters.

"There are these fears in the background, and they are suppressed," said Ms. Reid, who is now selling some of her jewelry and clothes online and is late on some credit card payments. "I have had nightmares about becoming a bag lady," she said. "It could happen to anyone. So many people are so close to it, and they don't even realize it."

Being unemployed at any age can be crushing. But older workers suspect their resumes often get shoved aside in favor of those from younger workers. Others discover that their job-seeking skills—as well as some technical skills sought by employers—are rusty after years of working for the same company.

Many had in fact anticipated working past conventional retirement ages to gird themselves financially for longer life spans, expensive health care and reduced pension guarantees.

The most recent recession has increased the need to extend working life. Home values, often a family's most important asset, have been battered. Stock portfolios are only now starting to recover. According to a Gallup poll in April, more than a third of people not yet retired plan to work beyond age 65, compared with just 12 percent in 1995.

Older workers who lose their jobs could pose a policy problem if they lose their ability to be self-sufficient. "That's what we should be worrying about," said Carl E. Van Horn, professor of public policy and director of the John J. Heldrich Center for Workforce Development at Rutgers University, "what it means to this class of the new unemployables, people who have been cast adrift at a very vulnerable part of their career and their life."

Forced early retirement imposes an intense financial strain, particularly for those at lower incomes. The recession and its aftermath have already pushed down some older workers. In figures released last week by the Census Bureau, the poverty rate among those 55 to 64 increased to 9.4 percent in 2009, from 8.6 percent in 2007.

But even middle-class people who might skate by on savings or a spouse's income are jarred by an abrupt end to working life and to a secure retirement.

"That's what I spent my whole life in pursuit of, was security," Ms. Reid said. "Until the last few years, I felt very secure in my job."

As an auditor, Ms. Reid loved figuring out the kinks in a manufacturing or parts delivery process. But after more than 20 years of commuting across Puget Sound to Boeing, Ms. Reid was exhausted when she was let go from her $80,000-a-year job.

Stunned and depressed, she sent out resumes, but figured she had a little time to recover. So she took vacations to Turkey and Thailand with her husband, who is a home repairman. She sought chiropractic treatments for a neck injury and helped nurse a priest dying of cancer.

Most of her days now are spent in front of a laptop, holed up in a lighthouse garret atop the house that her husband, Denny Mielock, built in the 1990s on a breathtaking piece of property overlooking the sound.

As she browses the job listings that clog her e-mail in-box, she refuses to give in to her fears. "If I let myself think like that all the time," she said, "I could not even bear getting out of bed in the morning." With her husband's home repair business pummeled by the housing downturn, the bills are mounting. Although the couple do not have a mortgage on their 3,000-square-foot house, they pay close to $7,000 a year in property taxes. The roof is leaking. Their utility bills can be $300 a month in the winter, even though they often keep the thermostat turned down to 50 degrees.

They could try to sell their home, but given the depressed housing market, they are reluctant. "We are circling the drain here, and I am bailing like hell," said Ms. Reid, emitting an incongruous cackle, as if laughter is the only response to her plight. "But the boat is still sinking."

It is not just the finances that have destabilized her life.

Her husband worries that she isolates herself and that she does not socialize enough. "We've both been hard workers our whole lives," said Mr. Mielock, 59. Ms. Reid sometimes rose just after 3 a.m. to make the hour-long commute to Boeing's data center in Bellevue and attended night school to earn a master's in management information systems.

"A job is more than a job, you know," Mr. Mielock said. "It's where you fit in society."

Here in the greater Seattle area, a fifth of those claiming extended unemployment benefits are 55 and older.

To help seniors polish their job-seeking skills, WorkSource, a local consortium of government and nonprofit groups, recently began offering seminars. On a recent morning, 14 people gathered in a windowless conference room at a local community college to get tips on how to age-proof their resumes and deflect questions about being overqualified.

Motivational posters hung on one wall, bearing slogans like "Failure is the path of least persistence." Using PowerPoint slides, Liz Howland, the chipper but no-nonsense session leader, projected some common myths about older job-seekers on a screen: "Older workers are less capable of evaluating information, making decisions and problem-solving" or "Older workers are rigid and inflexible and have trouble adapting to change."

Ms. Howland, 61, ticked off the reasons those statements were inaccurate. But a clear undercurrent of anxiety ran through the room. "Is it really true that if you have the energy and the passion that they will overlook the age factor?" asked a 61-year-old man who had been laid off from a furniture maker last October.

Gallows humor reigned. As Ms. Howland—who suggested that applicants remove any dates older than 15 years from their resume—advised the group on how to finesse interview questions like "When did you have the job that helped you develop that skill?" one out-of-work journalist deadpanned: "How about 'during the 20th century?'"

During a break, Anne Richard, who declined to give her age, confessed she was afraid she would not be able to work again after losing her contract as a house director at a University of Washington sorority in June. Although she had 20 years of experience as an office clerk in Chattanooga, Tenn., she feared her technology skills had fallen behind.

"I don't feel like I can compete with kids who have been on computers all their lives," said Ms. Richard, who was sleeping on the couch of a couple she had met at church and contemplating imminent homelessness.

Older people who lose their jobs take longer to find work. In August, the average time unemployed for those 55 and older was slightly more than 39 weeks, according to the Labor Department, the longest of any age group. That is much worse than in Aug., 1983, also after a deep recession, when someone unemployed in that age group spent an average of 27.5 weeks finding work.

At this year's pace of an average of 82,000 new jobs a month, it will take at least eight more years to create the 8 million positions lost during the recession.

And that does not even allow for population growth. Advocates for the elderly worry that younger people are more likely to fill the new jobs as well.

"I do think the longer someone is out of work, the more employers are going to question why it is that someone hasn't been able to find work," said Sara Rix, senior strategic policy adviser at AARP, the lobbying group for seniors. "Their skills have atrophied for one thing, and technology changes so rapidly that even if nothing happened to the skills that you have, they may become increasingly less relevant to the jobs that are becoming available."

In four years of job hunting, Ms. Reid has discovered that she is no longer technologically proficient. In one of a handful of interviews she has secured, for an auditing position at the Port of Seattle, she learned that the job required skills in PeopleSoft, financial software she had never used. She assumes that deficiency cost her the job.

Ms. Reid is still five years away from being eligible for Social Security. But even then, she would be drawing early, which reduces monthly payments. Taking Social Security at 62 means a retiree would receive a 25 percent lower monthly payout than if she worked until 66.

Ms. Reid is in some ways luckier than others. Boeing paid her a six-month severance, and she has health care benefits that cover her and her husband for $40 a month.

And she admits some regrets: she had a $180,000 balance in her 401(k) account, and paid $80,000 in penalties and taxes when she cashed it out early. She did not rein in her expenses right away. And now, her $500-a-week unemployment benefits have been exhausted.

She has since cut back, forgoing Nordstrom shopping sprees and theater subscriptions, but also cutting out red meat at home and putting off home repairs.

In order to qualify for accounting posts, she is taking an online training course in QuickBooks, a popular accounting software used by small businesses. She recently signed up for a tax course at an H&R Block tax preparation office in Seattle.

And she is plugging ahead with her current plan: to send out 600 applications to accounting firms in the area, offering her services for the next tax season. Eventually, she wants to open her own business. With odd jobs and her husband's—albeit shriveled—earnings, she could stagger along. For now, she stitches together an income by gardening for neighbors, helping fellow church members with their computers, and participating in Internet surveys for as little as $5 apiece.

"You don't necessarily have to go through the door," Ms. Reid said. "You can go around it and go under it. I can be very creative. I think that I will eventually manage to pull this together."

20100922-01	07:54	SteveB	"Jimmy Carter Hasn't Been Mincing Many Words of Late"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Lianne,

I can't help but like Jimmy Carter. He's such an outsider! And he's done a lot of good things.

It's too bad Kennedy killed Carter's Public Health Care legislation attempt. (This is the truth because I remember this happening and thought it amazingly strange at the time, though I didn't know how much Kennedy opposed Carter. And Kennedy's reasons were petty, not lofty service to the people.)

You know, the truth in politics is almost always different than what we think we know. Only history illuminates...later. Sometimes it's good to withhold judgment a little...especially on people.

"Jimmy Carter Hasn't Been Mincing Many Words of Late" by Brett Michael Dykes, The Upshot/Yahoo! News

Sept. 21, 2010, (http://news.yahoo.com/s/yblog_upshot/20100921/pl_yblog_upshot/jimmy-carter-hasnt-been-mincing-many-words-of-late)

Since leaving the White House some 30 years ago, former President Jimmy Carter has, for the most part, steered clear of controversy. He's won a fair amount of attention for building houses with Habitat for Humanity, and for the occasional foray into post-presidential diplomacy. (He recently traveled to North Korea to secure the release of an imprisoned American.) And he drew some headlines for publishing a harshly critical book about Israeli policy toward the Palestinians. But on balance, Carter has maintained a relatively quiet life out of office.

No longer. With a new book, "White House Diary," hitting the shelves, Carter seems to be everywhere, waging a full-scale media blitz. The book — which is, as the title suggests, a collection of the journal entries Carter wrote as president — has afforded the 85-year-old Democrat the chance to mount fresh defenses of his presidency, while lobbing more than a few attacks on political opponents.

Carter made news for remarks during an interview with Brian Williams that aired Monday on the "NBC Nightly News." Carter told Williams that the humanitarian work he's performed through his foundation means that his post-presidency career has been "superior" to that of other former presidents.

"I feel that my role as a former president is probably superior to that of other presidents'," Carter said. "Primarily because of the activism and the — and the injection of working at the Carter Center and in international affairs, and to some degree, domestic affairs, on energy conservation, on — on environment, and things of that kind. We're right in the midst of the — of the constant daily debate."

After his comments aired and caused a stir, Carter released a statement to clarify what he intended to say: "What I meant was, for 27 years the Carter Center has provided me with superior opportunities to do good."

You can watch the interview here: <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9b5xoUHCBSk>.

Perhaps the most combustible recent Carter interview aired over the weekend on CBS' "60 Minutes." In the segment, Carter tells correspondent Lesley Stahl that he tried to reform the nation's health care system — only to have his efforts thwarted by Ted Kennedy, the longtime senator from Massachusetts who made national health care the signature crusade of his political career.

"The fact is that we would have had comprehensive health care NOW, had it not been for Ted Kennedy's deliberately blocking the legislation that I proposed in 1978 or '79," Carter said. "It was his fault. Ted Kennedy killed the bill."

Asked by Stahl if he believed Kennedy — who ran unsuccessfully against Carter for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1980 — blocked the plan just to spite him, Carter replied, "That's the implication. He did not want to see me have a major success in that realm of American life."

And Monday night, Carter also appeared on "The Daily Show," where he offered some candid thoughts on the current state of American politics. Asked by Jon Stewart whether the direction the country's headed in gives him hope, Carter replied flatly, "No."

"Things have gone downhill, I think, in the last few years with the polarization of our country," Carter said. "With the evolution of a new kind of politics, with the birth of Fox News, which now distorts everything rather than telling the truth."

Carter also slipped in a couple of barbs aimed at the GOP's controversial candidate to fill Vice President Joe Biden's former Senate seat, Christine O'Donnell. He noted that even though he launched his national profile as an anti-Washington politician, he probably wouldn't be welcome within the tea party movement, since unlike O'Donnell, he has never "been involved with witchcraft," and added that as a young man he "was not 100 percent against" a certain act that O'Donnell is famous for targeting in her past political career. We'll leave the rest to your imagination.

20100922-02	12:46	Dennis	"Socialism in America? You Ain't Just Whistlin' Dixie"
-------------	-------	--------	--

"Socialism in America? You Ain't Just Whistlin' Dixie" by Michael Ford, Huffington Post

Aug. 8, 2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/michael-ford/socialism-in-america-you_b_675072.html)

Have you heard rumblings of a counter Tea Party movement afoot in the land that calls the Tea Party "the-bite-the-hand-that-feeds-you caucus?" A rogue e-mail making the rounds called the movement "freeloading, progress-blocking, benefit-grabbing, resource-sucking, violent and hypocritical."

Southern politicians, in particular, complain about big government and taxes because it resonates easily and conforms to the post-Civil War self-perception of that region as victims of northern conspiracies.

However, as it turns out, in spite of their persistent anti-government rhetoric, Southern politicians are completely comfortable accepting the last line of Tennessee Williams' play, A Streetcar Named Desire: "I have always depended on the kindness of strangers." Down South it has become habitual to do just that. Southerners get back a whole lot more than they give in taxes.

America's wealth is, indeed, being redistributed—from what the independent Tax Foundation calls the "giving states" of New York, New Jersey, New England, most of the northeast and California—to the "receiving states" consisting of all of the south and, ironically, Alaska.

For example, those poor socialists in New Jersey only get back $0.56 on the tax dollar. But for every tax dollar Mississippi sends to Washington they get back $2.02, more than doubling their money! That's a Madoff return paid by the "giving states." Same for Louisiana, Alabama, Arkansas, West Virginia, Rand Paul's Kentucky, South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Virginia and North Carolina. Then, of course, there is Alaska.

The South gets the biggest redistribution of federal tax money because it seems least capable of helping itself out. It has:

1. The lowest per capita percent of high school diplomas.
2. The fewest college degrees per capita.
3. The highest rates of adult illiteracy, and often their illiteracy rate exceeds their unemployment rate. For example, in Mississippi, adult illiteracy is 16 percent and unemployment is 11.5 percent. Illiteracy in Alabama is 15 percent and unemployment is 11 percent. This means that Southern states have many adults working who can't read beyond the 5th-grade level. Thus:

4. The highest poverty rates and the lowest average household income in the nation.
5. The highest percentages of citizens without health insurance, yet most likely to call health care reform "socialism."
6. The most unhealthy region in the nation, leading in obesity, smoking, hypertension, diabetes, cancer deaths per 100,000 while managing to exercise the least.
7. The most violent region in the country being a majority of the top 18 states in deaths by firearms. (Louisiana: 19.5 firearm deaths per 100,000. Mississippi: 17.3 deaths per 100,000, etc., as opposed to New York with 5.1 per 100,000 or Massachusetts with 3.1 per 100,000 etc.)
8. With 35 percent of the population, the South has created only 17 percent of the nation's patents over the last 25 years. California alone, with 10 percent of the national population, has nearly 20 percent of the patents over the last 25 years.
9. Louisiana is a special welfare case having a long-established dysfunctional dependence on the oil industry in its economy, its politics and in its winking willingness to debase the environment, combining to create an oil-based modern plantation mentality. They attack the federal government on the national news every day for being slow or for failing to act to "restore our way of life" after the BP disaster, as if American taxpayers are morally obligated to maintain the oil plantation to which Louisianans' sold out long ago.

Now some Southern public office holders and seekers from Tennessee to Texas are directly or indirectly talking about secession, and this has many others wondering if that is a threat or a promise.

Redistribution of wealth? The South appears to be on the dole, and things there have a way of never managing to get any better. Perhaps our Southern brethren should stand up for their outspoken beliefs and send the money back. Or perhaps they should consider jumping on the streetcar named get serious.

(This article posted originally at <http://www.xavier.edu/politics>.)

20100922-03	17:02	Dennis	"Poverty Is Through the Roof & Billionaires Are Getting Pu*sy About Not Enough Profits"
-------------	-------	--------	---

"Poverty Is Through the Roof, and Billionaires Are Getting Pu*sy About Not Enough Profits" by Les Leopold, AlterNet
 Sept. 17, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148217/>)

The ranks of the working-age poor in the United States climbed to the highest level since the 1960s as the recession threw millions of people out of work last year, leaving one in seven Americans in poverty. The overall poverty rate climbed to 14.3 per cent, or 43.6 million people, the Census Bureau said yesterday in its annual report on the economic well-being of U.S. households.

While 43.6 million Americans live in poverty, the richest men of finance sure are getting pu*sy. First Steve Schwartzman, head of the Blackrock private equity company, compares the Obama administration's effort to close billionaires' tax loopholes to "the Nazi invasion of Poland." Then hedge fund mogul David Loeb announces that he's abandoning the Democrats because they're violating "this country's core founding principles"—including "non-punitive taxation, Constitutionally-guaranteed protections against persecution of the minority, and an inexorable right of self-determination." Instead of showing their outrage about the spread of poverty in the richest nation on Earth, the super-rich want us to pity them?

Why are Wall Street's billionaires so whiny? Is it really possible to make $900,000 an hour (not a typo—that's what the top ten hedge fund managers take in), and still feel aggrieved about the way government is treating you? After you've been bailed out by the federal government to the tune of $10 trillion (also not a typo) in loans, asset swaps, liquidity and other guarantees, can you really still feel like an oppressed minority?

You'd think the Wall Street moguls would be thankful. Not just thankful—down on their knees kissing the ground taxpayers walk on and hollering hallelujah at the top of their lungs! These guys profited from puffing up the housing bubble, then got bailed out when the going got tough. (Please see The Looting of America for all the gory details.) Without taxpayer largess, these hedge fund honchos would be flat broke. Instead, they're back to hauling in obscene profits.

These billionaires don't even have to worry about serious financial reforms. The paltry legislation that squeaked through Congress did nothing to end too big and too interconnected to fail. In fact, the biggest firms got even bigger as they gobbled up troubled banks, with the generous support of the federal government. No bank or hedge fund was broken up. Nobody was forced to pay a financial transaction tax.

None of the big boys had a cap placed on their astronomical wealth. No one's paying reparations for wrecking the U.S. economy. The big bankers are still free to create and trade the very derivatives that catapulted us into this global crisis. You'd think the billionaires would be praying on the altar of government and erecting statues on Capitol Hill in honor of St. Bailout.

Instead, standing before us are these troubled souls, haunted by visions of persecution. Why?

The world changed. Before the bubble burst, these people walked on water. Their billions proved that they were the best and the brightest—not just captains of the financial universe, but global elites who had earned a place in history. They donated serious money to worthy causes—and political campaigns. No one wanted to mess with them.

But then came the crash. And the things changed for the big guys—not so much financially as spiritually. Plebeians, including me, are asking pointed questions and sometimes even being heard, both on the Internet and in the mainstream media. For the first time in a generation, the public wants to know more about these emperors and their new clothes. For instance:

- What do these guys actually do that earns them such wealth?
- Is what they do productive and useful for society? Is there any connection between what they earn and what they produce for society?
- Did they help cause the crash?
- Did these billionaires benefit from the bailouts? If so, how much?
- Are they exacerbating the current unemployment and poverty crisis with their shenanigans?
- Why shouldn't we eliminate their tax loopholes (like carried interest)?
- Should their sky-high incomes be taxed at the same levels as during the Eisenhower years?
- Can we create the millions of jobs we need if the billionaires continue to skim off so much of our nation's wealth??
- Should we curb their wealth and political influence?

How dare we ask such questions! How dare we consider targeting them for special taxes? How dare we even think about redistributing THEIR incomes... even if at the moment much of their money comes directly from our bailouts and tax breaks?

It's true that the billionaires live in a hermetically sealed world. But that doesn't mean they don't notice the riffraff nipping at their heels. And they don't like it much.

So they've gotten busy doing what billionaires do best: using their money to shield themselves. They're digging into their bottomless war chests, tapping their vast connections and using their considerable influence to shift the debate away from them and towards the rest of us.

We borrowed too much, not them. We get too much health care, not them. We retire too soon, not them. We need to tighten our belts while they pull in another $900,000 an hour. And if we want to cure poverty, we need to get the government to leave Wall Street alone.

Sadly, their counter-offensive is starting to take hold. How can this happen? Many Americans want to relate to billionaires. They believe that all of us are entitled to make as much as we can, pretty much by any means necessary. After all, maybe someday you or I will strike it rich. And when we do, we sure don't want government regulators or the taxman coming around! Billionaires are symbols of American individual prowess and virility. And if we try to hold them back or slow them down, we're on the road to tyranny. Okay, the game is rigged in their favor. Okay, they got bailed out while the rest of us didn't—especially the 29 million people who are jobless or forced into part-time work.

But what matters most is that in America, nothing can interfere with individual moneymaking.

That only a few of us actually make it into the big-time isn't a bad thing: It's what makes being rich so special. So beware: If we enact even the mildest of measures to rein in Wall Street billionaires, we're on the path to becoming North Korea.

Unfortunately, if we don't adjust our attitudes, we can expect continued high levels of unemployment and more people pushed below the poverty line. It's not clear that our economy will ever recover as long as the Wall Street billionaires keep siphoning off so much of our wealth. How can we create jobs for the many while the few are walking off with $900,000 an hour with almost no new jobs to show for it?

In the old days, even robber barons built industries that employed people—steel, oil, railroads. Now the robber barons build palaces out of fantasy finance. We can keep coddling our financial billionaires and let our economy spiral down, or we can make them pay their fair share so we can create real jobs. These guys crashed the economy, they killed millions of jobs, and now they're cashing in on our bailout.

They owe us. They owe the unemployed. They owe the poor. Dwight D. Eisenhower was no radical, but he accepted the reality: If America was going to prosper—and pay for its costly Cold War—the super-rich would have to pony up. It was common knowledge that when the rich grew too wealthy, they used their excess incomes to speculate. In the 1950s, memories of the Great Depression loomed large, and people knew that a skewed distribution of income only fueled speculative booms and disastrous busts. On Ike's watch, the effective marginal tax rate for those earning over $3 million (in today's dollars) was over 70 percent. The super-rich paid. As a nation we respected that other important American value: advancing the common good.

For the last thirty years we've been told that making as much as you can is just another way of advancing the common good. But the Great Recession erased that equation: The Wall Streeters who made as much as they could undermined the common good. It's time to balance the scales. This isn't just redistribution of income in pursuit of some egalitarian utopia. It's a way to use public policy to reattach billionaires to the common good.

It's time to take Eisenhower's cue and redeploy the excessive wealth Wall Street's high rollers have accumulated. If we leave it in their hands, they'll keep using it to construct speculative financial casinos. Instead, we could use that money to build a stronger, more prosperous nation. We could provide our people with free higher education at all our public colleges and universities—just like we did for WWII vets under the GI Bill of Rights (a program that returned seven dollars in GDP for every dollar invested). We could fund a green energy Manhattan Project to wean us from fossil fuels. An added bonus: If we siphon some of the money off Wall Street, some of our brightest college graduates might even be attracted not to high finance but to jobs in science, education and healthcare, where we need them.

Of course, this pursuit of the common good won't be easy for the billionaires (and those who indentify with them.). But there's just no alternative for this oppressed minority: They're going to have to learn to live on less than $900,000 an hour.

(Les Leopold is the executive director of the Labor Institute and Public Health Institute in New York, and author of The Looting of America: How Wall Street's Game of Fantasy Finance Destroyed Our Jobs, Pensions, and Prosperity—and What We Can Do About It (Chelsea Green, 2009).)

© 2010 Independent Media Institute.

Thought you all would appreciate the sentiment.

Dear SteveBA,

This might be funny if it weren't such a BIG LIE! And I'm no giant fan of Obama, but not for these fictitious reasons. In fact, he has done none of these things. Where is the light of truth from the right?

Let's be honest. About all Obama has been able to do so far is to keep the sinking Bush ship of state afloat.

That he has been able to do that is testimony to his merits.

Your post today was right-on, Dennis.

Dear GaryC,

I pretty much agree with you. But I think the system is too corrupt to create more term limits. And it takes a long time for someone to become a good legislator. A third party might work but the instability scares me. And it seems like third parties are almost impossible in the U.S. for several good reasons. So we're never able to take them very seriously. Maybe that could change, but I'm not hopeful.

McCain, Palin, and most of the other Republicans seem like idiots to me. And gigantic liars.

Ya, I don't understand this running for office while holding office. All the more reason to streamline the process, as you suggest.

But while we're at it, why not just end all the corruption and see what happens? No campaign contributions over $100 or so. No lobbyists with direct access to officials in power. No regulatory or lobbyist swinging doors. Regulators punished for not regulating.

It is not the will of the people that now rules, it's the will of the big money. The consequences are similar to when Standard Oil, etc. ruled—insufficient money for a middle class, the lifeblood of America.

20100923-04 12:03 SteveB Re: "Speak, Money"

Dear Pam,

Washington, DC is exactly like Tijuana or Warez or any of the other Mexican border communities. The murder rates aren't even that different. Money rules! Not justice or fairness or kindness. Greed! Power!

This is about what I expect, given the circumstances, but I know many of my liberal friends are very disillusioned. My conservative friends are simply insane, but no more so than the liberals. Both parties, both philosophies, both poles are wrong. (One more so than the other!) That's all there is to it. We live in a time of disconnect from the truth.

Your son, Tanner, sounds a lot like my daughter, Marissa. She's a vegan. She subscribes to every liberal cause...right or wrong. She feels sorry for illegal immigrants. She doesn't think any of her professors do any brain washing or have had theirs washed. She loves nothing more than to camp out like a hippie and listen to live music all night.

I say, more power to her! She's a wonderful, loving, very smart girl with lots of friends. I'm very proud of her, even if we don't always agree.

Plastic? What's with plastic? My Bolivian father-in-law won't touch plastic or eat anything that has. He's been like that his whole life. He won't even permit a plastic tablecloth in his house. Should I stop eating plastic now too?

Tomorrow is Bolivia's 200th Birthday! This means a 5-day weekend. The parties started yesterday, but the big beauty pageant, live concert, and fireworks will be tonight, near my condo. I'll probably just stay home and watch the fireworks from my balcony. Forget trying to conduct any business for most of the five days.

20100923-05 15:47 Dennis "GOP's New 'Pledge to America': A Pathetic, Destructive Sham"

Newest Contract on America by GOP...

The devil must be in the details. What? There are no details....

"GOP's New 'Pledge to America': A Pathetic, Destructive Sham" posted by stevebenen

Sept. 23, 2010, (<http://blogs.alternet.org/speakeasy/2010/09/23/gops-newly-unveiled-pledge-to-america-is-a-destructive-sham/>)

(This post first appeared on the Washington Monthly.)

Months in the making, House Republicans will unveil a new agenda this afternoon, and it's called the "Pledge to America." It won't be formally released for a few hours, but the contents are already online, offering us a chance to see what the GOP has in store.

Barring a dramatic last-minute overhaul, the "Pledge" appears to be something of a joke. I saw one analysis last night that characterized the document as "ridiculous," "laughable," and "dreck." The review added, "This document proves the GOP is more focused on the acquisition of power than the advocacy of long term sound public policy."

Did this come from the DNC? No, it came by way of a leading Republican media personality.

Looking at the bigger picture, it's tempting to think House Republicans deserve at least some credit for making the effort. After all, the GOP hasn't even tried to craft a policy agenda in many years. The point of the "Pledge," presumably, is to help demonstrate that congressional Republicans aren't just the "party of no"; this is a new GOP prepared to reclaim the mantle of "party of ideas."

But that's precisely why the endeavor is such an embarrassing failure. The document combines old ideas, bad ideas, contradictory ideas, and discredited ideas. The Republican Party that lost control of Congress four years ago has had an abundance of time to craft a policy vision that offered credible, serious solutions. Instead, we're confronted with a document that can best be described as tired nonsense.

Ezra Klein's take was entirely in line with my own:

You're left with a set of hard promises that will increase the deficit by trillions of dollars, take health-care insurance away from tens of millions of people, create a level of policy uncertainty businesses have never previously known, and suck demand out of an economy that's already got too little of it.

You're also left with a difficult question: What, exactly, does the Republican Party believe? The document speaks constantly and eloquently of the dangers of debt—but offers a raft of proposals that would sharply increase it. It says, in one paragraph, that the Republican Party will commit itself to "greater liberty" and then, in the next, that it will protect "traditional marriage." It says that "small business must have certainty that the rules won't change every few months" and then promises to change all the rules that the Obama administration has passed in recent months. It is a document with a clear theory of what has gone wrong—debt, policy uncertainty, and too much government—and a solid promise to make most of it worse.

If Republicans set out to prove that they're wholly unprepared and incapable of governing effectively, they've succeeded beautifully. That may have been obvious when there was an actual GOP majority and they failed on a spectacular, generational scale, but any hopes that the party has since learned valuable lessons quickly fade with the release of the "Pledge to America."

Indeed, the moral of the story this morning is very likely the fact that Republicans probably shouldn't even try. Last year, the House GOP released an alternative budget, which was so tragically pathetic, it neglected to include any numbers. Several months later, the House GOP released an alternative health care reform plan, which made no effort to actually improve a dysfunctional system.

And today, the House GOP will release a "Pledge" that simply doesn't make any sense to those who take reality seriously. It's a reminder that the Republican Party just isn't good at this sort of thing. It excels in attack ads, smear campaigns, and media manipulation; but the GOP struggles badly, to the point of comedy, when asked to do substantive work.

Ultimately, it may not matter. Voters are frustrated by a weak economy, and so Democrats are very likely to lose badly in November, even if they're being punished for trying to clean the GOP's mess. But electoral success for Republicans in the fall need not translate to an endorsement of this "Pledge." It's a transparent sham.

20100923-06	19:43	SteveB	Re: Motivational Poster: A Finger for President Obama
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear SteveBA,

You know, I can't help but wonder...

If Obama and his administration were so incompetent as to allow Al-Qaeda to bomb us, as Bush and his boys were. (Yet I don't recall much criticism of this fact.) Then, if Obama decided to start yet another worthless war in retaliation with maybe Iran or Pakistan this time...

Would the Republicans be happy and stand behind him or would he still be just a black non-American Democrat?

My guess is the latter. What a sad state of affairs our great country has sunk to.

20100924-01 08:18 SteveB "Hidden Under Tax-Exempt Cloak, Political Dollars Flow"
--

U.S.A.: #1 in Corruption!

Mexico and Afghanistan may have their drug cartel corruption. You might have to bribe an official in Bolivia or China to get him to do his job. But the mother of all corruption is right in good ol' America. This is one of the ways the rich and powerful manage to buy our politicians, stealing our freedom and way of life right from under our noses.

"Hidden Under Tax-Exempt Cloak, Political Dollars Flow" by Mike McIntire, New York Times

Sept. 23, 2010, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/09/24/us/politics/24donate.html?pagewanted=all>)

(Nonprofit advocacy groups allow the wealthy to influence elections without revealing themselves, watchdogs claim.)

Alaskans grew suspicious two years ago when a national organization called Americans for Job Security showed up and spent $1.6 million pushing a referendum to restrict development of a gold and copper mine at the headwaters of Bristol Bay. It seemed an oddly parochial fight for a pro-business group based in the Washington suburbs that had spent tens of millions of dollars since the late 1990s roughing up Democrats with negative advertisements around election time.

But after the mine's supporters filed a complaint with the state, it became clear that what was depicted as grass-roots opposition was something else entirely: Americans for Job Security, investigators found, had helped create the illusion of a popular upwelling to shield the identity of a local financier who paid for most of the referendum campaign.

More broadly, they said, far from being a national movement advocating a "pro-paycheck message," the group is actually a front for a coterie of political operatives, devised to sidestep campaign disclosure rules.

"Americans for Job Security has no purpose other than to cover various money trails all over the country," the staff of the Alaska Public Offices Commission said in a report last year.

The report went mostly unnoticed outside Anchorage. But its conclusions suddenly loom large in the current debate over nonprofit advocacy groups like Americans for Job Security, which campaign watchdogs say allow moneyed interests to influence elections without revealing themselves. Congress is now wrangling over a bill that would require some disclosure.

With every election cycle comes a shadow army of benignly titled nonprofit groups like Americans for Job Security, devoted to politically charged "issue advocacy," much of it negative.

But they are now being heard as never before—in this year of midterm discontent, Tea Party ferment and the first test of the Supreme Court decision allowing unlimited, and often anonymous, corporate political spending. Already they have spent more than $100 million—mostly for Republicans and more than twice as much as at this point four years ago.

None have been more active than Americans for Job Security, which spent $6 million on ads during the primary season.

Political attack ads

This week, emboldened by the court ruling, the group paid close to $4 million more for ads directly attacking nine Democratic candidates for Congress. That made it among the first to abandon the old approach of running ads that stopped just short of explicitly urging voters to elect or reject individual candidates.

Americans for Job Security says it is careful to hew to tax and campaign-finance laws: It may not spend the majority of its resources on political activity or coordinate with party committees, and may keep its donors secret only as long as their contributions are not intended for specific ad campaigns close to an election. Instead of earmarked donations, the group says, it collects membership dues and then decides, on its own, how to spend the money.

"We believe issue advocacy is much more effective than banging down doors of members of Congress," said the group's president, Stephen DeMaura. "And you now have the Supreme Court of the United States reaffirming our rights."

An examination of Americans for Job Security—based on a review of its recent activities, as well as on interviews and previously unreleased documents from the Alaska case—provides a rare look inside the opaque world of these ascendant advocacy organizations.

Its deep ties to a Republican consulting operation raise questions about whether, under cover of its tax-exempt mission "to promote a strong, job-creating economy," the group is largely a funnel for anonymous donations.

"A lot of nonprofits game the system, but A.J.S. is unusual in that they so blatantly try to influence elections and evade disclosure," said Taylor Lincoln, a research director at the watchdog group Public Citizen, which has filed complaints against the group in recent years. "By any common-sense, reasonable interpretation of what they do, they are in violation of the rules."

Drop box address

The group's Republican connections begin with location: While its public address is a drop box at a United Parcel Service store in Alexandria, Va., Mr. DeMaura actually works out of space that is sublet from a Republican consulting shop, Crossroads Media, whose other clients include the national Republican Party, the Republican Governors Association and American Crossroads, a Karl Rove-backed group raising millions to support Republican candidates.

Crossroads Media is run by Michael Dubke and David Carney, who along with several business groups helped start Americans for Job Security in 1997.

Mr. Carney had been political director for President George Bush, and Mr. Dubke was the first executive director and then president of Americans for Job Security until Apr., 2008, when Mr. DeMaura, recruited by Mr. Carney, took over.

The office space in Alexandria that the group shares with Crossroads Media—Suite 555 at 66 Canal Center Plaza, overlooking the Potomac—is home to at least three other political consulting firms, including the Black Rock Group, which Mr. Dubke runs with Carl Forti, a longtime Republican operative who is political director for American Crossroads.

As for Mr. DeMaura, it turns out he is the sole employee of Americans for Job Security, a 25-year-old former executive director of the New Hampshire Republican Party who cut his political teeth as an undergraduate by starting an anti-Hillary Clinton Facebook page.

The chairwoman of the group's board of directors is listed in tax filings as Tabitha Connor, a Columbia University graduate student, also in her 20s. She did not respond to requests for comment.

According to testimony in the Alaska case, the board meets once every two years, and there are no committees or written policies shaping decisions about ad campaigns. Mr. DeMaura said he made those calls. He disputed suggestions that he was influenced by the consultants with whom he shares an office.

"I work with them closely on a day-to-day basis, but we don't discuss our work or coordinate anything," he said. "It's firewalled off."

'The letter of the law'

Mr. Dubke, too, denied that the agenda of Americans for Job Security was driven by the political interests of his firms.

"Nothing is ever done in coordination with another campaign," he said. "I'm always trying to follow the letter of the law."

Still, while he is no longer an officer of Americans for Job Security, Mr. Dubke remains a consultant and has authority to countersign its checks. Crossroads Media also places many of the group's ads.

It is sometimes hard to discern the boundaries separating Americans for Job Security from the consultants in its office suite and the interests of their Republican clients. This month in upstate New York, the National Republican Congressional Committee—a sometime client of Mr. Dubke's—sent local reporters an Americans for Job Security announcement and transcript of a new ad opposing a Democratic congressman, Representative Michael Arcuri. A committee spokesman said he was not coordinating anything with the advocacy group, but merely passing along "a public document." The document, however, could not be found on the group's Web site, and a reporter who received it said the committee was his only source for it. In May, the group ran an ad attacking a labor-backed Democrat in an Arkansas Senate primary, Bill Halter, for having served on the board of a technology company that opened an office in India.

The ad—placed by Crossroads and produced by another Republican-connected company in the office suite, WWP Strategies—played ethnic music, featured Indians in colorful garb expressing gratitude toward Mr. Halter for their jobs, and was widely derided as insulting toward people from India.

And in Texas in 2008, while Mr. DeMaura's office mates were consulting for the state Republican Party, he requested records from the Nueces County sheriff's office on an incident in which a woman ran naked from the home of a prominent Democratic donor, who was arrested after flashing a phony badge at the police.

The disgraced donor was soon featured in a Republican Party television ad linking him to Democratic candidates for the Texas legislature. Mr. DeMaura said his request was not connected to the ad, but would not explain why he had sought the records.

Electioneering complaint

Other aspects of the group's operations have come under scrutiny as well. In 2007, Public Citizen filed complaints with the Internal Revenue Service and the Federal Election Commission, contending that Americans for Job Security spent the vast majority of its resources electioneering—running ads close to elections—contrary to I.R.S. guidelines for tax-exempt, nonprofit business groups.

Public Citizen said it never heard back from the I.R.S. At the election commission, staff lawyers agreed that there was "reason to believe" that the group had violated campaign finance laws, and recommended a full investigation. But the commission deadlocked along party lines, and the complaint was dropped.

Because Americans for Job Security was formed as a tax-exempt business league—known as a 501(c)(6) in the tax code—it does not have to report its sources of income. Federal election rules, though, require that when a group accepts a donation earmarked for an electioneering ad, the donor must be identified. Americans for Job Security avoids disclosure by reporting all its revenue as "membership dues." It claims more than 1,000 members. But a review of its tax returns shows membership revenue fluctuating wildly depending on election cycles—similar to the fund-raising of political committees that escalates during campaign season.

"Membership dues and assessments" totaled $7 million in the 2004 presidential election, and dipped to $1.2 million the following year before climbing back to $3.9 million for the 2006 midterm elections. Then, in 2007, they plunged to zero before shooting up to $12.2 million for the 2008 presidential race.

Asked how it could have collected no dues in 2007, neither Mr. Dubke nor Mr. DeMaura offered an answer. Mr. DeMaura said that there is no set membership fee and that members are not required to pay annually.

"They can if they want," he said.

A hidden hand in Alaska

Probably the most extensive look at the operations of Americans for Job Security came during the inquiry in Alaska. Through a public information request, The New York Times obtained records from the investigation, including the group's internal emails and memorandums, as well as the sworn testimony of Mr. Dubke and others.

The group ended up in Alaska through Mr. Dubke's work for opponents of the proposed Pebble Mine, led by an Alaska financier, Robert Gillam, whose private fishing lodge could be affected.

The opponents said the mine would endanger commercial fishing and pushed a ballot initiative aimed at imposing clean-water restrictions on it; its backers said the mine would create jobs.

Mr. Dubke's work for Mr. Gillam was called Operation Trenchcoat, documents show, and involved finding out who was behind a pro-mine Web site called Bob Gillam Can't Buy Alaska.

Mr. Gillam testified that he spoke with Mr. Dubke about Americans for Job Security, and decided to join by giving $2 million in "membership fees," and that he "had high hopes" the money would be used to oppose the mine. (The ballot initiative ultimately failed.)

State investigators found that the advocacy group quickly passed almost all the money to another nonprofit, Alaskans for Clean Water, set up to campaign for the referendum by a group that included Art Hackney, a local Republican consultant and board member of Americans for Job Security.

Mr. DeMaura told investigators that while he may have talked to Mr. Dubke about the mine issue, he decided to spend the money "based upon his own research and judgment," and that there was no prior agreement with Mr. Gillam or Mr. Dubke. The Alaska Public Offices Commission's staff report called this "completely implausible" and concluded that Americans for Job Security had violated state law by acting as an improper conduit. It also took a shot at the group's explanation that it protects its members' identities so they can speak out without fear of reprisals.

"One would hardly expect reprisals for 'promoting a healthy and vibrant economy,'" the report said.

The group's lawyers accused the staff of making "reckless and baseless" accusations and of "misrepresenting a respected entity like A.J.S., known nationally for its skill and sophistication in conducting educational and issue-related campaigns."

In a legal filing, they also worried that the allegations could be noticed "by the local, and potentially national, press."

Americans for Job Security eventually paid a $20,000 settlement without admitting guilt and agreed not to help anyone make anonymous contributions in an election in Alaska—with the condition that its pledge "does not apply to any other jurisdiction which may have laws dissimilar to the state."

Copyright © 2010 The New York Times

20100924-02 08:22 SteveB Re: "GOP's New 'Pledge to America': A Pathetic, Destructive Sham"

Dear Dennis,

Ludicrous! (Not the article, the pledge.)

20100924-03 12:06 SteveB Re: The Photos Say It All

Dear Laurel,

True enough. But one of them started wars, and one of them ends them. One of them completely sold his soul to the big money, and one of them is still thinking about what price he would need. They're all corrupt politicians, but my point #1 might be more important than the equipment they use.

20100924-04 12:24 SteveB Fw: "Stupid is, as Stupid Does....."

Dear Laurel,

No, "They can't possibly be Americans!" LOL!!!!

I'm thinking... they're from another planet!

Maybe Photoshopped? haha. Actually, from, I guess, 2002.

See: <http://www.snopes.com/politics/obama/photos/lefthand.asp>.

All things are not what they seems, and the Obamas being un-American is apparently one of them!

But I can understand the confusion with this issue, since the Republican "lie-machine" has been grinding on it for quite some time now, 'ey? The troops drift off to sleep...and begin to lose their grip on reality...holy sh*t!

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Stupid is, as Stupid Does.....

Unbelievable

As any American knows, we place our right hand over our heart when we recite the Pledge of Allegiance. And for anyone who thinks this may be a mirror-image picture, please note the wedding rings on the ring fingers of their LEFT HANDS and the RIGHT side of the Messiahs suit coat where the buttons are. They can't possibly be Americans!

20100925-01

12:34

Dennis

"New Rule: Rich People Who Complain About Being Vilified Should Be Vilified"

What wimpy-a*sed Democrats won't say...

"New Rule: Rich People Who Complain About Being Vilified Should Be Vilified" by Bill Maher, Huffington Post

Sept. 24, 2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/bill-maher/new-rule-rich-people-who- b_737429.html)

New Rule: The next rich person who publicly complains about being vilified by the Obama administration must be publicly vilified by the Obama administration. It's so hard for one person to tell another person what constitutes being "rich", or what tax rate is "too much." But I've done some math that indicates that, considering the hole this country is in, if you are earning more than a million dollars a year and are complaining about a 3.6% tax increase, then you are by definition a greedy a*s-hole.

And let's be clear: that's 3.6% only on income above 250 grand—your first 250, that's still on the house. Now, this week we got some horrible news: that one in seven Americans are now living below the poverty line. But I want to point you to an American who is truly suffering: Ben Stein. You know Ben Stein, the guy who got rich because when he talks it sounds so boring it's actually funny. He had a game show on Comedy Central, does eye drop commercials, doesn't believe in evolution? Yeah, that a*s-hole. I kid Ben—so, the other day Ben wrote an article about his struggle. His struggle as a wealthy person facing the prospect of a slightly higher marginal tax rate. Specifically, Ben said that when he was finished paying taxes and his agents, he was left with only 35 cents for every dollar he earned. Which is shocking, Ben Stein has an agent? I didn't know Broadway Danny Rose was still working.

Ben whines in his article about how he's worked for every dollar he has—if by work you mean saying the word "Bueller" in a movie 25 years ago. Which doesn't bother me in the slightest, it's just that at a time when people in America are desperate and you're raking in the bucks promoting some sleazy Free Credit Score dot-com... maybe you shouldn't be asking us for sympathy. Instead, you should be down on your knees thanking God and/or Ronald Reagan that you were lucky enough to be born in a country where a useless schmuck who contributes absolutely nothing to society can somehow manage to find himself in the top marginal tax bracket.

And you're welcome to come on the show anytime.

Now I can hear you out there saying, "Come on Bill, don't be so hard on Ben Stein, he does a lot of voiceover work, and that's hard work." Ok, it's true, Ben is hardly the only rich person these days crying like a baby who's fallen off his bouncy seat. Last week Mayor Bloomberg of New York complained that all his wealthy friends are very upset with mean ol' President Poopy-Pants: He said they all say the same thing: "I knew I was going to have to pay more taxes. But I didn't expect to be vilified." Poor billionaires—they just can't catch a break.

First off, far from being vilified, we bailed you out—you mean we were supposed to give you all that money and kiss your a*s, too? That's Hollywood you're thinking of. FDR, he knew how to vilify; this guy, not so much. And second, you should have been vilified—because you're the villains! I'm sure a lot of you are very nice people. And I'm sure a lot of you are jerks. In other words, you're people. But you are the villains. Who do you think outsourced all the jobs, destroyed the unions, and replaced workers with desperate immigrants and teenagers in China. Joe the Plumber?

And right now, while we run trillion dollar deficits, Republicans are holding America hostage to the cause of preserving the Bush tax cuts that benefit the wealthiest 1% of people, many of them dead. They say that we need to keep taxes on the rich low because they're the job creators. They're not. They're much more likely to save money through mergers and outsourcing and cheap immigrant labor, and pass the unemployment along to you.

Americans think rich people must be brilliant; no—just ruthless. Meg Whitman is running for Governor out here, and her claim to fame is, she started e-Bay. Yes, Meg tapped into the Zeitgeist, the zeitgeist being the desperate need of millions of Americans to scrape a few dollars together by selling the useless cr*p in their garage. What is e-Bay but a big cyber lawn sale that you can visit without putting your clothes on?

Another of my favorites, Congresswoman Michele Bachmann said, "I don't know where they're going to get all this money, because we're running out of rich people in this country." Actually, we have more billionaires here in the U.S. than all the other countries in the top ten combined, and their wealth grew 27% in the last year. Did yours? Truth is, there are only two things that the United States is not running out of: Rich people and bullsh*t. Here's the truth: When you raise taxes slightly on the wealthy, it obviously doesn't destroy the economy—we know this, because we just did it—remember the '90's? It wasn't that long ago. You were probably listening to grunge music, or dabbling in witchcraft. Clinton moved the top marginal rate from 36 to 39%—and far from tanking, the economy did so well he had time to get his dick washed.

Even 39% isn't high by historical standards. Under Eisenhower, the top tax rate was 91%. Under Nixon, it was 70%. Obama just wants to kick it back to 39—just three more points for the very rich. Not back to 91, or 70. Three points. And they go insane. Steve Forbes said that Obama, quote "believes from his inner core that people... above a certain income have more than they should have and that many probably have gotten it from ill-gotten ways." Which they have. Steve Forbes, of course, came by his fortune honestly: he inherited it from his gay egg-collecting, Elizabeth Taylor fag-hugging father, who inherited it from his father. Of course then they moan about the inheritance tax, how the government took 55% percent when Daddy died—which means you still got 45% for doing nothing more than starting out life as your father's pecker-snot.

We don't hate rich people, but have a little humility about how you got it and stop complaining. Maybe the worst whiner of all: Stephen Schwarzman, #69 on Forbes' list of richest Americans, compared Obama's tax hike to "when Hitler invaded Poland in 1939." Wow. If Obama were Hitler, Mr. Schwarzman, I think your tax rate would be the least of your worries.

20100925-02 15:55 Dennis Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..." [see 09/02/08, above]

from SteveBA:

Hope Columbo comes up with the right answers. I imagine some is already public record.

Dear SteveBA,

Geez, doesn't the extreme right wackosphere get tired of recirculating these garbage e-mails year after year? This faux Columbo tripe was long ago discredited by Fact Check:

<http://www.factcheck.org/2010/01/clueless-columbo/>.

20100926-01 07:44 SteveB Re: "Ah...Sorry to Bother You..."

Dear Dennis and SteveBA,

AMEN!

But I'm sure Obama's record at Harvard must have been pretty bad...he was only the editor of the Harvard Law Review. Right?

And I'm sure the University of Chicago Law School would never think to check Obama's credentials before hiring him as a law professor.

The birth certificate crock reminds me of "facts: like we never landed on the moon and it's made of green cheese. I guess the world must be flat too.

Why is it that Republicans seem to be so unable to find lies that are actually believable?

None of this kind of stupidity serves our nation well!!!!!!!

20100926-02 08:09 SteveB Re: "New Rule..."

About as plainly as it can be said!

The big, greedy Republican lie-machine has been at it again!

Now we're supposed to feel sorry for American billionaires! It boggles the mind!

20100926-03 12:55 Mary Re: "New Rule..."

Dear SteveB,

You want me to assign credibility to an article written by Maher? And wasn't it you who agreed with Dennis (article he'd sent) that ignorant people think with emotion? What is THIS article filled with? Besides 1/2 truths and childish name calling, it epitomizes that "sophomoric humor" I'd accused you of earlier that you didn't think was a fair description. Article was very nasty.....you show no respect by forwarding it, and you will forthwith be filtered from my email, as will Dennis. BUT FIRST.....since you're so into humor, let me share some "Reaganisms" with you:

The trouble with our liberal friends is not that they're ignorant; it's just that they know so much that isn't so.

The most terrifying words in the English language are: "I'm from the government and I'm here to help."

Government is like a baby: An alimentary canal with a big appetite at one end and no sense of responsibility at the other. [Yet, perhaps (one hopes) a greater sense of responsibility than big business, big finance, and the super-rich. —SteveB]

20100926-04 14:34 SteveB Re: "New Rule..."

Dear Mary,

Once again, you completely fail to appreciate a little mere humor. You're going to filter me from your email? And Dennis? LOL

What is that? You can't stomach other views? You're afraid of them? Can't take the heat? The truth will out, but I'm sorry to hear that you're going to join our little roundtable just to run away again, almost immediately.

I am reminded of your response (which I guess I deleted) to my comments concerning the article Dennis sent 'round about Christine O'Donnell's stance that masturbation should be illegal (essentially).

Your response to me was basically, "Why would you pick-on poor Christine and try to hurt her for positions she took years ago when she was young." You never stated whether you also thought the position was stupid, but I suppose you don't want to find yourself in agreement, even on something as cut and dry (and important) as this.

But I'll tell you the truth: Stupidity is not a problem alleviated by age. Maybe ignorance, but not stupidity. Just the opposite. I'm certain O'Donnell's positions and thinking remain as stupid today as they were then. It's only logical.

Could it be possible that many of the extreme right-wing, Tea Party, Sarah Palin positions are just as stupid as the masturbation one? Excluding of course the witchcraft one. Do they have a position on UFO's and abductions? I'd love to know their thoughts on that. I'm sure they all think (maybe you too?) that masturbation, witchcraft, and UFO's are the important political issues of the day.

Meanwhile, the real important issues of the day go unaddressed by the right (in particular)—jobs, free trade, healthcare, realistic taxation, immigration, education, war, deficit spending, the disparity of rich and poor in America...the list could go on forever because these issues have gone unaddressed, pretty much, in our entire lifetimes.

Do you really feel the America George Bush and Dick Cheney left us with is the one you want to pass on to your grandchildren? If so, I'm amazed that you don't like your grandchildren better than that (just kidding). Personally, I dream of a more perfect union.

Thank you for your contributions.

20100926-05 23:09 SteveG Election Reform / Term Limits

Dear SteveB and Mary,

All politicians in the U.S. seem to be snakes in the grass at this point. Their biggest concern seems to be getting elected or re-elected and they will do or say whatever they think or their campaign folks will fly. I really don't think any can be trusted on a long term basis. Campaign reform is a must and term limits are a must, but never will happen.

20100927-01 08:32 SteveB Re: Election Reform / Term Limits

Dear SteveG and Mary,

I agree completely, except that I have hope. If the electorate would just get itself together and defeat every incumbent, every election, every time, I don't think it would take many election cycles (maybe just one!) to wake these corrupt bastards up. Then, once they learn who their bosses really are, maybe real campaign finance, lobbying, and regulatory reform can begin.

I'm not ready to give up yet, but it's going to take some kind of non-violent, "gentle" revolution like this to take the country back from the big money, military, and special interests. Maybe it will require a third party, though I find that a scary proposition I'd rather not be needed. Call me a traditionalist at heart.

20100927-02 13:37 Dennis Re: Election Reform / Term Limits

Dear Steve,

Hate to be skeptical of any ideas that are the least bit hopeful, but electing new politicians every cycle would just produce more lobbyists with legislative connections. Limiting terms would only produce totally inexperienced legislative bodies who would rely on lobbyists to be able to operate.

I'd be for strict campaign finance reform and abolishing lobbyists, but do you think the corporate elite (kleptocracy) would ever give up its power?

20100927-03 16:08 SteveB Re: Election Reform / Term Limits

Dear Dennis,

I think that if it happened just one time, all across the country, that the shock and awe would revolutionize America. Think about what a radical thing it truly would be—the electorate...actually in control, at least marginally.

You're right, nothing short of that is ever going to allow us to end the tyranny of the big bucks.

20100927-04 16:11 Dennis Re: Election Reform / Term Limits

Dear SteveB,

I think what you're describing is the aspiration of the Tea Party movement. Be careful what you wish for.

20100927-05 16:21 SteveB Re: Election Reform / Term Limits

Dear Dennis,

Haha.

Well...except that, whether they know it or not (maybe some do), as the article you sent 'round the other day pointed out, the Tea Party movement's goal is the opposite of mine. They seek to maintain and broaden the tyranny of the big bucks (and the small minds, by invading the privacy of our bedrooms, knickers, and wombs).

Isn't it funny that the radical right talks so much about freedom, liberty, the Constitution, and protecting it, yet look at the way the Bushies trashed their sacred document.

20100927-06 10:31 GaryC My Income Taxes

Dear SteveB,

If we are talking about the will of the people, then I think everyone needs to pay some taxes before they vote. If you don't have a dog in the fight (tax money) then I don't think you are qualified to vote and say how the money is spent. If even poor people had to pay a very minimal tax, then I think they would think more about the process and the corruption created to buy their vote.

[These seem like very strange statements to me. Maybe just white male property owners should be able to vote, because they understand better "the corruption created to buy their vote"? —SteveB]

Poor people are just pawns of the system now and really don't understand that there is always a price to pay for the free lunch. I know that you feel Republicans are greedy and corrupt but consider what Democrats do to poor people to get their vote then bend them over and f*ck them.

[Democrats do what? What is your point? —SteveB]

40 years ago, I was in the lowest tax bracket and now I am in the top .001%. I pay more taxes than most small towns.

[You need to make about $8 million/year to be in the top 1%. So you're making at least $100 million per year? Funny you're not more famous. —SteveB]

And, I get very little from the government in return (defense, infrastructure, police protection). I could easily change my citizenship to many other locales but I prefer to try and make the U.S. better.

[You'd pay the same taxes on money you earn in the U.S., which is where you earn your money, right? —SteveB]

I hope that there are many in the lowest 1% that can make it like I did. However, the U.S. government has never ever given me anything.

[Not true! You enjoyed the benefits of the whole system! —SteveB]

I truly wish that all poor persons had the chance to make it like I have but I don't see it happening today with the Democrats making anyone that is poor a victim.

[Those damned Democrats should simply stop making the poor so poor! —SteveB]

Trust me; I am not a fan of the Republican Party either. I feel I have done more to help young poor people have a better life by employing them, training them and helping them find other jobs that any government program I am aware of. But, Democrats make successful business people like me out as greedy and callous.

Where in the hell do young undereducated people find jobs in the U.S. today? Not with big companies or the government but with small business. Who drives the engine of job creation in the U.S.? Small business. Where is most of the innovation in the U.S.? Small business.

[So who's against small business? Not the democrats. I'll tell you who the only people are who are against small business—BIG business! —SteveB]

The funny thing is that I don't give a sh*t about the amount of money I make. I truly enjoy creating new companies and new opportunities for people. But, I am the f*cking bad guy for the Democrats.

20100928-01	07:37	SteveB	Re: My Income Taxes
-------------	-------	--------	---------------------

Dear GaryC,

To me, this is a truly great email! It raises points that both parties never touch upon, not even the Republicans. I guess they both just take the heart and soul of America so much for granted that it is invisible to them. All we hear about is taxation, taxation, government, government, when the some solutions lie outside that sphere, I think. I love your email and hope you don't mind my forwarding it to my friends in an open way. By the way, I'm sure that, as always, my friends are your friends because we're friends. Does that make sense?

I kind of like your idea of having to pay a small tax to vote. I don't think it will ever happen. Maybe people could just prove that they have paid or filed their taxes to vote? Here in Bolivia every eligible person MUST vote! Even we immigrants. It's the law. If you don't vote, you face a hefty fine. Every eligible voter must also be on a list, like a jury list in the States, to serve mandatory election duty. All, or almost all, of the election workers are the people themselves. The elections are always on Sunday (Tuesdays seem stupid to me) and almost no one works that day, so everyone can vote. If it is your turn to help-out, you get a voucher to have a day off from your regular work with pay. I have written previously about how campaign media commercials are not allowed here and campaigning is severely limited, so campaign expenses are low, so big money corruption of elections is controlled better. And this is supposed to be such a corrupt country, but unlike the U.S., not their elections. I think it's a good system and people take their elections here very seriously. Not that the results are always so great here either. Evo Morales is a great example of elected stupidity.

I feel our American system is so corrupt, though, that no meaningful reform of any kind can take place until the corruption is ended first.

As I have said before, at this time and maybe at all times, the most important thing for a country, after peace, is jobs! Unless you want to be stuck in time like the U.S.S.R., or Cuba, or China before capitalism, the engine of this job creation cannot and should not be the government. The government creates no wealth. The engine of a free country is private enterprise—capitalism. Some Democrats may think this is some kind of evil thought or word, but I haven't run into one in a long time.

The life blood of capitalism is capital. Capital exists only when there are disparities in capital accumulation in a society. And it is the accumulation of capital which creates industries and jobs, not necessarily rich people. Let me give an example. Imagine a country where everyone who works makes exactly the same pay and that pay is enough for a good life. Those who do not work make half that. Only corporate profits are taxed (with a flat tax). The people of this imaginary country are industrious and frugal, so they save a lot of money. No one is rich, but almost everyone who works has quite a lot of money saved. This money in the banks, which actually belongs to the people, becomes the accumulation of capital which drives the economy, with no rich people at all. The pension funds in America represent as much of a job-creating source of investment as rich people.

Government may not be the solution to our problems inherently, but the right government is essential to allow the system to operate fairly. Taxation and law must be applied to help all people by helping business, but not to the point of total surrender to big money the way many Republicans seem to want. But, come on Democrats, you can't get something for nothing. You can't pretend that government is the direct solution to our problems, the end all and be all of existence, or the creator of wealth. As our founding fathers knew, government is essentially inefficient and potentially evil. Unfortunately...it is necessary, my Republican friends! Let's make it work right. We need less disparity of wealth for the system to work right.

The Republicans need to understand the greed which feeds us can also destroy us. It must be controlled. We have surely learned this since the Industrial Revolution began, but we must not forget it. They Republicans also need to understand that in a free country we are free. Free from their tyranny of religion and imposed morality. Free from their entry to my bedroom and schools. They need to understand that the capitalist system and it's necessary disparities needs a little redistribution of wealth for the good of all. People thought Henry Ford was crazy when he started paying his workers an unheard of $5 and hour, but, as he said, that's what people had to make to be able to buy his cars. The wealthy or not-so-wealthy consumer is an essential part of the system. Destroy people's ability to consume, leave them without jobs, and the system comes crashing down around our ears, as it is currently trying to do. I see unions, controlled equally to enterprise by law, to be an essential part of this system. Their destruction is hurting the middle class and all of us. We need more middle class, not less.

There is much more to be said. I hope the discussion will continue. We are in deep trouble as a nation, I fear. Both our great political parties have sold the country down the river. Big money rules, not the people. It is time for the people to take control back, before it is too late.

20100928-02	16:15	SteveB	"10 Signs the U.S. Is Losing Its Influence in the Western Hemisphere"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Something seems to be going wrong, doesn't it? And the trend has been long and continuing. Do you really think you can blame it on the Republicans or the Democrats? The only thing that makes sense is to blame it on something larger. The decline and fall of America is larger than any one political party, and it's too bad that neither party seems to want stop it.

Let's stop the inter-party bickering and work together to change the course of the nation.

If you identify yourself as a Republican or a Democrat rather than simply an American, you're part of the problem!

"10 Signs the U.S. Is Losing Its Influence in the Western Hemisphere" by Gus Lubin, Business Insider

Sept. 27, 2010, (<http://finance.yahoo.com/tech-ticker/10-signs-the-us-is-losing-its-influence-in-the-western-hemisphere-535456.html?tickers=eem,ewz,fxi,eeb,jjm,%5Edji,xle>)

We won't be the alpha dog in the western hemisphere forever. Even if the U.S. hadn't crashed into a financial crisis, there are demographic, material, and political forces that have been spreading power around the Americas for decades.

Brazil is first among the BRICs (Brazil, Russia, India, and China)—four economies that are supposed to overtake the six largest Western economies by 2032. Mexico is first among the MAVINS (Mexico, Australia, Vietnam, Indonesia, Nigeria, and South Africa)—six economies we expect to blow away expectations and become leading powers in their regions relatively soon. Canada and Venezuela are oil powers of the distant future. Peru and Chile are sitting on a fortune of metals and minerals. All these countries are cranking up, while America faces plenty of fiscal and demographic problems at home.

Here are Signs the U.S. Is Losing Its Influence In Its Own Backyard:

1. Our most powerful regional ally—Brazil—refuses to follow our orders on Iran. Hillary Clinton went to Brazil to beg support for sanctions against Iran and came away empty handed. Now the UN is counting on Brazil, which is friendly with America and Iran, to lead nuclear diplomacy.
2. The World's Richest Man is now a Mexican, not an American. For the first time in 16 years, the World's Richest Man is not an American. Carlos Slim, worth $54 billion, is the first Latin American to hold that title and one of many emerging market billionaires to eclipse the U.S.
3. Three years after a U.S. financial crisis, Latin America is again growing rapidly. The U.S.? Not so much...

Compare this to what happened during the Great Depression. Latin America was devastated when U.S. investment dried up and the export market soured in the 30s. A League of Nations report said Chile, Peru, and Bolivia suffered the world's worst depression.

Today is quite different. Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico have led a buoyant recovery from the global recession, according to Reuters. The regional economy is expected by the UN to grow 4.3 percent in 2010. If the American consumer remains weak, Latin American exports will move elsewhere.

Chile produces 300% more copper than America. America used to lead the world in copper production. We produced 49% of the world's copper in 1929, according to this article from the archives. Today we produce 1.2 million tons yearly, compared to 5.4 million tons in Chile.

Brazil now produces over four times as much iron ore as the U.S. We used to lead that industry, too. In 1892 we discovered the world's largest mine at the Great Lakes Mesabi Range. It was a wellspring for America's industrial might and the foundation of the rust belt. Now we claim reserves at 2,100 mt. Seven countries claim higher reserves, including Brazil at 8,900 mt. We produce only 54 mt yearly, while Brazil produces 250 mt.

Canada and Venezuela will pass the U.S. in oil production in the next decade. America produces around 9 million barrels of oil a day. Venezuela and Canada each produce around 3 million. But America's reserves are 21 billion barrels and may last less than a decade. Our oil-rich neighbors claim 99 billion bbl and 178 billion bbl, respectively, and will keep producing oil into the distant future.

Now Brazil exports over twice as much beef as we do. America used to lead the world in beef production. Although we still do, America exports only 800,000 mt of beef per year. Brazil exports 2,200,000 mt. Here's some ironic excerpts from a 1911 NYT article: "American-Canadian syndicate to have world's largest beef plant in Brazil... The chilled beef industry has never been tried before in Brazil and has only recently gotten under way in Argentina."

Brazil is now a critical partner for Russia, India, and China. The acronym coined by Goldman Sachs to describe the four key emerging powers has taken on a life of its own. Brazil, Russia, India, and China have held several summits and even discussed making a supranational currency—that would pull the rug out from the U.S. dollar. What's important here is that global emerging powers have good relations and are inclined to work together. For instance, China just signed major contracts to build factories and a high-speed rail in Brazil.

Brazil, Canada, and Mexico all invest a greater share of GDP in clean energy. A Pew survey found that Brazil invests 0.37% of its economy in clean energy. Canada invests 0.25% and Mexico invests 0.14%. America is eleventh in the world at 0.13%.

Hugo Chavez is still in power. The CIA has a notorious history of interventions in Latin America, supposedly targeting Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, Fidel Castro, Manuel Noriega, Rios Montt, Che Guevara, and many others. But they haven't stopped Hugo Chavez from railing against the United States for years. Clearly America has adopted a more passive regional strategy.

20100928-03 16:54 SteveB "Free" Trade

I read the other day that 71% of working people in Nigeria make less than $1 per day.

Compared to the United States:

- Consumer Prices in China are 60.14% lower.
- Consumer Prices (including rent) in China are 57.84% lower.
- Rent Prices in China are 53.41% lower.
- Restaurant Prices in China are 60.71% lower.
- Groceries Prices in China are 30.57% lower.
- Local Purchasing Power in China is 69.34% lower.

- Consumer Prices in Bolivia are 61.39% lower.
- Consumer Prices (including rent) in Bolivia are 62.76% lower.
- Rent Prices in Bolivia are 65.39% lower.
- Restaurant Prices in Bolivia are 54.51% lower.
- Groceries Prices in Bolivia are 65.57% lower.

Do the proponents of "free" trade really believe that workers and factories in the U.S. can compete with this, considering the high cost of living in the U.S.?

Will the "big money" not be happy until they have driven the standard of living in America down to these levels?

How is real wealth created? Farming, mining, fishing, and manufacturing.

In the U.S., the first three have natural constraints. Only manufacturing can produce the jobs we need to maintain a middle class and the standard of living we currently enjoy. Even at that, the standard of living we enjoyed in the past is apparently permanently in the past, not the present or future. This is how unsuccessful our generation has been. We created the computer revolution, we went to the moon, we fought how many wars, and where has it gotten us? What a terrible, declining legacy and mountain of debt we're leaving our children and grandchildren. This is what our Democratic and Republican politicians have created for us. "Free" trade has wiped out any gains. We can't compete and live like our vision of how we want Americans to live. What a sad state of affairs.

20100928-04 19:02 SteveG Re: "Free" Trade

Dear SteveB,

Agree.

Recent articles I have read indicate manufacturing jobs are down and not likely to return to the levels that they were. The articles also indicate that the interest of individuals in performing manufacturing jobs have decreased. Part may be due to the downfall of corporations over the past several years and the other part maybe to the poor educational efforts our schools have provided. We have done a poor job of preparing our society and our youth for the future. We will never catch back to where we were.

20100928-05 19:43 SteveBA Re: "Free" Trade

As long as China can peg its currency to a 20% discount to the dollar we cannot compete especially when we like the everyday low price of imported goods from Wal-Mart.

20100928-06 20:33 Charis Re: "Free" Trade

Dear SteveBA,

I don't think we can blame political parties for everything that is happening in the U.S. Most of the country's downfall is directly related to a population that insists on living beyond its means. Are there segments of the population that can't afford anything? Yes, of course, but MOST Americans could stand to live with less. One of the reasons prices are so much lower in countries like China and Bolivia is the lack of consumption. People don't typically buy almost anything on credit, at least not the 90% of the population that doesn't qualify for credit. People also don't enter into debt except for very important things like buying a house. So I think it's time Americans took a look at their own habits and what part they themselves play in their own demise.

20100928-07 21:36 Ben "Pakistan and the U.S. Exit from Afghanistan"

Stratfor is an amazing organization. They offer a much more encompassing paid service, but even the free stuff is magnificent.

"Pakistan and the U.S. Exit from Afghanistan" by George Friedman, Geopolitical Weekly

Sept. 27, 2010, (http://www.stratfor.com/weekly/20100927_pakistan_and_us_exit_afghanistan) or (<http://www.johnmauldin.com/outsidethebox/pakistan-and-the-u.s.-exit-from-afghanistan/>)

Bob Woodward has released another book, this one on the debate over Afghanistan strategy in the Obama administration. As all his books do, the book has riveted Washington. It reveals that intense debate occurred over what course to take, that the president sought alternative strategies and that compromises were reached. But while knowing the details of these things is interesting, what would have been shocking is if they hadn't taken place.

It is interesting to reflect on the institutional inevitability of these disagreements. The military is involved in a war. It is institutionally and emotionally committed to victory in the theater of combat. It will demand all available resources for executing the war under way. For a soldier who has bled in that war, questioning the importance of the war is obscene. A war must be fought relentlessly and with all available means.

But while the military's top generals and senior civilian leadership are responsible for providing the president with sound, clearheaded advice on all military matters including the highest levels of grand strategy, they are ultimately responsible for the pursuit of military objectives to which the commander-in-chief directs them. Generals must think about how to win the war they are fighting. Presidents must think about whether the war is worth fighting. The president is responsible for America's global posture. He must consider what an unlimited commitment to a particular conflict might mean in other regions of the world where forces would be unavailable.

A president must take a more dispassionate view than his generals. He must calculate not only whether victory is possible but also the value of the victory relative to the cost. Given the nature of the war in Afghanistan, U.S. President Barack Obama and Gen. David Petraeus—first the U.S. Central Command chief and now the top commander in Afghanistan—had to view it differently. This is unavoidable. This is natural. And only one of the two is ultimately in charge.

The Nature of Guerrilla Warfare

In thinking about Afghanistan, it is essential that we begin by thinking about the nature of guerrilla warfare against an occupying force. The guerrilla lives in the country. He isn't going anywhere else, as he has nowhere to go. By contrast, the foreigner has a place to which he can return. This is the core weakness of the occupier and the strength of the guerrilla. The former can leave and in all likelihood, his nation will survive. The guerrilla can't. And having alternatives undermines the foreigner's will to fight regardless of the importance of the war to him.

The strategy of the guerrilla is to make the option to withdraw more attractive. In order to do this, his strategic goal is simply to survive and fight on whatever level he can. His patience is built into who he is and what he is fighting for. The occupier's patience is calculated against the cost of the occupation and its opportunity costs, thus, while troops are committed in this country, what is happening elsewhere?

Tactically, the guerrilla survives by being elusive. He disperses in small groups. He operates in hostile terrain. He denies the enemy intelligence on his location and capabilities. He forms political alliances with civilians who provide him supplies and intelligence on the occupation forces and misleads the occupiers about his own location. The guerrilla uses this intelligence network to decline combat on the enemy's terms and to strike the enemy when he is least prepared. The guerrilla's goal is not to seize and hold ground but to survive, evade and strike, imposing casualties on the occupier. Above all, the guerrilla must never form a center of gravity that, if struck, would lead to his defeat. He thus actively avoids anything that could be construed as a decisive contact.

The occupation force is normally a more conventional army. Its strength is superior firepower, resources and organization. If it knows where the guerrilla is and can strike before the guerrilla can disperse, the occupying force will defeat the guerrilla. The occupier's problems are that his intelligence is normally inferior to that of the guerrillas; the guerrillas rarely mass in ways that permit decisive combat and normally can disperse faster than the occupier can pinpoint and deploy forces against them; and the guerrillas' superior tactical capabilities allow them to impose a constant low rate of casualties on the occupier. Indeed, the massive amount of resources the occupier requires and the inflexibility of a military institution not solely committed to the particular theater of operations can actually work against the occupier by creating logistical vulnerabilities susceptible to guerrilla attacks and difficulty adapting at a rate sufficient to keep pace with the guerrilla. The occupation force will always win engagements, but that is never the measure of victory. If the guerrillas operate by doctrine, defeats in unplanned engagements will not undermine their basic goal of survival. While the occupier is not winning decisively, even while suffering only some casualties, he is losing. While the guerrilla is not losing decisively, even if suffering significant casualties, he is winning. Since the guerrilla is not going anywhere, he can afford far higher casualties than the occupier, who ultimately has the alternative of withdrawal.

The asymmetry of this warfare favors the guerrilla. This is particularly true when the strategic value of the war to the occupier is ambiguous, where the occupier does not possess sufficient force and patience to systematically overwhelm the guerrillas, and where either political or military constraints prevent operations against sanctuaries. This is a truth as relevant to David's insurgency against the Philistines as it is to the U.S. experience in Vietnam or the Russian occupation of Afghanistan.

There has long been a myth about the unwillingness of Americans to absorb casualties for very long in guerrilla wars. In reality, the United States fought in Vietnam for at least seven years (depending on when you count the start and stop) and has now fought in Afghanistan for nine years. The idea that Americans can't endure the long war has no empirical basis. What the United States has difficulty with—along with imperial and colonial powers before it—is a war in which the ability to impose one's will on the enemy through force of arms is lacking and when it is not clear that the failure of previous years to win the war will be solved in the years ahead.

Far more relevant than casualties to whether Americans continue a war is the question of the conflict's strategic importance, for which the president is ultimately responsible. This divides into several parts. This first is whether the United States has the ability with available force to achieve its political goals through prosecuting the war (since all war is fought for some political goal, from regime change to policy shift) and whether the force the United States is willing to dedicate suffices to achieve these goals. To address this question in Afghanistan, we have to focus on the political goal.

The Evolution of the U.S. Political Goal in Afghanistan

Washington's primary goal at the initiation of the conflict was to destroy or disrupt al Qaeda in Afghanistan to protect the U.S. homeland from follow-on attacks to 9/11. But if Afghanistan were completely pacified, the threat of Islamist-fueled transnational terrorism would remain at issue because it is no longer just an issue of a single organization—al Qaeda—but a series of fragmented groups conducting operations in Pakistan, Iraq, Yemen, North Africa, Somalia and elsewhere.

Today, al Qaeda is simply one manifestation of the threat of this transnational jihadist phenomenon. It is important to stop and consider al Qaeda—and the transnational jihadist phenomenon in general—in terms of guerrillas, and to think of the phenomenon as a guerrilla force in its own right operating by the very same rules on a global basis. Thus, where the Taliban apply guerrilla principles to Afghanistan, today's transnational jihadist applies them to the Islamic world and beyond. The transnational jihadists are not leaving and are not giving up. Like the Taliban in Afghanistan, they will decline combat against larger American forces and strike vulnerable targets when they can.

There are certainly more players and more complexity to the global phenomenon than in a localized insurgency. Many governments across North Africa, the Middle East and South Asia have no interest in seeing these movements set up shop and stir up unrest in their territory. And al Qaeda's devolution has seen frustrations as well as successes as it spreads. But the underlying principles of guerrilla warfare remain at issue. Whenever the Americans concentrate force in one area, al Qaeda disengages, disperses and regroups elsewhere and, perhaps more important, the ideology that underpins the phenomenon continues to exist. The threat will undoubtedly continue to evolve and face challenges, but in the end, it will continue to exist along the lines of the guerrilla acting against the United States.

There is another important way in which the global guerrilla analogy is apt. STRATFOR has long held that Islamist-fueled transnational terrorism does not represent a strategic, existential threat to the United States. While acts of transnational terrorism target civilians, they are not attacks—have not been and are not evolving into attacks—that endanger the territorial integrity of the United States or the way of life of the American people. They are dangerous and must be defended against, but transnational terrorism is and remains a tactical problem that for nearly a decade has been treated as if it were the pre-eminent strategic threat to the United States.

Nietzsche wrote that, "The most fundamental form of human stupidity is forgetting what we were trying to do in the first place." The stated U.S. goal in Afghanistan was the destruction of al Qaeda. While al Qaeda as it existed in 2001 has certainly been disrupted and degraded, al Qaeda's evolution and migration means that disrupting and degrading it—to say nothing of destroying it—can no longer be achieved by waging a war in Afghanistan. The guerrilla does not rely on a single piece of real estate (in this case Afghanistan) but rather on his ability to move seamlessly across terrain to evade decisive combat in any specific location. Islamist-fueled transnational terrorism is not centered on Afghanistan and does not need Afghanistan, so no matter how successful that war might be, it would make little difference in the larger fight against transnational Jihadism.

Thus far, the United States has chosen to carry on fighting the war in Afghanistan. As al Qaeda has fled Afghanistan, the overall political goal for the United States in the country has evolved to include the creation of a democratic and uncorrupt Afghanistan. It is not clear that anyone knows how to do this, particularly given that most Afghans consider the ruling government of President Hamid Karzai—with which the United States is allied—as the heart of the corruption problem, and beyond Kabul most Afghans do not regard their way of making political and social arrangements to be corrupt.

Simply withdrawing from Afghanistan carries its own strategic and political costs, however. The strategic problem is that simply terminating the war after nine years would destabilize the Islamic world. The United States has managed to block al Qaeda's goal of triggering a series of uprisings against existing regimes and replacing them with jihadist regimes. It did this by displaying a willingness to intervene where necessary. Of course, the idea that U.S. intervention destabilized the region raises the question of what regional stability would look like had it not intervened. The danger of withdrawal is that the network of relationships the United States created and imposed at the regime level could unravel if it withdrew. America would be seen as having lost the war, the prestige of radical Islamists and thereby the foundation of the ideology that underpins their movement would surge, and this could destabilize regimes and undermine American interests.

The political problem is domestic. Obama's approval rating now stands at 42 percent. This is not unprecedented, but it means he is politically weak. One of the charges against him, fair or not, is that he is inherently anti-war by background and so not fully committed to the war effort. Where a Republican would face charges of being a warmonger, which would make withdrawal easier, Obama faces charges of being too soft. Since a president must maintain political support to be effective, withdrawal becomes even harder. Therefore, strategic analysis aside, the president is not going to order a complete withdrawal of all combat forces any time soon—the national (and international) political alignment won't support such a step. At the same time, remaining in Afghanistan is unlikely to achieve any goal and leaves potential rivals like China and Russia freer rein.

The American Solution

The American solution, one that we suspect is already under way, is the Pakistanization of the war. By this, we do not mean extending the war into Pakistan but rather extending Pakistan into Afghanistan. The Taliban phenomenon has extended into Pakistan in ways that seriously complicate Pakistani efforts to regain their bearing in Afghanistan. It has created a major security problem for Islamabad, which, coupled with the severe deterioration of the country's economy and now the floods, has weakened the Pakistanis' ability to manage Afghanistan. In other words, the moment that the Pakistanis have been waiting for—American agreement and support for the Pakistanization of the war—has come at a time when the Pakistanis are not in an ideal position to capitalize on it.

In the past, the United States has endeavored to keep the Taliban in Afghanistan and the regime in Pakistan separate. (The Taliban movements in Afghanistan and Pakistan are not one and the same.) Washington has not succeeded in this regard, with the Pakistanis continuing to hedge their bets and maintain a relationship across the border. Still, U.S. opposition has been the single greatest impediment to Pakistan's consolidation of the Taliban in Afghanistan, and abandoning this opposition leaves important avenues open for Islamabad.

The Pakistani relationship to the Taliban, which was a liability for the United States in the past, now becomes an advantage for Washington because it creates a trusted channel for meaningful communication with the Taliban. Logic suggests this channel is quite active now.

The Vietnam War ended with the Paris peace talks. Those formal talks were not where the real bargaining took place but rather where the results were ultimately confirmed. If talks are under way, a similar venue for the formal manifestation of the talks is needed—and Islamabad is as good a place as any.

Pakistan is an American ally which the United States needs, both to balance growing Chinese influence in and partnership with Pakistan, and to contain India. Pakistan needs the United States for the same reason. Meanwhile, the Taliban want to run Afghanistan. The United States has no strong national interest in how Afghanistan is run so long as it does not support and espouse transnational jihadism. But it needs its withdrawal to take place in a manner that strengthens its influence rather than weakens it, and Pakistan can provide the cover for turning a retreat into a negotiated settlement.

Pakistan has every reason to play this role. It needs the United States over the long term to balance against India. It must have a stable or relatively stable Afghanistan to secure its western frontier. It needs an end to U.S. forays into Pakistan that are destabilizing the regime. And playing this role would enhance Pakistan's status in the Islamic world, something the United States could benefit from, too. We suspect that all sides are moving toward this end.

The United States isn't going to defeat the Taliban. The original goal of the war is irrelevant, and the current goal is rather difficult to take seriously. Even a victory, whatever that would look like, would make little difference in the fight against transnational jihad, but a defeat could harm U.S. interests. Therefore, the United States needs a withdrawal that is not a defeat. Such a strategic shift is not without profound political complexity and difficulties. But the disparity between—and increasingly, the incompatibility of—the struggle with transnational terrorism and the war effort geographically rooted in Afghanistan is only becoming more apparent—even to the American public.

20100929-01 07:24 Pam Re: "Free" Trade
--

Dear SteveB,

It seems that everyone has an explanation for our financial doldrums but very little to offer in the way of solutions. It would seem that someone has to lose for someone else to win. Cheap goods for us mean a lower standard of living in the third world. I think we should look back at LBJ's Great Society. There used to be terrible poverty in this country, especially in Appalachia. Johnson vowed to end hunger in America—and he did (his administration did with his arm-twisting). If not for the Viet Nam war, he might be remembered as our greatest President. Now the local news features stories about families that depend on food banks, "normal" families who never had to resort to such things before. I never thought I'd see such a thing again, but I was wrong. Politicians used to make promises to end poverty, now they promise to protect the rich. It's a real flip-flop. Johnson brought us Medicare. Today I heard someone on NPR talking about curtailing it. And Social Security has been under attack by the Republicans for a long time.

The first thing that has to happen is for the Bush tax cuts to be eliminated. Well, I've been through all this before with you. I'm preaching to the choir. It is nice to know though that others out there feel as I do. I like Obama, but maybe that's the problem. Maybe he's too nice. LBJ was a real son of a b*tch. All I know is I distrust the Republicans.

20100929-02 07:41 Pam Re: "Free" Trade

Dear SteveB,

Ah ha. Now I see where we differ. I don't want to sell out the American people, nor do I think we are responsible for the welfare of the whole world, but it wouldn't it be in our best interest to have a peaceful, stable world? That won't happen until people in other countries have at least a fighting chance. Let's not keep sending big bucks to foreign governments for them to spend on their elites and armies. Why not send pencils and shoes (like that guy who does that) and pots and pans. The things that really would improve lives in tangible ways.

In Afghanistan, years ago, they tried introducing tractors. The farmers wouldn't use them. They preferred their old methods of animal power. You have to build from the bottom up. First a simple iron plow, then on from there. The way it went in the West, actually. I've never really understood why Europe and Asia developed their resources and Africa didn't. I wonder if geography has something to do with it. If all races truly are the same beneath the skin, then what factors account for societies that remain "primitive." And not just in Africa. I guess I should have studied anthropology.

I don't think isolation is viable for America.

20100929-03 07:53 SteveB Re: "Free" Trade

Dear Charis,

Somehow you always have a different perspective and an interesting point. I really like that! Thank you.

I also don't understand the "deep in debt" syndrome. But I guess the economy would tank even sooner without all that consumption. I don't know any good alternatives to the capitalist system, but one of the things about it that bothers me is that human beings are reduced to mere consumers. And they must be somehow made to consume, consume, consume and make that consumption keep growing for the whole thing seemingly to work.

I guess I want us to be more than that, more than consuming robots, even in the aggregate. And growth, to me, at this point in time, is truly our great enemy (along with Wal-Mart!).

20100929-04 08:40 SteveB Re: "Pakistan and the U.S. Exit from Afghanistan"

I love this quote from this article from Ben's article:

A war must be fought relentlessly and with all available means.

If we are going to go to war (which I wish we didn't do or didn't have to do, that's for sure), isn't this the way it has to be? I don't recall allowing the Germans and Japanese in WWII (bless their hearts) go slinking off the battlefield to come back another day to defeat us in an endless guerilla war.

No, then we had the balls to simply kill the enemy relentlessly. Anything less leads to defeat, so why start?

Ben's right about STRATFOR having some great articles and information. You might want to take a look at it.

www.stratfor.com

20100929-05 09:04 Bill Re: "Free" Trade

Most economists look at it this way: The "theory of competitive advantage" suggests that those national economies that best produce bicycles should max out on production of those and like goods that their level of industrial sophistication allows. Then, those national economies that can produce computers, MRIs, sophisticated drugs, etc., should max out on those. Via this paradigm for international trade, wealth—as between two nations or among all those on the globe—is maximized. It seems that those countries with a bit of chutzpah, a reasonably educated populace, and organized governments can do very well via this model, perhaps gaining relatively more than the sophisticated countries. The pace of dislocation in an economy like ours—loss of basic manufacturing jobs being a primary symptom—is very hard on those at the bottom of the scale. And the distribution of wealth, here and in one of those countries gaining those jobs, seems to become more lopsided.

I suppose we could return to a mercantilism, but there may be many problems associated with that. For example, we've become accustomed to having access to cheap goods from China and Southeast Asia, and, in fact, some people need those goods to survive. No wonder they call it the "dismal science."

20100929-06 09:25 GaryC Re: "Free" Trade

For those of you inclined to read history. You may remember that once upon a time, the U.S. was the "China" to Europe. Free Trade is how our U.S. economy began and what allowed it to expand. The textile mills in Manchester would not have been able to produce all of their "fine" cloth had it not been for cheap U.S. cotton.

When [Personal content removed. —SteveB], I was attending class, going to the library and studying economics. I even had the opportunity to teach Economics and had three fraternity brothers in my classes. One of the lessons I taught was the Law of Supply and Demand. My example was that as Panama Red became scarcer, the price went up. Likewise, with the Law of Diminishing Returns as your consumption of alcohol increased the affect diminished with each additional drink.

Interestingly, my students were able to understand these real world examples as the Economic laws applied to real life.

Free Trade is not FREE. There are consequences to the low prices at Wal Mart and Costco. Unfortunately, the U.S. has not made the transition to higher value added goods and services. When People magazine and American Idol are the top rated forms of entertainment in the U.S., it's easy to understand that our populace is fat, dumb and lazy. I have had a unique education in the last 20 years doing business all over the world. Free Trade has made this a better global community but the U.S. middle class has suffered because the ability to make a good middle class income without training or education left the barn 20 years ago.

BTW, two of my three declarations noted above are FALSE. I did study Economics though.

20100929-07 09:44 SteveB Re: "Free" Trade

Statistics on how many jobs we're losing to foreign countries are a little hard to come by. But here is the recent U.S. international trade balance of payments information from the OECD (Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development). This is how much money (in U.S. dollars) we're losing to the rest of the world every three months:

Q4-2008—(minus!)$172,383,000,000
Q1-2009—(minus!)$147,644,000,000
Q2-2009—(minus!)$95,577,000,000
Q3-2009—(minus!)$84,447,000,000
Q4-2009—(minus!)$100,907,000,000
Q1-2010—(minus!)$109,158,000,000
Q2-2010—(minus!)$123,283,000,000

Total for just 21 months—(minus!)$833 billion! (for comparison, the U.S. GDP for 2009 was about $14 trillion.)

And the plan of our Democratic and Republican politicians seems to be to do this forever! Wonderful plan! Gee! I wonder why there are no jobs? And for my liberal friends...doesn't it seem like we're doing our part to help the rest of the world? And remember, it's all this plus the allowed illegal immigration, which we're supposed to be sympathetic to. But this is what the "big money" wants and that's what our corrupt Democratic and Republican politicians give them, month after month, year after year, I guess, inevitably, until we're a Third World country! Our children and grandchildren be damned, right?

20100929-08 20:24 SteveG House OKs Bill Targeting China's Currency Manipulation

<http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=130225333>

Interesting House vote in regards to the manipulation of the currency in China.

from NPR.com (<http://www.liberalvsliberal.com/site/?p=5625>):

House OKs bill targeting China's currency manipulation. The 348-79 vote Wednesday sends the measure to the Senate, where its prospects are unclear. Senate supporters hope to get a vote on a similar proposal after Congress returns following the November congressional elections.

20100929-09 21:50 SteveB Re: "Free" Trade

Dear GaryC,

I thought I was the one attending classes while you did that other stuff? Anyway, that's my story and I'm sticking to it! :-
)

Good points, though, so maybe you did attend a few classes.

20100930-01 00:58 SteveBA Re: House OKs Bill Targeting China's Currency Manipulation

Dear SteveG,

I hope this bill goes thru, it will help eliminate an artificial advantage for them.

20100930-02 01:12 Pam Re: "Free" Trade, NAFTA

Dear SteveB,

I'm not an Economist, but doesn't the problem begin with the NAFTA treaty in the late '90's". In Anderson, that was when so many jobs went to Mexico. And, aren't the Bush Presidents' responsible for that and the war?

20100930-03 07:38 SteveB Re: "Free" Trade, NAFTA

Dear PamB,

Yes, Bush and the Republicans have led the way on free trade and war (shame on them!), but the tariffs, etc. that protected our jobs have been coming down before and after NAFTA, with Democrats and Republicans both responsible, because politicians in both parties are bribed via campaign contributions from the same big money interests.

Make no mistake, we've been sold down the river by both parties. The system is corrupt!

20100930-04 07:57 SteveB Re: House OKs Bill Targeting China's Currency Manipulation

Dear SteveBA & SteveG,

Yes, it seems like a necessary step. Interesting to me that only Republicans appear to oppose this bill. Just being contrarians because the Democrats led the way? Surely they don't mind if we preserve a few jobs here in the States?

20100930-05 08:57 SteveB Re: "Free" Trade

Dear Pam,

I'm not sure there's ever going to be a peaceful, stable world, but I sure like the idea of helping poor people instead of governments. I don't want anyone hungry or suffering, if possible (which it's not).

I have often wondered about Africa too.

I love black people (having spent so much time in the Caribbean), but I don't think we're "all the same beneath the skin." I just think we're all equal, all equally human, but can be very different, races can be very different, and that's a good thing. The broader the gene pool, the better. I also like it when that gene pool gets all mixed up. Trinidad, Brazil, and Bolivia have a lot of the world's most beautiful women for just that reason.

Man, that must have been a tough sell in Afghanistan!

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20100930-06 15:55 SteveB Re: "Free" Trade

Dear Pam,

No, I'm pretty sure cheap imported goods for us mean a higher standard of living in the Third World, but a lower standard of living for Americans. Seems sort of paradoxical, perhaps, but...that's economics.

I just wish we could get beyond partisanship! The left acts like it wants to destroy our capitalist system, which is the goose that laid the golden egg. They seem to want to open our borders, send most of our wealth abroad, and control all the rest themselves at home (though you're right about taxes!). You're right, too, that government has done a few things well (education, Social Security, Medicare being some of them; regulating the big corporations, war and immigration not), and people do need help sometimes, maybe not a lifetime free ride, but help. But, to me, in general, government is the enemy and not the direct solution to our problems.

The f*cking right seems to want to lock the rest of us up and beat us to death with the Constitution, which they don't even seem to be able to read. Plus, they're ready to sell us all out for a few bucks in a New York minute.

BOTH SIDES ARE WRONG! As Buddha said...the middle way!

20100930-07 21:21 SteveG "The Tea Party's Tension: Religion's Role in Politics" & Treaty of Tripoli

The top link is from today's NPR about the Tea Party and the religious right in politics. The second link is to the Treaty of Tripoli written in 1796 and signed in 1797. Number 11 of the treaty is particularly interesting in regards to the NPR article.

"The Tea Party's Tension: Religion's Role in Politics" by Barbara Bradley Hagerty, NPR

Sept. 30, 2010, (<http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=130238835>)

At the Mad Fox Brewery in Falls Church, Va., it's happy hour, which pretty much captures the mood of the two dozen middle-class conservatives who are reveling in their surprising political success.

These members of the Northern Virginia Tea Party fall silent as Jonathan Moseley takes the microphone.

"I bring you news from the front of the Tea Party revolution, from the battle of Delaware," he begins dramatically. For an hour, Moseley, who was Christine O'Donnell's campaign manager in 2008, describes O'Donnell's upset victory in Delaware's Senate primary.

O'Donnell is a conservative Christian. But no one mentions that at this meet-and-greet, in part because people here don't all agree about religion's role in politics.

The 'Sleeping Giant': Religious Conservatives

On the one end of the spectrum, Stacey Hagga says that religion and socially conservative issues are simply not a factor in the Tea Party movement.

"I personally don't know the last time I was at church," she says, shifting her toddler from one hip to the other. "I think people are just generally concerned about the economy and the direction of our country. I have my 2-year-old here and I'm just concerned about his future."

Nearby, Sandy Smith, a registered nurse, sees some religious undercurrents to the Tea Party movement.

"It's a movement about the Founding Fathers and what their faith was to this country, and how they brought faith over to this country," she says.

Smith is describing a "civil religion" that seems to appeal to many Tea Partiers: the idea that America was a divine experiment, that the Founding Fathers were Christian men who created a nation on biblical principles. She says America in 2010 has lost that.

"That's what started this whole downfall of America — taking God out of everything, and political correctness," Smith says. "We were founded on Judeo-Christian principles, and it's like 'What's happened? Why aren't we fighting to save that?' They fought hard for that so why aren't we? So we're out here trying to fight for those principles."

And then there's Michael Giere, a mortgage banker and evangelical Christian. "We are a Judeo-Christian country, and I don't care who says we're not, we obviously are," he says.

Giere says religious conservatives are the sleeping giant in the Tea Party.

"The discussion of the day is on economics, but when you start peeling back that onion, there is devout faith spread throughout the Tea Party and spread throughout the Tea Party leadership," he says.

Polls show that Tea Party members are far more likely to be weekly churchgoers and conservative Christians than the population as a whole.

That is what Wendy Wright, president of the evangelical Concerned Women for America, has found. And she says she believes the Tea Party is prompting Americans to look closely at their religious heritage — in particular, at the faith and early writings of the Founding Fathers.

"It's an opportunity for evangelicals to show how biblical principles are integral to America's foundation," she says. "And if we strip out those principles — if we ignore them or turn our back on them — that our foundation can't survive and therefore our country can't survive."

The most prominent proponent of this nostalgia for the early days of the Republic is Glenn Beck. At an August rally, more than 80,000 people gathered on Washington's Mall and listened with rapt attention as the Fox News commentator whipped up a religious revival.

"Something beyond imagination is happening," he boomed to the roars of the crowd. "Something that is beyond man is happening. America today begins to turn back to God!"

That moment marked a turning point in the relationship between religious conservatives and the Tea Party, says Bryan Fischer of the American Family Association. "There was a spiritual energy there that we haven't seen in typical Tea Party events," he says. "And my word to the Tea Party leadership is: Sit up and take notice. This is a winning issue for you, just from a purely strategic, pragmatic standpoint, to capture the spiritual energy of the American people."

For their part, religious conservatives have benefited hugely from the rise of the Tea Party. John Green, a political scientist at the University of Akron, says that evangelicals and conservative Catholics were dispirited after the 2008 election. They were disillusioned by what they saw as President Bush's unfulfilled promises and a disappointing Republican presidential candidate. At the same time, once-powerful organizations such as the Christian Coalition have petered out. Enter the Tea Party movement.

"There was an opening on the right for organizations and candidates and groups that could appeal to different elements of the religious coalition," he says. "In many ways the Tea Party has filled that niche."

Green says in this year's primary elections, religious conservatives have gotten exactly what they wanted.

"If you look at many of the candidates around the country that have won Republican primaries that are identified with the Tea Party, many of them hold very conservative views on social issues and therefore are likely to appeal to conservative Christians as well as other kinds of conservatives," he says.

Christine O'Donnell, for example, has spent much of her career as an evangelical activist. In fact, every Tea Party candidate who won his or her Senate primary opposes abortion.

The Glue That Holds The Tea Party Together: Fiscal Issues

And yet, there's still tension between these two groups. For example, Fischer recently interviewed Amy Kremer, chairman of the Tea Party Express, on his nationwide radio program. Fischer told her that evangelicals want some signal that the Tea Party movement supports their views on abortion and marriage.

"Can we hear that message from the Tea Party leadership?" he asked.

"You're not going to hear it from me," she responded. "I'm sorry, I'm going to disappoint you."

Tea Party Tug Of War; Is Focus Fiscal Or Social?

In an interview, Kremer explains that the Tea Party movement is a big tent, including not just religious people but atheists and libertarians.

"As long as we stay focused on the fiscal issues, that's the glue that holds us together," she says. "If we start delving into the religious aspect or social aspect, that's when we're going to become divided and when people are going to disagree."

But Fischer says this strategy could alienate Christian conservatives.

"And if they begin to discover that the leadership of the Tea Party movement isn't going to fight for them on those issues, then I think they're going to lose their enthusiasm for movement," he says. "And they'll go back to being disengaged or they'll invest in that energy in some other direction."

It appears that these groups are mostly patching over their differences. But the question is: After the election, could their diverging priorities lead to the breakup of this political marriage?

	Total U.S.	NET AGREE
Protestant
White evangelical	20%	33%
White mainline	16%	18%
Black Protestant	9%	3%
Other Protestant	5%	5%
Catholic
White non-Hispanic	15%	17%
Hispanic Catholic	7%	3%
Other Catholic	2%	2%
Mormon	2%	3%
Orthodox	1%	*
Jewish	2%	2%

Muslim	1%	0%
Buddhist	1%	*
Hindu	*	0%
Unitarian	*	0%
Other Faiths	1%	1%
Unaffiliated	17%	12%
Don't Know/Refuse	2%	1%

Source: Aug., 2010 Survey by the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life and the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press

TREATY OF PEACE AND FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE BEY AND SUBJECTS OF TRIPOLI AND BARBARY

(http://www.stephenjaygould.org/ctrl/treaty_tripoli.html)

(Authored by American diplomat Joel Barlow in 1796, the following treaty was sent to the floor of the Senate, June 7, 1797, where it was read aloud in its entirety and unanimously approved. John Adams, having seen the treaty, signed it and proudly proclaimed it to the Nation.)

Annals of Congress, 5th Congress

Article 1. There is a firm and perpetual peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and subjects of Tripoli, of Barbary, made by the free consent of both parties, and guarantied by the most potent Dey and Regency of Algiers.

Art. 2. If any goods belonging to any nation with which either of the parties is at war, shall be loaded on board of vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free, and no attempt shall be made to take or detain them.

Art. 3. If any citizens , subjects, or effects, belonging to either party, shall be found on board a prize vessel taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be set at liberty, and the effects restored to the owners.

Art. 4. Proper passports are to be given to all vessels of both parties, by which they are to be known. And considering the distance between the two countries, eighteen months from the date of this treaty, shall be allowed for procuring such passports. During this interval the other papers, belonging to such vessels, shall be sufficient for their protection.

Art. 5. A citizen or subject of either party having bought a prize vessel, condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificates of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for one year; this being a reasonable time for her to procure a proper passport.

Art. 6. Vessels of either party, putting into the ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, they shall be furnished at the market price. And if any such vessel shall so put in, from a disaster at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo without paying any duties. But in case shall she be compelled to the land her cargo.

Art. 7. Should a vessel of either party be cast on the shore of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her and her people; no pillage shall be allowed; the property shall remain at the disposition of the owners; and the crew protected and succored till they can be sent to their country.

Art. 8. If a vessel of either party should be attacked by an enemy, within gun-shot of the forts of the other, she shall be defended as much as possible. If she be in port she shall not be seized on or attacked, when it is in the power of the other party to protect her. And when she proceeds to sea, no enemy shall be allowed to pursue her from the same port, within twenty-four hours after her departure.

Art. 9. The commerce between the United States and Tripoli; the protection to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen; the reciprocal right of the establishing Consuls in each country; and the privileges, immunities, and jurisdiction, to be on the same footing with those of the most favored nations respectively.

Art. 10. The money and presents demanded by the Bey of Tripoli, as a full and satisfactory consideration on his part, and on the part of his subjects, for this treaty of perpetual peace and friendship, are acknowledged to have been received by him previous to his signing the same, according to a receipt which is hereto annexed, except such as part as is promised, on the part of the United States, to be delivered and paid by them on the arrival of their Consul in Tripoli; of which part a note is likewise hereto annexed. And no pretense of any periodical tribute of further payments is ever to be made by either party.

Art. 11. As the Government of the United States of America is not, in any sense, founded on the Christian religion; as it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity, of Mussulmen; and, as the said States never entered into any war, or act of hostility against any Mahometan nation, it is declared by the parties, that no pretext arising from religious opinions, shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries.

Art. 12. In case of any dispute, arising from a violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms; nor shall war be declared on any pretext whatever. But if the Consul, residing at the place where the dispute shall happen, shall not be able to settle the same, an amicable reference shall be made to the mutual friend of the parties, the Dey of Algiers; the parties hereby engaging to abide by his decision. And he, by virtue of his signature to this treaty, engages for himself and successors to declare the justice of the case, according to the true interpretation of the treaty, and to use all the means in his power to enforce the observance of the same.

Signed and sealed at Tripoli of Barbary the 3d day of Junad in the year of the Hegira 1211— corresponding with the 4th day of Nov., 1796, by JUSSOF BASHAW MAHOMET, Bey; MAMET, Treasurer; AMET, Minister of Marine; SOLIMAN KAYA. GALIL, General of the Troops; MAHOMET, Commander of the City; AMET; Chamberlain; ALLY, Chief of the Divan; MAMET, Secretary.

Signed and sealed at Algiers, the 4th day of Argill, 1211—corresponding with the 3d day of January, 1797, by HASSAN BASHAW, Dey. And by the agent Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, JOEL BARLOW.

20101001-01 07:31 SteveB Re: "The Tea Party's Tension: Religion's Role in Politics" & Treaty of Tripoli

Dear SteveG,

This is great. Thank you. What a sad state of affairs. Just in case these kooks win, to see if I can comply, I've already started practicing non-masturbation, but I just don't seem to be able to get it right. Hell, here I come.

20101002-01 08:45 SteveB "How Obama Can Fix the U.S. Economy"

I like a lot of this, but I still don't see anything constructive being done until the corruption in Washington is under control.

"How Obama Can Fix the U.S. Economy" by Jim Jubak, MSN Money

Sept. 27, 2010, (<http://articles.moneycentral.msn.com/Investing/JubaksJournal/how-obama-can-fix-the-us-economy.aspx>)

(Some advice on filling that economic-adviser job at the White House: Think big, get tough in the global economy, and invest in America's future. Oh, and call Jim Jubak.)

I haven't been able to sleep ever since I read that Larry Summers is leaving his post as top economic adviser to President Barack Obama's top economic adviser. Why doesn't my phone ring? I'm eating with it at my elbow. I've changed the way I walk to work to avoid cell phone dead zones. I'm even sleeping with the phone. And still no one has called to offer me the post.

I know the phone's going to ring, though, and I want to be prepared for the Big Question: What would you do to turn around the U.S. economy? I've quickly worked up this draft of an answer. I don't know how much more time I have before the president calls.

Change the way we define the problem

No more baby steps. You don't fix a crisis this big by tinkering around the edges. I had this drummed into me in a business school class in 1984. My assignment was to come up with a budget to fix the New York City economy. The professor read my carefully prepared solution and laughed. Well, actually he guffawed. You think you can fix this budget, he asked, by closing firehouses?

Now I'm looking at a $14 trillion U.S. economy with an unemployment rate pushing 10%. Tinkering with the tax code or offering a FICA tax holiday isn't going to fix this crisis.

Admit that as bad as things are now, they weren't exactly swell before the crisis. Incomes for the average family have been stagnant for the past 30 years—especially if you take out extra dollars that come from having more moms in the work force and having one or both parents work extra and/or temporary jobs. For some workers—blue-collar industrial workers and workers without high school degrees—the Great Recession began not in 2007, but in the 1980s and hasn't ever ended.

Even the great job-creation surge in the Clinton years doesn't look like the best of times when you consider the kinds of work created—lower-paying, predominantly service-industry jobs—to replace the higher-paying manufacturing jobs that had been lost.

Let's admit that the ideas now getting recycled in the midterm election campaigns from both parties haven't prevented or reversed that long income stagnation—and they aren't likely to. It's not because tax cuts, tax increases, education credits, No Child Left Behind, spending cuts, spending increases and the other patent medicines peddled by politicians don't have any effect but because they're too narrowly focused to end a 30-year problem.

As Larry Summers would say—if we transplanted James Carville's brain into the Harvard economist's body (and that would sure be fun)—"It's the global economy, stupid." Fixes that ignore the global economy are going to be too small or completely misguided. And those of us who live in the United States will have to give up some of our economic illusions. (Come on, you can do it. It's not nearly as painful as giving up "Mad Men.")

For example, it's time to concede that when it comes to exports, the U.S. has become essentially a commodity economy. We export corn, coal and scrap paper, and we import TVs, cars and solar cells. Export our way out of this mess with an extra paragraph here or there in our trade treaties? Oh, puleez! Play hardball (or insert your own sports cliché here)

Let me give you an example ripped from the headlines, as we say here in New York. China has slapped quotas on its exports of rare-earth minerals essential for building hybrid cars, wind turbines, amplifiers for optical cable communications networks and the newest fluorescent lights. If companies want to build these products and are worried about their sources of these raw materials, they can make sure they have plenty to work with quite simply—by moving production to China.

And we're going to fight back against this sort of globalism by creating a $30 billion loan fund for small businesses or lowering mortgage rates (by having the Federal Reserve run up its balance sheet)?

It's war out there in the global economy, and the battle is to secure the world's scarcest commodity: good jobs. That's way better than real war, let me remind you. But to stand a chance in this war, the U.S. has got to at least match the firepower of the other countries.

In this competitive economic war, we can't afford to have all the battles fought on our turf, and we can't always be on the defensive. European and Chinese makers of high-speed trains are going to fight it out to see who gets billions in U.S. taxpayer money to build a high-speed line in California.

Where's General Electric (GE, news, msgs) in that competition? And if we don't have the team that can play in the big leagues in high-speed trains, how about we go after China's market for freight cars or freight locomotives?

It's not like our stuff can't compete with their stuff. In many cases, cheap financing is the only thing they've got that we don't. (And it's hard to believe that it isn't cheaper to provide low-interest taxpayer financing to U.S. companies than it is to spend taxpayer money saving an industrial shell from bankruptcy.)

If moving from a defensive crouch to offense means using government resources to create competitive industries from scratch, so be it. It's cheaper in the long run than paying for years of unemployment and the social havoc that would cause. It's insane that the U.S. doesn't have a domestic source of rare-earth minerals and that we're willing to give anybody in the world control of something essential to 21st-century technology.

Think big? No, bigger!

So the world's companies want our metallurgical coal? Fine. Have them build steel mills in Pennsylvania and West Virginia and more car plants in Alabama. The world's companies want our corn? Fine. Make their home countries tear down the trade barriers that keep U.S. chickens out of Russia and other nations. (Granted, it might help if we promised not to dip the birds in bleach.)

Countries such as France and China have official national champions—companies the governments back to drive their domestic economies and the countries' exports overseas. The U.S. has de facto national champions. They haven't been awarded that title by some bureaucrat but have earned it in the actual marketplace. Intel (INTC, news, msgs), for example, is one.

But our de facto national champions often don't get much actual support from Washington, although we do give hefty tax breaks to last-century industries such as oil. So Intel winds up building a chip plant in Vietnam because that country supplies cheap land and labor. With government incentives, the U.S. could match that. And don't say that isn't our system. Alabama, South Carolina and Tennessee are perfectly comfortable paying BMW (BAMXF, news, msgs) or Toyota Motor (TM, news, msgs) to build plants in their states.

Get over our bad case of 'not invented here'

Maybe once upon a time we were justified in looking down at other countries' technology or to make jokes about their claims to have invented the telephone. But if that superiority was ever justified (and I'll bet my Marie Curie fan club ring that it wasn't), it sure isn't now. We need to stop exporting technology and to start importing some, too.

I've got no problem with Boeing (BA, news, msgs) subcontracting work to Chinese companies and giving a boost to China's aircraft industry through legal or extralegal technology transfer. But how about some of it flowing the other way? How about a U.S. company getting its hands on the technology to build a high-speed train as part of any contract in California? How about getting ArcelorMittal (MT, news, msgs) to transfer its best practices to U.S. steel company partners when it builds a plant in the U.S.?

We need to recognize that you don't win in this global economy playing with out-of-date infrastructure. Our airports, highways, ports and railroads aren't up to the standards of the toughest of our competitors. And then there's electronic technology, where our wireless Internet network increasingly lags. Countries, especially countries such as Singapore that don't have huge natural advantages, spend to create infrastructure advantages. We let ours decay because it costs too much money.

In the short run, the expense is certainly considerable, although it could be spread over years or decades by a mechanism such as a government-seeded infrastructure bank. (One of the great ironies of the moment is that to find good infrastructure investments, I have to send my money overseas.) In the long term, it is again cheaper than running a country in permanent recession.

And let's upgrade our human capital, too. If many of the workers feeling the brunt of this 30-year stagnation are those without high school diplomas, let's make sure that the next generation has more education and the next generation even more. And let's make sure that it's education that's appropriate to the new global economy.

Raising standards so that every kid getting out of high school can do 12th-grade math and write good (or is it "gooder"?) is a decent goal, but it won't get the job done in the long run. We can't learn only English and expect the rest of the world will, too. We can't say we've got a shortage of engineers, then turn out kids who can't do trigonometry.

It will take a long, tough battle. But again it's cheaper to fight the battle than to pay the long-term cost of losing it.

We should recognize that there's a potentially nasty strain of xenophobia built into this idea of global economic competition, and we should fight it actively by expanding all existing programs that get Americans acquainted with—or, better yet, immersed in—other cultures. If you play any competitive sport, you know it's possible to play to defeat your opponent with all your strength and still go out for a beer afterward. And it's fun.

Let's fix Washington, too

Your response to this is likely to be, "We can never get anything like that through Washington." (And I do recognize that another possible response is, "Thank goodness, nothing like that would ever get through Washington.")

I refuse to accept that. If the current politicians won't act, dump 'em. It may take years to create a responsive government. But if it took 30 years to get the problem to this stage, what's another 30 years fixing it?

And as long as we're thinking big, doesn't it strike you as hopelessly antiquated that we elect representatives to vote our will (ha!) in the age of social networks and online collaboration? Why not do away with the current budget system entirely and let Americans vote online for the programs they want to fund? Maybe within a limit of no more than a 20% change from one year to the next, to ensure some kind of continuity? (So it would take five years to kill the kind of boondoggle that now lives on forever.) And I'd suggest a simple rule: Adjusted for the economic cycle, we couldn't spend more than we had. Of course, to do that we'd need to actually implement a capital budget in Washington.

Or how about something like "American Idol" in which Washington department heads competed on TV for our money? Or "Budget Survivor," in which the worst government programs could get voted off the island (or out of D.C.).

I'd watch, especially if they had tiki torches.

Looking at my plan, I can't understand why the White House hasn't called. Come on, phone, ring!

Comments:

"It's not like our stuff can't compete with their stuff. In many cases, cheap financing is the only thing they've got that we don't. (And it's hard to believe that it isn't cheaper to provide low-interest taxpayer financing to U.S. companies than it is to spend taxpayer money saving an industrial shell from bankruptcy.)"

Reply: What "stuff" would you be referring to? We've been running massive trade deficits with China for a number of years now (and a number of other countries for that matter). Everyone always blames China for our crumbling manufacturing industry. It is thought that the undervalued Yuan is the sole reason why U.S. manufacturing jobs are being shipped to China. That theory just doesn't hold ground. What is often not examined is the massive tax and regulatory burden placed on U.S. businesses. This is the main reason businesses leave this country. It simply becomes too costly to operate within our borders. Sure, on a relative basis, Chinese workers earn less than Americans. But what is not seen is that companies in China have much higher input prices as a result of the inflation caused by their previous dollar peg. Furthermore, ALL countries manipulate their currencies. In the last 18 months, the U.S. has created more currency than it had in the previous 200 years combined. Why lay the blame on the Chinese for our own terrible fiscal and monetary policies? Look at the ISM numbers released yesterday if you think a weaker dollar will help us (prices paid for goods surged, which killed margins).

And, as far as the U.S. tax payers providing low interest loans to businesses, could you tell me why interest rates are so low? If you answered because of investors' fear of deflation, you obviously haven't been paying attention to commodity prices. Either that, or you haven't been to a grocery store in a while. Interest rates are low because the Federal Reserve has more than tripled the monetary base. They are about to surpass Japan and become the 2nd largest holder of U.S. Treasuries. Within the next year, they will surpass China as the largest holder. Either you didn't know this or you don't understand the difference between funding our debt and monetizing it. Look at their balance sheet ($812 billion in Treasuries, up from $805 billion last week). Every dollar that exists today was borrowed into existence. Stop blaming China. We have bigger concerns of our own.—Jim Jubak

"If moving from a defensive crouch to offense means using government resources to create competitive industries from scratch, so be it. It's cheaper in the long run than paying for years of unemployment and the social havoc that would cause."

Reply: First of all, the government cannot create jobs by passing legislation. It can certainly destroy jobs by passing legislation. We have to remember that the government doesn't have any resources. It only has resources that it takes from the private sector. And those resources that are taken from the private sector, be it from taxes, from borrowing, or from printing money, are resources that businesses no longer have access to. It's easy for politicians to point to jobs that the government's created. What is not seen are jobs that were destroyed as a result, or that never came into existence, because the government had to take this money from someone else, thus depriving businesses and individuals of the capital that is needed to create jobs. In addition, government jobs are not self-sustaining, and don't produce goods that act to increase our standard of living. We don't just need jobs in this country. We need productive jobs! Wake up people!—Jim Jubak

20101006-01	13:21	Dennis	"The Undeserving Rich: Did Warren Buffet Really Earn His $50 Billion?"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Do the rich really deserve all their wealth?

"The Undeserving Rich: Did Warren Buffet Really Earn His $50 Billion?" by Gar Alperovitz and Lew Daly, Dollars and Sense

Oct. 4, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148417/>)

Warren Buffett, one of the wealthiest men in the nation, is worth nearly $50 billion. Does he "deserve" all this money? Why? Did he work so much harder than everyone else? Did he create something so extraordinary that no one else could have created it? Ask Buffett himself and he will tell you that he thinks "society is responsible for a very significant percentage of what I've earned." But if that's true, doesn't society deserve a very significant share of what he has earned?

When asked why he is so successful, Buffett commonly replies that this is the wrong question. The more important question, he stresses, is why he has so much to work with compared to other people in the world, or compared to previous generations of Americans. How much money would I have "if I were born in Bangladesh," or "if I was born here in 1700," he asks.

Buffett may or may not deserve something more than another person working with what a given historical or collective context provides. As he observes, however, it is simply not possible to argue in any serious way that he deserves all of the benefits that are clearly attributable to living in a highly developed society.

Buffett has put his finger on one of the most explosive issues developing just beneath the surface of public awareness. Over the last several decades, economic research has done a great deal of solid work pinpointing much more precisely than in the past what share of what we call "wealth" society creates versus what share any individual can be said to have earned and thus deserved. This research raises profound moral—and ultimately political—questions.

Recent estimates suggest that U.S. economic output per capita has increased more than twenty-fold since 1800. Output per hour worked has increased an estimated fifteen-fold since 1870 alone. Yet the average modern person likely works with no greater commitment, risk, or intelligence than his or her counterpart from the past. What is the primary cause of such vast gains if individuals do not really "improve"? Clearly, it is largely that the scientific, technical, and cultural knowledge available to us, and the efficiency of our means of storing and retrieving this knowledge, have grown at a scale and pace that far outstrip any other factor in the nation's economic development.

A half century ago, in 1957, economist Robert Solow calculated that nearly 90% of productivity growth in the first half of the 20th century (from 1909 to 1949) could only be attributed to “technical change in the broadest sense.” The supply of labor and capital—what workers and employers contribute—appeared almost incidental to this massive technological “residual.” Subsequent research inspired by Solow and others continued to point to “advances in knowledge” as the main source of growth. Economist William Baumol calculates that “nearly 90 percent of current GDP was contributed by innovation carried out since 1870.” Baumol judges that his estimate, in fact, understates the cumulative influence of past advances: Even “the steam engine, the railroad, and many other inventions of an earlier era, still add to today’s GDP.”

Related research on the sources of invention bolsters the new view, posing a powerful challenge to conventional, heroic views of technology that characterize progress as a sequence of extraordinary contributions by “Great Men” (occasionally “Great Women”) and their “Great Inventions.” In contrast to this popular view, historians of technology have carefully delineated the incremental and cumulative way most technologies actually develop. In general, a specific field of knowledge builds up slowly through diverse contributions over time until—at a particular moment when enough has been established—the next so-called “breakthrough” becomes all but inevitable.

Often many people reach the same point at virtually the same time, for the simple reason that they all are working from the same developing information and research base. The next step commonly becomes obvious (or if not obvious, very likely to be taken within a few months or years). We tend to give credit to the person who gets there first—or rather, who gets the first public attention, since often the real originator is not as good at public relations as the one who jumps to the front of the line and claims credit. Thus, we remember Alexander Graham Bell as the inventor of the telephone even though, among others, Elisha Gray and Antonio Meucci got there at the same time or even before him. Newton and Leibniz hit upon the calculus at roughly the same time in the 1670s; Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace produced essentially the same theory of evolution at roughly the same time in the late 1850s. Less important than who gets the credit is the simple fact that most breakthroughs occur not so much thanks to one “genius,” but because of the longer historical unfolding of knowledge. All of this knowledge—the overwhelming source of all modern wealth—comes to us today through no effort of our own. It is the generous and unearned gift of the past. In the words of Northwestern economist Joel Mokyr, it is a “free lunch.”

Collective knowledge is often created by formal public efforts as well, a point progressives often stress. Many of the advances which propelled our high-tech economy in the early 1990s grew directly out of research programs and technical systems financed and often collaboratively developed by the federal government. The Internet, to take the most obvious example, began as a government defense project, the ARPANET, in the early 1960s. Up through the 1980s there was little private investment or interest in developing computer networks. Today’s vast software industry also rests on a foundation of computer language and operating hardware developed in large part with public support. The Bill Gateses of the world—the heroes of the “New Economy”—might still be working with vacuum tubes and punch cards were it not for critical research and technology programs created or financed by the federal government after World War II. Other illustrations range from jet airplanes and radar to the basic life science research undergirding many pharmaceutical industry advances. Yet the truth is that the role of collectively inherited knowledge is far, far greater than just the contributions made by direct public support, important as they are.

A straightforward but rarely confronted question arises from these facts: If most of what we have today is attributable to advances we inherit in common, then why should this gift of our collective history not more generously benefit all members of society?

The top 1% of U.S. households now receives more income than the bottom 120 million Americans combined. The richest 1% of households owns nearly half of all investment assets (stocks and mutual funds, financial securities, business equity, trusts, non-home real estate). The bottom 90% of the population owns less than 15%; the bottom half—150 million Americans—owns less than 1%. If America’s vast wealth is mainly a gift of our common past, what justifies such disparities?

Robert Dahl, one of America’s leading political scientists—and one of the few to have confronted these facts—put it this way after reading economist Edward Denison’s pioneering work on growth accounting: “It is immediately obvious that little growth in the American economy can be attributed to the actions of particular individuals.” He concluded straightforwardly that, accordingly, “the control and ownership of the economy rightfully belongs to ‘society.’”

Contrast Dahl’s view with that of Joe the Plumber, who famously inserted himself into the 2008 presidential campaign with his repeated claim that he has “earned” everything he gets and so any attempt to tax his earnings is totally unjustified. Likewise, “we didn’t rely on somebody else to build what we built,” banking titan Sanford Weill tells us in a

New York Times front-page story on the "New Gilded Age." "I think there are people," another executive tells the Times, "who because of their uniqueness warrant whatever the market will bear."

A direct confrontation with the role of knowledge—and especially inherited knowledge—goes to the root of a profound challenge to such arguments. One way to think about all this is by focusing on the concept of "earned" versus "unearned" income. Today this distinction can be found in conservative attacks on welfare "cheats" who refuse to work to earn their keep, as well as in calls even by some Republican senators to tax the windfall oil-company profits occasioned by the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina.

The concept of unearned income first came into clear focus during the era of rapidly rising land values caused by grain shortages in early 19th-century England. Wealth derived simply from owning land whose price was escalating appeared illegitimate because no individual truly "earned" such wealth. Land values—and especially explosively high values—were largely the product of factors such as fertility, location, and population pressures. The huge profits (unearned "rents," in the technical language of economics) landowners reaped when there were food shortages were viewed as particularly egregious. David Ricardo's influential theory of "differential rent"—i.e., that land values are determined by differences in fertility and location between different plots of land—along with religious perspectives reaching back to the Book of Genesis played a central role in sharpening this critical moral distinction.

John Stuart Mill, among others, developed the distinction between "earned" and "unearned" in the middle decades of the 19th century and applied it to other forms of "external wealth," or what he called "wealth created by circumstances." Mill's approach fed into a growing sense of the importance of societal inputs which produce economic gains beyond what can be ascribed to one person working alone in nature without benefit of civilization's many contributions. Here a second element of what appears, historically, as a slowly evolving understanding also becomes clear: If contribution is important in determining rewards, then, Mill and others urged, since society at large makes major contributions to economic achievement, it too has "earned" and deserves a share of what has been created. Mill believed strongly in personal contribution and individual reward, but he held that in principle wealth "created by circumstances" should be reclaimed for social purposes. Karl Marx, of course, tapped the distinction between earned and unearned in his much broader attack on capitalism and its exploitation of workers' labor.

The American republican writer Thomas Paine was among the first to articulate a societal theory of wealth based directly on the earned/unearned distinction. Paine argued that everything "beyond what a man's own hands produce" was a gift which came to him simply by living in society, and hence "he owes on every principle of justice, of gratitude, and of civilization, a part of that accumulation back again to society from whence the whole came." A later American reformer, Henry George, focused on urban land rather than the agricultural land at the heart of Ricardo's concern. George challenged what he called "the unearned increment" which is created when population growth and other societal factors increase land values. In Britain, J. A. Hobson argued that the unearned value created by the industrial system in general was much larger than just the part which accrued to landowners, and that it should be treated in a similar (if not more radical and comprehensive) fashion. In a similar vein, Hobson's early 20th-century contemporary Leonard Trelawny Hobhouse declared that the "prosperous business man" should consider "what single step he could have taken" without the "sum of intelligence which civilization has placed at his disposal." More recently, the famed American social scientist Herbert Simon judged that if "we are very generous with ourselves, I suppose we might claim that we 'earned' as much as one fifth of [our income]."

The distinction between earned and unearned gains is central to most of these thinkers, as is the notion that societal contributions—including everything an industrial economy requires, from the creation of laws, police, and courts to the development of schools, trade restrictions, and patents—must be recognized and rewarded. The understanding that such societal contributions are both contemporary and have made a huge and cumulative contribution over all of history is also widely accepted. Much of the income they permit and confer now appears broadly analogous to the unearned rent a landlord claims. What is new and significant here is the further clarification that by far the most important element in all this is the accumulated knowledge which society contributes over time.

All of this, as sociologist Daniel Bell has suggested, requires a new "knowledge theory of value"—especially as we move deeper into the high-tech era through computerization, the Internet, cybernetics, and cutting-edge fields such as gene therapy and nanotechnology. One way to grasp what is at stake is the following: A person today working the same number of hours as a similar person in 1870—working just as hard but no harder—will produce perhaps 15 times as much economic output. It is clear that the contemporary person can hardly be said to have "earned" his much greater productivity.

Consider further that if we project forward the past century's rate of growth, a person working a century from now would be able to produce—and potentially receive as "income"—up to seven times today's average income. By far the greatest part of this gain will also come to this person as a free gift of the past—the gift of the new knowledge created, passed on, and inherited from our own time forward.

She and her descendents, in fact, will inevitably contribute less, relative to the huge and now expanded contribution of the past, than we do today. The obvious question, again, is simply this: to what degree is it meaningful to say that this person will have "earned" all that may come her way? These and other realities suggest that the quiet revolution in our understanding of how wealth is created has ramifications for a much more profound and far reaching challenge to today's untenable distribution of income and wealth.

(Gar Alperovitz, Lionel R. Bauman Professor of Political Economy at the University of Maryland, and Lew Daly, a Senior Fellow of Demos, are the authors of Unjust Deserts: How the Rich Are Taking Our Common Inheritance and Why We Should Take It Back (New Press, 2009), upon which this article is based.)

© 2010 Dollars and Sense

20101007-01	07:38	SteveB	Re: "The Undeserving Rich" & "The Rich Are Hogging Our Common Inheritance—We Must Take It Back"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

I know many of you will think this article is pretty radical, but Warren Buffet has been saying for years that the rich, including himself, should pay more taxes. The one thing I think should have been emphasized more here (maybe the authors did, in the book) and that should be emphasized more in Republican thinking is EDUCATION! If discoveries, knowledge, and information developed by society in the past contributes directly to increased productivity (and who could argue that it does not?), then education deserves a greater societal emphasis and share of resources because it plays such a crucial role in productivity.

Yet Republicans and Democrats both seem hell bent on destroying the educational system that helped make us the richest country on earth. The Republicans because teachers have unions and teach Evolution, I guess. The Democrats because they want to control everything from the top down and permit a flood of illegal immigrants to swamp the system and establish Spanish as a second national language (with subsequent loss of productivity). They should all be trying to improve our educational system, not destroy it.

If the Bush tax cuts go away, the rich will still be paying less taxes than they did during Ronald Reagan's term in office. I don't think that will kill them, even though they're acting like it would. But not Warren Buffett, maybe the smartest of them all. The rich all seem to want balanced governmental budgets. Maybe they, especially, and all of us need to make this possible. Though, first, the people have to take the reins of government away from the rich and powerful, so that spending can be made responsible.

"The Rich Are Hogging Our Common Inheritance—We Must Take It Back" by Gar Alperovitz and Lew Daly, The New Press

Dec. 8, 2008, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/109509/>)

(Editor's Note: The following is an excerpt from Unjust Deserts: How the Rich Are Taking Our Common Inheritance and Why We Should Take It Back by Gar Alperovitz and Lew Daly, published by the New Press, 2008.)

"Technological progress ... has provided society with what economists call a "free lunch," that is, an increase in output that is not commensurate with the increase in effort and cost necessary to bring it about."—Joel Mokyr, Lever of Riches: Technological Creativity and Economic Progress (1990)

Warren Buffett, one of the wealthiest men in the nation, is worth over $60 billion. Does he "deserve" all this money? Why? Did he work so much harder than everyone else? Did he create something so extraordinary that no one else could have created? Ask Buffett himself and he will tell you that personally he thinks that "society is responsible for a very significant percentage of what I've earned."

But if this is true, doesn't society deserve a very significant share of what he has received?

Buffett may not know it, but he has put his finger on one of the most explosive issues developing just beneath the surface of public awareness. In recent decades researchers working in a broad range of economic, technological, and other fields have clarified much more precisely than in the past the many ways "society" contributes to the creation of "wealth"—and, accordingly, how relatively little any one individual can be said to have earned and "deserved." Their research, in turn, raises profound moral—and ultimately political—questions that are becoming increasingly difficult to avoid. At the heart of this revolution in understanding is a fundamental reconsideration of the extraordinary role of knowledge in economic growth—and of how ever-increasing knowledge, accumulating across the generations, is central to the creation of all wealth.

The distribution of income and wealth in the United States is more unequal today than at any time since the 1920s. The following study shares with Buffett a fundamental skepticism toward the belief that the nation's extraordinary inequalities are simply a natural outgrowth of differences in individual effort, skills, and intelligence. "We didn't rely on somebody else to build what we built," banking titan Sanford Weill tells us in a New York Times front-page story on the "New Gilded Age." "I think there are people," insists another executive, "who because of their uniqueness warrant whatever the market will bear."

The new research findings suggest that such views are profoundly wrong—but for reasons that go well beyond Buffett's general view and, indeed, beyond the understandings that until recently have been common among specialists concerned with these matters. Often in history something dramatic is brewing in the quiet work of scholars—something the public doesn't know about or understand until much, much later. Einstein's famous $E = mc^2$ equation meant absolutely nothing to most people when it was first published in 1905—but it hit the world literally as a bombshell when atomic weapons exploded in 1945. The sophisticated mathematics Claude Shannon worked out in the 1940s laid theoretical groundwork for the digital communication that today ramifies into every corner of domestic and global life. The structure of DNA was deciphered by scientists in 1953, but the public is only now beginning to realize just how radically genetic engineering may revolutionize medicine, food production, and many other important fields.

Unjust Deserts suggests that something at least as portentous as these extraordinary developments is silently emerging among scholars studying the sources of wealth, and that once the implications are fully grasped, it too is likely to have dramatic implications—in this case for the distribution of income, wealth, and power throughout society. It suggests, moreover, that this new understanding and the steady evolution of the knowledge economy, combined with growing social and economic pain and set against a backdrop of ever-worsening inequality, are likely to contribute to potentially massive political change as the twenty-first century unfolds. Consider the following truth: a person working today the same number of hours as a similar person in 1800—and working just as hard (and no harder)—can obviously produce many, many times the economic output. Recent estimates suggest that national output per capita has increased more than twenty fold since 1800. Output per hour worked has increased an estimated fifteen fold since 1870 alone.

Consider further that the modern person on average is likely to work with no greater commitment, risk, or intelligence than his counterpart from the past.

What is the primary cause of such vast gains if individuals do not really "improve"? The answer is obviously more productivity—more output from the same level of input. And self-evidently what this means is that we are more productive as a society. But how does a society become more productive if individual effort and intelligence remain relatively constant? Clearly, it is largely because on the whole the scientific, technical, and cultural knowledge available to us, and the efficiency of our means of storing and retrieving this knowledge, have grown at a scale and pace that far outstrip any other factor in the nation's economic achievement. "The central phenomenon of the modern age," economic historian Joel Mokyr observes, is quite simply "that as an aggregate we know more."

A half century ago, in 1957, the future Nobel Prize-winning economist Robert Solow calculated that nearly 90 percent of productivity growth in the first half of the twentieth century (from 1909 to 1949) could only be attributed to "technical change in the broadest sense."

The supply of labor and capital—what workers and employers contribute—appeared almost incidental to this massive technological "residual." Subsequent research inspired by Solow has continued to put a spotlight on "advances in knowledge" as the main source of growth. Another highly respected economist, William Baumol, argues that "nearly 90 percent ... of current GDP was contributed by innovation carried out since 1870." Baumol judges that his estimate, in fact, understates the cumulative influence of past advances: even "the steam engine, the railroad, and many other inventions of an earlier era still add to today's GDP."

Looked at another way, if today's high earners are typically highly educated, this is clearly not primarily because they are more intelligent or work harder, and it is not mainly because they were lucky in the "birth lottery," as some argue. Above all, they are highly educated because there is more knowledge for them to obtain and more opportunity to do so. "A college-educated engineer working today and one working 100 years ago have the same human capital," Stanford economist Paul Romer observes. But the engineer working today is far, far more productive. The reason, again, is self-evident: "He or she can take advantage of all the additional knowledge accumulated as design problems were solved during the last 100 years."

Today a society's "stock of knowledge" and its "technological state" are the subject of intense discussion by scholars and policy makers. An obvious truth that emerges from their work is also clear and lies at the foundation of the following study: All of this knowledge—the overwhelming source of all modern wealth—comes to us today through no effort of our own. It is the generous and unearned gift of the past. In the words of Mokyr, it is a "free lunch."

An obvious question arises from these facts: if most of what we have today is attributable to advances we inherit in common—what another economic historian, Nathan Rosenberg, has termed a "huge overhang of technological inheritance"—why, specifically, should this gift of our collective history not more generously and broadly benefit all members of society? Once the modern understandings are fully grasped, today's distributive realities become much harder to ignore: the top 1 percent of U.S. households now receives more income than the bottom 120 million Americans combined.

The richest 1 percent of households owns nearly half of all individually owned investment assets (stocks and mutual funds, financial securities, business equity, trusts, non-home real estate). The bottom 90 percent of the population owns less than 15 percent; the bottom half of the population—150 million Americans—own less than 1 percent.

If America's vast wealth is mainly a gift of our common past, how, specifically, can such disparities be justified? Although a great deal of research has been done on knowledge and economic growth—and although one can find related moral reflections scattered throughout the work of many writers—very few have dealt directly with the equity issues posed by our scientific and technological knowledge inheritance. We seek to remedy this large-order gap in public understanding. We hope thereby also to contribute to shaping new policies appropriate to the era of the knowledge economy.

Copyright New Press, 2008.

(Gar Alperovitz is the Lionel R. Bauman Professor of Political Economy at the University of Maryland. His previous books include The Decision to Use the Atomic Bomb and America Beyond Capitalism. He lives in Washington, D.C. Lew Daly is a senior fellow at Demos and the author of God and the Welfare State. He lives in New York City. [God? —SteveB])

20101007-02	09:28	Pam	Re: "The Undeserving Rich"
-------------	-------	-----	----------------------------

Dear Dennis & SteveB,

I don't think this article is radical at all. I think it makes tons of sense. It gives me a different perspective on something I believed intuitively, but this backs up the argument with facts and figures. It seems so obvious, but I never put it all together this way. I'm going to send it to my Republican friend, though she now claims to be a Libertarian. I'm beginning to think they're just about as bad. You are so right: the problem is the entire political system. There have been other periods in our history when things were really out of whack, as they are now, and somehow we found our way back. I hope we can do that this time.

My PhD work was on the Victorian period, and there are many parallels between the 19th c. and now. They had an industrial revolution, ours is technological. There were abuses and injustices early on that many of the leading thinkers of the day thought were inevitable—or the will of God. David Ricardo, Thomas Malthus, etc. But the end of the century saw a whole slew of reforms that were essentially democratic and humane. The 1840s—the "Hungry Forties"—witnessed bankruptcies, workhouses for the poor, starvation for the Irish, and a huge proportion of the population without the franchise. Reform actually started in 1832 with the First Reform Bill, but that was also when Jeremy Bentham's philosophy of Utilitarianism was a huge influence. Your article talks about "earned" and "unearned" income; in the 19th it was the "deserving" and the "undeserving" poor. Dickens, among others, exposed societal abuses and did a lot to shape things up. The only writer I can think of right now who is doing anything similar is Jonathan Franzen, especially in his latest novel. Philip Caputo is another writer who exposes the horrors of our presence in Africa. I bet no one I know has ever read any of his books.

It's too bad more people won't see this article, but I fault liberals and democrats for not explaining and articulating the realities more clearly. All we get is mushy platitudes. I get the AARP bulletin, and the latest issue explains the Health Care Reform Bill in about two pages. I don't see how ANYONE could object to its provisions. Why aren't the Democrats hammering that home? The media carries on night and day about how the Republicans are going to take back the House, making it a self-fulfilling prophecy. The Sarah Palin contingent is revving up and saying the most outlandish things, and Harry Reid is losing in the polls to a wack-job. I guess the lunatic fringe makes good copy.

I love the Victorians, partly because their greatest minds directly attacked the ills of their society, from Ruskin to Carlyle to Dickens et. al. And they were listened to and widely read! Television fills their spot today, and what's the most popular show on TV? "American Idol." Cable is probably doing more, but how many watch "The Wire" compared to the number that watches Fox News? H. L. Menken called the American middle class the "booboisie." Indeed.

Well, that was fun. Thanks for prompting me to write this. I feel slightly purged.

20101008-01 16:04 SteveB Re: "The Undeserving Rich"

Dear Pam,

I loved your writing here. Wish I could send it to everyone.

You are completely right that this sort of thing has happened before. I found myself thinking of the Standard Oil / The Jungle era the other day.

And, yes, I too completely fail to understand why the seemingly more intelligent left seems so totally unable to stand up for and articulate its own principles. Have the Democrats become so highly paid by big business that they don't even remember what they stand for, let alone form a coherent plan? The idiots in the Republican party seem better able to rally the troops, even without a hint of a coherent plan. I'm not getting much of a clear sense of leadership from the White House, and that's disappointing to me.

UN-ELECT YOUR POLITICIANS!

20101008-02 17:17 Dennis "White America Has Lost Its Mind"

Dementia Americana...

Okay, white people, get out your Thorazine, stop drooling, and read this article. And don't get distracted by the adjacent photos of the naked painting party.

[Maybe a little extreme, but surely no more crazy than Fox News. Thanks, Dennis! I particularly love the cover picture! — SteveB]

"White America Has Lost Its Mind" by Steven Thrasher, The Village Voice

Sept. 29, 2010 (<http://www.villagevoice.com/2010-09-29/news/white-america-has-lost-its-mind/>)

(The white brain, beset with worries, finally goes haywire in spectacular fashion.)

About 12:01 on the afternoon of Jan. 20, 2009, the white American mind began to unravel. It had been a pretty good run up to that point. The brains of white folks had been humming along cogently for near on 400 years on this continent, with little sign that any serious trouble was brewing.

White people, after all, had managed to invent a spiffy new form of self-government so that all white men (and, eventually, women) could have a say in how white people were taxed and governed. White minds had also nearly universally occupied just about every branch of that government and, for more than two centuries, had kept sole possession of the leadership of its executive branch (whose parsonage, after all, is called the White House).

But when that streak was broken—and, for the first time, a non-white president accepted the oath of office—white America rapidly began to lose its grip.

As with other forms of dementia, the signs weren't obvious at first. After the 2008 election, when former House majority leader Tom DeLay suggested that instead of a formal inauguration, Barack Obama should "have a nice little chicken dinner, and we'll save the $125 million," black folks didn't miss the implication. References to chicken, particularly of the fried variety, have long served as a kind of code when white folks referred to black people and their gustatory preferences—and weren't many of us already accustomed to older white politicians making such gaffes? But who among us sensed that it was a harbinger that an entire nation was plunging into madness?

Who didn't chuckle, after all, the first time they heard that white people had doubts that Barack Obama had even been born in the United States and was therefore ineligible to be president? It sounded like one of those Internet stories in which some (usually white) writer does his best to prove something everyone knows to be true is actually the exact opposite. And you go along with it for a few paragraphs to see how long the writer can convince you that what you know is right is actually wrong.

Seemed like that, didn't it? After all, what was the beef? Obama's father was Kenyan, and the kid was born in Hawaii—which is barely a part of the United States to begin with (only a state in 1959!). His mother was white, and after the Kenyan guy left, she married an Indonesian guy, so little Barack lived in Jakarta for a while before coming back to Hawaii to be brought up largely by his white grandparents.

And that's it? Come on, this was after-school-special material, the kind of thing that brings a tear to your eye because little half-Kenyan/half-white Barry made good, not the stuff of conspiracy novels. But the more you shook your head at it, the more it seemed to have taken root deep in the lizard part of the white nervous system. Obama is not an American. He says he's Christian, but he has a Muslim-sounding name. He's not black, he's not white. Is...is he even human?

Today, Newsweek has found, nearly a quarter of Americans believe that Obama is a Muslim, with barely 42 percent of the nation accepting his claim that he's a Christian. CNN finds that a quarter of Americans also believe that Obama was "probably or definitely" born in another country.

Harris found in an online poll that 14 percent of Americans believe in their hearts that President Barack Obama is the antichrist, with nearly a quarter of Republicans saying so.

At least in this form, however, Satan (sometimes) wears a flag pin.

What was going on? Had decades of sucking down so much high-fructose corn syrup not only made Americans incredibly obese, but also messed with white brain chemistry to the point that some sort of tipping point had occurred?

Not a bad theory, but no, there's a simpler explanation, with two parts: For the first time in their lives, baby boomers are hard up against it economically, and white boy is becoming outnumbered and it's got his bowels chilled with fear.

"In an age of diminished resources, the United States may be heading for an intensifying confrontation between the gray and the brown," writes Ronald Brownstein in his July National Journal article, "The Gray and the Brown: The Generational Mismatch." That's a polite and understated way of saying that older white folks are losing their sh*t as they're being replaced by young brown and black kids while the economy is in the cr*pper.

Brownstein notes that 40 percent of the nation's population under 18 is already non-white, with that number significantly higher in the Southwest (read: Mexicans!). By 2023, that number of young nonwhites will be an outright national majority.

At the same time, the baby boomers are getting older. At 80 percent white, boomers have gotten pretty used to dominating nearly every field of endeavor in this country since they came of age—politics, business, education, the arts—just about everything but MTV programming. Boomers set the national agenda in so many ways that we can forget how much the national economy and national media cater to them. Bewildered by the number of Cialis ads you see on television showing those flabby couples sitting in bathtubs? Or the way that older women are suddenly "cougars" and "MILFs" and . . . oh, yeah, you remember, boomers are getting old, but still want to think they can get the sheets sweaty. See? Boomers and their fixations and fears explain nearly everything.

Anyway, as boomers age, they get more politically active. That's just human nature, and their 40- million-strong AARP is the nation's biggest lobbyist. But as they try to wield that power, they're running into the growing, and less white, younger generations.

"Like tectonic plates, these slow-moving but irreversible forces may generate enormous turbulence as they grind against each other in the years ahead," writes Brownstein.

At some point, when tectonic plates build up enough tension, that destructive energy gets unleashed in a major earthquake, which is a pretty good metaphor for what happened on Nov. 4, 2008. A black man got elected president, and suddenly every aging white boomer in this country turned into Carole King—they sure as hell felt the earth moving under their feet.

Meanwhile, the brother moving into the White House inherited the kind of mortgage that even Wall Street executives might hesitate to call "subprime."

A devastated economy. Two wars, neither being fought with clear goals. Housing markets that resembled war zones. A health system crippled with costs. An auto industry cratering.

But surely, in a time of crisis, the country could pull together to fix this mess, right?

Can you help a brother on health care? No.

The economy? No.

Financial regulatory reform? No.

National security? No.

Now, some black folks can be forgiven for thinking, as they watched the political drama in Washington unfold over the past two years, that this was just another form of the same old thing they'd put up with in one way or another in this conflicted multiracial country.

But there is another explanation.

White people have simply gone sheer f*cking insane.

Let's look at some examples to nail down that theory.

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now was a nonprofit that organized voter drives and worked for improved wages and housing for poor, mostly non-white Americans. And because of who they organized, they became public enemy No. 1 in the eyes of certain people not so thrilled with black folks registering to vote in large numbers.

Obama had once defended ACORN in a voting-rights case (as co-counsel alongside the Justice Department and the League of Women Voters). An ACORN offshoot was one of many Get-Out-the-Vote enterprises employed by his primary (but not general) campaign. The group's members did the same kind of community organizing that Obama had done as a young man. But throughout the 2008 election season, there was a concerted campaign to whip up hysteria about ACORN, and by Nov., 2009, Public Policy Polling found that more than a quarter of Americans (and an outright majority of Republican voters) believed that ACORN had stolen the election for Obama.

This was, of course, after the classic bit of Nixonian "rat-f*cking" pulled off by a prankster named James O'Keefe.

O'Keefe, a veteran at creating videos to make blacks look greedy and stupid (look for "Taxpayers Clearing House" on YouTube), spent the summer driving around the country with his accomplice, Hannah Giles, making videos in ACORN offices asking for advice about avoiding tax troubles with prostitution money. You've no doubt seen the images of O'Keefe dressed as a '70s pimp. But O'Keefe had carefully edited his tapes and left out, for example, that he was decked out in college preppie clothes, not pimp-wear. At least one ACORN office threw him out, and at least two knowingly played along with his ruse. (The San Diego office called the cops after he left, and the Philadelphia office filed a police report.) The upshot was that after his edited tapes became public, Congress quickly voted to strip ACORN of all federal funds. The organization effectively went out of business before the bill could take effect or be thrown out in court.

O'Keefe has maintained he was "absolutely independent" in his project. But in Sept., 2009, the Voice reported that he'd been funded by billionaire conservative Peter Thiel and the Leadership Institute, the same outfit that funded young Grover Norquist and Karl Rove. That revelation fell on deaf ears, however, and to this day, media outlets perpetuate O'Keefe's claim that he was operating without backing.

O'Keefe got further help when his tapes were pushed by BigGovernment.com, which is run by an underhanded blowhard named Andrew Breitbart.

Months later, O'Keefe was arrested by the FBI in a bizarre prank at Senator Mary Landrieu's office, in which he was either attempting to plant a wiretap or, in his explanation on Breitbart's website, just trying to find out whether her phone system worked to help her constituents reach her. (Yeah, that was a good one.)

This summer, Breitbart picked out another black target with another selectively edited video, this one of a U.S.D.A. employee named Shirley Sherrod. His editing so mischaracterized Sherrod's words and intent that the fallout, in the words of Frank Rich, "could not only smear an innocent woman but make every national institution that touched the story look bad. The White House, the NAACP and the news media were all soiled by this episode."

But, hey, politics is hardball, right? We've had rat-f*ckers like Breitbart and O'Keefe around forever (the founding fathers were certainly not immune to dirty tricks in their day). What's different this time, however, is just how easily the lies and distortions of the rat-f*ckers are being soaked up by the damaged crania of this country's drooling white masses. What sort of senility is softening up the frontal lobes of America's palefaces that they can't see through the black-hatred of a wanker like Breitbart?

Out West, meanwhile, as home prices dropped faster than a burst piñata, an easy scapegoat was found: Mexicans. Long the scourge of aging white folks, who don't seem to understand the economics behind their cheap groceries, immigrants from Mexico, Guatemala, and other sweltering southern destinations became enemies of the American Dream.

Suddenly, it was open season on brown-skinned fruit pickers and seamstresses. Arizona passed S.B.1070—a law that would force its residents to carry identity papers with them at all times. Jurisdictions around the nation are salivating to copy suit.

Back East, meanwhile, we have our own brown-skinned devil: the Muslim. When an imam who had done diplomatic work for the Bush administration put together plans to build the Muslim version of a Jewish Community Center a few blocks from Ground Zero (but farther away than an off-track betting joint, a strip club, and the very financial institutions that had detonated the economy), white people freaked out.

At Landmarks Preservation Commission meetings, white housewives from Staten Island suddenly took a great interest in preserving mid-19th-century cast-iron façades and the architecture of Daniel Badger—all to try to keep New Yorkers from taking swimming lessons in the same building where Muslims would have a place to pray. They argued that Muslims could never understand the impact of 9/11 (even though more than 20 Muslims were killed that day) and could never understand the concept of Ground Zero being holy ground (as if a building that would contain prayer services was somehow less holy than an outlet for betting on horses or stuffing dollar bills into G-strings).

But by now, those sorts of distinctions are nearly impossible to make for a white mind so cluttered by decay. Race was always a tough one for white people to deal with, but now the back flips some people are doing over it requires a scorecard.

There may be no better example than Laura Schlessinger and the great white outpouring of support following the bizarre flameout of her radio show.

It all started with the most incomprehensible of happenings: that a black woman would, out of all reason, call the Dr. Laura show seeking advice.

The sister called Schlessinger to ask how to handle her white husband's white friends, who sometimes say racist things that she's uncomfortable with, including using "the N-word."

Schlessinger almost immediately went to, "A lot of blacks voted for Obama simply 'cause he was half black." She told the caller not to "NAACP" her by taking her out of context.

She said "n*gger" is fine to say because "black guys use it all the time."

She then wrote the caller off as having a "chip on [her] shoulder" and declared, "We've got a black man as president, and we have more complaining about racism than ever."

She told the caller that if "you're that hypersensitive about color and don't have a sense of humor" (i.e., you even question that your husband's white friends say "n*gger" to you in your house), "don't marry out of your race."

The caller, Schlessinger thought, was suffering from "hypersensitivity—which is being bred by black activists." Her discomfort with the word "n*gger," Schlessinger said, was just another "attempt to demonize whites hating blacks."

The reaction from white America, who clearly had not remembered to take their thorazine that morning, was overwhelming: Who, if not Laura Schlessinger, should say "n*gger" with impunity?

Schlessinger announced on Larry King Live, however, that in order to "regain" her First Amendment rights of free speech, she would be canceling her show.

Constitutional experts are still trying to parse that one.

Sarah Palin then rushed to Schlessinger's side, Tweeting in her inimitable style, "Don't retreat...reload!" Palin, we can only assume, wanted Schlessinger to utter "n*gger" as often as she wanted. Perhaps the two of them, having both quit their jobs, can get together and put on a road show, opening with "Zip Coon" and finishing with a rousing rendition of "Carry Me Back to Ole Virginny"?

On Feb. 19, 2009, not a month into Obama's presidency, Rick Santelli—a former hedge-fund manager—had a meltdown on the floor of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange while broadcasting for CNBC. Santelli was incensed not that the government was bailing out the multimillionaires who had run giant financial institutions, but that assistance would also be going to help out ordinary people who found themselves defaulting on their home mortgages. Calling such folks "losers," he said, "How many of you want to pay for your neighbor's mortgage that has an extra bathroom and can't pay their bills?" He then added that he was not only mad as hell, but wanted to do something about it: "We're thinking of having a Chicago Tea Party in July. All you capitalists that want to show up to Lake Michigan, I'm gonna start organizing."

Suddenly, other angry (and obviously very confused) white people began organizing their own "tea parties" and, from the start, had to defend themselves from charges that there was more than a little racial component to their movement.

Few were really surprised, for example, when Tea Party Express President Mark Williams turned out to have penned a letter that could have been written in the worst decades of Jim Crow: "We Coloreds have taken a vote and decided that we don't cotton to that whole emancipation thing. Freedom means having to work for real, think for ourselves, and take consequences along with the rewards. That is just far too much to ask of us Colored People and we demand that it stop!"

And it turns out that the "grassroots" modern tea party effort has been largely funded by the Koch brothers, reactionaries whose combined oil wealth places them just behind Bill Gates and Warren Buffet as America's wealthiest men. The brothers have given some $100 million toward the Tea Party's Astroturf call to arms.

"This right-wing, redneck stuff works for them," a former Koch associate told The New Yorker. "They see this as a way to get things done without getting dirty themselves." And in primaries across America this year, the Kochs have gotten one hell of a return on their investment. After decades of pouring money into think-tanks, the billionaire brothers now have an ally no institute fellow could ever match: a scared, angry white mob that votes.

And what a mob. White folks used to shy away from candidates who e-mailed pictures of a woman being f*cked by a horse, didn't they? Can you just see the scene down at the Republican Party headquarters: "Well, except for sending out those e-mails of horse-f*cking, other e-mails of n*gger jokes, and also fathering a love child, this guy Carl Paladino is just our kind of guy!"

Finding Rick Lazio not crazy enough, white New Yorkers nominated Paladino for governor by a margin of almost two to one.

Sure, Lazio had made an effort. He'd gone after the "Ground Zero Mosque" like a good race-baiter, but he just isn't in Paladino's mouth-frothing league. "Crazy Carl" is threatening to take a baseball bat to Albany (and our Tom Robbins explained last week how Carl's loony ravings are an empty act). Now, try, if your cortex is not too far gone, to reel things back a couple of years. Imagine, if you can, Barack Obama surging in polls in 2008 if it were known he'd sent out e-mails of a white woman getting it from a horse, revealed that he had a 10-year-old love child, and was threatening to take a baseball bat to federal employees. It's really impossible to conjure up, isn't it?

That—right there, more than anything—demonstrates just how much the white brain has become Swiss cheese in the last couple of trips around the sun.

A close second place: the really crazy white sh*t happening down in Delaware, a state that never really caused much trouble (except for unleashing Joe Biden on us) until it nominated one-time witch Christine O'Donnell, who is so batsh*t crazy she makes Sarah Palin sound perfectly reasonable.

By now, just about everyone has seen the precious moment in MTV's 1996 Sex in the '90s when O'Donnell made this monumental discovery about masturbation: "If he already knows what pleases him and he can please himself, then why am I in the picture?" Fourteen years later, it doesn't really seem to be dawning on the still-unmarried O'Donnell that she's not "in the picture" and might never be. But that, apparently, isn't going to stop her waging war against the sex lives of everyone else.

Again, only white lunacy explains it: Neither O'Donnell nor Paladino is a fringe candidate. O'Donnell has a difficult, but not impossible, chance to become a U.S. Senator. Paladino may yet become New York's next governor. (He's already polling ahead of Andrew Cuomo among likely male voters, who are generally white and clearly stark raving mad.)

Is there any hope? Can the white mind be cured? And what—other than a massive lobotomy—can salvage it? It's hard to imagine a cure when, at this point, the patient doesn't seem to realize that he's sick. Rush Limbaugh, for example, has declared that it's black Americans who have a problem. The "black frame of mind is terrible" because of unemployment, and, equally important, because of "Tiger Woods's choice of females," he has said. What was that about a pot and a kettle?

If there is a cure, it likely won't come from Barack Obama. There are those who say that this president invited our current derangement by not being commanding enough. They say he should have inveighed Franklin D. Roosevelt, who famously said before ever being re-elected, "I should like to have it said of my first Administration that in it, the forces of selfishness and of lust for power met their match. I should like to have it said of my second Administration that in it these forces met their master." But if Obama ever referred to being the "master" of anything, he'd scare white people more than he already does.

Glenn Beck is one of the downright terrified, and has said that Obama has "a deep-seated hatred of white people or the white culture." Which makes you wonder, has Beck really not seen Obama in his golf attire?

In the end, it goes beyond Obama, and the current economy, and is really about the inevitable demographic future of America, those coming browns and the grays. They will—one way or another—have to learn to get along.

It is true, as Brownstein says, that the graying boomers will hate to pay for the education, health, and welfare of the coming browns. They'll be stingy about it. They'll scream about it. But they'll have no choice but to do it.

After all, who but the hordes of young browns will be around to work when the grays retire? To pay taxes? To fund their Medicare and Social Security? And how will they earn enough money to finance boomers in their retirement if they're not well educated and healthy?

To do this dance effectively, the white American mind is going to have to focus and prioritize. Maybe, just maybe, it might be required to act with a little ever-loving sanity every now and again.

20101008-03 19:12 Patti Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia

Hello everyone! I'm Patti and I'm SteveB's niece by marriage.

I've just read this excellent debate about free trade and as a person with a degree in international business and living in a poor country such as Bolivia, I think that there is a lot of imperfections in the "free" trade economy, nothing is "free"..... and I also believe that countries like mine can't compete with an economy like China with their low prices, especially since we haven't developed much "higher value added goods and services" and our main income still comes from the international sale of raw materials.

In recent times, Bolivia is worse than ever before and we are going down the road with Venezuela (we are not just there yet, but we are in the fast lane for total economic disaster) and the whole world is watching how our rights are being violated and nobody takes an action, so why do you think this is? Don't you think the "free trade" economy has anything to do with it?

20101008-04 19:25 Charis Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia

Dear Patti,

I live in Bolivia too, and love it, but I think blaming other countries for our problems is the easy way out. Yes, free trade probably has something to do with Bolivia's economic disaster but nuestra querida y amada Bolivia has had many opportunities to better herself as a nation and we haven't known how to appreciate the opportunities that we've had and take advantage of them. Bolivia had a woman president 40 years ago, universities before the U.S. even existed, and many other opportunities to be a great nation before the U.S. was ever what it is today and before free trade ever existed as an economic system. As an international relations graduate I'd say it would be good for us to criticize ourselves in a responsible and positive way once in a while and think about what our own mistakes may have been that have resulted in what we are going through today in Bolivia. I think in response it would be nice if you'd take a look at this article and ask yourself whether or not Bolivia herself has anything to do with Bolivia's situation:

<http://www.boliviabella.com/we-did-something-wrong-speech-by-oscar-arias-president-of-costa-rica.html>

20101008-05 22:29 Patti Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia

Dear Charis,

Thanks for your answer, but I think you've got me wrong, I wasn't trying to take the blame away from the Bolivians about their own situation. I mean, it's our own fault and we have to work harder than everyone else to overcome our poverty and change things.

On the other hand, I was talking about the situation with our "dictatorial" governments (for lack of a better word to describe it) and I just think maybe the international community could do something about it too and I just wonder why they don't....

To illustrate my point, I just ask this question: Why is the U.S. is still buying oil from Venezuela? (And don't get me wrong I'm not blaming them for the world's problems.)

20101008-06 23:45 Charis Re: "Free" Trade, Bolivia

Dear Patti,

That was kind of exactly my point. I completely agree with you about that we are heading toward dictatorship and I really do wonder what the international community could do—probably not much because every country is sovereign. And that's my point. When it's convenient to it, Bolivia says "we are sovereign" and wants everyone else to butt out of its business. But when it needs help, it suddenly wonders why the international community doesn't do anything to help. So what can they do? If they do nothing they get criticized. If they do something they are "imperialistas".

To other countries, doing something to help Bolivia is a LOSE-LOSE situation. And to be honest, what most of the international community right now is asking is: why, if they do not want it, did Bolivians vote for the government they now have? And not once, but TWICE? What can they do? Bolivians have the government they have because Bolivians voted for it.

As to buying oil from Venezuela, I've asked myself exactly the same question. In my opinion, purchasing Venezuelan oil means the U.S. is funding that government and I am personally opposed to the U.S. purchasing Venezuelan oil—but what it all boils down to is, that the U.S. is still buying oil from Venezuela because the U.S. needs oil. By the way, the U.S. offered to purchase oil and gas from Bolivia, but Bolivians protested against that (as they did with Chile). Bolivia could not get its act together and, once again, lost the opportunity.

20101009-01 07:26 SteveB Fw: Heaven or Hell?

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

While walking down the street one day, a corrupt [aren't they all?] Senator was tragically hit by a car and died.

His soul arrives in heaven and is met by St. Peter at the entrance.

"Welcome to heaven," says St. Peter. "Before you settle in, it seems there is a problem. We seldom see a high official around these parts, you see, so we're not sure what to do with you."

"No problem, just let me in," says the Senator.

"Well, I'd like to, but I have orders from the higher ups. What we'll do is have you spend one day in hell and one in heaven. Then you can choose where to spend eternity."

"Really? I've made up my mind. I want to be in heaven," says the Senator.

"I'm sorry, but we have our rules."

And with that, St. Peter escorts him to the elevator and he goes down, down, down to hell.

The doors open and he finds himself in the middle of a green golf course. In the distance is a clubhouse and standing in front of it are all his friends and other politicians who had worked with him.

Everyone is very happy and in evening dress. They run to greet him, shake his hand, and reminisce about the good times they had while getting rich at the expense of the poor. They play a friendly game of golf and then dine on lobster, caviar and the finest champagne.

Also present is the devil, who really is a very friendly guy, having a good time dancing and telling jokes.

They are all having such a good time that before the Senator realizes it, it is time to go.

Everyone gives him a hearty farewell and waves while the elevator rises.

The elevator goes up, up, up and the door reopens in heaven where St. Peter is waiting for him, "Now it's time to visit heaven."

So, 24 hours pass with the Senator joining a group of contented souls moving from cloud to cloud, playing the harp and singing. They have a good time and, before he realizes it, the 24 hours have gone by and St. Peter returns.

"Well, then, you've spent a day in hell and another in heaven. Now choose your eternity."

The Senator reflects for a minute, then he answers: "Well, I would never have said it before, I mean heaven has been delightful, but I think I would be better off in hell." So St. Peter escorts him to the elevator and he goes down, down, down to hell...

Now the doors of the elevator open and he's in the middle of a barren land covered with waste and garbage. He sees all his friends, dressed in rags, picking up the trash and putting it in black bags as more trash falls from above. The devil comes over to him and puts his arm around his shoulders.

"I don't understand," stammers the Senator. "Yesterday I was here and there was a golf course and clubhouse, and we ate lobster and caviar, drank champagne, and danced and had a great time. Now there's just a wasteland full of garbage and my friends look miserable. What happened?"

The devil smiles at him and says, "Yesterday we were campaigning. Today, you voted."

Vote wisely!

20101009-02	08:25	SteveB	Re: "White America Has Lost Its Mind"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---------------------------------------

Dear Dennis,

You knew I'd love it and I did. Thanks.

20101010-01	08:59	SteveB	"Note to Tea Partiers: They Lied—You Don't Live in a Rich Country"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

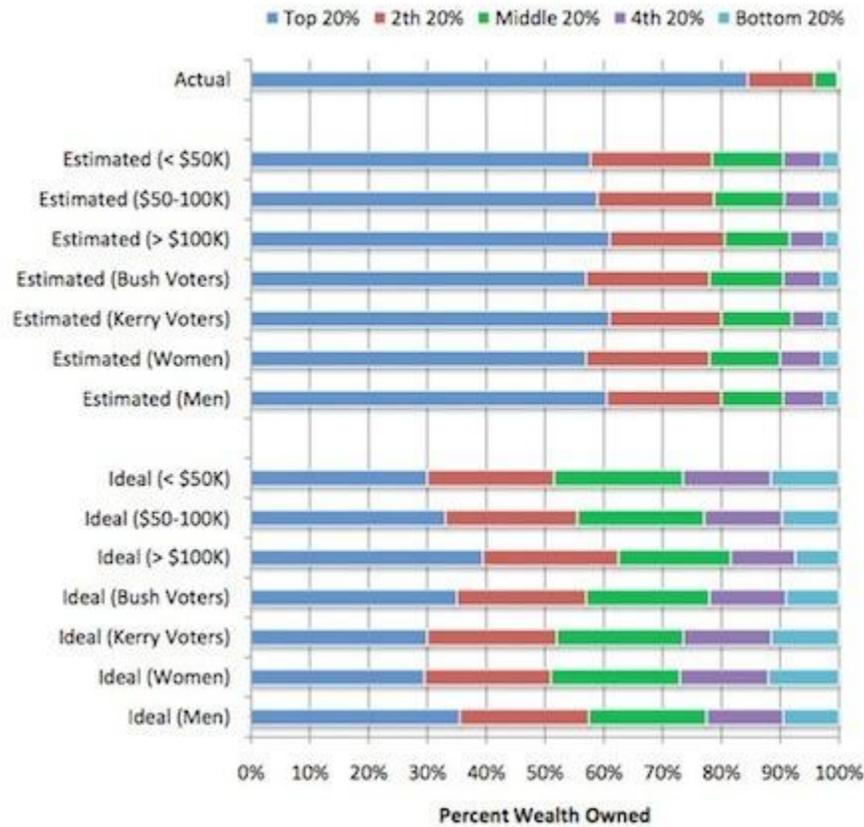

Read this and tell me if you still think America has a viable middle class. Or is it all—including all of us—owned by the rich?

"Note to Tea Partiers: They Lied—You Don't Live in a Rich Country" by Steven D. Booman Tribune

Oct. 7, 2010, (<http://blogs.alternet.org/speakeasy/2010/10/07/note-to-tea-partiers-they-lied-you-dont-live-in-a-rich-country/>)

We have the greatest income inequality in our nation's history, but for some strange reason people are incredibly misinformed about who has the most stuff. Take a look at this chart from "a paper called "Building a Better America One Wealth Quintile at a Time" by Dan Ariely and Michael I. Norton.

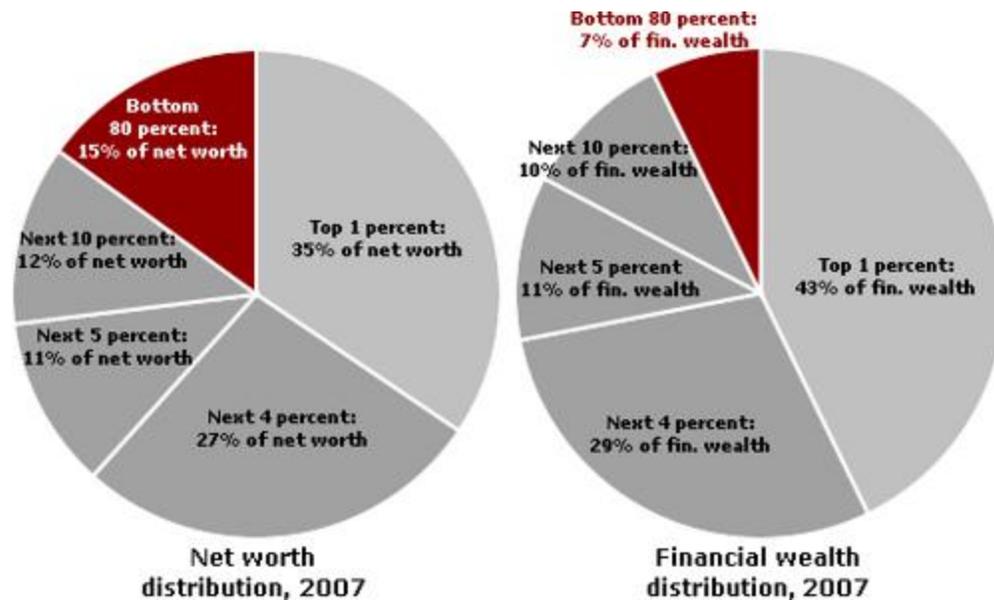

Real vs. Imagined Wealth Distribution in the U.S.

Source: Michael Norton and Dan Ariely. "Building A Better America—One Wealth Quintile At A Time."

As you can see, most people, regardless of political ideology or party affiliation or income level, are under the impression that there is a vast middle class (60% of the people) that owns roughly 40% or so of the wealth in America, with the wealthiest 20% owning slightly less than 60%. The truth? The richest 20 percent, represented by that blue line, has about 85 percent of the wealth. The next richest 20 percent, represented by that red line, has about 10 percent of the wealth. And the remaining three-fifths of America shares a tiny sliver of the country's wealth.

Yet even that doesn't tell the whole story. Because the highest 1% of income earners in America (income, not total assets) received 75% of the income gains from 2002 to 2006. Everybody else, 99% of Americans, received the remaining 25%. Now look at these pie charts on net wealth from Wealth, Income, and Power by G. William Domhoff, a professor of sociology at the University of California at Santa Cruz:

As you can see, as of 2007, the top 1% had 35% of the Net Worth and 43% of the Financial Wealth in America. The top 10% had 73% of the Net Worth, and a whopping 83% of the Financial Wealth. The bottom 90% had 27% of the net worth (most of it tied up in their home equity) and only 17% of the Financial Wealth.

Of course, those figures don't include the results of the Great Recession that began Dec., 2007, with the collapse of the housing market in which the lower 90% of Americans suffered the greatest loss of wealth and income and jobs.

So why the misconception by the majority of Americans that the people in the bottom 90% of income and wealth (however you measure that) have a much larger share of our "Ownership Society" than they actually do? I think one has to look squarely at the major news media, many of whom fit within the wealthiest 10% of Americans. They simply don't get out of their encapsulated havens to report on the real, in your face effects of the economic policies of the four presidents who preceded Obama, three of whom were Republicans.

It's telling that until very recently, major media figures simply didn't go out in the field and report on the devastation wrought by this economy on the lower 90% of individuals and families who don't share the same level of income, wealth, fame and status as our media mouthpieces:

In the green room before taping Real Time with Bill Maher on Friday, I [Arianna Huffington] had an unexpected conversation with my fellow panelist Joe Klein. He'd just finished a cross-country road trip, getting an up-close look at lives that "have been ripped up by the economic devastation of recent years." He embarked on the trip, he wrote, because "I really don't trust the things I've been seeing on TV and reading in the papers." The trip had been an eye-opener. "The people I met never talked about the things the Washington press does," he told me. The disconnect between the focus of his fellow reporters and the focus of the people he met on his travels was "transformational." "My sense of what's important has changed in a big way," he said. [...] In the final post of his trek, Klein came to this conclusion: "One thing I realized on this trip was how much time I spend immersed in the media back home—reading newspapers and blogs and books, watching TV—and how little time I spend immersed in other people."

In truth, this isn't particularly shocking to those of us who follow the mainstream media, whether the newspapers, television news or major blogs like Politico. We know they have been living in their own cloud cuckoo land for some time now.

And when you toss in Fox News, a news organization in name only, which every day literally creates its own false reality through propaganda, hate speech and lies of commission and omission in order to divide and polarize our nation and promote conservative and Republican policies that favor the Super Rich and Mega-Corporations at the expense of everyone else, it should come as no shock to anyone that most Americans have no clue how much they have lost in terms of wealth and income over the last three decades.

Which is one reason we as a nation have arrived at the sorry state of affairs we find ourselves in, both politically and economically. We have been misled by fools and propagandists posing as honest objective journalists and reporters for too long. And the misinformation and outright lies in many cases to which they have been an active party, have allowed the Wealthy and Big Corporations to corrupt our politics and impose a regimes that is driven us to the brink of collapse, all while they lined their pockets from the public purse and from the inaction of government to oversee their activities and prevent their financial shenanigans (and in many cases outright fraud).

That the Democratic Party was for too long complicit in this exercise, trolling for the same lobbyist cash that has always fueled the Republicans, is a failure of epic proportions, for it took decades to set the table from which the rich now feast while the rest of us beg for scraps from their table.

Much of the failure of Obama to meet the progressive expectations is a result of a political climate and an institutional structure skewed to benefit those who can "pay to play." To a large extent, the fact that Obama has accomplished as much as he has is a minor miracle, but 2 years is not enough time to reverse the appallingly unjust and divisive course that Ronald Reagan first set this nation upon 30 years ago, aided and abetted by a "liberal media" too afraid to challenge his "Morning in America" fantasy, to expose his many lies about the role of government and to confront his use of race and class to achieve his ends.

What Reagan began, every other President, to some degree or another has continued. Yes, Clinton raised taxes and balanced the budget, but he also signed into law with the support of the Republicans NAFTA, the Telecommunications Act and the final dismantling of the critical financial reforms put into place by FDR. That these were the culmination of a dream longed for years by Wall Street and the other major industries was not the result of bad luck or random chance. It was accomplished by design.

In 1932, FDR took advantage of a new information technology, radio, to reach the broad masses of Americans and speak over the heads of the Wall Street Titans and Big Business interests who opposed him. It is our challenge today, to use the new information technologies of our time, to speak over the heads of all those who oppose economic fairness and justice in America today. Until we accomplish that goal and get politicians truly committed to a progressive program of economic and government reform, our fellow citizens will remain in their current condition of enforced ignorance, and their lives and ours will remain subject to the whims of those who have the money, or as FDR rightly labeled them "Economic Royalists" and "The Money Power."

20101010-02 10:06 SteveB "China Emerges as Scapegoat in Campaign Ads"

Politicians finally admit the jobs are gone, accept no responsibility...

"China Emerges as Scapegoat in Campaign Ads" by David W. Chen, The New York Times

Oct. 10, 2010, (<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/10/10/us/politics/10outsource.html?pagewanted=all>)

(Candidates try to blame opponents for sending jobs overseas.)

With many Americans seized by anxiety about the country's economic decline, candidates from both political parties have suddenly found a new villain to run against: China.

From the marquee battle between Senator Barbara Boxer and Carly Fiorina in California to the House contests in rural New York, Democrats and Republicans are blaming one another for allowing the export of jobs to its economic rival. In the past week or so, at least 29 candidates have unveiled advertisements suggesting that their opponents have been too sympathetic to China and, as a result, Americans have suffered.

The ads are striking not only in their volume but also in their pointed language. One ad for an Ohio congressman, Zack Space, accuses his Republican opponent, Bob Gibbs, of supporting free-trade policies that sent Ohioans' jobs to China. As a giant dragon appears on the screen, the narrator sarcastically thanks the Republican: "As they say in China, xie xie Mr. Gibbs!"

In an ad featuring Chinese music and a photo of Chairman Mao, Spike Maynard, a Republican challenger in West Virginia, charges that Representative Nick Rahall supported a bill creating wind-turbine jobs in China.

And on Wednesday, Senator Harry Reid, the majority leader, began showing an ad that wove pictures of Chinese factory workers with criticism that Republican Sharron Angle was "a foreign worker's best friend" for supporting corporate tax breaks that led to outsourcing to China and India.

The barrage of ads, expected to total in the tens of millions of dollars, is occurring as politicians are struggling to address voters' most pressing and stubborn concern: the lack of jobs.

"China is a really easy scapegoat," said Erika Franklin Fowler, a political science professor at Wesleyan University who is director of the Wesleyan Media Project, which tracks political advertising.

Polls show that not only are Americans increasingly worried that the United States will have a lesser role in the years ahead; they are more and more convinced that China will dominate. In a Pew poll conducted in April, 41 percent of Americans said China was the world's leading economic power, slightly more than those who named the United States. [Note: the U.S. is still #1, temporarily.]

The attacks are occurring as trade tensions continue and the United States is pressuring the Chinese government to allow its currency to rise in value, a central topic under discussion at the International Monetary Fund meeting in Washington this weekend.

The ads are so vivid and pervasive that some worry they will increase hostility toward the Chinese and complicate the already fraught relationship between the two countries.

Robert A. Kapp, a former president of the U.S.-China Business Council, said that even though tensions had flared in the past, he had never seen China used as such an obvious punching bag for American politicians.

"To bring one country into the crosshairs in so many districts, at such a late stage of the campaign, represents something new and a calculated gamble," he said. "I find it deplorable. I find it demeaning."

Not all of the ads are solely about China; a few mention India or Mexico. A recent ad from Mrs. Boxer accuses Ms. Fiorina, a former chief executive at Hewlett-Packard, of outsourcing thousands of jobs to "Shanghai instead of San Jose, Bangalore instead of Burbank," and of "proudly stamping her products 'Made in China.'"

It is no accident that Democrats, in particular, have been eying China as a line of attack. This spring, national Democrats, including the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, began to encourage candidates to highlight the issue after reviewing internal polling that suggested voters strongly favored eliminating tax breaks for companies that do business in China. The party first began emphasizing the issue in a special election for a Pennsylvania House seat in May, said Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Never mind that there is hardly any consensus as to what exactly constitutes outsourcing and how many of the new overseas jobs would have stayed in American hands. The Democrats cite studies this year from the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal research organization, that assert three million jobs have been outsourced to China since 2001 because of the growing trade imbalance.

But Republicans, backed by some academics, say the number is much smaller. Indeed, Scott Kennedy, director of the Research Center for Chinese Politics and Business at Indiana University, said that most of the jobs China had added in manufacturing through foreign investment had come from Taiwan, Hong Kong and South Korea, not from the United States.

Still, some Republicans clearly see the issue as potent, and they are counterattacking with ads stating that the Obama administration's stimulus package helped to create $2 billion in wind-turbine technology jobs in China, a claim the Treasury Department and the American Wind Energy Association say is dubious. Representative John A. Boehner, the House minority leader, in a speech Friday in Ohio, blamed President Obama and Ms. Pelosi for a "stimulus that shipped jobs overseas to China instead of creating jobs here at home."

Evan B. Tracey, president of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, which tracks political advertising, said that "China has sort of become a straw-man villain in this election" in a way that elicits comparisons to the sentiments toward Japan in the 1980s over car manufacturing and Mexico in the 1990s over the North American Free Trade Agreement.

While China's growth has slowed a bit recently, its economy is still projected to surge by about 10 percent this year, continuing a remarkable three-decade streak of double-digit expansion.

"In a lot of ways it's a code word: 'Let's be mad at China, because then the voters will connect the dots and say our manufacturing plants have been shut down because of China, and all the unfair labor practices, and throw on the fact that we're basically selling all our debt to China,'" Mr. Tracey said.

Even as the ads play up Americans' unease with the threat posed by modern China, they often employ outdated and almost cliché depictions.

In a new spot for Representative Joe Sestak, who is running for the Senate in Pennsylvania, a gong clangs as a narrator says of his Republican rival, Pat Toomey: "He's fighting for jobs—in China."

An ad for Ryan Frazier, a Republican running for Congress in western Colorado, shows Forbidden City-style doors opening to reveal China on a world map, as the voiceover criticizes the Democratic incumbent, Ed Perlmutter, for supporting cap-and-trade legislation, which some Coloradans believe will drive more manufacturing jobs overseas.

Consultants from both parties are monitoring polling and voter reaction to gauge the effectiveness of the ads and to determine how long to continue showing them. Based on the back-and-forth between candidates on the campaign trail, the issue does not appear to be going away anytime soon.

At a Senate debate in Connecticut on Monday night between the Democrat Richard Blumenthal and the Republican Linda E. McMahon, Mr. Blumenthal repeatedly tried to raise concerns about the business practices of World Wrestling Entertainment, the company in which Ms. McMahon served as chief executive.

A tense moment occurred when Mr. Blumenthal asked: Why does Ms. McMahon's company manufacture its popular action figure toys in China, rather than here at home? She said it was not her decision, but that of the toy company, and moved on.

20101011-01	08:11	SteveB	"Animals Said to Have Spiritual Experiences"
-------------	-------	--------	--

"Animals Said to Have Spiritual Experiences" by Jennifer Viegas, Curiosity.com/Discovery Channel

Oct. 8, 2010, (<http://news.discovery.com/animals/animals-spiritual-brain.html>)

Animals (not just people) likely have spiritual experiences, according to a prominent neurologist who has analyzed the processes of spiritual sensation for over three decades.

Research suggests that spiritual experiences originate deep within primitive areas of the human brain — areas shared by other animals with brain structures like our own.

The trick, of course, lies in proving animals' experiences.

"Since only humans are capable of language that can communicate the richness of spiritual experience, it is unlikely we will ever know with certainty what an animal subjectively experiences," Kevin Nelson, a professor of neurology at the University of Kentucky, told Discovery News.

"Despite this limitation, it is still reasonable to conclude that since the most primitive areas of our brain happen to be the spiritual, then we can expect that animals are also capable of spiritual experiences," added Nelson, author of the book The Spiritual Doorway in the Brain, which will be published in January 2011.

The finding is an extension of his research on humans, which has been published in many peer-reviewed journals. A Neurology journal study, for example, determined that out-of-body experiences in humans are likely caused by the brain's arousal system, which regulates different states of consciousness.

"In humans, we know that if we disrupt the (brain) region where vision, sense of motion, orientation in the Earth's gravitational field, and knowing the position of our body all come together, then out-of-body experiences can be caused literally by the flip of a switch," he said. "There is absolutely no reason to believe it is any different for a dog, cat, or primate's brain."

Other mammals also probably have near-death experiences comparable to those reported by certain humans, he believes. Such people often say they saw a light and felt as though they were moving down a tunnel.

The tunnel phenomenon "is caused by the eye's susceptibility to the low blood flow that occurs with fainting or cardiac arrest," he said. "As blood flow diminishes, vision fails peripherally first. There is no reason to believe that other animals are any different from us."

Nelson added, "What they make of the tunnel is another matter."

The light aspect of near-death experiences can be explained by how the visual system defines REM (rapid eye movement) consciousness, he believes.

"In fact," he said, "the link between REM and the physiological crises causing near-death experience are most strongly linked in animals, like cats and rats, which we can study in the laboratory."

Mystical experiences — moments that inspire a sense of mystery and wonderment — arise within the limbic system, he said. When specific parts of this system are removed from animal brains, mind-altering drugs like LSD have no effect.

Since other animals, such as non-human primates, horses, cats and dogs, also possess similar brain structures, it is possible that they too experience mystical moments, and may even have a sense of spiritual oneness, according to Nelson.

Marc Bekoff, a professor emeritus of ecology and evolutionary biology at the University of Colorado, Boulder, also believes animals have spiritual experiences, which he defines as experiences that are nonmaterial, intangible, introspective and comparable to what humans have.

Both he and primatologist Jane Goodall have observed chimpanzees dancing with total abandon at waterfalls that emerge after heavy rains. Some of the chimps even appear to dance themselves into a trance-like state, as some humans do during religious and cultural rituals.

Goodall wondered, "Is it not possible that these (chimpanzee) performances are stimulated by feelings akin to wonder and awe? After a waterfall display the performer may sit on a rock, his eyes following the falling water. What is it, this water?"

"Perhaps numerous animals engage in these rituals, but we haven't been lucky enough to see them," Bekoff wrote in a Psychology Today report.

"For now, let's keep the door open to the idea that animals can be spiritual beings and let's consider the evidence for such a claim," he added.

"Meager as it is, available evidence says, 'Yes, animals can have spiritual experiences,' and we need to conduct further research and engage in interdisciplinary discussions before we say that animals cannot and do not experience spirituality."

20101011-02 12:32 Pam Responses

Dear SteveB,

You have posted quite a few very interesting articles recently, and I keep thinking of things to say about all of them. I guess I'll start with the most recent first, the one about animals' spirituality. It is fascinating to think that animals have "supernatural" experiences, but not surprising when you think about it. If it's our primitive, limbic brain that generates "hallucinations", then it stands to reason that animals would have them too. One more reason to go vegetarian, perhaps.

My mother told me once about a near-death experience she had. It was classic. She felt she was floating up near the ceiling, watching as the doctors and nurses tried to pull her back from a heart attack. Obviously, they succeeded, but she said she felt no fear or sadness at all. I read an article once by Lewis Thomas where he says he believes (based on research) that when animals (including us) are about to die, they stop feeling pain. The body recognizes that there is no longer any use in struggling to survive, so it basically quits. He said you can see this when a cat has a live mouse in its jaws. The mouse will be alive but just hanging limp. I've always wondered if nature hasn't figured out a way to ease our passing: by making the real seem unreal—and vice versa.

This helps explain religion too, as the limbic brain seems to be where religion originates. I was born without that piece of my brain, but I can see now why so many people swear that their beliefs are true: they actually have had "experiences" that have convinced them. I am currently reading two terrific books that actually sort of speak to each other, though I didn't plan it that way. One is a biography of Montaigne called How to Live. I've never read Montaigne, just know the name, so I am learning a ton of 16th c. history, as well as a lot about Montaigne, whom I like a lot. He had such a sensible, moderate philosophy of life. I find myself agreeing with so much of what he says about living the good life—except he didn't put much store in love or relationships. He had one true friend that he did love, but he died young. I don't think Montaigne ever really loved anyone else, not even his wife and mother, who were both rather bossy. He believed in a kind of Stoic detachment that I've never been able to cultivate, but I can see its appeal. He lived through a French civil war (Protestants vs. Catholics) where absolutely dreadful things happened, and he was able to put it all in perspective without becoming a fanatic himself. He says a lot that speaks to our own age.

The other book I've just started, but so far so good. It's The Moral Landscape: How Science Can Determine Human Values by Sam Harris. Harris is a fervent atheist (as am I). I've read his other books: Letter to a Christian Nation and The End of Religion. (I think that's the name of it.) I look forward to his explanation of how morals are universal, like chemistry or physics, and how science can lead the way toward discovering empirically what they are (i.e., should be). It's like health. We know what health is, and we know disease. So too there is "well being" and its opposite. Moral behavior contributes to wellbeing for all. I can see how this could all get very complicated, but I'm eager to find out what Harris has to say. He was on "The Daily Show" with Jon Stewart the other night. He's very smart. He's a neuroscientist and studies the brain, and his effort is to connect the matter of the brain to the mind that we have assumed is separate ever since Descartes, who incidentally despised Montaigne. I love thinking about all this stuff, and I love it when I discover new ideas and perspectives that fill out my own thinking. Like Montaigne, I want to keep an open mind so new stuff can get in, and I also want to have good judgment.

I was energized by the articles you sent on economic issues. It's good to see some actual facts and figures. More than ever, I am convinced that there must be some deep drive in our culture toward wealth and power. I would say "conspiracy" but I don't know that it's conscious. Maybe like religion, it comes from some primitive part of the brain. I heard George Soros on NPR the other day. Boy, did he make sense! He said we need to run a deficit until we get a handle on unemployment, then we can work on lowering the deficit. We can't do both at once. If the private sector won't generate jobs, which it's not, then the govt. must do it, at least in the near term. Asked if he thought there was a chance this would be put into practice, he said "no." The politics of the day mean we'll keep muddling along, prolonging the recovery—and the misery. I am astounded by people's selfishness. (That said, I don't give much to charity at all. But then, if we had a sensible govt., charity would be unnecessary.) If we all paid just a bit more tax, we could do so much, but people are so determined to hold onto their measly 2% or whatever. And why do the rich squawk so much? It's not like they'd even notice a few million less. Even David Stockman has recanted on "trickle-down economics." We have seen people brainwashed by communist ideology cling to their political beliefs, despite ample evidence that their system is pernicious. We are no different with our hysterical belief in "free market" capitalism. Another term for "free market" is "laissez faire", and that was proved unsavory in the 19th c.

You are fortunate to have your group that discusses these matters. I still don't want to be part of it though. I feel I know you (sort of), and I'm much more interested in "talking" with an individual than blogging to a bunch of strangers. I have such mixed feelings. The other day I discovered a blog by a young woman who I helped get a Fulbright a number of years ago. We are FB friends, and there was a link to her blog in one of her postings, so I went to it. She is a fascinating person, an artist, a poet, and a marvelous prose writer. She is highly intelligent and also EXTREMELY religious. She has been all over the world, teaching and living in religious communes and I don't know what all. Currently she is attending the Bethel School of Supernatural Ministry in Calif. She and her "peeps" go out into the community and do hands-on "healing" with winos and street people. I simply cannot put the two together—her intelligence/talent and her religiosity. Her parents were missionaries, but still... I don't want to get into a "conversation" with her because we have nothing to say to each other, really. But I did enjoy her blog. She has written a bunch of lovely little essays about this and that. It made me want to write too—just not to strangers.

Also, I saw something about your Bolivian president playing a soccer game recently. There was a video of him, and at one point he gratuitously kicked an opposing player, who was just standing there, and knocked him down. They weren't even in play at the time. He just up and kicked him. Jon Stewart had him on a while back, and he showed a tape of that interview. I was reminded of all this when I read the postings by your niece about Bolivian politics. It is a mystery why societies persist in behaviors that cause such pain and suffering or inefficiency—and they all do to some degree. Maybe Sam Harris's book will help explain that.

20101012-01 07:26 SteveB "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"

Hey, I've got a great idea (thanks to your Republican candidates)!

It has been proven that lower taxes for the rich produces a thriving economy and more jobs than you can shake a stick at, Right? Surely, it is the incredibly low tax rates on the rich (since Reagan, even lower since Bush) which have produced the current economic miracle—low unemployment, balanced budget, etc. Though I'll admit that free trade, deregulation, and unbridled illegal immigration might have helped a little. This philosophy has produced this "Golden Age of America" in which we now enjoy peace, tranquility, and prosperity for all.

So...instead of slightly increasing the tax paid by the rich and super rich, let's cut Social Security paid to the poorest Americans, by freezing the COLA despite inflation! Surely that will permit the big moneyed rich suckers to keep this incredible economic boom going well into the future. Let's also use this money to fight wars and reduce the deficit! Let's ignore the lessons we should have learned from the past 50 years or so. Our children and grandchildren are so lucky!

"Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze" by Matt Sedensky, AP

Oct 11, 2010, (http://www.cnn.com/id/39626572/Senior_Citizens_Brace_for_Social_Security_Freeze)

(BOCA RATON Fla.) Seniors prepared to cut back on everything from food to charitable donations to whiskey as word spread Monday that they will have to wait until at least 2012 to see their Social Security checks increase.

The government is expected to announce this week that more than 58 million Social Security recipients will go through a second straight year without an increase in monthly benefits. This year was the first without an increase since automatic adjustments for inflation started in 1975.

"I think it's disgusting," said Paul McNeil, 69, a retired state worker from Warwick, R.I., who said his food and utility costs have gone up, but his income has not. He lamented decisions by lawmakers that he said do not favor seniors.

"They've got this idea that they've got to save money and basically they want to take it out of the people that will give them the least resistance," he said.

Cost-of-living adjustments are automatically set by a measure adopted by Congress in the 1970s that orders raises based on the Consumer Price Index, which measures inflation. If inflation is negative, as in 2009 and 2010, payments remain unchanged.

Still, seniors like McNeil said they'll be thinking about the issue when they go to vote, and experts said the news comes at a bad time for Democrats already facing potentially big losses in November. Seniors are the most loyal of voters, and their support is especially important during midterm elections, when turnout is generally lower.

"If you're the ruling party, this is not the sort of thing you want to have happening two weeks before an election," said Andrew Biggs, a former deputy commissioner at the Social Security Administration and now a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

At St. Andrews Estates North, a Boca Raton retirement community, seniors largely took the news in stride, saying they don't blame Washington for the lack of an increase. Most are also collecting pensions or other income, but even so, they prepared to tighten their belts.

Bette Baldwin won't be able to travel or help her children as much. Dorcas Eppright will give less to charity. Jack Dawson will buy cheap whiskey instead of his beloved Canadian Club.

"For people who have worked their whole life and tried to scrimp and save and try to provide for themselves," said Baldwin, a 63-year-old retired teacher, "it's difficult to see that support system might not sustain you."

Baldwin and her husband mapped out their retirements, carefully calculating their income based on their pensions and Social Security checks. Trouble is, they expected an annual cost-of-living increase. "When we cut back, we're cutting back on niceties," Baldwin said. "But there are other people that don't have anything to cut back on. They're cutting back on food and shelter."

Many at St. Andrews said the cost-of-living decision won't affect who they vote for next month. But seniors tied the Social Security issue to what they see as a larger societal problem with debt, entitlements and hopefulness for the future.

"I'm kind of glad in a way," Stella Wehrly, an 86-year-old retired secretary, said of the freeze. "One thing depends on the other and when people aren't working there's not enough people feeding into the Social Security system."

Wehrly and her husband, Hank, said curtailing government spending is necessary to maintain the Social Security system.

"We have a generation now that we're not going to leave a very good legacy for," she said. Jack Dawson, 77, said the freeze is the right move considering the state of the government and the American economy.

"Who would be surprised what's happened?" he asked. "I feel this is the right decision in light of the malaise."

More than 58.7 million people rely on Social Security checks that average $1,072 monthly. It was the primary source of income for 64 percent of retirees who got benefits in 2008; one-third relied on Social Security for at least 90 percent of their income.

At the Phoenix Knits yarn shop in Phoenix, 73-year-old owner Pat McCartney said she already worries about paying for utilities, groceries and gas. Not having the increase makes her worry even more.

"If I have any major expense, I don't know what I'll do," McCartney said while helping customers with their knitting. "I live on Social Security."

In Kansas City, Mo., Georgia Hollman, 80, said Social Security is her sole source of income. She would have liked a bigger check, but said she's grateful for what she gets.

"There isn't nothing I can do about it but live with it," she said. "Whatever they give us is what we have to take. I'm thankful we get that little bit."

Advocates for seniors argue the Consumer Price Index doesn't adequately weigh the costs that most affect older adults, particularly medical care and housing.

"The existing COLA formula does not account for the economic reality of the true costs that most seniors faced," said Fernando Torres-Gil, director of UCLA's Center for Policy Research on Aging and the first person appointed to the governmental post of assistant secretary for aging, during the Clinton administration.

Still, Torres-Gil said the political reality is different, and many feel seniors are lucky to have their checks determined by the CPI, instead of some new formula that might make it even harder to secure a raise. "We may just be lucky to keep the current index," he said.

20101012-02 07:40 GaryC Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
--

Dear SteveB,

Did you actually read this article before you sent it out? [Sorry, I don't understand why the question is being asked. — SteveB]

I am well aware of what is happening since we take care of two seniors. However, you can't be serious in blaming Republicans. And, did you see what seniors had to say about the lack of increase—cheaper booze, won't be able to help kids, less trips. Not exactly forcing them to eat trash etc. [Did you actually read the article? —SteveB] And, do you know what the increase was in 2009? I am sure no one was complaining then when the increase was in the double digits. [Totally false. —SteveB] And, I am sure most people forget the reason for Social Security in the first place was not to maintain a high standard of living but to provide minimum necessities for the elderly. [How could anyone forget that on the amount paid? Could you live on, say, $1000/month? It's insurance! Paid for by the people! —SteveB] If you would look at what most of these retirees have received in SS versus what they paid in they are way ahead of the game. [Totally unproven and false. —SteveB] This is a classic Ponzi scheme adopted by the Congress to get votes and now the pigeons are coming home to roost. Too many retirees, benefits too high and not enough workers to feed the machine. But neither party has the balls to fix the problem even though the signs have been around for years. COLA is the smallest of concerns about this issue.

[Did you actually read this article before you replied? —SteveB]

[See: <http://livingstingy.blogspot.com/2011/07/do-you-pay-more-into-social-security.html> and <http://www.nationalreview.com/corner/256212/medicare-and-social-security-what-you-pay-vs-what-you-will-get-maybe-veronique-de-rugy>. —SteveB]

20101012-03	09:55	SteveB	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze" & "Top 10 Facts About Social Security"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear GaryC,

Why would you ask if I read the article? Why would I not? What's the reason for your accusation? My point is simply about the injustice of the zero COLA despite inflation.

1. Social Security is a program that needs to be fixed. But it works. It should get a little credit for that. It's not going away any time soon.
2. In 2010 [Corrected from "2009." —SteveB], ditto, there was no COLA increase either—2 years in a row. Not so for Wall Street.
3. It's not that I, or maybe even the article, mind the Social Security "decrease" that much. It's that there is no balance between the rich and a middle class...to America's detriment.
4. Social security does redistribute some wealth and help maintain a middle class among people who need it most:

from "Top 10 Facts About Social Security" by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities

Aug. 13, 2010, (<http://www.cbpp.org/cms/index.cfm?fa=view&id=3261>)

Fact #6: Almost half of the elderly would be poor without Social Security. Social Security lifts 13 million elderly Americans out of poverty.

Without Social Security benefits, almost half of Americans aged 65 and older would have incomes below the poverty line, all else being equal. With Social Security benefits, only one-tenth of the elderly do. (See figure.) The program lifts 13 million elderly Americans out of poverty.

Almost 90 percent of people aged 65 or older receive some of their family income from Social Security. Those not receiving Social Security mostly comprise recent immigrants, state and local government retirees (and federal retirees hired before 1984) who are covered by separate retirement systems, people under age 66 with significant earnings, and people who are so seriously disabled that they never worked and also have never married.

20101012-04	10:04	GaryC	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

Dear SteveB,

I think you are wrong on this one. I believe 2011 will be the second year in a row without a cola but I think 2009 was about 19%.

[19%. Maybe for the uber-rich. The actual facts: I meant 2010. 2009 COLA was 5.8% (thanks to Bush), 2010 = 0%, 2011 = 0%. 2012 will be 3.6%. Where's the 19%? —SteveB]

You always seem to beat on the rich. Don't the poor have some responsibility for their plight? When I was poor, I did something about it. I worked multiple sh*t jobs and got an education. No scholarships, no food stamps, no unemployment checks, no free lunch.

I really feel for the poor but part of what makes America great is that a poor person like me can make it big in the U.S.

You seem to pick on big corporations as being evil. In my opinion, corporations have no feelings or intent. The PEOPLE who run them can be greedy and mean spirited. The same is true for big government, big unions and big education.

I choose to believe that I can redistribute my wealth better and more effectively than some bureaucrat can. History has shown that you cannot soak the rich to create equality. You must lift up the poor.

20101012-05	11:03	GaryC	"Revolt of the Accountants"
-------------	-------	-------	-----------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Interesting article. This is what I fear might be happening in the U.S. Envy! If the U.S. loses its natural and national character, then we will dissolve into a 3rd world country very rapidly.

"Revolt of the Accountants" by Peggy Noonan, WSJ.com

Oct. 8, 2010, (<http://www.politicalnewsnow.com/2010/10/08/peggy-noonan-revolt-of-the-accountants-wsj-com-3/>)

(Washington is turning America into Paperwork Nation.)

If you write a column, you get a lot of email. Sometimes, especially in a political season, it's possible to discern from it certain emerging themes—the comeback of old convictions, for instance, or the rise of new concerns. Let me tell you something I'm hearing, in different ways and different words. The coming rebellion in the voting booth is not only about the economic impact of spending, debt and deficits on America's future. It's also to some degree about the feared impact of all those things on the character of the American people. There is a real fear that government, with all its layers, its growth, its size, its imperviousness, is changing, or has changed, who we are. And that if we lose who we are, as Americans, we lose everything.

This is part of what's driving the sense of political urgency this year, especially within precincts of the tea party.

The most vivid illustration of the fear comes, actually, from another country, Greece, and is brilliantly limned by Michael Lewis in October's Vanity Fair. In "Beware of Greeks Bearing Bonds," he outlines Greece's economic catastrophe. It is a bankrupt nation, its debt, or rather the amount of debt that has so far been unearthed and revealed, coming to "more than a quarter-million dollars for every working Greek." Over decades the Greeks turned their government "into a piñata stuffed with fantastic sums" and gave "as many citizens as possible a whack at it." The average government job pays almost three times as much as the average private-sector job. The retirement age for "arduous" jobs, including hairdressers, radio announcers and musicians, is 55 for men and 50 for women. After that, a generous pension. The tax system has disintegrated. It is a welfare state with a cash economy.

Much of this is well known, though it is beautifully stated. But all of it, Mr. Lewis asserts, has badly damaged the Greek character. "It is simply assumed that anyone who is working for the government is meant to be bribed. Government officials are assumed to steal." Tax fraud is rampant. Everyone cheats. "It's become a cultural trait," a tax collector tells him.

Mr. Lewis: "The Greek state was not just corrupt but also corrupting. Once you saw how it worked you could understand a phenomenon which otherwise made no sense at all: the difficulty Greek people have saying a kind word about one another. Everyone is pretty sure everyone is cheating on his taxes, or bribing politicians, or taking bribes, or lying about the value of his real estate. And this total absence of faith in one another is self-reinforcing. The epidemic of lying and cheating and stealing makes any sort of civic life impossible.”

Thus can great nations, great cultures, disintegrate, break into little pieces that no longer cohere into a whole.

And what I get from my mail is a kind of soft echo of this. America is not Greece and knows it's not Greece, but there is a growing sense—I should say fear—that the weighty, mighty, imposing American government itself, whether it meant to or not, has for years been contributing to American behaviors that are neither culturally helpful nor, as we now all say, sustainable: a growing sense of entitlement, of dependency, of resentment and distrust, and an increasing suspicion that everyone else is gaming the system. “I got mine, you get yours.”

People, as we know, are imperfect. Governments, composed top to bottom of imperfect people wielding power, are very imperfect. There are of course a million examples, big and small, of how governments can damage the actual nature and character of the citizenry, and only because there was just a commercial on TV telling me to gamble will I mention the famous case of the state lotteries. Give government the right to reap revenues from the public desire to gamble, and you'll soon have government doing something your humble local bookie never had the temerity to try: convince the people that gambling is a moral good. They promote it insistently on local television, undermining any remaining reserve among our citizens not to play the numbers, not to develop what can become an addiction. Our state government daily promotes what for 2,000 years was understood to be a vice. No bookie ever committed a crime that big.

Government not only can change the national character, it can bizarrely channel national energy. And this is another theme in my mailbox, the rebellion against what government increasingly forces us to become: a nation of accountants.

No matter what level of life in which you operate, you are likely overwhelmed by forms, by a blizzard of regulations, rules, new laws. This is not new, it's just always getting worse. Priests are forced to be accountants now, and army officers, and dentists. The single most onerous part of Obamacare is the tax change whereby spending $600 on goods or services will require a 1099 form. Economists will tell you of the financial cost of this, but I would argue that Paperwork Nation is utterly at odds with the American character.

Because Americans weren't born to be accountants. It's not in our DNA! We're supposed to be building the Empire State Building. We were meant, to be romantic about it, and why not, to be a pioneer people, to push on, invent electricity, shoot the bear, bootleg the beer, write the novel, create, reform and modernize great industries. We weren't meant to be neat and tidy record keepers. We weren't meant to wear green eyeshades. We looked better in a coonskin cap!

There is I think a powerful rebellion against all this. It isn't a new rebellion—it was part of Goldwaterism, and Reaganism—but it's rising again.

For those who wonder why so many people have come to hate, or let me change it to profoundly dislike, “the elites,” especially the political elite, here is one reason: It is because they have armies of accountants to do this work for them. Those in power institute the regulations and rules, and then hire people to protect them from the burdens and demands of their legislation. There is no congressman passing tax law who doesn't have staffers in his office taking care of his own financial life and who will not, when he moves down the street into the lobbying firm, have an army of accountants to protect him there.

Washington is now to some degree the focus of the same sort of profound resentment that Hollywood liberals inspired when they really mattered, or seemed really powerful. For decades they made films that were not helpful to our culture or society, that were full of violence and sick imagery. But they often brought their own children up more or less protected from the effects of the culture they created. Private schools, nannies, therapists, tutors. They bought their way out of the cultural mayhem to which they'd contributed. Their children were fine. Yours were on their own.

This is part of why people dislike “the elites” and why “the elites,” especially in Washington, must in turn be responsive, come awake, start to notice. People don't like it when they fear you are subtly, day by day, year by year, changing the personality and character of their nation. They think, “You are ruining our country and insulating yourselves from the ruin. We hate you.” And this is understandable, yes?

20101012-06	15:26	Dennis	“Poor People”
-------------	-------	--------	---------------

Delusions of the Right repudiated...

"Poor People" by Joshua Holland, AlterNet

Oct. 10, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148454/>)

(AlterNet is proud to present this excerpt from senior writer Joshua Holland's new book, The Fifteen Biggest Lies about the Economy (And Everything Else the Right Doesn't Want You to Know about Taxes, Jobs, and Corporate America).)

Perhaps the most pernicious right-wing lie of late is that the Wall Street hustlers who came close to bringing the global economy to its knees in 2008 were just innocent victims of government-sponsored programs that forced them to lower lending standards in a misguided effort to increase home ownership among the poor (read: dark-skinned).

It's an alluring story line for those who are ideologically predisposed to blame "inner city" people instead of MBAs in suits roaming the executive suite. It's also patent nonsense—a Big Lie that has nonetheless become an object of almost religious belief for some on the Right.

Jeb Hensarling, a notably obtuse Republican back-bencher from Texas, wrote that "the conservative case is simple":

The [Community Reinvestment Act] compelled banks to relax their traditional underwriting practices in favor of more "flexible" criteria. These subjective standards were then applied to all borrowers, not just low-income individuals, leading to a surge in lower-quality loans. Blame should [also be] directed at Fannie [Mae] and Freddie [Mac], and their thirst for weaker underwriting to help meet their federally mandated "affordable housing" goals. This distortion has had seismic consequences as market participants, wrongly believing GSE-touched loans were sanctioned by the government and therefore safe, began to rely on a government mandate as a substitute for their own due diligence.

This tale has everything a conservative could want—Big Government overreach, well-intentioned but out-of-touch liberals causing devastating unanticipated consequences with their social tinkering, and even their favorite bogeyman, ACORN, and other low income housing advocates that have pushed for increased home-ownership among the poor.

The narrative gained steam with an influential op-ed in the Wall Street Journal by Peter Wallison, a fellow with the American Enterprise Institute (who, according to his bio, "had a significant role in the development of the Reagan administration's proposals for the deregulation of the financial services industry"). Wallison found that "Almost two-thirds of all the bad mortgages in our financial system, many of which are now defaulting at unprecedented rates, were bought by government agencies or required by government regulations."

The data shows that the principal buyers were insured banks, government sponsored enterprises (GSEs) such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, and the FHA—all government agencies or private companies forced to comply with government mandates about mortgage lending.

The sleight-of-hand here is pretty straightforward. The U.S. government regulates lenders and provides deposit insurance to banks, which means that a large chunk of all home loans—good, bad, and in between—have some connection to a government program. It's like saying that the government is responsible for pollution because the EPA regulates industrial emissions.

Yet no bank has ever been "forced to comply with government mandates about mortgage lending." There are no "government mandates," and there never were. In order to qualify for government-backed deposit insurance—a benefit that banks aren't forced to accept but enjoy having—the Community Reinvestment Act and similar measures designed to prevent discrimination in lending (to qualified individuals) only encourage banks to lend in all of the areas where they do business. And Section 802 (b) of the Act stresses that all loans must be "consistent with safe and sound operations"—it's the opposite of requiring that lenders write risky mortgages. There are no penalties for noncompliance with CRA guidelines. The only "stick" hanging over banks that fail to meet those standards is that their refusal might be taken into account by regulators when they want to open new branches or merge with other financial institutions. What's more, there are no defined standards for CRA compliance, and within the banking community, the loose guidelines are considered to be somewhat of a joke.

As Sheila Blair, the chairwoman of the FDIC, asked in a Dec., 2008 speech, "Where in the CRA does it say: make loans to people who can't afford to repay? Nowhere! And the fact is, the lending practices that are causing problems today were driven by a desire for market share and revenue growth, pure and simple."

Fannie and Freddie: Tempted by Easy Profits

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were created by an act of Congress, but they are (or were, until being taken over in the wake of the housing crash) private, for-profit entities whose dual mandate was to increase the availability of mortgages to moderate- and low-income families, and at the same time turn a profit for their shareholders. Fannie and Freddie did end up with a very large portfolio of subprime loans, with a high rate of default, but they didn't get into the market because the government mandated it. They dived in deep because there were profits to be made as the housing bubble expanded. As Mary Kane, a finance reporter for the Washington Independent, put it:

Neither the Community Reinvestment Act—the law most cited as the culprit—nor other affordable housing goals set by the government forced Fannie, Freddie or any other lender to make loans they didn't want to. The lure of the subprime market was high yields and healthy profit margins—it's as simple as that.

Contrary to the conservative spin, University of Michigan law professor Michael Barr told a congressional committee that although there was in fact quite a bit of irresponsible lending in low-income communities in the late 1990s and the early 2000s, "More than half of subprime loans were made by independent mortgage companies not subject to comprehensive federal supervision; another 30 percent of such originations were made by affiliates of banks or thrifts, which are not subject to routine examination or supervision, and the remaining 20 percent were made by banks and thrifts [subject to CRA standards]." Barr concluded, "The worst and most widespread abuses occurred in the institutions with the least federal oversight [italics added]."

That's not to say that millions of Americans didn't bite off more than they would eventually be able to chew in the housing market. A lot of people looking to turn a quick buck by capturing the booming value of real estate in the mid- to late 2000s bought property with "teaser" loans that offered very low rates for the first few years; the investors assumed that they'd be able to turn a tidy profit before higher interest rates kicked in. Many of those individuals have since found themselves "under water"—owing more on their homes (and investment properties) than they're worth. Yet it's worth noting that most of the experts also didn't identify the real estate bubble as a problem, even as home prices far surpassed values that could be reasonably explained by the laws of supply and demand. Irrational exuberance was the theme of the day. In 2006, David Learah, the former head of the National Association of Realtors, wrote a book titled Why the Real Estate Boom Will Not Bust—And How You Can Profit from It: How to Build Wealth in Today's Expanding Real Estate Market. The book made quite a splash at the time.

In 2010, former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan offered a bit of historical revisionism to a House committee investigating the causes of the financial crisis, telling lawmakers, "In 2002, I expressed concern that our extraordinary housing boom, financed by very large increases in mortgage debt, cannot continue indefinitely. I warned of the consequences of this situation in testimony before the Senate Banking Committee in 2004."

Writing in the Washington Post, Dana Milbank offered a corrective with some of the highlights of Greenspan's congressional testimony at the peak of the housing bubble. In 2005, Greenspan told lawmakers, "A bubble in home prices for the nation as a whole does not appear likely." He added, "Home price declines were they to occur, likely would not have substantial macroeconomic implications," and explained that "nationwide banking and widespread securitization of mortgages make it less likely that financial intermediation would be impaired."

In English, that last bit meant "Banks won't get into serious trouble even if things do go to hell," and we know how well that prediction turned out. If Greenspan could be so wrong and the smart people at the Washington Post and the New York Times couldn't see this huge, dangerously inflated housing bubble, how was your average couple trying to get a place to live or the small investor looking for a few bucks in rental income supposed to make a rational decision about how much debt to take on? That's not a defense of individuals who got in over their heads; it's simply an important bit of context.

The narrative that the real estate crash and the subsequent recession were the fault of borrowers, especially poor and middle-income borrowers—while members of the financial community were innocent victims—is not only revisionism of the worst kind, but it's an especially egregious lie.

The obvious sin of this claim is that it shifts responsibility for the mess away from those who created it, but what makes it even more disgraceful is that conservatives have long argued that efforts to increase home ownership among low-income families and communities of color was the "free market" thing to do (and have, to some degree, negated the need for a decent social safety net). It was George W. Bush, not Vladimir Lenin, who said in a 2002 speech, "We have a problem here in America, a homeownership gap," and said, "we've got to work together to close [the gap] for the good of our country." This was standard American Enterprise Institute—quality conservative fare.

Blaming individuals is easy—it's not hard to understand how people could borrow a bunch of cash they were later unable to pay back. The real cause of the housing crash is, of course, a far more complicated tale. And it's a story that ultimately represents the abject failure of conservative economic mythology.

(Joshua Holland is an editor and senior writer at AlterNet. He is the author of The 15 Biggest Lies About the Economy (and Everything else the Right Doesn't Want You to Know About Taxes, Jobs and Corporate America)).

© 2010 Independent Media Institute.

20101012-07 16:24 SteveB Re: "Revolt of the Accountants"

Dear GaryC,

This is good, but just the tip of the iceberg, I fear. Tax law needs reform and simplification. Many things need to be done. Without a government of honest, non-debt-owing politicians, none of it will get done in such a way as to benefit the country as a whole.

20101012-08 16:37 GaryC My Experience with Taxes

Dear SteveB,

You are so right about tax reform. You probably don't know this but after getting my law degree from Indiana, I moved to DC and worked for Coopers & Lybrand, one of the big 5 accounting firms in their national tax office. My responsibilities included attending House and Senate hearings on tax policy and advising Congressmen on tax legislation. Pretty scary and heady stuff for a 25 year old. While in DC, I attended Georgetown and got a Master of Laws in Taxation, a real specialized Doctorate in Law. I am proud to say I actually studied at Georgetown and was 1st in my class.

Let me tell you it is so ridiculous the way tax policy in the U.S. is determined. For the Republicans and Democrats it's all about special interest groups and buying votes. 90% of the congressional representatives were not interested one bit in the consequences of their actions other than how it would generate campaign dollars or votes. Most of the time when I explained provisions in the law, regulations or proposed legislation to them, they had the old "deer in the headlight" look. Tax policy should not be a province of congress but a separate independent body to look at fair taxation, easy accountability and elimination of fraud and cheats.

20101012-09 16:40 SteveB Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze" & "Wall Street to Break Pay Record in This Economy"

Dear GaryC,

I meant 2010. 2009 COLA was 5.8%, 2010 = 0%, 2011 = 0%. 2012 will be 3.6%.

I don't think rich Americans are carrying a proportional share of the load. All the numbers seem to bear this out.

"Wall Street to Break Pay Record in This Economy" posted by Heracles, VisaJourney

Oct. 12, 2010, (<http://www.visajourney.com/forums/topic/278185-wall-street-to-break-pay-record-in-this-economy/>)

I kind of agree with you about private enterprise...to a point. Big corporations should have making money as their #1 objective. That's what they are designed to do.

That's what they do well. They can deliver jobs and even things like healthcare and welfare well, or at least as well as the government can. But, human nature being what it is, the public (to whom the corporations owe their very existence) must curtail the baser instincts, and structure the costs and benefits of the system to benefit the greater good, which includes the businesses themselves. Otherwise, history has shown us that the corporations actually enrich very few.

One of the most important obligations of all citizens and corporate citizens is to support and fund a superior educational system. Most of this money goes to education very efficiently, because it is local. Yet we, as a society, don't seem to be willing to fully fund what was really the secret of your success (other than your hard work)—education! Yet this is the minimum that must be handed to the future in order to secure that future.

When an American corporation makes a good business decision to, say, ship all its jobs to China, this is not really helping America. It is not the businessman's fault. He is just doing what the system dictates, but it hurts the country. It hurts all of us. Therefore, costs and controls must be imposed to guide the business to a decision that is best, both for the company and the country. Many business taxes and incentives achieve these ends. They all need a little (at least) tweaking and simplifying, but it's the same general idea.

But rather than submit to paying their fair share, big business and rich people are able to buy politicians under the current campaign finance and laws. Pressure is exerted through unrestrained lobbyists. Then the bought-and-sold politicians manipulate the tax, incentive, and regulatory systems in favor of the rich who got them elected, but unfairly for the country as a whole. Trade with China could have kept more tariffs in place and moved more slowly. Maybe Chinese companies could have been forced to build factories in America, if they were going to force American companies to build factories in China, as I have seen first-hand.

At this same time the rich and powerful have been buying politicians, so have all the organized special interests. First the unions, but no longer, the rich have managed to curtail their power greatly. Now it's foreign countries like China, the medical profession, the bankers, the old people, the military, the illegal immigrants, the gays, anybody who can gather enough money to buy a politician and help him get elected. Debts must be paid, so laws are passed which benefit these groups, whether the money to spend actually exists or not. Therefore, under the present system, there can never be enough money.

We, the people, should be whom our politicians care about. All of us. As a nation. Rich or poor. Powerful or powerless. Not just the powerful, rich, and organized. The result of all this corruption: endless federal deficits, endless trade deficits, endless job deficits, endless decline. For the last 50 years, that's about all we've seen. Meanwhile, we, as a country, keep getting sold down the river by our elected officials. America's place in the world erodes. Influence erodes because of massive debt and obligation. Power loses its potency. The nation becomes poorer.

Yet you are also right, and the left is wrong, in thinking that the government can solve all our problems. Removing the corruption from government only gives us a level, democratic playing field. Then, maybe a clear-headed government can see that it must balance protecting and nourishing business with trying to make it serve the greater public good. If we must have growth, private enterprise should and must be the engine of wealth and job creation, but all that power must be controlled by law, just as surely as a man with a gun or a bomb.

Surely, as a society, we have paid attention to all of history since the Industrial Revolution began and learned these lessons? I hope and pray we have, but the Tea Party, the Republicans, the Democrats, and the news media are making me think we have not.

20101012-10	16:40	SteveB	More Lies: 'Housing Bubble Caused by the Poor'
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

More big lies...

HOUSING BUBBLE CAUSED BY THE POOR, NOT THE RICH! LOL!

20101012-11	16:57	GaryC	Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--

Dear SteveB,

There are lies, damn lies and statistics. In most cases you can find statistical data to support both sides of an argument.? Do you look at raw numbers or percentages?? What percentage of the U.S. income tax burden falls on those in the top 10% of income?? What percentages of people in the U.S. pay no income tax?? What percentage of people pay no income tax yet make lots of money in the underground economy?? What is fair?? What is the legal justification for wealth transfer??

If I make a $1,000,000 and pay 50% in taxes and spend the rest on cars, food, energy, entertainment and housing, don't those not fortunate enough to make this amount of money all benefit from my profligate spending and charitable giving?? If I want to give $10,000 to a local charity educating minority children shouldn't I get to make that choice with my ill gotten gains instead of the government making those decisions for me??

[No. If it is a necessity that people pay taxes. And it is. It is necessary that they be equal. For almost 100 years the standard has been not equal dollars, not an equal percentage, but that the last dollar paid to the government should result in an equal amount of pain. I know of no better standard or way of putting it. —SteveB]

Historically, when real tax rates on the rich approach 40%, the gross tax collections of a country actually diminish.? When the percentage of persons in a society not paying tax approaches 50%, the society starts to disintegrate because those not contributing want more of what those that are contributing have.? In the late 60's or early 70's England had a tax rate approaching 90+%.? The consequence of this soak the rich scheme is that the rich vamoosed.? The Beatles, soccer players, actors etc. all left England for better tax pastures.? Net collections in England went down.

[This is laughable. LOL. —SteveB]

Instead of taxing the rich, isn't the answer educating the poor and middle class to be able to compete better in our society and improve their lot in life?? Most Americans start their working life in the bottom 10—20% of the income range.? Over time, with more education and better experience, these low earning Americans move to higher and higher income brackets.? With socialism, do you really think most Americans are going to try to better themselves or earn more money?? What's the incentive?

20101012-12	17:18	Dennis	"Axelrod Is Wrong: Obama Must Protect American Families from Wall Street Fraud"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Rich not always amoral...

"Axelrod Is Wrong: Obama Must Protect American Families from Wall Street Fraud" by Zach Carter, Huffington Post

Oct. 11,2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/zach-carter/axelrod-is-wrong-obama-mu_b_758265.html)

If senior White House adviser David Axelrod's comments this weekend are any indication, the Obama administration is woefully misreading the foreclosure fraud crisis currently gripping the U.S. economy. Axelrod refused to commit the administration to a national moratorium on foreclosures, and mischaracterized a massive, systematic fraud perpetrated by Wall Street banks as a set of unfortunate "mistakes." This is not a minor scandal and it will not simply go away. President Barack Obama needs to stand up for the middle class and protect our economy from Wall Street theft. If he doesn't, the economic and political price will be devastating. The full transcript of Axelrod's appearance on CBS' Face the Nation with Bob Shieffer is here, but here are his key comments, emphasis mine:

It's bad for the housing market and it's bad for these institutions which is why they're scrambling now to— to go back through and— and— and through their documentation for all of this as they should. The President was concerned enough to veto a bill that came to him last Thursday, that would have unintentionally made it perhaps easier to make mistakes....I'm not sure about a national moratorium because there are, in fact, valid foreclosures that— that— that probably should go forward. And where the documentation and paperwork is— is proper, but we are working closely with these institutions to make sure that they expedite the process of going back and reconstructing these and throwing out those that don't work....Our hope is that this moves rapidly and that this gets unwound very, very quickly.

Let's straighten some facts out first. Lenders aren't just making "mistakes"—they're fabricating documents, forging signatures and lying to judges in order to illegally throw people out of their homes and slap them with thousands of dollars in illegal fees.

Consumer advocates were not worried that the bill Obama vetoed on Friday would make it easier for lenders to make "mistakes"—they were worried it would make it harder to expose rampant, systematic fraud committed by Wall Street banks against American families.

Nor is this a problem that can be resolved quickly. Banks are resorting to fraud for a reason—they don't have the documents that prove they have the right to foreclose. It's not like JPMorgan Chase or GMAC need to dig through a filing cabinet to find the right form—the form doesn't exist. Banks willfully, knowingly destroyed key documentation in order to cut costs and boost bonuses. Other banks that bundled these mortgages into complex securities didn't ask for this documentation for the same reasons.

This creates legal liabilities for the banks that can push them into failure. A lot of these securities were packed with fraudulent mortgages—loans where banks falsified borrower information in order to push them into predatory loans. Investors who bought these mortgages have been trying to force banks to repurchase the fraudulent loans. But now that banks cannot even document which loans they own, the entire fraudulent mortgage securitization framework may land on the banks' doorstep. If that happens, we're going to see some very big banks go under.

What does all this mean for borrowers? We've already seen plenty of cases in which banks are foreclosing on the wrong homes—kicking out borrowers who haven't missed any payments, or borrowers who are working with the bank on receiving a loan modification to keep them in their homes. But even for borrowers who have stopped paying their mortgages, the fraud process creates serious dangers. Banks charge all kinds of fees on borrowers when they foreclose—fees that often amount to thousands of dollars. The current wave of fraud is enabling an onslaught of grotesque, illegal fees. When you create new documents and forge signatures, you can claim people agreed to ridiculous things they never agreed to, tell ridiculous lies about the house being foreclosed on, and generate thousands of dollars in improper fees.

In other words, banks and their lawyers are breaking the law to steal from borrowers facing financial hardship. This impropriety may create losses so big that megabanks are going to fail. Smart political leaders need to get out there right now and prove that they are backing American families, not Wall Street elites. A foreclosure moratorium is the first step, the second is a major new initiative to reduce mortgage debt to a level that borrowers can afford—that prevents foreclosures and keeps this mess from spiraling into a financial calamity. The mortgage market needs to reflect economic reality, not inflated banker dreams. Other leaders have figured this out. If Obama refuses to stand up for the middle class, he'll be hanging many embattled Democratic members of Congress out to dry, politically undercutting them on an issue of household financial security in the middle of a brutal recession. Swing-state Democrats like Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz, D-Fla., and Rep. Alan Grayson, D-Fla., Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., and Carolyn Kirkpatrick, D-Mich., have already endorsed foreclosure moratoriums. Attorneys general in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Illinois, California, Iowa, Texas, and Ohio have either imposed state-wide moratoriums or investigations into foreclosure fraud, and Ohio is already suing GMAC. Why does the president want to kneecap members of his own party?

What's more, Axelrod's comments put the White House on the same side as Republican Whip Eric Cantor, R-Va., a Wall Street crony who voted to bailout the big banks with no strings attached, but refused to support Wall Street reform. For his services, Wall Street rewarded Cantor with $2.1 million in campaign contributions for the 2010 elections. Here's what Cantor said on Fox News Sunday:

If you impose a moratorium on foreclosures, what you're telling people and institutions that lend money is they do not have the protection to take the risk they need to, to extend credit so people can get a mortgage....You're going to shut down the housing industry if that's the case....People have to take responsibility for themselves.

Cantor's reasoning is, of course, complete nonsense. People do need to take responsibility for themselves, which is why the government has a responsibility to stop banks from systematically defrauding borrowers on an epic scale. But note Cantor's positioning on the issue. He claims that if the government does anything to help troubled borrowers, that assistance will cause a financial catastrophe. It's a phony story that completely ignores the financial catastrophe already brewing, one created by massive Wall Street fraud, not the government's big, bleeding heart. Cantor is peddling a monstrous lie, but if Obama doesn't push-back against it, he will politically hamstring any opportunity to fend off the economic fallout from this mess, and leave troubled borrowers at the mercy of Wall Street predators.

(Zach Carter is AlterNet's economics editor. He is a fellow at Campaign for America's Future, which he represents on the steering committee of Americans for Financial Reform. He is a frequent contributor to The Nation magazine.)

20101014-01	17:25	Dennis	"Why Germany Has It So Good & Why America Is Going Down the Drain"
-------------	-------	--------	--

Un-American activities: Can socialists do capitalism better?

"Why Germany Has It So Good—and Why America Is Going Down the Drain" by Terence McNally, AlterNet

Oct. 14, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/module/printversion/148501>)

While the bad news of the Euro crisis makes headlines in the U.S., we hear next to nothing about a quiet revolution in Europe. The European Union, 27 member nations with a half billion people, has become the largest, wealthiest trading bloc in the world, producing nearly a third of the world's economy—nearly as large as the U.S. and China combined. Europe has more Fortune 500 companies than either the U.S., China, or Japan.

European nations spend far less than the United States for universal healthcare rated by the World Health Organization as the best in the world, even as U.S. health care is ranked 37th. Europe leads in confronting global climate change with renewable energy technologies, creating hundreds of thousands of new jobs in the process.

Europe is twice as energy efficient as the U.S. and their ecological "footprint" (the amount of the earth's capacity that a population consumes) is about half that of the United States for the same standard of living.

Unemployment in the U.S. is widespread and becoming chronic, but when Americans have jobs, we work much longer hours than our peers in Europe. Before the recession, Americans were working 1,804 hours per year versus 1,436 hours for Germans—the equivalent of nine extra 40-hour weeks per year.

In his new book, Were You Born on the Wrong Continent?, Thomas Geoghegan makes a strong case that European social democracies—particularly Germany—have some lessons and models that might make life a lot more livable. Germans have six weeks of federally mandated vacation, free university tuition, and nursing care.

But you've heard the arguments for years about how those wussy Europeans can't compete in a global economy. You've heard that so many times, you might believe it. But like so many things, the media repeats endlessly, it's just not true.

According to Geoghegan, "Since 2003, it's not China but Germany, that colossus of European socialism, that has either led the world in export sales or at least been tied for first. Even as we in the United States fall more deeply into the clutches of our foreign creditors—China foremost among them—Germany has somehow managed to create a high-wage, unionized economy without shipping all its jobs abroad or creating a massive trade deficit, or any trade deficit at all. And even as the Germans outsell the United States, they manage to take six weeks of vacation every year.

They're beating us with one hand tied behind their back."

Thomas Geoghegan, a graduate of Harvard and Harvard Law School, is a labor lawyer with Despres, Schwartz and Geoghegan in Chicago. He has been a staff writer and contributing writer to The New Republic, and his work has appeared in many other journals. Geoghegan ran unsuccessfully in the Democratic Congressional primary to succeed Rahm Emanuel, and is the author of six books including Whose Side Are You On, The Secret Lives of Citizens, and, most recently, Were You Born on the Wrong Continent?

Terence McNally: You start your book, Were you Born on the Wrong Continent?, with a personal experience, a stopover in Zurich. Could you talk about that?

Thomas Geoghegan: In 1993 I got it in my head, for reasons too long to tell, to go see a woman I'd met who happened to be in Moscow. Because of the coup in Oct., 1993, all the flights to Moscow were canceled, and I ended up in Zurich. I had not been in Western Europe for years, and, while I was waiting for clearance, I happened to walk around the streets and I was just thunderstruck by how nice it was. Every bookstore seemed like a boutique and even the train station was like a perfumery.

And I thought, how did this part of the world get so wealthy without my knowing it? That was the epiphany that led me to take a bigger and bigger interest in how Europeans live, and to ask ultimately, were you born in the wrong continent?

McNally: In talking about that walk, you point out that if you don't have much poverty, life is better for everybody. Not just better for the poor, but for everybody.

Geoghegan: You have more of the city available to you. [My hometown] Chicago's fantastic, but there's a huge swath of it that you don't particularly want to go to—not because of any criminal danger, but just because it's run down. Largely white ethnic neighborhoods on the northwest side are unattractive and dilapidated. Plus there are huge parts of the city that are downright dangerous. Europe isn't like that. It's the argument for social democracy: more equality and less poverty and disorder.

McNally: In their book, The Spirit Level, Richard Wilkinson and Kate Pickett point out that on average everything is worse for everybody in the countries with the most unequal distribution of wealth.

Geoghegan: As a labor lawyer, I can see that janitors and truck drivers I represent would be better off in a social democracy. I make the argument in the book that even people who are doing relatively well would be literally, materially better off in a more egalitarian social democracy. Some of the public goods that are available there for free—university education, for example, are skewed towards the people who are relatively at the top.

McNally: Someone who doesn't go to university doesn't get that benefit, but a family who sends two or three kids gets an enormous benefit.

Geoghegan: Of course, low income sectors do better too. Nonetheless, it could be said, there's a growing amount of poverty in Germany. Especially during the 1990's and the early part of the last decade, there was a scaling back of social democracy. For a while the bubble of casino capitalism in the U.S. and the U.K. led to an allocation of capital into the U.S. and U.K. looking for hot returns. Since the collapse of casino type capitalism in 2008, money has shifted back where it should have been in the first place, to the virtuous economies of the world like Germany, based in manufacturing.

McNally: I recall Kevin Phillips pointing out in his book Bad Money that year after year the U.S. shifted more and more of our money and our best and brightest young people into finance. When the casino seemed to be paying off, other countries also shifted in our direction, but when it broke, we didn't have the manufacturing and export base a country like Germany has to fall back on.

Geoghegan: The Germans had a certain amount of schadenfreude about the whole thing. They're basically a very pessimistic people by temperament, and when they saw a world debacle that they weren't responsible for, they actually became a little more upbeat.

They had what they call a good recession. The German government was very quick off the mark, and immediately put in place what they called kurzzeit. Through this short work-week program, the government paid people to stay on the job when they otherwise might have been let go.

"We got ahead of the curve," one German labor minister said, "employment didn't drop here the way it did in the U.S." When the economy recovered, there was no incentive to hold off hiring because the people were already on the job. Their unemployment is now significantly lower than ours and the economy is booming.

McNally: When asked why Obama didn't pursue a similar policy to stem the economic bleeding, Larry Summers dismissed the idea, saying the White House wanted to create new jobs not preserve old ones.

Geoghegan: A pretty lame answer.

McNally: And an arrogant one. Good for you, Larry. What about the guy who lost his job? And his family and his kids?

Geoghegan: Larry Summers is the villain of my book. He was an architect of deregulation, and was doing a war dance back in the late 1990's about how the U.S. model was triumphant over all. Now, the shoe's on the other foot.

McNally: What's the status of the crisis in Europe right now? The EU includes not only virtuous, productive economies like Germany, but also others not nearly so.

Geoghegan: Those less virtuous economies were the so-called "new Europe" that Donald Rumsfeld was touting. People in the countries that are in trouble now economically were the ones willing to go to Iraq—and there is a connection. These are the countries that were much more inclined to go the American route, going into debt heavily, using housing speculation as the engine of the economy, and opening their economies big time to global bank debt and finance.

Goldman Sachs poured tons of money into Greece, and other New York, London and German banks poured money into Spain. None of the bubbles occurred in Germany and in the "old Europe" that Donald Rumsfeld wrote off. Part of Europe is in trouble to the extent—and only to the extent—that it's involved in the American model. Those countries most resistant to the American model are doing fine.

By the way, why was Goldman Sachs willing to lend money to weak economies like Greece? Because Greece was in the EU. Because Spain was in the EU. These countries would never have gotten all this money from U.S. banks. And what is so important about the EU? At the end of the day the Germans with their trade surplus are able to pay—and in fact that's what has happened.

McNally: How is the relationship unfolding between Germany and the economies it is bailing out?

Geoghegan: It's working out pretty well. The Germans are doing even better because the Euro fell—it was overvalued to begin with—and that made German goods more competitive. After the great debt crisis, the Euro became relatively cheaper, and that made Germany more profitable as an export country. Greece didn't collapse, partly because the Germans bailed it out and partly because there was belt tightening in Greece and plenty of tourists still coming in.

McNally: By the way, Greece represents only 2% of the EU's total GDP, whereas California represents 14% of the U.S. Yet when California reached out to the federal government for similar help, it didn't get it.

Geoghegan: You see a story in the New York Times every six weeks—ever since I graduated from college in 1971—about how Europe is going to collapse. They come out like clockwork.

McNally: I pulled one of those Times articles in May when the Greek crisis was hot. The headline: "Europeans Fear Crisis Threatens Liberal Benefits." But you point out that when a country like Germany takes something away from the safety net, they usually balance it with a benefit.

Geoghegan: They cut back on holiday and they add a nursing home benefit. But the U.S. press always focuses on the cutback. One of the reasons I wrote this book was to show that there's a leadership class over there that is very clever about these things. I don't mean in a spurious, tricky way, but actually thinking, "What do we have to cut back now so that we can go forward in the future?"

To quote a wonderful line from the Lampedusa novel, The Leopard: as the old order is collapsing, the Sicilian aristocrat says to his young prince, "We have to change so that everything remains the same." How do you change social democracy so that you preserve it, and maybe even create an opportunity to expand it in a year or two when the wheel of fortune turns again?

McNally: Let's talk about some of the contrasts in the book between our culture and theirs. People here work nine more weeks per year.

Geoghegan: In the U.S., the most driven work 2300 hours a year, and people a notch or two below the most driven are working 1800 hours a year. That doesn't count hours that are off the clock.

McNally: Why do we work so hard? You say one of the reasons is because we don't have unions or job security. People are afraid that if they don't work weekends and overtime, if they don't skip their kid's soccer game, they'll get laid off.

Geoghegan: Nobody knows who's going to be laid off next. It's all arbitrary, Chainsaw AI could knock down your cubicle door at any time. So everyone has an incentive to stay five minutes longer than everyone else, and that creates anarchy. According to labor economists Richard Freeman at Harvard and Linda Bell at Haverford, in the U.S. there's nobody to tell you to go home.

McNally: Given the fact that we work more, are we more productive?

Geoghegan: If you consider productivity as output per hour, working longer probably decreases it. My friend Isabelle came to the U.S. to attend grad school at Northwestern, and was upset when she discovered there were no holidays here. In the middle of the year, I found her very stressed, and I figured out what was happening: she was working American hours with German efficiency. When you look at the fact that Germans rank at the top of the world in terms of export sales—on a par with the Chinese who work till they drop—you realize they must be doing something that makes them more efficient.

Leisure time also has material value. The fact that Americans work longer and longer hours increases GDP per capita, but it doesn't necessarily raise our standard of living.

McNally: Americans don't know how things actually work in European countries. For many people the fact that Germany is neck and neck with China as the number one exporting country—give or take the rise and fall of currency—must be mind blowing. Even progressives in America don't look overseas for models that work. I find it almost pathological that our exceptionalism infects even those who assume they don't believe in it.

Geoghegan: I have a friend who's just come back from being a journalist for a long time in France and now works as a political reporter in Washington DC. She recently told me, "It's become impossible for me to stay in a carpool with other women journalists because all I do is say to them, 'Oh, it's so much better in France This is so much better If this happened we wouldn't' She said, "They're just so sick of me, they don't want to hear anything more about France."

In some ways it's understandable and in some ways it's tragic. Another journalist friend of mine told me, "The three most deadly words in American journalism are 'in Sweden they' People just won't keep going from there, and why is that? These are economies that have developed a level of sophistication and look like the U.S. in so many ways. People say, "Europe's becoming just like America," but it's not.

McNally: Let's make a quick comparison of GDP. The problem with GDP is that it has only an addition side, it doesn't have a subtraction side. So an auto accident increases GDP; crime increases GDP.

Geoghegan: Waste and fraud and gambling; Katrina increases GDP; urban sprawl especially increases GDP. Hours stuck in traffic increase GDP.

McNally: plus the fact that we've monetized so many things that we used to do for ourselves or for our families.

Geoghegan: You're shelling out $50,000 in tuition for NYU law school and your counterpart in Europe is getting it for free. How pathetic for the poor European adding nothing to GDP. In America we're increasing GDP, but dragging down people's standard of living.

It's a very perverse system of accounting. You say it's all addition and no subtraction, but it's not even all addition. Nothing increases your well-being or your material standard of living as much as leisure time. Among the untouchables in India, of course, that's absolutely not the case; leisure is a nightmare, unemployment is a nightmare. But for many, a loss of leisure is a loss of material value.

For example, leisure to go to a free concert at Millennium Park in Chicago. It's a glorious experience. People in Europe are gaga about it, because it's the one thing in America that seems to them the most European—wonderful orchestras, pop bands, jazz bands, playing right in the middle of the city; gorgeous lawns; people picnicking, etc.—and it's all free. It's so un-American, there's no money going out the door. It makes a mark on your life but you can't turn it into a sum of dollars, so it doesn't mean anything—even though of course it means everything.

McNally: You say the three building blocks of German social democracy are the works councils, the election of boards of directors by workers as well as by hedge fund managers, and the regional wage setting institutions.

Geoghegan: First: work councils. The analogy I used in the book is fictitious: Imagine you elect a works council from among the employees at the Barnes & Noble bookstore where you work. They don't bargain for wages, that's done by the unions; but they have all sorts of rights that relate to working time, who gets laid off, even whether the store is going to close or not. They can go in and look at the books. The management has to enter into agreements. The works council can't dictate, but they have enormous influence over what working hours will be, who's going to work when and how.

Co-determined boards are mandated at German companies with 2000 employees or more, the global companies that are beating us, although you can have them in other situations. These are maybe more like super boards that don't do as much day-to-day managing as our boards of directors do. It consists one half of people elected by and from the workers, and one half elected by the shareholders.

The chairman of the board is selected by the shareholders and has a double vote so that, if there's a tie between the shareholders and the employees, the shareholders win. But it creates a lot of potential influence over how the debate goes.

McNally: But you also say that the shoe is on the other foot when it comes to choosing the CEO, correct?

Geoghegan: If the shareholders are divided on who should be the next CEO, the clerks get to pick the king.

McNally: In contract negotiations over the last 10, 15, 20 years, American workers have been giving back things, agreeing to two tiers, lowering their pension guarantees. I've never heard of any of them trading a concession for the right to elect members to the board.

Geoghegan: The UAW had somebody on the board once.

McNally: Management can't even say it won't work because Germany's beating our pants in manufacturing, and the codetermined board is also spreading elsewhere, right?

Geoghegan: The German model has made inroads on the U.S. model in other European countries.

McNally: You quote the German labor minister saying, "Our biggest export now is codetermination". Now, third: regional or sector wage settling.

Geoghegan: It's much reduced these days, but they still have some version of regional wage bargaining setting standards that everybody has to comply with. That used to be true here—to a lesser extent than in Germany—but it's disappeared.

McNally: Are you talking about a situation where you would negotiate with one of the big three automakers and the others would basically get the same deal?

Geoghegan: I was thinking more of the United Mineworkers negotiating a contract with multiple employer associations to produce a national agreement that covered every employer. That was true in the coal industry and with the Teamsters in the trucking industry.

McNally: Agreements across a whole industry create a sense of transparency, right?

Geoghegan: People know what their wages are. East Germany was a factor in the breakdown. You couldn't really have the same labor costs and labor standards that you had in West Germany because the economy wasn't at the same stage of development.

McNally: If you compare your quality of life and the prospective quality of life for your children with the German quality of life, things are only getting worse. To cite just one example, economist Robert Frank talks about the fact that American families end up moving into neighborhoods they can't afford because that's where the good schools are, and I'm sure this played some role in the mortgage collapse.

Geoghegan: We'd be much more competitive globally if Americans had six weeks off, and had a chance to go and see what people are doing in other countries. We'd come back much more sophisticated about them and probably have better ideas about how to sell things to them.

McNally: You point out that as globalization grew, the U.S. chose to compete on the basis of cheap labor by outsourcing. We kept the marketing and executives here and moved the manufacturing elsewhere. We've been playing that game for 20-30 years now. Germany chose to play the opposite game.

Geoghegan: 30 years later the Germans are making money off of China, and China is making big time money off of us. One thing I really try to get across in the book: Many Americans think that we've got a trade deficit because we can't compete with China. We've got a trade deficit because we can't compete with Germany in selling things to China. Until people wake up and look at the kinds of things that the Germans are doing to keep their manufacturing base, we're going to continue to run deficits which leave us in the clutches of foreign creditors and compromise our autonomy as a country.

McNally: This is something that the right wing should be up in arms about. Geoghegan: Absolutely. And they're clueless. They are mortgaging this country's future and they're too stupid to realize it.

McNally: This seems like a good point to turn to "10 Things the Dems Could Do To Win," a cover story I wrote for a recent issue of The Nation.

Geoghegan: The Democrats have to do something for their base, keep it simple and make it universal. Unlike the healthcare bill which was perceived as a handout for "them", the uninsured, many of them in red states. Democrats should focus on things that either give a direct benefit to people or give them a sense of power.

For example, increase Social Security so that it's a real public pension—push Social Security benefits up to 50% of people's income. Of course we can't do this overnight, but we can set it as a serious goal.

McNally: Social security in the U.S. is 39% at this point. In Germany it was 67%, but it's dropped?

Geoghegan: To the low fifties. But people have tons of money in the bank over there, there's a high savings rate and, at least in the unions, they also have private pensions that work much better than in the U.S.

McNally: They also don't graduate college with thousands of dollars of debt that many will carry for the rest of their lives.

Geoghegan: They do have a demographic crisis that they're going to have to get through, but they've protected the system.

McNally: Raising social security to 50% of working income means that when you go on to social security you'll get half of what you were getting when you were working. Currently you get less than two-fifths.

Geoghegan: The top 20 developed countries have an average rate of something like 60%, so we can do this.

My second proposal is simply the most effective way to move ultimately to a single payer healthcare system, which I think we have to do. I would say that even if I didn't think single payer were a better system. You have to have one consistent system of payment to get control of healthcare costs. All the European countries do. It doesn't have to be single payer, but it has to be a consistent system. You can't have a mix of private market and single payer.

Let's lower Medicare's eligibility to 55. What brought back GM and Chrysler? The government came in and took away their retiree healthcare costs. We've got to lower labor costs not by bringing down wages—that would be a disaster, but by having the government assume wage labor costs that are making us less competitive. People of 55-65 will all vote for you because it will change their lives.

McNally: Folks like Alan Simpson and Pete Peterson are going to say, "Wait a minute, you're going in exactly the wrong direction."

Geoghegan: Social security basically is solvent now even at its current level. And I have ways of paying for it.

First, if you brought back the estate tax and dedicated the proceeds to the Social Security trust—as Robert Ball, former Social Security commissioner, once proposed. Second, lift the cap on the Social Security tax—it's at $90,000 now—so it applies to all incomes. After all, Social Security is for everyone. Third, if you did things like eliminate the corporate debt protection for debt that is used in leverage buyouts and non-productive uses right now, you could generate the financial reserve that could pay for this. Finally, I do think people should pay a little more for their Social Security because they're going to get a better deal.

All of these things have two purposes, to do something directly beneficial to the base now, and to do something that reduces the size and influence of the financial sector and increases the viability of manufacturing.

Lowering the age for Medicare, for example, allows employers to substantially lower their labor costs for their most expensive workers. It's not just to make them competitive, but it's also to induce investment into manufacturing which is right now inhibited by the uncertainty of healthcare costs. Ultimately the goal of all of this is to get the U.S. out of debt.

The debt issue ought to be the Democrat's issue not the Republicans. The real debt issue is our external trade deficit. We either have consumers go into debt to make the books balance at the end of the day as we did during the Bush era, or we have the federal government do it when consumers cut back. We don't earn out way in the world, and until we do, we're going to be running either large consumer debts which lead to private financial panics, or federal debt which could lead to a sovereign default. We've got to get out of that box, and the only way to do it is to put in measures that make our economy more competitive globally.

McNally: You're saying that Obama and the Democratic party could transform the issue of debts and deficits by offering solutions that are not just about paying today's bill, but about restructuring our ability to pay the bill in the future.

Geoghegan: We will never get out of debt until we confront our inability to pay our way in the world. Somebody is going to be in debt, whether it's me the taxpayer paying off the federal deficit or me the consumer paying off my Visa card. It doesn't make a whole lot of difference at the end of the day. The Democrats ought to present themselves as the party that has a plan to get the country out of debt.

McNally: You also recommend a usury cap on credit cards.

Geoghegan: You've got to get returns down in the financial sectors and returns up in manufacturing sectors. That's the key. And proposing that will split the business community in this country in a very healthy way. The Democrats can be the party of the manufacturers, even if it's at the expense of Wall Street. For years, the Democrats have slipped the other way. People perceive that and they're frustrated by it.

McNally: The financial sector currently funds both parties. Republicans get to be true to their convictions, while Democrats end up negotiating with themselves. Though they may have some progressive leanings, their funders pull them in the other direction.

Geoghegan: Even progressive Democrats don't have the sophistication of their counterparts on the left in France and Germany in terms of understanding how important it is not to run up a national debt. Here we march against Mexico and put up tariff walls. They don't do that in Europe, they're not that unsophisticated.

McNally: Let me finish with a quote of yours that really struck me: Without an industrial base a democracy dies.

Geoghegan: My own favorite ending line would be: Countries like Germany do both capitalism and socialism better than we do.

20101015-01 07:27 Pam Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
--

Dear Dennis,

Great article. Thanks—again—for adding fuel to my fire. I just read an article in the New Yorker about the history and background of the Tea Party, going back to Teddy Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson (Glenn Beck's bete noire). It was illuminating and disquieting. In short, the "lunatic fringe" (Teddy R.'s phrase) has effectively taken over the Republican party, pushing the moderates into the ditch. Even someone like Karl Rove is taken to be moderate and mainstream compared to the likes of Christine O'Donnell. The article focuses on Glenn Beck and his influences. He is scary!! Confused, ignorant Americans have adopted him and his misrepresentations of history. The troubling thing is that there are so many of them. If Tea Party candidates get elected in substantial numbers, the problems we have today are going to look like a birthday party. [You predicted that right, Pam. —SteveB] I am so deeply at odds with American exceptionalism and libertarian disregard for the public welfare I feel helpless and disgusted when I see what is going on. Your calls to un-elect our politicians sound good, but dis-electing ANY politician and replacing him with a Tea Partier would be disastrous, and that's what might happen. You have to choose either a Republican or a Democrat, and the Democrat still remains the lesser of two evils (if you consider ALL politicians evil). I'd rather have Nancy Pelosi than Sarah Palin.

I read articles like this one and they seem so sensible and realistic. Why is it so hard for people to be this rational? Why is it so hard for people to be open-minded and subject to reason? Why do so many people want things that will actually hurt them? I heard a sixty something woman on NPR the other day, saying she was all for the Tea Party. This woman is on Medicare and Social Security is her only income. What can she be thinking?! I don't trust "the people", I don't trust politicians, I don't trust corporations. Where does that leave me? I really don't know.

20101015-02 09:11 SteveB Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"

The article, above, should be mandatory reading for all Americans.

Oooooo! SOCIALISM! Shudder, shudder. Don't believe the Republican boogeyman lies about Europe. There's a very good reason why so much of the rest of the world is doing so much better than we are in the U.S. (though the Euro ain't that strong either, and Greece, etc. are definitely problems, but, hey, look at our dollar and our debt).

That reason they're doing better is that, in many other countries, the political system is not corrupted by huge campaign contributions from the rich and big corporations. Therefore, laws have been passed which benefit the people as a whole. In the U.S., laws have been passed by corrupted politicians who sell-out the people to the rich, big corporations, military, and even foreign governments.

It's really, simply all a matter of a country's politicians knowing who they work for. They can be made to work for the good of the country, or they can be allowed to have other bosses whose ruthless self-interest and greed corrupt everything they touch.

Why would we, the people, choose to allow the latter?

DIS-ELECT YOUR POLITICIANS.

YOU'RE THE BOSS. IT'S TIME TO FIRE!

20101015-03 12:01 SteveB "Show Me the Donors"

Exactly how your Democrat and Republican politicians are bought and sold...

The whole system, not just one party or the other, is corrupted by Big Money—to the detriment of the middle class, jobs, and America.

"Show Me the Donors" by Richard L. Hasen, Slate

Oct. 14, 2010 (http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/politics/2010/10/show_me_the_donors.html)

(What's the point of disclosing campaign donations? Let's review.)

What's the point of disclosing campaign donations? With all the controversy still swirling around whether the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is using foreign money to fund its $75 million effort to support Republican Congressional candidates, the secrecy of Karl Rove's new political groups, and the emergence of new groups with anodyne-sounding names like the "Coalition to Protect Seniors," it's worth stepping back and asking why federal law requires campaign finance disclosure in the first place. Do we still need these laws? Do they work the way they're supposed to?

For years, federal campaigns took place without effective disclosure laws. After Watergate, with its revelations of secret illegal corporate cash being funneled to candidates and with paper bags full of campaign money, Congress finally passed a law in 1974 requiring disclosure of contributions to candidates and political committees and the spending these groups engaged in. At this point, most political players were candidates, political parties or political action committees, and they all were subject to the disclosure rules.

For a long time following, there was a virtual consensus in Congress that disclosure was the way to keep campaigns clean. But, in recent years, as the Supreme Court has struck down more limits on election spending, the consensus has unraveled. Emboldened, opponents of campaign finance regulation have gone after disclosure, too.

Their arguments are not new. As soon as Congress passed its 1974 disclosure laws, a coalition of plaintiffs, including the ACLU, challenged the requirements as overly broad. They argued that at least some disclosure is unconstitutional under the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech and association, because compelling someone to reveal who is funding political speech will chill vigorous participation in politics.

The Supreme Court rejected that constitutional challenge in the 1976 campaign finance case, Buckley v. Valeo. Confronted with a law that required disclosure of even very small contributions, the court held that the disclosure laws were justified by three important government interests. First, disclosure laws can prevent corruption and the appearance of corruption. Having no more paper bags of cash makes it harder to bribe a member of Congress. Second, disclosure laws provide valuable information to voters. A busy public relies on disclosure information more than ever. This was apparent when California voters recently turned down a ballot proposition which would have benefitted Pacific Gas and Electric. PG&E provided almost all of the $46 million to the "Yes on 16" campaign, compared with very little spent opposing the measure. Thanks to California's disclosure laws, PG&E's name appeared on every "Yes on 16" ad and the measure narrowly went down to defeat. Third, disclosure laws help enforce other campaign finance laws. Worried about foreign money in elections? Disclosure tells you how much is coming in.

Still, after Buckley, the Supreme Court recognized that groups that face threats of harassment from either the government or private sources should have a constitutional right to be exempt from the disclosure laws. In 1982, the Court held that the Socialist Workers Party, which had faced FBI and other harassment, did not have to disclose their contributors to the FEC. This is a narrow exemption for very unpopular groups. But opponents of disclosure have continued to argue that chilling is a problem that affects not just these marginal groups but everyone who might contribute to a political cause.

This argument seemed to gain some traction in the Internet era. No longer is it necessary to trudge down to a government office to wade through disclosure reports. With a Web site like Fundrace, you can plug in your home address (or any address) and see to whom (and how much) your neighbors have donated in federal races. Same-sex marriage advocates created Eightmaps to find Californians who donated to "Yes on 8," as in Proposition 8, the ballot measure outlawing gay unions. There's an ongoing lawsuit over whether these Proposition 8 contributors should have been exempt from disclosing their names because of allegations that they have suffered economic boycotts, lost their jobs, and even faced the threat of violence.

The Supreme Court will eventually have to grapple with whether the Internet changes the constitutional calculus—in other words, whether the ease with which we can now discover who has contributed to what means that people won't feel free to give and whether that outweighs the societal benefit of disclosure in preventing corruption, informing voters, and helping to enforce other campaign finance laws. In two cases last term, however, the court reaffirmed its strong support for disclosure rules. In Citizens United, the court struck down limits on corporate spending in campaigns; and at the same time, in an 8-1 vote, it endorsed disclosure as the better solution to preventing corruption from large spending. By the same 8-1 count, the court also, last term in Doe v. Reed, rejected an argument in a case similar to the Proposition 8 suit. The court ruled that Washington state residents who signed a petition for a voter referendum that would reverse an "everything but marriage" same-sex union law could not shield their identities.

In these cases, only Justice Clarence Thomas argued for a complete deregulated campaign finance system: no limits and no disclosure. But that doesn't mean that the question of disclosure in the Internet era is really settled. The Reed majority was fractured, with six of the eight justices writing opinions—plus Thomas in dissent. At the end of the spectrum close to Thomas, Justice Alito suggested that disclosure in the Internet era can chill political activity and argued that exemptions like the one the court allowed for the Socialist Workers Party should be easy to get. On the other end, Justice Scalia strongly supported disclosure laws, writing that "[r]equiring people to stand up in public for their political acts fosters civic courage, without which democracy is doomed."

The truth is probably somewhere in the middle. As law professors Bill McGeveran and Richard Briffault have persuasively argued, the Internet does have the potential to make individual small contributors skittish about political activity. So we should raise the threshold for disclosure, requiring it for larger contributors and spenders and leaving out the small timers.

That is a far cry from the way disclosure is actually working. Since they haven't made real headway in court, groups that don't want to reveal the identities of their donors look for ways to avoid the mess of regulations that requires it. The Chamber of Commerce says it won't disclose the names of donors funding its multimillion-dollar political advertising blitz because it fears its members will be harassed. But the real reason is probably that the businesses that belong to the chamber don't want to lose customers for taking controversial positions, as Target recently experienced when it backed an anti-gay candidate in Minnesota.

The disclosure chase has become a kind of Whac-A-Mole whereby groups that want to avoid disclosure choose different organizational forms in the tax code to hide donors. Before Congress passed the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reforms in 2002, groups avoided disclosure by refraining from expressly advocating for the election or defeat of a candidate. For example, in the 2000 election, a group called "Republicans for Clean Air" spent money in the New York presidential primary knocking John McCain's environmental record to support the candidacy of George W. Bush. It turned out (and we know this thanks to some enterprising journalists) that Republicans for Clean Air was none other than Sam and Charles Wyly, two Texas supporters of Bush. Since their ads didn't say "don't vote for McCain," they didn't disclose their identities.

McCain-Feingold and other changes Congress made to the tax code at first put an end to this disclosure dodging. But the fixes only worked for a while. With the help of three Republican Commissioners at the Federal Election Commission, opponents of disclosure have found new ways around the law. This campaign season, the action has moved to 501(c)(4)s. This type of nonprofit generally must report contributions above $5,000 to the IRS—but that information is not made public. This really does open the spigot: For example, as I predicted, funding to the Rove political group American Crossroads skyrocketed when he opened up a 501(c)(4) affiliate, Crossroads GPS, to take anonymous donations. The Chamber, meanwhile, is a 501(c)(6) trade association, and it, too, does not have to disclose its members or their contributions publicly.

All of these groups, and anyone else spending least $10,000 in TV or radio ads mentioning a candidate in the period close to an election, has to file a public reports with the Federal Election Commission detailing their spending. But thanks to the FEC, no one needs to disclose who has contributed to pay for these ads, unless the donor is dumb enough specifically to direct the organization to use the money for a particular ad. This system just begs political operatives to set up innocuous-sounding front groups to launder contributions for ads.

This is what pro-disclosure reformers are up-in-arms about. They are filing complaints alleging that the 501(c)(4)s with the bland names are violating tax law because their primary purpose is politics rather than whatever they've declared it to be in the IRS paperwork that got them nonprofit status. But there are two problems with these complaints. We don't know what a group's primary purpose is until it's had a chance to spend money over a year and we can see what share went for political activities. Also, the IRS rules are far from clear as to how to measure "primary purpose."

The bottom line is that the 2010 election will be over long before the IRS decides whether the Coalition to Protect Seniors and its ilk are breaking the law. The same thing happened in the 2004 cycle, when Republicans complained that certain Democratic-leaning organizations were really political committees that the FEC should have regulated. By the time the complaints went anywhere and the groups were ordered to pay fines, they had stopped being politically active.

Democrats in Congress have proposed tightening up these rules yet again in the DISCLOSE Act, but they larded up the bill with new limits on corporate political activities and no Republicans were willing to back even a straight disclosure bill. Even if the bill passed, it it's not clear it would solve the problem. It doesn't bar secret contributions to nonprofit veterans organizations, leading to speculation that they could be the new front groups.

This election season, enterprising journalists, especially at the New York Times, have been digging into the shell game of contributions and spending, including activities by the American Future Fund, Crossroads GPS, and Americans for Job Security. The most important piece the Times has run, by Mike McIntire, demonstrated in vivid detail just how hard it is to follow the money without disclosure rules strongly enforced by the government.* As McIntire explains, after his extensive investigation into the backers of the "Coalition to Protect Seniors" led him to P.O. boxes and unanswered e-mails, it looked as if the health care industry might be behind an ad the group ran attacking the president's health care plan. But in all likelihood, we'll never know for sure. That's how porous our disclosure rules have become.

20101015-04	12:25	SteveB	Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
-------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

Dear Pam,

Thanks. I hope you're having a good fall. Those lovely fall days always remind me of college...

I'm happy you're getting fired up! Glenn Beck is a truly evil man. And so transparent. He's out to use people to make money. For a while, I tracked his predictions against reality...but there is no reality to this man. He is a blatant liar!

I have decided that, to shake up the system as much as needs to be done, I don't mind if a few bad eggs get in and a few good eggs get tossed. The result would be that the politicians would all be so scared that something good might happen. The Tea Party wouldn't be able to elect enough people to do anything. A third party scares me. Were this whole batch of scoundrels to be dis-elected (unelected?) again, two years later, you would detect a definite smell from the pants of the government(s), and real, constructive change might be able to happen.

No one I know or have read has come up with any better way to fix things. I don't believe another way exists at this time, except violence, which I totally shun. Haha. You don't trust anybody! Well...I don't blame you. I guess I only trust the ideas that got us here, that have stood the test of time. Finding these, creating agreement on them and acting for the good of the nation is the true calling of the politician and what we should be electing them to do.

Now, we elect them to pay back their campaign donors or to serve some agenda totally their own. Generally, there is one item on the agenda of our present politicians—power. That's OK. That's human nature. But this impulse needs to be controlled by the State, not by the rich and organized, as we now allow to happen.

Our government has been stolen from us by money and no longer acts in our best interest. That much seems pretty obvious.

On the home front, life is difficult here. I'm hoping Marci can get over what has happened and we can get back to normal, but it seems not yet.

20101015-05	13:27	Pam	Re: "Why Germany Has It So Good"
-------------	-------	-----	----------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Fall is here at last, I do believe. After an incredibly hot summer, things have finally cooled down and there is a fall feeling in the air—and in my mood. I love fall. I must be a wintry sort of person, because I consider fall the real start of the year, not spring. The school calendar must have something to do with it. For a long time I existed on one-year contracts, so fall meant I had a year's secure employment and could relax a bit.

Mark and I are getting ready to go out to California for his 40th Stanford reunion. I can't remember if I mentioned that before or not. We haven't been on a "big" trip in quite a while, so we're due. At least Mark is. He's the one with the travel bug. I'm the homebody. Sometimes I feel a little guilty that I have clipped his wings. I know he'd go more places if he thought I wanted to go as much as he does. We do go to the mountains from time to time, stay in a B & B, eat some good food, drink some good wine, and generally chill out. That's always fun. We're going to stay at a B & B for a night in Calif. wine country with Mark's brother and his girlfriend. We're going to visit wineries a la "Sideways."

I wish I had your optimism about the possibility of change in our politics. I agree with you that big money rules the roost, and I don't see how there's anything to stop that. If I were an honest politician with good ideals, I believe I'd go crazy watching all the bs that goes on. I admire Evan Bayh for leaving the Senate, though that just shows how bad things have become. There's something deeper than differences of opinion going on, I think. The anger and hatred that are generated over political issues that ought to be amenable to rational discussion smacks of a strange sort of religious fervor to me. It's like there is a boiling cauldron of anger in human beings that simply seeks a place to run over into. (odd sentence) People are literally out of their minds, rather like Viking berserkers. How can rationality deal with that?

There was a choice moment on "The Colbert Report" last night. (Do you get American TV?) Christine O'Donnell was in a televised debate with her opponent, and she was asked to name a Supreme Court decision that she disagreed with. She couldn't come up with a single thing and just floundered around. It was wonderful to watch! Then they showed a piece of Katy Couric's interview with Sarah Palin where she was asked the same thing. She didn't have an answer either.

This time of year always reminds me of our time in Canada. I loved it there. My kids were little, we had a nice big house (if no money to speak of), and I had some good friends. I loved my days and was very aware of how happy I was (despite having an alcoholic for a husband). When I think back on that time, it seems that I was in a bubble of contentment. I worried about things, but the larger world did not seem especially threatening. I get echoes of that feeling now and I do enjoy my life, but it's like I've lost a protective layer. The world seems more precarious, dangerous, irrational, and unjust than ever. But perhaps it's not the world that has changed, but me. ("I" is correct, but it doesn't sound right, does it?)

20101017-01	07:49	GaryF	Fw: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?
-------------	-------	-------	---

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

"What If ...?" by John Yates, Washington, MA, Oct. 15, 2010

As we approach the midterm elections, and consider turning control of our Congress over to the Republican party, it is a good time to reflect on policies past, present, and future, and ask the question "What if ...?"

Looking back, what if the majority of conservative Republicans had their way?

Government would be much smaller, and taxes would be much less. But at what cost? Social Security and Medicare wouldn't exist, and many of our elderly would still be dying of abject poverty and lack of health care. The EPA, CAFE standards, the FDA, Labor Laws, and financial regulations would be minimal, and our food, air and water would be polluted with carcinogens and other contaminants. Our cars would be burning leaded gasoline with poor economy, and without pollution control systems. Our food and drugs would be loaded with untested and potentially dangerous chemicals. The National Parks system and the Peace Corps would be unheard of. All of these progressive programs were paid for with tax dollars, and passed only with the overwhelming support of Democrats sufficient to overcome the negative votes cast by the majority of Republicans. Without these legislations, our work days would be long and children would be laboring in factories and fields.

Our economy would be one of boom and bust, and our society would be two class, with a small number in a ridiculously wealthy class and the masses living in or near poverty. Our natural resources would be squandered and our infrastructure would be decrepit.

[And our educational system would be a complete shambles and masturbation (+ + + +) would be illegal.—SteveB]

If this were not true, would any of these policies have been invented? All of these conditions existed prior to passage of these progressive and liberal regulations. Why would one think that business is any different now than it has been throughout history? By charter, Corporations must put shareholder profits at the top of their priorities, and without regulation many would pay little heed to environmental, worker, and social protections where they infringe on profits. Recently, many have moved their operations to foreign countries to avoid these liberal policies, and are polluting the environments and abusing the workers' rights there to maximize profit. Given the chance, would they not operate the same way here?

Recently, under Bush, our country was led from a Democrat controlled decade of peace, prosperity, and budget surplus to a Republican controlled condition of deficit, economic ruin, and embroilment in two unwinnable and unnecessary wars. A simple, cost effective, transparent, and controllable Single Payer National Healthcare plan proposed by Obama was forced by an opposing Congressional Republican party, which was marching in lock step, to become 1,500 pages of legalese designed to preserve the massive profits enjoyed by insurance companies. Obama's Economic Stimulus Program, designed to create jobs by rebuilding our infrastructure and promoting green business, was compromised to the point of making it inadequate and to some degree ineffective, causing our recovery to be sluggish and delayed. Even as a slight minority, Republican policies continue to damage our ability to prosper.

Looking forward, if the Conservatives have their way, the Bush era tax cuts will be extended for the wealthiest class, costing the Federal Budget $700B, money our government can ill afford. Social Security will be privatized and subject to the whims of the market (much to the delight of Wall Street!). Reductions in the size of government and reductions in taxes will bring massive cuts in school, police, and fire department budgets, necessary services that are already going under water as the Federal government withdraws support to the States in a desperate effort to regain control over an expanding deficit. Reduction of government means allowing our infrastructure to decay further, our parks to close, our social welfare programs to fail and our poor to rely on charity which is already grossly insufficient to meet demand. Millions of publicly funded jobs will be cut, creating another crisis within our economy as demand for goods and services goes with the jobs, and private businesses fail for lack of demand.

After a disastrous decade of Republican control followed by two short years of Democratic control, our economy and society are just beginning to recover. As we enter the midterm elections, now is a good time to ask the question "What if ...?", and decide if we really want to return to the short-sighted policies promoted by the vast majority in the Republican Party.

20101022-01 17:23 Dennis Tea Party Training Video

Take a course in Teabagger Ethics 101: <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tGB8Uuffi4M>.

20101025-01 07:38 SteveB Re: My Experience with Taxes

Dear GaryC,

That must have been really interesting work in Washington!

You know, my wife attended Georgetown too. She studied law there on a Fulbright Scholarship for a year after she got her Bolivian law degree. I think she was there in 1989. (She's a little younger than we are.)

Your last paragraph is a beautiful, pithy description of how politics works in the U.S. If the Tea Party candidates get elected, I'm moving to Bolivia. Wait a minute! I've already moved to Bolivia...

The South American economies seem to be booming, even though they are mainly leftist. Growth rates aren't equal to China or India (except maybe for Brazil) but they sure trounce the U.S.

Hope you're having a great fall! Not much time left to get a coney at the Lafayette Dog 'n Suds before they close for the winter. They're the best!

20101025-02 07:55 SteveB Re: "Senior Citizens Brace for Social Security Freeze"

Dear GaryC,

Well, the Republicans love to throw around the "S" word this year, don't they? But affordable healthcare for all citizens is a prerequisite of a decent society to live in. Why can't we solve this one in the U.S.? Our system sucks and the Democrats have been bought-out of fixing it, apparently. The tax code does keep a lot of people employed. haha. And taxing everyone, especially the rich, to improve education for the good of the whole country is a pretty socialistic idea too, when you think about it. But, as you say, it is essential if we are to ever be competitive again.

I also think the social idea of doing something for the very poor and mentally incapacitated people who live homeless on our streets is something we need to attend to. And how can government not have a role in solving the energy problem? Especially through taxes and incentives? These can't all be called socialist ideas. F*ck the Republicans! I could say that wanting to come into my bedroom to tell me what I can and can't do, monitoring my telephone and internet usage, trying to tell women what they can and cannot do with their own bodies, and fighting unnecessary wars are fascist ideas!

But other than that and national security, I think the role of government should be as small and efficient as possible. I'm no bleeding-heart liberal. I think illegal immigration and the balance of payments deficit must be stopped. Benefits for illegals must be stopped. Work for illegals must be stopped. I don't care what the cost is, I know the rewards for the country would outweigh any cost. F*ck the Mexicans!

Let's see...anything else? Oh, how about the energy problem! Lots and lots of money possible in that arena...

20101025-03 08:39 SteveB Re: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?

If anyone finds any part of this email to be lies or incorrect, please let me know. Personally, I don't see how any of this can be disputed. Facts are facts, no matter which party you might erroneously "believe in".

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Food for thought...

Once upon a time the government had a vast scrap yard in the middle of a desert. Congress said, "Someone may steal from it at night." So they created a night watchman position and hired a person for the job.

Then Congress said, "How does the watchman do his job without instruction?" So they created a planning department and hired two people, one person to write the instructions, and one person to do time studies.

Then Congress said, "How will we know the night watchman is doing the tasks correctly?" So they created a Quality Control department and hired two people, one to do the studies and one to write the reports.

Then Congress said, "How are these people going to get paid?" So they created two positions: a time keeper and a payroll officer, then hired two people.

Then Congress said, "Who will be accountable for all of these people?" So they created an administrative section and hired three people, an Administrative Officer, Assistant Administrative Officer, and a Legal Secretary.

Then Congress said, "We have had this command in operation for one Year and we are $918,000 over budget, we must cut back." So they laid off the night watchman. NOW slowly, let it sink in. Quietly, we go like sheep to slaughter.

Does anybody remember the reason given for the establishment of the DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY during the Carter Administration? Anybody? Anything? No? Didn't think so!

Bottom line: We've spent several hundred billion dollars in support of an agency....the reason for which not one person who reads this can remember! Ready?

It was very simple...and at the time, everybody thought it very appropriate. The Department of Energy was instituted on 8/04/1977. Its purpose: TO LESSEN OUR DEPENDENCE ON FOREIGN OIL.

Hey, pretty efficient, huh?

AND NOW IT'S 2010—33 YEARS LATER—AND THE BUDGET FOR THIS "NECESSARY" DEPARTMENT IS AT $24.2 BILLION A YEAR. IT HAS 16,000 FEDERAL EMPLOYEES AND APPROXIMATELY 100,000 CONTRACT EMPLOYEES; AND LOOK AT THE JOB IT HAS DONE! (THIS IS WHERE YOU SLAP YOUR FOREHEAD AND SAY, "WHAT WERE THEY THINKING?")

33 years ago 30% of our oil consumption was foreign imports. Today 70% of our oil consumption is foreign imports. Ah, yes—good old Federal bureaucracy.

NOW, WE HAVE TURNED THE BANKING SYSTEM, HEALTH CARE, AND THE AUTO INDUSTRY OVER TO THE SAME GOVERNMENT? [Not exactly! —SteveB]

Hello!! Anybody Home?

You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot lift the wage earner up by pulling the wage payer down. You cannot further the brotherhood of man by inciting class hatred. You cannot build character and courage by taking away people's initiative and independence.

"You cannot help people permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves."
—Abraham Lincoln

Dear SteveB

Could be. But things are no better with Demos in control so what's the solution? I find people spending 95% of their time trying to find something to blame and very few spending any time wondering about solutions.

What if ... the U.S. wasn't stuck in the rut of a two-party system?

20101025-06 10:18 SteveB Re: What If Conservative Republicans Had Their Way?

Dear Charis,

Well, believe me, things are much better than they would be otherwise had Democrats never been in control in the past (as this email illustrates).

To my mind, we must avoid more than a two-party system like the plague. It would allow more power for the lunatic fringe, which has already become so huge and powerful. I think it would be an experiment fraught with danger. But you're right, it may have to come to that.

I always talk about solutions when I talk about the problems. We must reform campaign financing! The only way I know to accomplish that is to kick-out all the corrupt politicians who are against such reform. Oh, you say that would be all of the politicians? I agree! Kick the bums out! All of them! Let's get a fresh start.

We must remember that we are all Americans. We were born or naturalized that way. None of us were born Democrat or Republican. We must examine closely our loyalties to one or the other totally corrupt party. (Though I can't help but believe that the Democrats, though partly misguided, are still the less corrupt of the two parties. But I don't let this thought make me into any kind of party loyalist!)

20101025-07 10:31 Clark Re: How Government Works

Just FYI, Abraham Lincoln did not say the quote at the bottom.

<http://www.snopes.com/quotes/lincoln/prosperity.asp>

20101025-08 10:42 SteveB Re: How Government Works

Dear Clark,

Yep, you are exactly right. Thank you. Hope you're having a great fall.

20101025-09 16:16 Dennis "Tea Party Inc.: The Big Money & Powerful Elites Behind the Right Wing's Latest Uprising"

Countdown to a putsch...

It takes mega bucks to subvert a democracy and make it look like a Tea Party. Does anyone else see a parallel here with developments in Europe eight decades ago? Will the new brown shirts be red, white & blue?

"Tea Party Inc.: The Big Money and Powerful Elites Behind the Right Wing's Latest Uprising" by Adele M. Stan, AlterNet

Oct. 24, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148598/>)

Win or lose, the Tea Party movement will come away from next week's elections triumphant, having injected into the Republican Party a group of candidates pledged to the dismantling of government and wed to the religious right. Of the movement's dozen favored candidates for U.S. Senate, all are anti-abortion, and five oppose it even in cases of rape and incest. Among their number are Colorado's Ken Buck, who has compared homosexuality to alcoholism, and Nevada's Sharron Angle, who wants to demolish both the Department of Education and the Environmental Protection Agency. Major GOP players, from political strategist Karl Rove to former Bush speechwriter David Frum, have fretted publicly over Tea Party extremism, with Frum complaining of the movement's "paranoid delusions."

But it has now become clear that these Tea Party "outsiders" are all part of an inside game, a battle for control of the Republican party.

Though billed as a people's movement, the Tea Party wouldn't exist without a gusher of cash from oil billionaire David H. Koch and the vast media empire of Rupert Murdoch. Many of the small donations to Tea Party candidates have been cultivated by either Fox News Channel, a property of Murdoch's News Corporation, or the Americans for Prosperity Foundation, chaired by Koch. The movement's major organizations are all run, not by first-time, mad-as-hell activists, but by former GOP officials or operatives.

Taken together, Americans for Prosperity, FreedomWorks (another far-right political group seeded by the Kochs) and Murdoch's News Corp, owner of Fox News and the Wall Street Journal, form the corporate headquarters of a conglomerate one might call Tea Party, Inc. This is the syndicate that funds the organizing, crafts the messages, and channels the rage of conservative Americans at their falling fortunes into an oppositional force to President Obama and to any government solution to the current economic calamity. Groups such as Tea Party Express, Tea Party Nation, and the FreedomWorks-affiliated Tea Party Patriots; the bevy of political consultants for hire; and various allied elected officials can be understood as Tea Party, Inc.'s loosely affiliated subsidiaries. The Web sites of FreedomWorks, Americans for Prosperity and the Tea Party side projects of Fox News Channel's Glenn Beck are linked with those of Tea Party Express and Tea Party Patriots, all of which in turn solicit support for Tea Party candidates.

The armies of angry white people with their "Don't Tread on Me" flags, the actual grassroots activists, are not the agents of the Tea Party revolt, but its end users, enriching the Tea Party's corporate owners just as you and I enrich Google through our clicks.

Coming Out Party

Tea Party, Inc. was on full display in our nation's capital in late August, when Glenn Beck gathered his angry white multitudes at the Lincoln Memorial on the anniversary of Martin Luther King's historic "I Have a Dream" speech. The tens of thousands of Tea Partiers who showed up for this political revival were mobilized by untold hours of free promotion on Murdoch's network, while a related "Take America Back" convention, held the day before at Constitution Hall, was convened by FreedomWorks.

At that event, the crowd was treated to a trailer for a forthcoming film called Runaway Slave, narrated by Rev. C.L. Bryant, an African-American pastor from Louisiana identified as "a former NAACP radical," who made the case that liberalism is yet another means of enslaving black people.

"[I]n the black community," Bryant says in the film, "there's always somebody who's gotta keep them n*ggers in control." A photo of Jesse Jackson flashed on the screen. Then one of Al Sharpton. Some images flashed by so quickly that they were barely discernible. One was of a wriggling maggot.

Before the night was out, Glenn Beck himself graced the stage, asking the crowd to "expect miracles" at the next day's rally.

A few miles away, a more sedate crowd was jammed into a Marriott ballroom for a gala dinner that wrapped up yet another activist conference, the Defending the American Dream Summit, this one convened by the Americans for Prosperity Foundation. Striding toward the podium to the opening strains of "New York, New York" was chairman Koch. Tall and dapper in a precisely tailored dark suit, the 70-year-old stood in sharp contrast to the 2,500 middle-class women in pastel frocks and men in department-store sport coats who populated the ballroom tables. Koch prefers to be known for the hundreds of millions he lavishes on his adopted city's cultural institutions—the New York City Ballet, the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and the Metropolitan Opera, to name a few. But the quieter largess behind events like these, dispensed by David Koch and his brother Charles, has reshaped Washington, D.C., and our national politics. Though Americans for Prosperity, which he founded, and its foundation, whose board he chairs, have been instrumental in organizing the Tea Party movement, Koch still publicly claims to have no Tea Party ties, making tonight's appearance notable.

"Six years ago, when we launched this organization," he said in his uneasy and halting style, "we envisioned a grassroots organization of Americans from all walks of life banded together to advance economic freedom and prosperity by limiting government's reach, and curbing government's growth, reining in government spending. ...We envisioned an organization that would boldly and unapologetically defend the free-market economy. The Tea Party is Koch's dream come true; the Washington summit, he told attendees, was designed to train grassroots activists in the defense of the "free-market economy" and "to send a message to the political class that these activists [are] energized and watching" its members.

The Capitol Hill Franchise

The self-appointed head of Tea Party, Inc.'s Capitol Hill division is the junior senator from South Carolina, Jim DeMint. DeMint is the top Senate recipient of donations from the Koch Industries' PAC, reeling in $22,000 in the current election cycle for a race he stands virtually no chance of losing. The Kochs' PAC is also the number three donor to DeMint's PAC, the Senate Conservatives Fund, which he spends on other races.

In DeMint, the Kochs found a politician who will make no compromises on their far right agenda, favoring tax cuts and opposing health-care reform, green energy, labor unions and regulation of any kind. Last year, DeMint received the Americans for Prosperity Foundation's George Washington Award, bestowed upon the senator by Koch himself. Speaking at the organization's summit in August, Koch said DeMint "has consistently stood for freedom against this big-government agenda." In backing DeMint's power play against leaders of the Republican establishment, particularly his challenge to the power of Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, the Kochs stand poised to push those establishment leaders into the same uncompromising positions. Echoing DeMint's agenda are Rep. Michele Bachmann, a Minnesota Republican who, in July, founded a Tea Party Caucus in the House of Representatives, and Rep. Mike Pence, a Republican from Indiana, who is House GOP conference chairman and a charter member of the new caucus. Both are Tea Party favorites, and Bachmann is a regular speaker at Americans for Prosperity events. At the Americans for Prosperity Foundation's RightOnline conference, held in Las Vegas in July, Pence used a luncheon address to make the case for melding the free-market Tea Party agenda with the values of the religious right, while Bachmann entertained a banquet crowd with her plan to phase out Social Security.

FreedomWorks has its eye on a political transformation in the Senate, and is closely allied with DeMint, whose PAC is spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on behalf of many of the same Tea Party-backed Senate candidates endorsed by the FreedomWorks PAC, including Sharron Angle (currently in a tight race against Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid), Rand Paul in Kentucky, Marco Rubio in Florida, and Utah's Mike Lee. (Bachmann's Tea Party Caucus was announced the day after Paul, addressing FreedomWorks activists on a July 13 conference call, suggested a Tea Party caucus for the Senate.) Each of these candidacies began as primary challenges to establishment Republicans endorsed by McConnell.

In September, Huffington Post political columnist Sam Stein cited a Democratic strategist who said that by the midterms' close, Americans for Prosperity will have spent $45 million on organizing "voter education" and get-out-the-vote activities that test the limits of legal nonprofit expenditures. Actually, Americans for Prosperity president Tim Phillips told me his plan was to raise and spend even more, though he wouldn't name a figure. Even the lesser amount, according to tax filings, would represent a tripling of its funds since 2008.

FreedomWorks also hopes to triple its revenue, from $3 million in 2008, according to tax filings, to an anticipated $10 million this election cycle, according to Adam Brandon, the group's communications director. In a fundraising video sent by FreedomWorks to new members, leaders announce that every dollar raised will be matched by an unnamed donor. Both Brandon and Koch Industries spokesperson Melissa Cohlmiya say that FreedomWorks has received no funding from the Kochs or their foundations since 2004, so there is likely another high-roller involved. But neither FreedomWorks nor Americans for Prosperity, nor its foundation, is required by law to disclose its donors and—like advocacy organizations across the political spectrum—they don't.

At any rate, the vast expenditures on organizing have worked in at least one way: FreedomWorks' membership had reached nearly 1.1 million by mid-October, according to the group's Web site ticker. Americans for Prosperity claims 1.5 million members and chapters in 31 states.

Both groups excel at training activists and spreading the word for Tea Party candidates, who have raked in a significant portion of their campaign donations from small donors, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. When Angle's campaign announced earlier this month that it had raised a whopping $14 million since June, spokesperson Jarrod Agen told the Washington Post that 96 percent of those donations were $200 or less. (At press time, neither Angle nor the FEC had released official filings.)

One "voter education" exercise I witnessed was the dispatch of participants in July's RightOnline conference to canvass the Las Vegas suburbs, armed with a script about Harry Reid. "Reid voted for the failed $800 billion stimulus plan that has wasted our tax dollars on more government," it read. "Reid's policies will make government bigger, waste more money, drive up budget deficits and kill jobs."

The canvassers had just heard Angle, Reid's opponent, deliver the conference's closing speech. But as they boarded vans for their deployments, they were reminded this was, of course, a nonpartisan exercise—since the Americans for Prosperity Foundation, a nonprofit, is forbidden from endorsing candidates.

The Money Men

The Tea Party's two major patrons are fabulously wealthy. David Koch is heir to the fortunes of Koch Industries, described in 2008 by Fortune as the largest privately held corporation in the United States, and was ranked by Forbes as one of the world's richest people, with an estimated personal wealth of $17.5 billion. Rupert Murdoch, founder and CEO of News Corp—ranked by Fortune as world's second-largest entertainment company—was also rated by Forbes among the world's wealthiest, with personal wealth of $6.3 billion.

Koch Industries, with David as executive vice-president and his brother Charles as CEO, presides over a vast conglomerate of oil and gas interests, as well as holdings in timber and chemicals. Since the 1970s, the two men have funded and controlled a large network of right-wing institutions, launching the libertarian Cato Institute in 1977 and the Mercatus Institute in 1985, all of which advocate business deregulation under the rubric of "free markets."

Both cornerstones of Tea Party Inc.—FreedomWorks and the two entities comprising Americans for Prosperity—sprang from Koch's riches. FreedomWorks rose from the ashes of Citizens for a Sound Economy, an early Astroturf group and think tank he founded during the Reagan years to advocate for lower taxes, less regulation, and smaller government. CSE was rebranded as FreedomWorks in 2004, after a corporate-style merger with Empower America, founded by the late Republican Congressman Jack Kemp to limit government and privatize government services.

That same year, Koch rebranded CSE's foundation as the Americans for Prosperity Foundation and founded its sibling organization, Americans for Prosperity. Koch hired the politically connected Tim Phillips to serve as president of both organizations. (Phillips is a business partner of former Christian Coalition director Ralph Reed in a political consulting firm, Century Strategies, which was implicated, but never charged, in the bribery scandal that sent Jack Abramoff to prison.)

Koch and his allies built the underpinnings for a movement not quite ready to be born. The absent ingredient was rage. But by 2009, with the collapse of the economy and the election of the nation's first African-American president, the supply chain of rage was complete, and the Tea Party came roaring to life. Rupert Murdoch gave the new movement legitimacy by means of sympathetic columns in the Wall Street Journal, boosterism from Sean Hannity and Glenn Beck and a regular media platform on Fox News Channel for Tea Party personalities and candidates. As Jane Mayer remarked in her New Yorker profile of the Kochs, the Tea Party had at last turned their private agenda into a mass movement.

The role of these groups in launching the movement is indisputable. In concert with Glenn Beck's 912 Project, FreedomWorks did the logistical organizing for the first Tea Party march on Washington, in Sept., 2009. Beck launched the 912 Project on his Fox News Channel show, promoted the march on his show and mobilized for it through a social networking Web site built by his production company.

Since then, the groups have been tearing through the Murdoch-Koch agenda. Americans for Prosperity says it convened, through an offshoot, some 300 rallies against health-care reform, and once the healthcare bill was passed in March, the organization quickly moved to block cap-and-trade as a means of regulating carbon emissions. In fact, at an Americans for Prosperity Foundation conference I attended in Pittsburgh in August 2009, cap-and-trade was already being introduced as the next Tea Party battle. This is a longstanding priority for Koch Industries, a major polluter heavily invested in old energy technologies. In a Mar., 2010 report, Greenpeace said that, over the years, the Koch brothers have "quietly funneled" nearly $50 million to "climate-denial front groups that are working to delay policies and regulations aimed at stopping global warming."

Wall Street Journal columnist Stephen Moore—a member of the newspaper's editorial board and a former fellow at the Koch-funded Cato Institute—told the gathering of Tea Party activists he thought global warming was "the greatest hoax of the last 100 years." He called the climate change agenda "not just evil, but...contrary to the free-market system that made this country great."

The Media Storm

It is not unusual for op-ed pages to reflect the bias of an outlet's owners. It is highly unusual, however, for news operations to engage in outright political organizing on behalf of a CEO's agenda. Yet that's just what certain Fox News hosts and Wall Street Journal columnists seem to be doing on behalf of Rupert Murdoch, who is opposed to regulation of any kind, hates taxes, and despises labor unions—having famously broken unions at his U.K. newspapers.

News Corp's best-known personalities accomplish this by working hand in glove with the like-minded ideologues at Americans for Prosperity. Fox News hosts, along with Stephen Moore and fellow Wall Street Journal columnist John Fund, are regular speakers at conferences sponsored by the Americans for Prosperity Foundation. At the group's 2009 RightOnline conference, a third of the plenary speakers were News Corp writers and pundits, including Moore and Fund, as well as Jim Pinkerton and Michelle Malkin, who were paid Fox commentators at the time. Fox News personality John Stossel spoke against health-care reform at three rallies sponsored by Americans for Prosperity, while Sean Hannity, host of a prime-time Fox News show, live-broadcast Americans for Prosperity's 2009 Tax Day protest in Atlanta—and the network preempted regular programming to present it. Moore and Fund also shill for the foundation's anti-regulatory "worker education" project, known as Prosperity101. The door swings the other way as well. By means of his regular presence on Fox's airwaves and column at the FoxNation Web site, Americans for Prosperity vice president Phil Kerpen was instrumental in building the case against Obama green jobs adviser Van Jones, who was ultimately forced to resign his White House post. At last year's RightOnline conference, I asked Americans for Prosperity president Tim Phillips if his group worked in partnership with News Corp, given the presence of so many of its personalities on the roster.

"Not at all, not at all," he replied with a laugh. "The fact is, the Wall Street Journal's my favorite newspaper; I love those guys. I like what they write. I look at Steve Moore and John Fund, and those are two of the smartest guys. But there's no partnership—financially, understood, or anything else."

News Corp enjoys a similarly friendly—if similarly informal—relationship with FreedomWorks. In early October, FreedomWorks was promoting its Take America Back campaign—a get-out-the-vote effort—with a photo of Glenn Beck standing before his iconic blackboard. The FreedomWorks' Web site also featured an audio message from Beck: "I've been sayin' it for weeks. If you care about freedom, you must get involved. If you really want to end tyranny in Washington, you must get involved. And the group you need to find out about is FreedomWorks. ... Take America back—FreedomWorks.org." Just days ago, Beck's image was used in a splash screen to solicit contributions for FreedomWorks' PAC.

To Rupert Murdoch, Glenn Beck is much more than a broadcaster; he's Murdoch's lead community organizer. His show has leached revenue since the civil rights group Color of Change launched a boycott of his advertisers, reportedly chasing away at least 100. But his act is far more profitable to News Corp in another way—by creating the conditions for a stripping away of federal regulations that limit the growth of News Corp and its bottom line. And so Beck's rants become more shrill and his claims more preposterous, whether he is stoking racial fears or recalling that old bogeyman threat of looming socialism—a theme straight out of the John Birch Society, of which the Kochs' father, Fred, was a founding member.

The Campaigns

In Washington, D.C., Adam Brandon, FreedomWorks' communications director, is bubbling over with excitement at the end of a long, hot July day. "I'm racking up the frequent flyer miles," he says of his relentless weekend trips to train Tea Party activists in how to chalk up wins for candidates FreedomWorks' PAC has endorsed. FreedomWorks doesn't aim to elect just any Tea Party candidate to office: as with DeMint's Senate Conservatives Fund, its endorsements seem designed to undermine the current GOP establishment, push the party rightward and further an antiregulatory agenda. Well before others joined in, FreedomWorks embraced far-right insurgencies, notably those of Marco Rubio and Rand Paul. Both endorsements put FreedomWorks at loggerheads with Sen. McConnell, whose candidates—including his hand-picked protégé in his home state of Kentucky—were vanquished.

DeMint's PAC spends hefty amounts on behalf of its endorsed candidates, including $447,000 for Rubio and $95,000 for Paul ($95,000). FreedomWorks matches DeMint's cash with ground forces. The PAC runs an online "service center," where, according to FreedomWorks president Matt Kibbe, Tea Partiers "get the tools they need to turn a protest into a sophisticated, turn-out-the-vote effort." Those tools include walking maps, door-hangers, talking points, and "a sophisticated phone banking system that is going to allow you to make calls in all of our targeted races." If you're an activist in Wisconsin, FreedomWorks can set you up to turn out voters for Rand Paul in Kentucky. Combined, these Tea Party outfits have proven that they have the potential to decide elections.

When I asked whether FreedomWorks' endorsements were chosen in part to undermine McConnell, Brandon declined to answer directly, but his response revealed the intimate ties between his outfit and DeMint's. DeMint has been stalwart on behalf of FreedomWorks' positions, Brandon explained. These include opposition to healthcare and energy reform and labor unions. But DeMint needs more people like him in the Senate in order to create something of a caucus—"a new power center," Brandon called it.

Their combined might was recently on display in Utah, where DeMint and FreedomWorks joined forces to replace incumbent Republican Senator Bob Bennett. DeMint's PAC and FreedomWorks' PAC each rank among the top twelve donors to Bennett's challenger, Tea Partier Mike Lee.

In Utah, candidates must win delegates at their state party convention; primaries take place only if a run-off is needed. So FreedomWorks helped pack the convention with Tea Party-allied delegates, and Lee showed convention-goers a video endorsement by DeMint. Bennett lost his seat that day, coming in third with 26 percent of the vote. (The remainder was split between Lee and another Tea Party candidate.) Lee prevailed in the subsequent two-way primary, with more help from DeMint's PAC, which has spent $315,000 on his behalf, including $184,000 in so-called "independent expenditures," according to FEC filings.

Suppliers and Subsidiaries

While Americans for Prosperity, FreedomWorks and News Corp run the boardroom of Tea Party, Inc., a growing number of national organizations have sprung up to provide a range of services; call them the suppliers. Some have similar names—Tea Party Patriots, Tea Party Nation, Tea Party Express—though they compete ferociously. Reed's Faith & Freedom Coalition provides a unique service to Tea Party Inc.: the promise of delivering religious-right voters to its candidates. Like the big players, these groups, too, are run by former Republican officials or political consultants.

Tea Party Patriots, perhaps the most substantial of these groups, was born of FreedomWorks, as co-founder Jenny Beth Martin points out in a FreedomWorks video, and its state chapters do the on-the-ground organizing for FreedomWorks' agenda. Martin, a former Republican political consultant in Georgia, coordinates the group with Mark Meckler, a Northern California attorney who previously ran an online political consultancy with GOP ties.

More flamboyant is Tea Party Express, another name for Our Country Deserves Better, an anti-Obama PAC founded by Howard Kaloogian, the California attorney who orchestrated the recall of Gov. Gray Davis. The group has already weathered controversy—its spokesperson, radio talk-show host Mark Williams, was forced to exit the organization in July after authoring a demeaning satire of NAACP president Ben Jealous. But Tea Party Express has nevertheless raised $6.6 million this election, according to recent FEC data, making it, in the estimation of the New York Times, "the single biggest independent supporter of Tea Party candidates." And the group has racked up primary victories for Tea Party insurgents such as Christine O'Donnell in Delaware, who benefitted from $250,000 in Tea Party Express ad buys; Joe Miller in Alaska, who beat incumbent Lisa Murkowski with the aid of $550,000 from the group; and Angle, who has enjoyed nearly $1 million in "independent expenditure" advertising by the group, according to FEC filings.

"Sharron Angle, in my opinion, wouldn't have won [the Republican primary] without the Tea Party Express," California Republican consultant and Tea Party organizer Eric Odom told participants in this year's RightOnline conference.

Reed's Faith & Freedom Coalition, which seeks to unite the Tea Party and the religious right, is provides a unique service to Tea Party Inc.: delivery of religious right voters to its candidates. On Sept. 11, Reed brought together a few hundred activists for a strategy briefing at Washington, D.C.'s Mayflower Hotel. The event featured speakers from the GOP's glory days, from Karl Rove to Newt Gingrich. There, Reed instructed activists on how to "move the needle" when the polls are against you.

"We're building databases of faith-based and fiscal conservatives in every key congressional race, U.S. Senate race or governor's race, and a lot of targeted state legislative races," Reed explained. "Those voters are going to be contacted an average of seven times. We're gonna mail 'em, we're gonna phone 'em, if we have an e-mail, we're gonna e-mail 'em, if we have a cell phone number, we're gonna text message them. And at the end, we're gonna knock on their door."

Reed's big announcement of his new Faith & Freedom Coalition took place in Aug., 2009, at an Atlanta rally against health-care reform convened by Americans for Prosperity, the organization fronted by his old business partner, Tim Phillips. FreedomWorks chairman Dick Arney delivered the keynote address, and Fox News contributor Herman Cain made the business case against health-care reform. Phillips couldn't make it to Atlanta that day. He was stuck in Pittsburgh, at his RightOnline conference, rubbing elbows with the stars of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp.

20101026-01

15:46

Dennis

"The Supreme Court Sold Out Our Democracy—How to Fight the Corporate Takeover of Our Elections"

Was the judicial activism of the Roberts Court in Citizens United the result of the majority's ignorance of the law because they never actually read the case history? Or is it more sinister than that?

"The Supreme Court Sold Out Our Democracy—How to Fight the Corporate Takeover of Our Elections" by Joshua Holland, AlterNet

Oct. 25, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148608/>)

Election 2010 is being fought on a wave of campaign dollars unleashed on the American people by the Supreme Court in its Citizens United v. FEC decision. The court, led by a majority of staunch right-wingers, struck down limits on third-party "electioneering" ads based on a tortured interpretation of the First Amendment guarantee of free speech.

Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution scholar, wrote that the decision "will likely go down in history as one of the Supreme Court's most egregious exercises of judicial activism." Rep. Peter Fazio, D-Oregon, told the Huffington Post last week that "the Supreme Court has done a tremendous disservice to the United States of America... They have done more to undermine our democracy with their Citizens United decision than all of the Republican operatives in the world in this campaign." DeFazio said he is "investigating articles of impeachment" against Chief Justice John Roberts for committing perjury when he promised he wouldn't be a judicial activist during his Senate confirmation hearings.

The floodgates are open, and American democracy is at risk. But the decision didn't emerge out of thin air. Rather, it was the culmination of the development, over more than a century, of a bizarre theory of jurisprudence that holds that corporations enjoy the same Constitutional rights as human beings.

For years, it was believed the concept was enshrined in the law by the Supreme Court in 1886, but in his groundbreaking book, Unequal Protection: How Corporations Became People—And How You Can Fight Back, historian and radio host Thom Hartmann revealed that the principle was in fact the result of what may be the greatest corporate fraud ever perpetrated on the American people.

With the first post-Citizens United election looming—and the release of Unequal Protection in paperback—AlterNet caught up with Hartmann to discuss how corporations bought themselves a perverse regiment of civil rights.

Joshua Holland: I'd like to start with a very brief kind of bumper sticker explanation of 'corporate personhood.'

Thom Hartmann: Sure. From the sixth-century English law until today there have been two types of persons under the eyes of the law. The first are natural persons, human beings, and the second are artificial persons—corporations, churches, unions and governments. The reason why there has to be artificial persons is because you have to have some sort of status as a person to be able to own property, pay taxes, enter into contracts, and sue or be sued.

The concept goes back to the sixth century, but it's only in the last 100 years of the United States that anybody has had the weird idea that those artificial persons should be entitled to human rights under the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution.

JH: So BP and Goldman Sachs have the same constitutional rights that you and I enjoy?

TH: Somewhat. They have not yet claimed their Second Amendment rights.

JH: That's a good thing.

TH: But we're waiting. You got Blackwater, actually.

JH: Yes. I would think they'd be the first on that boat.

TH: The point is that through various claims and cases before the Supreme Court, corporations have explicitly claimed First Amendment free speech rights, Fourth Amendment rights of privacy, Fifth Amendment rights against taking and against self-incrimination, and 14th Amendment rights against discrimination.

JH: Now, although it's been with us for a very long time, it wasn't until the 1980s that corporate starting breaking it out with increasing frequency. Can you give us just a couple of examples of where corporations asserted these constitutional rights?

TH: Sure. In short form, in 1874 I believe it was, the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments to the Constitution were passed to free the slaves. The 14th Amendment says that everybody has equal rights under the law.

I think it was clear to the authors, and pretty much to everybody, that they were talking about human beings—natural persons. But in the 1880s, a decade later, the railroad corporations, which, as a result of the Civil War were the largest corporations in America, started bringing a series of cases before the Supreme Court ... they all started in the 9th Circuit Court in California under Judge Steven J. Field, asserting that because the word "natural" does not exist in the 14th Amendment, that corporations should be considered persons.

JH: Now let me just interrupt you here. If I were to go down to a law school and get out the kind of textbook that maybe a first-year law student would read, it would say that the courts had in fact decided that in the case Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad. Is that right?

TH: When I first wrote Unequal Protection—the first edition came out I think in 2000 or thereabouts—I was invited to the Vermont Law School to give a talk on it, and I spoke to about 300 law students, professors and history teachers. And I said raise your hand if you know that in 1886, in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad, corporations were given the rights of persons under the reconstruction-era amendments to the Constitution? And pretty much everybody in the room raised their hand and I think the few who didn't just hadn't gotten to that point in their studies. And then I proceeded over the course of the next hour to demolish it basically by reading from the case.

There was a case before the Supreme Court in the 1980s, called First National Bank of Boston v. Belotti, which was one of the first cases in the modern era that really gave corporations the right to participate in political elections. Massachusetts had this law that said corporations could only give money to ballot initiatives that affected their businesses. But the case involved a ballot initiative to regulate gay marriage, and the banks had no rights to spend money on that—the stockholders' money. And the First National Bank of Boston had broken that law. The Attorney General sued them and won in Massachusetts, and it was taken to the Supreme Court. And in that case, Justice Rehnquist—who, regardless of what you think of him, was one of the most brilliant jurists of our time—wrote a dissent in Boston v. Belotti. And in that dissent—what I'm giving you is my bad paraphrasing of it—Renquist said, "Back in 1886, in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad, this Court, without the benefit of public debate or discourse, decided that corporations have equal rights under the 14th Amendment." Then he went on to say how he thought that it was a wrongly decided case.

Well, it turns out, it wasn't wrongly decided. And even Renquist didn't know it! Forget the law students in Vermont Law School!

JH: Now let's recap the story. You went down to a dusty Vermont courthouse—I don't actually know if it was dusty, I'm just making that up ...

TH: The book was dusty! I don't think anybody had pulled it off the shelf in 100 years.

JH: And you found that what the real deal was. Tell me about that, and also tell me who JC Bancroft Davis is.

TH: Yes. Jack Chandler Bancroft Davis is his name. I started out writing a book about Thomas Jefferson's view of America and how we went off track. How we got off the rails. And I wanted to primary source everything in the book, like a good historian would do. And when I came to the 1800s—when corporations became a major force in America, and led right to the massive accumulations of wealth that were marked the 'Robber Baron Era'—there was a lot of material about how this case had been decided in 1886. And so I thought I ought to read the case so I could quote the exact language. Because nobody was quoting the exact language. Everybody was saying it was decided, but even Renquist in his Belotti dissent didn't quote the exact language.

So I went into Montpelier, Vermont's, old law library and spoke to Paul Donovan, the librarian there. And I said I'm looking for that 1886 case of Santa Clara County v. Southern District Railroad. And he said, 'Oh, the one where corporations became people?' And I said 'Yeah, that one.' And so he finds the book of Supreme Court proceedings from the term of 1886. He pulls it out, blows the dust off the top, and opens it on the table. This was before they started putting acid in paper in the 1930s, so the pages were still in pretty good shape. And he flipped through it, and he found the case, and he said, 'Here's the head note. You can ignore that—that has no legal status.'

And so I sat down and I just read it, all the way through, looking for those magic words that I could put in my book. And they weren't there. In fact, what the case was about was Santa Clara County was charging property tax to the Southern Pacific Railroad. And the way that they calculated property taxes for right of way was by fence posts along the railway. So X number of dollars for every 100 fence posts. And because Santa Ana County was charging a lower rate than Santa Clara County, the railroad was screaming foul, and in fact refused to pay the tax. And this ended up before the Supreme Court. And the railroad made a whole bunch of different arguments. And one of those was that this was illegal discrimination under the 14th Amendment, that they weren't being treated equally under the law by two different counties in the same state.

But the argument that I just described to you was not even referenced in the decision. Because there was a clear and explicit part of California law that gave each county the right to determine their own property taxes. The California law and the California Constitution backed it up.

And at the very end of the case, it basically said that the Court did not feel the need to address those federal Constitutional claims because they were able to find remedies within the California law and in the state Constitution.

JH: So they didn't even consider those arguments, they didn't need to, because they were able to decide the case based on other issues.

TH: Right. One of the core concepts of jurisprudence is minimalism. You always try to—it's called "judicial restraint"—you always try to decide a case as narrowly as possible, and if within that narrow band, you can find the remedy, then you don't go beyond that.

And so I read that, and I went back to Paul, the librarian, and I said "I'm not finding in this case what I thought I'd find. I'm baffled." And he said, "Well, did you read the head note? Maybe that will give you a clue where to find it." You know, as if I'd overlooked something. So I said, "What's a head note?" And he said, "Well, a head note is basically Cliff notes—you know, cheat sheets for lawyers to understand what a case is about without having to read the whole case." They're written by the Clerk of the Court. And so we went back and he found the head note in the book, and I read the head note. And there, a couple of paragraphs into the head note, was this language where the author of the head note, the Clerk of the Court, said he was quoting the Chief Justice of the Court, saying that corporations are persons and entitled to rights under the 14th Amendment.

So I take my 75 cents, or whatever it was, and my copies of the book, and we very carefully copied it on the copy machine there and Paul put it back on the shelf. Then I went around the corner to an old friend who was a lawyer in Montpelier, Jim Deville, and I laid out my copies on his table. And I showed him the language toward the end of the decision. I said, "Okay, here's the argument, here's the argument, here's the argument, here's the language at the end of the decision." And he goes, "Wow! That's not what we learned in law school!"

And so I went back to the head note, and I highlighted that sentence in the head note, and I said, "Well, this is probably what you learned in law school, right?" And he goes, "Holy sh*t!" And I said, "What do you think?" And he said, "Well, this is why they tell you in law school: don't cut corners and just read the head notes."

Because occasionally the head notes are wrong! He said in this case, not only was the head note wrong, it actually contradicted the decision! And I asked him whether it had any legal status. And he said, "No, there was a 1909 Supreme Court decision that explicitly ruled that head notes have no legal status."

JH: Now the Clerk ... let's get back to the Clerk just briefly.

TH: Sure.

JH: So this is JC Bancroft Davis.

TH: That's correct.

JH: Tell me a little bit about what you found out about him when you dug into his story?

TH: Well, that was pretty hard to find. Because to the best of my knowledge nobody had ever done anything about him, or looked into him, other than Davis himself—he had published a number of books. He was quite the dandy. And he was the son of a very wealthy family. His father was the governor of Massachusetts. He had been one of the original incorporators of the New York and Newburgh Railroad, and so he was a railroad guy.

JH: Okay, so basically we're seeing that a lot of what we have taken for granted as legal corporate power, is in a sense a result of what may be the greatest fraud in history.

TH: That's right. And so when I started digging into this, not only did I find out that Davis was questionable—kind of a dicey character—but that this was one of a series of cases, tax cases, that all originated in the 9th Circuit in California, with Steven J. Field, and got kicked up to the Supreme Court, in which every single one of them argued that the 14th Amendment gave corporations personhood.

And in the first few, the Court just rejected out of hand. And that was until 1886. And so we started digging into it, and wondered, who the hell was this Steven J. Field guy?'

Field had basically two allies on the Supreme Court, plus Davis, who had no vote. And so we started digging into the Steven J. Field collection at the National Archives, and we found correspondence between him and the railroads that I don't think anybody had looked at in 100 years, if ever. In some of them, the railroad barons were in some cases implicitly, and in one case rather explicitly saying that if he could get them this corporate personhood, they would sponsor him to run for President of the United States in the election of 1888, I think it was, or maybe 1892. And he didn't actually succeed. In fact, Steven J. Field actually wrote a dissent in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad, in which he loudly complained about the fact that they hadn't established corporate personhood. And you'd think somebody would read the damned thing!! You know?

JH: So we have this ...

TH: What you had was a corrupted Supreme Court, and it had been corrupted by these very, very wealthy and powerful guys who ran the railroads and who were the richest men in America. And you know, that led to what we have now, which is this kind of corporate aristocracy. And there's a direct line between the two.

JH: So let's bring it from the 19th century into the late 20th and 21st. I just want to kind of get a brief sense, if you can give me a couple of examples of how modern multinationals have used this principle in recent years to push back on regulation, etc.

TH: Sure. Nike argued that they had the right to lie in advertising, because they had a 1st Amendment right of speech. That was ultimately, I guess, arguably decided in Citizens United. There was a chemical company that argued that the EPA invaded their 4th Amendment right of privacy by photographing them—from the air—making illegal chemical discharges. There had been a number of cases where giant agricultural operations, toxic waste operations, and large chain stores have argued that keeping them out of a neighborhood or community is the same thing as telling a black person he can't sit at a lunch counter. In other words they claimed their 14th Amendment rights. There have been a number of cases over the years where corporations have claimed that they have the right against self-incrimination.

You know, the original corporate laws, when corporations were created in the early 19th century, their books had to be totally public for the mid part of the 19th century, they had to be totally available to the Secretary of State in each state in which they were incorporated. But since the early 20th century they have been able to claim 4th Amendment privacy rights.

JH: Now, a quick aside. Did you catch a story about the town of Monroe, Maine, rejecting corporate personhood? They passed a local ordinance?

TH: Yes. There have been over 100 communities in the United States that have done this. So yes, there have been a lot of communities that have done this. There has not been a case where a community has made this law and it has been challenged and it has been taken to the Supreme Court. What happens more often is that the communities pass the laws, the corporation comes in and says "Okay, we're going to fight you in court." The community looks at what the legal costs are going to be, and the community then repeals the law. And it's happened numerous times.

JH: Now in your book, you have a chapter on restoring government of, by and for the people. And I think you take a fairly optimistic tone.

TH: I do.

JH: Tell me, what is the basis for that optimism? What are you hoping to see happen? How might we restore government of, by and for natural people?

TH: Right. For natural persons. Well, we had a time in this country when African Americans were not fully people. In fact what's so ironic is that in the Dred Scott decision, the Supreme Court ruled the persons were property. And that was the mirror image of the 2010 Citizens United decision, which ruled that properties can be persons. But over time the idea that African Americans should not have full rights has become unthinkable.

In the early 20th century, if a woman's husband died, she could not dispose of his assets or her assets ... in fact she didn't even have the legal right in most states to decide what religion to raise her child in, or even necessarily to keep her child. A male executor had to be appointed who made all those decisions for her.

And then on top of that there have been times like the late 19th century when the vast mass of working people in the United States have been victims of oppression—we had kind of descended into a Victorian era kind of serfdom, and the response to that was the rise of the Progressive Movement in the 1880s and 1890s. And the labor movements, and the Wobblies, and all this stuff. Which led to the Progressive Era of Teddy Roosevelt, and then to, again, after the Crash in 1929, the Progressive Era of Franklin Roosevelt.

So what I see when I look at the arc of history in the United States is that we're continuously moving upward towards a more egalitarian, healthier, more (small d) democratic republic. And also that there have been a lot of hiccups along the way—lot of setbacks. For example, early in the 20th century, there were a number of cases where the Supreme Court actually struck down minimum wage laws, child labor laws, maximum hour laws—struck all that stuff down, and said that it was a violation of the Commerce Clause.

And I think it was in '36 or '37, when finally enough people on the Supreme Court changed, and Roosevelt was able to start getting into law the things that the Supreme Court, just a generation earlier, had declared unconstitutional. So we've had some major setbacks as a result of the Supreme Court, and as a result of just general public sentiments.

But I think that (small d) democracy ... freedom ... these words are in our DNA as Americans. They're just burnt in there. They're not going to go away. And this oppression of working people by trans-national monopolies—I'm not even going to use the word "corporation"—is I don't believe something that will stand. I think eventually the pain is going to get so bad that the average American is going to say "Now I understand!" We have a long history in this country of people figuring out that something's wrong, and then figuring out how to fix it. So I'm very optimistic actually. There are a lot of people who are trying to solve this problem today. And one of the solutions has been legislative, for example trying to just deal with the First Amendment right of free speech stuff, that was addressed in Citizens United. But I think that that's very dangerous, because it doesn't address the real issue of corporate power. It doesn't address the corporations using the Fourth Amendment, the Fifth Amendment, the 14th Amendment. Similarly, there's a movement by some very well intentioned progressives to amend the Constitution, to specifically say corporations don't have First Amendment free speech rights. And I think that that's dangerous also. Because it not only leaves intact the Fourth, Fifth and 14 Amendment rights that corporations are claiming ... and arguably Sixth, Seventh and Eighth Amendment rights ... but it implicitly recognizes them.

And so I believe that the only way to address this is to amend the Constitution clearly and explicitly to say that the 14th Amendment was intended to free slaves who are natural persons ... and that only natural persons, human beings, have rights under the Bill of Rights, and that corporations are merely the creation of governments. Because they are. They are legal fictions, and they have only those rights and privileges that the individual states decide to give them.

I think if we don't do the whole thing, if we only do it part way, we might end up, at least over a short period of time, worse off than we were, even though we'll think that we had a victory.

(Joshua Holland is an editor and senior writer at AlterNet. He is the author of The 15 Biggest Lies About the Economy (and Everything else the Right Doesn't Want You to Know About Taxes, Jobs and Corporate America.)

20101027-01 15:14 Dennis

Excerpt: The Great American Stick-Up: How Reagan Republicans & Clinton Democrats Enriched Wall Street While Mugging Main Street

A bipartisan wrecking of American capitalism...

from The Great American Stick-Up: How Reagan Republicans and Clinton Democrats Enriched Wall Street While Mugging Main Street, by Robert Scheer, Nation Books

Oct. 27, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148609/>)

Ronald Reagan called her his favorite economist, and Wendy Lee Gramm seemed to deserve the praise. Both while she was an academic economist and after Reagan appointed her to various regulatory positions in his administration, she excelled in articulating antiregulatory rhetoric that marked her as a true believer in what would later be labeled the "Reagan Revolution."

Reagan himself had risen in politics after six years of tutelage as a spokesman for the General Electric Company, from 1954 to 1962. It was a time of conversion, as he described it, from being a "hemophiliac liberal" Hollywood actor to a cold-blooded Big Business conservative. Carrying the company's banner, Reagan came to absorb the message that government regulation developed during the New Deal had become a chokehold on economic growth. Although as governor of California and later in the White House Reagan would preside over massive government budgets and even expand them, he found in Gramm an ideological "small government" soul mate. The Mercatus Center, an anti-regulation think tank based at George Mason University from which Gramm has proselytized mightily, proudly boasts in her website biography that the Wall Street Journal "called her 'The Margaret Thatcher of financial regulation.'"

However, unlike the former British prime minister, neither Gramm nor President Reagan was able to bring about much change in the balance between government and the private sector. While his administration did funnel hundreds of billions of dollars in new Cold War military spending to corporate contractors—hugely expanding the national debt in the process—Reagan was not able to deliver to Wall Street a parallel windfall.

For Wall Street, the holy grail was not cash handouts but a deconstruction of the complex public-private partnership ushered in by Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal to restrain capitalism's most self-destructive patterns. For these so-called FIRE firms—Finance, Insurance, and Real Estate—this half-century-old regulatory system, modest as it was, was an irritant that limited their ability to gamble and leverage their dominant positions.

While the companies just wanted to be free of restraint to profit at will, Reagan and Gramm were true believers, arguing that the regulatory status quo was outmoded and onerous—even socialist—hobbling business growth. The top target in their sights was the New Deal-enacted Glass-Steagall Act of 1933, signed into law by President Roosevelt, which regulated the financial services industry. Key to its effectiveness was the seemingly simple wall it erected between the commercial banks entrusted with depositors' funds—and insured by the government's Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC), the agency created by Glass-Steagall—and the wilder antics of basically unregulated Wall Street investment banks like Goldman Sachs.

In 1982, Reagan signed the Garn-St. Germain Depository Institutional Act, easing regulation of savings and loans and, in the eyes of critics such as Paul Krugman, paving the way for the S&L collapse in the 1980s as well as the subprime housing crisis decades later. Nevertheless, Reagan made clear even then that this was not the biggest target on his list.

Unfortunately, this legislation does not deal with the important question of delivery of other services, including securities activities by banks and other depository institutions. But I'm advised that many in the Congress want to put this question at the top of the banking deregulatory agendas next year, and I would strongly endorse such an initiative and hope that at the same time, the Congress will consider other proposals for more comprehensive deregulation which the administration advanced during the 97th Congress.

Reagan's timeline, however, was overly optimistic; economic problems, particularly the savings and loan meltdown and the spiraling national debt, made politicians of both parties cautious. Yet, in one of the grand twists of American politics, the proposals he sought would eventually be signed into law more than a decade later by a Democratic president with a reputation of being a liberal child of the 1960s. In fact, at the end of Reagan's presidency, Congress passed legislation that toughened rather than weakened financial industry regulation. As Time magazine reported on Aug. 17, 1987:

Ronald Reagan's dream of carrying out a sweeping deregulation of the U.S. economy has stirred a powerful backlash on Capitol Hill. Never has that been more apparent than last week, when Congress passed its first comprehensive piece of banking legislation since 1982. The White House had hoped the bill would remove many of the governmental shackles that inhibit competition between banks, securities firms and other institutions in the burgeoning field of financial services. In fact, it does just the opposite.

Reagan signed the bill, the Competitive Equality Banking Act of 1987, only after criticizing it for not only failing to tear down the Glass-Steagall walls but, worse, temporarily extending "the 1933 Glass-Steagall Act restrictions on securities activities to state-chartered, non-member banks for the first time." He made it clear he was signing the bill despite his quite vociferous objections because it contained provisions for funding for local banks in trouble. It was at once a statement of the enormous importance he attached to decimating Glass-Steagall and an admission that he would come to the end of his last term without accomplishing that goal.

So legislatively his administration was a bust when it came to reversing the New Deal. Yet rhetorically it was an enormous success in propagandizing a view that so-called big government was the cause of America's late-twentieth-century crisis of economic confidence. He managed to popularize and make palatable the heretofore fringe belief that government regulation of the financial sector, rather than saving capitalism from itself, was an irrational hindrance to individual profit and even a threat to our national power. Speaking at the signing of the 1987 bill, Reagan noted, "These new anti-consumer and anti-competitive provisions could hold back a vital service industry at a time when competition in the international capital markets increasingly challenges United States financial institutions, and they should be repealed."

With great political irony, this speech would be repeated almost word for word a dozen years later, when Democrat Bill Clinton reversed a half century of his party's core economic principles to argue for the repeal of Glass-Steagall. Clinton's public rationale for this watershed shift was that if regulation of Wall Street were not "modernized"—political code for weakened or eliminated—the United States would lose out to foreign competition in capital markets.

Much of the groundwork for Clinton's break was laid by the diligent Republican Wendy Lee Gramm and her husband, Senator Phil Gramm, also a Texas Republican. The high priestess and priest of financial deregulation met at a conference in New York, where Wendy Lee, a PhD student in economics, was interviewing with Phil Gramm for a position at Texas A&M University, where he was a senior professor. Wendy Gramm would later tell interviewers that as Professor Gramm was helping her on with her coat at the interview's conclusion, he expressed interest in dating her if she came to Texas. She told the New York Times her response to him was "Oh, yuck," but Gramm persisted, and six weeks after she arrived on campus, they wed.

His bold self-confidence might have helped carry the duo as apostles of an unabashedly Big Business creed then increasingly gaining currency in academic economic circles and within both political parties. Back in 1976, in fact, Jimmy Carter, now known mostly for his postpresidency activism on behalf of Third World democracy, Middle East peace, and ending poverty in America, was a strong advocate of business deregulation. As Georgia's governor, Carter had been a fiscal conservative who, in the tradition of conservative Southern Democrats, shunned Northern liberalism.

Phil Gramm, too, came out of that tradition. After obtaining his doctorate in economics from the University of Georgia in 1967, the year after Carter lost his first bid to be that state's governor, Gramm moved on to Texas A&M and taught economics for twelve years before jumping into politics. Gramm was elected to Congress as a Democrat in 1978; just three years later, he would become the epitome of a "Reagan Democrat" by cosponsoring the Gramm-Latta budget that implemented Reagan's economic program. Proudly, at his retirement from the Senate, Gramm cooed, "in 1981, I wrote the first Reagan budget." Gramm then abruptly resigned from the U.S. House of Representatives on Feb. 12, 1983, forcing a special election for his seat, and the next month was elected to that seat as a Republican. After serving a third term, he completed his meteoric rise by being elected to the Senate in 1984. Until he retired, he would prove to be arguably the most influential Republican on financial issues.

As chair of the Senate's Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee from 1995 to 2000, he was in a position, with Clinton's support, to finally make Reagan's commitment to radical deregulation of the financial markets a reality. This was accomplished with two signature pieces of legislation that he—surely more than anyone else—was responsible for putting into the law books: the Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999 and the Commodity Futures Modernization Act of 2000.

Certainly there were many other legislators and bureaucrats pushing for what was euphemistically called "banking reform." By now the FIRE industries were pumping hundreds of millions of dollars into each major election cycle to lobby both parties to support the reversal of Glass-Steagall's regulatory provisions and similar regulations, and so they had plenty of eager helpers. With union membership on the decline in America, Democrats decided they no longer could let Wall Street money flow in such unequal measure to Republicans; under Clinton's lead, the floodgates of campaign payola were now fully bipartisan.

Senator Gramm's committee status and long-term persistence on the matter, however, gave him alpha status: The legislation that finally would reverse the venerable Glass-Steagall laws would carry his name first: the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act, which would be signed into law as the Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999. However, some years before Glass-Steagall was dismantled, Phil's wife played a key role, as a member of both the Reagan and the Bush I administrations, in shaping the rapid changes in the financial markets brought about by internationalization, computer-driven trading, and the introduction of a whole new discipline of "risk management," whereby Wall Street wizards deployed complex mathematical models to create a vast array of new financial products, such as the now infamous credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations.

As was seen throughout the Reagan and later the Bush I and Bush II administrations, the Republicans had realized they could impose de facto deregulation of Big Business by appointing to influential federal commissions and agencies "watchdogs" who were sympathetic to the corporations they were supposed to be monitoring. Of course, this end run around congressional authority was probably not as satisfying or foolproof as wiping out the regulation altogether, yet it proved quite effective in pleasing CEOs, who had spent the 1970s complaining about red tape and overzealous government investigators.

Thus it was that professional deregulation activist Wendy Gramm came to be appointed by Reagan as chair of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission in 1988, which was the governmental arm most likely to regulate those newfangled investment devices that seemed so much like futures. Gramm, who would never think of questioning any of these clever "modern" gimmicks, saw them as an unmitigated blessing.

Rather than destabilizing the world economy, as they would prove to do two decades later, these products were supposed to be a win-win that would increase market efficiency by bringing order to pricing and the management of risk. Greater productivity, lower prices, and enormous new sources of wealth would inevitably follow. Of course, the top echelon of Wall Street insiders would skim the cream off, but, the argument went, the rest of the country would benefit as well. Not only would the economy be stronger, but American individuals, pension plans, and charities could all ride this dragon skyward, through investments and through donations from the mega-rich looking for tax shelters. It is no accident, then, that in each of the recent economic collapses, from Enron to Bernie Madoff, arose the ever-present laments from charities that were suddenly defunded.

The derivatives and swaps involved buying and packaging financial risk and selling it based on a system of corresponding grades. So a bank might buy up a collection of mortgages or credit card debts from lenders, who could then take this capital to bankroll even more loans. The buyers of this securitized debt would sort and slice it into levels of predicted risk; the more risk, the higher the return, of course. A buyer in this still small but expanding market could then "insure" this risk—for a price.

The end result by the turn of the century was a massive casino in which bettors poured money into huge gambles on expected gain or to hedge against a loss if conditions changed. Think Las Vegas—only this market was unregulated instead of being supervised by government agencies, the same way we regulate bets made on gambling tables or the future price of products such as wheat, pork bellies, or oil on regulated commodity exchanges. Such regulations increase transparency and accuracy in the description of the commodity, the terms of trade in their future, and the accountability of the parties involved.

20101028-01

08:10

SteveB

"The Perils of Privatizing Government" & "The Glenn Beck School of Investing" & "Don't Blame Obama for This Mess"

PLEASE, MY FRIENDS, VOTE! BUT PLEASE VOTE AFTER YOU THINK, NOT BEFORE!

"The Perils of Privatizing Government" by Karen Aho, MSN Money

Oct. 27, 2010, (<http://money.msn.com/investing/the-perils-of-privatizing-government.aspx>)

By now, you've probably heard the story about the Tennessee man whose house was allowed to burn down because he hadn't paid a $75 fire-protection fee. The heart-rending image—firefighters standing by as a family's home is reduced to ashes and four pets die—became instant fodder for a fierce election-year debate over what the government should and shouldn't be doing with public dollars.

With the midterm elections looming and Tea Party candidates stumping for drastic cuts in government spending, their foes held out the Tennessee fire as a glaring example of the perils of privatization. "This is essentially the same as denying someone essential medical care because he doesn't have insurance," economist Paul Krugman blogged for The New York Times. "So the question is, do you want to live in the kind of society in which this happens?" On the other side, most of the logic went this way: If the firefighters had saved the home anyway, who'd ever pay the fee again? "I know that if I opted out of the program before, I would be more likely to opt-in now," Jonah Goldberg wrote on National Review Online. It's not as if people aren't aware of the potential problems of privatization. After 9/11, the nation decided airport security couldn't be left in the hands of poorly paid private screeners. The high cost—in dollars and human life—of outsourcing operations to contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan has been painfully clear for years.

But as the recession drags on and governments sink deeper into the red, it's easy to be swept up in the call for government to do less. That's until a picture of what that might look like emerges: public firefighters, in uniform and with hoses in hand, doing nothing.

The public-private debate

Privatization, broadly defined as any transfer of a government service to a private company, is used at every level of government and often with positive results. It can involve work contracted out but paid with city dollars, or fees paid by the users of, say, a service or a roadway.

In the Tennessee fire, a city department responded to the call. But the home was outside the city, where residents were required to pay a fee for service—akin to a privatized model.

Privatization is almost as old as cities themselves. The ancient Greeks and Romans raised funds by auctioning off the right to serve the public for a profit. Privatization in the U.S. is nothing new either, but it had been largely abandoned by the mid-20th century in favor of a growing public sector.

"In the 19th century, New York City used to experiment with privatizing street cleanup. It was always cheaper to privatize, but the streets didn't get clean," says Elliott D. Sclar, a professor of urban planning at Columbia University and the author of "You Don't Always Get What You Pay For: The Economics of Privatization." "Finally, by the 1890s, they had thrown up their hands."

The history of fire protection is similar. "In the 19th century, cities used to burn down with private fire companies," Sclar says, so they went public.

The basic concept—protecting the common good by protecting each individual—has been applied to schools, libraries, fire and police service, trash collection, transportation, infrastructure, health care, social services and more. The success of these services is credited with laying the foundation for a prosperous American middle class with an innovative industrial base.

But as the backlash against "big government" grew in the 1970s and '80s, privatization re-emerged. By 2007, half of all local governments said they had considered privatizing some services, with nearly 90% citing cost-cutting as the reason, according to the International City/County Management Association. Name a public service today, and somewhere a private CEO is running it: prisons, schools, parks, trash collection, welfare centers, mass transit.

Proponents say the profit motive inspires companies to innovate, streamline and cut costs. The Reason Foundation, a libertarian think tank, says privatization typically reduces costs between 5% and 20%. A good chunk of those savings comes in the form of reduced labor costs. Today, 30% of public-sector workers are unionized, typically receiving pensions, good health benefits and better-than-average pay. Just 7% of the private sector is unionized. (Public-sector unions also tend to support Democrats—another reason privatization is a big issue for the largely Republican Tea Party movement.)

"Oftentimes it's about breaking unions," says Dean Baker, a co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research, a progressive Washington, D.C., think tank. "Insofar as you can get a lower-cost work force, you can get savings."

Cutting costs by driving down wages

Like many public agencies, Jackson County, Ore., considered the bottom line when it tried to reopen its 15 library branches, shuttered after a loss of federal funds in 2007. While negotiating with the county workers union, it put management of the libraries out for bid.

Library Systems & Services, the only private company to bid, won the contract with a bid that cut costs by about 40% over what the union had proposed. With library hours reduced, the company rehired 70 of the 110 laid-off library members, at their same salaries but with reduced benefits, says Amy Blossom, the manager of the Ashland branch.

An analysis by the Oregon State Library found that while overall library staffing in Jackson was reduced by 36%, the number of librarians was reduced by 52% and the number of those with advanced degrees—common for the position—by 57%.

This net result—lowered compensation overall and fewer benefits—is typical with privatization, according to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, a union. "It's certainly been one of the factors in the growing inequality" between rich and poor that led to the recession, Baker says. "You get rid of those jobs, you put more downward pressure on the wages of other jobs."

Critics also say there's no guarantee that work will be done less expensively, or better, with privatization. In fact, the accounting books at private companies often remain closed. Jackson County, while happy with Library Systems & Services, has no idea exactly how the company is spending tax dollars. (The company declined to comment for this story.)

That veil of secrecy can be costly. Consider the case of New York City's hiring of computer consultant Science Applications International for a project called CityTime. After more than a decade, there's no end in sight, and the New York Daily News reported recently that more than 400 consultants on the project have billed the city an average of $400,000 a year. The city's controller is looking into why a project that was supposed to cost $68 million has cost more than $700 million, the newspaper reports.

Asked to comment for this story, Science Applications provided written statement saying: "CityTime is working now for 73,000 employees with a 99.9 percent accuracy rate and SAIC is eager to have the system up and running in the remaining agencies once those agencies give us the green light. We believe CityTime brings a great value and savings to New York City taxpayers and we are pleased to help ensure its completion."

Ironically, the project was for equipment to prevent time-clock abuses by city employees.

Privatization "is a very mixed bag. Just because something is done in the private sector doesn't mean it's done more cheaply," says Baker, particularly once you factor in "highly paid executives."

"A government that's incompetent to deliver a service is not going to be any more competent to monitor a contractor," Sclar adds.

Get rid of government?

Even when privatizing services does save money, the question remains: How far do we want to go? Privatization purists say taxpayer dollars should never help pay for programs that would not turn a profit in the private sector or where there's a private alternative. Some Tea Party candidates have gone as far as calling for privatization of Social Security and Medicare, the nation's biggest social programs.

Take Amtrak. Experts think half of its routes would be profitable if run by private companies, says Chris Edwards, an economist and the editor of Downsizing the Federal Government, an online guide of the libertarian Cato Institute. The routes that wouldn't be profitable—largely in rural areas and outside the Northeast—"don't make any sense and shouldn't be run," he says.

"I don't think anything should be off limits," he says. He'd like to see the Federal Aviation Administration—essentially the police of the skies—privatized, along with airports. The media and federal accounting office could monitor operations, but ultimately customers would drive performance. If Dulles International Airport in the Washington, D.C., area hired a lousy security company, passengers would be more likely to use nearby Reagan National Airport instead, Edwards says.

Another area ripe for privatization: highways and toll lanes, something that's already being done in some areas. Let private companies raise capital and charge fees, and if you can't pay, slum it on the public pavement. [Often this does not work as well. —SteveB]

Life in second class

But how much of this would the public stand for?

Sure, we'll accept first class in the skies. In fact, bizarre pricing gaps among travelers make flying affordable for the average Joes in the sardine cabin (see "The secrets behind crazy air-travel prices"). But should there be two classes of airport security, two classes of fire protection, two classes of public safety? And what happens when those paying to drive on private roads get tired of paying a gas tax to support public roads? It can be annoying to pay both, Edwards concedes.

When Sclar, whose work takes him around the globe, lectures on privatization, he shows slides of what he calls "the transportation of the rich in São Paulo, Brazil, and the United States." The first slide shows a helicopter, the safe mode of transport in Brazil, where public services have been heavily privatized and public areas are often unsafe. The second shows a New York City taxi—a very democratic mode of transportation. "When you don't have good municipal services, societies break down," Sclar says. "The social costs of that can be enormous over time."

So when do you let it burn?

The Tennessee fire has helped put the high-level debate into perspective. When city officials ordered the firefighters of South Fulton, Tenn., not to put out Gene Cranick's fire, their reasons made good business sense: If you provide a service for free, no one will pay. But was it the right decision for a community?

As Cranick mourned his losses, strangers across the country called him a freeloader, an ingrate and a jerk. Firefighters from other departments said that the South Fulton officers should be ashamed of themselves. After the fire, one of Cranick's relatives went to the fire station and reportedly assaulted the chief.

Even privatization proponents hedged. "The Obion County fire seems a clear example of government failure, not market failure," wrote Thomas Firey for the Cato Institute. "It's not difficult to imagine what a private fire service would do in an event like the Obion fire: It likely would extinguish the blaze and then send the homeowner a bill."

On the National Review Online, writer David Foster suggested this right business decision may not have been the moral one. Others said the fire was not a good example of privatization anyway: When the subsidized city department entered the market, it unfairly blocked out competitors.

But even in an entirely free market, the question would remain: When your neighbor's home is burning, do you have a responsibility to help, or do you let it burn for a lack of a fee?

Or perhaps, if you're not paid up, we just assume you're not really a neighbor. That's what one poster at The Agonist seems to suggest, blaming Cranick for not having just paid the fee and adding, "Jeebus people, step up and be part of the community already."

[GLENN BECK SAYS HE'S "NOT A JOURNALIST". HE SAYS HE'S "NOT A FINANCIAL ADVISER". WHAT IS HE THEN? JUST A MAN WITH A GOOD MONEY-MAKING SCHEME!—SteveB]

"The Glenn Beck School of Investing" by Karen Aho, MSN Money

Aug. 26, 2010, (http://groups.google.com/group/alt.politics/browse_thread/thread/46f4ad3e479634e2)

(Conservative talk-show host Glenn Beck doesn't claim to be a money expert, but he does dispense a lot of financial advice. Are gold and seeds good places to put your cash?)

Glenn Beck likes to worry, and one of the things he's worried about is your money.

As the conservative talk-show host sees it, progressives are wrapping up a decades-long plot to supplant the capitalist system with a godless, Marxist state, one where entrepreneurship, stock prices—in fact, your entire financial future—may as well be in a coma.

If that's not enough, there's rising debt and inflation to worry about, along with natural disasters, social programs and terrorist attacks. Sometimes, Beck worries himself to tears.

Although there's a lot of fun to be had mocking the radio and television personality's on-air theatrics (Beck gets into the act, touting himself as the "crying conservative") and apocalyptic advice (stock the fruit cellar), there's no laughing at the very real anxiety he taps into.

His predictions, after all, are just a few steps beyond those of such respected economists as Nouriel Roubini—the one they call Dr. Doom.

In Beck's case—and no, he doesn't call himself a financial adviser—it's not a stretch to envision an avid listener ending up with a cupboard of seeds, a pantry of dehydrated food and a stack of gold coins bought in part by cashing in a 401k (something Beck has said he's done).

It's that last idea that financial experts find worrisome. Here's Beck during a Fox News broadcast last year: "How much did you lose if you had any money in your 401k? Did you lose, let's say, I don't know, 40% of it? So, that's gone. Now, did you know that the dollar has lost nearly 29% of its value in the last seven years? 29%. OK, that's gone. Just gone."

Beck is right that 401k's took a beating in the 2008-09 market meltdown, but since the rally that began in Mar., 2009, stocks have regained about 60% of their value. Inflation, however, averaged just 2.51% a year from 2002 to 2009, for a 19% loss in the dollar's value.

But no mind. Although the facts may be off, the underlying sense of peril remains. And for those fears, Beck offers his vast audience—now about 30 million strong across his media platforms—plenty of prescriptions.

They range from the specific ("Buy this book today") to the vague ("Be prepared"), with seemingly contradictory switchbacks along the way ("Now may be the perfect time to buy gold," but on another day, "You don't listen to me for financial advice, don't").

Despite the twists, plenty of people do follow. When the Beck effect can be measured, it is profound. His recommendations can yank even a dry economic tome up to No. 1 in sales, sending publishers into frenzied reprints and Beck into that lofty sphere of media influence previously occupied only by Oprah Winfrey.

When Goldline International, a California gold coin seller, began advertising with Beck in 2008, the private company was generating $275 million in annual revenue. Two years later, revenue had nearly doubled, to $523 million, says the company.

So Beck is clearly good for his sponsors. (Or those that remain. More than 100 have left since Beck called President Barack Obama a racist; religious leaders called for a boycott after Beck equated social justice with Nazism.)

But is following his advice good for your money? Do his suggestions and product endorsements—they can be hard to separate—make good financial sense?

Advice for a 'crazy world'

Beck broadcasts for four hours every weekday, three on a syndicated radio show that reaches 9 million listeners in a week and one on Fox News, where 2.06 million TV viewers tune in daily. He posts an additional one-hour recap on his website, appears on colleagues' shows and speaks at his own "American Revival" rallies and comedy shows. It's a lot of talking.

Most of the talk is anti-administration political commentary—often with Beck playing teacher at a blackboard—that leans heavily on conspiracy theory and religion. Although he's seen on a television channel with "news" in its title—and at the prime news hour of 5 p.m.—Fox News classifies Beck's show as opinion, not news. Beck himself says he aims to "enlighten and entertain."

Though he doesn't claim to be a financial expert, Beck uses some of his ample airtime to give money advice.

Of course, other conservative hosts draw equally wide multimedia audiences. But Beck is the most fervent among them when it comes to suggesting that some kind of "economic apocalypse"—a phrase he's written on his chalkboard—is near and in admonishing his guests to take specific actions to "prepare for the worst," a powerful one-two punch for a listener assessing his own financial portfolio.

At the Glenn Beck Program Web site, Beck's face adorns most ads, all of which appear plucked from the Doomsday Times. Recently those included an encrypted computer backup system ($55 a year), a survivalist newsletter (free), an emergency solar generator ($1,697), non-hybrid seeds to plant a "full acre crisis garden" ($149) and "food insurance," a two-week supply of freeze-dried food in a backpack ($200) that Beck says is "great stuff."

"We live in a crazy world. I live in a nuts town," Beck says in a promotional video on the Food Insurance website, gesturing toward ground zero from his midtown Manhattan office.

"You just want to be able to have some peace of mind," he continues, in a soft, reassuring tone. "Do the easy stuff now. Prepare yourself for what we all hope won't happen but probably will if you're not prepared."

The survivalist bent sounds more like Mormon teaching than financial advice. (Beck joined the church, which encourages food storage in preparation for disasters, during his drug and alcohol recovery in 1999.)

The ads dovetail nicely with Beck's commentary, in which he forebodes an "economic apocalypse" and prescribes a "3-G system" for protection: "God, gold and guns."

Combined, this all helps fuel sales of another product Beck endorses as "insurance," one that offers listeners an opportunity to drop some serious cash: gold.

All that glitters

On his TV show on May 19, Beck held two gold coins in his hands, scribbled figures on a chalkboard and said of gold's value: "It doesn't change with inflation. It never has."

Gold comes in many forms for investors, and plenty of experts have recently been touting the metal, an age-old hedge against market uncertainty. But what's in Beck's hand is telling: His programming leads listeners toward coins, particularly so-called collector coins with high markups that limit any investment value. (Read "Should you buy gold coins?")

In an ad for Rosland Capital, one of several sponsors of Beck's Fox News show, fellow talk-show host and former Watergate operative G. Gordon Liddy tells viewers to invest in gold. He then clinks several coins in his hand and says, in booming staccato: "That's the sound of security. That's the sound—of gold."

In a report issued in May, Rep. Anthony Weiner, D-N.Y., called the pairing of such ads with hosts who habitually predict a plummeting dollar and economic collapse an "unholy alliance" that preys on public fears to sell overpriced coins.

Beck cried victim in behalf of all gold bugs, as fans of the precious metal are called.

Without addressing the consumer-protection issues—allegations of misleading sales techniques and false representations as investment advisers—Beck got out his chalkboard and outlined the government's underlying conspiracy: "They've got to have your money."

If people buy gold, they're less likely to invest in government bonds and Treasuries—money the government can spend, Beck said. The government's creation of Treasury inflation-protected securities, or TIPS, in the 1980s, he said, was an effort to steer individuals away from gold.

"They realized that if we have problems, people take their money out of bonds and put it into gold or silver or precious metals. When you do that, you then are in control of your wealth, and they lose money," Beck said.

"This is not about me or anybody else," he said, also on May 19. "This is about shutting down another way for you to protect yourself."

Advertising or advocacy?

Beck, through his production company, and Fox News declined interviews for this story. Goldline's vice president, Scott Carter, who agreed to one, says Beck is simply delivering its radio advertisements. "We're buying an advertising spot. Some are taped; some are live reads," Carter says. "It's a pretty standard advertising agreement."

Those blurred lines are standard radio technique, and the difference can be tough for listeners to parse. Beck is careful to tell listeners to do their own homework, to "study it out," even "to pray on it," before deciding whether gold or another product is right for them.

But he also might go on for three minutes, a long time for an ad, mentioning how his own family cashed out some 401k's to buy gold. "It's not right for everybody," he'll say. "Find out if it's right for you and your family."

(Goldline also advertises with Beck in other media, but it's on the radio where the distinctions fade.) But listening to Beck's homey, fireside voice, it can be easy to forget that his family's financial portfolio is probably not at all like yours.

"He's very, very good at connecting to his audience," says Alexander Zaitchik, an investigative journalist who spent a year researching Beck's life for the biography "Common Nonsense: Glenn Beck and the Triumph of Ignorance." "He's very sort of vulnerable and effeminate in ways that (his peers) aren't."

Beck's production company, Mercury Radio Arts (named in honor of Orson Welles' Mercury Theatre on the Air), pulled in $32 million in the year ending Mar. 1, 2010, according to Forbes. He uses bodyguards, flies in a private jet and has multimillion-dollar homes in Connecticut and New York City.

Beck also has a "bottomless audacity" to "make bold claims about things that he knows nothing about," Zaitchik says. "Facts don't matter."

A financial adviser's advice

In the past two years, financial adviser Eric Tyson has been hearing from more and more people who begin their question with "Glenn Beck said."

So Tyson, the author of "Personal Finance for Dummies" and "Investing for Dummies," started looking at the financial advice Beck was proffering beyond the advertisements. He even landed the near impossible for anyone outside the conservative media circuit: an interview with Beck.

Beck's investing score, says Tyson: 0 for 3. "He was basically telling people, 'Sell your stocks, get out of municipal bonds and Treasury bills, and put all your money in gold,'" Tyson says. "He gave all this advice, and toward the end of his interview, he says, 'People shouldn't listen to me.' OK, then why are you doing this?"

In fact, says Tyson: Municipal bonds have excellent advantages for people in high tax brackets, and they're extremely unlikely to fail. Gold is not nearly the long-term performer that either stocks or Treasuries are. And, well, when stocks are down, you buy, not sell.

"From my analysis from a year ago, that was horrible advice," Tyson says, adding that in the year after the Mar., 2009 interview, stocks rose 70% and gold 20%. "That's no contest."

"I had no crystal ball to know that stocks were going to rise 70%," he adds. "But I did know, as a student of the market, that they'd come back, even if you think the world's going to end."

To be sure, gold has outperformed stocks since the end of 1999, gaining 329% while the S&P 500 Index ($INX) lost 28%. But longer term, stocks have held the edge. Since Jan. 2, 1980, when trading in gold futures began, gold is up 115% while the S&P 500 has soared 890%.

As for Beck's theory that TIPS are a government effort to steer people away from gold: "Ridiculous," Tyson says. "It's just another investment option."

Beck has no apparent training in finance, say experts, and claims none. He began in radio as a precocious 13-year-old, bypassing formal higher education (apart from one unfinished theology class at Yale University) in favor of on-the-job training at suburban radio studios. Adding a political voice later boosted his talk-show ratings.

Beck has said that his own financial advisers rein him in when it comes to buying gold, limiting it to "15, maybe 20%" of his portfolio.

"People get into trouble when they start taking advice from people who don't know what they're talking about," Tyson warns. "You've got to separate politics from personal investing and finances."

"Don't Blame Obama for This Mess" by Anthony Mirhaydari, MSN Money

Oct. 27, 2010, (<http://www.bundle.com/article/dont-blame-obama-for-mess/>)

(For all the heat the president has taken for the economy, he has gotten some things right. And regardless of Tuesday's vote, history says we're in for an upswing.)

To be sure, President Barack Obama is receiving the lion's share of the anger about the state of the U.S. economy. His approval rating is near its all-time low; his handling of the economy is rated even lower.

That's understandable: Unemployment stands near 10%, home prices continue to founder, job growth has stalled, and consumer confidence is falling again. Just 22% of those polled by CBS News recently believed the economy would improve anytime soon. And with the midterm elections less than a week away, there's a flock of opposition candidates to help the electorate focus on Obama's shortcomings. But how much of the blame he deserves for this economic malaise is debatable.

Though Obama inherited a mess, there are certainly things he could have done differently. More of his $787 billion stimulus package might have focused on fast-acting personal and business tax cuts. Obama himself conceded recently that "there's no such thing as shovel-ready projects," in reference to the infrastructure spending he proposed to stir the economy. And yes, he could have toned down the anti-Wall Street rhetoric.

But Obama, and Congress, have been positive forces. And other presidents, including Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, had lower economic approval ratings heading into midterm elections. Reagan's approval rating stood at 35% in Sept., 1982, while Bush's stood at 36% in summer 1990. Gallup most recently put Obama's rating at 38%. Bill Clinton managed a 39% approval rating in Oct., 1994, according to CBS News.

So while the electorate appears determined to punish Obama and the Democrats, it's not so clear how much punishment they deserve.

The Obama upside

In fact, some facets of Obama's economic strategy deserve credit.

The recession officially ended more than a year ago. Nearly 1.6 million jobs have been created over the past year—more than in the previous decade. The effects of the financial crisis of 2007-09 are fading as credit starts to flow again. Despite long odds, the economy was pulled back from the precipice, dusted off and put back on an upward path thanks to the bank bailout (which turned a profit for taxpayers, by the way) and Obama's stimulus package.

Between summer 2009 and spring 2010, in fact, the situation was almost rosy. Consumers were reducing debt burdens. Banks were working through loan losses. Businesses were rebuilding inventories. The stock market was roaring.

Then the global debt crisis struck. And the BP (BP, news, msgs) oil spill. And the government's lawsuit against Goldman Sachs (GS, news, msgs). The U.S. dollar moved higher as the euro plunged. This took the wind out of the U.S. economy's sails, sent stocks reeling and damaged exporters. Businesses hoarded cash instead of hiring and investing. The Obama administration's "summer of recovery" looked more like a winter of discontent.

This punch in the collective stomach came at a vulnerable time: The economy was going through a typical mid-cycle slowdown as the rapid rebound from the recession's low transitioned into slower, more normal growth. But before business investment and consumer spending could kick in, confidence was shattered. There was little a politically weakened Obama could do besides scramble.

Along with all this short-term trouble, the truth set in that some of the biggest issues the economy faces, such as long-term unemployment, are due to structural problems—something I discussed in a recent column. These issues will be much harder and take much longer to fix.

Included are things such as skill mismatches, the loss of productivity for idled workers and the difficulties involved with relocating the nation's work force when so many homeowners are "underwater" on their mortgages and can't afford to sell and move. A recent International Monetary Fund paper finds that up to 1.3% of the increase in the unemployment rate is attributable to this last factor alone. All that means the "natural rate" of unemployment could now be as high as 6.5%. That's the bad news.

Fortunately, it's becoming increasingly clear that after drifting through the economic doldrums, America is ready to grow again thanks to the export-boosting power of its weakened currency. The dollar has plunged more than 25% against the euro since June. That should provide a boost to third-quarter gross domestic product numbers (due to be released Friday) and job creation in the months to come, just as a weakened euro helped Europe bounce back earlier this year.

Moreover, as far as the stock market is concerned, elections during a president's second year in office tend to mark the start of a rip-roaring bull market run. That should provide a boost throughout 2011.

The Obama downside

None of this will come fast enough to keep Democrats from being punished at the polls next week. Obama owns the current economy in the minds of voters. It didn't help that his advisers had sworn his stimulus plan would keep the jobless rate below 8% but were painfully wrong.

There are certainly areas where Obama has damaged the recovery, mainly because of uncertain policies on taxes and regulation. For example, his predecessor's tax cuts will expire at the year's end, and we don't know what will replace them. That's a terrible environment in which to do business and make big spending decisions.

These are same concerns that sapped confidence in the depths of the Great Depression in the 1930s. And that's what has Allan Meltzer so worried.

Meltzer, a Carnegie Mellon University professor of political economy and the author of "A History of the Federal Reserve," told me over the phone that he believes the current obsession with more economic stimulus from the Fed (something he views as dangerously foolish) is the result of policy errors by the White House. Indeed, he boils it down to a simple equation: Obama's missteps are causing Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's missteps.

Meltzer believes more fiscal stimulus is the answer. He suggests a moratorium on tax increases and new regulation. That would let businesses and households stop worrying about increased costs for energy, health care or financing and instead focus on growth. It would also take a lot of uncertainty off the table.

He also sees parallels to Franklin D. Roosevelt's anti-business rhetoric of the late 1930s in Obama's railing against the excesses of Wall Street "fat cats." Some of this has been pure politics; the bailed-out bankers at the center of the financial meltdown aren't a popular group. But Obama's broadsides have turned off a much broader segment of the business community.

The big question for Meltzer is whether Obama can move to the political center with both his rhetoric and his policies. And for that, the composition of the next Congress will play a big role.

Why this isn't 1994

Currently, the Intrade prediction market puts the odds of a Republican takeover of the House at a solid 88%. The odds of a GOP Senate victory stand at 58% but have been slipping since August.

With the Democrats poised to lose at least one house of Congress, it will become effectively impossible for Obama to pass sweeping legislation on energy or labor practices, or a new stimulus package that focuses on spending. This would greatly reduce the uncertainty about new regulatory burdens on businesses and households. That's good news from an uncertainty perspective—frequently cited as a reason for lackluster hiring by the private sector.

This outcome would also increase the likelihood that the George W. Bush tax cuts would be extended for everybody, including the rich. Many would disagree with that policy, but it's a plus at least in terms of eliminating another uncertainty.

But there's also a risk that Republicans will damage the recovery with an overzealous focus on the budget and the national debt. As discussed in my column last week—"Could the Tea Party save the economy?"—the rise of that movement may force the Republican Party to prematurely focus on fiscal consolidation. Already, the slow withdrawal of stimulus-package spending will subtract 0.5% worth of GDP growth in 2011.

Economist Aneta Markowska at Société Générale warns of parallels to the big Republican victory in the 1994 midterms. Although the election forced Clinton toward the center and focused the government on trimming the deficit, the economy was much more robust then and was able to handle the strong medicine of tax increases and spending limits. We were in the early days of the debt-fueled growth story that helped inflate the tech and housing bubbles. We don't have that tailwind now. In Markowska's words, the "private sector is suffering from an acute demand shortage." If the government cuts spending now and consolidates its finances prematurely, the economy could tip back into a recession.

There are solutions. For one, the fact the U.S. Treasury sold $10 billion worth of inflation-protected bonds for a negative interest rate of—0.55% on Monday is a sign that plenty of borrowing capacity remains. Thanks to ultralow interest rates, the government is spending the least on interest payments since the mid-1970s.

This leaves room for additional short-term fiscal stimuli, most likely in the form of full extension of the Bush tax cuts—which, if removed altogether, would shave 2% off 2011 GDP growth, or 0.5% if they expired for just the rich, according to Markowska's estimate. By keeping them in place, taking into account the steady withdrawal of the $787 billion American Recovery and Reinvestment Act, the economy would receive a boost of 1.5% next year.

Other possibilities, with bipartisan support, include restoring and making permanent a research-and-development tax credit that expired last December—something that was proposed by Obama in September. Extension of emergency unemployment benefits is another likely candidate.

But all this presumes the two parties can put aside the past two years of bad blood, which is an exercise in optimistic thinking.

The presidential cycle

And what does Election Day portend for investors and the stock market?

Whatever happens to Obama, the Tea Party and Congress, history suggests stocks should post impressive gains in the third year of a presidency. This makes sense, since the president is motivated to get a flagging economy going again before standing for re-election in less than two years.

In fact, according to Jeffery Hirsch and the team behind the Stock Trader's Almanac, there hasn't been a down year in the third year of a presidential term since 1939, when Hitler was marching into Poland. Most bear markets occur during the first or second years after a presidential election. Then prices typically turn higher.

Here's the exciting part: The fourth quarter of the midterm year and the first quarter of the pre-election year are the "sweet spot" in the four-year presidential cycle. Since 1949, the average gain in this period has been 14.4% for the Dow Jones Industrial Average ($INDU). For the Nasdaq Composite Index ($COMPX), it's been a whopping 24% since the exchange was founded in 1971.

Hirsch believes these trends will be particularly strong this time because Obama will be fighting an uphill battle into the 2012 election. That will help grease the wheels of the legislative process. Democrats will need to work more effectively with their Republican colleagues on new stimulus ideas. And Republicans, no longer entirely a minority power, will want to engage and show progress on their new mandate. Expect common ground to be found on infrastructure investments and tax cuts.

Either way, and assuming there isn't another Greek-style financial tragedy looming, these efforts should go a long way toward restoring both the economy and Obama's approval numbers.

20101028-02 13:34 SteveB Re: The Great American Stick-Up

A true partial history of how and why America failed to grow (except in debt and poverty) and take her rightful place among the first echelon of nations in the 21st Century, as well as why the middle-class was decimated and Wall Street failed, necessitating that famous, foul "bail-out".

But, of course, all our current, deep and maybe deepening problems are Obama's fault or the fault of what Republicans like to call "socialism". What a crock!

20101101-01 14:19 Dennis "The Scary Actual U.S. Government Debt"

Contemplate the following when you consider the proposal for a new tax on the 1%:

from "The Scary Actual U.S. Government Debt", by Laurence Kotlikoff, Globe and Mail

Oct. 28, 2010, (<http://www.montrealanalyst.com/node/38>)

Boston University economist Laurence Kotlikoff says U.S. government debt is not $13.5-trillion (U.S.), which is 60 per cent of current gross domestic product, as global investors and American taxpayers think, but rather 14-fold higher: $200-trillion—840 per cent of current GDP. "Let's get real," Prof. Kotlikoff says. "The U.S. is bankrupt."

Writing in the September issue of Finance and Development, a journal of the International Monetary Fund, Prof. Kotlikoff says the IMF itself has quietly confirmed that the U.S. is in terrible fiscal trouble—far worse than the Washington-based lender of last resort has previously acknowledged. "The U.S. fiscal gap is huge," the IMF asserted in a June report. "Closing the fiscal gap requires a permanent annual fiscal adjustment equal to about 14 per cent of U.S. GDP."

This sum is equal to all current U.S. federal taxes combined. The consequences of the IMF's fiscal fix, a doubling of federal taxes in perpetuity, would be appalling—and possibly worse than appalling.

Prof. Kotlikoff says: "The IMF is saying that, to close this fiscal gap [by taxation], would require an immediate and permanent doubling of our personal income taxes, our corporate taxes and all other federal taxes.

"America's fiscal gap is enormous—so massive that closing it appears impossible without immediate and radical reforms to its health care, tax and Social Security systems—as well as military and other discretionary spending cuts."

He cites earlier calculations by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) that concluded that the United States would need to increase tax revenue by 12 percentage points of GDP to bring revenue into line with spending commitments. But the CBO calculations assumed that the growth of government programs (including Medicare) would be cut by one-third in the short term and by two-thirds in the long term. This assumption, Prof. Kotlikoff notes, is politically implausible—if not politically impossible.

One way or another, the fiscal gap must be closed. If not, the country's spending will forever exceed its revenue growth, and no one's real debt can increase faster than his real income forever.

Prof. Kotlikoff uses "fiscal gap," not the accumulation of deficits, to define public debt. The fiscal gap is the difference between a government's projected revenue (expressed in today's dollar value) and its projected spending (also expressed in today's dollar value). By this measure, the United States is in worse shape than Greece.

(Prof. Kotlikoff is a noted economist. He is a research associate at the U.S. National Bureau of Economic Research. He is a former senior economist with then-president Ronald Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers.)

20101101-02 16:15 Pam Trip to Stanford Reunion

Dear SteveB,

I feel like a lot has happened since I last wrote to you. We went to California for Mark's 40th Stanford reunion, which I was not really looking forward to. Boy, was I surprised! I had a fabulous time. Stanford is absolutely beautiful, a world unto itself. Everyone I met was so smart and nice. I got into great conversations with the women next to me in line for the rest room, to say nothing of longer conversations with Mark's classmates. I never experienced anything like it. The whole weekend was filled with intellectually stimulating talks, classes, and social gatherings. Plus, the food was great and there was a full bar everywhere we went.

We also went to Napa and Sonoma, where we toured wineries, stayed in a great B&B, and had a great dinner with Mark's brother and girlfriend. Kirk lives in El Cerito, a "suburb" of San Francisco. He lent us his red Mitsubishi sports car to tootle around in, which was wonderful until a sparkler broke. (I swear that's what it was called.) We had to call AAA for a tow. Not great, but the only real glitch we encountered.

Now I am home (and happy to be so) and thinking about the election tomorrow. I fear a Republican sweep. If that happens, I dread the catastrophe that will ensue. I HATE the Tea Party. I HATE the Republican party, yadda, yadda, yadda. You've heard me on this before. Is it because I'm older and more aware, or are things really in a desperate state? Most people are stupid, even if we pretend otherwise. Big money controls everything, though we claim to be a democracy. We are living through an intense time of paradigm shift, which is never easy. Progress is stymied by the entrenched past, and ignorance is abroad in the land. I am bitterly disillusioned. The media, which I used to trust, whips up fear and anger (their words, not mine). Jon Stewart is the only sane person in America, but he's spitting into the wind. I hope I am proved wrong, but, sadly, I doubt it.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20101103-01 07:16 SteveB Our Highest Nature

Dear India,

Good website: <http://www.ourhighestnature.org/index.html>

"The true nature of anything is the highest it can become." —Aristotle, 356 B.C.

20101108-01 08:44 Dennis "Obama's Biggest Mistake: Selling Out to the Bankers"

It's been pretty clear to me for some time that Obama was bamboozled by Wall Street from the day he took office and the following confirms that for me. By the way, he was also bamboozled by the military which has been nearly as disastrous for the country, but that's another depressing story. If he doesn't change course quickly by cleaning out his staff, the country could have an even bigger disaster...Sarah Palin in the White House.

"Obama's Biggest Mistake: Selling Out to the Bankers" by James K. Galbraith, New Deal 2.0

Nov. 7, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/148770/>)

Bruce Bartlett says it was a failure to focus. Paul Krugman says it was a failure of nerve. Nancy Pelosi says it was the economy's failure. Barack Obama says it was his own failure—to explain that he was, in fact, focused on the economy.

As Krugman rightly stipulates, Monday-morning quarterbacks should say exactly what different play they would have called. Paul's answer is that the stimulus package should have been bigger. No disagreement: I was one voice calling for a much larger program back when. Yet this answer is not sufficient.

The original sin of Obama's presidency was to assign economic policy to a closed circle of bank-friendly economists and Bush carryovers. Larry Summers. Timothy Geithner. Ben Bernanke. These men had no personal commitment to the goal of an early recovery, no stake in the Democratic Party, no interest in the larger success of Barack Obama. Their primary goal, instead, was and remains to protect their own past decisions and their own professional futures.

Up to a point, one can defend the decisions taken in Sept.-Oct., 2008 under the stress of a rapidly collapsing financial system. The Bush administration was, by that time, nearly defunct. Panic was in the air, as was political blackmail—with the threat that the October through January months might be irreparably brutal. Stopgaps were needed, they were concocted, and they held the line.

But one cannot defend the actions of Team Obama on taking office. Law, policy and politics all pointed in one direction: turn the systemically dangerous banks over to Sheila Bair and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Insure the depositors, replace the management, fire the lobbyists, audit the books, prosecute the frauds, and restructure and downsize the institutions. The financial system would have been cleaned up. And the big bankers would have been beaten as a political force. Team Obama did none of these things. Instead they announced "stress tests," plainly designed so as to obscure the banks' true condition. They pressured the Federal Accounting Standards Board to permit the banks to ignore the market value of their toxic assets. Management stayed in place. They prosecuted no one. The Fed cut the cost of funds to zero. The President justified all this by repeating, many times, that the goal of policy was "to get credit flowing again."

The banks threw a party. Reported profits soared, as did bonuses. With free funds, the banks could make money with no risk, by lending back to the Treasury. They could boom the stock market. They could make a mint on proprietary trading. Their losses on mortgages were concealed—until the fact came out that they'd so neglected basic mortgage paperwork, as to be unable to foreclose in many cases, without the help of forged documents and perjured affidavits.

But new loans? The big banks had given up on that. They no longer did real underwriting. And anyway, who could qualify? Businesses mostly had no investment plans. And homeowners were, to an increasing degree, upside-down on their mortgages and therefore unqualified to refinance. These facts were obvious to everybody, fueling rage at "bailouts." They also underlie the economy's failure to create jobs. What usually happens (and did, for example, in 1994-2000) is that credit growth takes over from Keynesian fiscal expansion. Armed with credit, businesses expand, and with higher incomes, public deficits decline. This cannot happen if the financial sector isn't working.

Geithner, Summers and Bernanke should have known this. One can be fairly sure that they did know it. But Geithner and Bernanke had cast their lots, with continuity and cover-up. And Summers, with his own record of deregulation, could hardly have complained.

To counter calls for more action, Team Obama produced sunny forecasts. Their program was right-sized, because anyway unemployment would peak at 8 percent in 2009. So Larry Summers said. In making that forecast, the Obama White House took responsibility for the entire excess of joblessness above eight percent. They made it impossible to blame the ongoing disaster on George W. Bush. If this wasn't rank incompetence, it was sabotage.

This is why, in a crisis, you need new people. You must be able to attack past administrations, and override old decisions, without directly crossing those who made them.

President Obama didn't see this. Or perhaps, he didn't want to see it. His presidential campaign was, after all, from the beginning financed from Wall Street. He chose his team, knowing exactly who they were. And this tells us what we need to know, about who he really is.

James K. Galbraith is the author of The Predator State: How Conservatives Abandoned the Free Market and Why Liberals Should Too, and of a new preface to The Great Crash, 1929, by John Kenneth Galbraith. He teaches at The University of Texas at Austin.

© 2010 New Deal 2.0

20101108-02	13:05	SteveG	Re: "Obama's Biggest Mistake: Selling Out to the Bankers"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dennis,

Some banks sold their buildings and leased them back—decreasing their debt and taking the equity to profits. They also outsourced, in one bank's case 10,000 jobs, in order to decrease their employee expenses. No policy changes and none of the biggies got fired. The bosses got raises because they were able to increase the profits.

20101110-01	21:07	SteveB	"Please Allow Me to Correct a Few Things"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

"Please Allow Me to Correct a Few Things" by Bill Wyman, Slate

Nov. 5, 2010, (<http://www.slate.com/id/2273611>)

(Imagine if Mick Jagger responded to Keith Richards about his new autobiography.)

(Editor's note: On a recent morning, the journalist Bill Wyman received a UPS package containing a typed manuscript. On reading it, he saw that it seemed to be the thoughts, at some length, of singer Mick Jagger on the recently published autobiography of his longtime songwriting partner in the Rolling Stones, Keith Richards. A handwritten note on an old piece of Munro Sounds stationery read: "Bill: For the vault. M.")

From this, Wyman surmised that the package was intended for Jagger and Richards' former band mate, the bassist Bill Wyman, who has assiduously overseen the band's archives over the past five decades and with whom Wyman the journalist coincidentally shares the same name. Wyman the journalist, a longtime rock critic, was once threatened with a cease-and-desist letter from Wyman the bassist's Park Avenue attorneys and felt no compunction about perusing the contents of the package. The manuscript he received is reprinted below.)

I am, I see here, marginally endowed, if I read Keith's sniggering aright. I do not sing well, either. I am not polite to employees; indeed, I have even been known to say, "Oh, shut up, Keith," in band meetings. I do not appreciate the authenticity of the music or the importance of what we do. I want to "lord it over" the band, like James Brown. I am "insufferable." I slept with Anita.

Most of that is in just the first quarter of this overlong book, but a tattoo of my failings sounds all through it and culminates in almost 20 full pages of rambling invective near the end.

I don't mind this, really, for reasons I hope are understandable and will get into later. This is all from a guy pushing 70 for whom gays are still "poofters" and women "b*tches." I think so many things about Keith. We were close, the two of us, for many years. We had known each other in grade school, if you can believe it, in the same undistinguished eastern suburb. Then we bumped into each other in a train station at 18 or so and started talking about the blues. We were different; I'd already been on TV with my father, who was a fairly notable expert on physical education at the time. Keith was ... rougher, let's say. For the next nearly 10 years, we were rarely apart. Even after we were famous, we lived at each others' flats or houses. We were still very young, and, like puppies, we'd cluster together.

We were barely a band before our lives changed, but I think still of the time we spent, squalidly, before we were a group, in a very cold and small flat, more filthy than you can imagine. Our flat mate Jimmy Phelge was a veritable comic virtuoso with a pair of soiled underwear. Certainly we—I—wanted to be famous, but can I point out our road to it was not absurd, exactly, but unthinkable, in the sense that we couldn't even imagine a way to do it? The London music scene was entirely insignificant, and we didn't even play the trad jazz (Charlie's métier), which dominated.

Still, we practiced day and night out of some unspoken impetus, innocent suburban boys abruptly living quite near the edge of a dark milieu. This brings me to Brian, who played guitar very well and was a brittle devil. We knew that because of many things, not least that he spent an inappropriate amount of time beating up his girls in the next room. I'm not proud of that. Keith gives himself (too much, I think) credit for rescuing Anita, eventually, from Brian; but that of course was years later. Earlier, we both listened to or watched his cruelty, in the bedroom and elsewhere; we paid no attention to the half dozen kids he'd fathered and ignored the savagery he accomplished on tour. We didn't know better; we were priapic jackals ourselves, f*cking even one another's girlfriends if they got left, as it were, unattended. But it was wrong to have let Brian do that, and Keith should have owned up to this in the book.

I supposed it is a karmic justice for Brian that we continued to watch as he descended from there to hell, harried by the police and increasingly incapacitated artistically, which further estranged him from us. Oh, that's not true; we didn't just watch. We ushered him along, ridiculing him, you might say, to death as he began to lose his ability to contribute. Again, we were young. What were you doing at 25? We didn't know about depression, insanity, addiction, or what acid might have done to him. It's unclear to me whether the drugs diminished his ability to contribute or whether the drugs were in effect a way to cover up something that wasn't there. The first song Keith and I wrote was a hit single; Brian couldn't write a song to save his life, literally. And let's remember that he was a total a*s-hole. I'm digressing but I'm trying to explain where we came from. We didn't have a template. Nothing against Steven Tyler, but there's a difference. We felt around in the dark; we were famous within weeks; and, in the end, we left a body or two behind us. We did these things, good and bad, together; we were friends.

The second important thing is Keith's talent. We took it for granted, in a way, as he says. We felt it was our duty to get together and write a song, one good song each day we worked. He is kind to say I could take what he gave me and run with it. But he is the one who gave me the actual song to write the lyrics to. He wrote a dozen Top 10 hits in five years, and, after the band added Mick Taylor and essentially grew up, he wrote most of Beggars Banquet and Let It Bleed. Again: What were you doing at 25? It's interesting to me how no previous song we'd recorded would have a respectable place on those albums; and any song on them would have seemed out of place even on Aftermath or Between the Buttons. Keith's lurch forward was amazing. As a pure rock (not folk or pop) songwriter, I think he is not just without peer. I think he is unrivaled in depth and growth, from "As Tears Go By" to "Satisfaction" to "Jumping Jack Flash" to, I don't know, "Gimme Shelter", "Monkey Man", "Street Fighting Man."

The primal feel of the chording. The musicality of the intros and breaks. The innovation of the recording—cruder, no doubt, but I will argue far more emotionally powerful than the Beatles'. The winding, intermixed guitars he almost desperately loved. Without him, what would I have been? Peter Noone? It is hard to use a word like integrity about a band as compromised, as self bloodied, as we were. But for some years, unlike any other group, the Beatles included, we declared war on that silly, hypocritical, repressive, and arbitrary society in which we lived. The only ammunition we had were Keith's songs. The lyrics, I confess now, may have been in their defiance just épater la bourgeoisie and in their poesy derivatively Zimmerman-esque. Even when they weren't, no one would have paid attention if the chords weren't arresting, irrefutable. The songs spoke primarily through their music, not their words. Keith's dotting fans nattering on about the ultimate avatar of rock 'n' roll authenticity irritate me, it's true; but he may to this day be underappreciated.

So those two things I think, are important. Our bond; his talent. We blink at that point, and go 40 years forward, and he has written a book that says, essentially, that I have a small dick. That I am a bad friend. That I am unknowable.

The reviewers, who idolize Keith, don't ask why this is all in here. We have rarely spoken of such things publicly, and tangentially even then. We don't talk about it in private, either, and, no, he hasn't been in my dressing room in 20 years. I thought we both learned that there is no point in sharing anything at all with the press, save a few tidbits for the upbeat The Stones are back in top rocking form! article that accompanies each of our tours. I think Keith never appreciated the tedious hours I had to spend with Jann Wenner to accomplish that.

But I know why it is all here. In the book we get the stories. Oh, the stories. The rock, the girls. The car wrecks, the arrests. You read them on the printed page, delivered in what, I must admit, is a pretty fair written representation of Keith's slightly tangential, drawing, effeminate delivery, resting charmingly just this side of the incomprehensible.

I was generally made familiar with the stories in a different context. They were generally related by an assistant or a lawyer, tour manager or a publicist, poking their head into a room. Keith's disappeared. Keith's asleep backstage and can't be roused for the show. No one will wake him because he keeps a loaded gun under his pillow and grabs it and points when riled. Keith fell asleep in the studio again. No, Keith isn't mixing the album. He flew off to Jamaica, and, no, we don't know when he will be back. Keith's asleep. Keith's asleep. Keith's asleep.

The scamp. Those are but one tier, and a fairly innocuous one, of the many times I was vouchsafed news of my partner. The next tier is more colorful. Keith (or his favorite sax player/drug runner/drug buddy/hanger-on) has slugged a photographer/destroyed a hotel room/gotten into a fistfight with the locals/fallen into a coma. Oh, yes, and the police are here. (Because police are whom you want backstage at a rock concert or at a recording studio.)

Or: The band mate Keith personally vouched for is freebasing again. This last was of some interest to me, because it meant that I got to sing at a stadium backed by not one but two guitarists falling over onstage. Keith likes to talk a lot about his getting clean from heroin. It is not correspondingly apprehended that he replaced the heroin comprehensively with liquor. Given a choice I select the slurring alcoholic over the comatose junkie as a lifelong professional partner, and I say this with some knowledge of the two alternatives. But neither is strictly desirable.

And, yes, they do fall over onstage. (Or asleep on a chair in the studio.) I laugh at it now and blame no one but myself. Why, Keith gave me his "personal guarantee" Woody would not be freebasing on tour. And yet I was surprised when it happened. I take the point that professionalism, one's word, rock 'n' roll merriment ... these are fungible things in our world. It is a fair charge that I have become less tolerant in these matters over the decades. In our organization, inside this rather unusual floating circus we call home, I am forced into the role of martinet, the one who gets blamed for silly arbitrary rules. (Like, for a show in front of 60,000 people for which we are being paid some $6 or $7 million for a few hours' work, I like to suggest to everyone that we start on time, and that we each have in place a personal plan, in whatever way suits us best, to stay conscious for the duration of the show.)

So I will take that point. All of the forgoing was just ... a little outré behavior on tour. Let's go to the next tier—again, of matters one is informed of with some regularity, this not over months, not years, but entire decades. Keith's been arrested with a mason jar full of heroin and a shopping bag full of other drugs and drug paraphernalia and is charged with drug trafficking. That was his baggage for a weekend in Toronto. It is hard to play a show with a catatonic guitarist, harder still when he is in jail for 10 years. I won't even get into the fact that this came right when I had every record label in the world fighting to sign us, and in an instant my negotiating power was vaporized. Here's a baroque bulletin from the archives: Anita's 17-year-old boyfriend has accidentally shot himself, in Keith's house—Keith's bedroom—with a gun Keith left lying around. Young Marlon, then perhaps 10, saw Anita, covered in blood, coming down the stairs distraught, and God knows it could have been Marlon playing with the gun. Or: Keith's driven his car off the road (again) with Marlon inside (again). In his book Keith stands back, amazed at the things that just ... happen to him.

He is frequently the victim of faulty wiring in the hotels in which we bivouac; a surprising number of times this phenomenon has caused fires. Ritz-Carltons are not built the way they use to be, I guess. Redlands burned down a couple of times as well, as did a house he was renting in Laurel Canyon. It's a wonder Marlon survived his childhood. A third child Keith disposed of by sending her off to his mum back in Dartford I to raise. The second? That was another son, who was left with his paranoid, unstable, heroin-addict mother and didn't make it past infancy. Keith says he blames himself, and on that at least I think we can agree.

It is said of me that I act above the rest of the band and prefer the company of society swells. Would you rather have had a conversation with Warren Beatty, Andy Warhol, and Ahmet Ertegun ... or Keith, his drug mule Tony, and the other surly nonverbal members of his merry junkie entourage? Keith actually seems not to understand why I would want my dressing room as far away as possible from that of someone who travels with a loaded gun. And for heaven's sake. No sooner did Keith kick heroin than Charlie took it up. In the book Keith blames me for not touring during the 1980s. I was quoted, unfortunately, saying words to the effect of "the Rolling Stones are a millstone around my neck." This hurt Keith's feelings. He thinks it was a canard flung from a fleeting position of advantage in my solo career, the failing of which he delights in. He's not appreciating the cause and effect. Can you imagine going on tour with an alcoholic, a junkie, and a crack head? Millstone wasn't even the word. I spent much of the 1980s looking for a new career, and it didn't work. If I had it to do over again I would only try harder.

When I came back I resolved to do at least something well. Which brings us to money. We did not entirely mismanage our career in the 1960s, save for the calamity of signing with Allen Klein, who, with fatal strokes of our pens, obtained the rights and total control of our work throughout the 1960s. It was my responsibility. Keith downplays this, but the fact is we signed the thief's papers. It was all done legally. Klein was a Moriarity, truly; he didn't wait to sign us to steal. The signing was the theft, a product of a scheme so encompassing that in the end, he paid us a pittance and walked off with our songs. This is by far the single most important nonmusical event in our history, and yet it is rarely remarked on. I was not 30 and had lost us a historic treasure.

In the 1970s, we worked very hard, and with Some Girls we eventually sold a lot of records, but in reality you couldn't make much money back then, even touring. In the early 1970s we might play for a period of, say, two months, 10,000- and 20,000-seat halls at $6 or $10 a ticket. Back then, we were lucky to take half the gross home. You do the math. Then take out expenses and manager and lawyer fees ... and split the remainder five ways. Nor did we live frugally. It got better over the decade, and Keith and I had the songwriting, of course, but compare us with Paul or Elton during the 1970s (who outsold us by many times, for starters, and among other things did not split their income with anyone) and our fame was entirely inconsistent with our back accounts.

In 1981, I put us in stadiums and charged a more reasonable tariff and might have made us more money that summer than we'd earned in our entire career up to that point. And I've done it several times since—each time, I mean, to be precise, literally earning close to as much as we had the previous 30 or 40 years in total, including those previous tours. The "Bigger Bang" outing grossed more than $588 million—more than a million dollars a day for 18 months—and we pocketed the lion's share of it. If the promoters didn't like it they could raise price of the nachos, or the parking. And I'm not even mentioning the sponsorships, the ticket fees, the merchandise ...

I sound, now, like the accountant who earns my band mates' jeers. But I don't remember Keith complaining about these sums, or, incidentally, that it took me 20 years to remember to give Ronnie a full share, just as we both pretended not to hear when Mick Taylor, or Ronnie, asked for credit for songs they'd written.

Does Keith really sigh for the good old days on tour? Shabby theaters, sh*tty sound? Wound-up kids standing for hours in the hot summer sun in dreadful mid-American cities waiting for a chance to race recklessly for general-admission seats? Us enduring a day of hassle and travel to take home perhaps $3,500 each? I remember Keith asleep or not showing up until hours after the scheduled start time. Our feral fans running, fighting, throwing rocks at police. Today, the shows start promptly, there are video screens for the folks in the back, and we offer $1,000-a-seat ducats for the fat cats.

Here's the thing: I'm a rock star. What is the measure of my success if not the biggest rock and roll tour of all time?

I know what you're thinking. It's what Keith thinks, too. What about the music. Isn't it all, in the end, about the music? I must note that the Stones rarely get a bad review, no matter how poor our albums. (Jann again, and so many wannabe Janns; how is it that we somehow manage, again and again, to record our "best album since Some Girls"?)

But let me ask you to imagine yourself, as I was, unimaginably, partnered with the writer of "Satisfaction," "Paint It Black," "19th Nervous Breakdown," "Honky Tonk Woman," etc. And then imagine that your partner, seemingly overnight, lost some essential part of his talents. Not, as is commonly supposed, sometime perhaps in the 1980s, when the Rolling Stones' decline in creativity was on obvious display, but earlier. A lot earlier. Like, say, 1972 at the latest.

Those who like Exile on Main St. like its denseness, its mystery, its swampy commitment. Accidentally and amid no little chaos, we conjured up something dirty, impenetrable, and, in parts, compelling. But I think its murk promises depths that aren't there. There are decent but no major songs on Exile. Let's go back an album, to Sticky Fingers. I wrote "Brown Sugar." Mick Taylor wrote "Sway" and most of "Moonlight Mile," and made "Can't You Hear Me Knocking" his own. Keith and I together did most of the rest, like "Wild Horses," but, in the end, he didn't write most of the thing's best songs.

From there, there's Exile. Some nice tracks—"Rocks Off," "Happy"—but there is no "Gimme Shelter" or "Let It Bleed." Chords that once threatened society in some significant way now rarely radiated outward.

The next few years were difficult. I don't want to say Keith wrote no songs. He did. But successively, in each album, the process became more difficult, as both his capacity for the job declined along with the quality of what he did write. He mocks the disco songs—"Hot Stuff," "Miss You," "Emotional Rescue."

But what would the commercial impact of those albums have been without those immediate hits? We were being outsold by everyone from Supertramp to the Doobie Brothers as it was. At the same time I had to come up with tracks and weasel promising material out of our cohort and not give up songwriting credit, which I accomplished in all but one or two cases.

The resulting albums are, with perhaps the exception of Some Girls, flaccid and unconvincing. The aforementioned disco hits. A little lyrical naughtiness ("Starf*cker," "Some Girls"). The earnest ballad in which the incorrigible Stones display some unexpected touches of maturity ("Memory Motel," "Waiting on a Friend"). Lots and lots of undistinguished filler, clavinet playing by Billy Preston, Motown covers ... And for some of the good stuff Keith wasn't even there. For It's Only Rock and Roll I did the title single with Woody and Bowie. Taylor and I constructed the splendid "Time Waits for No One," a fantasia, alluring to this day, for percussion, piano, and guitar. (I don't think Keith has ever let us play it live.) ("Sway," either.)

I will testify that Keith was intermittently sentient during some part of the recording of Some Girls. Yes we were fully Manhattanized at this point, because I live here and that's what I found interesting. The geographic location of Keith's talent, being nowhere, wasn't available for evocation.

By the time of Tattoo You I was exhausted. Entirely drained of ideas. I told Chris Kimsey to ransack the archives. "Start Me Up" was a very old song, with some 20, 30, 40 takes as a reggae ... and one with a real rock guitar. It turned out to be our last real hit, and the arc of our career would look a lot different if we hadn't found it. With it, we could plausibly least claim to be hit makers in the 1980s. "Waiting on a Friend," that symbol of our new-found maturity, was, if memory serves, from a centuries-old session with me and Mick Taylor. About our work from the rest of the 1980s and 1990s, the less said the better. Can you sing a single chorus from Dirty Work? Name a single track? We certainly don't play songs from those records in concert if we can help it.

I go into such detail to describe the arc of our decline accurately but also note this sad corollary: Keith brought something out of me, way back when. Through Exile, I felt I had to rise to his songs. When he checked out creatively, I lost something important. While there is some spark, I guess, in "Some Girls" or "Shattered" or whatever, however contrived, I know most of the other songs sucked. In the 1980s and '90s it got worse. I could conjure up only the most banal cliché or the most pretentious polysyllabic nonsense. Compare "Sympathy for the Devil" with "Heartbreaker." One Godard made a film about. The other is a TV movie. I literally wrote a song called "She's So Cold" and then, a few years later, one called "She Was Hot."

Now, Keith went through the same thing. I think this is why Keith lost himself with heroin and now drinks: to stave off the pressure to match himself and dull the knowledge that he can't any more (and, back then, couldn't). It's trite, maybe, but there's a reason a guy spends a decade in a haze, and the three decades since in a stupor. Keith's rancor is almost entirely based on the fact that it was not, in the end, easy to keep the appearances of what in the public mind is the Rolling Stones, and the process wasn't always pretty. But I did it, and, among other things, to this day it is hardly in the public mind that Keith Richards hasn't written a significant rock 'n' roll song in nearly 35 years. For that I get Keith's book.

Why did he write it? Or, rather, having decided to write it all down, why did he devote so much of it to carping about me?

Well, he's not talking about me, really. He's just trying to get my attention, I think, in the end. The remaining part of the rancor comes from the fact that he knows he lost me, many years ago. It's funny—Keith doesn't write good rock songs much anymore, but what he does do, every four or five years, is craft a beautiful little ballad. Since Tattoo You Keith's written and sung a couple of tracks per album. (We had a huge fight about his putting three on Bridges to Babylon; I didn't like it, but didn't have anything else to offer, even with three years since the previous album. Why one of the songs I did write is now co-credited to k.d. lang is a matter to be discussed on some other day.) Generally, one of these is a throwaway, and the other ... is something gorgeous. Put them all together along with songs he wrote solo and sang from the early years—"You Got the Silver," "Happy," and so forth, all the way up to "Thru & Thru" and "All About You"—and you have a CD of no little power and emotion. (I've done it.)

These songs are more honest than his book. In "The Worst," he says something about "I'm the worst kind of guy/ For you to be around." That's a song that might ring true for many people. It makes me think about how Keith lost me only after I lost him. In an older song, he explains a worldview I find a bit disturbing, and I would like to point out that since from most peoples' perspective I have flirted the edge of total decadence my entire life I can make that observation with some authority:

Slipped my tongue in someone else's pie
Tasted better every time
She turned green and tried to make me cry
Being hungry
Ain't no crime.

Again, the honesty is bracing. I think Keith puts just about any of his manifold urges on a par with hunger, and I think we can agree the world would be a dangerous place if that was the norm. It explains many, many of his actions over the years. In the book he tells the story of going to meet Patti Hansen's parents for the first time—drunk, holding an open bottle of Jack, and with one of his f*cktard friends in tow. You can imagine how the evening ended. I'm sure Keith thinks it's OK. ("Being nervous ain't no crime.") ("Oh, shut up, Keith," I think.) With that perspective—and the added benefit of being rich and famous and having most of his deplorable actions do nothing but burnish his image—Keith's way in the world has been, in a certain way and ignoring, for the moment, the people who died, a blessed one.

I certainly bless it. I stood by him and propped him up and didn't fire his a*s for many, many years. It would have ended the Stones, of course, so maybe I was being selfish. In a way, even comatose he had a marquee name; as my meal ticket, you might say, it suited me to let him doze. I took the reins until, when he finally woke up, he found that he had no place in the management. He's angry about that, too. Yes, let's let Keith Richards have a hand in overseeing an operation that generates $1 million a day in revenue. I don't know what else I could have done. Later, one grows older and becomes more informed about such things, and I saw I was supposed to have held an elaborate ceremony called an "intervention." Society could have effectively halted the upheavals of the 1960s simply by requiring all of us to "intervene" with one another. In any event, considering half our circle was on heroin and the rest were coke fiends, I think it wouldn't have been efficacious in our circumstances.

He talks about me, too, in his solo songs, less subtly: "I'm so sick and tired/ Of hanging around/ Jerks like you." People ask me why I let him put these on the album. I think: Oh, why not? It's a great song, and he can sing it, and he can write the book, too. He's trying to get my attention. To connect. To have it be how it once was. At our age, I think there's no basis for it. Keith celebrates his own unchanging character, and I have had quite enough of that.

But, still, when I think of Keith, I think sometimes of how someone different from the book comes out through these songs. Once in a great while he detaches and looks down at his corporeal self. "I think I lost my touch," he sings on one of them; "It's just another song and it's slippin' away." Rock and roll is strange. When a song is beautiful—those spare guitars rumbling and chiming, by turns—the words mean so much more, and there, for a moment, I believe him, and feel for him.

Or I think about "How Can I Stop" which may end up being Keith's last great song.

"How can I stop ... once I start?" he murmurs, over and over again. "How can I stop once I start?" It's about rock 'n' roll, of course, and playing guitar, and his tenure, and mine, in our unusual coalition. It's also about heroin and everything else he can't stop ingesting. But again it's about Keith himself, who once started never did stop—through the fame, the songs, the concerts and the women and the drugs; and the violence and senselessness, the addictions and the deaths, the ruined lives, the petty and large-scale cruelties. At the end Keith got Wayne Shorter to do a sax solo that is itself almost an out-of-body experience, perhaps the loveliest moment on one of our records. It goes on and on over the last two minutes of a very long track, and the end is almost a ... an exaltation, perhaps? I am lost there. It's something I'm not sure I ever saw evidenced in real life, and something that isn't in his book.

It's the sound—or at least the closest thing Keith Richards will ever admit to it—of a conscience.

(Bill Wyman is the former arts editor of NPR and Salon.com.)

Copyright 2007 Washingtonpost.Newsweek Interactive Co. LLC

20101110-02	21:27	SteveB	"Pelosi's Triumph"
-------------	-------	--------	--------------------

"Pelosi's Triumph" by William Saletan, Slate

Nov. 5, 2010, (<http://www.slate.com/id/2273708>)

(Democrats didn't lose the battle of 2010. They won it.)

Democrats have lost the House, and health care is getting the blame. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana, a retiring Democrat, says his party "overreached by focusing on health care rather than job creation" and by spending $1 trillion on "a major entitlement expansion." Sen. John McCain's economic adviser agrees.

Pundits say the health care bill killed President Obama's approval ratings, cost congressional Democrats their jobs, and snuffed out the legacy of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. "Virtually every House Democrat from a swing district who took a gamble by voting for the health law made a bad political bet," says the New York Times. The Los Angeles Times laments that "the measure of a leader in Washington isn't how much gets done, it's who holds power in the end. On that scale, Pelosi failed."

I'm not buying the autopsy or the obituary. In the national exit poll, voters were split on health care. Unemployment is at nearly 10 percent. Democrats lost a lot of seats that were never really theirs, and those who voted against the bill lost at a higher rate than did those who voted for it. But if health care did cost the party its majority, so what? The bill was more important than the election.

I realize that sounds crazy. We've become so obsessed with who wins or loses in politics that we've forgotten what the winning and losing are about. Partisans fixate on punishing their enemies in the next campaign. Reporters, in the name of objectivity, refuse to judge anything but the Election Day score card. Politicians rationalize their self-preservation by imagining themselves as dynasty builders. They think this is the big picture.

They're wrong. The big picture isn't about winning or keeping power. It's about using it. I've made this argument before, but David Frum, the former speechwriter to President Bush, has made it better. In March, when Democrats secured enough votes to pass the bill, he castigated fellow conservatives who looked forward to punishing Pelosi and President Obama "with a big win in the Nov., 2010 elections." Frum observed:

Legislative majorities come and go. This healthcare bill is forever. A win in November is very poor compensation for this debacle now. ... No illusions please: This bill will not be repealed. Even if Republicans scored a 1994 style landslide in November, how many votes could we muster to re-open the "doughnut hole" and charge seniors more for prescription drugs? How many votes to re-allow insurers to rescind policies when they discover a pre-existing condition? How many votes to banish 25 year olds from their parents' insurance coverage?

Exactly. A party that loses a House seat can win it back two years later, as Republicans just proved. But a party that loses a legislative fight against a middle-class health care entitlement never restores the old order. Pretty soon, Republicans will be claiming the program as their own. Indeed, one of their favorite arguments against this year's health care bill was that it would cut funding for Medicare. Now they're pledging to rescind those cuts. In 30 years, they'll be accusing Democrats of defunding Obamacare.

Most bills aren't more important than elections. This one was. Take it from Mitch McConnell, the Senate Republican leader. Yesterday, in his election victory speech at the Heritage Foundation, he declared, "Health care was the worst piece of legislation that's passed during my time in the Senate." McConnell has been in the Senate for 26 years. He understands the bill's significance: It's a huge structural change in the relationship between the public, the economy, and the government.

Politicians have tried and failed for decades to enact universal health care. This time, they succeeded. In 2008, Democrats won the Presidency and both houses of Congress, and by the thinnest of margins, they rammed a bill through. They weren't going to get another opportunity for a very long time. It cost them their majority, and it was worth it.

And that's not counting financial regulation, economic stimulus, college lending reform, and all the other bills that became law under Pelosi. So spare me the tears and gloating about her so-called failure. If John Boehner is speaker of the House for the next 20 years, he'll be lucky to match her achievements.

Will Republicans revisit healthcare? Sure. Will they enact some changes to the program? Yes, and Democrats will help them. Every program needs revisions. Republicans will get other things, too: business tax breaks, education reform, more nuclear power, and a crackdown on earmarks. These are issues on which both parties can agree. Which is why, if you're a Democrat, you deal with them after you've lost your majority—not before.

It's funny, in a twisted way, to read all the post-election complaints that Democrats lost because they thought only of themselves. Even the chief operating officer of the party's leading think tank, the Center for American Progress, says Obama failed to convince Americans "that he knows their jobs are as important as his." That's too bad, because Obama, Pelosi, and their congressional allies proved just the opposite. They risked their jobs—and in many cases lost them—to pass the health care bill. The elections were a painful defeat, and you can argue that the bill was misguided. But Democrats didn't lose the most important battle of 2010. They won it.

(William Saletan is Slate's national correspondent and author of Bearing Right: How Conservatives Won the Abortion War.)

Copyright 2007 Washingtonpost.Newsweek Interactive Co. LLC

20101119-01 16:42 SteveB Re: Trip to Stanford Reunion

Dear Pam,

Jeez, I have been a terrible correspondent and I am sorry for that. You said you feel like a lot has happened since you wrote the time before your email below, and I feel the same way now. Yet, it really hasn't been that much happening, but I have been thinking about you, so here goes...

Your trip to California sounds wonderful! I am surprised by your surprise over the Stanford stuff being a good time. What a great school! What intelligent, interesting people must gather in memory of times spent there! I envy you guys.

I have always loved California. I lived there for just three months when I was a student at Purdue. I had a great girl friend from LA and we traveled all over the state. I was loathe to leave, but duty called, yet I have wondered ever since what would have happened had I chosen the other path. I've been back for short stays many times and always manage to find interesting people and places. Too bad it's so expensive to live in most of the best places there.

And now it's nearly Thanksgiving. Incredible!

Bad and good how the election turned-out. At least Sarah Palin's Alaskan buddy lost. Some good people won. The country's still in big trouble. Pussy Obama is still in big trouble. But, hey, look at denuded, deluged, demonic, diseased Haiti. Maybe one day the world will wake up.

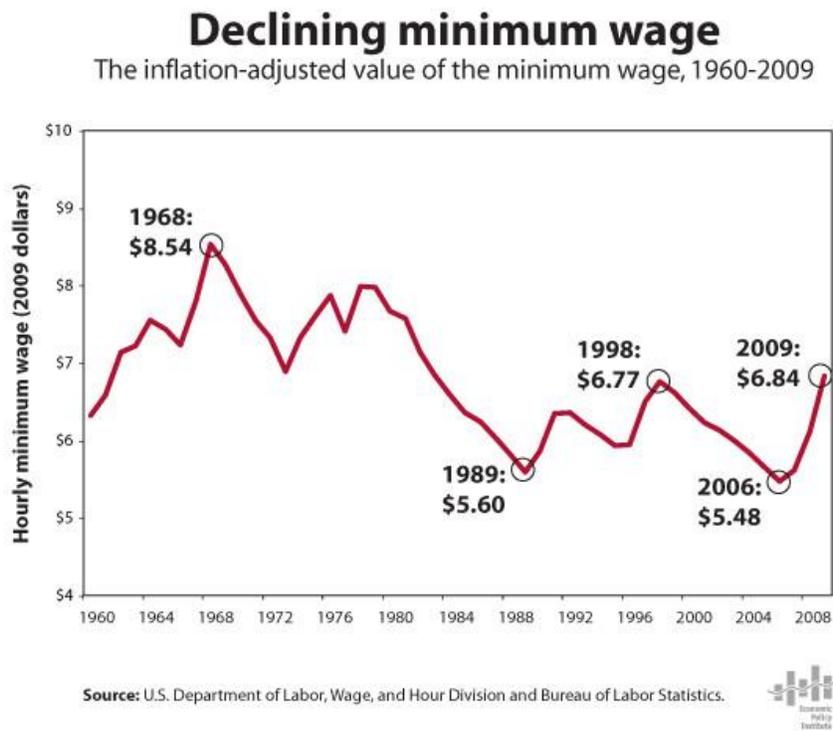

20101120-01 08:58 SteveB "The Poor Is Getting Poorer"

The decline and fall of America.

I don't think you'll see this same pattern for corporate CEO's over this span of time. How strange! Do you still believe there's a level playing field? Do you know what it costs to live in America? I hope you do. It's a bad sign if you don't. How much longer do you think the middle class will exist at this rate? How much longer will consumers be able to consume in order to make the rich richer?

Maybe not much longer. Maybe the rich should consider these questions...

I hate to say it, but it's beginning to look a lot like "us against them"! Did I say, "Beginning?" It's been more like my entire lifetime. When is our great land going to smarten up? It's not just that this situation is not good for the poor. It's not good for any of us!

"See, as the rich is getting richer,
The poor is getting poorer."
—Carlos Santana, "Maria Maria"

20101120-02 12:55 Bill Re: "The Poor Is Getting Poorer"

Dear SteveB,

I share your concern and have empathy for those trying to make on such a wage. I would guess that the statistic takes into account what I'm guessing is a larger number of low wage jobs and a smaller number of the good jobs—e. g. auto industry—that seem in short supply. The worst fix (aside from having no job) to be in is having lost one of those good wage jobs and fallen into the low wage sector. At the same time many of the low wage jobs seem to be filled by those who have come here recently in droves from Mexico and other points south (Bolivia?). There are at least 100,00 Mexicans living in Indianapolis. I feel for their struggle; at the same time they took on risk coming here.

The other, and severe, problem lies in the severe loss of manufacturing jobs to other countries. The loss poses the conundrum for people here: Do they want to do without the cheap goods from China and other Asian countries, or do they want to subsidize money-losing manufacturing industries in this country? It's the dismal science after all.

20101120-03 13:47 SteveB Re: "The Poor Is Getting Poorer"

Dear Bill,

Before "free" trade and waves of illegal aliens willing to live in multi-family garages f*cked us (because it costs so much more to live decently in America than, for instance, China or Mexico), prices were deemed reasonable and no one had to "subsidize money-losing manufacturing industries in this country." American corporations made plenty of money, even the ones paying fair wages.

We were the richest country the world had ever seen (or maybe will ever see). We were even rich enough to help the rest of the world (WWII might be one good, rather costly example). Now, we are the ones needing help in the form of constant loans from a China seeking to dominate (or bankrupt) us. Think disaster can't happen here? Look at Greece and Ireland.

The chart, I believe, only details the average, legal "minimum wage" adjusted for inflation and changes in the law. Other numbers paint equally dismal pictures of exactly what Carlos is referring to in his song. Believe me, the rich ain't gettin' poorer!

Our politicians have sold us down the river, bribed by campaign contributions into doing the will of the few, to the detriment of us all.

"Cheap goods from China and other Asian countries" are not as cheap as they seem. It's not that you can't have one without the other. We had both in our "Golden Age" (before the sell-out)—sufficiently low prices to maintain and nurture a large, consuming middle class AND profitable industries providing good jobs.

What do we have now? Wal-Mart junk and Wal-Mart part-time jobs paying less than the chart shows. Not enough to live on. Wonderful progress, America! Yes, quite dismal, huh?

I always appreciate your thoughts.

20101120-04 14:00 SteveB "China's Surprise Rate Hike: What It Means"

Why would the U.S. have taken measures in the past which prevent us from doing what China does, i.e., encouraging "exports and the consumption of domestically produced goods"?

Why would doing so make America somehow immoral or wrong? Aren't these proper goals for any country to pursue, for the good of its people? I don't hear even any of you liberals saying China is bad because it strives to serve its own self-interest. Maybe it's time America did what all the rest of the world does: put the interests of its own people first.

"China's Surprise Rate Hike: What It Means" by Daniel Gross, Yahoo! Finance

Oct. 19, 2010, (<http://www.best-of-cyprus-property.com/news/china-s-surprise-rate-hike-what-it-means>)

On Tuesday global stock markets got up on the wrong side of the bed thanks to news from an unexpected source: the People's Bank of China. The nation's central bank, analogous to the Federal Reserve in the U.S., announced it would raise rates on one-year loans and deposits by .25 percent, or 25 basis points.

Why is the People's Bank of China raising interest rates?

Central banks raise interest rates when they are concerned about inflation, or if they are worried that credit or the economy at large is expanding at an unsustainable pace. Higher interest rates make money more expensive, and thus should cut down on borrowing activity. China's economy is growing very rapidly, at a 10.3 percent annual rate in the most recent quarter, and inflation is running above the official target of three percent. For a country that has to make up as much ground as China does, no rate can be too fast. But housing markets, especially in coastal cities, have been raging. With observers fretting about bubbles, China's central bank has taken efforts to discourage real estate lending and choke off inflation. Raising interest rates is one way to do that.

Why would global stock markets react negatively to this news?

Two reasons. First, think about the changing shape of the world's economic geography. The U.S. (the world's largest economy), Japan (until recently the world's second-largest economy), and the European bloc (which rivals the U.S. in size) are all growing very slowly. China, now the second-largest economy in the world, accounts for a huge amount of growth and demand. While it exports a great deal, it also imports massive quantities of everything from nuts grown in California to copper mined in Chile. The Chinese domestic market has also finally emerged as an important source of sales; General Motors sells more cars in China than it does in the U.S. So any hint that the Chinese juggernaut might be showing signs of slowing is bound to be seen in a negative light by investors who are concerned about growth.

Second, it was a surprise. Markets hate surprises. As a general rule, monetary policy in the U.S. and Europe is conducted with a certain amount of transparency. Officials use speeches and statements to telegraph their intentions, so as not to surprise investors and markets. In China, government bodies keep information very close to their vest and don't face the same type of pressures that western central banks do to give notice about their actions. Since the markets for Chinese currency are very tightly controlled, the People's Bank of China doesn't feel the need to communicate openly about its intentions.

What are the effects of such an increase on China's economy?

The impact of this rate increase lies as much in its symbolism as in its practical effect. Boosting the rates by 25 basis points is like tapping the brakes gently on a freight train running at 90 miles per hour — it can only slow it down a bit. But it does signal that China's central bank is sufficiently concerned about some issues in its economy to take action.

The exchange rate of China's currency, the Yuan (the Renminbi is the official name of the currency, while the Yuan is the main unit of currency), against the dollar, has been a contentious issue between the U.S. and China. How does this move affect the exchange rate?

In theory, raising interest rates in China should make the Yuan stronger against the dollar. All things being equal, money flows toward countries with higher interest rates (like China) and away from countries with very low interest rates (like the U.S.). But despite intense pressure from the U.S. government, China has remained committed to keeping the Yuan trading in a stable range against the greenback. China prefers a weak currency because it makes Chinese goods cheap for American consumers and makes American-made goods expensive for Chinese consumers — which encourages exports and the consumption of domestically produced goods.

(Daniel Gross is economics editor and columnist at Yahoo! Finance.)

20101120-05	14:03	SteveB	"Olbermann, O'Reilly & the Death of Real News"
-------------	-------	--------	--

"Olbermann, O'Reilly and the Death of Real News" by Ted Koppel, The Washington Post

Nov. 14, 2010, (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/11/12/AR2010111202857.html>)

To witness Keith Olbermann—the most opinionated among MSNBC's left-leaning, Fox-baiting, money generating hosts—suspended even briefly last week for making financial contributions to Democratic political candidates seemed like a whimsical, arcane holdover from a long-gone era of television journalism, when the networks considered the collection and dissemination of substantive and unbiased news to be a public trust.

Back then, a policy against political contributions would have aimed to avoid even the appearance of partisanship. But today, when Olbermann draws more than 1 million like-minded viewers to his program every night precisely because he is avowedly, unabashedly and monotonously partisan, it is not clear what misdemeanor his donations constituted. Consistency?

We live now in a cable news universe that celebrates the opinions of Olbermann, Rachel Maddow, Chris Matthews, Glenn Beck, Sean Hannity and Bill O'Reilly—individuals who hold up the twin pillars of political partisanship and who are encouraged to do so by their parent organizations because their brand of analysis and commentary is highly profitable.

The commercial success of both Fox News and MSNBC is a source of nonpartisan sadness for me. While I can appreciate the financial logic of drowning television viewers in a flood of opinions designed to confirm their own biases, the trend is not good for the republic. It is, though, the natural outcome of a growing sense of national entitlement. Daniel Patrick Moynihan's oft-quoted observation that "everyone is entitled to his own opinion, but not his own facts," seems almost quaint in an environment that flaunts opinions as though they were facts.

And so, among the many benefits we have come to believe the founding fathers intended for us, the latest is news we can choose. Beginning, perhaps, from the reasonable perspective that absolute objectivity is unattainable, Fox News and MSNBC no longer even attempt it. They show us the world not as it is, but as partisans (and loyal viewers) at either end of the political spectrum would like it to be. This is to journalism what Bernie Madoff was to investment: He told his customers what they wanted to hear, and by the time they learned the truth, their money was gone.

It is also part of a pervasive ethos that eschews facts in favor of an idealized reality. The fashion industry has apparently known this for years: Esquire magazine recently found that men's jeans from a variety of name-brand manufacturers are cut large but labeled small. The actual waist sizes are anywhere from three to six inches roomier than their labels insist.

Perhaps it doesn't matter that we are being flattered into believing what any full-length mirror can tell us is untrue. But when our accountants, bankers and lawyers, our doctors and our politicians tell us only what we want to hear, despite hard evidence to the contrary, we are headed for disaster. We need only look at our housing industry, our credit card debt, the cost of two wars subsidized by borrowed money, and the rising deficit to understand the dangers of entitlement run rampant. We celebrate truth as a virtue, but only in the abstract. What we really need in our search for truth is a commodity that used to be at the heart of good journalism: facts—along with a willingness to present those facts without fear or favor.

To the degree that broadcast news was a more virtuous operation 40 years ago, it was a function of both fear and innocence. Network executives were afraid that a failure to work in the "public interest, convenience and necessity," as set forth in the Radio Act of 1927, might cause the Federal Communications Commission to suspend or even revoke their licenses. The three major broadcast networks pointed to their news divisions (which operated at a loss or barely broke even) as evidence that they were fulfilling the FCC's mandate. News was, in a manner of speaking, the loss leader that permitted NBC, CBS and ABC to justify the enormous profits made by their entertainment divisions. On the innocence side of the ledger, meanwhile, it never occurred to the network brass that news programming could be profitable.

Until, that is, CBS News unveiled its "60 Minutes" news magazine in 1968. When, after three years or so, "60 Minutes" turned a profit (something no television news program had previously achieved), a light went on, and the news divisions of all three networks came to be seen as profit centers, with all the expectations that entailed.

I recall a Washington meeting many years later at which Michael Eisner, then the chief executive of Disney, ABC's parent company, took questions from a group of ABC News correspondents and compared our status in the corporate structure to that of the Disney artists who create the company's world famous cartoons. (He clearly and sincerely intended the analogy to flatter us.) Even they, Eisner pointed out, were expected to make budget cuts; we would have to do the same.

I mentioned several names to Eisner and asked if he recognized any. He did not. They were, I said, ABC correspondents and cameramen who had been killed or wounded while on assignment. While appreciating the enormous talent of the corporation's cartoonists, I pointed out that working on a television crew, covering wars, revolutions and natural disasters, was different. The suggestion was not well received.

The parent companies of all three networks would ultimately find a common way of dealing with the risk and expense inherent in operating news bureaus around the world: They would eliminate them. Peter Jennings and I, who joined ABC News within a year of each other in the early 1960s, were profoundly influenced by our years as foreign correspondents. When we became the anchors and managing editors of our respective programs, we tried to make sure foreign news remained a major ingredient. It was a struggle.

Peter called me one afternoon in the mid-'90s to ask whether we at "Nightline" had been receiving the same inquiries that he and his producers were getting at "World News Tonight." We had, indeed, been getting calls from company bean-counters wanting to know how many times our program had used a given overseas bureau in the preceding year. This data in hand, the accountants constructed the simplest of equations: Divide the cost of running a bureau by the number of television segments it produced. The cost, inevitably, was deemed too high to justify leaving the bureau as it was. Trims led to cuts and, in most cases, to elimination.

The networks say they still maintain bureaus around the world, but whereas in the 1960s I was one of 20 to 30 correspondents working out of fully staffed offices in more than a dozen major capitals, for the most part, a "bureau" now is just a local fixer who speaks English and can facilitate the work of a visiting producer or a correspondent in from London.

Much of the American public used to gather before the electronic hearth every evening, separate but together, while Walter Cronkite, Chet Huntley, David Brinkley, Frank Reynolds and Howard K. Smith offered relatively unbiased accounts of information that their respective news organizations believed the public needed to know. The ritual permitted, and perhaps encouraged, shared perceptions and even the possibility of compromise among those who disagreed.

It was an imperfect, untidy little Eden of journalism where reporters were motivated to gather facts about important issues. We didn't know that we could become profit centers. No one had bitten into that apple yet.

The transition of news from a public service to a profitable commodity is irreversible. Legions of new media present a vista of unrelenting competition. Advertisers crave young viewers, and these young viewers are deemed to be uninterested in hard news, especially hard news from abroad. This is felicitous, since covering overseas news is very expensive. On the other hand, the appetite for strongly held, if unsubstantiated, opinion is demonstrably high. And such talk, as they say, is cheap.

Broadcast news has been outflanked and will soon be overtaken by scores of other media options. The need for clear, objective reporting in a world of rising religious fundamentalism, economic interdependence and global ecological problems is probably greater than it has ever been. But we are no longer a national audience receiving news from a handful of trusted gatekeepers; we're now a million or more clusters of consumers, harvesting information from like-minded providers.

As you may know, Olbermann returned to his MSNBC program after just two days of enforced absence. (Given cable television's short attention span, two days may well have seemed like an "indefinite suspension.") He was gracious about the whole thing, acknowledging at least the historical merit of the rule he had broken: "It's not a stupid rule," he said. "It needs to be adapted to the realities of 21st-century journalism."

There is, after all, not much of a chance that 21st-century journalism will be adapted to conform with the old rules. Technology and the market are offering a tantalizing array of channels, each designed to fill a particular niche—sports, weather, cooking, religion—and an infinite variety of news, prepared and seasoned to reflect our taste, just the way we like it. As someone used to say in a bygone era, "That's the way it is."

(Ted Koppel, who was managing editor of ABC's "Nightline" from 1980 to 2005, is a contributing analyst for "BBC World News America.")

20101124-01	10:35	Pam	"Dirty Coal, Clean Future"
-------------	-------	-----	----------------------------

Dear SteveB,

After so much grumbling about this and that, I think I've found something to be optimistic about. I just read an article in The Atlantic by James Fallows [below] on the cooperation between China and the U.S. regarding clean energy.

Apparently the Chinese are miles ahead of us and are leading the way toward getting a handle on climate change. Perhaps if the Chinese become our economic allies we'll be able to salvage the 21st century. The downside is that Congress moves so slowly that we lag decades behind in being able to implement change. Businesses are making their own deals without waiting for governments to get off the dime. It might just be that corporations are the governments of the future. I'm not too comfortable with that, but what do I know?

"Dirty Coal, Clean Future" by James Fallows, The Atlantic

Dec. 2010, (<http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2010/12/dirty-coal-clean-future/8307/>)

(To environmentalists, "clean coal" is an insulting oxymoron. But for now, the only way to meet the world's energy needs, and to arrest climate change before it produces irreversible cataclysm, is to use coal—dirty, sooty, toxic coal—in more-sustainable ways. The good news is that new technologies are making this possible. China is now the leader in this area, the Google and Intel of the energy world. If we are serious about global warming, America needs to work with China to build a greener future on a foundation of coal. Otherwise, the clean-energy revolution will leave us behind, with grave costs for the world's climate and our economy.)

THROUGH THE PAST four years I've often suggested that China's vaunted achievements are less impressive, or at least more complicated, seen up close. Yes, Chinese factories make nearly all of the world's consumer electronic equipment. But the brand names, designs, and most of the profits usually belong to companies and people outside China. Yes, China's accumulated trade surpluses have made it the creditor for America and much of the world. But the huge share of its own wealth that China has sunk into foreign economies ties its fate to theirs. Yes, more and more Chinese people are very rich. But hundreds of millions of Chinese people are still very poor. Yes, Chinese factories lead the world in output of windmills and solar-power panels. But China's environmental situation is still so dire as to pose the main threat not just to the country's public health and political stability but also to its own economic expansion.

This report will have a different tone. I have been learning about an area of Chinese achievement that is objectively good for the world as a whole, including the United States. Surprising enough! And China's achievement dramatically highlights a structural advantage of its approach and a weakness of America's. It involves the shared global effort to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions, of which China and the United States are respectively the No. 1 and No. 2 producers, together creating more than 40 percent of the world's total output. That shared effort is real, and important. The significant Chinese developments involve more than the "clean tech" boom that Americans have already heard so much about. Instead a different, less publicized, and much less appealing-sounding effort may matter even more in determining whether the United States and China can cooperate to reduce emissions. This involves not clean tech but the dirtiest of today's main energy sources—coal.

Mining coal is notoriously dangerous, the remnants of those mines disfigure the Earth, and the by-products of coal's combustion fill the air not simply with soot, smoke, and carbon dioxide but also with toxic heavy metals like mercury and lead, plus corrosive oxides of nitrogen and sulfur, among other pollutants. When I visited coal towns in China's Shandong and Shanxi provinces, my face, arms, and hands would be rimed in black by the end of each day—even when I hadn't gone near a mine. People in those towns, like their predecessors in industrial-age Europe and America, have the same black coating on their throats and lungs, of course. When I have traveled at low altitude in small airplanes above America's active coal-mining regions—West Virginia and Kentucky in the East, Wyoming and its neighbors in the Great Basin region of the West—I've seen the huge scars left by "mountain top removal" and open-pit mining for coal, which are usually invisible from the road and harder to identify from six miles up in an airliner. Compared with most other fossil-fuel sources of energy, coal is inherently worse from a carbon-footprint perspective, since its hydrogen atoms come bound with more carbon atoms, meaning that coal starts with a higher carbon-to-hydrogen ratio than oil, natural gas, or other hydrocarbons.

The proposition that coal could constitute any kind of "hope" or solution, or that a major environmentalist action plan could be called "Coal Without Carbon," as one I will describe is indeed named—this goes beyond seeming interestingly contrarian to seeming simply wrong. For the coal industry, the term "clean coal" is an advertising slogan; for many in the environmental movement, it is an insulting oxymoron. But two ideas that underlie the term are taken with complete seriousness by businesses, scientists, and government officials in China and America, and are the basis of the most extensive cooperation now under way between the countries on climate issues. One is that coal can be used in less damaging, more sustainable ways than it is now. The other is that it must be used in those ways, because there is no plausible other way to meet what will be, absent an economic or social cataclysm, the world's unavoidable energy demands.

This is not an argument against all-out effort on all other fronts, from conservation and efficiency to improved battery technology to wind- and solar-power systems to improved nuclear facilities. Amory Lovins, of the Rocky Mountain Institute, has argued for years that designing buildings and transportation systems to waste less energy from the start is by far the cheapest way to reduce damaging emissions (a position reinforced by influential studies from McKinsey & Company). "Good ideas about climate change are not in competition with one another," Roger Aines, a climate scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, told me when I visited this summer. "We need every possible solution, and then we need more."

This is an argument for recognizing that China has faced reality, in launching an all-out effort to "de-carbonize" coal—and for recognizing America's difficulty in doing the same.

37 Billion Tons

Let's review the basics. This material will be elementary for some readers and controversial for a few others, but laying it out helps clarify the problem to be solved and the real options from which to choose. Also, the quantities and numbers involved here are so vast—the standard unit in discussing carbon-dioxide emissions is the gigaton, or 1 billion metric tons—that it helps to have some indicators of scale.

All human activity together puts roughly 37 billion tons (37 gigatons) of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere each year. That number has been rising, as the world's population grows and the number of cars, factories, and power plants increases. Twenty years ago, it was less than 25 billion tons. Twenty years from now, it could well be 50 billion tons. Carbon dioxide is not the only greenhouse gas—that is, a substance that affects the atmosphere's ability to absorb and emit heat, so that a growing portion of the sun's energy is trapped to warm the planet rather than radiating back into space. Methane, nitrous oxide, aerosols, and other emissions play a major role, and ton per ton can be more powerful in greenhouse effect. But the focus is on carbon dioxide because we produce so much of it, and because its effects are so long-lasting.

Carbon dioxide added to the atmosphere persists for many decades, even centuries—unlike methane, which can disperse within a single decade. This means that when more carbon dioxide is emitted than natural systems absorb, the concentration in the atmosphere continually goes up. Before James Watt invented the steam engine in the late 1700s—that is, before human societies had much incentive to burn coal and later oil in large quantities—the concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere was around 280 parts per million, or ppm (meaning 280 carbon-dioxide molecules per million molecules of "dried air," or air with the water removed). It is thought to have fluctuated between about 180 and 280 ppm through the previous 800,000 years. By 1900, as Europe and North America were industrializing, it had reached about 300 ppm.

Now the carbon-dioxide concentration is at or above 390 ppm, which is probably the highest level in many millions of years. "We know that the last time CO₂ was sustained at this level, much of the Greenland and West Antarctic ice sheets were not there," Michael Mann, a climate scientist at Penn State, told me. Because of the 37 billion annual tons of carbon-dioxide emissions, the atmospheric carbon-dioxide level continues to go up by about two ppm a year. For perspective: by the time today's sixth-graders finish high school, the world carbon-dioxide level will probably have passed 400 ppm, and by the time most of them are starting families, it will have entered the 420s.

Have we so far come across anything that is "controversial"? No: such political controversy as exists mainly concerns the exact connection between rising carbon-dioxide levels and future climate change, and how harmful (and to whom) that change would be. That the atmospheric carbon-dioxide level is rapidly going up, and that recent years have been on average the warmest in recorded history, no one bothers to dispute. And in any case, all parties to the negotiations I'm describing, including the heads of the major coal-mining and electric-power utilities in the United States and China, accept as settled fact that greenhouse-gas emissions are an emergency they must confront, because of the likely disruptive effects on the world's climate. At a U.S.-China environmental conference this summer in San Francisco, I heard one utility-company official after another testify, confession-meeting style, about the vast extent of their current emissions and their need to reform.

The main uncertainties involve what might happen as carbon-dioxide levels reach 450 ppm and above. In particular, the question is how and when "positive feedback" loops would kick in, so that the hotter things get, the faster they will get even hotter. The main way this would happen would be through melting of the polar ice sheets, which would mean less white ice surface to reflect the sun's heat, and more blue water surface to absorb it. Similarly, the vast Arctic permafrost areas could have a positive-feedback effect as they thaw. They are essentially frozen peat bogs, which contain huge amounts of methane. As they began to melt, they would release their methane, which in turn could trigger even faster melting and more methane release.

"The reality of it is that in many cases, there may not be any fixed threshold for 'irreversible' change," Michael Mann told me. "What we have with rising CO2 levels in general is a dramatically increasing probability of serious and deleterious change in our climate." He went down the list: more frequent, severe, and sustained heat waves, like those that affected Russia and the United States this summer; more frequent and destructive hurricanes and floods; more frequent droughts, like the "thousand-year drought" that has devastated Australian agriculture; and altered patterns of the El Niño phenomenon, which will change rainfall patterns in the Americas. In other cases, he said, there could be important thresholds. For example, the possibility of dramatic rises in ocean levels, which could affect the habitability of New York, London, Shanghai, Miami, the entire Netherlands, and many other modern conurbations, along with coastal areas in India, Bangladesh, and elsewhere. "It would be nice to know where such thresholds are so we can avoid crossing them," Mann said. "We can't know that. What we do know for certain is that with each fraction of a degree of warming, the probability of such potentially catastrophic outcomes goes up."

The Inevitability of Coal

That's the big picture. Now come the parts of the background that are somewhat less familiar but bear on the argument that the only real salvation must involve coal.

Recall the 37 billion tons of worldwide annual carbon-dioxide emissions. On a per capita basis, that would mean about six tons for each of the planet's 6-billion-plus people. But of course it doesn't work that way. For the United States, emissions are about 25 tons per person. For Europe as a whole, they're about 11 tons. (The difference is smaller houses, smaller cars, fewer sprawling suburbs, and in the case of France, much heavier reliance on nuclear power to generate electricity. Nuclear plants are expensive and obviously create waste-disposal problems, but they emit practically no greenhouse gases.) Japan's level is slightly below Europe's. For China, the emission level is about eight tons per person. Overall, China's economy is more energy-intensive than America's or Europe's—its bias toward construction and heavy manufacturing, plus its on-average shoddy standard of building insulation, mean that it takes more fuel, electricity, and raw energy to produce a dollar's worth of output in China than in the U.S. But overall living standards are still so much lower in China that per capita emissions there are barely one-third the U.S. level. India's per capita emission level is about three tons per year, less than half of China's (because India has so many fewer factories). For Kenya and other barely industrialized countries, it's about one ton per person per year.

The range of these figures suggests the technical challenges ahead. As one climate scientist put it to me, "To stabilize the CO2 concentration in the atmosphere, the whole world on average would need to get down to the Kenya level"—a 96 percent reduction for the United States. The figures also suggest the diplomatic challenges for American negotiators in recommending that other countries, including those with hundreds of millions in poverty, forgo the energy-intensive path toward wealth that the United States has traveled for so many years.

Indeed, in comparisons between the United States and China, the emissions figures probably understate the real gap in per capita energy use. David Mohler is the chief technology officer for Duke Energy Company, which is based in Charlotte and is a leading electricity and natural-gas provider in the Carolinas and parts of the Midwest. He travels frequently to China, and he took me through a comparison of electricity use in the two countries, as a proxy for overall energy use and emissions. At face value, he said, there was about a 5-to-1 difference between U.S. and Chinese per capita electricity-use levels. Each American is on average responsible for about 13.6 megawatt-hours of electricity use per year, counting residential heating and lighting, a pro-rated share of industrial and commercial demand, and so on. For each Chinese, the average is about 2.6. "But around half of that Chinese electricity consumption was for manufactured products for export," Mohler said. That is, China's surge in electric capacity has disproportionately gone toward its factory-export boom, rather than toward home air-conditioning and lighting, elevators, TVs and computers, electric cars, or any other in-China use by Chinese people (though to see a blazingly lit Chinese city at night is to recognize that plenty of power is already being used). "So in a sense, their 'real' per capita use is only about 1.5 megawatt-hours," Mohler said, "and ours, counting what went into the products we import, could be 10 times that much."

Mohler's point was less about abstract equity than practical reality. People in rural China, in my experience, don't really care that people somewhere else—Los Angeles or Houston, even Shanghai or Tianjin—are using more electricity and gasoline than they are. They just want to use more themselves! I assume the same to be true of their counterparts from Nigeria to India to North Korea. "You go in the countryside in China, and people don't have any power to pump their water," Mohler said. "Of course they're going to want those powered pumps. Anyone would." And hot water for their baths, and refrigerators for their kitchens, and air-conditioners for their bedrooms—and cars.

Thus the bind. The atmosphere needs to absorb dramatically less carbon dioxide, while people around the world are certain to want dramatically more of the products and comforts whose creation and operation send carbon dioxide and other gases into the sky.

Isn't "clean energy" the answer? Of course—because everything is the answer. The people I spoke with and reports I read differed in emphasis, sometimes significantly. Some urged greater stress on efficiency and conservation; some, a faster move toward nuclear power or natural gas; some, an all-out push for solar power and other renewable sources; others, immediate preparation for "geo-engineering" or "abatement" projects to offset the effects of climate disruption once they occur. But in a sense they were all in harmony, because everything on all the lists works toward the same end.

The best-known illustration of the need for an all-fronts approach is the "carbon wedge" analysis from the Carbon Mitigation Initiative at Princeton. Its premise is that to keep the carbon-dioxide level from going into the 500s, or twice its pre-industrial-age level, over the next 50 years, the world collectively will need to reduce its carbon-dioxide emissions by a total of about 26 billion tons per year. (Technically, CMI measures its goals in billions of tons of carbon contained within the carbon dioxide. For clarity, I've converted the figures.) To reach that total, CMI proposes seven "stabilization wedges" of a little less than 4 billion tons of carbon dioxide each. A 4-billion-ton "wedge" through efficiency efforts of all kinds; another wedge of that size through renewable power; another through avoiding deforestation and changing agricultural practices. Eventually it adds up. "There are many good options," Julio Friedmann, a geologist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, told me soon after I first met him in Beijing two years ago. "But there are no unlimited options. Each is limited by cost, limited by scale, limited by physics and chemistry, limited by thermodynamics. For example, there's nothing wrong with switchgrass as a biofuel"—one of George W. Bush's novel proposals—"but there's not a lot of energy in it."

We'll hear from Friedmann again. This emphasis on limits is what begins pointing us back to coal.

"Emotionally, we would all like to think that wind, solar, and conservation will solve the problem for us," David Mohler of Duke Energy told me. "Nothing will change, our comfort and convenience will be the same, and we can avoid that nasty coal. Unfortunately, the math doesn't work that way."

The math he has in mind starts with the role that coal now plays around the world, and especially for the two biggest energy consumers, America and China. Overall, coal-burning power plants provide nearly half (about 46 percent this year) of the electricity consumed in the United States. For the record: natural gas supplies another 23 percent, nuclear power about 20 percent, hydroelectric power about 7 percent, and everything else the remaining 4 or 5 percent. The small size of the "everything else" total is worth noting; even if it doubles or triples, the solutions we often hear the most about won't come close to meeting total demand. In China, coal-fired plants supply an even larger share of much faster-growing total electric demand: at least 70 percent, with the Three Gorges Dam and similar hydroelectric projects providing about 20 percent, and (in order) natural gas, nuclear power, wind, and solar energy making up the small remainder. For the world as a whole, coal-fired plants provide about half the total electric supply. On average, every American uses the electricity produced by 7,500 pounds of coal each year.

Precisely because coal already plays such a major role in world power supplies, basic math means that it will inescapably do so for a very long time. For instance: through the past decade, the United States has talked about, passed regulations in favor of, and made technological breakthroughs in all fields of renewable energy. Between 1995 and 2008, the amount of electricity coming from solar power rose by two-thirds in the United States, and wind-generated electricity went up more than 15-fold. Yet over those same years, the amount of electricity generated by coal went up much faster, in absolute terms, than electricity generated from any other source. The journalist Robert Bryce has drawn on U.S. government figures to show that between 1995 and 2008, "the absolute increase in total electricity produced by coal was about 5.8 times as great as the increase from wind and 823 times as great as the increase from solar"—and this during the dawn of the green-energy era in America. Power generated by the wind and sun increased significantly in America last year; but power generated by coal increased more than seven times as much. As Americans have read many times, Chinese companies are the world's leaders in manufacturing solar panels, often using technology originally developed in the United States. Many of the panels are used inside China for its own rapidly growing solar-power system; still, solar energy accounts for about 1 percent of its total power supply. In his book Power Hungry, Bryce describes a visit to a single coal mine, the Cardinal Mine in western Kentucky, whose daily output supports three-quarters as much electricity generation as all the solar and wind facilities in the United States combined. David MacKay, of the physics department at Cambridge University in England, has compiled an encyclopedia of such energy-related comparisons, which is available for free download (under the misleadingly lowbrow title Sustainable Energy—Without the Hot Air). For instance: he calculates that if the windiest 10 percent of the entire British landmass were completely covered with wind turbines, they would produce power roughly equivalent to half of what Britons expend merely by driving each day.

Similar patterns apply even more starkly in China. Other sources of power are growing faster in relative terms, but year by year the most dramatic increase is in China's use of coal. "Coal simply is going to be with us for decades," a technical adviser to China's energy ministry told me this summer in Beijing. "We hope someday to have 15 percent of our power from renewable sources. Even so, the percentage of power generated by coal will not drop by more than a few points, and the absolute amount will quickly grow." Another government energy expert in Beijing said that the only serious limit on how fast Chinese power companies can increase their use of coal is the capacity of the country's transportation system. "It's kind of an existential question, whether they can handle the physical volumes they are planning to consume," he said. "Right now railroads are at capacity, you have entire highways being blocked with coal trucks, and the problems cascade." Part of the reason China has committed some $80 billion over the next decade to build light-rail networks across the country is to get human passengers off the main rail lines, opening up more capacity to move coal.

"People without a technical background think, 'Coal is dirty! It's bad,'" I was told in Beijing by Ming Sung, a geologist and energy expert who was born in Shanghai, worked for decades in America and became a citizen, and has now returned to China. "But will you turn off your refrigerator for 30 years while we work on renewables? Turn off the computer? Or ask people in China to do that? Unless you will, you can't get rid of coal for decades. As [U.S. Energy Secretary] Steven Chu has said, we have to face the nightmare of coal for a while."

Coal will be with us because it is abundant: any projected "peak coal" stage would come many decades after the world reaches "peak oil." It will be with us because of where it's located: the top four coal-reserve countries are the United States, Russia, China, and India, which together have about 40 percent of the world's population and more than 60 percent of its coal. It will be with us because its direct costs are in most circumstances far lower than those of the alternatives—that's why so much is used. (Prices vary widely from place to place and company to company, but one utility executive said that the lowest-price coal plant might generate electricity for 2 cents per kilowatt-hour, while the same amount of power from a new wind farm in the same area might cost 20 cents.) It will be with us because its indirect costs, in miner deaths, environmental destruction, and carbon burden on the atmosphere are unregulated and "externalized." Power companies that answer to shareholders or ratepayers have a hard time justifying a more expensive choice. "Coal is so cheap because its dirtiness still doesn't count against it," an air-pollution expert with the Natural Resources Defense Council told The Wall Street Journal 10 years ago. In the absence of climate legislation in the United States and international agreements to reduce emissions, the dirtiness still doesn't count. Coal will be with us because changing a power infrastructure—like building a new transportation system or extending cable or fiber-optic connections through an entire country—is the very opposite of a "virtual" process, and takes many years to complete.

And it will be with us because of a surprising constraint: after a century in which medical diagnosis and treatment, computer and communications systems, aerospace and nanotech industries, and nearly every other form of technology have routinely achieved the magical, energy production is essentially what it was in the time of James Watt. With the main exception of nuclear-power plants and the hoped-for future exception of practical nuclear-fusion systems, we mostly create electricity by burning something that was once underground—coal, oil, natural gas—to boil water and turn turbines with the steam. (Windmills use the wind's force, and hydropower systems use falling water, to turn turbines directly.) The computer of 10 years from now will be unrecognizably more powerful than today's, and its predictably increased capability will make medical, navigation, and other systems better, too. If the power plant of 10 years from now is even slightly more efficient than today's, that will be a major achievement. The most advanced of today's "ultra-supercritical" coal-fired plants, which operate at very high temperatures and pressures to maximize the efficiency of combustion, convert up to 48 percent of the coal's potential energy to electric power; the rest is lost as heat. "Subcritical" plants typically have efficiencies in the mid-30s. The costliest and most advanced technology is an improvement—but not a breakthrough. A breakthrough is what it would take to move beyond reliance on coal.

"I know this is a theological issue for some people," Julio Friedmann of Lawrence Livermore said. "Solar and wind power are going to be important, but it is really hard to get them beyond 10 percent of total power supply." He pointed out the huge engineering achievement it has taken to raise the efficiency of solar photovoltaic cells from about 25 percent to about 30 percent; whereas "to make them useful, you would need improvements of two- or threefold in cost," say from about 18 cents per kilowatt-hour to 6 cents. He recited a skeptic's line used about the Carter administration's clean-energy programs—"You're not going to run a steel plant with solar panels"—and then made a point that summarized the outlook of those who have decided they can best wage the climate fight by working on dirty, destructive coal.

"It is very hard to go around the world and think you can make any difference in carbon-loading the atmosphere without some plan for how people can continue to use coal," Friedmann said. "It is by far the most prevalent and efficient way to generate electricity. People are going to use it. There is no story of climate progress without a story for coal. In particular, U.S.-China progress on coal.”

The Technical Challenge

What would progress on coal entail? The proposals are variations on two approaches: ways to capture carbon dioxide before it can escape into the air and ways to reduce the carbon dioxide that coal produces when burned. In “post-combustion” systems, the coal is burned normally, but then chemical or physical processes separate carbon dioxide from the plume of hot flue gas that comes out of the smokestack. Once “captured” as a relatively pure stream of carbon dioxide, this part of the exhaust is pressurized into liquid form and then sold or stored. Refitting an existing coal plant can be very costly. “It’s like trying to remodel your home into a mansion,” a coal-plant manager told me in Beijing. “It’s more expensive, and it’s never quite right.” Apart from research projects, only two relatively small coal-fired power plants now operate in America with post-combustion capture.

Designing a capture system into a plant from the start is cheaper than doing refits. But even then the “parasitic load” of energy required to treat, compress, and otherwise handle the separated stream of carbon dioxide can come to 30 percent or more of the total output of a coal-fired power plant—so even more coal must be burned (and mined and shipped) to produce the same supply of electricity. Without mandatory emission limits or carbon prices, burning coal more cleanly is inevitably more expensive than simply burning coal the old way. “When people like me look for funding for carbon capture, the financial community asks, ‘Why should we do that now?’” an executive of a major American electric utility told me. “If there were a price on carbon”—a tax on carbon-dioxide emissions—“you could plug in, say, a loss of $30 to $50 per ton, and build a business case.”

“Pre-combustion” systems are fundamentally more efficient. In them, the coal is treated chemically to produce a flammable gas with lower carbon content than untreated coal. This means less carbon dioxide going up the smokestack to be separated and stored.

Either way, pre- or post-, the final step in dealing with carbon is “sequestration”—doing something with the carbon dioxide that has been isolated at such cost and effort, so it doesn’t just escape into the air. Carbon dioxide has a surprisingly large number of small-scale commercial uses, starting with adding the sparkle to carbonated soft drinks. (This is not a big help on the climate front, since the carbon dioxide is “sequestered” only until you pop open the bottle’s top.) All larger-scale, longer-term proposals for storing carbon involve injecting it deep underground, into porous rock that will trap it indefinitely. In the right geological circumstances, the captured carbon dioxide can even be used for “enhanced oil recovery,” forcing oil out of the porous rock into which it is introduced and up into wells.

These efforts are in one way completely different from “advanced research and development” as we often conceive of it, and in another way very much the same. They are different in that the scientists and entrepreneurs involved do not seem to count on, or even hope for, the large breakthroughs we have come to assume in biological sciences and info-tech. Consistent with two centuries of incremental improvement in power systems since the time of James Watt, practical refinements and ever-improving efficiency are the goal. They are similar in the operational advantage conferred by doing. Because Google indexes more data and handles more queries than any competitor, it can more quickly determine which innovations are succeeding (News, Translate, Earth, Maps) and which are failing (Wave), and exactly how the promising products still need to be improved. The first million copies of each new chip that Intel produces help it debug the production process, so that subsequent millions are cheaper and increasingly defect-free. “Whenever you scale something up, there are always differences from what you planned,” an engineer from a major American technology company told me. “It’s never quite the same. China is building plants like mad, so they can afford to experiment. We are not.”

In the search for “progress on coal,” like other forms of energy research and development, China is now the Google, the Intel, the General Motors and Ford of their heyday—the place where the doing occurs, and thus the learning by doing as well. “They are doing so much so fast that their learning curve is at an inflection that simply could not be matched in the United States,” David Mohler of Duke Energy told me.

“In America, it takes a decade to get a permit for a plant,” a U.S. government official who works in China said. “Here, they build the whole thing in 21 months. To me, it’s all about accelerating our way to the right technologies, which will be much slower without the Chinese.

“You can think of China as a huge laboratory for deploying technology,” the official added. “The energy demand is going like this”—his hand mimicked an airplane taking off—“and they need to build new capacity all the time. They can go from concept to deployment in half the time we can, sometimes a third. We have some advanced ideas. They have the capability to deploy it very quickly. That is where the partnership works.”

The good aspects of this partnership have unfolded at a quickening pace over the past decade, through a surprisingly subtle and complex web of connections among private, governmental, and academic institutions in both countries. Perhaps I should say unsurprisingly, since the relationships among American and Chinese organizations in the energy field in some ways resemble the manufacturing supply chains that connect factories in China with designers, inventors, and customers in the United States and elsewhere. The difference in this case is how much faster the strategic advantage seems to be shifting to the Chinese side.

In the normal manufacturing supply chain—Apple creating computers, Walmart outsourcing clothes and toys—the United States provides branding, design, and a major market for products, while China supplies labor, machines, and the ability to turn concepts into products at very high speed. In the quest for cleaner coal, America’s contribution is mainly “soft power”—advice, coordination, prodding, and expertise—in hopes of influencing what Chinese organizations do.

Ten years ago, at the end of the Clinton administration, the Chinese and American governments signed a “Fossil Energy Protocol,” to coordinate research on better use of coal and oil. Political leaders have come and gone since then, but the cast of technicians, civil servants, and business officials on each side has been relatively stable and has gotten used to working together. After taking office as secretary of energy last year, Steven Chu—a celebrity in China because of his Chinese heritage and his Nobel Prize—gave a new push to these efforts, hiring additional staff members for the U.S.-China office and committing $75 million to a joint Clean Energy Research Center.

The efforts of two scientists we’ve already met, Julio Friedmann and Ming Sung, illustrate what Americans can and cannot do to shape what happens in China—and the mounting advantages on China’s side relative to America’s.

Friedmann, who is in his mid-40s, has become one of the world’s experts on sequestration: how and where carbon dioxide can safely be stored underground. He was trained in geology at MIT and the University of Southern California and initially went to work for ExxonMobil. But by the early 2000s he had become fascinated with the emerging science of underground carbon-dioxide storage. “At that point, it was clear that nearly all of the really cool work was being done in the national labs,” he told me. In 2004 he and his family moved from Maryland to California, where he joined Lawrence Livermore. He is now the head of the Carbon Management Program there and the technical leader of a government-university-business consortium that this summer won a Department of Energy competition to help develop carbon-sequestration projects in China. To give an idea of the consortium’s range, it includes three universities, three national laboratories, two scientific nongovernmental organizations, and six large corporations, among them General Electric, Duke Energy, and AEP.

After talking with Friedmann many times in China, I finally asked about the ethnic derivation of his name. His grandparents were Ashkenazim from Poland and Hungary who left for Latin America in the 1930s; his parents, raised in Colombia and Venezuela, met on an arranged date at Grossinger’s in the Catskills. Although Friedmann bikes to work through the bucolic Northern California setting of the Lawrence Livermore lab—a setting punctuated by the watchtowers and electrified fencing that surround the plutonium stockpile for the lab’s weapons-research center—he comes across as a fast-talking, high-pressure East Coast urban type.

In many meetings in America and China in the past two years, I have seen him turn that intensity to one great question: how quickly geologists from America and elsewhere can work with their counterparts in China to improve systems for pumping carbon dioxide underground, and to identify the right rock formations where it can safely be stored. On a typical trip to China, he will spend half his time in Beijing or Shanghai, meeting with government and corporate officials—and the other half in Xi’an or the Inner Mongolian wilderness, where many of the most promising storage locations are found. What he and his team have to offer, from the American part of the supply chain, is expertise on geological formations, on computer models for how the “plume” of liquefied carbon dioxide will settle into porous rock, and on other benefits of America’s decades of experience in petroleum geology. He can also put Chinese plant managers, scientists, and bureaucrats in touch with overseas counterparts they would otherwise never meet. “Projects like these are sort of like the school dance,” he told me. “You’re not getting married, but you’re figuring out how to interact. We need to start the process in a way that gives people the confidence to do it again, and again, and again. The confidence is the product.” The more often Chinese and foreign officials work together, the more easily they continue to work together. This might sound trivial, but I’ve become convinced that the steady expansion of these contacts will make a major difference in how an ever more powerful China deals with the rest of the world. What does Friedmann, or the United States, get from the process? “More tons sequestered, rather than emitted, in China,” he told me. But also something unavailable in America: a chance to see new technology in new plants and learn how it works. “In the U.S. today, there is not a single demonstration of capturing CO₂ from a coal-fired plant at large scale," he said. "The technologies have been a little too expensive to actually implement. That's why we started looking at China." They can afford to build, and Americans can hope to watch and learn.

Ming Sung's role illustrates a similar balance of influence and knowledge between the United States and China. Sung, who is in his early 60s, was born in Shanghai and raised there and in Hong Kong, where his family fled in 1958. Ten years later he came to the United States for college and graduate studies in geology. He became a U.S. citizen, worked in the newly formed Department of Energy during the Carter administration, and then left for a 25-year career around the world as an executive with Shell Oil. After he retired from Shell and founded a software company, he and his wife decided to move back to China. He now works in Beijing for a Boston-based nonprofit environmental group called the Clean Air Task Force. (Disclosure: my sister is on the board.)

In the early 2000s the task force, originally a conventional anti-air-pollution group, embraced the necessity of cleaning up coal. In Beijing, Sung gave me a copy of its latest working paper, in both Chinese and English, called "Coal Without Carbon."

The group has sponsored research on sequestration, on post-combustion capture, and on the "cleanest" of the emerging pre-combustion coal technologies—"underground coal gasification." In this process, jets of air (or pure oxygen), sometimes with steam or various chemicals, are blasted into coal seams deep underground. They interact chemically with the coal to produce a gas that flows back up a pipe and can be burned. It leaves in the ground much of the carbon, sulfur, nitrogen, and other elements that create greenhouse gases and other pollutants when coal is burned.

"And this can be very cheap," Sung told me. "You don't have to mine the coal. You don't have to send men underground or haul coal around or dispose of ash. All the dirty stuff stays buried." Because of these and other savings, he said, coal used this way could match or beat the price of today's standard dirty power plant.

But in advocating the whole range of "clean coal" technologies, Sung and his team have the same problem Julio Friedmann has with carbon sequestration: it's not happening in the United States. There's one significant exception: the Texas Clean Energy Project, a plant being built outside Odessa, which will apply underground-gasification technology to capture 90 percent of its carbon, more than any other commercial plant in the world. It received a $450 million federal award, just over half from the Department of Energy's Clean Coal Power Initiative and the rest from the American Recovery and Reinvestment stimulus program (toward the $2.1 billion total capital cost). If it works as promised, this facility will be an advance over any coal-fired plant operating anywhere: it will gasify coal underground, eliminating the cost and damage of mining; it will sell urea (for fertilizer) and other chemical by-products of the underground gasification; and it will use the captured carbon dioxide for enhanced oil recovery in the nearby Permian Basin oil fields—all in addition to generating power. [Correction: The de-carbonization and other cleanup steps that make this plant distinctive are done above rather than underground. For full details, see <http://www.texascleanenergyproject.com/about-tcep>.] But otherwise, to see new technology in action and to influence the next dozen coal plants being built in the world, Ming Sung had to go back to China.

"For the last 30 years, we have not been able to build a coal-to-gas conversion plant in this country," a U.S. coal-company official told me. "China has done many. That is what we need to learn from them, all that production and operating experience." And in exchange? "We do have safety and environmental information that we can definitely provide."

Ten years ago, the United States and many other countries set joint targets of building a series of experimental low-emissions, high-efficiency coal-fired power plants: FutureGen in America, ZeroGen in Australia, various European efforts without a "Gen" name, and GreenGen in China. America's FutureGen was proposed early, and China's GreenGen was proposed late. Now—surprise!—GreenGen is closest to being completed, with its scheduled opening moved up from 2015 to 2013, and FutureGen has only recently begun to move beyond the congressional-wrangling stage.

What Sung takes from the interaction is both operational knowledge and the chance to influence China's decisions in some way. What he has provided is another sort of connection, between Chinese organizations and the private businesses that mine coal and generate electricity in the United States. "That is the reason we are here—to get companies together," Sung said. "It is taking too long for governments to agree on policies, so we believe in B-to-B connections." At a crucial point, he arranged a meeting in Beijing between the CEO of Duke Energy, Jim Rogers, and Zhang Guobao, vice chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission, essentially China's director of industrial policy. "After the meeting, Zhang said, 'I fully support this collaboration,'" Sung told me. "With that sentence, what more could you ask for?"

Duke got serious about China only two and a half years ago, after Rogers, the CEO, took his grandson on a trip there in the summer of 2008 as a high-school graduation present. The elder Rogers, like so many first-time visitors, was stunned by the scale and dynamism of what he saw. He immediately urged his senior management team to learn about and visit China. "There is something you can't sense from your office in America," the director of Duke's China operations, a 30-year-old woman named River Lu, told me. She grew up in Shenzhen, just north of Hong Kong. "Here you feel the pollution, you feel the growth, you feel the energy." (Her Chinese name is Lu Yun; she chose the English name "River" in her teens. The creativity and often beauty of these chosen names is a dependable pleasure of meeting young English-speaking Chinese.) Although she did not leave China until her mid-20s, for graduate work at the Monterey Institute of International Studies, she has a native-American accent, which she says comes from watching Friends and Ally McBeal on Hong Kong TV.

David Mohler, Duke's chief technology officer, was one of the first visitors and most frequent return travelers. "We learned that China is preparing, by 2025, for 350 million people to live in cities that don't exist now," he told me. "They have to build the equivalent of the U.S. electrical system"—that is, almost as much added capacity as the entire U.S. grid—"by 2025. It took us 120 years." Rogers, Mohler, and the company as a whole moved quickly from being impressed or frightened by Chinese growth to determining how they could work with it.

"We realized there was no way we could duplicate their speed, the scale, or the constancy of energy policy within the United States," Mohler said. "So we wondered if we could find Chinese partners to work with in applying these clean technologies, so we could bring the benefits of their speed and scale back to the United States." In his speeches and interviews, Rogers frequently emphasizes that by 2050, Duke will need to replace or rebuild every one of its existing power plants in the United States, except for its hydroelectric facilities. Some, because of age; the rest, to meet what Duke considers to be inevitably tightening clean-energy standards. "We will have a huge need for capital," Mohler said. Duke's capital budget for the next three years is $18 billion, and only in China can the company find that plus the operational experience of seeing cleaner-coal technologies as they are deployed. Duke Energy supported the Obama administration's now-abandoned climate bill, because it would have added predictability to the future standards the company will have to meet. With or without a bill, it is looking to China for future financing.

Within months of Rogers's first visit, Duke had opened an office in China, headed by River Lu. Within a year of the visit, in the summer of 2009, Duke signed an agreement for joint research with China's largest energy company, Huaneng, and with the government's Thermal Power Research Institute. Within the clean-energy world, the institute's director of technology, Xu Shisen, is a celebrity known for his advocacy of clean-coal projects. Huaneng has bought a share in a new low-emissions Duke plant in Edwardsport, Indiana. [Correction: The Memorandum of Understanding between Duke and Huaneng, which involves employees of each company visiting the other's plants and sharing information and research, does not include direct investment by Huaneng. Duke has a joint-venture understanding with another Chinese company, the ENN group, toward developing merchant solar panel plants in the United States.]

"As China meets its capacity, it is likely that the best technologies will be commercialized and applied here faster than anywhere else," River Lu said. "We want to be involved in that process."

CHINA'S COOPERATION WITH the United States on coal is good news for the world. If the two countries had decided to make this another arena for demonstrating their respective toughness—if, as at the failed Copenhagen talks last winter, they had mainly exchanged accusations about who was more to blame for emissions problems—they would have guaranteed that the problems could not be solved. If that cooperation breaks down, Julio Friedmann said, "we'll end up paying twice as much to get the same learnings—and delaying the technology on both sides by another decade." Both sides seem to have looked for ways to keep the cooperation going. They have not been in the newspapers, but they deserve recognition for attempting to do the world's work.

But China's very effectiveness and dynamism, beneficial as they may be in this case, highlight an American failure—a failure that seems not transient or incidental but deep and hard to correct.

The manifestation of the failure is that China is where the world's "doing" now goes on, in this industry and many others. If you want to learn how the power plants of the future will work, you must go to Tianjin—or Shanghai, or Chengdu—to find out. Power companies from America, Europe, and Japan are fortunate to have a place to learn. Young engineers and managers and entrepreneurs in China are fortunate that the companies teaching the rest of the world will be Chinese.

The deeper problem is the revealed difference in national capacity, in seriousness and ability to deliver. The Chinese government can decide to transform the country's energy system in 10 years, and no one doubts that it will. An incoming U.S. administration can promise to create a clean-energy revolution, but only naïfs believe that it will.

"The most impressive aspect of the Chinese performance is their determination to do what is needed," Julio Friedmann told me. "To be the first, to be the biggest, to have the best export technology for cleaning up coal." America obviously is not displaying comparable determination—and the saddest aspect of the U.S. performance, he said, is that it seems not deliberate but passive and accidental, the product of modern America's inability to focus public effort on public problems.

"No one in the U.S. government could ever imagine a 10-year plan to ensure U.S. leadership in solar power or batteries or anything else," Joseph Romm, a former Department of Energy official who now writes the blog Climate Progress, told me. "It's just not possible, so nobody even bothers to propose it."

The Chinese system as a whole has great weaknesses as well as great strengths. Its challenges, as I have reported so often in these pages, make the threats facing America look trivial by comparison. But its response to the energy challenge—including its commitment to dealing with the dirty, unavoidable reality of coal—reveals a seriousness about facing big problems that America now appears to lack.

20101126-01 08:08 SteveB Re: "Dirty Coal, Clean Future"

Dear Pam,

I'm so happy you have found something to be optimistic about, and I'm not shading that with sarcasm or anything. :-)

I hope you had a great Thanksgiving! I think it's such a great idea to have a holiday for expressing and thinking about thankfulness, and eating lots of good food with family and friends. We have so much to be thankful for in this incredible life. I don't ever want to lose sight of that.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Very good article, by the way.

20101128-01 08:38 SteveB Reasonable Cost Health Care

Dear GaryC,

[Email referenced is not in archive. —SteveB]

You are exactly right. If a poor country like Bolivia can have good, nearly free universal health care, why can't the mighty U.S.?

20101128-02 10:18 GaryC Re: Reasonable Cost Health Care

Dear SteveB,

Because we let politicians make a career out of serving the voters. Term limits would make politicians make good decisions for the voters and not for themselves. Too bad I am not in charge.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20101130-01 17:21 Dennis "5 Right-Wing Scumbags Bankrolling Dangerous (& Plain Weird) Conservative Causes"

The Sugar Daddy conspirators...

If you haven't gotten your fill of conspiracy theories about billionaire puppet masters by now, here are some more fine examples of why our country is in deep doo-doo because some people have too damn much money.

[I wonder why he left out the Koch brothers? —SteveB]

"5 Right-Wing Scumbags Bankrolling Dangerous (and Plain Weird) Conservative Causes" by Brad Reed, AlterNet

Nov. 29, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/module/printversion/149011>)

A non-insane observer of American politics might wonder why our elite policy makers are considering curbing our budget deficit by cutting Social Security and Medicare payments all while further lowering tax rates for high-income earners.

The answer is that most of our political class and establishment media have bought into the meme that rich people are so super-special that if we hurt their feelings by making them pay the same amount in taxes that they paid in the 1990s, they will get so depressed they will lose the will to work and no one in the country will ever have jobs again.

While this idea may seem insane to all sane people, it's actually one of many ideas promoted over the past several decades by wealthy right-wingers who have plunged significant sums of money into conservative think tanks, political candidates and advertising campaigns. You see, for some reason rich Americans aren't content to have five yachts and a butler named Willivers—rather, they seem obsessed with having the entire country leave red, white and blue smooch marks all over their rear ends.

And just who are these multimillionaire propagandists, you ask? Well, I'm sure you know all about the Koch brothers and Rupert Murdoch, since they've all been relatively high-profile lately. But there are plenty more right-wing sugar daddies out there. So without further ado, let's get started!

Right-Wing Sugar Daddy #1: Sheldon Adelson

Like most neoconservatives, Adelson's goal in life is to make sure the United States and Israel remain in a state of perpetual warfare against Arab countries until most of the world is destroyed. Adelson, who made his fortune as a Las Vegas casino mogul, made headlines in 2007 when he funded Freedom's Watch, a neoconservative advocacy group that supported wars wherever and whenever it could find them.

The group's first campaign was a $15 million ad blitz urging Americans to support the Iraq troop surge. One of the group's most notorious ads featured an Iraq war vet who lost both his legs during the war imploring Congress to keep funding the war indefinitely because "if we pull out now everything I've given and sacrificed will mean nothing." The ad also shamelessly conflated the Iraq war with the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks by showing pictures of the World Trade Center burning as the vet firmly reminded Americans that "they attacked us." From there, the group held a conference hyping up the dangers of Iran and radical Islam in general. Freedom's Watch disbanded in late 2008, after a sizable chunk of Adelson's spare cash went up in smoke—quite possibly the only good outcome from the global financial crisis.

Although Adelson's impact on U.S. policy is relatively small, he is much more of a factor in Israel where he invested a reported $180 million to launch the free Israel Hayom tabloid in 2007. The Israeli media apparently refer to the paper as "Bibi-ton" because it serves as a propaganda rage for Netanyahu's hard-line Likud government. The paper, which now has the largest circulation of any daily newspaper in Israel, mercilessly attacked the government of former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, particularly his handling of the 2006 mini-war with Lebanon (sample headline, per the New Yorker: "The a*s-Covering of the Government"). Adelson was also upset that Olmert had the audacity to support a two-state solution where Palestinians are actually given some level of autonomy over their lives.

Right-Wing Sugar Daddy #2: Richard Mellon Scaife

Scaife got his start in politics by giving Richard Nixon's campaign $1 million in 1972 and he hasn't looked back since. As an heir to the Mellon fortune, Scaife didn't exactly have to pick himself up by his bootstraps on his way to the top. And instead of doing something useful with his life, Scaife has blown hundreds of millions of dollars keeping wastoids like Jonah Goldberg employed by funding conservative think tanks such as the Heritage Foundation, newspapers such as the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review and right-wing opinion rags such as the American Spectator.

Scaife really hit his stride in the 1990s when he became obsessed with forcing President Bill Clinton and his penis from office. He kicked things off in 1993 by funding the so-called "Arkansas Project" that sent Spectator hacks down to Little Rock to dig up embarrassing dirt on the Clintons. Although that failed to produce the goods, Scaife decided to simultaneously fund Paula Jones' unsuccessful sexual harassment lawsuit against Clinton, thus setting the stage for later sex scandals that would result in the president getting impeached by the Republican House.

Scaife also got another "gift" when the suicide of Deputy White House Counsel Vince Foster sparked a litany of crazed conspiracies asserting that the Clintons had actually murdered Foster themselves.

"The death of Vincent Foster: I think that's the Rosetta Stone to the whole Clinton Administration," Scaife told the New York Times in 1995. "There are just too many questions that have no answers. "

In order to unlock this "Rosetta Stone," Scaife funded "journalists" who were willing to keep the Foster-was-murdered conspiracy alive. As New York Times reporter Tim Weiner noted at the time, Scaife's Tribune-Review was "the only daily newspaper in the nation trying to prove that Mr. Foster might have been murdered." To make a long story short, Scaife never truly nailed Clinton like he wanted to, but he did get to watch Clinton get impeached for lying about a blowjob. God, America was a much nicer country back when we had no real problems to deal with.

Right-Wing Sugar Daddies #3 and #4: The Wyly Brothers

Sam and Charles Wyly gained notoriety during the 2000 Republican presidential primary by bankrolling the most comically Orwellian front group ever assembled.

Dubbed "Republicans for Clean Air" the group spent more than $2 million for ads that attacked John McCain's environmental record while praising George W. Bush's green credentials. The Wyllys similarly went to bat for their boy Bush by donating $10,000 apiece to the infamously dishonest Swift Boat Veterans for Truth campaign that attacked John Kerry's war record in Vietnam. The Wyllys also donated more than $1 million to the Republican National Committee from 2000 through 2004, although they significantly curbed those donations once the Securities and Exchange Commission started investigating them for tax fraud.

Other than funding conservative campaigns, the Wyllys' favorite hobby seems to be getting in trouble for alleged tax evasion. The Wyllys, who started making money in the software business and then branched out to clothing stores, restaurants and energy companies, first got the attention of the SEC in 2004 when they refused to provide Bank of America with details on their offshore assets. Oops!

From there, it was one unfortunate event after another for the Wyllys. In 2005 the brothers copped to "inadvertently" hiding company profits in offshore trusts. In 2006, the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations issued a report detailing a series of trusts the Wyllys set up on the Isle of Man that were used to shelter $720 million worth of profits from taxation. And this past summer the SEC finally brought the hammer down on the Wyllys, accusing them of reaping more than $30 million from an insider trading scheme related to the sale of their Sterling Software company. The SEC is seeking millions of dollars in fines from the brothers, which would presumably leave them with less cash to use on political smear campaigns. And what a sad, sad tragedy that would be.

Right-Wing Sugar Daddy #5: Peter Thiel

This super-wealthy technodork, who made his money cofounding the PayPal online payment service and being one of Facebook's earliest investors, is using his cash to influence hearts and minds, albeit in a significantly different way from the previous right-wing sugar daddies we've examined. For instead of funding rightwing political campaigns, advertising blitzes and think tanks, Thiel is instead trying to influence his fellow libertarians to flee society, not change it.

Thiel officially lost faith in American society after the 2008 presidential election and he confessed on the Cato Institute's Web site that he thought democracy and freedom were no longer compatible. The big reason for this, Thiel said, was that over the past century too many people went on welfare and women got the right to vote. Since welfare recipients and women are "two constituencies that are notoriously tough for libertarians," Thiel reasoned, then "the notion of 'capitalist democracy'" has become "an oxymoron. "

To rectify this, Thiel sunk more than $500,000 into the hilariously bone-headed "Seasteading" project being headed up by Patri Friedman, the grandson of famous conservative economist Milton Friedman. With money from Thiel and other likeminded rich libertarians, the seasteading project aims to build large, floating, concrete platforms in international waters where libertarians can live without the greedy hands of Uncle Sam taking their hard-earned cash.

They also plan to make money for themselves by using these platforms as intranational havens for drugs and prostitution, since no legal authority would be able to arrest them out in the open waters. And presumably, women living on the platforms won't have any say in how the seasteads are run, lest they transform these aquatic libertarian paradises into scummy socialist hellholes. Thiel is also interested in funding transhumanist life-extension projects, as he has given the Methuselah Foundation excess of $3.5 million to ensure that he and his buddies can haunt the Earth with their presence for at least the next few hundred years.

When you think about it, Thiel's devotion to dopey libertarian escapism, while elitist and horribly sexist, actually makes him the most palatable of all the right-wing sugar daddies we've examined. Unlike Scaife, Adelson and the Wyllys, Thiel doesn't want to influence how we think about the world. Rather, he wants to flee the wretched mediocrity of his fellow flesh bags and escape to a no-girls-allowed cyber tree house out in the middle of the ocean. To which I say, "You go, Galt!" The only tragedy is that if Thiel succeeds he likely won't bring any of his brethren with him to the seastead platforms. Because what America needs now more than ever is for a bunch of its self-appointed Atlases to go shrug themselves.

Brad Reed is a writer living in Boston. His work has previously appeared in the American Prospect Online, and he blogs at Sadly, No!.

20101130-02 17:53 GaryC Re: "5 Right-Wing Scumbags"

Dear Dennis and SteveB,

Thank GOD none of this happens from left wing liberals. It's nice to know that we can all focus our energy on dealing with right wing nut bags and have nothing to fear from the middle or left. Thanks for sharing. However, if you are going to correctly point out these mother f*ckers you might want to consider if they aren't mirrored on the left. I am pretty sure that would never occur to the writer of this piece (and I ain't saying he's wrong just that he has his agenda also).

Unfortunately, there seem to be no middle of the road fat cats standing up for the citizens of the U.S.

20101202-01 12:48 Dennis "Welcome to the Plutocracy!"

The Gilded Age returned with a vengeance in our time. It slipped in quietly at first, back in the early 1980s, when Ronald Reagan began a "massive decades-long transfer of national wealth to the rich." As Roger Hodge makes clear, under Bill Clinton the transfer was even more dramatic, as the top 10 percent captured an ever growing share of national income. The trend continued under George W. Bush—those huge tax cuts for the rich, remember, which are now about to be extended because both parties have been bought off by the wealthy—and by 2007, the wealthiest 10% of Americans were taking in 50% of the national income. Today, a fraction of people at the top today earn more than the bottom 120 million Americans. —from a speech given by Bill Moyers at Boston University on Oct. 29, 2010.

This is a rather long read, but well worth it.

"Welcome to the Plutocracy!" by Bill Moyers, TruthOut

Nov. 3, 2010, (<http://archive.truthout.org/bill-moyers-money-fights-hard-and-it-fights-dirty64766>)

(Speech at Boston University, Oct. 29, 2010, as a part of the Howard Zinn Lecture Series.)

I was honored when you asked me to join in celebrating Howard Zinn's life and legacy. I was also surprised. I am a journalist, not a historian. The difference between a journalist and an historian is that the historian knows the difference. George Bernard Shaw once complained that journalists are seemingly unable to discriminate between a bicycle accident and the collapse of civilization. In fact, some epic history can start out as a minor incident. A young man named Paris ran off with a beautiful woman who was married to someone else, and the civilization of Troy began to unwind. A middle-aged black seamstress, riding in a Montgomery bus, had tired feet, and an ugly social order began to collapse. A night guard at an office complex in Washington D.C. found masking tape on a doorjamb, and the presidency of Richard Nixon began to unwind. What journalist, writing on deadline, could have imagined the walloping kick that Rosa Park's tired feet would give to Jim Crow? What pundit could have fantasized that a third-rate burglary on a dark night could change the course of politics? The historian's work is to help us disentangle the wreck of the Schwinn from cataclysm. Howard famously helped us see how big change can start with small acts.

We honor his memory. We honor him, for Howard championed grassroots social change and famously chronicled its story as played out over the course of our nation's history. More, those stirring sagas have inspired and continue to inspire countless people to go out and make a difference. The last time we met, I told him that the stories in A People's History of the United States remind me of the fellow who turned the corner just as a big fight broke out down the block. Rushing up to an onlooker he shouted, "Is this a private fight, or can anyone get in it?" For Howard, democracy was one big public fight and everyone should plunge into it. That's the only way, he said, for everyday folks to get justice—by fighting for it.

I have in my desk at home a copy of the commencement address Howard gave at Spelman College in 2005. He was chairman of the history department there when he was fired in 1963 over his involvement in civil rights. He had not been back for 43 years, and he seemed delighted to return for commencement. He spoke poignantly of his friendship with one of his former students, Alice Walker, the daughter of tenant farmers in Georgia who made her way to Spelman and went on to become the famous writer. Howard delighted in quoting one of her first published poems that had touched his own life:

It is true
I've always loved the daring ones like the black young man who tried to crash all barriers
at once,
wanted to swim
at a white beach (in Alabama)
Nude.

That was Howard Zinn; he loved the daring ones, and was daring himself.

One month before his death he finished his last book, The Bomb. Once again he was wrestling with his experience as a B-17 bombardier during World War II, especially his last mission in 1945 on a raid to take out German garrisons in the French town of Royan. For the first time the Eighth Air Force used napalm, which burst into liquid fire on the ground, killing hundreds of civilians. He wrote, "I remember distinctly seeing the bombs explode in the town, flaring like matches struck in the fog. I was completely unaware of the human chaos below." Twenty years later he returned to Royan to study the effects of the raid and concluded there had been no military necessity for the bombing; everyone knew the war was almost over (it ended three weeks later) and this attack did nothing to affect the outcome. His grief over having been a cog in a deadly machine no doubt confirmed his belief in small acts of rebellion, which mean, as Howard writes in the final words of the book, "acting on what we feel and think, here, now, for human flesh and sense, against the abstractions of duty and obedience."

His friend and long-time colleague writes in the foreword that "Shifting historical focus from the wealthy and powerful to the ordinary person was perhaps his greatest act of rebellion and incitement." It seems he never forget the experience of growing up in a working class neighborhood in New York. In that spirit, let's begin with some everyday people.

When she heard the news, Connie Brasel cried like a baby.

For years she had worked at minimum-wage jobs, until 17 years ago, when she was hired by the Whirlpool refrigerator factory in Evansville, Indiana. She was making $ 18.44 an hour when Whirlpool announced earlier this year that it was closing the operation and moving it to Mexico. She wept. I'm sure many of the other eleven hundred workers who lost their jobs wept too; they had seen their ticket to the middle class snatched from their hands. The company defended its decision by claiming high costs, underused capacity, and the need to stay competitive. Those excuses didn't console

Connie Brasel. "I was becoming part of something bigger than me," she told Steven Greenhouse of the New York Times. "Whirlpool was the best thing that ever happened to me."

She was not only sad, she was mad. "They didn't get world-class quality because they had the best managers. They got world-class quality because of the United States and because of their workers."

Among those workers were Natalie Ford, her husband and her son; all three lost their jobs. "It's devastating," she told the Times. Her father had worked at Whirlpool before them. Now, "There aren't any jobs here. How is this community going to survive?"

And what about the country? Between 2001 and 2008, about 40,000 U.S. manufacturing plants closed. Six million factory jobs have disappeared over the past dozen years, representing one in three manufacturing jobs. Natalie Ford said to the Times what many of us are wondering: "I don't know how without any good-paying jobs here in the United States people are going to pay for their health care, put their children through school."

Now, if Connie Brasel and Natalie Ford lived in South Carolina, they might have been lucky enough to get a job with the new BMW plant that recently opened there and advertised that the company would hire one thousand workers. Among the applicants? According to the Washington Post; "a former manager of a major distribution center for Target; a consultant who oversaw construction projects in four western states; a supervisor at a plastics recycling firm. Some held college degrees and resumes in other fields where they made more money." They will be paid $15 an hour—about half of what BMW workers earn in Germany

In polite circles, among our political and financial classes, this is known as "the free market at work." No, it's "wage repression," and it's been happening in our country since around 1980. I must invoke some statistics here, knowing that statistics can glaze the eyes; but if indeed it's the mark of a truly educated person to be deeply moved by statistics, as I once read, surely this truly educated audience will be moved by the recent analysis of tax data by the economists Thomas Piketty and Emmanuel Saez. They found that from 1950 through 1980, the share of all income in America going to everyone but the rich increased from 64 percent to 65 percent. Because the nation's economy was growing handsomely, the average income for 9 out of 10 Americans was growing, too—from $17,719 to $30,941. That's a 75 percent increase in income in constant 2008 dollars.

But then it stopped. Since 1980 the economy has also continued to grow handsomely, but only a fraction at the top have benefitted. The line flattens for the bottom 90% of Americans. Average income went from that $30,941 in 1980 to $31,244 in 2008. Think about that: the average income of Americans increased just $303 dollars in 28 years.

That's wage repression.

Another story in the Times caught my eye a few weeks after the one about Connie Brasel and Natalie Ford. The headline read: "Industries Find Surging Profits in Deeper Cuts." Nelson Schwartz reported that despite falling motorcycle sales, Harley-Davidson profits are soaring—with a second quarter profit of $71 million, more than triple what it earned the previous year. Yet Harley-Davidson has announced plans to cut fourteen hundred to sixteen hundred more jobs by the end of next year; this on top of the 2000 job cut last year.

The story note: "This seeming contradiction—falling sales and rising profits—is one reason the mood on Wall Street is so much more buoyant than in households, where pessimism runs deep and unemployment shows few signs of easing."

There you see the two Americas. A buoyant Wall Street; a doleful Main Street. The Connie Brasels and Natalie Fords—left to sink or swim on their own. There were no bailouts for them.

Meanwhile, Matt Krantz reports in USA TODAY that "Cash is gushing into company's coffers as they report what's shaping up to be a third-consecutive quarter of sharp earning increases. But instead of spending on the typical things, such as expanding and hiring people, companies are mostly pocketing the money or stuffing it under their mattresses." And what are their plans for this money? Again, the Washington Post:

.... Sitting on these unprecedented levels of cash, U.S. companies are buying back their own stock in droves. So far this year, firms have announced they will purchase $273 billion of their own shares, more than five times as much compared with this time last year... But the rise in buybacks signals that many companies are still hesitant to spend their cash on the job-generating activities that could produce economic growth.

That's how financial capitalism works today: Conserving cash rather than bolstering hiring and production; investing in their own shares to prop up their share prices and make their stock more attractive to Wall Street. To hell with everyone else.

Hear the chief economist at Bank of America Merrill Lynch, Ethan Harris, who told the Times: "There's no question that there is an income shift going on in the economy. Companies are squeezing their labor costs to build profits."

Or the chief economist for Credit Suisse in New York, Neal Soss: As companies have wrung more savings out of their work forces, causing wages and salaries barely to budge from recession lows, "profits have staged a vigorous recovery, jumping 40 percent between late 2008 and the first quarter of 2010."

Just this morning the New York Times reports that the private equity business is roaring back: "While it remains difficult to get a mortgage to buy a home or to get a loan to fund a small business, yield-starved investors are creating a robust market for corporate bonds and loans."

If this were a functioning democracy, our financial institutions would be helping everyday Americans and businesses get the mortgages and loans—the capital—they need to keep going; they're not, even as the financiers are reaping robust awards.

Yes, Virginia, there is a Santa Claus. But he's run off with all the toys.

Late in August, I clipped another story from the Wall Street Journal. Above an op-ed piece by Robert Frank the headline asked: "Do the Rich Need the Rest of America?" The author didn't seem ambivalent about the answer. He wrote that as stocks have boomed, "the wealthy bounced back. And while the Main Street economy" [where the Connie Brasels and Natalie Fords and most Americans live] "was wracked by high unemployment and the real-estate crash, the wealthy—whose financial fates were more tied to capital markets than jobs and houses—picked themselves up, brushed themselves off, and started buying luxury goods again."

Citing the work of Michael Lind, at the Economic Growth Program of the New American Foundation, the article went on to describe how the super-rich earn their fortunes with overseas labor, selling to overseas consumers and managing financial transactions that have little to do with the rest of America, "while relying entirely or almost entirely on immigrant servants at one of several homes around the country."

Right at that point I remembered another story that I had filed away three years ago, also from the Wall Street Journal. The reporter Ianthe Jeanne Dugan described how the private equity firm Blackstone Group swooped down on a travel reservation company in Colorado, bought it, laid off 841 employees, and recouped its entire investment in just seven months, one of the quickest returns on capital ever for such a deal. Blackstone made a killing while those workers were left to sift through the debris. They sold their homes, took part-time jobs making sandwiches and coffee, and lost their health insurance.

That fall, Blackstone's chief executive, Stephen Schwarzman, reportedly worth over $5 billion, rented a luxurious resort in Jamaica to celebrate the marriage of his son. According to the Guardian News, the Montego Bay facility alone cost $50,000, plus thousands more to sleep 130 guests. There were drinks on the beach, dancers and a steel band, marshmallows around the fire, and then, the following day, an opulent wedding banquet with champagne and a jazz band and fireworks display that alone cost $12,500. Earlier in the year Schwarzman had rented out the Park Avenue Armory in New York (near his 35-room apartment) to celebrate his 60th birthday at a cost of $3 million. So? It's his money, isn't it? Yes, but consider this: The stratospheric income of private-equity partners is taxed at only 15 percent—less than the rate paid, say, by a middle class family. When Congress considered raising the rate on their Midas-like compensation, the financial titans flooded Washington with armed mercenaries—armed, that is, with hard, cold cash—and brought the "debate" to an end faster than it had taken Schwarzman to fire 841 workers. The financial class had won another round in the exploitation of working people who, if they are lucky enough to have jobs, are paying a higher tax rate than the super-rich.

So the answer to the question: "Do the Rich Need the Rest of America?" is as stark as it is ominous: Many don't. As they form their own financial culture increasingly separated from the fate of everyone else, it is "hardly surprising," Frank and Lind concluded, "that so many of them should be so hostile to paying taxes to support the infrastructure and the social programs that help the majority of the American people."

You would think the rich might care, if not from empathy, then from reading history. Ultimately gross inequality can be fatal to civilization. In his book Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed, the Pulitzer Prize-winning anthropologist Jared Diamond writes about how governing elites throughout history isolate and delude themselves until it is too late. He reminds us that the change people inflict on their environment is one of the main factors in the decline of earlier societies. For example: the Mayan natives on the Yucatan peninsula who suffered as their forest disappeared, their soil eroded, and their water supply deteriorated. Chronic warfare further exhausted dwindling resources. Although Mayan kings could see their forests vanishing and their hills eroding, they were able to insulate themselves from the rest of society. By extracting wealth from commoners, they could remain well-fed while everyone else was slowly starving. Realizing too late that they could not reverse their deteriorating environment, they became casualties of their own privilege. Any society contains a built-in blueprint for failure, Diamond warns, if elites insulate themselves from the consequences of their decisions, separated from the common life of the country.

Yet the isolation continues—and is celebrated. When Howard came down to New York last December for what would be my last interview with him, I showed him this document published in the spring of 2005 by the Wall Street giant Citigroup, setting forth an “Equity Strategy” under the title (I’m not making this up) “Revisiting Plutonomy: The Rich Getting Richer.”

Now, most people know what plutocracy is: the rule of the rich, political power controlled by the wealthy. Plutocracy is not an American word and wasn’t meant to become an American phenomenon—some of our founders deplored what they called “the veneration of wealth.” But plutocracy is here, and a pumped up Citigroup even boasted of coining a variation on the word—“plutonomy”, which describes an economic system where the privileged few make sure the rich get richer and that government helps them do it. Five years ago Citigroup decided the time had come to “bang the drum on plutonomy.”

And bang they did. Here are some excerpts from the document “Revisiting Plutonomy”:

Asset booms, a rising profit share and favorable treatment by market-friendly governments have allowed the rich to prosper... and take an increasing share of income and wealth over the last 20 years.

...the top 10%, particularly the top 1% of the United States—the plutonomists in our parlance—have benefitted disproportionately from the recent productivity surge in the U.S.... [and] from globalization and the productivity boom, at the relative expense of labor.

... [and they] are likely to get even wealthier in the coming years. Because the dynamics of plutonomy are still intact.

I’ll repeat that: “The dynamics of plutonomy are still intact.” That was the case before the Great Collapse of 2008, and it’s the case today, two years after the catastrophe. But the plutonomists are doing just fine. Even better in some cases, thanks to our bailout of the big banks.

As for the rest of the country: Listen to this summary in The Economist—no Marxist journal—of a study by Pew Research:

More than half of all workers today have experienced a spell of unemployment, taken a cut in pay or hours or been forced to go part-time. The typical unemployed worker has been jobless for nearly six months. Collapsing share and house prices have destroyed a fifth of the wealth of the average household. Nearly six in ten Americans have cancelled or cut back on holidays. About a fifth say their mortgages are underwater. One in four of those between 18 and 29 have moved back in with their parents. Fewer than half of all adults expect their children to have a higher standard of living than theirs, and more than a quarter say it will be lower. For many Americans the great recession has been the sharpest trauma since the Second World War, wiping out jobs, wealth and hope itself.

Let that sink in: For millions of garden-variety Americans, the audacity of hope has been replaced by a paucity of hope.

Time for a confession. The legendary correspondent Edward R. Murrow told his generation of journalists that bias is okay as long as you don’t try to hide it. Here is mine: Plutocracy and democracy don’t mix. Plutocracy too long tolerated leaves democracy on the auction block, subject to the highest bidder.

Socrates said to understand a thing, you must first name it. The name for what’s happening to our political system is corruption—a deep, systemic corruption. I urge you to seek out the recent edition of Harper’s Magazine. The former editor Roger D. Hodge brilliantly dissects how democracy has gone on sale in America. Ideally, he writes, our ballots purport to be expressions of political will, which we hope and pray will be translated into legislative and executive action by our pretended representatives. But voting is the beginning of civil virtue, not its end, and the focus of real power is elsewhere. Voters still “matter” of course, but only as raw material to be shaped by the actual form of political influence—money.

The article is excerpted from Hodge’s new book, The Mendacity of Hope. In it he describes how America’s founding generation especially feared the kind of corruption that occurs when the private ends of a narrow faction succeed in capturing the engines of government. James Madison and many of his contemporaries knew this kind of corruption could consume the republic. Looking at history a tragic lens, they thought the life cycle of republics—their degeneration into anarchy, monarchy, or oligarchy—was inescapable. And they attempted to erect safeguards against it, hoping to prevent private and narrow personal interests from overriding those of the general public.

They failed. Hardly a century passed after the ringing propositions of 1776 than America was engulfed in the gross materialism and political corruption of the First Gilded Age, when Big Money bought the government right out from under the voters. In their magisterial work on The Growth of the American Republic, the historians Morrison, Commager, and Leuchtenberg describe how in that era “privilege controlled politics,” and “the purchase of votes, the corruption of election officials, the bribing of legislatures, the lobbying of special bills, and the flagrant disregard of laws” threatened the very foundations of the country.”

I doubt you’ll be surprised to learn that this “degenerate and unlovely age”—as one historian described it—served to inspire Karl Rove, the man said to be George W. Bush’s brain and now a mover and shaker of the money tree for the corporate-conservative complex (more on that later.) The extraordinary coupling of private and political power toward the close of the 19th century—the First Gilded Age—captured Rove’s interest, especially the role of Mark Hanna, the Ohio operative who became the first modern political fund-raiser. (David von Drehle wrote (“Washington Post, July 24, 1999) that “as a tenacious student of political history, Rove had dug so deeply into the McKinley era that he had become “the swami of McKinley mania.” Rove denied it to the writer Ron Susskind, who then went on to talk to old colleagues of Rove “dating back 25 years, one of whom said: “Some kids want to grow up to be president, Karl wanted to grow up to be Mark Hanna. We’d talk about it all the time. We’d say, ‘Jesus, Karl, what kind of kid wants to grow up to be Mark Hanna?’”

“There are two things that are important in politics,” Hanna said. “The first is money and I can’t remember what the second one is.” He had become rich as a business man in Ohio, “the characteristic American capitalist of the Gilded Age” (Columbia Encyclopedia). He was famously depicted by one cartoonist as “Dollar Mark,” the prototype of plutocracy. Hanna tapped the banks, the insurance companies, the railroads and the other industrial trusts of the late 1800s for all the money it took to make William McKinley governor of Ohio and then President of the United States. McKinley was the perfect conduit for Hanna’s connivance and their largesse—one of those politicians with a talent for emitting banalities as though they were recently discovered truth. Hanna raised “an unprecedented amount of money (the biggest check came from the oil baron John Rockefeller) and ran a sophisticated, hardball campaign that got McKinley to the White House, “where he governed negligently in the interests of big business,” wrote Jacob Weisberg in “Slate” (Nov. 2, 2005) His opponent in the 1896 election was the Democrat-Populist candidate, William Jennings Bryan, whose base consisted of aroused populists—the remnant of the People’s Party—who were outraged at the rapacity and shenanigans of the monopolies, trusts, and corporations that were running roughshod over ordinary Americans. Because Bryan threatened those big economic interests he was able to raise only one-tenth the money that Mark Hanna raised for McKinley, and he lost: Money in politics is an old story.

Karl Rove would have learned from his study of Hanna the principles of plutonomy. For Hanna believed “the state of Ohio existed for property. It had no other function...Great wealth was to be gained through monopoly, through using the State for private ends; it was axiomatic therefore that businessmen should run the government and run it for personal profit.”

He and McKinley therefore saw to it that first Ohio and then Washington were “ruled by business...by bankers, railroads, and public utility corporations.” The United States Senate was infamous as “a millionaire’s club.” City halls, state houses and even courtrooms were bought and sold like baubles. Instead of enforcing the rules of fair play, government served as valet to the plutocrats. The young journalist Henry George had written that “an immense wedge” was being forced through American society by “the maldistribution of wealth, status, and opportunity.” Now inequality exploded into what the historian Clinton Rossiter described as “the great train robbery of American intellectual history.” Conservatives of the day—pro-corporate apologists—hijacked the vocabulary of Jeffersonian liberalism and turned words like “progress,” “opportunity,” and “individualism” into tools for making the plunder of America sound like divine right. Laissez faire ideologues and neo-cons of the day—lovers of empire even then—hijacked Charles Darwin’s theory of evolution and so distorted it that politicians, judges, and publicists gleefully embraced the notion that progress emerges from the elimination of the weak and the "survival of the fittest." As one of the plutocrats crowed: "We are rich. We own America. We got it, God knows how, but we intend to keep it."

And they have never given up. The Gilded Age returned with a vengeance in our time. It slipped in quietly at first, back in the early 1980s, when Ronald Reagan began a "massive decades-long transfer of national wealth to the rich." As Roger Hodge makes clear, under Bill Clinton the transfer was even more dramatic, as the top 10 percent captured an ever-growing share of national income. The trend continued under George W. Bush—those huge tax cuts for the rich, remember, which are now about to be extended because both parties have been bought off by the wealthy—and by 2007, the wealthiest 10% of Americans were taking in 50% of the national income. Today, a fraction of people at the top today earn more than the bottom 120 million Americans.

You will hear it said, "Come on, this is the way the world works." No, it's the way the world is made to work. This vast inequality is not the result of Adam Smith's invisible hand; it did not just happen; it was no accident. As Hodge drives home, it is the result of a long series of policy decisions "about industry and trade, taxation and military spending, by flesh-and-blood humans sitting in concrete-and-steel buildings." And those policy decisions were paid for by the less than one percent who participate in our capitalist democracy political contributions. Over the past 30 years, with the complicity of Republicans and Democrats alike, the plutocrats, or plutonomists (choose your own poison) have used their vastly increased wealth to assure that government does their bidding. Remember that grateful Citigroup reference to "market-friendly governments" on the side of plutonomy? We had a story down in Texas for that sort of thing; the dealer in a poker game says to the dealer, Now play the cards fairly, Reuben; I know what I dealt you." (To see just how our system was rigged by the financial, political, and university elites, run, don't walk, to the theatre nearest you showing Charles Ferguson's new film, "Inside Job." Take a handkerchief because you'll weep for the republic.)

Looking back, it all seems so clear that we wonder how we could have ignored the warning signs at the time. One of the few journalists who did see it coming—Thomas Edsall of the Washington Post—reported that "business refined its ability to act as a class, submerging competitive instincts in favour of joint, cooperative action in the legislative arena." Big business political action committees flooded the political arena with a deluge of dollars. They funded think tanks that churned out study after study with results skewed to their ideology and interests. And their political allies in the conservative movement cleverly built alliances with the religious right—Jerry Falwell's Moral Majority and Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition—who zealously waged a cultural holy war that camouflaged the economic assault on working people and the middle class.

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan also tried to warn us. He said President Reagan's real strategy was to force the government to cut domestic social programs by fostering federal deficits of historic dimensions. Senator Moynihan was gone before the financial catastrophe on George W. Bush's watch that could paradoxically yet fulfill Reagan's dream. The plutocrats who soaked up all the money now say the deficits require putting Social Security and other public services on the chopping block. You might think that Mr. Bush today would regret having invaded Iraq on false pretences at a cost of more than a trillion dollars and counting, but no, just last week he said that his biggest regret was his failure to privatize Social Security. With over 100 Republicans of the House having signed a pledge to do just that when the new Congress convenes, Mr. Bush's vision may yet be realized.

Daniel Altman also saw what was coming. In his book Neoeconomy he described a place without taxes or a social safety net, where rich and poor live in different financial worlds. "It's coming to America," he wrote. Most likely he would not have been surprised recently when firefighters in rural Tennessee would let a home burn to the ground because the homeowner hadn't paid a $75 fee.

That's what is coming to America.

Here we are now, on the verge of the biggest commercial transaction in the history of American elections. Once again the plutocracy is buying off the system. Nearly $4 billion is being spent on the congressional races that will be decided next week, including multi millions coming from independent tax-exempt organizations that can collect unlimited amounts without revealing the sources. The organization Public Citizen reports that just 10 groups are responsible for the bulk of the spending by independent groups: "A tiny number of organizations, relying on a tiny number of corporate and fat cat contributors, are spending most of the money on the vicious attack ads dominating the airwaves"—those are the words of Public Citizen's president, Robert Wiessman. The Federal Election Commission says that two years ago 97% of groups paying for election ads disclosed the names of their donors. This year it's only 32%.

Socrates again: To remember a thing, you must first name it. We're talking about slush funds. Donors are laundering their cash through front groups with high-falutin' names like American Crossroads. That's one of the two slush funds controlled by Karl Rove in his ambition to revive the era of the robber barons. Promise me you won't laugh when I tell you that although Rove and the powerful Washington lobbyist who is his accomplice described the first organization as "grassroots", 97% of its initial contributions came from four billionaires. Yes: The grass grows mighty high when the roots are fertilized with gold.

Rove, other conservative groups and the Chamber of Commerce have in fact created a "shadow party" determined to be the real power in Washington just like Rome's Opus Dei in Dan Brown's The DaVinci Code. In this shadow party the plutocrats reign. We have reached what the new chairman of Common Cause and former Labor Secretary Robert Reich calls "the perfect storm that threatens American democracy: an unprecedented concentration of income and wealth at the top; a record amount of secret money, flooding our democracy; and a public becoming increasingly angry and cynical about a government that's raising its taxes, reducing its services, and unable to get it back to work. We're losing our democracy to a different system. It's called plutocracy."

That word again. But Reich is right. That fraction of one percent of Americans who now earn as much as the bottom 120 million Americans includes the top executives of giant corporations and those Wall Street hedge funds and private equity managers who constitute Citigroup's "plutonomy" are buying our democracy and they're doing it in secret.

That's because early this year the five reactionary members of the Supreme Court ruled that corporations are "persons" with the right to speak during elections by funding ads like those now flooding the airwaves. It was the work of legal fabulists. Corporations are not people; they are legal fictions, creatures of the state, born not of the womb, not of flesh and blood. They're not permitted to vote. They don't bear arms (except for the nuclear bombs they can now drop on a congressional race without anyone knowing where it came from.) Yet thanks to five activist conservative judges they have the privilege of "personhood" to "speak"—and not in their own voice, mind you, but as ventriloquists, through hired puppets.

Does anyone really think that's what the authors of the First Amendment had in mind? Horrified by such a profound perversion, the editor of the spunky Texas Observer, Bob Moser, got it right with his headline: "So long, Democracy, it's been good to know you."

You'll recall that soon after the Court's decision President Obama raised the matter during his State of the Union speech in January. He said the decision would unleash a torrent of corrupting corporate money into our political system. Sitting a few feet in front of the president, Associate Justice Samuel Alito defiantly mouthed the words: "Not true."

Not true? Terry Forcht knew otherwise. He's the wealthy nursing home executive in Kentucky whose establishments is being prosecuted by Attorney General Jack Conway for allegedly covering up sexual abuse. Conway is running for the Senate. Forcht has spent more than $1 million to defeat him. Would you believe that Forcht is the banker for one of Karl Rove's two slush funds, American Crossroads, which has spent nearly $30 million to defeat Democrats?

What's that, Justice Alito? Not true?

Ask Alan Grayson. He's a member of Congress. Here's what he says: "We're now in a situation where a lobbyist can walk into my office...and say, 'I've got five million dollars to spend and I can spend it for you or against you.'"

Alito was either disingenuous, naïve, or deluded. He can't be in this world without knowing he and his four fellow corporatists were giving big donors the one thing they most want in their campaign against working people: an unfair advantage.

My friend and colleague, the writer Michael Winship, told a story this week that illuminates the Court's coup de grace against democracy. It seems the incorrigible George Bernard Shaw once propositioned a fellow dinner guest, asking if she would go to bed with him for a million pounds (today around $1,580,178 U.S. dollars). She agreed. Shaw then asked if she would do the same for ten shillings. "What do you take me for?" she asked angrily. "A prostitute?" Shaw responded: "We've established the principle, Madam. Now we're just haggling over the price."

With this one decision, the Supreme Court established once and for all that Shaw's is the only principle left in politics, as long as the price is right.

Come now and let's visit Washington's red light district, headquarters of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the front group for the plutocracy's prostitution of politics. The Chamber boasts it represents more than three million businesses and approximately 300,000 members. But in reality it has almost nothing to do with the shops and stores along your local streets. The Chamber's branding, as the economics journalist Zach Carter recently wrote, "allows them to disguise their political agenda as a coalition of local businesses while it does dirty work for corporate titans." Carter reported that when the Supreme Court came down with its infamous ruling earlier this year, the Chamber responded by announcing a 40% boost in its political spending operations. After the money started flowing in, the Chamber boosted its budget again by 50%.

After digging into corporate foundation tax filings and other public records, the New York Times found that the Chamber of Commerce has "increasingly relied on a relatively small collection of big corporate donors"—the plutocracy's senior ranks—"to finance much of its legislative and political agenda." Furthermore, the chamber "makes no apologies for its policy of not identifying its donors." Indeed, "It has vigorously opposed legislation in Congress that would require groups like it to identify their biggest contributors when they spend money on campaign ads."

Now let's connect some dots. While knocking down nearly all limits on corporate spending in campaigns, the Supreme Court did allow for disclosure, which would at least tell us who's buying off the government. Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell even claimed that "sunshine" laws would make everything okay. But after the House of Representatives passed a bill that would require that the names of all such donors be publicly disclosed, McConnell lined up every Republican in the Senate to oppose it. Hardly had the public begun to sing "Let the Sunshine In" than McConnell & Company went tone deaf. And when the chief lobbyist for the Chamber of Commerce was asked by an interviewer, "Are you guys eventually going to disclose?" the answer was a brisk: "No." Why? Because those corporations are afraid of a public backlash. Like bank robbers pulling a heist, they prefer to hide their "personhood" behind sock masks. Surely that tells us something about the nature of what they're doing. In the words of one of the characters in Tom Stoppard's play Night and Day: "People do terrible things to each other, but it's worse in places where everything is kept in the dark."

That's true in politics, too. Thus it turns out that many of the ads being paid for secretly by anonymous donors are "false, grossly misleading, or marred with distortions," as Greg Sargent reports in his website "The Plum Line." Go to Sargent's site and you'll see a partial list of ads that illustrate the scope of the intellectual and political fraud being perpetrated in front of our eyes. Money from secret sources is poisoning the public mind with toxic information in order to dupe voters into giving even more power to the powerful.

On another site—"thinkprogress.com"—you can find out how the multibillionaire Koch brothers—also big oil polluters and Tea Party supporters—are recruiting "captains of industry" to fund the right-wing infrastructure of front groups, political campaigns, think tanks and media outlets. Now, hold on to your seats, because this can blow away the faint-hearted: Among the right-wing luminaries who showed up among Koch's 'secretive network of Republican donors' were two Supreme Court Justices: Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. That's right: 2 of the 5 votes to enable the final corporate takeover of government came from justices who were present as members of the plutocracy hatched their schemes for doing so.

Something else is going on here, too. The Koch brothers have contributed significantly to efforts to stop the Affordable Care Act—the health care reforms—from taking effect. Justice Clarence Thomas has obviously been doing some home schooling, because his wife Virginia claims those reforms are "unconstitutional," and has founded an organization that is fighting to repeal them. Her own husband on the Supreme Court may one day be ruling on whether she's right or not ("Play the cards fair, Reuben; I know what I dealt you.") There's more: The organization Virginia Thomas founded to kill those health care reforms—also a goal of the Koch brothers, remember—got its start with a gift of half a million dollars from an unnamed source, and is still being funded by donors who can't be traced. You have to wonder if some of them are corporations that stand to benefit from favorable decisions by the Supreme Court. Now guess the name of the one Supreme Court justice who voted against the disclosure provision. I'm not telling, but Mrs. Thomas can tell you—if, that is, she's willing to share the pillow talk.

This truly puzzles me. It's what I can't figure out about the conservative mindset. The Kochs I can understand: messianic Daddy Warbucks who can't imagine what life is like for people who aren't worth 21 billion dollars. But whatever happened to "compassionate conservatism?" The Affordable Care Act—whatever its flaws—extends health care coverage to over 40 million deprived Americans who would otherwise be uncovered. What is it about these people—the Thomases, the secret donors, the privileged plutocrats on their side—that they can't embrace a little social justice where it counts—among everyday people struggling to get by in a dog-eat-dog world? Health care coverage could mean the difference between life and death for them. Mrs. Thomas is obviously doing okay; she no doubts takes at least a modest salary from that private slush fund working to undermine the health care reforms; her own husband is a government employee covered by a federal plan. Why wouldn't she want people less fortunate than her to have a little security, too? She headquarters her organization at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University, a reportedly Christian school aligned with the Moral Majority. How is it she's only about "Live and Let Live?" Have they never heard there the Old Time Religion of "Live and help live?" Why would this cushioned, comfortable crowd, pious crowd, resort to such despicable tactics as using secret money to try to turn public policy against their less fortunate neighbors, and in the process compromise the already tattered integrity of the United States Supreme Court?

I don't get it.

You be the judge (Because if you don't, Justice Thomas will.)

Time to close the circle: Everyone knows millions of Americans are in trouble. As Robert Reich recently summed it the state of working people: They've lost their jobs, their homes, and their savings. Their grown children have moved back in with them. Their state and local taxes are rising. Teachers and firefighters are being laid off. The roads and bridges they count on are crumbling, pipelines are leaking, schools are dilapidated, and public libraries are being shut.

Why isn't government working for them? Because it's been bought off. It's as simple as that. And until we get clean money we're not going to get clean elections, and until we get clean elections, you can kiss goodbye government of, by, and for the people. Welcome to the plutocracy.

Obviously Howard Zinn would not have us leave it there. Defeat was never his counsel. Look at this headline above one of his essays published posthumously this fall by the Progressive magazine: DON'T DESPAIR ABOUT THE SUPREME COURT. The Court was lost long ago, he said—don't go there looking for justice. "The Constitution gave no rights to working people; no right to work less than 12 hours a day, no right to a living wage, no right to safe working conditions. Workers had to organize, go on strike, defy the law, the courts, the police, create a great movement which won the eight-hour day, and caused such commotion that Congress was forced to pass a minimum wage law, and Social Security, and unemployment insurance....Those rights only come alive when citizens organize, protest, demonstrate, strike, boycott, rebel and violate the law in order to uphold justice."

So what are we to do about Big Money in politics buying off democracy? I can almost hear him throwing that question back at us: "What are we to do? ORGANIZE! Yes, organize—and don't count the costs." Some people already are. They're mobilizing. There's a rumbling in the land. All across the spectrum people oppose the escalating power of money in politics. Fed-up Democrats. Disillusioned Republicans. Independents. Greens. Even Tea Partiers, once they wake up to realize they have been sucker-punched by their bankrollers who have no intention of sharing the wealth.

Veteran public interest groups like Common Cause and Public Citizen are aroused. There are the rising voices, from web-based initiatives such as "freespeechforpeople.org" to grassroots initiatives such as "Democracy Matters" on campuses across the country, including a chapter here at Boston University. "Moveon.org" is looking for a million people to fight back in a many-pronged strategy to counter the Supreme Court decision.

What's promising in all this is that in taking on Big Money we're talking about something more than a single issue. We're talking about a broad-based coalition to restore American democracy—one that is trying to be smart about the nuts-and-bolts of building a coalition, remembering that it has a lot to do with human nature. Some will want to march. Some will want to petition. Some will want to engage through the web. Some will want to go door-to-door: many gifts, but the same spirit. A fighting spirit. As Howard Zinn would tell us: No fight, no fun, no results.

But here's the key: If you're fighting for a living wage, or peace, or immigration reform, or gender equality, or the environment, or a safe neighborhood, you are, of necessity, strongly opposed to a handful of moneyed-interests controlling how decisions get made and policy set. Because most Americans are attuned to principle of fair play, of not favoring Big Money at the expense of the little guy—at the expense of the country they love. The legendary community organizer Ernesto Cortes talks about the "power to preserve what we value." That's what we want for Americans—the power to preserve what we value, both for ourselves and on behalf of our democracy.

But let's be clear: Even with most Americans on our side, the odds are long. We learned long ago that power and privilege never give up anything without a struggle. Money fights hard, and it fights dirty. Think Rove. The Chamber. The Kochs. We may lose. It all may be impossible. But it's OK if it's impossible. Hear the former farm worker and labor organizer Baldemar Velasquez on this. The members of his Farm Labor Organizing Committee are a long way from the world of K Street lobbyists. But they took on the Campbell Soup Company—and won. They took on North Carolina growers—and won, using transnational organizing tactics that helped win Velasquez a “genius” award from the MacArthur Foundation. And now they’re taking on no less than R. J. Reynolds Tobacco and one of its principle financial sponsors, JPMorgan-Chase. Some people question the wisdom of taking on such powerful interests, but here’s what Velasquez says: “It’s OK if it’s impossible; it’s OK! Now I’m going to speak to you as organizers. Listen carefully. The object is not to win. That’s not the objective. The object is to do the right and good thing. If you decide not to do anything, because it’s too hard or too impossible, then nothing will be done, and when you’re on your death bed, you’re gonna say, “I wish I had done something. But if you go and do the right thing NOW, and you do it long enough “good things will happen—something’s gonna happen.”

Shades of Howard Zinn!

20101202-02	17:21	Dennis	“The Big Economic Story & Why Obama Isn’t Telling It”
-------------	-------	--------	---

“The Big Economic Story and Why Obama Isn’t Telling It” by Robert Reich, Huffington Post

Dec. 1, 2010, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/robert-reich/post_1362_b_790614.html)

Quiz: What’s responsible for the lousy economy most Americans continue to wallow in?

- A. Big government, bureaucrats, and the cultural and intellectual elites who back them.
- B. Big business, Wall Street, and the powerful and privileged who represent them.

These are the two competing stories Americans are telling one another.

Yes, I know: It’s more complicated than this. In reality, the lousy economy is due to insufficient demand—the result of the nation’s almost unprecedented concentration of income at the top. The very rich don’t spend as much of their income as the middle. And since the housing bubble burst, the middle class hasn’t had the buying power to keep the economy going. That concentration of income, in turn, is due to globalization and technological change—along with unprecedented campaign contributions and lobbying designed to make the rich even richer and do nothing to help average Americans, insider trading, and political bribery.

So B is closer to the truth.

But A is the story Republicans and right-wingers tell. It’s a dangerous story because it deflects attention from the real problem and makes it harder for America to focus on the real solution—which is more widely shared prosperity. (I get into how we might do this in my new book, Aftershock.)

A is also the story President Obama is telling, indirectly, through his deficit commission, his freeze on federal pay, his freeze on discretionary spending, and his wavering on extending the Bush tax cuts for the rich. Most other Washington Democrats are falling into the same trap.

If Obama and the Democrats were serious about story B they’d at least mention it. They’d tell the nation that income and wealth haven’t been this concentrated at the top since 1928, the year before the Great Crash. They’d be indignant about the secret money funneled into midterm campaigns. They’d demand Congress pass the Disclose Act so the public would know where the money comes from.

They’d introduce legislation to curb Wall Street bonuses—exactly what European leaders are doing with their financial firms. They’d demand that the big banks, now profitable after taxpayer bailouts, reorganize the mortgage debt of distressed homeowners. They’d call for a new WPA to put the unemployed back to work, and pay for it with a tax surcharge on incomes over $1 million.

They’d insist on extended unemployment benefits for long-term jobless who are now exhausting their benefits. And they’d hang tough on the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy—daring Republicans to vote against extending the cuts for everyone else.

But Obama is doing none of this. Instead, he's telling story A—making a big deal out of the deficit—appointing a deficit commission and letting them grandstand with a plan to cut $4 trillion out of the projected deficit over the next ten years—$3 of government spending for every $1 of tax increase—is telling story A. What the public hears is that our economic problems stem from too much government and that if we reduce government spending we'll be fine.

Announcing a two-year freeze on federal salaries—explaining that “I did not reach this decision easily... these are people's lives”—is also telling story A. What the public hears is government bureaucrats are being paid too much, and that if we get the federal payroll under control we'll all be better off.

Proposing a freeze on discretionary (non-defense) spending is telling story A. So is signaling a willingness to extend the Bush tax cuts to the top. So is appointing his top economic advisor from Wall Street (as apparently he's about to do). In fact, the unwillingness of the President and Washington Democrats to tell story B itself promotes story A, because in the absence of an alternative narrative the Republican story is the only one the public hears.

Obama's advisors explain the President's moves are designed to “preempt” the resurgent Republicans—just like Bill Clinton preempted the Gingrich crowd by announcing “the era of big government is over” and then tacking right.

They're wrong. By telling story A and burying story B, the President legitimizes everything the right has been saying. He doesn't preempt them; he fuels them. He gives them more grounds for voting against raising the debt ceiling in a few weeks. He strengthens their argument against additional spending for extended unemployment benefits. He legitimizes their argument against additional stimulus spending.

Bill Clinton had a rapidly expanding economy to fall back on, so his appeasement of Republicans didn't legitimize the Republican world view. Obama doesn't have that luxury. The American public is still hurting and they want to know why. Unless the President and Democrats explain why the economy still stinks for most Americans and offer a plan to fix it, the Republican explanation and solution—it's big government's fault, and all we need do is shrink it—will prevail.

That will mean more hardship for tens of millions of Americans. It will make it harder to remedy the bad economy. And it will set Republicans up for bigger wins in the future.

© 2010 Robert Reich

20101202-03	20:49	SteveB	“Anti-Earmark Tea Party Caucus Takes $1 Billion in Earmarks”
-------------	-------	--------	---

A politician is a politician is a politician...and that ain't necessarily good for any of us.

More Republican lies... It's all about the money and the power with these good folks.

“Anti-Earmark Tea Party Caucus Takes $1 Billion in Earmarks” by Reid Wilson, National Journal

Dec 2, 2010, (<http://news.yahoo.com/blogs/exclusive/anti-earmark-tea-party-caucus-takes-1-billion-164309010.html>)

Members of the Congressional Tea Party Caucus may tout their commitment to cutting government spending now, but they used the 111th Congress to request hundreds of earmarks that, taken cumulatively, added more than $1 billion to the federal budget.

According to a Hotline review of records compiled by Citizens Against Government Waste, the 52 members of the caucus, which pledges to cut spending and reduce the size of government, requested a total of 764 earmarks valued at $1,049,783,150 during Fiscal Year 2010, the last year for which records are available.

"It's disturbing to see the Tea Party Caucus requested that much in earmarks. This is their time to put up or shut up, to be blunt," said David Williams, vice president for policy at Citizens Against Government Waste. "There's going to be a huge backlash if they continue to request earmarks." In founding the caucus in July, Rep. Michele Bachmann (R-Minn.) said she was giving voice to Americans who were sick of government overspending.

How do deficit-cutters sell the U.S. on pain?

"The American people are speaking out loud and clear. They have had enough of the spending, the bureaucracy, and the government-knows-best mentality running rampant today throughout the halls of Congress," Bachmann said in a July 15 statement. The group, she wrote in a letter to House Administration Committee chairman Bob Brady, "will serve as an informal group of Members dedicated to promote Americans' call for fiscal responsibility, adherence to the Constitution, and limited government."

Bachmann and 13 of her Tea Party Caucus colleagues did not request any earmarks in the last Fiscal Year, according to CAGW's annual Congressional Pig Book. But others have requested millions of dollars in special projects.

Rep. Robert Aderholt (R-Ala.), for one, attached his name to 69 earmarks in the last fiscal year, for a total of $78,263,000. The 41 earmarks Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) requested were worth $65,395,000. Rep. Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) wanted $63,400,000 for 39 special projects, and Rep. Rob Bishop (R-Utah) wanted $93,980,000 set aside for 47 projects.

With jobs at issue, what is Washington doing?

Rep. Denny Rehberg (R-Mont.) takes the prize as the tea partier with his name on the most earmarks. Rehberg's office requested funding for 88 projects, either solely or by co-signing earmark requests with Sens. Max Baucus (D) and Jon Tester (D), at a cost of $100,514,200. On his own, Rehberg requested 20 earmarks valued at more than $9.6 million.

More than one member can sign onto an earmark. Still, there are 29 caucus members who requested on their own or joined requests for more than $10 million in earmark funding, and seven who wanted more than $50 million in funding.

Most offices did not respond right away to a request for comment. Those that did said they supported Republicans' new efforts to ban earmarks.

Will Obama's winning campaign plan be used against him in 2012?

Alexander, for one, "stands with his fellow Republicans in the House in supporting the current earmark ban. Since joining the Tea Party Caucus in July, he has not submitted any earmark requests and has withdrawn his outstanding requests that were included in the most recent Water Resources Development Act," said Jamie Hanks, his communications director.

Rep. Gregg Harper (R-Miss.), who requested 25 earmarks in the last Fiscal Year at a total cost of just over $80 million, has agreed to abide by the Republican earmark ban, according to spokesman Adam Buckalew. "He supported the moratorium and the prohibition adopted recently by the Conference on House earmarks for the 112th Congress," Buckalew said of Harper.

"It's easy to be a member of the TEA Party Caucus because, like them, I agree that we're Taxed Enough Already and we've got to balance the budget by cutting spending instead of raising taxes. Deficit spending is not new, but the unprecedented rate of spending in Congress is," Rehberg said in a statement emailed by his office. "Montanans have tightened their belts, and it's way past time for Congress to follow their lead. The TEA Party Caucus is about listening to concerned Americans who want to fundamentally change how Congress spends their tax dollars. On that, we're in total agreement."

For America's 10 wealthiest Congressional Districts, it will be more happy holidays

Bachmann's office did not respond to emails or phone calls seeking comment. Still, some Republicans—albeit none who belong to the Tea Party Caucus—have said they will not abide by the voluntary earmark ban. And, said CAGW's Williams, the anti-spending organization isn't waiting with baited breath.

"Seeing is believing. It's going to take a lot more than rhetoric to convince us," he said. A list of Tea Party Caucus members and their earmark requests in Fiscal Year 2010, courtesy of Citizens Against Government Waste's Pig Book:

NAME	# of EARMARKS	AMOUNT
Aderholt (R-AL)	69	$78,263,000
Akin (R-MO)	9	$14,709,000
Alexander (R-LA)	41	$65,395,000

Bachmann (R-MN)	0	0
Barton (R-TX)	14	$12,269,400
Bartlett (R-MD)	19	$43,060,650
Bilirakis (R-FL)	14	$13,600,000
R. Bishop (R-UT)	47	$93,980,000
Burgess (R-TX)	15	$15,804,400
Broun (R-GA)	0	0
Burton (R-IN)	0	0
Carter (R-TX)	26	$42,232,000
Coble (R-NC)	19	$18,755,000
Coffman (R-CO)	0	0
Crenshaw (R-FL)	37	$54,424,000
Culberson (R-TX)	22	$33,792,000
Fleming (R-LA)	10	$31,489,000
Franks (R-AZ)	8	$14,300,000
Gingrey (R-GA)	19	$16,100,000
Gohmert (R-TX)	15	$7,099,000
S. Graves (R-MO)	11	$8,331,000
R. Hall (R-TX)	16	$12,232,000
Harper (R-MS)	25	$80,402,000
Herger (R-CA)	5	$5,946,000
Hoekstra (R-MI)	9	$6,392,000
Jenkins (R-KS)	12	$24,628,000
S. King (R-IA)	13	$6,650,000
Lamborn (R-CO)	6	$16,020,000
Luetkemeyer (R-MO)	0	0
Lummis (R-WY)	0	0
Marchant (R-TX)	0	0
McClintock (R-CA)	0	0
Gary Miller (R-CA)	15	$19,627,500
Jerry Moran (R-KS)	22	$19,400,000
Myrick (R-NC)	0	0
Neugebauer (R-TX)	0	0
Pence (R-IN)	0	0
Poe (R-TX)	12	$7,913,000
T. Price (R-GA)	0	0
Rehberg (R-MT)	88	$100,514,200
Roe (R-TN)	0	0
Royce (R-CA)	7	$6,545,000
Scalise (R-LA)	20	$17,388,000
P. Sessions (R-TX)	0	0
Shadegg (R-AZ)	0	0
Adrian Smith (R-NE)	1	$350,000
L. Smith (R-TX)	18	$14,078,000
Stearns (R-FL)	17	$15,472,000
Tiahrt (R-KS)	39	$63,400,000
Wamp (R-TN)	14	$34,544,000
Westmoreland (R-GA)	0	0
Wilson (R-SC)	15	$23,334,000
TOTAL	764	$1,049,783,150

20101203-01 07:49 Pam My Blog

Dear SteveB,

Guess what! I've started a blog. I can't believe I'm doing this, but I'm going to give it a try. I've also decided to start following a few select blogs—so far Paul Krugman's is the only one I've signed up for. I LOVE what he says.

You can check it out at: <http://pammcrae.blogspot.com>

20101203-02 19:30 Dennis The Bush Tax Cuts

According to Newsweek, George W. Bush "earns" $4.2 million from paid speeches, public appearances and miscellaneous punditry each year. Hence the Bush Tax Cuts cut Bush's own taxes by an amazing $187,552 each year. And that's not even counting how much the Bush tax cuts engorge Bush's investment income.

So Bush cut his own taxes. No wonder Bush is in favor of extending those tax cuts. He's not the only one. Here is how much the Bush tax cuts benefit—each year—some other folks you may have heard of:

Rush Limbaugh—$2,689,135.
Glenn Beck—$1,512,352
Sean Hannity—$1,006,352
Bill O'Reilly—$914,352
Sarah Palin—$638,352
Newt Gingrich—$247,352

If I worked for Fox News I'd be for the Bush Tax Cuts too!

20101205-01 13:51 SteveB Re: The Bush Tax Cuts

Dennis,

If tax cuts, especially tax cuts for the rich (the top 2% of earners), create jobs for Americans, where the hell are all the jobs created by the Bush tax cuts?

Or by the still-existing remnants of the Regan tax cuts, for that matter? Why is unemployment 9.8% if this national debt-building tax cut strategy works?

And unemployment is actually much worse than that if you include people who have given up looking and all the part-time restaurant and retail workers, most of whom make under $8/hour, working, say 20 hours a week (maybe $160/week). Hardly a "living wage" anywhere in the country.

Buy hey, folks, they is workin', right?

Don't listen to the Republican lies! All our recent national history proves that these tax cuts do nothing but make the rich richer, the banks bigger, the fat cats fatter, and keep the corrupt politicians in power. The People have been sold down the river.

What a legacy for our generation to pass on to our children handed to us by the "Greatest Generation".

Maybe we should be called the "Failed Generation!" or the "Worst Generation" Just thought I'd try to brighten up your day.

20101205-02 18:24 SteveB Re: "Welcome to the Plutocracy!"

Dear Dennis,

Ya...this is some good stuff indeed...

20101206-01 10:50 Ben Re: The Bush Tax Cuts

Dear SteveB,

I don't think ANYBODY believes that tax cuts for the uber-wealthy create jobs, except for rank-and-file Republicans who ignorantly accept either the Party line because it IS the Party line, or who can be fooled by Carl Rove's, "loudly proclaim that 'off' is 'on' and people will except that 'off' is the new 'on'" tactics.

For some, ignorance is truly bliss; there seem to be LOTS of Republicans in this boat. Don't there?

20101206-02	15:04	Dennis	"4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Will the future look like this?

"4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire" by Alfred W. McCoy, TomDispatch

Dec. 5, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/149080/>)

A soft landing for America 40 years from now? Don't bet on it. The demise of the United States as the global superpower could come far more quickly than anyone imagines. If Washington is dreaming of 2040 or 2050 as the end of the American Century, a more realistic assessment of domestic and global trends suggests that in 2025, just 15 years from now, it could all be over except for the shouting.

Despite the aura of omnipotence most empires project, a look at their history should remind us that they are fragile organisms. So delicate is their ecology of power that, when things start to go truly bad, empires regularly unravel with unholy speed: just a year for Portugal, two years for the Soviet Union, eight years for France, 11 years for the Ottomans, 17 years for Great Britain, and, in all likelihood, 22 years for the United States, counting from the crucial year 2003.

Future historians are likely to identify the Bush administration's rash invasion of Iraq in that year as the start of America's downfall. However, instead of the bloodshed that marked the end of so many past empires, with cities burning and civilians slaughtered, this twenty-first century imperial collapse could come relatively quietly through the invisible tendrils of economic collapse or cyber warfare.

But have no doubt: when Washington's global dominion finally ends, there will be painful daily reminders of what such a loss of power means for Americans in every walk of life. As a half-dozen European nations have discovered, imperial decline tends to have a remarkably demoralizing impact on a society, regularly bringing at least a generation of economic privation. As the economy cools, political temperatures rise, often sparking serious domestic unrest.

Available economic, educational, and military data indicate that, when it comes to U.S. global power, negative trends will aggregate rapidly by 2020 and are likely to reach a critical mass no later than 2030. The American Century, proclaimed so triumphantly at the start of World War II, will be tattered and fading by 2025, its eighth decade, and could be history by 2030.

Significantly, in 2008, the U.S. National Intelligence Council admitted for the first time that America's global power was indeed on a declining trajectory. In one of its periodic futuristic reports, Global Trends 2025, the Council cited "the transfer of global wealth and economic power now under way, roughly from West to East" and "without precedent in modern history," as the primary factor in the decline of the "United States' relative strength—even in the military realm." Like many in Washington, however, the Council's analysts anticipated a very long, very soft landing for American global preeminence, and harbored the hope that somehow the U.S. would long "retain unique military capabilities... to project military power globally" for decades to come.

No such luck. Under current projections, the United States will find itself in second place behind China (already the world's second largest economy) in economic output around 2026, and behind India by 2050. Similarly, Chinese innovation is on a trajectory toward world leadership in applied science and military technology sometime between 2020 and 2030, just as America's current supply of brilliant scientists and engineers retires, without adequate replacement by an ill-educated younger generation.

By 2020, according to current plans, the Pentagon will throw a military Hail Mary pass for a dying empire. It will launch a lethal triple canopy of advanced aerospace robotics that represents Washington's last best hope of retaining global power despite its waning economic influence. By that year, however, China's global network of communications satellites, backed by the world's most powerful supercomputers, will also be fully operational, providing Beijing with an independent platform for the weaponization of space and a powerful communications system for missile- or cyber-strikes into every quadrant of the globe.

Wrapped in imperial hubris, like Whitehall or Quai d'Orsay before, the White House still seems to imagine that American decline will be gradual, gentle, and partial. In his State of the Union address last January, President Obama offered the reassurance that "I do not accept second place for the United States of America." A few days later, Vice President Biden ridiculed the very idea that "we are destined to fulfill [historian Paul] Kennedy's prophecy that we are going to be a great nation that has failed because we lost control of our economy and overextended." Similarly, writing in the November issue of the establishment journal Foreign Affairs, neo-liberal foreign policy guru Joseph Nye waved away talk of China's economic and military rise, dismissing "misleading metaphors of organic decline" and denying that any deterioration in U.S. global power was underway.

Ordinary Americans, watching their jobs head overseas, have a more realistic view than their cosseted leaders. An opinion poll in Aug., 2010 found that 65% of Americans believed the country was now "in a state of decline." Already, Australia and Turkey, traditional U.S. military allies, are using their American-manufactured weapons for joint air and naval maneuvers with China. Already, America's closest economic partners are backing away from Washington's opposition to China's rigged currency rates. As the president flew back from his Asian tour last month, a gloomy New York Times headline summed the moment up this way: "Obama's Economic View Is Rejected on World Stage, China, Britain and Germany Challenge U.S., Trade Talks With Seoul Fail, Too."

Viewed historically, the question is not whether the United States will lose its unchallenged global power, but just how precipitous and wrenching the decline will be. In place of Washington's wishful thinking, let's use the National Intelligence Council's own futuristic methodology to suggest four realistic scenarios for how, whether with a bang or a whimper, U.S. global power could reach its end in the 2020s (along with four accompanying assessments of just where we are today). The future scenarios include: economic decline, oil shock, military misadventure, and World War III. While these are hardly the only possibilities when it comes to American decline or even collapse, they offer a window into an onrushing future.

Economic Decline: Present Situation

Today, three main threats exist to America's dominant position in the global economy: loss of economic clout thanks to a shrinking share of world trade, the decline of American technological innovation, and the end of the dollar's privileged status as the global reserve currency.

By 2008, the United States had already fallen to number three in global merchandise exports, with just 11% of them compared to 12% for China and 16% for the European Union. There is no reason to believe that this trend will reverse itself.

Similarly, American leadership in technological innovation is on the wane. In 2008, the U.S. was still number two behind Japan in worldwide patent applications with 232,000, but China was closing fast at 195,000, thanks to a blistering 400% increase since 2000.

A harbinger of further decline: in 2009 the U.S. hit rock bottom in ranking among the 40 nations surveyed by the Information Technology & Innovation Foundation when it came to "change" in "global innovation-based competitiveness" during the previous decade.

Adding substance to these statistics, in October China's Defense Ministry unveiled the world's fastest supercomputer, the Tianhe-1A, so powerful, said one U.S. expert, that it "blows away the existing No. 1 machine" in America.

Add to this clear evidence that the U.S. education system, that source of future scientists and innovators, has been falling behind its competitors. After leading the world for decades in 25- to 34-year-olds with university degrees, the country sank to 12th place in 2010. The World Economic Forum ranked the United States at a mediocre 52nd among 139 nations in the quality of its university math and science instruction in 2010. Nearly half of all graduate students in the sciences in the U.S. are now foreigners, most of whom will be heading home, not staying here as once would have happened. By 2025, in other words, the United States is likely to face a critical shortage of talented scientists.

Such negative trends are encouraging increasingly sharp criticism of the dollar's role as the world's reserve currency. "Other countries are no longer willing to buy into the idea that the U.S. knows best on economic policy," observed Kenneth S. Rogoff, a former chief economist at the International Monetary Fund. In mid-2009, with the world's central banks holding an astronomical $4 trillion in U.S. Treasury notes, Russian president Dimitri Medvedev insisted that it was time to end "the artificially maintained unipolar system" based on "one formerly strong reserve currency."

Simultaneously, China's central bank governor suggested that the future might lie with a global reserve currency "disconnected from individual nations" (that is, the U.S. dollar). Take these as signposts of a world to come, and of a possible attempt, as economist Michael Hudson has argued, "to hasten the bankruptcy of the U.S. financial-military world order."

Economic Decline: Scenario 2020

After years of swelling deficits fed by incessant warfare in distant lands, in 2020, as long expected, the U.S. dollar finally loses its special status as the world's reserve currency. Suddenly, the cost of imports soars. Unable to pay for swelling deficits by selling now devalued Treasury notes abroad, Washington is finally forced to slash its bloated military budget. Under pressure at home and abroad, Washington slowly pulls U.S. forces back from hundreds of overseas bases to a continental perimeter. By now, however, it is far too late.

Faced with a fading superpower incapable of paying the bills, China, India, Iran, Russia, and other powers, great and regional, provocatively challenge U.S. dominion over the oceans, space, and cyberspace. Meanwhile, amid soaring prices, ever-rising unemployment, and a continuing decline in real wages, domestic divisions widen into violent clashes and divisive debates, often over remarkably irrelevant issues. Riding a political tide of disillusionment and despair, a far-right patriot captures the presidency with thundering rhetoric, demanding respect for American authority and threatening military retaliation or economic reprisal. The world pays next to no attention as the American Century ends in silence.

Oil Shock: Present Situation

One casualty of America's waning economic power has been its lock on global oil supplies. Speeding by America's gas-guzzling economy in the passing lane, China became the world's number one energy consumer this summer, a position the U.S. had held for over a century. Energy specialist Michael Klare has argued that this change means China will "set the pace in shaping our global future."

By 2025, Iran and Russia will control almost half of the world's natural gas supply, which will potentially give them enormous leverage over energy-starved Europe. Add petroleum reserves to the mix and, as the National Intelligence Council has warned, in just 15 years two countries, Russia and Iran, could "emerge as energy kingpins."

Despite remarkable ingenuity, the major oil powers are now draining the big basins of petroleum reserves that are amenable to easy, cheap extraction. The real lesson of the Deepwater Horizon oil disaster in the Gulf of Mexico was not BP's sloppy safety standards, but the simple fact everyone saw on "spillcam": one of the corporate energy giants had little choice but to search for what Klare calls "tough oil" miles beneath the surface of the ocean to keep its profits up.

Compounding the problem, the Chinese and Indians have suddenly become far heavier energy consumers. Even if fossil fuel supplies were to remain constant (which they won't), demand, and so costs, are almost certain to rise—and sharply at that. Other developed nations are meeting this threat aggressively by plunging into experimental programs to develop alternative energy sources. The United States has taken a different path, doing far too little to develop alternative sources while, in the last three decades, doubling its dependence on foreign oil imports. Between 1973 and 2007, oil imports have risen from 36% of energy consumed in the U.S. to 66%.

Oil Shock: Scenario 2025

The United States remains so dependent upon foreign oil that a few adverse developments in the global energy market in 2025 spark an oil shock. By comparison, it makes the 1973 oil shock (when prices quadrupled in just months) look like the proverbial molehill. Angered at the dollar's plummeting value, OPEC oil ministers, meeting in Riyadh, demand future energy payments in a "basket" of Yen, Yuan, and Euros. That only hikes the cost of U.S. oil imports further. At the same moment, while signing a new series of long-term delivery contracts with China, the Saudis stabilize their own foreign exchange reserves by switching to the Yuan. Meanwhile, China pours countless billions into building a massive trans-Asia pipeline and funding Iran's exploitation of the world largest natural gas field at South Pars in the Persian Gulf.

Concerned that the U.S. Navy might no longer be able to protect the oil tankers traveling from the Persian Gulf to fuel East Asia, a coalition of Tehran, Riyadh, and Abu Dhabi form an unexpected new Gulf alliance and affirm that China's new fleet of swift aircraft carriers will henceforth patrol the Persian Gulf from a base on the Gulf of Oman. Under heavy economic pressure, London agrees to cancel the U.S. lease on its Indian Ocean island base of Diego Garcia, while Canberra, pressured by the Chinese, informs Washington that the Seventh Fleet is no longer welcome to use Fremantle as a homeport, effectively evicting the U.S. Navy from the Indian Ocean.

With just a few strokes of the pen and some terse announcements, the "Carter Doctrine," by which U.S. military power was to eternally protect the Persian Gulf, is laid to rest in 2025. All the elements that long assured the United States limitless supplies of low-cost oil from that region—logistics, exchange rates, and naval power—evaporate. At this point, the U.S. can still cover only an insignificant 12% of its energy needs from its nascent alternative energy industry, and remains dependent on imported oil for half of its energy consumption.

The oil shock that follows hits the country like a hurricane, sending prices to startling heights, making travel a staggeringly expensive proposition, putting real wages (which had long been declining) into freefall, and rendering non-competitive whatever American exports remained. With thermostats dropping, gas prices climbing through the roof, and dollars flowing overseas in return for costly oil, the American economy is paralyzed. With long-fraying alliances at an end and fiscal pressures mounting, U.S. military forces finally begin a staged withdrawal from their overseas bases.

Within a few years, the U.S. is functionally bankrupt and the clock is ticking toward midnight on the American Century.

Military Misadventure: Present Situation

Counter intuitively, as their power wanes, empires often plunge into ill-advised military misadventures. This phenomenon is known among historians of empire as "micro militarism" and seems to involve psychologically compensatory efforts to salve the sting of retreat or defeat by occupying new territories, however briefly and catastrophically. These operations, irrational even from an imperial point of view, often yield hemorrhaging expenditures or humiliating defeats that only accelerate the loss of power.

Embattled empires through the ages suffer an arrogance that drives them to plunge ever deeper into military misadventures until defeat becomes debacle. In 413 BCE, a weakened Athens sent 200 ships to be slaughtered in Sicily. In 1921, a dying imperial Spain dispatched 20,000 soldiers to be massacred by Berber guerrillas in Morocco. In 1956, a fading British Empire destroyed its prestige by attacking Suez. And in 2001 and 2003, the U.S. occupied Afghanistan and invaded Iraq. With the hubris that marks empires over the millennia, Washington has increased its troops in Afghanistan to 100,000, expanded the war into Pakistan, and extended its commitment to 2014 and beyond, courting disasters large and small in this guerilla-infested, nuclear-armed graveyard of empires.

Military Misadventure: Scenario 2014

So irrational, so unpredictable is "micro-militarism" that seemingly fanciful scenarios are soon outdone by actual events. With the U.S. military stretched thin from Somalia to the Philippines and tensions rising in Israel, Iran, and Korea, possible combinations for a disastrous military crisis abroad are multifold.

It's mid-summer 2014 and a drawn-down U.S. garrison in embattled Kandahar in southern Afghanistan is suddenly, unexpectedly overrun by Taliban guerrillas, while U.S. aircraft are grounded by a blinding sandstorm. Heavy losses are taken and in retaliation, an embarrassed American war commander looses B-1 bombers and F-16 fighters to demolish whole neighborhoods of the city that are believed to be under Taliban control, while AC-130U "Spooky" gunships rake the rubble with devastating cannon fire.

Soon, mullahs are preaching jihad from mosques throughout the region, and Afghan Army units, long trained by American forces to turn the tide of the war, begin to desert en masse. Taliban fighters then launch a series of remarkably sophisticated strikes aimed at U.S. garrisons across the country, sending American casualties soaring. In scenes reminiscent of Saigon in 1975, U.S. helicopters rescue American soldiers and civilians from rooftops in Kabul and Kandahar.

Meanwhile, angry at the endless, decades-long stalemate over Palestine, OPEC's leaders impose a new oil embargo on the U.S. to protest its backing of Israel as well as the killing of untold numbers of Muslim civilians in its ongoing wars across the Greater Middle East. With gas prices soaring and refineries running dry, Washington makes its move, sending in Special Operations forces to seize oil ports in the Persian Gulf. This, in turn, sparks a rash of suicide attacks and the sabotage of pipelines and oil wells. As black clouds billow skyward and diplomats rise at the U.N. to bitterly denounce American actions, commentators worldwide reach back into history to brand this "America's Suez," a telling reference to the 1956 debacle that marked the end of the British Empire.

World War III: Present Situation

In the summer of 2010, military tensions between the U.S. and China began to rise in the western Pacific, once considered an American "lake." Even a year earlier no one would have predicted such a development. As Washington played upon its alliance with London to appropriate much of Britain's global power after World War II, so China is now using the profits from its export trade with the U.S. to fund what is likely to become a military challenge to American dominion over the waterways of Asia and the Pacific.

With its growing resources, Beijing is claiming a vast maritime arc from Korea to Indonesia long dominated by the U.S. Navy. In August, after Washington expressed a "national interest" in the South China Sea and conducted naval exercises there to reinforce that claim, Beijing's official Global Times responded angrily, saying, "The U.S.- China wrestling match over the South China Sea issue has raised the stakes in deciding who the real future ruler of the planet will be."

Amid growing tensions, the Pentagon reported that Beijing now holds "the capability to attack... [U.S.] aircraft carriers in the western Pacific Ocean" and target "nuclear forces throughout... the continental United States." By developing "offensive nuclear, space, and cyber warfare capabilities," China seems determined to vie for dominance of what the Pentagon calls "the information spectrum in all dimensions of the modern battle space." With ongoing development of the powerful Long March V booster rocket, as well as the launch of two satellites in Jan. 2010 and another in July, for a total of five, Beijing signaled that the country was making rapid strides toward an "independent" network of 35 satellites for global positioning, communications, and reconnaissance capabilities by 2020.

To check China and extend its military position globally, Washington is intent on building a new digital network of air and space robotics, advanced cyber warfare capabilities, and electronic surveillance. Military planners expect this integrated system to envelop the Earth in a cyber-grid capable of blinding entire armies on the battlefield or taking out a single terrorist in field or favela. By 2020, if all goes according to plan, the Pentagon will launch a three-tiered shield of space drones—reaching from stratosphere to exosphere, armed with agile missiles, linked by a resilient modular satellite system, and operated through total telescopic surveillance.

Last April, the Pentagon made history. It extended drone operations into the exosphere by quietly launching the X-37B unmanned space shuttle into a low orbit 255 miles above the planet. The X-37B is the first in a new generation of unmanned vehicles that will mark the full weaponization of space, creating an arena for future warfare unlike anything that has gone before.

World War III: Scenario 2025

The technology of space and cyber warfare is so new and untested that even the most outlandish scenarios may soon be superseded by a reality still hard to conceive. If we simply employ the sort of scenarios that the Air Force itself used in its 2009 Future Capabilities Game, however, we can gain "a better understanding of how air, space and cyberspace overlap in warfare," and so begin to imagine how the next world war might actually be fought.

It's 11:59 p.m. on Thanksgiving Thursday in 2025. While cyber-shoppers pound the portals of Best Buy for deep discounts on the latest home electronics from China, U.S. Air Force technicians at the Space Surveillance Telescope (SST) on Maui choke on their coffee as their panoramic screens suddenly blip to black. Thousands of miles away at the U.S. CyberCommand's operations center in Texas, cyber warriors soon detect malicious binaries that, though fired anonymously, show the distinctive digital fingerprints of China's People's Liberation Army.

The first overt strike is one nobody predicted. Chinese "malware" seizes control of the robotics aboard an unmanned solar-powered U.S. "Vulture" drone as it flies at 70,000 feet over the Tsushima Strait between Korea and Japan. It suddenly fires all the rocket pods beneath its enormous 400-foot wingspan, sending dozens of lethal missiles plunging harmlessly into the Yellow Sea, effectively disarming this formidable weapon. Determined to fight fire with fire, the White House authorizes a retaliatory strike.

Confident that its F-6 "Fractionated, Free-Flying" satellite system is impenetrable, Air Force commanders in California transmit robotic codes to the flotilla of X-37B space drones orbiting 250 miles above the Earth, ordering them to launch their "Triple Terminator" missiles at China's 35 satellites. Zero response. In near panic, the Air Force launches its Falcon Hypersonic Cruise Vehicle into an arc 100 miles above the Pacific Ocean and then, just 20 minutes later, sends the computer codes to fire missiles at seven Chinese satellites in nearby orbits. The launch codes are suddenly inoperative.

As the Chinese virus spreads uncontrollably through the F-6 satellite architecture, while those second-rate U.S. supercomputers fail to crack the malware's devilishly complex code, GPS signals crucial to the navigation of U.S. ships and aircraft worldwide are compromised. Carrier fleets begin steaming in circles in the mid-Pacific. Fighter squadrons are grounded. Reaper drones fly aimlessly toward the horizon, crashing when their fuel is exhausted. Suddenly, the United States loses what the U.S. Air Force has long called "the ultimate high ground": space. Within hours, the military power that had dominated the globe for nearly a century has been defeated in World War III without a single human casualty.

A New World Order?

Even if future events prove duller than these four scenarios suggest, every significant trend points toward a far more striking decline in American global power by 2025 than anything Washington now seems to be envisioning.

As allies worldwide begin to realign their policies to take cognizance of rising Asian powers, the cost of maintaining 800 or more overseas military bases will simply become unsustainable, finally forcing a staged withdrawal on a still-unwilling Washington. With both the U.S. and China in a race to weaponize space and cyberspace, tensions between the two powers are bound to rise, making military conflict by 2025 at least feasible, if hardly guaranteed.

Complicating matters even more, the economic, military, and technological trends outlined above will not operate in tidy isolation. As happened to European empires after World War II, such negative forces will undoubtedly prove synergistic. They will combine in thoroughly unexpected ways, create crises for which Americans are remarkably unprepared, and threaten to spin the economy into a sudden downward spiral, consigning this country to a generation or more of economic misery.

As U.S. power recedes, the past offers a spectrum of possibilities for a future world order. At one end of this spectrum, the rise of a new global superpower, however unlikely, cannot be ruled out. Yet both China and Russia evince self-referential cultures, recondite non-roman scripts, regional defense strategies, and underdeveloped legal systems, denying them key instruments for global dominion. At the moment then, no single superpower seems to be on the horizon likely to succeed the U.S.

In a dark, dystopian version of our global future, a coalition of transnational corporations, multilateral forces like NATO, and an international financial elite could conceivably forge a single, possibly unstable, supra-national nexus that would make it no longer meaningful to speak of national empires at all. While denationalized corporations and multinational elites would assumedly rule such a world from secure urban enclaves, the multitudes would be relegated to urban and rural wastelands.

In Planet of Slums, Mike Davis offers at least a partial vision of such a world from the bottom up. He argues that the billion people already packed into fetid favela-style slums worldwide (rising to two billion by 2030) will make "the 'feral, failed cities' of the Third World... the distinctive battle space of the twenty-first century." As darkness settles over some future super-favela, "the empire can deploy Orwellian technologies of repression" as "hornet-like helicopter gun-ships stalk enigmatic enemies in the narrow streets of the slum districts... Every morning the slums reply with suicide bombers and eloquent explosions."

At a midpoint on the spectrum of possible futures, a new global oligopoly might emerge between 2020 and 2040, with rising powers China, Russia, India, and Brazil collaborating with receding powers like Britain, Germany, Japan, and the United States to enforce an ad hoc global dominion, akin to the loose alliance of European empires that ruled half of humanity circa 1900.

Another possibility: the rise of regional hegemonies in a return to something reminiscent of the international system that operated before modern empires took shape. In this neo-Westphalian world order, with its endless vistas of micro-violence and unchecked exploitation, each hegemon would dominate its immediate region—Brasilia in South America, Washington in North America, Pretoria in southern Africa, and so on. Space, cyberspace, and the maritime deeps, removed from the control of the former planetary "policeman," the United States, might even become a new global commons, controlled through an expanded U.N. Security Council or some ad hoc body.

All of these scenarios extrapolate existing trends into the future on the assumption that Americans, blinded by the arrogance of decades of historically unparalleled power, cannot or will not take steps to manage the unchecked erosion of their global position.

If America's decline is in fact on a 22-year trajectory from 2003 to 2025, then we have already frittered away most of the first decade of that decline with wars that distracted us from long-term problems and, like water tossed onto desert sands, wasted trillions of desperately needed dollars.

If only 15 years remain, the odds of frittering them all away still remain high. Congress and the president are now in gridlock; the American system is flooded with corporate money meant to jam up the works; and there is little suggestion that any issues of significance, including our wars, our bloated national security state, our starved education system, and our antiquated energy supplies, will be addressed with sufficient seriousness to assure the sort of soft landing that might maximize our country's role and prosperity in a changing world.

Europe's empires are gone and America's imperium is going. It seems increasingly doubtful that the United States will have anything like Britain's success in shaping a succeeding world order that protects its interests, preserves its prosperity, and bears the imprint of its best values.

(Alfred W. McCoy is professor of history at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. A TomDispatch regular, he is the author, most recently, of Policing America's Empire: The United States, the Philippines, and the Rise of the Surveillance State (2009). He is also the convener of the "Empires in Transition" project, a global working group of 140 historians from universities on four continents. The results of their first meetings at Madison, Sydney, and Manila were published as Colonial Crucible: Empire in the Making of the Modern American State and the findings from their latest conference will appear next year as Endless Empire: Europe's Eclipse, America's Ascent, and the Decline of U.S. Global Power.)

Copyright 2010 Alfred W. McCoy, © 2010 Tomdispatch.com

Want to know how some of the rich are preparing for the future?

Go to....www.escapefromamerika.com/move or <http://www.sovereignsociety.com/pages/svs/video/PassportVideo.php?pub=SVS&code=DSVSLA33>

20101206-03	16:55	SteveB	Re: The Bush Tax Cuts
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

Dear Ben,

Yet the only reason given (or possible) for why tax rates for the rich must be so low (and budget-busting) is that low rates are necessary so that these silver-spooners can/will create jobs. Well, then where are the jobs? China, I guess...

So, at least all the Republicans seem to believe these lies, and maybe many of the ball-less Democrats.

20101206-04	21:16	SteveG	Re: "4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Dennis,

With the pending continuation of the Bush tax scenarios and the continuation of our mounting national debt as well as the continuation of the 2 war sites, where are we borrowing the money to pay for this life style? Saudi Arabia and China for certain, but where else??

20101207-01	06:07	SteveB	Re: "4 Scenarios for the Coming Collapse of the American Empire"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveG,

I read that Haiti and Greece are thinking about helping us with loans...

20101207-02	10:21	Jim	Fw: Changes Are Coming & "19 Facts About the De-industrialization of America That Will Blow Your Mind"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	--

These are continuations of processes that have been going on for many years.....Not new but escalating to critical points.

Like anything you read, this is not 100%—but some of these changes may very well happen. Make sure you read this and then the following article: "The De-Industrialization of the U.S."

There is nothing political about this email. It simply points out very probable changes that are in our future.

[Original source of email unknown. —SteveB]

CHANGES ARE COMING—Whether these changes are good or bad depends in part on how we adapt to them. But, ready or not, here they come!

1. The Post Office

Get ready to imagine a world without the post office. They are so deeply in financial trouble that there is probably no way to sustain it long term. Email, Fed Ex, and UPS have just about wiped out the minimum revenue needed to keep the post office alive. Most of your mail every day is junk mail and bills.

2. The Check

Britain is already laying the groundwork to do away with checks by 2018. It costs the financial system billions of dollars a year to process checks. Plastic cards and online transactions will lead to the eventual demise of the check. This plays right into the death of the post office. If you never paid your bills by mail and never received them by mail, the post office would absolutely go out of business.

3. The Newspaper

The younger generation simply doesn't read the newspaper. They certainly don't subscribe to a daily delivered print edition. That may go the way of the milkman and the laundry man. As for reading the paper online, get ready to pay for it. The rise in mobile Internet devices and e-readers has caused all the newspaper and magazine publishers to form an alliance. They have met with Apple, Amazon, and the major cell phone companies to develop a model for paid subscription services.

4. The Book

You say you will never give up the physical book that you hold in your hand and turn the literal pages. I said the same thing about downloading music from iTunes. I wanted my hard copy CD. But I quickly changed my mind when I discovered that I could get albums for half the price without ever leaving home to get the latest music. The same thing will happen with books. You can browse a bookstore online and even read a preview chapter before you buy. And the price is less than half that of a real book. And think of the convenience! Once you start flicking your fingers on the screen instead of the book, you find that you are lost in the story, can't wait to see what happens next, and you forget that you're holding a gadget instead of a book.

5. The Land Line Telephone

Unless you have a large family and make a lot of local calls, you don't need it anymore. Most people keep it simply because they've always had it. But you are paying double charges for that extra service. All the cell phone companies will let you call customers using the same cell provider for no charge against your minutes.

6. Music

This is one of the saddest parts of the change story. The music industry is dying a slow death. Not just because of illegal downloading. It's the lack of innovative new music being given a chance to get to the people who would like to hear it. Greed and corruption is the problem. The record labels and the radio conglomerates are simply self-destructing. Over 40% of the music purchased today is "catalog items," meaning traditional music that the public is familiar with. Older established artists. This is also true on the live concert circuit. To explore this fascinating and disturbing topic further, check out the book, Appetite for Self-Destruction, by Steve Knopper, and the video documentary, "Before the Music Dies."

7. Television

Revenues to the networks are down dramatically. Not just because of the economy. People are watching TV and movies streamed from their computers. And they're playing games and doing lots of other things that take up the time that used to be spent watching TV. Prime time shows have degenerated down to lower than the lowest common denominator. Cable rates are skyrocketing and commercials run about every 4 minutes and 30 seconds. I say good riddance to most of it. It's time for the cable companies to be put out of our misery. Let the people choose what they want to watch online and through Netflix.

8. The "Things" That You Own

Many of the very possessions that we used to own are still in our lives, but we may not actually own them in the future. They may simply reside in "the cloud." Today your computer has a hard drive and you store your pictures, music, movies, and documents. Your software is on a CD or DVD, and you can always re-install it if need be. But all of that is changing. Apple, Microsoft, and Google are all finishing up their latest "cloud services." That means that when you turn on a computer, the Internet will be built into the operating system. So, Windows, Google, and the Mac OS will be tied straight into the Internet. If you click an icon, it will open something in the Internet cloud. If you save something, it will be saved to the cloud. And you may pay a monthly subscription fee to the cloud provider. In this virtual world, you can access your music or your books, or your whatever from any laptop or handheld device. That's the good news. But, will you actually own any of this "stuff" or will it all be able to disappear at any moment in a big "Poof?" Will most of the things in our lives be disposable and whimsical? It makes you want to run to the closet and pull out that photo album, grab a book from the shelf, or open up a CD case and pull out the insert.

9. Privacy

If there ever was a concept that we can look back on nostalgically, it would be privacy. That's gone. It's been gone for a long time anyway. There are cameras on the street, in most of the buildings, and even built into your computer and cell phone. But you can be sure that 24/7, "They" know who you are and where you are, right down to the GPS coordinates, and the Google Street View. If you buy something, your habit is put into a zillion profiles, and your ads will change to reflect those habits. And "They" will try to get you to buy something else. Again and again. All we will have that can't be changed are Memories."

"Nineteen Facts About the De-industrialization of America That Will Blow Your Mind" The Economic Collapse

Sept. 24, 2010, (<http://theeconomiccollapseblog.com/archives/19-facts-about-the-deindustrialization-of-america-that-will-blow-your-mind>)

The United States is rapidly becoming the very first "post-industrial" nation on the globe. [there was Gr.Br.!] All great economic empires eventually become fat and lazy and squander the great wealth that their forefathers have left them, but the pace at which America is accomplishing this is absolutely amazing.

It was America that was at the forefront of the industrial revolution. It was America that showed the world how to mass produce everything from automobiles to televisions to airplanes. It was the great American manufacturing base that crushed Germany and Japan in World War II.

But now we are witnessing the de-industrialization of America. Tens of thousands of factories have left the United States in the past decade alone. Millions upon millions of manufacturing jobs have been lost in the same time period. The United States has become a nation that consumes everything in sight and yet produces increasingly little. Do you know what our biggest export is today? Waste paper. Yes, trash is the number one thing that we ship out to the rest of the world as we voraciously blow our money on whatever the rest of the world wants to sell to us.

The United States has become bloated and spoiled and our economy is now just a shadow of what it once was. Once upon a time America could literally out produce the rest of the world combined. Today that is no longer true, but Americans sure do consume more than anyone else in the world. If the de-industrialization of America continues at this current pace, what possible kind of a future are we going to be leaving to our children? Any great nation throughout history has been great at making things. So if the United States continues to allow its manufacturing base to erode at a staggering pace how in the world can the U.S. continue to consider itself to be a great nation?

We have created the biggest debt bubble in the history of the world in an effort to maintain a very high standard of living, but the current state of affairs is not anywhere close to sustainable. Every single month America goes into more debt and every single month America gets poorer. So what happens when the debt bubble pops? The deindustrialization of the United States should be a top concern for every man, woman and child in the country. But sadly, most Americans do not have any idea what is going on around them.

For people like that, take this article and print it out and hand it to them. Perhaps what they will read below will shock them badly enough to awaken them from their slumber:

1. The United States has lost approximately 42,400 factories since 2001. About 75 percent of those factories employed over 500 people when they were still in operation.
2. Dell Inc., one of America 's largest manufacturers of computers, has announced plans to dramatically expand its operations in China with an investment of over $100 billion over the next decade.
3. Dell has announced that it will be closing its last large U.S. manufacturing facility in Winston-Salem , North Carolina in November. Approximately 900 jobs will be lost.
4. In 2008, 1.2 billion cell phones were sold worldwide. So how many of them were manufactured inside the United States ? Zero.
5. According to a new study conducted by the Economic Policy Institute, if the U.S. trade deficit with China continues to increase at its current rate, the U.S. economy will lose over half a million jobs this year alone.
6. As of the end of July, the U.S. trade deficit with China had risen 18 percent compared to the same time period a year ago.
7. The United States has lost a total of about 5.5 million manufacturing jobs since Oct., 2000.
8. According to Tax Notes, between 1999 and 2008 employment at the foreign affiliates of U.S. parent companies increased an astounding 30 percent to 10.1 million. During that exact same time period, U.S. employment at American multinational corporations declined 8 percent to 21.1 million.
9. In 1959, manufacturing represented 28 percent of U.S. economic output. In 2008, it represented 11.5 percent.
10. Ford Motor Company recently announced the closure of a factory that produces the Ford Ranger in St. Paul, Minnesota. Approximately 750 good paying middle class jobs are going to be lost because making Ford Rangers in Minnesota does not fit in with Ford's new "global" manufacturing strategy.
11. As of the end of 2009, less than 12 million Americans worked in manufacturing. The last time less than 12 million Americans were employed in manufacturing was in 1941.
12. In the United States today, consumption accounts for 70 percent of GDP. Of this 70 percent, over half is spent on services.
13. The United States has lost a whopping 32 percent of its manufacturing jobs since the year 2000.
14. In 2001, the United States ranked fourth in the world in per capita broadband Internet use. Today it ranks 15th.
15. Manufacturing employment in the U.S. computer industry is actually lower in 2010 than it was in 1975.
16. Printed circuit boards are used in tens of thousands of different products. Asia now produces 84 percent of them worldwide.
17. The United States spends approximately $3.90 on Chinese goods for every $1 that the Chinese spend on goods from the United States.

18. One prominent economist is projecting that the Chinese economy will be three times larger than the U.S. economy by the year 2040.

19. The U.S. Census Bureau says that 43.6 million Americans are now living in poverty and according to them that is the highest number of poor Americans in the 51 years that records have been kept.

So how many tens of thousands more factories do we need to lose before we do something about it? How many millions more Americans are going to become unemployed before we all admit that we have a very, very serious problem on our hands? How many more trillions of dollars are going to leave the country before we realize that we are losing wealth at a pace that is killing our economy? How many once great manufacturing cities are going to become rotting war zones like Detroit before we understand that we are committing national economic suicide?

The de-industrialization of America is a national crisis. It needs to be treated like one. America is in deep, deep trouble folks. It is time to wake up.

20101210-01 17:09 SteveB Re: My Blog

Dear Pam,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

I did read your blog and loved it. I wish I were that ambitious! I'll certainly follow yours!

The big news is that Marci and I are moving back to the States for a while. We arrive in Miami on Dec. 31. I don't know where we're going to live for sure (probably Florida or Montana), while Marci pursues citizenship (because she is so patriotic haha), because it's the practical thing to do.

I can't wait to see my kids and grandkids and eat all the decadent foods I love. But, next week, we're taking a two-day, intensive class in just making salteñas, a special Bolivian empanada. Salteñas are a delicious pastry crust wrapped and baked around a spicy, or not so spicy, juicy chicken stew. They might make a good money-maker in the U.S.

20101211-01 16:09 Dennis "Don't Shoot the Messenger for Revealing Uncomfortable Truths"

Much has been written lately, amid a lot of authoritarian posturing, about WikiLeaks and Julian Assange. But what does Assange himself have to say?

"Don't Shoot the Messenger for Revealing Uncomfortable Truths" by Julian Assange

Dec. 7, 2010, (<http://www.dailypaul.com/151479/breaking-article-by-julian-assange-dont-shoot-messenger-for-revealing-uncomfortable-truths>)

(Wikileaks deserves protection, not threats and attacks.)

In 1958 a young Rupert Murdoch, then owner and editor of Adelaide's The News, wrote: "In the race between secrecy and truth, it seems inevitable that truth will always win."

His observation perhaps reflected his father Keith Murdoch's expose that Australian troops were being needlessly sacrificed by incompetent British commanders on the shores of Gallipoli. The British tried to shut him up but Keith Murdoch would not be silenced and his efforts led to the termination of the disastrous Gallipoli campaign. Nearly a century later, WikiLeaks is also fearlessly publishing facts that need to be made public.

I grew up in a Queensland country town where people spoke their minds bluntly. They distrusted big government as something that could be corrupted if not watched carefully. The dark days of corruption in the Queensland government before the Fitzgerald inquiry are testimony to what happens when the politicians gag the media from reporting the truth.

These things have stayed with me. WikiLeaks was created around these core values. The idea, conceived in Australia, was to use Internet technologies in new ways to report the truth.

WikiLeaks coined a new type of journalism: scientific journalism. We work with other media outlets to bring people the news, but also to prove it is true. Scientific journalism allows you to read a news story, then to click online to see the original document it is based on. That way you can judge for yourself: Is the story true? Did the journalist report it accurately?

Democratic societies need a strong media and WikiLeaks is part of that media. The media helps keep government honest. WikiLeaks has revealed some hard truths about the Iraq and Afghan wars, and broken stories about corporate corruption.

People have said I am anti-war: for the record, I am not. Sometimes nations need to go to war, and there are just wars. But there is nothing more wrong than a government lying to its people about those wars, then asking these same citizens to put their lives and their taxes on the line for those lies. If a war is justified, then tell the truth and the people will decide whether to support it.

If you have read any of the Afghan or Iraq war logs, any of the U.S. embassy cables or any of the stories about the things WikiLeaks has reported, consider how important it is for all media to be able to report these things freely.

WikiLeaks is not the only publisher of the U.S. embassy cables. Other media outlets, including Britain's The Guardian, The New York Times, El Pais in Spain and Der Spiegel in Germany have published the same redacted cables.

Yet it is WikiLeaks, as the coordinator of these other groups, that has copped the most vicious attacks and accusations from the U.S. government and its acolytes. I have been accused of treason, even though I am an Australian, not a U.S., citizen. There have been dozens of serious calls in the U.S. for me to be "taken out" by U.S. Special Forces. Sarah Palin says I should be "hunted down like Osama bin Laden", a Republican bill sits before the U.S. Senate seeking to have me declared a "transnational threat" and disposed of accordingly. An adviser to the Canadian Prime Minister's office has called on national television for me to be assassinated. An American blogger has called for my 20-year-old son, here in Australia, to be kidnapped and harmed for no other reason than to get at me.

And Australians should observe with no pride the disgraceful pandering to these sentiments by Julia Gillard and her government. The powers of the Australian government appear to be fully at the disposal of the U.S. as to whether to cancel my Australian passport, or to spy on or harass WikiLeaks supporters. The Australian Attorney-General is doing everything he can to help a U.S. investigation clearly directed at framing Australian citizens and shipping them to the U.S.

Prime Minister Gillard and U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton have not had a word of criticism for the other media organisations. That is because The Guardian, The New York Times and Der Spiegel are old and large, while WikiLeaks is as yet young and small.

We are the underdogs. The Gillard government is trying to shoot the messenger because it doesn't want the truth revealed, including information about its own diplomatic and political dealings. Has there been any response from the Australian government to the numerous public threats of violence against me and other WikiLeaks personnel? One might have thought an Australian prime minister would be defending her citizens against such things, but there have only been wholly unsubstantiated claims of illegality. The Prime Minister and especially the Attorney-General are meant to carry out their duties with dignity and above the fray. Rest assured, these two mean to save their own skins. They will not.

Every time WikiLeaks publishes the truth about abuses committed by U.S. agencies, Australian politicians chant a provably false chorus with the State Department: "You'll risk lives! National security! You'll endanger troops!" Then they say there is nothing of importance in what WikiLeaks publishes. It can't be both. Which is it?

It is neither. WikiLeaks has a four-year publishing history. During that time we have changed whole governments, but not a single person, as far as anyone is aware, has been harmed. But the U.S., with Australian government connivance, has killed thousands in the past few months alone.

U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates admitted in a letter to the U.S. Congress that no sensitive intelligence sources or methods had been compromised by the Afghan war logs disclosure. The Pentagon stated there was no evidence the WikiLeaks reports had led to anyone being harmed in Afghanistan. NATO in Kabul told CNN it couldn't find a single person who needed protecting. The Australian Department of Defence said the same. No Australian troops or sources have been hurt by anything we have published.

But our publications have been far from unimportant. The U.S. diplomatic cables reveal some startling facts:

- The U.S. asked its diplomats to steal personal human material and information from UN officials and human rights groups, including DNA, fingerprints, iris scans, credit card numbers, Internet passwords and ID photos, in violation of international treaties. Presumably Australian UN diplomats may be targeted, too.
- King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia asked the U.S. to attack Iran.
- Officials in Jordan and Bahrain want Iran's nuclear program stopped by any means available.
- Britain's Iraq inquiry was fixed to protect "U.S. interests".
- Sweden is a covert member of NATO and U.S. intelligence sharing is kept from parliament.
- The U.S. is playing hardball to get other countries to take freed detainees from Guantanamo Bay.
- Barack Obama agreed to meet the Slovenian President only if Slovenia took a prisoner.
- Our Pacific neighbour Kiribati was offered millions of dollars to accept detainees.

In its landmark ruling in the Pentagon Papers case, the U.S. Supreme Court said, "only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government". The swirling storm around WikiLeaks today reinforces the need to defend the right of all media to reveal the truth.

(Julian Assange is editor-in-chief of WikiLeaks.)

20101212-01	14:09	Pam	Re: My Blog
-------------	-------	-----	-------------

Dear SteveB,

It must feel strange to be changing your life so drastically. There must be a lot to do to get ready. Your whole life sounds like one big adventure; I'm amazed you still have the gumption to persist. I admire that.

I dreamed last night that I met Obama and sort of took him under my wing. He was shaken by all the criticism aimed at him lately, and I literally held his hand and encouraged him to be strong. He looks like (back in real life now) he's aged ten years in two years. On a purely human level I feel for the man. He really is pretty young and he doesn't seem as seasoned as someone like, say, Ted Kennedy. I heard a piece on NPR (by James Fallows) that Obama and Bill Clinton gave a joint press conference or something the other day. Fallows said that while Clinton and Obama stood side by side and each spoke, Clinton looked stiff and awkward, but as soon as Obama left the room—without mingling—Clinton became his old affable, garrulous (don't know how to spell that and my dictionary is missing the g's) self. It's too bad Clinton screwed around. Except for the Kosovo mess, he was a pretty good President.

Now Newt Gingrich is gearing up again. I thought we'd seen the last of him. Lord knows what the new Republican Congress is going to put us through. I'm so fed up with rampant conservatism I can hardly stand it. If I were you, I'd settle in a liberal part of the country. I love where I live, but it is awfully conservative for my taste. At least we live in a liberal neighborhood

Good luck with your move. Do the Bolivians celebrate Christmas in a big way? I hope that despite all your trials and tribulations you have a very happy holiday. A new year, a new life—who knows what's next?

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20101212-02	14:36	Dennis	"Free Trade Doesn't Work: Interview with Economist Ian Fletcher"
-------------	-------	--------	--

I think this article on the failure of free trade will be of interest to you guys:

"Free Trade Doesn't Work: Interview with Economist Ian Fletcher" by Michael Hughes, Huffington Post

Dec. 8, 2010, (<http://www.truth-out.org/free-trade-doesnt-work-interview-with-economist-ianfletcher65810>)

Free trade doesn't work, the global economy is a myth and the U.S. has been duped during trade negotiations for the past 40 years, according to Ian Fletcher, an adjunct fellow with the U.S. Business and Industry Council and author of Free Trade Doesn't Work: What Should Replace It and Why, who relayed these concepts to me in an exclusive interview.

During our exchange I discovered that Mr. Fletcher certainly is not opposed to capitalism, underlined by his experience working for hedge funds and private equity firms as an economist, but what he is opposed to are bad economic policies that have led to an ever-burgeoning U.S. trade deficit well on its way to hitting $500 billion this year.

Michael Hughes: You argue that protectionism is more "American" than free trade. How would you respond to libertarian types who might see this as an assault on America's deeply-held capitalistic values?

Ian Fletcher: Libertarians simply don't know their history. Take out a $10 bill and have a look at the portrait on it. Alexander Hamilton, founding father and intellectual architect of American capitalism, was a protectionist, and protectionism was American policy from Independence until after WWII. The reality is that a blend of government support for economic growth along with vigorous market-oriented competition has been the American tradition from the transcontinental railroad to the Internet. Entire industries like semiconductors and aircraft were effectively launched by Cold War military industrial policy. Is it an accident that nations, like China, that still do this sort of thing are cleaning our clock right now?

Hughes: You thoroughly and convincingly document, supported by countless inconvenient facts, how protectionism has been much more beneficial to the U.S. throughout history than free trade. If protectionism is clearly the better economic policy, why is the U.S. so resistant to change?

Ian Fletcher: The U.S. isn't totally resistant to change on this issue, and it is, in fact, changing. Since the late 1990s, one can trace public opinion and congressional majorities inexorably turning against "free" trade, which has really been a distinctive, off-shoring-focused approach to trade policy to benefit multinational corporate interests. Why has it taken so long? Corruption, both the obvious kind driven by campaign finance, and the subtler kind deriving from the laziness, complacency, and intellectual arrogance of economists.

The "American" multinationals, which are no longer American corporations but find this fiction convenient on Capitol Hill, and other free trade advocates have prevailed because a critical mass of American voters has not yet seen through the delusional economics of free trade, and because America can still borrow money abroad and sell off assets to cover its trade deficit. But this music is going to stop fairly soon.

Hughes: But doesn't foreign competition force U.S. corporations to become leaner and more productive?

Ian Fletcher: Sure, but I'm not against foreign competition. I'm not against trade either. I'm against free trade and the ersatz version thereof we are being subjected to, neither of which are the same thing as trade per se. Companies need enough competition to keep them on their toes, but not so much as to knock them off their feet. The U.S. color TV industry hasn't exactly been driven to heights of efficiency by foreign competition—because foreign competition killed it. And a lot of that competition wasn't free at all; it was subsidized by foreign nations seeking a foothold in strategic industries, i.e. those with a future.

Hughes: India's prime minister recently suggested off-shoring processes to India makes American corporations more productive overall. Is there any validity to this statement?

Ian Fletcher: This is a mirage created by the fact that if you offshore the low-productivity jobs from an American company, the jobs remaining in the U.S. will have, by definition, higher productivity—creating the illusion that the company is now more productive. But jobs have still been lost, and there is, pace laissez-faire economic theory, no guarantee that the workers who formerly held them will find new jobs of equal or greater value. What works on the level of the individual company is a net loss for the economy as a whole.

And it's erroneous to suppose that merely upgrading skill sets will be enough to protect American wages and employment levels if we do nothing to fix our employment situation. Educating people for jobs that don't exist because they've moved abroad will not magically cause jobs to come into existence.

Hughes: Which products should the U.S. target immediately for protectionist measures?

Ian Fletcher: I don't advocate industry-specific tariffs, which obviously could lead to all kinds of political mischief. I prefer a flat tariff. But if America imposed, say, a flat 30% tariff on all imports, this would tend to bring back to the U.S. high-value industries like producing flat-panel displays, not the cheap-labor stuff like T-shirts.

Hughes: Can China sustain its unprecedented growth through free trade, and what would happen to China if America woke up one day and became protectionist?

Ian Fletcher: Free trade does not even remotely characterize what China practices. China practices industrial policy and mercantilism, which are the systematic manipulation of the domestic economy and foreign trade to increase economic growth. Right now, the interests of China's ruling elite are far more closely aligned with the interests of the Chinese economy as a whole than in the U.S. China's elite wants to build up its own country; the American elite is quite happy to let America gradually decline so long as they can make investments and money overseas. At some point, America's ability to absorb China's trade surpluses will end, and it doesn't look like China can smoothly segue to satisfying domestic demand quickly enough. Their manufacturing base is set up to produce goods, like fax machines, pitched at the income levels of their trading partners, not their own people.

Hughes: Explain how free trade actually leads to artificial pricing (i.e., dubious assumption #2 in your book: "there are no externalities").

Ian Fletcher: An externality is a missing price tag. For example, this means that products produced in environmentally-harmful ways impose economic costs on the environment that ought to show up in their price and don't. To take another example, buying so many cheap imports that you kill off an entire domestic industry will deprive America's economy of the future value of that industry and everything that would have grown out of it. Because we lost the color TV industry, we've never had a flat screen TV industry either—but the cost of that wasn't factored into all those cheap color TVs in 1981.

Hughes: Countless jobs have been lost from corporations procuring parts, relocating or outsourcing entire manufacturing operations overseas. Why is manufacturing important to America?

Ian Fletcher: Because Americans want to consume manufactured goods, which means that either we must make them, or we must make something else to trade for them. And there just aren't enough other things we can offer the rest of the world, to keep them supplying us manufactured goods forever. Exporting soybeans and investment banking services just won't cut it; the numbers (which are easy to look up) aren't nearly big enough. Non-elite service-industry jobs are also much more productivity-constrained than manufacturing, so you're never going to be able to pay most people decent wages there.

20101214-01 07:29 SteveB Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"
--

Dear Dennis,

Thanks for this. I liked it so well, I thought it deserved to be quoted (see below). Why does the right-wing press never publish anything like this? It's just economics, not politics...

What? Republicans don't want a thriving, vibrant economy for their grandchildren? They don't understand that a large middle class helps the rich too? That a prosperous America is a better place to live than a Third World America, even for the rich and super-rich? That only farming, mining (incl. drilling), and manufacturing generate wealth? That it can never be in the strategic interest of any country to export its manufacturing and jobs to other countries?

To do so is suicidal!

China, on the other hand, is very protectionist. And why shouldn't they be? They act in their own self-interest. This is rational.

Only America seems to have lost the realization of what its self-interest is and must be—America for all! Just, please, not at the cost of sticking our heads in the sand like we used to do...provincial America, ignoring the rest of the world.

We should be doing exactly what China and India and other countries are doing...protecting and nourishing our industries, educating our children well in foreign languages, science, business, and creative problem solving, then going out there and trying to win this new Cold War with our ingenuity and manufacturing might, because only that can give us any future prosperity.

20101214-02 07:37 GaryC Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"

Dear SteveB,

Are you leaving Bolivia? I assume you are headed to the worker's paradise of Cuba, Yemen or Venezuela! What's up?

20101214-03 08:52 Charis Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"

Dear Dennis and SteveB,

The author's right that exporting our jobs to countries like India is a mistake because there is no guarantee Americans who lose those jobs will find other jobs. But there's another point he didn't happen to mention. Americans used to be very hard working and considered any job honorable as long as a person was working. Now Americans have gotten too high-falutin' for manual labor and with millions of people out of work, those jobs are still being given to foreigners, many of them illegals, not because there aren't Americans to fill them, but because Americans consider those jobs to be beneath them.

20101214-04 18:00 SteveB Re: "Don't Shoot the Messenger for Revealing Uncomfortable Truths"

"In its landmark ruling in the Pentagon Papers case, the U.S. Supreme Court said, 'Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government.' The swirling storm around WikiLeaks today reinforces the need to defend the right of all media to reveal the truth." —Julian Assange, editor-in-chief of WikiLeaks.

20101214-05 18:45 SteveB Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work" Travel

Dear GaryC,

Well, it's kind of a long story, but I'll tell the short version. I had found the ideal location for my restaurant. My lawyer and I worked quite some time on the contract with the landlord, who assured me the whole time that it was essentially a done deal. We agreed on everything and even got along great (he owns a bar where they salsa and do Cuban music and dancing and rum all night long on weekends). Then things broke down and it became a family thing with the guy's father really the owner and deciding to rent the place to a relative. They finally opened and are failing miserably. After that, we kept looking at other places, but nothing was quite right. I have a very definite business plan for this place (actually a couple of alternatives), but location and facility need to fit definite specs, so to speak.

So, anyway, I was going to stay here and run the restaurant while my wife, Marcela, headed back to the States at the end of this month to finish up her U.S. citizenship stuff. That could take as long as 3-6 month. I'm embarked on the same citizenship path down here in Bolivia. As you know, visas can get expensive and a hassle, so we're doing what we have to do to travel back and forth more easily.

But now, without the restaurant to occupy me, I have not so much to do and I miss my White Castles, so I'm coming with Marci to spend a little time back in Dixie or the U.S.S.R. or whatever. Will spend a while with my daughters and grandkids in Florida, then try to visit with as many old friends as possible and my brothers on the way to, probably, Montana for a while.

Then back to Bolivia. It will be time to buy and sell cattle again. I love helping the cowboys drive them into town to the market, a long, perilous journey down a tiny dirt road, across two rivers, but I do it from a pick-up, not horseback. Can you even imagine what it would feel like after being on a horse most of the time for 10-12 hours?

Also hoping that, by that time, the local cocaine boom will have settled down a little so we can get the restaurant started up. Right now there's so much construction going on in this city that they've run out of cement and can't import enough, so much of the construction has come to a screeching halt as concrete is rationed out to, probably, whoever bribes somebody the most. About all they build here anymore are reinforced concrete towers about 20-30 floors, so the concrete is sort of essential. Wood is never used except for a few special insect-proof jungle woods that are used decoratively more than anything. Everything else is mortar and bricks or ceramic bricks or tile, so the cement is sort of necessary. Sure wish I had some stock in the local cement industry.

Take care. May you and yours have a great Christmas! Would love to see you when we pass through God's Country, otherwise known as Indiana.

20101215-01 06:38 SteveB Re: U.S. Photos: 1935-1939

Dear Jim,

Thank you for this. The photos not only remind me of how lucky most of us are, but also make me think of how many millions of jobless people may be headed for the same scenario because those jobs simply don't exist in the U.S. anymore. The fat cats have moved them to China.

When I was a young boy, we lived close to the New York Central tracks outside Greencastle. I can remember, even in the early '50's, many desperate, homeless people who still traveled by rail. Often, they would appear at our door for a handout. My parents were always careful and distrustful of these folks. We kids were certainly never allowed to be alone with them, but we always gave them something to eat and drink before they continued on their journey to who knows where. My mother was always gentle and sympathetic with them, even through her distrust.

I pray we never see again in America what we saw then and what I commonly see in my Third World travels, but I have become less hopeful with time.

20101215-02 17:48 Dennis "Tax Cuts Simply Do Not Create Jobs"

Okay, business geniuses, if this doesn't make sense, let me know why....

"Tax Cuts Simply Do Not Create Jobs" by Larry Beinhart, AlterNet

Dec. 14, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/149201/>)

MYTH #1: Tax cuts create jobs. Tax increases cost jobs.

All Republican politicians, and many Democratic ones as well, make the claim that tax increases will prevent small business people from hiring. Indeed, it may force them to fire people.

Alright, we expect politicians to say loony things.

But we have a right to expect reporters to break out in hysterical laughter, economists to call their nearest media outlet to say how ridiculous that is, and competing politicians to explain why they're wrong. That doesn't happen. And that's the weird part. Because it's pretty simple.

Let's do some basic economics. Real basic. Taxes are not paid on revenue. Taxes are paid on profits. Profits are revenues minus costs. Labor is a cost.

Let's imagine a small business. For the sake of simplicity, let's say it's a personal business, not a corporation. It has gross revenues of $10,000,000 a year. It has one hundred employees. They each make about the median income, about $35,000 a year. So they have a payroll of $3,500,000.

All its other expenses come to $5,000,000 a year. This includes all the things it buys to make whatever it sells, rent, utilities, shipping, legal, accounting, etc., etc., and so forth. That leaves a profit of $1,500,000 a year.

Let's look at a very high tax situation. Taxes on everything over a million dollars a year is 90%. (The rate from WWII until 1964) So, on the final half million of my profits, I have to give the government $450,000, leaving just $50,000.

If I add ten employees at $35,000 each, that costs me $350,000. Those are costs, deducted from revenues, decreasing profits. Do I want to do that? I would only have kept $35,000 of that $350,000 anyway. You bet I want to do it. I get to add ten employees at a cost—to me—of just $35,000. Or $3,500 per employee. I get more production, more territories, more sales. My business grows. Indeed, the whole community benefits.

Let's look at a much lower tax situation. Say 30% (just 1% lower than what we have now.) We'll assume the same business, same employees, same costs and profits.

Let's say I'm approached by a factory in China. For simplicity's sake, let's say that even with shipping and other ancillary costs, I can cut fifty jobs and walk away with half their salaries as profits. Fifty employees cost me $1,750,000. Half of that is $875,000. After taxes (30%), I keep $612,000. That's worth doing. I'm a bit tired of Chinese villains.

Let's say that by increasing hours, decreasing benefits, firing older workers, hiring new workers at a lower pay scale and a variety of other maneuvers, I can decrease my costs by the equivalent of ten employees. That's $350,000. At a 90% tax rate I only keep $35,000. Not chump change. But balanced against continuity, happiness, and efficiency in my company and the likelihood that it will grow my business, I'm likely to keep my people. At a 30% tax rate I keep $245,000. I'll jump on it.

In any debate on taxes and their effect on business, keep in mind that taxes are only paid on profits. Costs are counted against profits. High taxes are, therefore, an inducement to invest (create deductible costs). Labor is a cost. High taxes are, therefore, an inducement to hire people. Not, of course, at random, but people who will grow the business and increase the value of the business.

Low taxes are an inducement to reduce costs—at whatever cost—and take profits. We currently have low taxes. If the theoretical model above is correct, the result should be high unemployment and high corporate profits. Moreover, profits that are retained. That are not reinvested. Except to purchase other companies. Which is exactly what we have.

20101216-01	06:26	SteveB	"A Few Things You Should Know About Minimum Wage"
-------------	-------	--------	---

Below is another example of Republican attempts to destroy American workers. How do these crazy idiots get any votes at all? Only through lies, manipulation, and corruption. As we discussed before the election in terms of the Tea Party, why would anybody but the super-rich or the super-stupid vote Republican, since to do so (if you ain't super-rich) is to vote against your own self-interest?

"A Few Things You Should Know About Minimum Wage" by Kaitlin Madden, The Work Buzz, CareerBuilder.com

Nov 1, 2010, (<http://www.theworkbuzz.com/news/pop-culture/current-affairs/a-few-things-you-should-know-about-minimum-wage/>)

The principle of the minimum wage comes with an inherent debate: Some argue that it contributes to an increased unemployment rate; others say that the minimum wage is crucial in keeping poverty levels low. It's a debate that's been going on since the establishment of a federal unemployment rate in the 1930s, but it has become even more relevant during these difficult economic times.

Many economists now argue that eliminating the minimum wage would allow cash-strapped companies to create more jobs. While this side of the argument does raise logical points, an article by The New York Times highlighted a recent study that makes a strong case for the opposite.

The study, called "Minimum Wage Effects Across State Borders: Estimates Using Contiguous Counties" not only found that the minimum wage has virtually no effect on employment levels of low-wage jobs, but that it also successfully increases the standard of living for workers in low-paying industries like food service and retail.

The research was conducted by economists at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and the University of California at Berkeley, who analyzed 16 years of employment data for low-wage workers. Full results of the study can be read here:

https://udrive.oit.umass.edu/folbre/REST_a_00039-Dube_proof2.pdf.

Though the study presents interesting information, it's especially compelling given the recent midterm elections, which could have an impact on both the minimum wage and employment. Here are a few things to keep in mind about the minimum wage:

- Historically, the Democratic Party has proposed increases to the minimum wage, while the Republican Party has been in favor of capping or eliminating the minimum wage.
- According to the 2000 Census, there are more than 10 million minimum-wage workers in the U.S.
- In 2006, nearly half of surveyed economists said the minimum wage should be abolished. Only one-third said it should be increased.
- Washington state has the highest minimum wage, at $8.55, followed by Oregon, at $8.40.
- In Jan., 2011, the minimum wage in San Francisco will be raised to $9.92. San Francisco also has one of the nation's highest costs of living.
- Five states in the U.S. have no minimum-wage requirement: Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Tennessee.
- Working a job at the current federal minimum wage, $7.25, for 40 hours per week, all 52 weeks of the year produces an annual, pre-tax income of $15,080. If about one-third of that income is paid in taxes and benefits, net annual income becomes $10,556.
- In Oklahoma City, the major U.S. metropolitan area with the lowest average housing costs, one year of rent averages $8,676.
- The poverty line for a family of four is an annual income of $22,050.

20101216-02	10:29	SteveB	Re: "Free Trade Doesn't Work"
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------

Dear Charis,

I've been thinking about your points and find that I cannot agree with your point about American workers.

I have been lucky enough to work with lower level workers in many industries and businesses, from many countries, both abroad and in the U.S. You'd be amazed how many Polish, Eastern European, Russian, German, Latin American, Chinese, and other workers they have in and around Chicago whose expat communities are so large that they need to learn very little English.

I have always found American workers to be at least as good, hard working, and dedicated as any workers in the world. Bar none!

I believe the problem is related to the little article I've quoted below. We Americans all grew up, not expecting a hand-out or an easy life, but a life at least as good, if not better, than had already been achieved by our parents. That's the American way. It always has been. And there was no reason American jobs had to be destroyed. There was no good reason why our government had to sell us down the river and our good jobs too. No reason except greed and evil.

Now look at America. The article, I think, actually vastly understates the problem. Most people making minimum wage don't even have the option of working 40-hour weeks...they're stuck with part-time work at even less than minimum wage, which only applies to full-time workers. And all these workers are counted by the government as "employed". What B.S.!

I don't blame workers for being discouraged. Why work or have a good attitude about a job that leaves you essentially homeless? Maybe some Mexicans can have a better attitude because they can get by living in garages with 16 other families. If American workers have trouble doing this, I don't blame them. I swear I wouldn't do it either. I will not work rather than work for what is, in reality, nothing! We Americans expect better than this. The world seems to expect better than this. We did not expect our government and our businesses to fail so utterly to protect our best interests. I believe this was a reasonable expectation. What a tragedy, but don't blame American workers...the best workers in the world! Blame the greed and short-sightedness of the rich and powerful!

20101220-01	11:38	Dennis	"Glenn Beck Book Tour Makes Bizarre Visit to Heartland America"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Beck certainly knows how to fleece the gullible to get his piece of the pie....

"Glenn Beck Book Tour Makes Bizarre Visit to Heartland America" by Nina Berman, AlterNet

Dec. 19, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/149257/>)

Peddling a book called Broke in a city busted through and through, Glenn Beck rolled into Wilmington, Ohio last week to gleefully proclaim miracles.

Styling himself as a real-life Santa Claus, Beck promised the city a celebrity stimulus surge. He would host live shows at a downtown theater, charging people $125 a ticket and $500 for breakfast meet-and-greet. Up to 20,000 people would come, and what was left in their pockets would be spent on Main Street, buying chocolate chip cookies, Tupperware and homemade handbags.

Maybe it was the cold weather. Maybe Beck overestimates his appeal. The anticipated 20,000 topped off at about 3,000, according to police. And while there was a buzz on Main Street, particularly in the bookstore where Beck signed copies of Broke, what was startling about his visit to Wilmington, a city with nearly 16 percent unemployment, was how many people either didn't know who he was ("Beck, you mean the guitarist?"), or didn't care ("I'm not seeing his show, he's just a man, not a God.").

Accompanied by an entourage of young male assistants, Beck was a charmer in person, doughy, approachable and eager to please, dressed in jeans and an upscale Loro Piana scarf. Most of the face time required a fee, either $500 for a photo with him at breakfast, a $125 ticket to one of his shows, or $30 for a book that came with a prayer if asked. He spoke at one free evening event on an outdoor stage and by that time, the local police were treating him more like a candidate than an entertainer, with barricades and no-go zones.

In Beck's eyes, the 12,000-strong Wilmington is a shining example of the righteousness of his own conservative narrative. He describes the town as a place too proud to accept federal stimulus or government handouts even after losing thousands of jobs when the DHL distribution hub closed in 2008. On his Nov. 22 radio broadcast he said, "This town hasn't taken any money from the government. They don't want any money from the government." During his visit he described Wilmington as "going through liberating strife," which sounds a little like Rumsfeld's "freedom can be messy."

The problem is that none of it is true. The non-partisan Politifact.com gave Beck's depiction of Wilmington a "pants on fire" rating. In fact, Wilmington has received more than $13 million in a variety of federal funds since a Bush-era 2008 emergency job training allocation. The very theater where Beck performed just received a $250,000 federal grant to help renovate a heating system and leaky roof. The grant was secured by Republican Congressman Mike Turner, a frequent critic of federal handouts—he voted against the federal stimulus package—and an author of HR 57, the "Preserving Capitalism in America Amendment," which would give permanent constitutional protection to American free enterprise.

Beck follows a path of media stars who have adopted Wilmington as the little town that could. Comedian Jay Leno gave a free performance there during his 2009 Comedy Stimulus tour. The same year, celebrity chef Rachel Ray cooked

Thanksgiving dinner for 2,000 people and donated a year's food supply and a brand-new kitchen to Sugartree Ministries, the local soup kitchen that feeds 150 people a day. But only Beck had the entrepreneurial spirit to mix good old capitalist greed with Christian charity, hawking his book and charging admission. To be fair, Beck claims that net proceeds of his Wilmington shows will go to local charities but no figures were made public and he never said he would forgo his own fee. The bookstore that sold 800 Broke titles also touted the event as charity, but it was coming from their end, not from Beck or the publisher.

In person, Beck comes off as a caring person, all smiles, handshakes, head nods and an understanding ear. He even acknowledges that the poor and destitute at times require assistance. Recently, he has cultivated the persona of a small town baker, donning a white apron over his suit, with the words "I'm a baker not a divider." According to Beck, the nation has been beaten down by communists and socialists* who have robbed Americans of their can-do spirit. We are a nation full of people scrounging around for pieces of pie, leftover from the one federal pie offered us. As a result, we've gotten lazy, we've become beggars waiting for handouts. "Some people need help, that's where charity comes in, but the vast majority of us, get off your a*s and bake some pie."

*Beck must be referring here to the communists and socialists at the Fed, Goldman Sachs and Citibank.

20101220-02	12:09	Dennis	"Getting to the Truth About Taxes and Public Spending"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Okay right-wingers, repudiate these facts!

"Getting to the Truth About Taxes and Public Spending" by Joshua Holland, AlterNet

Dec. 19, 2010, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/149265/>)

It's difficult to know where to begin deconstructing conservative rhetoric on taxes and spending. It's such a central part of their worldview, and yet it's a view informed by a whole slew of falsehoods that have been repeated again and again during this year's debates over the Bush tax cuts, public spending and the deficit.

What follows are nine of the biggest fact-free whoppers that conservatives insist are true:

1. Cutting Taxes Leads to More Money for the Government

Conservatives can't say they oppose popular programs on ideological grounds, and they can't admit they're happy to run up huge budget deficits, so they've come up with the fiction that cutting taxes actually brings in more revenues to finance the public sector.

What's especially brazen about this is that it's usually preceded by debate-stifling phrases such as "as everyone knows," "history shows us" or "every single time taxes have been cut."

In 2007, Sen. John McCain, R-Arizona, said, "Tax cuts, starting with Kennedy, as we all know, increase revenues"; Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchinson, R-Texas, claimed that "Every major tax cut we've had in history has created more revenue," and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-KY said earlier this year that the myth represented "the view of virtually every Republican on that subject."

It's also complete nonsense, and it's worth noting that only conservative politicians and pundits make the claim—economists across the ideological spectrum agree that the argument is cursed by voodoo math.

As Time Magazine's Justin Fox noted in 2007, "Every economics Ph.D. who has worked in a prominent role in the Bush administration acknowledges that the tax cuts enacted during the past six years have not paid for themselves—and were never intended to." Harvard professor Greg Mankiw, a former chairman of Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, dedicated a whole section of his economics textbook to debunking the claim.

And in an opinion column in the Wall Street Journal responding to Bush's claim that "You cut taxes, and the tax revenues increase," Andrew Samwick, who served as chief economist on Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, wrote, "You are smart people....You know that the tax cuts have not fueled record revenues... You know that the first order effect of cutting taxes is to lower tax revenues."

2. Conservatives' Favorite Economist Proves the Point

As I note in my book, The Fifteen Biggest Lies About the Economy, that falsehood is based in large part on an abuse of "Laffer's curve," the conservative media's favorite economic theorem. The idea, first scribbled on a cocktail napkin by economist George Laffer (according to lore), is pretty simple. It holds that you can raise income taxes to a degree, but when the top tax rate exceeds a certain point, people will go to such extraordinary lengths to avoid paying the piper that the government will actually end up collecting less revenue.

When Dylan Thomas asked a number of experts where the Laffer Curve "bends" for the Washington Post, the economists (he asked some conservative opinion columnists as well) all agreed that a top rate of 50 percent—several went as high as 70 percent—would still fall below the curve. That's important to keep in mind as we debate the merits of letting the top rate return to the 39 percent that prevailed during the Clinton years.

Each time taxes have been cut in the past few decades, it's led to a drop in revenues, which is why people like McCain like to go back to the Kennedy era, when cutting the top rate did spur growth and bring more money into the government's coffers. What they don't mention is that Kennedy cut the top rate from 91 percent to 70 percent, which has no bearing on the debate we're having today. (The "Kennedy tax cuts" were signed into law by Johnson, a year after JFK's assassination.)

3. Taxes on the Rich Keep 'Wealth Producers' from 'Creating Jobs'

We're all familiar with this one. In a New York Post column last week, Fox Business columnist Charles Gasparino claimed that businesses have "been hoarding cash instead of hiring" because of "the likelihood for higher taxes." Media Matters responded by citing the CBO's finding that "Increasing the after-tax income of businesses typically does not create much incentive" to hire.

What's noteworthy about the narrative is the degree to which it defies simple common sense. It shouldn't be a matter of debate that only one thing creates jobs, and that's demand for companies' goods and services. The idea that a business that was booming would refuse to hire people and forego expansion because top tax rates might nudge upward is as silly as the idea that a business that has no customers would add new employees because its owners expect taxes to be low.

4. The Opposite: Tax Cuts for Upper Earners Spur Job Growth

Demand creates jobs, and U.S. Demand is way down because American households lost around $15 trillion dollars in wealth during the downturn. So it's important to note that research has shown that when you give a tax break to high-earners, they bank it, and when you give relief to working people, they spend it, increasing demand.

Like other types of public spending, giving cuts to those at the top does stimulate the economy, but very, very badly. According Mark Zandi, chief economist for Moody's, a dollar in tax cuts on capital gains adds .38 cents of economic growth and a dollar in corporate tax cuts brings us just .30 cents worth of stimulus, but a dollar in unemployment benefits gives the economy a boost of $1.63 and a buck worth of food stamps adds $1.73 in stimulus.

5. Only Half of American Families Pay Taxes

Rush Limbaugh put it this way: "The bottom 50 percent is paying a tiny bit of the taxes.... Remember this the next time you hear the 'tax cuts for the rich' business. Understand that the so-called rich are about the only ones paying taxes anymore."

That's an entirely false narrative that emerges from some rather transparent sleight-of-hand. You have to look at the federal income tax in isolation and then pretend that it represents the government's entire take. But the reality is that the government isn't financed from federal income taxes alone—far from it. Payroll taxes, for example, represent the biggest tax bite for the average worker.

When you add it all up—state and local taxes, federal taxes, sales taxes and excise fees—it turns out that the rich, the poor, and those in between all end up with about the same tax rate. That's the conclusion of a 2007 study by Boston University economists Laurence J. Kotlikoff and David Rapson. They summarized, "The average marginal tax rate on incomes between $20,000 and $500,000 is 40.3%, the median tax rate is 41.8%, and the standard deviation of all of those rates is 5.3 percentage points. Basically, most of us pay about 40%, plus or minus 5.3 percentage points."

6. Americans Are Taxed to Death

This is one of those claims made so frequently that it becomes a matter of faith. But faith doesn't rely on fact, and this one is totally untrue. In 2008, we ranked 26th out of the 30 countries in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) in terms of our overall tax burden—the share of our economy we fork over to the government. The U.S. came in almost 9 percentage points below the average of the group of wealthy nations, and some 20 percentage points below highly taxed countries like Denmark.

7. We're Being Killed by Runaway Government Spending

Public spending has increased with the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and, temporarily, with the stimulus package. And it will rise in the future as more baby boomers retire. But beyond that, it's important to understand how "limited" our government really is relative to other wealthy countries.

Sabina Dewan and Michael Ettlinger of the Center for American Progress crunched the data and found that between 2004 and 2007, the U.S. ranked 24th out of 26 OECD countries in overall government spending as a share of our economic output. Only Ireland and South Korea, both relative newcomers to the club, had a more "limited government" than we did during that span. Again, we came in around 7 percentage points of GDP below the OECD average—and almost 20 percentage points beneath that of big spenders like France.

8. Conservatives Favor Low Taxes and Limited Government

The Right loves "Big Government" as long as it's pursuing their preferred agenda. What they don't like are the government's most popular functions—assuring a social safety net, protecting consumers and the environment, subsidizing education, etc. They don't want to debate priorities, so they claim an ideological preference for a smaller government while showering tons of money on the military, law enforcement, corporate subsidies, etc.

That's why the share of the economy represented by government spending (at the local, state, and federal levels combined) has been remarkably consistent during the last 40 years or so, regardless of which party controlled the White House or Congress.

In the two years that Gerald Ford presented budgets, government spending as a share of GDP averaged 31.4 percent; in ultra-liberal Jimmy Carter's four years, it dropped to 30.7 percent; Ronald Reagan, the patron saint of fiscal conservatism, came into office, and it rose to 32.2 percent. It nudged slightly higher during the first George Bush's term in office, then dropped to an almost Nixonian 30.3 percent during the Clinton years, before rising to 31.6 percent during the second Bush administration.

Looking at the other side of the ledger, overall government revenues have also remained relatively stable, but the pattern is reversed. The government's take, as a share of GDP, dropped during the Ford era, rose again under Carter, and fell again under Reagan. Revenues rose by almost 2 percent under Clinton and fell by a percent and a half under George W. Bush. (The only exception: government revenues rose from 27.3 percent of GDP during the Reagan years to 27.6 percent under George Herbert Walker Bush—that was the "peace dividend.")

Although the government taxes and spends at fairly similar rates, under Republican leadership the nation shells out a bit more for government services and takes in just a bit less in taxes. With a $15 trillion economy, those little differences add up to pretty big deficits, and this, rather than hot school lunches for poor kids, is responsible for a large chunk of our federal debt.

Given that reality, it's a wonder that conservatives have managed to convince the mainstream media and much of the country that they're the fiscally responsible ones who are always ready to step in and clean up the nation's budgetary mess.

9. Taxes on Top Earners Are Actually Taxes on 'Small Businesses'

For years, Republicans have pushed the spin that most of the Bush cuts for the highest earners were going to "small business owners," the proverbial lifeblood of Small Town U.S.A. Then Republican national committee chair Ed Gillespie launched the meme in a 2003 speech, saying that "80% of the tax relief for upper income filers goes to small businesses."

Fact-check.org, the nonpartisan campaign watchdog, looked at the claim, which was cooked up by GOP staffers on the House Economic Committee, and concluded that "it's untrue—and a classic example of a statistical distortion gone amok." The lie is pretty simple: around 80 percent of the wealthiest Americans report some business income on their tax returns, either from private partnerships (think big law firms) or from "hobby" businesses. And the GOP committee counted everyone who reported even a dollar on Schedule C of their returns as a "small business owner."

The reality? Less than 2 percent of tax returns reporting small-business income are filed by people in the top two income brackets. As a Washington Post analysis concluded, "If the objective is to help small businesses, continuing the Bush tax cuts on high-income taxpayers isn't the way to go—it would miss more than 98 percent of small-business owners and would primarily help people who don't make most of their money off those businesses."

20101220-03 19:12 Dennis Excerpt: Make Members of Congress Wear NASCAR Patches

Corporate control of government...

Here's an excellent article by a small business entrepreneur on the.....Corporate Control of Government....and includes a rundown on the huge number of corporate lobbyists and the corporations that pay them huge amounts of money, as well as what Americans can do about being screwed by America's six big banks.

Lots of good stuff and well worth reading.

from Make Members of Congress Wear NASCAR Patches, by: Thom Hartmann, Berrett-Koehler Publishers, book excerpt

June 23, 2011, (<http://www.truth-out.org/make-members-congress-wear-nascar-patches/1308863083>)

The liberty of a democracy is not safe if the people tolerate the growth of private power to a point where it comes stronger than their democratic state itself. That, in its essence, is fascism—ownership of government by an individual, by a group.—Franklin D. Roosevelt

I started my first business at the age of 17 with $25. I paid that amount to rent a shelf in a head shop (which sold mostly pipes, bongs, and cigarette papers) across the street from Michigan State University in East Lansing. The shelf had a sign: "The Electronics Joint—leave your stereo or TV here for repair, and we'll return it fixed within a week. Free estimate of charges before work is done." The guy who ran the head shop managed the shelf for 10 percent of our revenues plus the $25-per-month shelf rental; within two years the venture had grown to include five employees, and we moved into our own storefront down the street.

As the business grew, however, I didn't manage it wisely and ended up about $3,000 in debt, which was a lot of money in 1968 for a part-time student and part-time DJ. Ultimately, I had to shut the company down and go to work full-time as a radio DJ.

That didn't turn out so well either. I got fired when I played two black female artists back-to-back, a violation of station policy at the time, and then refused to promise to never do it again. With my unemployment check, I bought some herbs at a local General Nutrition Center store and started an herbal tea company—Woodley Herber—that grew over the next six years to having 19 employees. One of our products that contained ginseng (which was then hot as an aphrodisiac) was picked up by Larry Flynt to market through his brand-new magazine, Hustler, making him a million bucks and turning a nice profit for my partner and me. Louise and I sold our half of that company to our employees in 1978 to move to New Hampshire and start a community for abused kids.

We wiped out our savings buying land for the children's village and living for almost five years on a salary of $25 per week.* I still had an American Express Platinum Card, a leftover from the prosperous Woodley Herber days, so in 1983, with a $10,000 (or was it $15,000?) line of credit and some income from writing for a few magazines (I was contributing editor to seven of them that year), Louise and I moved to Atlanta and opened International Wholesale Travel and its retail operation Sprayberry Travel. That turned out to be quite a success. Within three years we'd marketed the company to the front page of the Wall Street Journal and had about $6 million in annual revenues, so we sold the company in 1986 to retire to Germany for a year to do volunteer work for the international relief agency Salem International.

We moved back to Atlanta in 1987 and used about $50,000 we had left from selling the travel company to start an advertising agency, The Newsletter Factory, which quickly grew to generating several million dollars a year in revenue and had about 20 employees. We sold that business to our employees on a seven-year buyout in 1996 and retired to the backwoods of Vermont to write books and enjoy life.

All of this is a way of saying that I am a somewhat typical "serial entrepreneur," and fortunately we have a lot of them in America. They are generally middle-class people (my dad worked in a tool-and-die shop for 40 years, and my mom was a full-time homemaker with four sons), they generally do not have an inheritance or family money to draw on, and yet they spend their lives pursuing the American Dream.

I have never relied on a member of Congress or a government agency to do me a favor or bend the rules. I have never given campaign contributions to politicians in hopes of getting favors that would help my business. I have never hired a lobbyist to try to amend laws that would serve my financial interest. And this is generally true of all the hundreds of thousands of sole proprietors and partnerships and small businesses across America.

But that is not how big-time corporate America operates. To them making large campaign contributions and spending millions of dollars each year on lobbyists is just another investment that pays off handsomely. Their motto (in behavior, if not in fact) is You've got to pay to play.

This flood of corporate money and influence in our government makes for a decidedly uneven playing field for businesses as well as taints and corrupts our government. Unfortunately, the trend is moving in the direction of allowing even more money to encroach into our politics, thanks to the Supreme Court. The absolutely necessary solution here is to bring honesty and transparency to our politics.

"Capital" Hill

Tom DeLay famously (and apparently illegally—as of this writing he's managed to keep postponing his trial for years) took all sorts of goodies from lobbyists when he was a Republican leader in the House of Representatives, ranging from campaign contributions to a golf trip to St. Andrews in Scotland, the (incredibly expensive) "home" of the sport. His major patron was Jack Abramoff, lobbyist, businessman, head of conservative organizations—and criminal, sentenced to prison for felonies related to defrauding Indian tribes and plying politicians with gifts in exchange for political favors.

DeLay even went beyond just taking money and favors from lobbyists. He famously told lobbying firms on K Street in Washington, D.C., that they shouldn't even bother to show up at his office looking for favors if they had any Democrats working in their offices. In 2005, DeLay was charged with violations of campaign finance laws and money laundering, while two of his former aides were convicted in the Abramoff scandal.

Similarly, former Republican senator Phil Gramm took a few million dollars over the years (and his wife, on Enron's board of directors, took somewhere between $900,000 and $2 million) from the financial services and energy industries. And then, while still a senator, he slipped into the must-pass 2000 omnibus spending bill a sweet little feature, the 262-page Commodity Futures Modernization Act of 2000 (CFMA), which came to be known as the "Enron loophole."

The CFMA allowed Enron to squeeze an estimated $40 billion out of California consumers, creating an energy crisis in the state in 2000 and 2001 and a political crisis for Governor Gray Davis that led to his replacement in 2003 by Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger (nominated for the job after he had a private and largely secret meeting with Enron CEO Ken Lay). It also opened the doors for Wall Street to use the new law to "create" what they called "new financial instruments" like credit default swaps, leading directly to the near-worldwide crash of the banking system in 2008.

After leaving Congress, Gramm followed in the footsteps of more than 100 of his colleagues in the past three decades and became a lobbyist himself in 2002, immediately going to work for UBS, a massive Swiss bank that is the world's second-largest manager of "wealth assets." In 2009, UBS was accused of helping American millionaires and billionaires evade taxes. The IRS filed a lawsuit in Feb., 2009 alleging that 52,000 Americans secretly held up to $14.8 billion in accounts at UBS to avoid paying U.S. income taxes¹.

As the cases of DeLay and Gramm show (and there are hundreds of similar congressional examples), for major corporations and very rich individuals and families, national or international, campaign contributions and lobbying do produce healthy returns. Invest a few million, make a few billion. Putting money into the careers of members of Congress, past or present, it turns out, is among the most consistently lucrative investments in the world.

As I noted in my book Unequal Protection, as of 2009 there were roughly 64 registered lobbyists for every member of Congress—more than 34,750 in total—and 138 of them are former members of Congress. Include state lobbyists, and there are more than 60,000 (because of variations in state laws on what is or isn't a lobbyist, and who and how they should register, this may well be a significant underestimate: nobody really knows the true number).²

Senator Bernie Sanders noted on my radio show during the Senate debates on financial services industry regulation that the banking industry was spending more than $1 million per day on lobbying and had hired more than 250 former members of Congress to lobby their peers, including people who had previously been considered to have highly ethical and spotless reputations like former Democratic presidential candidate Dick Gephardt.

As Jeffrey H. Birnbaum noted in the Washington Post in June 2005, "The number of registered lobbyists in Washington has more than doubled since 2000 to more than 34,750 while the amount that lobbyists charge their new clients has increased by as much as 100 percent. Only a few other businesses have enjoyed greater prosperity in an otherwise fitful economy." He added that "lobbying firms can't hire people fast enough" and that salaries started at $300,000 per year. "Big bucks lobbying is luring nearly half of all lawmakers who return to the private sector when they leave Congress," Birnbaum noted, citing a study by Public Citizen's Congress Watch.³ The situation has only gotten worse since then.

From Lobbying to Regulating—Another Way Corporations Control Government

One of the primary goals of lobbyists is to affect legislation—introduce new bills or amendments, slip in key provisions, kill bills, and so on. But just as important is to affect regulations being considered by myriad federal agencies that could have huge financial impacts on the lobbyists' corporate clients. So when the lobbyists have friends in the White House, as they did with George W. Bush and Dick Cheney, they actually get to take over the regulatory agencies through appointments.

A Rogues' Gallery

During the Bush Jr. administration, more than a hundred very well paid lobbyists decided to forsake their big incomes for relatively paltry civil service paychecks for a year or two to become the actual regulators of the agencies they used to lobby.

J. Steven Griles, for example, moved from a $585,000-per-year paycheck as a lobbyist for oil and gas interests to become the number two person in the Department of the Interior, right under Interior Secretary Gale Norton, accepting a salary of $150,000 (a pay cut of $435,000 per year). His department then opened 8 million acres of western lands for oil and gas exploration and gave $2 million in no-bid contracts to one of Griles's former clients—while Griles continued to receive a four-year $284,000-per-year bonus from his former employer.⁴

Griles was also helping Jack Abramoff at the Interior Department (a government prosecutor said Griles was "Abramoff's guy at the Interior"); he eventually pleaded guilty to lying to the Senate about his relationship with Abramoff and was sentenced to 10 months in prison and a $30,000 fine.⁵

The Denver Post in 2004 looked into the revolving-door phenomenon in the Bush administration, tallying more than 100 "high-level officials under Bush who helped govern industries they once represented as lobbyists, lawyers or company advocates." The newspaper reported:⁶

In at least 20 cases, those former industry advocates have helped their agencies write, shape or push for policy shifts that benefit their former industries. They knew which changes to make because they had pushed for them as industry advocates. The president's political appointees are making or overseeing profound changes affecting drug laws, food policies, land use, clean-air regulations and other key issues.

Government watchdogs call it a disturbing trend, not adequately restrained by existing ethics laws.

Among the cases the article identified were Charles Lambert, a 15-year lobbyist for the meat industry in its effort to block labeling and mad cow disease investigations, who went to work for the U.S. Department of Agriculture (U.S.D.A.), where he officially determined that mad cow disease wasn't a threat and shouldn't be investigated and that meat shouldn't be labeled with regard to its safety.

Then there was Daniel E. Troy, a lawyer who worked for a lobbying firm representing Pfizer Inc., Eli Lilly & Co., and others in Big Pharma. In 2001 he left the lobbying firm and became the chief counsel for the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). Mysteriously, the main focus of the FDA's position on regulating the drug companies moved "to discourage frivolous lawsuits, which drive up costs," making it harder for consumers damaged by prescription drug side effects to sue Troy's former employers.

The Denver Post story also pointed out the case of Thomas A. Scully, a lobbyist who represented HCA, a huge hospital corporation originally started by Bill Frist's family. HCA was embroiled in a fraud investigation by the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, started by a whistleblower. In 2001 Scully left his job to head the CMS. By coincidence, eight months later, the agency worked out a $250 million settlement—which critics said was far too lenient—that kept the feds from looking further into HCA's books and kept the Justice Department away. Under pressure from some members of Congress, the settlement was delayed and eventually HCA ended up paying the $250 million plus $631 million in civil penalties. Scully then left the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and went back to work again as a lobbyist for Medicare providers.

Then there was the case of lobbyist Jeffrey Holmstead, who worked at a law firm that represented big utility companies and which had proposed 12 paragraphs of changes in Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) regulations affecting those utilities. Holmstead then went to work for the EPA as a regulator overseeing the air pollution division, and soon thereafter those 12 paragraphs—which would have given a pollution exemption to 168 of 232 western-based power plants—appeared in proposed EPA rules changes. The case was so blatant that 45 U.S. senators—including three Republicans—and 10 states' attorneys general wrote a letter asking the EPA to void the proposed rule because of "undue industry influence." Their complaints were largely ignored by the Bush administration.

Lobbying as Big Business

Given how lucrative lobbying is as an investment, it's become a huge business. In Feb., 2010, the Center for Responsive Politics laid out which industries had invested how much in Congress the previous year. Overall it found that in 2009 the number of registered lobbyists who actively lobbied Congress was 13,694 and the total lobbying spending was a whopping $3.47 billion—a 240 percent increase since 1999.

The report showed that the top federal lobbying spending was carried out in 2009 by the health-care sector ($543.9 million); followed by the finance, insurance, and real estate sector ($465 million); and energy and natural resources ($408.9 million) (see Table 1 below). Among the biggest lobbying clients were the U.S. Chamber of Commerce ($144.5 million), ExxonMobil ($27 million), and the pharmaceutical industry group PhRMA ($26 million) (see Table 2 below).

Table 1 Top Congressional Lobbying Spending in 2009 by Sector

Sector	Total (in dollars)
Miscellaneous business (retail, manufacturing, etc.)	558,230,086
Health	543,992,861
Finance, insurance and real estate	465,018,131
Energy and natural resources	408,966,962
Communications/electronics	360,048,798
Other (education, nonprofits, religious)	247,684,383
Transportation	243,941,558
Ideological/single-issue	153,357,071
Agribusiness	141,834,541
Defense	135,879,762
Construction	56,759,414
Labor	43,391,295
Lawyers and lobbyists	35,020,209

Source: The Center for Responsive Politics

<http://www.opensecrets.org/news/2010/02/federal-lobbying-soars-in-2009.html>

Table 2 Top Congressional Lobbying Spending in 2009 by Client

Lobbying Client	Total (in dollars)
U.S. Chamber of Commerce	144,496,000
ExxonMobil	27,430,000
Pharmaceutical Research & Mfrs. of America	26,150,520
General Electric	25,520,000
Pfizer Inc.	24,619,268
Blue Cross/Blue Shield	22,715,439
AARP	21,010,000
American Medical Association	20,830,000
Chevron Corp.	20,815,000
National Association of Realtors	19,477,000
American Beverage Association	18,850,000
American Hospital Association	18,347,176
ConocoPhillips	18,069,858
Verizon Communications	17,820,000
FedEx Corp.	17,050,000
Boeing Co.	16,850,000
BP	15,990,000
National Cable and Telecommunications Assoc.	15,980,000
Northrop Grumman	15,180,000
AT&T Inc.	14,729,673

Source: The Center for Responsive Politics

<http://www.opensecrets.org/news/2010/02/federal-lobbying-soars-in-2009.html>

The most recent example of the toxic and pernicious influence of industry in government (as of this writing) is the BP/Transocean/Halliburton oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico. Both Norway and Brazil allow companies to engage in deep-water offshore drilling, but both of those countries also require by law that companies put blowout preventer devices on all oil wells that can be remotely activated in the event of a catastrophic failure. When Dick Cheney's Energy Task Force (comprising Cheney, a few hand-picked bureaucrats, and executives from the fossil fuels industry, meeting in secret behind closed doors) reviewed a suggestion that the United States put into our regulations a similar provision, they dismissed it as "too expensive." The cost for one of those devices—which would have prevented the BP Gulf spill—is a paltry $500,000 per well.

Rein in Corporate Control of Government

It wasn't always this way. Consider this old Wisconsin statute, broadly representative of laws virtually every state had up until the rise of the robber barons—railroad magnates and other businessmen who became wealthy using anti-competitive and unfair business practices—in the 1880s:⁷

Political Contributions by Corporations

No corporation doing business in this state shall pay or contribute, or offer consent or agree to pay or contribute, directly or indirectly, any money, property, free service of its officers or employees or thing of value to any political party, organization, committee or individual for any political purpose whatsoever, or for the purpose of influencing legislation of any kind, or to promote or defeat the candidacy of any person for nomination, appointment or election to any political office. [Italics added for emphasis—it makes a great “out loud” read when you shout the word “any”.]

The penalty for an individual (representing a corporation) violating such a law was not just a fine but a prison term; and if the corporation itself was found to be violating the law, the penalty could even include the corporate death penalty: dissolution of the corporation.

Reflected in that law (and in similar laws across the nation at the time) is a healthy skepticism of corporate interests and motives and an assumption that those interests are often contrary to the larger public interest.

We’ve gone the wrong way since then.

What we have lost is the moral and ethical view of our civic life and replaced it with a story that says that anything is acceptable so long as it is legally permitted. Campaign contributions, lobbyist wining-and-dining, and revolving-door careers—all are seen as legally permissible and that’s that, end of story, even though these unethical and immoral acts interfere with our fundamental democratic process and are therefore really crimes against the public good.

The British Lobbying Sting

While lobbying isn’t explicitly illegal in the United Kingdom, it’s seriously frowned upon, particularly when done by former members of the government. In Mar., 2010, the Sunday Times and Britain’s privately owned Channel 4 TV ran a sting operation on former cabinet ministers and members of Parliament by pretending to be a U.S. lobbying firm. The reporters-lobbyists approached 20 former members of Parliament (MPs) altogether, 13 from the Labour Party and seven Conservatives, and used hidden cameras to record the conversations. The offer was for the former MPs to try to influence their associates and to do so for 3,000 to 5,000 British pounds per day in payment as lobbyists.⁸

Two out of 20 agreed to do so. No money was paid, no work was done, but the politicians simply agreed to work as lobbyists and use their connections to advance the interests of the (fake) American firm.

When the story hit the newspaper and the hidden camera clips were aired, all hell broke loose. The scandal rocked London. “Ex-ministers in ‘Cash for Influence’ Row under Fire” screamed the headline on the BBC’s Web site, noting that other ministers “have condemned ex-cabinet colleagues who were secretly filmed apparently offering to try to influence government policy in return for cash.”

The day after the story hit, the Labour Party suspended three of the cabinet ministers involved in the investigation. The Guardian newspaper reported:⁹

Three former cabinet ministers, Geoff Hoon, Stephen Byers and Patricia Hewitt were suspended from the Parliamentary Labour party last night in an unprecedented crack down on sleaze.

The move was implemented by the party’s chief whip, Nick Brown, and fuelled by backbench revulsion at claims that the trio had been using their ministerial experience to seek profit-able lobbying consultancies.

What’s important to note is the absolute shock expressed by everyone at the basic idea—something we take for granted in America—that politicians would even consider using their connections to make money as lobbyists. The BBC noted in its article that this behavior shocked and horrified even the most senior financial officer in the prime minister’s cabinet. Alistair Darling, the chancellor of the Exchequer (similar to Treasury secretary in the United States), told the BBC:¹⁰

The best answer when you get a call like that is to put the receiver back down again. It’s obvious...But really, what on earth did they think they were doing?

And equally for a company, you don’t need a lobbyist. If you’ve got something to say, go directly to the government department and make your case. It’s just ridiculous.

Corporate Bedfellows

So how is it that lobbying is widespread in the developing world (where it's often referred to as "bribery") but rare in developed countries—except for the United States? The answer has much to do with the U.S. Supreme Court's interpretation of the "rights" of corporations and its interpretation of our First Amendment, which forbids the government from limiting "free speech," particularly interpreted to mean political free speech.

Supreme Court rulings notwithstanding (more on this in chapter 10), this is definitely not what the Founders of this nation or the Framers of the Constitution had in mind. Numerous legislative solutions to corporations' corrupting politicians with money or influence have been offered over the years, from the Tillman Act of 1907 to the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, commonly known as McCain-Feingold. All have been weakened or even struck down, in whole or in part, by the Supreme Court in its defense of the free-speech rights of very wealthy individuals and corporations.

The most powerful lever that lobbyists have is the campaign contribution, since it costs a member of Congress more than $1 million every two years to get reelected and a senator around $6 million (and far more in the very large states).

So for years now, reform efforts have focused on transparency and limits on campaign contributions and on pushing a system of publicly financing elections to take money out of politics. But all of that has been negated by the Supreme Court, and its latest ruling pretty much puts a nail in the coffin of public financing of campaigns. In 2010, in the Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission case, the Supreme Court ruled that corporations—even foreign corporations—and wealthy individuals can spend unlimited amounts of money to influence elections; they just have to spend it independently of the candidate's or party's official campaign.

So now if a candidate wants a few million dollars spent for his campaign, all he has to do is get the commitment (informally, of course) from a corporation that it'll do it. Assuming the corporation keeps its word, this blows up pretty much every strategy anybody has come up with so far to clean up the elections mess in the United States and will probably lead, over the next few years, to an entirely corporate-controlled and beholden Congress.

Because the Supreme Court (with corporate lawyers like Antonin Scalia and former Monsanto attorney Clarence Thomas, with Thomas's wife working at the corporate- and rich-guy-funded think tank Heritage Foundation) has completely jumped into bed with corporations with the Citizens United ruling, about the only real solutions to this are either amending the Constitution or changing the composition of the Court (through attrition over time in the hopes of a Democrat in the White House or through impeachment, which is extremely unlikely). We'll get back to this in detail in chapter 10.

Fix Our Monetary System

But there are other things that we can fix, starting with how we handle our money. Some of this will be helped by having an honest White House and Congress, but other things we can do ourselves right now.

One of the biggest private sectors funneling money into politics these past few years—and causing the revolving door to rotate ever faster—is the financial services industry. As a joint report in late 2009 showed:¹¹

Since the beginning of 2009, organizations in the financial services sector—including banks, investment firms, insurance companies and real estate companies—have commissioned 940 former federal employees as federal lobbyists, Public Citizen's analysis of data provided by the Center for Responsive Politics shows....

So far in 2009, the industry has employed at least 70 former members of Congress, nearly half of the 150 former members who have reported lobbying in 2009. These include former Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.); former Senate Majority Leader and Republican presidential nominee Bob Dole (R-Kansas); former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.); former House Majority Leaders Dick Armey (R-Texas) and Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.); former Appropriations Chairman Bob Livingston (R-La.); and former Ways & Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.). Former Rep. Vin Weber (R-Minn.) boasts the most financial sector clients (11) among former members of Congress.

It is no surprise that financial services corporations are extremely interested in influencing government these days. The financial systems of the United States have been as badly corrupted by corporate influence as have most of our politicians.

The Fickle Fed

Perhaps the most important player in our national economy is the Federal Reserve. In reality, the “Fed” is not federal and has no reserves. The Constitution specifies that only the Treasury Department—part of the federal government—has the power to “coin money, [and] regulate the value thereof” and lays out no provision for a separate corporation such as the Fed to produce our money supply.

The Fed was created in 1913 by an act of Congress but is a separate-from-government corporation, owned by its member banks, which are themselves owned by their stockholders. It therefore, arguably, has no constitutional authority to “coin money” for us. To get around the constitutional provision that only the government can mint money, the U.S. Treasury Department still runs the U.S. mints, where our actual coins are produced. If you have dollar coins, or half-dollars, quarters, dimes, nickels, or pennies, you have actual money produced by the U.S. government. But if you have paper money that says “Federal Reserve Note” at the top, it is not produced by the U.S. government but by the corporate-bank-owned Federal Reserve.

The distinction is at once significant and irrelevant in this age of electronic money flying across the Internet.

It’s significant because in all the years since it was created, the Fed has never been audited. When in 2009 and 2010 Congress wanted to know why the Fed was creating trillions of U.S. dollars electronically out of thin air and “loaning” them to foreign central banks (and wanted to know which banks got them), the Fed bluntly told Congress that it wasn’t going to disclose the information. It similarly told members of Congress to take a leap when they asked what banks got Fed help during the Bush Great Crash of 2008. If the Treasury Department controlled our money supply instead, decisions would be more transparent (and subject to Freedom of Information Act lawsuits) and “profits” from handling the money supply would inure to We the People.

It’s arguably irrelevant because dollars—even those “created” by the Fed—are backed by the full faith and credit of the United States. We’re stuck with them.

There are two “solutions” that people knowledgeable about these matters suggest and that seem to make a lot of sense.

The first solution is that the Federal Reserve be nationalized and brought under the purview of the Treasury Department, so the United States goes back to producing and controlling its own money and money supply. “Banking profits” from the Fed could even help support the federal budget.

In this scenario the Fed would simply be purchased—or taken with compensation under provisions of the Fifth Amendment—by the U.S. government from the private banks that own it.

As we work on that change, we can start with the idea of immediately setting up a system to audit the Fed. We have the system in place to conduct such an audit—the Government Accountability Office (GAO), which audits most other federal agencies. Congress could simply require that the GAO audit the Fed, given that the Fed makes loans that amount to more money than our national budget.*

The second solution is for each of the 50 states to do what North Dakota did about 90 years ago—create its own state-chartered and state-run bank. Because banks can be enormous profit centers, North Dakota started its own bank to inexpensively loan money to its farmers and small businesses; and when it does so (as it has all these years), all the profits from the interest paid go back into the state’s coffers. This has a lot to do with why that state was among those least affected by the Bush financial crisis that began in 2008.

If every state did this, over time these state-run banks would provide strong competition to corporate banks, running many of them out of business or forcing them to operate more efficiently and to pay their CEOs less. State-run banks could also offer loans to citizens at a lower interest rate than the commercial banks, thus stimulating and stabilizing the states’ local economies.†

That afternoon the president changed his mind, deciding to oppose both pieces of legislation, and that night the bill to break up the big banks (which control much of the trading on Wall Street) failed by 66 votes in the 100-member Senate. The bill to audit the Fed, after a meeting at the White House, was hastily rewritten that afternoon to limit the audit to a very narrow scope of the Fed’s activities during the banking crisis of 2008.

Bring Back the STET

One of the biggest problems the United States has grappled with since the great waves of deregulation under Reagan and Clinton has been the bubble like nature and the incredible velocity of the stock market. There is, however, a way to put a very small amount of sand into the stock market's gears, to borrow a phrase from economist Dean Baker, who has written on this topic, and thus stabilize both the markets and the economy.

We did it in the United States from 1914 to 1966 (and before that we did it to finance the Spanish-American War and the Civil War), and it's called the Securities Turnover Excise Tax (STET). For example, if we were to institute a 0.25 percent STET on every stock, swap, derivative, or other trade today, it would produce—in its first year—around $150 billion in revenue. Wall Street would be generating the money to fund its own bailout.

But there are other benefits as well.

As John Maynard Keynes pointed out in 1936 in his seminal economics tome The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money, such a securities transaction tax would have the effect of "mitigating the predominance of speculation over enterprise."¹²

In other words, it would tamp down toxic speculation while encouraging healthy investment. The reason is pretty straightforward: when there's no cost to trading, the behavior of Wall Street shifts from careful investment to careless gambling. The current system is like a casino where the house never makes any money and nobody's watching the players on closed-circuit TVs to prevent cheating.

A STET would, for instance, at least dampen if not deter the unethical tactics that are routinely employed these days. Consider one such scenario for a person or bank with lots of money or a huge line of credit: you buy a million shares of a particular stock over a day or two purely with the goal of driving up the stock's price (because everybody else sees all the buying activity and thinks they should jump onto the bandwagon) so that three days later you can sell all your stock at a profit and get out before its price collapses as the result of the sale.

Investment, on the other hand, is what happens when people buy stock because they believe the company has an underlying value. They're expecting the value to increase over time because the company has a good product or service and good management. Investment stabilizes markets, makes stock prices reflect real company value, and helps small investors securely build their own personal wealth over time.

Historically, from the founding of our country through the twentieth century, most people invested rather than speculated. When rules limiting speculation were gutted in the first big Republican deregulation binge during the administrations of Warren G. Harding, Calvin Coolidge, and Herbert Hoover (1921 to 1933), it created a speculative fever that caused the housing bubble of the early 1920s only to burst nationally starting in 1927 as housing values began to collapse. That housing collapse, which started in Florida, popped the stock market bubble and produced the Great Crash of 1929. That, in turn, crashed the national housing and stock markets and produced the Republican Great Depression of 1930 to 1942.

As part of the New Deal, Franklin D. Roosevelt put into place a series of rules to discourage speculation and promote investment, including maintaining—and doubling—the STET. Other countries followed our lead, and Australia, Austria, Belgium, Chile, China, France, Germany, Greece, India, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, and the United Kingdom all had or have STETs.

Reinstating a STET now would generate money, so we wouldn't have to borrow it on the international market, as the Bush administration borrowed $700 billion (or more) from China, Saudi Arabia, and other countries and investors, adding to our national debt and saddling us with repaying it, with interest, at an actual cost of $1.4 trillion over 20 years.

So let's go back to what we know works. After Hoover's bail-out of the banks failed, FDR did a cold reboot of the entire system, putting into place strong rules to prevent speculative abuse. His doubling of the STET tax both produced revenue that more than funded the Securities and Exchange Commission and further prevented a repeat of the speculative bubble of the 1920s.

In the United Kingdom, a major campaign was launched in early 2010 to impose a variation on the STET—a 0.05% tax on interbank activities—that the British campaigners are calling the "Robin Hood Tax." Actor Ben Kingsley starred in a clever short video promoting the tax as a tiny charge on bankers but a boon for the public, enabling the funding of social programs and helping mitigate climate change.

We've done it before. We financed the Spanish-American War and partially financed the Civil War and World Wars I and II with STETs. We stabilized our stock market with a STET from the mid-1930s to 1966, and other nations are doing it today. It's time to do it again, this time using the STET to stop speculative behavior and so Wall Street can pay for its own bailout.

Don't Bank On the Banks

Banks should be thought of as public utilities, even if they're privately run. They exist to take deposits, facilitate commerce, and lend money to businesses and individuals. As such they shouldn't be in the business of gambling or speculating with other people's money. From the Glass-Steagall Act of 1933 until its 1999 repeal with the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act (put forward by Republican senator Phil Gramm—there's that name again), banks could not get into the business of speculation.

After Phil Gramm's spectacular little bit of deregulation in 1999, banks went on a consolidation binge (we still weren't enforcing the Sherman Antitrust Act), with some buying up investment houses and others being bought by investment houses. The result was a speculative frenzy that nearly crashed the entire world banking system—and still may.

Because of this and another 2000 change in the law brought to us by Phil Gramm, it is currently perfectly legal for your bank to engage in what's called "proprietary trading"—and most all of the big national banks do. Proprietary trading is where the bank takes your deposits and, instead of loaning them out to your neighbors to buy a house or start a business, "invests" that money in the stock market, trading stocks, currencies, credit default swaps, and all manner of other things, minute-by-minute, hour-by-hour, 24 hours a day on superfast and highly sophisticated computer systems.

When the market is going up, your bank shows a huge profit and pays its traders and CEO millions. When the market goes down, your bank declares an emergency and gets bailed out by Congress and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation—and continues to pay its traders and CEO millions.

This is, frankly, insane. FDR was right: banks should be banks and nothing else. Nice boring businesses—green eyeshades and flannel suits, banker's hours, nothing exciting. It's your money, after all, that they're holding.

Until the day when the big banks are brought back under control, there are two alternatives.

Local Banks and Credit Unions

The first option is to move your money into local, community-oriented banks. These institutions are typically owned by one or more local people who—sometimes generations ago—set out to make money in the banking business. But because they're not national and they don't do bizarre things like proprietary trading or gambling in currency default swaps, they're generally pretty safe and stable. There's a movement—strongly publicized in 2010 by Arianna Huffington of the Huffington Post—to get individuals and government agencies to move their money from big banks into local community banks, and billions of dollars (including the accounts of some states and big unions) have been transferred as a result.

But still, even local community banks are for-profit operations. They often imitate the big banks when it comes to fees and interest rates because—just like the big banks—their primary reason for being in business is to make a profit. The upside is that the profit is going to local wealthy people. The downside is that it's going anywhere other than back to you.

So how can we get banking services—from checking accounts to mortgages to credit cards—without having to deal with a for-profit bank of any size?

The answer is community credit unions, which are depositor-owned financial institutions, run on a nonprofit basis, which do pretty much everything that a bank can do. When you give them your money to open a checking or savings account, you actually become a member of a nonprofit cooperative and can even run for a seat on the credit union's board of directors.

Breaking Your Bank

Community credit unions are answerable to their communities and usually use the profits from their bank-like operations to support local charities and to reduce the overall cost of the bank-like services they offer their depositors. And, just like banks, the federal government guarantees their deposits.

Community credit unions grew in membership by around 2 percent in 2009, a time when a lot of banks both big and small were shrinking or even collapsing. The Credit Union National Association (the trade association for credit unions) notes that in 2008 credit unions saved their members $9.2 billion that, had it been "earned" by banks (large or small), would instead have gone to banking corporation stockholders and CEOs.¹³

When Louise and I moved from Vermont to Portland, Oregon, the nearest bank branch to our home was owned by one of the six largest banks in the United States. The bank offered reasonable service and hours, but when they took billions in bailout money because of questionable activities that I'd call gambling, and their CEO and other senior executives continued to pay themselves millions in the face of obvious incompetence, we decided enough was enough.

We looked around Portland and discovered that there were more than 30 community credit unions in the area. While credit unions offer traditional banking services—from checking and savings accounts to credit cards to mortgages and car loans—they are owned by their members—not stockholders or local rich guys.

The idea of cooperative, locally owned, not-for-profit institutions getting into the banking business started in Germany in 1852, and the first U.S. credit union was opened in Manchester, New Hampshire, in 1908. Since then credit unions have spread across the country, and—particularly after the failure of so many savings-and-loan institutions after that industry was deregulated by the Reagan administration—many Americans have moved their money from banks or savings and loans into credit unions.

Louise and I did the same, as did others who are among my readers and radio listeners. Here's a note I received from a listener in 2010 that's quite enlightening and reflects in many ways our personal experience:¹⁴

I found your New Year's resolution very inspiring and vowed that I too would take my money out of Bank Against America and put it into a local credit union. I did some research and found that Columbia Credit Union (right down the street from my house, no less) had a really good rating and had been voted "Grand Poobah Of Credit Unions" several years in a row. So I decided to go with that one. I had considered joining years ago when my wife was a member but, as soon as they told me they would have to do a credit check, I backed off. No sense in wasting everyone's time, I always say. But, as it turns out, they just wanted to be sure I didn't suck, they didn't really care if I was a few months overdue on my electric bill.

With that taken care of, I decided to give Bank Against America a couple of weeks to make sure everything had cleared. I went in fully intending to close my account but there was a phantom charge on the account and they couldn't close it until that cleared. I thought that was odd since I hadn't used the account in some time. They assured me it would clear the next day and I could find out the nature of the charge and close my account so I took out half of the money in the account and vowed to return the next day. The next day, the charge had cleared but they had no idea what the charge was and, as far as they could tell, there had been no charge, she said looking at me from the corner of her eye. I assumed that, if I tried closing the account, another phantom charge would suddenly appear so I took out all but eight dollars and decided I would let them send me monthly statements for the rest of my life and really get my $8 worth.

Well, two months later, I got a notice that my account was over-drawn, my account that I had not used since the end of January was overdrawn eighty cents. By the time I got to the bank the following Monday, it was overdrawn almost ten dollars. When I confronted the teller with the fact that I had not used the account in months and was told there were no monthly service charges, she agreed to waive the fees that should not have been charged in the first place. She then zeroed out the accounts and closed them for good.

I am now out from under the thumb of Bank Against America and am very happy with my credit union. I don't get my picture on my card, it doesn't have a groovy Autism Speaks symbol on it and they don't have a "Keep The Change" benefit, but I'm also not paying $5 for a money order while the CEOs get billions in bonuses and charge me $35 for going one cent over my balance. Thanks for the inspiration, Thom.

We can all move from the banksters to owning our own deposits, owning our own piece of a credit union. Try it, you'll like it!

*Although we moved on, the Salem Children's Village is still there and doing fine 30-plus years later; <http://www.salemchildrensvillage.org>. It's a great charity if you're inclined to help out!

†Interestingly, on May 6, 2010, two pieces of legislation were scheduled for a vote in the U.S. Senate, and both were expected to pass. One was a bill to audit the Fed, and the other was a bill to break up the six largest banks in America so none would be “too big to fail.” Around 2:40 p.m. that day, the stock market suddenly dropped 998 points in a matter of a few minutes, with six stocks falling in value to a penny or less and one stock—Sotheby’s—rising in value from around $33 per share to more than $100,000 per share. Five minutes later the market had largely recovered, but the shot across the bow by the large bankers wasn’t missed by Congress or the White House.

*Ellen Brown has written extensively about these topics at her Web site, <http://www.WebOfDebt.com>.

¹Kevin McCoy, “IRS Unlocks UBS Vault Hiding Americans Evading Taxes,” USA Today, Feb. 20, 2009, http://www.usatoday.com/money/industries/banking/2009-02-19-ubs-tax-evaders-irs_N.htm,

²Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, “The Road to Riches Is Called K Street: Lobbying Firms Hire More, Pay More, Charge More to Influence Government,” Washington Post, June 22, 2005, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2005/06/21/AR2005062101632.html>

³Ibid.

⁴Anne C. Mulkern, “When Advocates Become Regulators: President Bush Has Installed More Than 100 Top Officials Who Were Once Lobbyists, Attorneys or Spokespeople for the Industries They Oversee,” Denver Post, May 23, 2004, <http://www.mindfully.org/Reform/2004/Advocates-Become-Regulators23may04.htm>.

⁵Matt Apuzzo “Former Interior Official Gets Prison,” Washington Post, June 26, 2007, http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2007/06/26/AR2007062600179_pf.html.

⁶See note 4 above.

⁷Lyman J. Nash, ed. Wisconsin Statutes 1919, Volume II: Embracing All General Statutes in Force at the Close of the General and Special Sessions of 1919, Consolidated and in Part Revised Pursuant to Sections 43.07, 43.03, 35.18 and 35.19 of These Statutes (Madison: State of Wisconsin, 1919), sec. 4479a, 1771—1775, <http://books.google.com/books?id=6ZCxAAMAAMAJ&pg=PA2299&lpg=PA2299&ots=WxkbUWGxMn&dq=wisconsin+1905+section+4479a&output=text>.

⁸“Ex-ministers in ‘Cash for Influence’ Row under Fire,” BBC News, Mar. 21, 2010, <http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/8578597.stm>. 212 Rebooting the American Dream

⁹Patrick Wintour and Allegra Stratton, “Stephen Byers and Other Ex- ministers Suspended from Labour Party over Lobbying Allegations,” Mar. 23, 2010, <http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2010/mar/23/stephen-byers-geoff-hoon-patricia-hewitt>.

¹⁰See note 8 above.

¹¹“Ca$hing In: More Than 900 Ex—Government Officials, Including 70 Former Members Of Congress, Have Lobbied for the Financial Services Sector in 2009,” Public Citizen, <http://www.citizen.org/publications/publicationredirect.cfm?ID=7714>.

¹²John Maynard Keynes, The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1936, 1997).

¹³Daniel Mica, “Consumers Are Moving Their Money to Credit Unions, Rising Membership Shows,” Jan. 6, 2010, Huffington Post, http://www.huffingtonpost.com/daniel-mica/consumers-are-moving—t_b_414190.html.

¹⁴E-mail message received by the author from a listener. Reprinted verbatim with his permission.

(Thom Hartmann is a New York Times bestselling Project Censored Award winning author and host of a nationally syndicated progressive radio talk show.)

Copyright Thom Hartmann and Mythical Research, Inc.

Dear SteveB,

I remember when my Daddy took me to the Evans Products office and his boss showed me an IBM disk pack. It wasn't a LOT smaller than that; late 1960s. It was waist-height and about the size of a very large desk. Capacity unknown; not so awfully big — probably 5 MB as well.

20110119-01 09:59 SteveB Re: Giant 1956 5MB IBM Hard Drive

Dear Ben,

My first computer "job" was between my junior & senior years in high school. I won a National Science Foundation grant to study at IU for the summer. I learned how to program and operate the university's biggest computer—an IBM 709 or 790 (I can't remember which). This was 1963. They has a smaller 1401 that used transistors, but the giant computer used tubes. It took a whole army of people to keep it going. On weekends and some nights, I got to operate the whole thing by myself. Very scary. I remember that their air conditioning bill, just for the computer room, was $1,000,000/year. We had no hard drives, just a slew of giant tape units the size of large refrigerators. The main I/O was, of course, IBM cards, and I became quite proficient with them. In my spare time, I completed a science project involving prime numbers. Lots of fun for a high school kid!

I think it's time to sell our Apple stock. I have my sell order in.

20110128-01 16:27 SteveB Cenesthetic Hallucination

This is wild!

<http://www.neave.com/strobe/>

Weird, huh? Maybe reality is not what it seems to be?

20110203-01 06:51 SteveB Gasparilla

Dear Pam,

Haha! I think it's supposed to represent Uri Geller (the spoon bender) heading toward the black hole at the center of the galaxy during the End Times/Rapture. :-) [About a photo I had sent. —SteveB]

We're still in Florida, spending time on the beach, seeing my daughters and little Zach and Natalie, eating too much rich American food, getting along pretty well. Marci is working on the final stages of her citizenship. Very happy we're avoiding that amazing winter up north, but also wish we were immersed in the worst of it. Otherwise, winter is worthless, as far as I'm concerned.

We had a lot of fun at the Tampa Gasparilla Pirate Invasion last weekend!

20110203-02 07:54 Pam Re: Gasparilla

Dear SteveB,

I love the pictures!! Marci is so pretty. I always love getting pictures from people. I'd send you some of my world, but I haven't yet figured out how to get pictures from my cell phone to the computer. I ordered a cable, but I haven't got it working—waiting on my son-in-law to help me out.

I am SO glad to not be in that awful storm. My brother is right in the thick of it. Last time I heard from him their furnace had quit on them. I must find out if he's OK. I think global warming is screwing up our weather all over the place. I look forward to spring, but I bet we'll have lots of thunderstorms, if not worse. Growing up in Indiana, I developed quite a phobia of tornadoes.

I'm glad you're enjoying time with your family. I bet they're tickled to have you there. Do you think you'll stay in Florida? Do you have a condo or something? I think you like balmy climes better than I do. I like a change of seasons—just not extreme hot or cold. North Carolina is pretty good actually. Over all. All things considered.

I wonder what's going to happen in Egypt. It's a mess over there. I just heard Glenn Beck (via the Daily Show) saying the whole Middle East is going to blow up and the whole world is going to implode. Don't see how both could happen at once, but when did he ever use logic? What a moron. There are lots of people out there who believe him, which makes him hugely irresponsible. How does he get away with it?

20110204-01 10:45 SteveB Re: Gasparilla

Dear Pam,

I do appreciate warm weather; water—not so much as I used to, for some reason. But I really loved the winters in Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, and Montana (mmmm...all M's), but not enough, I guess, to go out of my way to travel there. I really need to buy a condo here...prices are very low right now, but I hate to tie-up money here, especially in real estate. My ex-wife has taken some real losses down here. So we are just staying with friends and family a little and at resorts and hotels most of the time. Trying to stay light on our feet; though, being America, we did have to buy a car. I really miss public transportation.

It is great seeing my daughters and our conversations. I love the grandkids!

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Glenn Beck is amazing, isn't he? How can anybody ever listen to his insane idiocy? A dangerous man to the public climate. I believe fervently in free speech, but this guy should be arrested for sedition and for yelling "Fire!" in a crowded theater! How can no one look back at his dire predictions and see that none of them even came true?

Egypt is worrisome. There we are, just like we used to always be in South America, seemingly backing a dictator and order instead of the people and chaos or potential chaos. Tough choices that don't let us win, whichever way we go. Poor Obama! Now we just mostly avoid that continent, but we can't ignore the oil.

The photo is my daughter, Marissa, who will graduate from college at the end of this semester. We were at the weekly sundown drum circle on Treasure Island Beach—another respite from all the oldies down here, with whom I absolutely cannot identify!

20110204-02 11:46 Pam Re: Gasparilla

Dear SteveB,

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Your daughter is very pretty. What does she plan to do with her life?

I do hope Obama does the right thing re. Egypt. We carry on about how we want democracy in the Middle East, then when they actually go for it on their own, we get all worried. Do we really think such a huge shift would be painless? I deplore the violence in Cairo, but I can't say I'm surprised. It's like Hungary in the 50s or Prague in 1968. I just hope the Egyptians come out of this better. When I see tanks rolling down the streets, I know there's trouble. Mubarak must go—now. I just hope a bunch of radicals don't take over and introduce another kind of tyranny.

I didn't mind the cold and snow too much when I lived up north, but I don't care if I never see snow again. My brother says this is the coldest, snowiest winter he can remember, and he's been in upstate New York for over 30 years. But I don't like the tropics either. No offense, but I really dislike Florida. My first husband's parents owned a condo in Jensen Beach (I think it was), where they went in the winters from Akron. They let us use it one Christmas. We took the kids—Saskia must have been about seven—and did all the touristy stuff. Lots of old people, balmy air that seemed unnatural, and over-development. There's no wilderness there, and what little there is looks like hell. So there you have it: my opinion of sunny Florida. Do you ever go to Tampa?

I don't mean to sound like I'm criticizing everything you do, but doesn't being so rootless get a little old after a while? I've always believed that people get more like themselves the older they get. I always liked staying at home and doing my own thing, even in high school. I went to basketball and football games, but only because I didn't want to be totally out of it. I never enjoyed them. Especially basketball in the old gym across from the old junior high. It was so LOUD in there. Maybe you like being a rolling stone. I think my dad had a bit of that in him. He always wanted to drive off into the sunset, dragging my mother and me with him.

Walking on the beach sounds fine though. Enjoy.

20110205-01 10:48 SteveB Re: Gasparilla

Dear Pam,

You're really pi*sing me off with all this criticism! haha

I wonder if being from Greencastle has anything to do with using sarcastic humor? I guess we grew up "getting it", but when I use it with other people—especially in places like Bolivia—they sometimes look at me like I'm crazy. How could anybody say something but mean the opposite? They'll just have to get used to it, because I'm addicted.

Well...we talked about dogs and music (which we always do, Billy loves music, as do I)...an incredible band named "Gomez". Give them a listen if you like rock. Slant rhyme, my poem "Dark Matter", Sarasota, the cool weather down here, though that day was perfect.

Do you believe in astrology? I don't either, but I am a Sagittarius...supposed to be more rootless than other people. Some of my poems talk about rootlessness and alienation..."What Passes for Home" comes to mind...maybe "Picture of Marigot Bay"...or "My House" (below).

But, no, I don't get tired of travel or exotic places, though I understand where you're "coming from". My father and my brother, the doctor, got so they weren't really comfortable leaving their houses. I guess I'm just the opposite. Always wanted to sail around the world, but probably never will, though I've logged at least a few thousand nautical miles. But I do have places I sort of call home—Marigot Bay, St. Lucia, the Bitterroot Valley in Montana, Santa Cruz, Beaver Island, Michigan.

You mentioned Tampa. That's our center of operations at the moment.

I loved the old gym! Wish it were still there! The basketball games were so exciting, especially for a junior high kid. After junior high football practice we would leave our equipment in piles up on the bleachers. The smell of sweaty leather mixed with adolescent B.O. always reminds me of those days. :-)

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110205-02 16:14 Pam Re: Gasparilla
--

Dear SteveB,

I always used to tell my students to go out and have adventures. I believe a life without adventures (and that can mean a whole host of things) is too dull to endure. When I was young I traveled a lot and assumed I'd do that forever. I even thought about working overseas somehow. But then one thing led to another, and here I am, right where I want to be.

I've always had a thing about houses and the stuff that goes in them. A house reflects the personalities of the people who live in it and has a character of its own. That fascinates me. I've only been in a few (very few) houses that I felt at home in, that I felt I could happily live in. Come to think of it, they were all in Canada. Here's the perfect house, based on these two or three favorites of mine: a small stone cottage with some age on it, hardwood floors, French doors between living and dining room, weathered eclectic furniture, tiled kitchen floor (terra cotta) with blue tiled countertops, an overhead rack with copper pans hanging. Interesting art on the walls, worn oriental rugs here and there, old windows with the original glass.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110205-03	22:48	SteveB	Re: Gasparilla
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------------

Dear Pam,

I usually have very many dreams, strange and unstrange (if that's a word...if it's not, it should be). But, for some reason, I had very few dreams I remembered while sleeping in my condo in Santa Cruz. Now, in our little apartment by the sea, I'm having tons once again. I have thought of a theory I don't believe in but find interesting. Maybe dreams are not what they appear to be...our sleeping minds simply creating stories. Maybe we're really being prodded into revealing our innermost secrets by...something...the mind of God, spirits from the "other side" or something reading them (or us) as we create them. Maybe "they" even create them from our beings and we just receive them. Maybe there are more "spirits" here in this apartment than there were in my condo? Maybe it's just the rich American food?

I had one the other night that involved my deceased Mom's spirit and other "spirits" (or something) from the "other side". I never actually saw any of the beings in the dream, but I perceived them. My mother was accompanied by the spirits, and I was part of a "team" of people on this side (of whatever). We had a "job" to do that seemed to be very important. Now, this part is a little Stephen Kingish (I know him too. haha. Met him when I was a young teacher in Maine and he was just getting started. Boy, did we end up on different paths, but at the time I wouldn't have predicted that.)

Our job was to travel around and repair "tears (rips) in the fabric of reality". That's what I knew they were in my dream. I and all these "invisibles" from both sides (because it was necessary for both sides to work together to repair the rips) traveled around to places where the rips were occurring and fixed them, but I have no idea how we would actually do the repair, yet I was part of the process somehow. The rips seemed to be a sort of drip which just appeared in a room or wherever, moving down from high to lower as if reality were a canvas or something. When we saw one, we knew we had to move fast to close it back up or something very bad would/could happen. We fixed several of them, then I awoke. I have no idea what the hell that dream could mean.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110208-01	10:36	Pam	Re: Gasparilla
-----------------------------	-------	-----	----------------

Dear SteveB,

Dreams are fascinating, at least mine are. :-) I've never read Freud's "Interpretation of Dreams" but he would undoubtedly find much to talk about in yours. Fixing the rips in reality, humn.

I think you have a much more spiritual side than I do, and I suggest that your dream indicates your desire to somehow unite the two sides to existence, the one you can sense and the one you intuit. As for me, I don't believe our dreams come from outside but rather they reflect deeply ingrained patterns that are carved into our brains. I have several recurring dreams that proceed sort of like chapters in a book. At least the one about husband #2 does. The one I have most is set in Greencastle. I am walking from somewhere on campus toward my house. Everything appears just as I remember it in great detail. Often I have been away for a long time and am returning, expecting to reunite with a lover, only he is never there. I think our fears, memories, and desires all appear in our dreams with their own logical consistency. Last night I dreamed I was driving with Atty over very dangerous mountain roads. I'd say most of my dreams involve going from one place to another—or trying to.

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

Dear Tom,

I do find the Egyptian situation worrisome for the future of the U.S.

Unemployment here is about the same as in Egypt. Here, as in Egypt, the rich have gotten richer, the poor have gotten poorer, and the middle class is disappearing rapidly. Our good jobs have been shipped to China, our politicians of both parties have sold us down the river, we're left with huge debt and part-time Wal-Mart jobs selling Chinese goods. The solutions the Republicans offer is more free trade, lower taxes for the very rich, more illegal immigration, reduced spending on education, and more deregulation. Want fair, non-bankrupting health care—f*ck you! The same tired old policies that have created our problems.

I wonder how much longer it will take for Americans to wake-up and join their Egyptian brothers fighting for and demanding change, this time in the streets of our own cities?

"Joe Republican" posted by Jeff Parker, Nomad Life

Nov. 19, 2009, (<http://neverbetter.nomadlife.org/2011/02/joe-republican-by-jeff-parker.html>)

Joe gets up at 6 a.m. and fills his coffeepot with water to prepare his morning coffee. The water is clean and good because some tree-hugging liberal fought for minimum water-quality standards. With his first swallow of water, he takes his daily medication. His medications are safe to take because some stupid commie liberal fought to ensure their safety and that they work as advertised. All but $10 of his medications are paid for by his employer's medical plan because some liberal union workers fought their employers for paid medical insurance—now Joe gets it too. He prepares his morning breakfast, bacon and eggs. Joe's bacon is safe to eat because some girly-man liberal fought for laws to regulate the meat packing industry. In the morning shower, Joe reaches for his shampoo. His bottle is properly labeled with each ingredient and its amount in the total contents because some crybaby liberal fought for his right to know what he was putting on his body and how much it contained.

Joe dresses, walks outside and takes a deep breath. The air he breathes is clean because some environmentalist wacko liberal fought for the laws to stop industries from polluting our air. He walks to the subway station for his government-subsidized ride to work. It saves him considerable money in parking and transportation fees because some fancy-pants liberal fought for affordable public transportation, which gives everyone the opportunity to be a contributor.

Joe begins his work day. He has a good job with excellent pay, medical benefits, retirement, paid holidays and vacation because some lazy liberal union members fought and died for these working standards. Joe's employer pays these standards because Joe's employer doesn't want his employees to call the union. If Joe is hurt on the job or becomes unemployed, he'll get a worker compensation or unemployment check because some stupid liberal didn't think he should lose his home because of his temporary misfortune.

It's noontime and Joe needs to make a bank deposit so he can pay some bills. Joe's deposit is federally insured by the FDIC because some godless liberal wanted to protect Joe's money from unscrupulous bankers who ruined the banking system before the Great Depression. Joe has to pay his Fannie Mae-underwritten mortgage and his below-market federal student loan because some elitist liberal decided that Joe and the government would be better off if he was educated and earned more money over his lifetime. Joe is home from work.

He plans to visit his father this evening at his farm home in the country. He gets in his car for the drive. His car is among the safest in the world because some America hating liberal fought for car safety standards. He arrives at his boyhood home. His was the third generation to live in the house financed by Farmers' Home Administration because bankers didn't want to make rural loans. The house didn't have electricity until some big-government liberal stuck his nose where it didn't belong and demanded rural electrification.

He is happy to see his father, who is now retired. His father lives on Social Security and a union pension because some wine-drinking, cheese-eating liberal made sure he could take care of himself so Joe wouldn't have to.

Joe gets back in his car for the ride home, and turns on a radio talk show. The radio host keeps saying that liberals are bad and conservatives are good. He doesn't mention that the beloved Republicans have fought against every protection and benefit Joe enjoys throughout his day. Joe agrees: "We don't need those big government liberals ruining our lives! After all, I'm a self-made man who believes everyone should take care of themselves, just like I have."

20110212-02 16:21 SteveB Re: Joe, the Self-Made Republican

Dear Dennis,

Ah so, most excellent! Thanks, Dennis.

20110215-01 19:17 Tom 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

No new taxes? Hardly.

"Uncovered: The 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget" posted by Jonathon M. Seidl, The Blaze

Feb. 14, 2011, (<http://www.theblaze.com/stories/uncovered-the-15-tax-hikes-hidden-in-obamas-new-budget/>)

Over the last two years, the president has regularly touted his fight to lower taxes for Americans. In fact, his latest budget proposal offered up today is being billed as a package of tough cuts. But buried within the budget's rhetoric and numerous pages are actually a healthy amount of increases — tax increases, that is. 15 of them.

The folks over at Business Insider (<http://www.businessinsider.com/tax-hikes-obama-budget-2011-2#ixzz1DxbARoKu>) note "the budget contains as much as $1.5 trillion in hikes over ten years," thanks to some diligent sleuthing by the group Americans for Tax Reform (<http://www.atr.org/obamas-fy-budgetbr-taxes-more-a5844#>).

Here are the hidden increases:

- Raising the top marginal income tax rate (at which a majority of small business profits face taxation) from 35% to 39.6%. This is a $709 billion/10 year tax hike.
- Raising the capital gains and dividends rate from 15% to 20%.
- Raising the death tax rate from 35% to 45% and lowering the death tax exemption amount from $5 million ($10 million for couples) to $3.5 million. This is a $98 billion/ten year tax hike.

- Capping the value of itemized deductions at the 28% bracket rate. This will effectively cut tax deductions for mortgage interest, charitable contributions, property taxes, state and local income or sales taxes, out-of-pocket medical expenses, and unreimbursed employee business expenses. A new means-tested phase-out of itemized deductions limits them even more. This is a $321 billion/ten year tax hike.
- New bank taxes totaling $33 billion over ten years.
- New international corporate tax hikes totaling $129 billion over ten years.
- New life insurance company taxes totaling $14 billion over ten years.
- Massive new taxes on energy, including LIFO repeal, Superfund, domestic energy manufacturing, and many others totaling $120 billion over ten years.
- Increasing unemployment payroll taxes by $15 billion over ten years.
- Taxing management capital gains in an investment partnership ("carried interest") as ordinary income. This is a tax hike of $15 billion over ten years.
- A giveaway to the trial lawyers—not letting companies deduct the cost of punitive damages from a lawsuit settlement. This is a tax hike of $300 million over ten years.
- Increasing tax penalties, information reporting, and IRS information sharing. This is a ten-year tax hike of $20 billion.

20110216-01 11:23 SteveB Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

Dear Tom,

I don't see a single one of these taxes that I don't agree should be raised. (What? I'm supposed to feel sorry for millionaires, who pay less taxes here than in any other developed country?)

Spending (especially on the military) must be cut too. Everybody must suffer a little...especially the rich (Veterans and folks on Social Security already are! Why not the rich too? Don't they have a debt to society?). Excuuuuse me! :-)

The alternative is America becoming a 6th-rate, debt-ridden country like Greece. Come to think of it, we're pretty much already there! It's now or never!

20110216-02 11:46 GaryC Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

Dear SteveB,

I know you have traveled a lot and been to a lot of other countries. But your statement is dead wrong about taxing millionaires. First, you may have forgotten that I was a tax attorney for many years in Washington representing clients around the world.

Second, the U.S. corporate tax rate is the HIGHEST in the world at 35% plus another 4% for the average state tax. The average corporate tax rate is 25% and most foreign countries do not tax outside of their territory. Third, my friends around the world laugh at our tax rate and tax deductions as the whole system is gamed for social engineering. Without getting into specifics, my friends in Hong Kong pay a top rate on income of 18% and pay nothing on capital gains. This country would be a lot better off if the rates were lower for everyone and all deductions were eliminated. This would encourage more job growth, less IRS intrusion and more compliance with the tax laws.

In addition, you keep harping on the wealthy's social responsibility to the country. I will ask you the question I ask others who want to soak the rich. First, what is the "social responsibility" of the poor to our society? Second, if I make a lot of money shouldn't I have the option of using it for charitable pursuits instead of letting the government make those decisions and wasting the money? Of course, my favorite charity is educating Chinese peasant girls on the sexual proclivities of American fat cats.

20110216-03	13:35	Dennis	"Sleepwalking Toward Plutocracy"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	----------------------------------

The hijacking of America...

Here's a link to a rather extensive article by my friend, Marsh Whitfield: "Sleepwalking Toward Plutocracy."

It's a bit of a long read, but if you're interested in how and why America has been hijacked (despite warnings by Jefferson, Lincoln, Teddy Roosevelt, Eisenhower, and others).

"Sleepwalking Toward Plutocracy" by Marsh Whitfield, BuzzFlash at TruthOut

Feb. 15, 2011, (<http://blog.buzzflash.com/node/12358>)

"Corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed."—Abraham Lincoln¹

This grim vision caused Lincoln to "tremble for the safety of my country," as he wrote on Nov. 21, 1864. It foretold of Plutocracy (rule by the wealthy) in America.

Today, we watch his vision coming true: the richest 1 percent of Americans now take home 24 percent of U.S. income, up from 9 percent in 1976.² America's wealth is "aggregating in a few hands" right before our eyes, in plain view.

And we stare uncomprehendingly, like deer in the headlights.

Perhaps our inertness is understandable. For nearly 150 years since Lincoln's awful premonition, who has worried about Plutocracy? The last time greedy corporations threatened our country, President Teddy Roosevelt's trust-busting broke up their monopolies quite handily.

Since then, Plutocracy disappeared from America's headlines. Until recently. We are now slowly waking up to the tsunami of money drowning democracy. But we're a bit late. We've slept through an epochal shift in American politics: the Plutocrats (huge corporations, Wall Street, and billionaire oligarchs) have been quietly busy, hijacking the Republican Party.

The Hijacking

Let me be clear. We are not talking here about mere corruption—the random bribery by which businesses and wealthy individuals have always tried to influence government officials in all societies. Plutocracy means governance by the wealthy. This is the story of how modern Plutocrats have converted the power of money into the control of government.

They did it by gradually hijacking the Republican Party—its ideology, political agenda, and legislation. Their payoff is already in the trillions of dollars.

Does this sound like an exaggeration? It is as undeniable as a pregnancy. Let's start with the evidence:

1. The Bribe: Why do the Plutocrats spend tens of billions on conservative think tanks, Republican campaigns, and GOP lobbyists' salaries? (Sure, they try to buy Democrats as well, to control both parties, but—see next two questions—which party has been bought?)
2. Republican Acceptance: Since Reagan's time, the Republican agenda has slavishly matched the Plutocrats' demands: lower taxes and less government regulation.
3. Democratic Rejection: Despite shameful bribe-taking by "Blue Dogs" and other individual Democrats on specific legislation, the Democratic party as a whole opposes tax cuts for the wealthy and is responsible for almost all environmental, safety and financial regulations (such as the financial regulatory overhaul in the 2010 Dodd-Frank Act).

4. The Payoff: Here's what our government (Republican since 1980 except for Clinton's eight years) has delivered to the Plutocrats: from 1980 to 2005, more than four-fifths of the total increase in American incomes went to the richest 1 percent.² Presently, despite staggering deficits and the distress of 14.8 million unemployed, the top 1 percent of Americans enjoy tax rates a third lower than in 1970.³

If Republicans are not governing on behalf of their rich patrons, what else explains this massive upward redistribution of American wealth?

"Wait!" You might protest. "Perhaps the rich are getting richer for other reasons, like—ahem—smart people coping better with globalization than average people." "Or, um, coincidence?"

No dice. If there was ever any argument for innocence of intent or accidental outcome in the Plutocrats' ongoing payoff, it vanished during Dec., 2010, when Republicans threatened to block extension of unemployment insurance unless tax cuts for America's richest 2% were extended.

It was a revealing moment. Prosperity and huge bonuses had returned to the Wall Street firms which caused the recession and to the corporations which had shipped jobs overseas, yet the millions of workers they had left jobless were suffering terribly. Fairness demanded the insurance extension, and so did 66% of the American public.⁴

By holding unemployment insurance extension hostage in exchange for billionaire tax cuts, Republican leaders Mitch McConnell and John Boehner defied both public opinion and fairness—and added $900 billion to our ballooning deficit. Showing neither shame nor remorse, they stood naked for all to see as extortionists for their Plutocrat patrons.

The Hijacking's Threat to our Democracy

The problem with the hijacked Republican party goes deeper than the gluttonous enrichment of the Plutocrats in control.

Thomas Jefferson wrote in a 1816 letter to George Logan: I hope we shall... crush in its birth the aristocracy of our moneyed corporations which dare already to challenge our government in a trial of strength, and bid defiance to the laws of our country.⁵

Then came Lincoln's worrisome vision, cited above, of how Plutocrats—"the money power of the country"—could destroy our republic.

Unfortunately, our Supreme Court judges have lacked the wisdom and foresight of Jefferson and Lincoln. In the 1886 Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad decision, the Supreme Court recognized corporations as persons for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment.⁶

The 1886 decision was a key stepping-stone toward the devastating 2010 Citizens United vs. Federal Election Commission decision by the Roberts Supreme Court, which opened the floodgates for corporate money in election campaigns.⁷

These decisions make it perfectly legal for corporations to buy control of American democracy, to replace our government "of, by and for" the people with a government "by and for" big corporations.

The difference is as profound as it is obvious: People have everyday human concerns about jobs, security, and the welfare of their kids and grandkids. And they possess normal human feelings such as patriotism and fairness.

Corporations, in contrast, have no grandchildren, no morality, no patriotism. With corporations in control of government, government exists only to increase corporate profits and rich people's wealth—at any cost to America's environment and the lives and welfare of its citizens.

To corporations, taxes are anathema, even for schools and infrastructure, because they reduce profits. It's that simple. "America really needs infrastructure? Well, don't expect me to pay for it. Go borrow some more from China and pay it back later."

Also, because environmental and safety regulations cost money, they are ignored and flagrantly broken by the Plutocrats. Think of BP's monstrous—and avoidable—spill, or Massey Energy's 29 miners negligently killed in Apr., 2010.⁸

In short, the laws and government services which make our society livable are merely an onerous burden to the Plutocrats. Their objective is stated candidly in the famous Grover Norquist quote: "Our goal is to shrink the government to the size where you can drown it in a bathtub." A reckless, almost suicidal goal, for weak governments invite anarchy.

And how are the Plutocrats doing in their dangerous quest? They're winning, and their wins beget more wins. Example: in 2001, a conservative majority on the Supreme Court helped Bush gain the Presidency. That enabled Bush to appoint Alito and Roberts to the Court, which decided the 2010 Citizens United case (cited above) in favor of the Plutocrats, which will allow unlimited funding for future Republican election campaigns.

The nightmare premonitions of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln have materialized before us in the hijacked Republican party. No longer "of, by and for the people," it's "by and for General Dynamics, Goldman Sachs, Monsanto, BP, News Corp (etc.)." Please pause and reflect on that: one of our two major parties has been captured by Plutocrats—half of American democracy has already been lost.

Like Lincoln, we should all "tremble for the safety of our country."

How The Hell Did This Happen?

In the period following WWII, while corporations and wealthy individuals were still making business-as-usual donations to Republican politicians, a new element—policy institutes—became a factor in the game. These "think tanks" offered the Plutocrats an opportunity to influence conservative ideology at its very source.

Naturally, the think tanks which best advocated small government and lower taxes were rewarded with the most donations. Over time, the think tanks became dependent on a lavish flow of dollars, and the Plutocrats attained effective control over Republican ideology.

One of the more zealous true believers in this ideology was Ronald Reagan. In 1981, Reagan became President promising lower taxes and proclaiming that "government is not the solution to our problems; government IS the problem." That was the pivotal capitulation. At that point, the Republican party quietly and willingly became a de facto subsidiary of the Plutocrats.

It's worth noting that, in this process, no conspiracy or collusion was necessary between the various Plutocrats. They were and are united by sharing a common enemy: government regulations and taxes. They all bribe in pitch-perfect unison without even needing to talk to one another.

Money—for the right-thinking think tanks, the loyal candidates, and the can-do Beltway lobbyists—has always been their carrot, but the Plutocrats now have a stick. Tea Party candidates have become the Plutocrats' enforcers. As we all saw in the 2010 mid-term elections, if any Republican isn't prepared to drink the Plutocratic Kool-Aid, they can count on being opposed by a massively-financed Tea Party candidate in their next primary.

Thus the Plutocrats' control over the Republican party has closed like a vise. Respected moderates like Mike Castle were eliminated in the 2010 GOP primaries by Tea Party candidates. Remaining moderates like Olympia Snow are an endangered species. There is little hope that even a universally-admired Republican like Colin Powell could rise up to wrest control from the Plutocrats.

...little hope, but two remaining, puzzling questions: Many of the surviving Congressional Republicans are people of principle; how were they seduced into adopting the Plutocrats' agenda? Next, how did these hijacked Republican standard-bearers then persuade millions of lower-income Americans to vote for the Plutocrats' agenda and against their own interests?

It required a kind of alchemy. If that sounds medieval, it's apt. The alchemy in this case is Libertarianism, a somewhat obscure but persistent political philosophy. Like the classic alchemist's dream of turning lead into gold, it has never proven workable but has always attracted passionate believers.

The Hijacking's Alchemy

Without Libertarianism as a philosophy, the hijacking could never have happened. It's the rarely acknowledged but indispensable Swiss army knife of right-wing ideology. Its fiercely anti-Government, anti-tax doctrine gives Republicans a rationale for prostituting themselves to the Plutocrats. It provides an excuse for their shameful unwillingness to pay for wars and government services.

Libertarian worship of "free market capitalism" has proved tailor-made to justify the Plutocrats' demands for deregulation (the root cause of the Wall Street crash, the BP oil spill, and countless other disasters).

Any coherent understanding of American politics today requires some knowledge of Libertarianism—a knowledge most Americans lack. Here's a quick overview.

According to the American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language, a Libertarian "is one who advocates maximizing individual rights and minimizing the role of the state."

"... maximizing individual rights" refers to civil liberties, which sounds good to most Americans. That's what makes Libertarianism so seductive, especially to young people. What makes it dangerous is how "maximizing individual rights" is coupled with "minimizing the role of the state," as if the state was the enemy of individual rights rather than the guarantor.

This upside-down view of reality was popularized in the 1950s by Ayn Rand, charismatic author of Atlas Shrugged and The Fountainhead. She portrayed the real producers in society as independent, wealthy and talented heroes, burdened and oppressed by government. Her biographer Jennifer Burns called her a "gateway drug to life on the right."

By 1972, Rand's extremist anti-government philosophy merged with older Libertarian thinking and free-market ideology into the American Libertarian Party, which has fielded a presidential candidate every election year since 1972. Twice this candidate has been Ron Paul, whose mild-mannered country doctor charm has put a friendly, almost reasonable face on Libertarianism. By 2006, polls showed that 15 percent of American voters identified themselves as Libertarian.

All these people either fail to grasp, or are in denial about, Libertarianism's fatal flaws:

1. It sells a cruel mirage by flattering Americans as rugged individualists, self-sufficient and contemptuous of Medicare, Social Security, etc. Sadly, that arrogant self-image dissolves in the face of sickness, disability, and old age. I've never met a Libertarian who wasn't either wealthy or young and healthy.
2. It rejects the long human struggle to develop civilized societies with empathy for those who need help. It defies Judeo-Christian traditions about being our brother's keeper, and scorns Mahatma Gandhi's belief that "A nation's greatness is measured by how it treats its weakest members."
3. Its outrage over government growth ignores society's obvious need to protect the planet and cope with the world's growing complexities. Environmental regulations never entered our forefathers' thoughts when we were four million people in a mostly unexplored wilderness; now, with 311 million creating garbage, controls are desperately needed. We didn't need the FAA until our skies got crowded; now we do.
4. It cites wasteful spending as a prime evil of government, as if bureaucracy and waste were not universal in all human endeavors. Even well-run small businesses have human problems and make mistakes. So the FDA is not perfectly efficient? Instead of trying to fix it, Libertarians would dismantle it, trusting the capitalist profit motive to somehow keep our food safe.
5. Its blind belief in a free-market economy is a triumph of theory over real-world experience. If we learned nothing else from the Bush years, when runaway U.S. banks almost destroyed the world's economy, we should have learned that capitalism simply can't be trusted to regulate itself.

Libertarianism has never worked in any country because it denies basic human needs and is far too simplistic to provide practical governance. In the words of one bright young Republican, Meghan McCain, "Libertarianism is logical in the classroom and not necessarily applicable in real life."

Nevertheless, in its contempt for government and celebration of individual self-sufficiency, Libertarianism is absolute catnip for Americans who yearn for the simpler times of our pioneer ancestors. These are the zealous True Believers. How can you distinguish them from those who cynically claim Libertarian beliefs merely to mask their greed and lack of social conscience? It doesn't really matter; they're both equally dangerous.

This is the cornerstone ideology of the hijacking. Now let's look at how the Plutocratic Republican machinery works.

The Hijacked Republicans' Propaganda Machine

The Plutocratic Republican political strategy is breathtakingly brazen: to manipulate ill-informed working Americans into voting directly against their own interests—i.e., to allow more water and air pollution, and to give tax breaks to billionaires.

This manipulation strategy is implemented with a well-organized propaganda factory. At its upstream end, several dozen conservative think tanks churn out papers on current events, foreign relations, etc. All of these articles and opines are based on carefully selected actual facts, cleverly woven together with simplistic elements of Libertarianism, jingoistic patriotism and everyone's aversion to taxes.

Downstream, this professionally-prepared propaganda is fed to Republican politicians, who wrap themselves in flags, guns and religion and promise to "restore the constitution," reduce taxes for everyone, and "get government off your back".

Democrats are portrayed as socialists trying to steal Americans' liberty and freedom, as enemies of free enterprise, as wastrels in favor of a welfare state, as godless secularists attacking Christian family values, and as traitors who somehow put a black man in the White House.

In response to these threats, Republicans must "take back our government," and doing so may require our "Second Amendment rights." With this, the Plutocratic Republican rhetoric flirts with insurrection—recklessly dangerous in an already-gun-crazed nation.

There's nothing new, of course, about political propaganda. But what is new is the recent evolution of media outlets. Before 1980, nothing like Fox News or right wing talk radio existed, and the Internet was in its infancy. Now, with talk radio and the Internet, any political message can reach most of the population.

This wider array of media offers synergy to the Republican machine's highly disciplined propaganda. Because their messages all conform to the master party line, these various media outlets form a self-reinforcing, self-verifying echo chamber. The messages can be quite disconnected from reality, but they are convincing in their consistency, and the echo chamber becomes a familiar comfort zone. Unless you force yourself to step outside, it becomes your own confirmed truth.

Of these outlets, the least understood by liberals is right-wing talk radio. If your car radio should happen to stop on such a channel, you'll hear some guy haranguing you about how Obama is a secret Muslim, how his Stimulus didn't create a single job, how the START treaty proves he wants to unilaterally disarm the U.S., or how Pelosi is really "Mussolini in a skirt,"—on and on. It's annoying, crazy talk, so you turn the dial.

By doing so, you miss the power of talk radio. Its effect takes time and repetition, like Chinese water torture. To grasp its insidious potency, imagine yourself as Joe Six-pack, a typical guy with money worries and family distractions, someone who "keeps up on things" by watching a hour or so of Fox News each evening.

Imagine that you have a two-hour commute—one hour each way to work and back. The car radio brings you Dennis Prager in the morning and Michael Medved going home. These guys are very, very good at what they do. They give you the inside scoop on Obama's endless misdeeds, his traitorous "Marxist regime," and grave foreign threats being ignored. You hear this two hours a day, five days a week, year after year. And what you hear is "confirmed" on Fox News.

This is classic brainwashing. Over time, it works on virtually anyone, regardless of IQ or education. As Joe Six-pack sits in traffic, the lies he hears over and over provide an answer for why his life isn't better, and slowly, they become his worldview. Which, per a 2010 poll of Republicans, includes the following:⁹

- 31 percent believe Obama is a racist who hates white people.
- 23 percent want their state to secede from the U.S.

The Republican propaganda machine has succeeded in brainwashing millions of American voters, leaving them not only primed to vote Republican, but paranoid, angry about government, cynical about democracy, and ready to reach for their guns. Which is fine with the Plutocrats. The last thing they want is a contented populace with minds clear to reflect on what exactly the Republican party really offers them.

These brainwashed millions add to the science-deniers, states-righters, and Christians awaiting Rapture, creating a huge block of our electorate which is susceptible to the vote-against-your-interest manipulation that is critical to the Plutocrats' strategy.

So that's the hijacking, how it happened, its ideology, and how it works. It's the key to understanding American politics today. Once you get your head around the fact that conservative ideology and the Republican party are controlled by Plutocrats, our biggest political and economic problems snap into place and are readily understandable.

The Hijacking and the Deficit

For example, take the deficit (approaching $14 trillion in late 2010), falsely attributed by Republicans to "tax and spend Democrats." The truth is that all Presidents prior to Reagan patriotically contributed to paying down our WWII debt.¹⁰

Then came the hijacking, and from Reagan through G.W. Bush, Republican administrations increased our national debt by roughly $9 trillion (Clinton actually ran a small surplus). [10] Most of that $9 trillion was, quite simply, a Republican payoff to the Plutocrats in the form of irresponsibly low taxes. (An interesting micro-example: the Bush tax cuts continue to put an extra $187,000 in George W.'s personal pocket each year.¹¹)

But turning America into a debtor country wasn't bad enough. The hijacking also brought a profound shift in our population's thinking about debt. Reagan came into office preaching "Voodoo Economics" (so named by George H. W. Bush), severing the link to depression-era realities learned by our grandparents.

Suddenly, after years of relative fiscal conservatism, U.S. citizens heard the President himself—a lovable and believable father figure—telling us we didn't have to "pay as we go" after all. This permissiveness marks the start of the great American consumer borrowing binge, which brought us to the 2008 housing bubble and crash.

The final connection between the Republican hijacking and the deficit is a masterpiece of devious subtlety. Remember, for the Plutocrats, the whole point of the hijacking was to reduce government regulations and taxes—and nothing accomplishes those objectives better than shrinking government.

And how do you scare the American public into supporting smaller government? With huge deficits. Huge, scary deficits that "will have to be paid off by your children and grandchildren." With that image filling voters' minds, Republicans have neatly framed the entire deficit issue as a matter of cutting Social Security, Medicare and other programs to avoid impoverishing our grandchildren. No one mentions the other solution to the deficit problem: paying for what we spend.

No one mentions that in WWII, the top tax rate was 94% (starting at today's equivalent of $2.4 million). If today's top tax rate of 34.5% was raised to far less than that, in order to responsibly fund two wars and recovery from the Bush recession, our deficit would steadily come under control. But Republicans (with rare exceptions like Senator Dick Lugar) are in the iron grip of the Plutocrats and will never let that happen. Yachts for billionaires now trump patriotism.

Sadly, we have all become seduced to some degree by Reagan's Voodoo Economics, spoiled by paying insufficient taxes. And alarmingly, even non-Republicans are starting to believe the Plutocrats' propaganda that U.S. corporate tax rates are already "uncompetitive." Which is patently false if you take into account all the Plutocrat-designed loopholes and exclusions in our tax code—but how many people dig through our tax code to find that out?

Then there's the big threat: "If we raise taxes on corporations and the wealthy job-creators, they'll leave the U.S." Such bullsh*t! Big corporations have already outsourced most labor-intensive work—because of wage, not tax, differentials—and the "wealthy job-creators" (the Murdochs and Koch brothers, our version of Russian oligarchs) aren't going anywhere. They know that the U.S. is the best place in the world to live and bring up a family.

The Hijacking and Washington's Dysfunctionality

The hijacking also explains the maddening stalemate in Washington. For nearly two years, Republicans like SC Senator Jim DeMint have openly described their intent to "break" Obama, to seek his "Waterloo." In Oct., 2010, Mitch McConnell,

Senate minority leader, announced "The single most important thing we want to achieve is for President Obama to be a one-term president."

This obstructionism reveals the core strategy of the Plutocrats. A non-functioning government can't enforce existing environmental and safety regulations, let alone add new ones. If obstructionism brings government to a standstill, so much the better for the Plutocrats.

This is a policy of national sabotage, in effect if not by design. The cost to our country of blocked or crippled legislation, blocked judicial appointments, and unenforced regulation is incalculable.

And the damage is accelerating, compounding. For example, as Republicans pursue "smaller government," funding for public education shrinks, and we fall even further behind other countries (we're now down to #22 in Science¹²). Which suits the Plutocrats just fine: a less-educated electorate is more susceptible to the brainwashing of the Republican propaganda machine—and Republicans gain a further advantage in subsequent elections.

Who's To Blame?

So who's really responsible for this crippling of America? Some pundits, finally waking up to the hijacking, are blaming "Corporate Greed." They are apparently unaware that corporations are intended to be "greedy."

Follow the bouncing dollar sign here: every investor has a natural, legitimate desire to make money on his/her investment. This holds true not just for Wall Street hedge funds, but also for millions of small investors all across America. If you've ever bought a few shares of stock, ask yourself "how much profit is enough?" I'll bet that visions of Microsoft or Google flash across your mind, and your honest answer is "Well, as much as I can get. Why not?"

The Plutocrats' top executives are hired hands, paid to deliver that profit. No matter how outrageously they're paid and how powerful they appear, they can be locked out of their offices in less than 24 hours if they fail to perform. And no level of profitability is ever "enough."

Shareholders and the stock market always want more from them. The pressure for profits is unrelenting and implacable, driving corporations to do anything—anything—within the law to deliver. Morality? Patriotism? Sorry. Not even in the corporate dictionary.

Despite the enormous damage the Plutocrats have done to our country, we cannot call them evil. It was not their deliberate plan to hollow out industrial America by shipping jobs overseas. Nor is it their personal intent to impoverish working Americans and destroy the environment. They are simply doing their job: producing profits for themselves and return on investment for us shareholders.

Toward that goal, and with the same brilliance and ruthlessness that made them global leaders, they found a legal way to control their government environment and maximize their profits: the hijacking.

To sum up, the core problem of the hijacking is not in the legitimacy of corporate profits. Nor does it lie in the legality of the hijacking's methods; massive political contributions are, sadly, within the law. It's the cold, inhuman amorality of corporations. That's what makes them unsuitable to be in control of any human society—especially American democracy. That's what made Lincoln "tremble for the safety of my country."

What To Do

First, we must recognize that the hijacked Republican party is poised to become irreversibly entrenched in power—through additional Supreme Court appointments and reactionary legislation. By gaining control of the Senate and winning the Presidency in 2012, they may become unstoppable.

The Plutocratic Republican juggernaut cannot be stopped in the courts (thanks again to the Roberts Supreme Court Citizens United decision). Nor with utopian ideas or protests. It can only be done at the ballot box, and certainly not with some Ralph Nader-like third party. It will require the massive efforts of an existing political entity which already has money, momentum and infrastructure. That means the Democratic party, with all of its flaws. It's our only real-world alternative to Plutocracy.

For now, our traditional progressive/conservative arguments must be considered secondary. A national emergency confronts us: the Plutocratic Republican party vs. patriots of all political stripes, in a battle to save American democracy.

With the Plutocrats currently winning, American patriots need to wake up, get motivated and get in shape for the battle. We've become fat (literally and figuratively) and spoiled (living on borrowed money). We're all too selfish. Our country's in a hole financially, and we all need to sacrifice a little to work our way out.

For example, everyone knows that the real cost of gasoline is far more than we're paying, but we throw a national tantrum if anyone proposes an increase in gas taxes. I'm old enough to remember WWII, when our response to a national crisis was totally different: we all toiled in "Victory Gardens" growing our own vegetables, limited our driving because of gas rationing, and no one complained. We need to find that American spirit again—if we still have it.

And what if we have to work a couple of years longer before Social Security kicks in? Instead of going into knee-jerk protest mode, maybe we should be thankful for the greater longevity that medical advances have given us.

If you're a Democrat, forget progressive purity for now and pull your boots on. Quit pouting in the corner, badmouthing Obama because the Public Option didn't make it into his health care reform. Or because he and Bernanke and Geithner weren't tough enough on Wall Street. Hey, they were rushed. They had a global economy to save.

And how about acknowledging that Obama's "majority in congress" was always a fiction, because the Blue Dog Democrats were really Republicans? How about applauding him for achieving so much progress in two years despite the Blue Dogs, the great Bush recession, and historically unprecedented obstructionism? In this emergency, we are fortunate to have a calm, clear-headed, pragmatic President.

To lead this battle as Democrats, let's get our priorities straight and be more inviting to independents and moderate Republicans. We need to create solidarity with every potential voter who recognizes the threat of Plutocracy.

Most important, don't wait to get active. It will take all of two years for truth about the hijacking to overcome Republican brainwashing. Start today and support Democrats with your money, your time, your heart, and your vote.

If you're an Independent, here's my challenge to you: if you disagree with me about the hijacking, I respectfully invite you to offer an alternate explanation which matches and accounts for the facts cited above—especially the massive shift of wealth from ordinary Americans to rich Americans.

If you're a Republican and have no answer to this challenge, perhaps you will at least consider the awful possibility that the hijacking is a fact—that your party is no longer "of, by and for" American citizens, but "by and for" oligarchs and global corporations which don't deserve your loyalty—and that any vote in any election which strengthens the Republican party is a vote for Plutocracy.

American democracy needs YOU. Let your conscience be your guide. Make Honest Abe proud of you.

¹Anup Shah, The Rise of Corporations, Global Issues, Updated: Dec. 5, 2002

²<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/11/07/opinion/07kristof.html?nl=todaysheadlines&emc=tha211> (Income distribution)

³<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/11/14/opinion/14rich.html?nl=todaysheadlines&emc=a212> (Tax rates)

⁴<http://www.gallup.com/poll/145109/americans-support-major-elements-tax-compromise.aspx> (Tax cuts & unemployment extension)

⁵http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Corporate_personhood (Thomas Jefferson 1816 letter to George Logan)

⁶http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Santa_Clara_County_v._Southern_Pacific_Railroad (1886 Supreme Court decision)

⁷http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Citizens_United_v._Federal_Election_Commission (2010 Supreme Court decision)

⁸http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/11/opinion/11sat3.html?_r=1&nl=todaysheadlines&emc=a211 (Coal miner deaths)

⁹<http://www.aolnews.com/the-point/article/daily-kos-poll-of-Republicans-met-with-shock-skepticism/19343356>

¹⁰<http://zfacts.com/p/480.html> (Debt by President)

¹¹<http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2010/12/03/grayson-bashes-bush-on-tax-cuts/?partner=rss&emc=rss> (Bush tax cut take-home)

¹²http://www.geographic.org/country_ranks/educational_score_performance_country_ranks_2009_oecd.html (Science scores)

Comments

posted by Chris Moran—Online Editor/Content Producer at Newspaper:

"Without Libertarianism as a philosophy, the hijacking could never have happened. It's the rarely acknowledged but indispensable Swiss army knife of right-wing ideology." (My note: Ignore the poor 80s-ish web design of this site. It offers some compelling and reasonable arguments.)

posted by William Miller—Works at Greenville Public Library:

For the most part, this is a solid, informative diagnoses of the problem before us, and how it came to be. But I do think the author seriously down-played the role of Democrats in not standing united for the working men and women in this country over the past quarter century. At about the time that baby-boomers were leaving their peace, love and community world-view behind for careers in the private sector, but still, for social reasons identified themselves as Democrats, the Democratic Party became untethered from its working class, blue collar base. In a word, it became elitist. This is the essence of the problem; if you can no longer identify with poor and working class whites, and you actively insult their Guns, God, and Patriotism world view, then you have left them nowhere to turn but the other party! Why should a working class guy in West Virginia, whose daddy and granddaddy voted Democrat when Democrats paid attention to working class concerns, now feel loyalty to a party led by upper middle class baby-boomers who have never had to take a bus to work, have never had to worry about where their next meal is coming from, and who now live in a suburban cul-de-sac, safely removed from the unwashed masses? Until the Democratic Party remembers its roots, and remembers who its logical base is, it will always be fighting a battle on the enemy's turf. And this is a battle that it cannot, in the long run, win.

20110216-04	17:23	Mark	Fw: A Reminder in History; Viet Nam
-------------	-------	------	-------------------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I learned about the U.S. Strategic Bombing in Vietnam in a Vietnam history class. It is true, we could have won the war in a day with the right kind of bombing—perhaps the U.S. was afraid that Russia would get into the war and go against us if we did that. Also; the Chiefs of Staff were not allowed to run the bombing but Johnson's men ran it instead. I don't know about the news mentioned below, but it sure would not surprise me if it played a big role.

General VoNguyen Giap was a brilliant, highly respected leader of the North Vietnam military. The following quote is from his memoirs currently found in the Vietnam war memorial in Hanoi : 'What we still don't understand is why you Americans stopped the bombing of Hanoi . You had us on the ropes. If you had pressed us a little harder, just for another day or two, we were ready to surrender! It was the same at the battle of TET. You defeated us!

We knew it, and we thought you knew it.

But we were elated to notice your media was helping us. They were causing more disruption in America than we could in the battlefields We were ready to surrender. You had won!'

General Giap has published his memoirs and confirmed what most Americans knew. The Vietnam war was not lost in Vietnam—it was lost at home. The same slippery slope, sponsored by the U.S. media, is currently underway. It exposes the enormous power of a Biased Media to cut out the heart and will of the American public.

A truism worthy of note: ... Do not fear the enemy, for they can take only your life. Fear the media for they will destroy your honour

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Two years ago today, Barack Obama was inaugurated as president of the United States . Are you better off today than you were two years ago? Numbers don't lie, and here are the data on the impact he has had on the lives of Americans:

Statistic	Jan., 2009	Feb., 2011	% chg
Avg. retail price/gallon gas in U.S.	$1.83	$3.104	69.6% ¹
Crude oil, European Brent (barrel)	$43.48	$99.02	127.7% ²
Crude oil, West TX Inter. (barrel)	$38.74	$91.38	135.9% ²
Gold: London (per troy oz.)	$853.25	$1,369.50	60.5% ²
Corn, No.2 yellow, Central IL	$3.56	$6.33	78.1% ²
Soybeans, No. 1 yellow, IL	$9.66	$13.75	42.3% ²
Sugar, cane, raw, world, lb. fob	$13.37	$35.39	164.7% ²
Unemployment rate, non-farm, overall	7.6%	9.4%	23.7% ³
Unemployment rate, blacks	12.6%	15.8%	25.4% ³
Number of unemployed	11,616,000	14,485,000	24.7% ³
Number of fed. employees, ex. military*	2,779,000	2,840,000	2.2% ³
Median household income (2008 v 2009)	$50,112	$49,777	-0.7% ⁴
Number food stamp recipients (10/10)	31,983,716	43,200,878	35.1% ⁵
Number unemployed (12/10)	7,526,598	9,193,838	22.2% ⁶
Number of long-term unemployed	2,600,000	6,400,000	146.2% ³
Poverty rate, individuals (2008 v 2009)	13.2%	14.3%	8.3% ⁴
People in poverty in U.S. (2008 v 2009)	39,800,000	43,600,000	9.5% ⁴
U.S. Economic Freedom World Rankings	5	9	n/a ¹⁰
Present Situation Index (curr = 12/10)	29.9	23.5	-1.4% ¹¹
Failed banks (curr = 2010 + 2011 to date)	140	164	17.1% ¹²
U.S. dollar vs. Japanese yen exchange rate	89.76	82.03	-8.6% ²
U.S. money supply, M1, in billions*	1,575.1	1,865.7	18.4% ¹³
U.S. money supply, M2, in billions*	8,310.9	8,852.3	6.5% ¹³
National debt, in trillions	$10.627	$14.052	32.2% ¹⁴

*Dec., 2010 prelim.

Just take this last item: In the last two years we have accumulated national debt at a rate more than 27 times as fast as during the rest of our entire nation's history. Over 27 times as fast! Metaphorically, speaking, if you are driving in the right lane doing 65 MPH and a car rockets past you in the left lane 27 times faster, it would be doing 1,755 MPH! This is a disaster!

Sources: (1) U.S. Energy Information Administration; (2) Wall Street Journal; (3) Bureau of Labor Statistics; (4) Census Bureau; (5) U.S.D.A.; (6) U.S. Dept. of Labor; (7) FHFA; (8) Standard & Poor's/Case-Shiller; (9) RealtyTrac; (10) Heritage Foundation and WSJ; (11) The Conference Board; (12) FDIC; (13) Federal Reserve; (14) U.S. Treasury

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

I'm a one percenter! (read the last sentence)...This just about says it all.

"Where can I get my pistol engraved like this?"

A reporter did a human-interest piece on the Texas Rangers. The reporter recognized the Colt Model 1911 the Ranger was carrying and asked him 'Why do you carry a 45?' The Ranger responded, 'Because they don't make a 46.'

The old sheriff was attending an awards dinner when a lady commented on his wearing his sidearm. 'Sheriff, I see you have your pistol. Are you expecting trouble?' He promptly replied, 'No Ma'am. If I were expecting trouble, I would have brought my shotgun.'

Beware the man who only carries one gun. HE PROBABLY KNOWS HOW TO USE IT!

I was once asked by a lady visiting if I had a gun in the house. I said I did. She said, 'Well I certainly hope it isn't loaded!' To which I said, "Of course it is loaded, it can't work without bullets!" She then asked, "Are you that afraid of someone evil coming into your house?" My reply was, "No not at all. I am not afraid of the house catching fire either, but I have fire extinguishers around, and they are all loaded too."

HAVE A NICE DAY But don't Monkey with Me...And Remember? I'm a firm believer of the 2nd Amendment!

20110219-01	11:18	SteveB	Re: Who will Protect You & Your Family?
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Tom,

I kind of agree with this one. Yet non-violence is better than violence, peace is better than war, and when push finally comes to shove on our shores, it's going to be a bloody, tragic mess.

"Freedom's just another word for nothin' left to lose."—Kris Kristofferson and Fred Foster, performed by Janis Joplin 20110219-02	18:17	SteveB	Fw: Have Republicans Declared War on Women?

-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

[Source of original email unknown —SteveB]

1. Republicans not only want to reduce women's access to abortion care, they're actually trying to redefine rape. After a major backlash, they promised to stop. But they haven't.
2. A state legislator in Georgia wants to change the legal term for victims of rape, stalking, and domestic violence to "accuser." But victims of other less gendered crimes, like burglary, would remain "victims."
3. In South Dakota, Republicans proposed a bill that could make it legal to murder a doctor who provides abortion care. (Yep, for real.)
4. Republicans want to cut nearly a billion dollars of food and other aid to low-income pregnant women, mothers, babies, and kids.
5. In Congress, Republicans have proposed a bill that would let hospitals allow a woman to die rather than perform an abortion necessary to save her life.
6. Maryland Republicans ended all county money for a low-income kids' preschool program. Why? No need, they said. Women should really be home with the kids, not out working.
7. And at the federal level, Republicans want to cut that same program, Head Start, by $1 billion. That means over 200,000 kids could lose their spots in preschool.
8. Two-thirds of the elderly poor are women, and Republicans are taking aim at them too. A spending bill would cut funding for employment services, meals, and housing for senior citizens.
9. Congress voted yesterday on a Republican amendment to cut all federal funding from Planned Parenthood health centers, one of the most trusted providers of basic health care and family planning in our country.
10. And if that wasn't enough, Republicans are pushing to eliminate all funds for the only federal family planning program. (For humans. But Republican Dan Burton has a bill to provide contraception for wild horses. You can't make this stuff up).

20110219-03 18:20 Charis Re: Have Republicans Declared War on Women?

Dear SteveB,

While these spending cut proposals do make me hopping mad, my question would be, what is the solution to our multi-trillion dollar deficit and foreign debt?

20110219-04 18:51 SteveB Re: Have Republicans Declared War on Women?

Dear Charis,

Ah, as Shakespeare said, "Therein lies the rub!" I don't think it will happen, because our politicians are totally corrupted by large campaign contributions, but taxes on the rich need to be increased, government needs to be smaller and more efficient, without the savings being born by those in poverty. Illegal immigration and free trade need to end immediately. Companies need to be encouraged to manufacture in America by manipulating taxes—make it here and pay less taxes, make it "there" and be penalized. Education must not be cut, but more of our educational resources need to go to Americans and not foreigners. Markets need to be a little more regulated (but not as "regulated" as Bolivia's sugar market). :-) We have to work much harder to quickly end our dependence on foreign oil. We need electric cars and more trains. We need to bring manufacturing back to our shores. We need to end the wars and shrink the military. Every whining baby American must learn to make some small sacrifices temporarily. We need constitutional amendments in all 50 states and at the federal level to eventually force budget balancing except in cases of direst emergency. We need to learn languages and go out into the world and sell American products. And, unfortunately, we need to gradually inflate our currency to the point that we can pay our debts with cheaper dollars.

If we could do all these things—which of course we won't—we just might save ourselves from joining the Third World.

I'm not pro-abortion, but very much against governmental intrusion into the private lives, bedrooms, and bodies of citizens.

20110220-01 09:57 SteveB Movie Recommendations

Three well-acted, well-written movies about love that appears out of nowhere, endures great adversity, yet emerges triumphant. I know it sounds sappy, but I like that kind of movie.

- Original Sin
- The Lake House
- Only You

Hope you enjoy!

20110220-02 13:16 Pam Re: Movie Recommendations

Dear SteveB,

I'll put them on my Netflix list. I like "sappy" movies too:

- Love Actually
- Enchanted April
- Sirens (early Hugh Grant)
- Truly, Madly, Deeply

Some more of my favorites:

- Jean de Florette
- Manon of the Spring
- Il Postino
- Four Weddings and a Funeral
- Immortal Beloved

I saw a crocus and a daffodil in bloom yesterday. It was in the mid-seventies. Today it's 20 degrees cooler. If you watch any of "my" movies, let me know what you think

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110221-01	14:43	Phil	Fw: Joys of a Muslim Woman
-------------	-------	------	----------------------------

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB

from: http://urbanlegends.about.com/od/religion/a/joys_of_muslim_women.htm:

Analysis: Despite the attribution at the top—"Joys of Muslim Women by Nonie Darwish"—this text wasn't written by Nonie Darwish; indeed, the bottom two-thirds of it refer to her repeatedly in the third person. Darwish confirmed via email that she did not write the article, though it is, in her words, "to a large extent accurate." She also told me her 2009 book, Cruel and Usual Punishment, better represents her views.

It should be noted that while the email is at least partially based on Darwish's personal experiences growing up in a Muslim country and reading the Qur'an, it's awash in generalizations and makes pronouncements about Islam and Islamic practices that don't necessarily pertain to all Muslims.

For more on Nonie Darwish's views in her own words, see Cruel and Usual Punishment \(Interview\)—<http://www.familysecuritymatters.org>, Jan. 8, 2009.

For a differing view on the Islamic faith, see Myths About Islam by Christine Huda Dodge—About.com.]

You may have seen this before...but I see it happening in our town....

A VERY INTERESTING READ AND VERY IMPORTANT

Worth the read. Joys of a Muslim Woman. 20 years from now, I will be in Heaven This was written by a woman born in Egypt as a Muslim. This is not hearsay, and it may scare the life out of you.

Joys of a Muslim Woman, by Nonie Darwish

In the Muslim faith a Muslim man can marry a child as young as 1 year old and have sexual intimacy with this child.

Consummating the marriage by 9

The dowry is given to the family in exchange for the woman (who becomes his slave) and for the purchase of the private parts of the woman, to use her as a toy. Even though a woman is abused she cannot obtain a divorce. To prove rape, the woman must have (4) male witnesses.

Often, after a woman has been raped, she is returned to her family and the family must return the dowry. The family has the right to execute her (an honor killing) to restore the honor of the family. Husbands can beat their wives 'at will' and he does not have to say why he has beaten her.

The husband is permitted to have (4 wives) and a temporary wife for an hour (prostitute) at his discretion.

The Sharia Muslim law controls the private as well as the public life of the woman.

In the West World (America) Muslim men are starting to demand Sharia Law so the wife cannot obtain a divorce and he can have full and complete control of her. It is amazing and alarming how many of our sisters and daughters attending American Universities are now marrying Muslim men and submitting themselves and their children unsuspectingly to the Sharia law.

By passing this on, enlightened American women may avoid becoming a slave under Sharia Law.

Ripping the West in Two

Author and lecturer Nonie Darwish says the goal of radical Islamists is to impose Sharia law on the world, ripping Western law and liberty in two.

She recently authored the book, Cruel and Usual Punishment: The Terrifying Global Implications of Islamic Law.

Darwish was born in Cairo and spent her childhood in Egypt and Gaza before immigrating to America in 1978, when she was eight years old. Her father died while leading covert attacks on Israel . He was a high-ranking Egyptian military officer stationed with his family in Gaza. When he died, he was considered a "shahid," a martyr for jihad. His posthumous status earned Nonie and her family an elevated position in Muslim society. But Darwish developed a skeptical eye at an early age. She questioned her own Muslim culture and upbringing. She converted to Christianity after hearing a Christian preacher on television.

In her latest book, Darwish warns about creeping Sharia law—what it is, what it means, and how it is manifested in Islamic countries.

For the West, she says radical Islamists are working to impose Sharia on the world. If that happens, Western civilization will be destroyed. Westerners generally assume all religions encourage a respect for the dignity of each individual. Islamic law (Sharia) teaches that non-Muslims should be subjugated or killed in this world. Peace and prosperity for one's children is not as important as assuring that Islamic law rules everywhere in the Middle East and eventually in the world.

While Westerners tend to think that all religions encourage some form of the golden rule, Sharia teaches two systems of ethics—one for Muslims and another for non-Muslims. Building on tribal practices of the seventh century, Sharia encourages the side of humanity that wants to take from and subjugate others...

While Westerners tend to think in terms of religious people developing a personal understanding of and relationship with God, Sharia advocates executing people who ask difficult questions that could be interpreted as criticism. It's hard to imagine, that in this day and age, Islamic scholars agree that those who criticize Islam or choose to stop being Muslim should be executed. Sadly, while talk of an Islamic reformation is common and even assumed by many in the West, such murmurings in the Middle East are silenced through intimidation.

While Westerners are accustomed to an increase in religious tolerance over time, Darwish explains how petro dollars are being used to grow an extremely intolerant form of political Islam in her native Egypt and elsewhere. (In twenty years there will be enough Muslim voters in the U.S. To elect the President by themselves! Rest assured they will do so... You can look at how they have taken over several towns in the U.S.... Dearborn Mich. is one... And there are others...)

I think everyone in the U.S. Should be required to read this, but with the ACLU, there is no way this will be widely publicized, unless each of us sends it on! It is too bad that so many are disillusioned with life and Christianity to accept Muslims as peaceful.. some may be but they have an army that is willing to shed blood in the name of Islam.. the peaceful support the warriors with their finances and own kind of patriotism to their religion. While America is getting rid of Christianity from all public sites and erasing God from the lives of children the Muslims are planning a great jihad on America.

This is your chance to make a difference...! Pass it on to your email list or at least those you think will listen. Some of those I'm sending it to WILL NOT! Put your head back under the covers so you can't see the boogie man!

20110221-02 19:29 SteveB Re: Joys of a Muslim Woman

Dear Phil,

Ma fellow Americans (I can clearly hear LBJ saying that now),

This email contains some untruths. There will almost certainly not be enough Muslims in America within 20 years (or ever) to elect a President by themselves. Do the math, if you don't believe me. There are between 2.0 and 2.7 million at the present time.

And I think of myself as a tolerant, open-minded, non-racist world traveler. But I am worried.

Though many Muslims seem to be sweet people, I don't understand why we feel the need to give our country away to them, rather than passing America on to our children and grandchildren, as our parents did. These are immigrants with no plans to integrate into American society. Their plans are to stand apart or even to change American society.

But it is somehow considered un-American and racist to state these truths. One of the biggest problems right now (maybe the biggest) is jobs. And I believe in seniority when it comes to jobs. I want to see the children and grandchildren of American citizens of all races have good jobs. Yet our factories are now in China and India, etc. As I travel around the country, I can't help but notice that every convenience store, gas station, motel, and many of the shops are owned and run by Indians or Pakistanis who barely speak English. I won't even mention taxi drivers Surely this is work/business practically no American considers below them. Where are the Americans?

Why do we feel compelled to give our country and our children's future to strangers who don't even appear to like us? Why is it not OK to say this?

The other day, my wife and I were walking around the lakes of Celebration, Florida...a lovely planned community partly designed and built by Walt Disney near Orlando. Google it. The average home there probably sells for $1,000,000, despite the bottom falling out of Florida home prices. I embrace the few Cubans here, even the Colombian drug dealers who can afford to live there. With these people we share a cultural heritage. Like the Irish, Italians, Russians, Germans, and Eastern Europeans who came here before them, the Hispanic immigrants, though rightfully proud of their language and culture, are integrating into the American melting pot amazingly rapidly, to my mind. That is their plan and their desire. I like them, though there are a tad too many of them, especially the illegal variety.

But, frankly, when I saw a Muslim woman coming down the path in her burqa, I felt resentment. Sorry, my friends even more liberal than I, I just don't feel enough guilt to want to allow these people to steal the rightful places of my children and grandchildren. Let them return to their homelands. I don't really want them here, and I say that out of love, not racism.

Unfortunately, though this email exaggerates, it also contains a lot of truth about Muslim treatment of women.

20110221-03 21:53 Tom Video: "Rewriting Black History Month"

Video: "Rewriting Black History Month" by AlfonZo Rachel, PJTV

<http://www.rantrave.com/Rave/Black-History-Month---A-Different-Take.aspx>

<http://www.pjtv.com/?cmd=mpg&mpid=84&load=4853>

This is a very good view, well done presentation.

AlfonZo rewrites black history on this episode. AlfonZo takes serious issue with black history month and is not afraid to say why. For example, why is it that you never hear about black Republicans? Zo thinks it is time to wrest control of the educational system from the Democratic party and set history free. Find out more.

20110222-01 08:26 SteveB Re: "Rewriting Black History Month"

Dear Tom,

..."Black Republicans"??? Like Mr. Five-Years-of-Silence, Clarence Thomas? What a buffoon that guy is! Another fool: Michael Steele!

Let's face it, there are good, fundamental reasons why about 90% of blacks and union members are Democrats. Or do you want to go back to Upton Sinclair's The Jungle? Not me!

Without the unions, working conditions in the U.S. would be just like those in China or Haiti. Or do you imagine that rich employers love you? In my working life, I always recognized that, in reality, it was them against me! That's the way it's always been and the way it will always be.

The rich deserve their bigger share of the pie, but not the whole damn pie!

20110222-02 11:04 SteveB Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

Dear GaryC,

All I can say is that if current trends continue, our great nation is in very, very much trouble. We're on our way to the Third World.

By the way, the U.S. has the about the lowest tax rates of any First World country. I don't think it will happen, because our politicians are totally corrupted by large campaign contributions, but here are the things that I think need to be done.

Taxes on the rich need to be increased, government needs to be smaller and more efficient, without the savings being born by those in poverty. Illegal immigration and free trade need to end immediately. Companies need to be encouraged to manufacture in America by manipulating taxes—make it here and pay less taxes, make it "there" and be penalized. Education must not be cut, but more of our educational resources need to go to Americans and not foreigners. Markets need to be a little more regulated (but not as "regulated" as Bolivia's sugar market). :-) We have to work much harder to quickly end our dependence on foreign oil. We need electric cars and more trains. We need to bring manufacturing back to our shores.

We need to end the wars and shrink the military. Every whining baby American must learn to make some small sacrifices temporarily. We need constitutional amendments in all 50 states and at the federal level to eventually force budget balancing except in cases of direst emergency. We need to learn languages and go out into the world and sell American products. And, unfortunately, we need to gradually inflate our currency to the point that we can pay our international debts with cheaper dollars.

20110222-03 18:50 SteveB Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget; Gasoline Tax

Dear GaryC,

Oh...and one other thing I think should be done: Gasoline taxes should be raised and constantly adjusted to maintain the price of a gallon of gasoline at $5 to $6 (at least). This would reduce consumption, help our federal deficit, and allow the more rapid development of alternative vehicles and public transportation. (What a fool the Republican governor of Florida is for refusing $2 billion for high speed rail!) Even if oil were to fall to $20/barrel, this gasoline price should be maintained via the adjustable tax. I'm tired of our alternative development efforts being sabotaged by the oil producers yo-yoing the price of oil. We need to get wise to their cr*p.

Go Libya!

20110222-04 20:06 GaryC Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget; Gasoline Tax

Dear SteveB,

I totally agree on the gas tax. That is really a no brainer as it would keep kids from cruising around and would get more people to look at public transportation. When I am in Europe, I rarely drive but take trains everywhere. Also, in China I take trains whenever I can. I do see why the governor in Florida did not take the money. That corridor is not traveled that much. I would rather see an eastern seaboard, west coast and maybe central line to start and then start filling in the pieces. If I could ride the train to Chicago or Cincinnati, I would never drive.

20110223-01	15:18	GaryC	Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---

SteveB: All I can say is that if current trends continue, our great nation is in very, very much trouble. We're on our way to the Third World. By the way, the U.S. has the about the lowest tax rates of any First World country.

GaryC: Really, where did you get this information? Are you talking personal income tax or corporate income tax? I do know a little about this but if this is the case, it has sure changed in recent years. Plus, and this is a big plus, almost all foreign countries DO NOT tax income earned outside of their territory unlike the U.S., so the local rates might be higher but the income included is much lower.

SteveB: I don't think it will happen, because our politicians are totally corrupted by large campaign contributions, but here are the things that I think need to be done.

GaryC: Yes, including contributions from unions. Do you think it is any surprise that so many unions have received waivers from Obama Care?

SteveB: Taxes on the rich need to be increased, government needs to be smaller and more efficient.

GaryC: Yes.

SteveB: Without the savings being born by those in poverty. Illegal immigration and free trade need to end immediately.

GaryC: Illegal immigration, yes, Free trade, no. This works both ways. I personally believe the poor will be hurt more if we restrict trade. The poor jobs, mainly at Kmart, Walmart and Costco. If China prices go up by 20-30%, it will be the poor paying the price.

SteveB: Companies need to be encouraged to manufacture in America by manipulating taxes—make it here and pay less taxes, make it "there" and be penalized. Education must not be cut, but more of our educational resources need to go to Americans and not foreigners. Markets need to be a little more regulated. (but not as "regulated" as Bolivia's sugar market). :-)

GaryC: Yes and no. Protect people but not industries or create more government jobs to intrude on commerce. This is a fine line and no one (Repubs or Dems) every gets the right balance. Self regulation is the best with government oversight.

SteveB: We have to work much harder to quickly end our dependence on foreign oil. We need electric cars and more trains. We need to bring manufacturing back to our shores. We need to end the wars and shrink the military. Every whining baby American must learn to make some small sacrifices temporarily. We need constitutional amendments in all 50 states and at the federal level to eventually force budget balancing except in cases of direst emergency We need to learn languages and go out into the world and sell American products. And, unfortunately, we need to gradually inflate our currency to the point that we can pay our international debts with cheaper dollars.

GaryC: Yes to the above. I am not a Tea Party guy, but I may become one listening to your rhetoric. One thing I will disagree with you on is the need to tax (soak) the rich. I think rates need to go down to encourage investment and growth. I think the vast amount of deductions or credits need to be eliminated to do away with social engineering and industry preferences. I also think everyone needs to pay something to the government albeit it a small amount. If you have no skin in the game and only have your hand out for freebies, how do you think you will vote? If we reduce the rates and eliminate deductions and credits, we shrink the IRS and get more compliance. One thing that scares the hell out of me is the fact that only about 55% of American families pay tax now. When that number goes over 50%, we will have really big problems and class warfare will erupt like never before. Guess who pays in that scenario? It would sure be nice if we had term limits and politicians had to recuse themselves on votes concerning an interest benefiting their contributors.

20110223-02 17:17 SteveB Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

Dear GaryC,

We're not that high, especially when you consider the effective rate (not really shown here):

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tax_rates_around_the_world.

<http://www.sourcingline.com/country-data/smb-effective-tax-rate/>.

And I still say the effective personal tax rate is not nearly high enough for upper brackets after the Reagan and Bush cuts have put it at a near record low at a time the contribution is badly needed. The gasoline tax, as we've discussed, would also help the deficit. Also, marijuana should be legalized and taxed highly. I also believe there should be a special "gay" tax (very high). Other taxes I would consider to alleviate the deficit—a Muslim tax, a special illegal immigrant tax, and (highest of all) a special "ugly" Muslim or illegal immigrant tax. Ugly, gay, Muslim illegal immigrants would pay 100%.

20110224-01 12:08 GaryC Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

Dear SteveB,

I would really hate to see you pay higher taxes because you are ugly and gay but if you personally feel you should pay more, then more power to you. And, thanks. BTW, if the liberals are all concerned about the rich paying more taxes why don't they voluntarily pay more?

Also, I really don't understand the soak the rich argument of liberals (and I consider myself a liberal on many issues). When I was younger and working 50 hours a week and going to school, I paid much higher rates than what a person of comparable salary pays today. The consequence was that it took me longer to save up $100,000 to start my first business. Had the rates been lower and investment lending more attractive, I would have begun my personal business career much sooner.

Assuming I have more disposal income with lower rates, I have four options for the extra cash. One, put it in the bank and earn 1/4%. Two, expand my current businesses or start a new business and hire more people. This puts people to work at the lower end of the earnings scale. Three, spend the money on hookers, wine and fun. This puts money into the economy mostly at the low income wage scale. Fourth, give the money to charity to help the poor in ways I deem most useful.

Or, under your approach, I can give it to Washington and let weak people spend it in ways to insure they stay in power.

For me, this is a no brainer argument. I feel way better spending the money in the way I want instead of letting whores spending it for me. (Excluding of course those young women who want to make me feel better for 2—3 minutes).

BTW, you never did respond to my query regarding the responsibility of the poor to our society.

20110224-02 21:40 SteveB Re: 15 Tax Hikes Hidden in Obama's New Budget

Dear GaryC,

The responsibility of the poor is to consume and be maids and gardeners and Wal-Mart workers for low wages. Too bad they don't have public transportation and decent cheap housing like the poor of Bolivia enjoy.

I don't think business taxes should be increased, merely tailored to what society needs. Look how slow the investment has been in alternative vehicles and fuels. Look how all our manufacturing has been shipped overseas. Taxes can help correct these situations.

Oh, another partial remedy I didn't mention: oil companies should be made to pay royalties on Gulf oil! Not have a free ride for billions of taxpayer dollars. Also, you know the rich and big corporations do many things to lower their effective tax rates (aka loopholes). The poor don't have these opportunities. But I think everyone should pay something and vote. Take a look, though, at the corporations in your investment portfolio and see what effective tax rate they pay.

Regardless, we're deep in debt and need to do something to get out. More importantly, we need a booming economy, which now seems impossible under current trends.

All I know is we went wrong 20-30 years ago and it's probably too late to correct the course of the ship without great hardship. Many Americans are already experiencing this hardship—I could give you a myriad of examples. The rich need to share a little in this hardship, not enjoy record low tax rates.

When are you getting to Florida again? Just watched the shuttle launch a while ago. My first. So very cool!

20110224-03 23:08 Tom "Missouri Ahead of the Game in Dealing with Illegal Immigration"
--

FYI: Missouri has no illegals....

I believe Missouri's laws make that very clear and give our law enforcement officials the authority they need to deal with the problem.

"Missouri Ahead of the Game in Dealing with Illegal Immigration" by Nita Jane Ayres, The Ozarks Sentinel

May 13, 2010, (<http://ozarkssentinel.com/missouri-ahead-of-the-game-in-dealing-with-illegal-immigrantsp1034.htm>)

Missouri's approach to the problem of illegal immigration appears to be more advanced, sophisticated, strict and effective than anything to date in Arizona.

So, why doesn't Missouri receive attention?

Answer: There are no Mexican illegals in Missouri to demonstrate.

The "Show Me" state has once again shown us how it should be done. There needs to be more publicity and exposure regarding what Missouri has done.

In 2007, Missouri placed on the ballot a proposed constitutional amendment designating English as the official language of Missouri. In Nov., 2008, nearly 90% voted in favor! Thus, English became the official language for ALL governmental activity in Missouri. No individual has the right to demand government services in a language OTHER than English.

In 2008, a measure was passed that required the Missouri Highway Patrol and other law enforcement officials to verify the immigration status of any person arrested, and inform federal authorities if the person is found to be in Missouri illegally. Missouri law enforcement officers receive specific training with respect to enforcement of federal immigration laws.

In Missouri, illegal immigrants do NOT have access to taxpayers benefits such as food stamps and health care through Missouri HealthNET.

In 2009, a measure was passed that ensures Missouri's public institutions of higher education do NOT award financial aid to individuals who are illegally in the United States.

In Missouri, all post-secondary institutions of higher education to annually certify to the Missouri Dept. of Higher Education that they have NOT knowingly awarded financial aid to students who are unlawfully present in the United States.

So, while Arizona has made national news for its new law, it is important to remember, Missouri has been far more proactive in addressing this horrific problem.

Missouri has made it clear that illegal immigrants are NOT welcome in the state and they will certainly NOT receive public benefits at the expense of Missouri taxpayers.

"These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman."—Thomas Paine

"A government which robs Peter to pay Paul can always depend on the support of Paul."—George Bernard Shaw

"There is no worse tyranny than to force a man to pay for what he does not want merely because you think it would be good for him."—Robert Heinlein

"Dictators ride to and fro on tigers from which they dare not dismount. And the tigers are getting hungry."—Sir Winston Churchill

<http://www.usasurvival.org/911.shtml>

<http://www.bartleby.com/>

<http://euphoricreality.com/>

20110225-01	19:09	Dennis	"Obama's Secret Plot to Bring 100 Million Muslims to the U.S." & "The Plutocrat's Coup d'Etat, Their Republican Allies & Their Democratic Enablers"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Fantasies and realities...

Read what the wackos are now saying about Obama in the first article.

However, if you're sane and prefer to know what's really going on, read the second instead.

"Obama's Secret Plot to Bring 100 Million Muslims to the U.S." by David Corn, Islamophobia Today

Feb. 25, 2011, (<http://www.islamophobiatoday.com/2011/02/25/obamas-secret-plot-to-bring-100-million-muslims-to-the-us/>)

In the past few years, paranoid conservatives have cooked up all sorts of conspiracy theories about President Barack Obama. Some have claimed he has a secret plan to confiscate guns. Others have said he has a secret plan to confiscate IRA accounts. Still others have contended he's setting up clandestine FEMA concentration camps. And, of course, there's the big one: Obama's is an undercover socialist purposefully trying to wreck the U.S. economy so he can implement a dictatorial takeover. But here's the mother of all right-wing conspiracy theories: Obama is scheming to bring tens of millions of Muslims—perhaps up to 100 million—from the Middle East into the United States in order to turn this country into an Islamic nation by the end of his second term.

Fortunately, this diabolical plan has been exposed by an American-born Israeli named Avi Lipkin, who says he once was a translator for the Israeli government, and an outfit called Special Guests, which books conservative commentators and advocates on popular television and radio talk shows. Lipkin's website claims that since 1990 he has lectured on various topics—including the threat of Islam and Israel—in over 1000 churches and synagogues in the United States, Canada, England, Greece, Israel, and other countries. His bio notes that he heads the Judeo-Christian Bible Bloc party in Israel. (The party's Facebook page listed 103 members yesterday.)

This week, Lipkin and Special Guests sent an email to television and radio bookers pitching the biggest story of all time:

According to Arabic language broadcasts intercepted and interpreted by Lipkin and his team, "The Moslem world is saying that President Obama wants amnesty for the current Hispanic 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. in order to pave the way for the next wave of tens of millions of illegals from the Middle East to the United States, leading to 50 to 100 million Muslims living in the U.S. before the end of Obama's second term, which will be brought forth by these new U.S. citizens voting for their savior, Obama."

Lipkin, who also goes by the name Victor Mordechai, claims to have "a source with a senior United Nations official" (whatever that means) who says that the United States "will be a Muslim country by the end of Obama's second term." This grand plan is so organized that it even has three parts. Phase One: Obama foments unrest in "each Middle East country" so that these regimes are toppled and replaced by "fanatic" Sunni Muslims, who go on to "overthrow the competing Shiite regime in Iran without involving American troops." Phase Two: A massive exodus of Muslims heads toward Europe, Canada, and the United States, turning all of these Western nations into Muslim countries. Phase Three:

The nations now controlled by Islamic extremists “march on Israel in an effort to destroy it” and Obama “keeps his promise...to destroy Israel.”

Of course, there’s a YouTube video (embedded below) that explains Lipkin’s scoop. It’s called, “Is Barack Obama Really A Saudi/Muslim ‘Plant’ in the White House?” The answer is obvious. The video claims that “for years before” the 2008 election, Lipkin’s wife, who worked for the Israeli government monitoring Arabic radio broadcasts, picked up broadcasts of Saudis saying, “We will have a Muslim in the White House in 2008.” (Remember Obama’s bow before the Saudi king in 2009? Wink, wink.) The video notes that Obama has refused “to reveal” his long-form birth certificate “or anything else about his past.” (Convergence with the birthers!) The video suggests that Obama and his crew have pulled off the “greatest...scam in history” and “put an anti-American and Saudi-sponsored Muslim in the White House, thanks to a brain-dead American public and news media, both obsessed with skin color and an American Idol mentality.” The video goes on to say that in 2009 Lipkin’s wife listened to an Egyptian television broadcast featuring the then-foreign minister saying that Obama had sworn to him that he was a Muslim. Obama—according to Lipkin’s account of his wife’s account of the foreign minister’s account—also told this Egyptian official that after he finished with the health care debate, “You Muslims will see what I will do for Islam regarding Israel.”

The video does not specifically cover Obama’s secret scheme to bring up to 100 million Muslims into the United States. But isn’t that what a Saudi plant would do?

Avi Lipkin puts Glenn Beck to shame as a conspiracy theorist. But though he’s on the fringe, he’s not on his own. His video has been viewed 2.9 million times. And Special Guests is an outfit that works within the conservative establishment. According to its website, the organization has collaborated with the National Right To Life Committee, the Catholic Family and Human Rights Institute, the Second Amendment Foundation, and other conservative groups. The site boasts, “We regularly place guests on radio shows including Rush Limbaugh, Glenn Beck, Sean Hannity Radio, [and] Michael Savage.” The group says it only promotes causes that “are pleasing to The Maker, our Creator.” It asks potential clients, “What is your special message? Is it helpful to humanity? Is it God-honoring?” Apparently, it pleases God to accuse the president of covertly plotting—and implementing!—a Muslim takeover of the United States.

(David Corn is Mother Jones’ Washington bureau chief. He’s also on Twitter and Facebook.)

“The Plutocrat’s Coup d’Etat, Their Republican Allies and Their Democratic Enablers” by John Atcheson, CommonDreams

Feb. 25, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/view/2011/02/25-1>)

For thirty years, now, Republicans have been yammering about small government, deficits, the glories of the free market, and the incompetence and wastefulness of government.

It’s all been a big lie, part of a well funded and cleverly executed coup d’etat, designed to enable the ultra rich and corporations to literally take power out of the hands of government and money out of the pockets of individual citizens.

Democrats have either actively participated in the coup or watched in near silence. The press has been passively playing the part of a mute stenographer. The basis of this coup is simple—money has become the lingua franca of political power, eclipsing the vote.

They’ve just about pulled it off.

Hyperbole? Hardly. Let’s examine their message against their actions.

Do Republicans Really Favor Small Government?

Nope. Republicans and their corporate over lords were never really concerned with making government small. In fact, the size of government exploded under Reagan and Bush II, and we didn’t hear a peep out of Republicans. In the last thirty years, only Clinton reduced the size of government significantly, and he did so while declaring “the era of big government” to be over.

What they really wanted was a weak government.

Government is one of the only forces capable of preventing the excesses of unconstrained markets, so step one of the Plutocrat's coup had to be to thoroughly discredit it. It began with Reagan's famous quote, "Government is not the solution to our problem, government is the problem," and despite massive and growing evidence to the contrary, it's been repeated so often, that it is now accepted as revealed truth.

Don't look for the Democrats to set things straight, though. If Republicans are merely paid mouthpieces for corporate America, Democrats are wholly owned subsidiaries of it. As for the main stream media? They are corporate America.

Are Republicans Genuinely Worried about Deficits?

Not so much. Here again, deficits grew under Reagan, Bush I, and Bush II. In fact, Reagan and Bush II added more to the deficit than all previous Presidents combined, and again, not a peep was heard. In recent times, only Clinton reduced it. If deficits were really an issue, we should have heard protests well before Obama took office.

What the Republican Plutocracy has really been doing is to "...starve the beast down to the size where we can drown it in the bathtub." That's why Republicans increased the budget while decreasing revenue—not a good strategy for dealing with deficits, but a great way to create excuses for selectively shrinking key government programs. In Wisconsin, for example, Walker gave away $140 billion in tax breaks to industry cronies just weeks before declaring the compelling need cut government workers' salaries and eliminate their right to conduct collective bargaining. The State's Legislative Reference Bureau, the equivalent of the federal government's non-partisan Congressional Budget Office, said that absent those tax cuts, Wisconsin would have run a budget surplus.

Talk About Bait-and-Switch

The looming showdown in the House of Representatives over deficits is similarly a self-inflicted hot foot. Simply eliminating the Bush tax cuts for the rich, cutting back agricultural subsidies, closing a few corporate tax loopholes (including the infamous offshore tax provisions which reward companies for moving jobs out of America), instituting a small financial trading tax (something that would have the added benefit of reducing market volatility) and reducing the defense budget to reasonable levels would enable us to approach a balanced budget with relatively little pain. And each of these are supported by the majority of Americans.

So, if there are politically popular, pain-free strategies for balancing the budget that actually create jobs and help the economy, why aren't we even discussing them? Because they don't "starve the beast."

The fact that Republicans are picking on the miniscule portion of the budget devoted to the poor and middle class shows they're not serious. There simply isn't enough there to make even a small dent in the deficit. But a large pool of unemployed workers with no safety net certainly helps the fat cats keep wages down.

How About the Notion that Unconstrained Markets Create Prosperity and Jobs? Again not so much. The fact is, laissez-faire, free market policies have failed miserably every time they've been tried. It turns out they have a nasty habit of consistently causing grotesque income inequalities, huge market volatility and severe financial collapses. In fact, the Great Recession we are now climbing out of should have been strike 3 for the Free Marketeers. Strike one was the Panic of 1893 and the depression which followed it. Strike two was the Great Depression of the 30's. In all three cases, these collapses were preceded by conservative, laissez-faire policies featuring deregulation, low taxes and weak governments.

Three tries—each resulting in a catastrophic economic meltdown. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out this strategy doesn't work. But it does help the Plutocrats continue their policy of plundering the nation's wealth.

Is Government Really the Problem?

There was a time when people knew that government was a critical contributor to our nation's prosperity. Up until the 80's many folks still remembered how government had won two World Wars. They knew that it had been instrumental in helping us out of a major Depression. They knew that it had built world-class infrastructure that created wealth—including dams, public buildings, and the federal highway system. They'd watched as government R&D generated unprecedented prosperity and whole new industries, including the agricultural revolution, the aerospace industry, nuclear energy, the Internet, leadership in chip manufacturing, pharmaceuticals and many of the health innovations we enjoy.

Until recently, people realized that government regulation of corporations and the financial sector had assured a level playing field, transparent markets, and international trust, creating the longest sustained period of prosperity in U.S. history—a prosperity that was shared by all.

Portraying the government as a collection of bumbling bureaucrats who can't do anything other than get in the private sector's way and waste our tax money serves three purposes in the Plutocrat's coup. First, it provides a scapegoat for the increasing economic pain people will inevitably feel in a Plutocratic world. Second, it reinforces the desire to cut taxes—to starve the beast. Why give incompetent boobs and wastrels more money? And third, it prevents citizens from looking at government as an effective solution to the problems created by a Plutocratic society.

The Press as Mute Stenographer

At one time, facts would have been more important than slogans and the media would have given people those facts, exposing The Big Lie as a steaming pile of elephant dung in our collective national living room. The fact that Medicare, Medicaid, and Veterans health programs have an overhead of 4% or less, and produce better outcomes than private health insurance with its 30% overhead would have been known to folks, and lies about death panels wouldn't have survived.

The fact that Social Security is not in danger, that it has nothing to do with current deficits and that it is far more efficient—and less costly—than privatized systems would have mattered. For example, the U.S. Social Security system has an overhead of less than 4%—in Chile, the fully privatized system (which has since been abandoned) had administrative fees as high as 20%.

The fact that government programs are often cheaper and better run, than privatized programs in everything from healthcare, to transportation to water supplies to trash collection to prison administration to firefighting would have been more important than baseless sound bites about government incompetence repeated endlessly. But facts no longer rule. Now, Plutocrats such as Rupert Murdoch control much of the media and rather than exposing the elephant dung for what it is, they shovel more into our national dialogue, piling it higher and deeper, obscuring the truth rather than revealing it.

The End-Game is Near

The thirty-year Plutocratic plan to take over America is reaching fruition. The Republicans have cleverly played a game of divide and conquer and the Democrats have either been active participants or complicit in their silence. The Plutocrats and their Republican allies have taken away workers' rights, reduced their compensation and eliminated their benefits in the private sector, and now they're coming after the public sector, turning it into an all-purpose bogeyman, responsible for all that ails us.

At a time when all workers are getting screwed, the Republicans and the Plutocrats have managed to make them fight among themselves over a rapidly dwindling share, rather than joining together to demand their equitable share of the national wealth.

Here's the deal. Worker productivity in the private sector has been going steadily up for three decades. That means corporations are making more money off of each hour worked. Yet wages have stagnated over that time, and benefits have shrunk. Where has the wealth from the increased productivity gone? Straight into the pockets of the Plutocrats. For example, in 1966, CEOs made about 50 times the minimum wage. Today, they make more than 821 times minimum wage.

Now that government has been all but vanquished, unions and public employees are the last bastion of individual political power and equitable compensation, and there is a clear and concerted effort to break them and discredit them, once and for all. But rather than protest this economic rape by corporations, too many citizens have been duped or distracted. From flag burners, to immigrants, to gay marriage to abortions, to Technicolor terrorist alerts, to myths about incompetent fat-cat government workers, Republicans have been throwing up flack and creating scapegoats. Public workers are simply the latest distraction.

The takeover has been generously funded, cleverly plotted, patiently played, and skillfully executed.

Democrats, once the Party of labor and the middle class have either actively supported the Plutocratic coup, or stood idly by while it proceeded unopposed. Has Obama championed the efforts of the workers of Wisconsin? Has he used his eloquence to capture their plight and halt this coup? No. He's squandered this week with empty platitudes about small business and he's introduced a budget that essentially endorses the Plutocrat's lies.

What Can We Do?

Citizens, we have a choice. We can confront this Plutocratic coup, or we can draft an apology to our founders, beg the forgiveness of the brave men and women who fought valiantly over the last two centuries to defend the ideals of this country, and then kiss those ideals goodbye.

At the end of the day, we have the three things that can trump money: truth, the vote and market power. If we insist on candid, transparent discussions on the issues of the day; refuse to vote for dirty-money or mealy-mouthed candidates; and punish Plutocrats like Murdoch and Koch and Rove who intentionally distort the truth in the one place where it hurts—the market place—we can win this country back.

It will take commitment, organization, a willingness to endure some hardship, and a passion for justice and fairness—the kind of things that animated exploited workers back when facts mattered, but it can be done. The pieces of a resistance to the Plutocratic coup are coming together.

Russ Feingold has established a PAC called Progressives United with a mission to reverse the infamous Citizens United Decision and get the money out of politics. Bill McKibben's 350.org has announced a campaign called the U.S. Chamber doesn't speak for me.

Van Jones and progressive groups are creating a movement to restore the American Dream—the notion that government isn't a punch line—it is a contract between we the people; a vehicle that enables us to come together to accomplish that which must be done together; that which has, in times past, made us a prosperous, just, and noble nation.

If we back these efforts, we can prevail. If we don't, then the words of Edmund Burke should haunt our conscience as we slide inevitably into a well-deserved Plutocratic dystopia: "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men [and women] do nothing."

(John Atcheson's writing has appeared in the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Baltimore Sun, the San Jose Mercury News, the Memphis Commercial Appeal, as well as in several wonk journals. He is currently at work on a fictional trilogy that centers on climate change. Atcheson's book reviews are featured on Climateprogress.org.)

20110226-01	11:10	Robert	Fw: Divorce Agreement
-------------	-------	--------	-----------------------

Note: I will be on my Bike heading for Fl. Mar. 1st will likely return 13th of March my computer will be off line and down!!——

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Ref: Divorce Agreement

THIS IS SO INCREDIBLY WELL PUT AND I CAN HARDLY BELIEVE IT'S BY A YOUNG PERSON, A STUDENT!!! WHATEVER HE RUNS FOR, I'LL VOTE FOR HIM.

Dear American liberals, leftists, social progressives, socialists, Marxists and Obama supporters, et al:

We have stuck together since the late 1950's for the sake of the kids, but the whole of this latest election process has made me realize that I want a divorce.... I know we tolerated each other for many years for the sake of future generations, but sadly, this relationship has clearly run its course.

Our two ideological sides of America cannot and will not ever agree on what is right for us all, so let's just end it on friendly terms. We can smile and chalk it up to irreconcilable differences and go our own way.

Here is a model separation agreement:

Our two groups can equitably divide up the country by landmass each taking a similar portion. That will be the difficult part, but I am sure our two sides can come to a friendly agreement.. After that, it should be relatively easy! Our respective representatives can effortlessly divide other assets since both sides have such distinct and disparate tastes.

We don't like redistributive taxes so you can keep them. You are welcome to the liberal judges and the ACLU. Since you hate guns and war, we'll take our firearms, the cops, the NRA and the military. We'll take the nasty, smelly oil industry and you can go with wind, solar and biodiesel. You can keep Oprah, Michael Moore and Rosie O'Donnell (You are, however, responsible for finding a bio-diesel vehicle big enough to move all three of them).

We'll keep capitalism, greedy corporations, pharmaceutical companies, Wal-Mart and Wall Street. You can have your beloved lifelong welfare dwellers, food stamps, homeless, homeboys, hippies, druggies and illegal aliens. We'll keep the hot Alaskan hockey moms, greedy CEO's and rednecks. We'll keep the Bibles and give you NBC and Hollywood .

You can make nice with Iran and Palestine and we'll retain the right to invade and hammer places that threaten us. You can have the peaceniks and war protesters. When our allies or our way of life are under assault, we'll help provide them security.

We'll keep our Judeo-Christian values.. You are welcome to Islam, Scientology, Humanism, political correctness and Shirley McClain. You can also have the U.N.. but we will no longer be paying the bill.

We'll keep the SUV's, pickup trucks and oversized luxury cars. You can take every station wagon you can find.

You can give everyone healthcare if you can find any practicing doctors. We'll continue to believe healthcare is a luxury and not a right. We'll keep The Battle Hymn of the Republic and the National Anthem. I'm sure you'll be happy to substitute Imagine, I'd Like to Teach the World to Sing, Kum Ba Ya or We Are the World.

We'll practice trickledown economics and you can continue to give trickle up poverty your best shot. Since it often so offends you, we'll keep our history, our name and our flag.

Would you agree to this? If so, please pass it along to other like minded liberal and conservative patriots and if you do not agree, just hit delete. In the spirit of friendly parting, I'll bet you Answer which one of us will need whose help in 15 years.

Sincerely, John J. Wall, Law Student and an American

P. S. Also, please take Ted Turner, Sean Penn, Martin Sheen, Barbara Streisand, & Jane Fonda with you.

P. S. S. And you won't have to press 1 for English when you call our country.

20110226-02 14:49 Robert Fw: This Should Be Posted in Every School
--

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Isn't life strange? I never met one Veteran who enlisted to Fight for Socialism. [Oh...Ummmmm...uh...I enlisted to fight for socialism and the American way. Actually I was drafted to fight for socialism. —SteveB]

86% will send this on. This should be posted in every school in the U.S. Only 31 words— Think about it

I PLEDGE ALLEGIANCE TO THE FLAG, OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA , AND TO THE REPUBLIC FOR WHICH IT STANDS, ONE NATION UNDER GOD, INDIVISIBLE, WITH LIBERTY AND JUSTICE FOR ALL!

[I believe this is probably already posted in every school. Why not? But if the government is going to require such a pledge of its citizens, when is the government going to make a pledge to its citizens to provide "liberty and justice for all"? —SteveB]

If Muslims can pray on Madison Avenue, why are Christians banned from praying in public and erecting religious displays on their holy days?

[They pretty much aren't. —SteveB]

Tell me again, whose country is this? Ours or the Muslims? I was asked to send this on if I agree, or delete if I don't. It is said that 86% of Americans believe in God.

[I think it's 100% of Muslims. —SteveB]

Therefore I have a very hard time understanding why there is such a problem in having 'In God We Trust' on our money and having 'God' in the Pledge of Allegiance. I believe it's time we stand up for what we believe! If you agree, pass this on, if not, delete

20110227-01 07:28 Skimantom2000 Re: This Should Be Posted in Every School; Healthcare

Dear Robert,

This is bullsh*t!! Let me ask all you right wingers: Why is the United States number 46 in health care in developed countries??? And the top countries (number 1 for sure in health care) all have (oh my GOD) Socialized medicine!! MMMM

When the United States had government controlled health care, we were NUMBER ONE in the world!! "Oh my God figure that" Your boy Richard Milhous "f*ck you" Nixon took care of that!!! Our country (which I can have my say, because I put my life on the line for) is on its last legs because of deregulation!! Mostly the right wing f*cks in our government are the ones who put them there!! I rest my case!!!

20110227-02 17:58 SteveB Re: This Should Be Posted in Every School

Yes, this "socialism" cr*p is just more lies concocted by the Republican lie machine. Almost nothing they say is the truth and thinking people know it. Yes, the state of healthcare, the state of the middle class, the state of infrastructure, the state of national debt, the balance of payments, wise energy policy, the very state of the union is in pathetic condition and the fault can squarely be blamed on the Republicans. (Though the Democrats are not much better at times, but they are more honest and bipartisan.)

The real problem is that all our politicians are corrupt and short-sighted. They think only of how they can get re-elected in the next election, how they can get campaign contributions, and how they can pay back the big contributors. The future of America is the farthest thing from their minds. We need campaign finance reform badly, yet notice that this is something the Republicans never talk about. I could go on and on...

20110302-01 10:38 Phil Fw: Letter to Sen. Alan Simpson About Social Security

[Source of original email unknown. Snopes.com says partly true. (<http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/simpson.asp>) —SteveB]

Alan Simpson, Senator from Wyoming, Co-Chair of Obama's deficit commission, calls senior citizens the "Greediest Generation", as he compared " Social Security " to a Milk Cow with 310 million teats.

Here's a response in a letter from an unknown fellow in Montana, I think he is a little ticked off!

He also tells it like it is! "Hey Alan, let's get a few things straight..

1. As a career politician, you have been on the public dole for FIFTY YEARS.
2. I have been paying Social Security taxes for 48 YEARS (since I was 15 years old. I am now 63).
3. My Social Security payments, and those of millions of other Americans, were safely tucked away in an interest bearing account for decades until you political pukers decided to raid the account and give OUR money to a bunch of zero ambition losers in return for votes, thus bankrupting the system and turning Social Security into a Ponzi scheme that would have made Bernie Madoff proud.

4. Recently, just like Lucy & Charlie Brown, you and your ilk pulled the proverbial football away from millions of American seniors nearing retirement and moved the goalposts for full retirement from age 65 to age 67.. NOW, you and your shill commission is proposing to move the goalposts YET AGAIN.

5. I, and millions of other Americans, have been paying into Medicare from Day One, and now you morons propose to change the rules of the game. Why? Because you idiots mismanaged other parts of the economy to such an extent that you need to steal money from Medicare to pay the bills.

6. I, and millions of other Americans, have been paying income taxes our entire lives, and now you propose to increase our taxes yet again. Why? Because you incompetent bastards spent our money so profligately that you just kept on spending even after you ran out of money. Now, you come to the American taxpayers and say you need more to pay off YOUR debt.

To add insult to injury, you label us "greedy" for calling "bullsh*t" on your incompetence. Well, Captain Bullsh*t, I have a few questions for YOU:

1. How much money have you earned from the American taxpayers during your pathetic 50-year political career?
2. At what age did you retire from your pathetic political career, and how much are you receiving in annual retirement benefits from the American taxpayers?
3. How much do you pay for YOUR government provided health insurance?
4. What cuts in YOUR retirement and healthcare benefits are you proposing in your disgusting deficit reduction proposal, or, as usual, have you exempted yourself and your political cronies?

It is you, Captain Bullsh*t, and your political co-conspirators who are "greedy". It is you and they who have bankrupted America and stolen the American dream from millions of loyal, patriotic taxpayers. And for what Votes? That's right, sir. You and yours have bankrupted America for the sole purpose of advancing your pathetic political careers. You know it, we know it, and you know that we know it.

And you can take that to the bank, you miserable son of a b*tch.

PASS IT ON!!!! And I say double miserable. This is a good one!!! This should be Posted in every school in the U.S.

20110303-01	12:03	Marci	Fw: And God Created Montana
-------------	-------	-------	-----------------------------

I love it.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

And God Created Montana ...

God was missing for six days. Eventually, Michael, the archangel, found him, resting on the seventh day.

He inquired, "Where have you been?"

God smiled deeply and proudly pointed downwards through the clouds, "Look, Michael. Look what I've made."

Archangel Michael looked puzzled, and said, "What is it?"

"It's a planet," replied God, and I've put life on it. I'm going to call it Earth and it's going to be a place to test Balance."

"Balance?" inquired Michael, "I'm still confused."

God explained, pointing to different parts of Earth. "For example, northern Europe will be a place of great opportunity and wealth, while southern Europe is going to be poor. Over here I've placed a continent of white people, and over there is a continent of black people. Balance in all things."

God continued pointing to different countries. "This one will be extremely hot, while this one will be very cold and covered in ice."

The Archangel, impressed by God's work, then pointed to a land area and said, "What's that one?"

"That's Montana, the most glorious place on earth. There are beautiful mountains, rivers and streams, lakes, forests, hills, and plains. The people from Montana are going to be handsome, modest, intelligent, and humorous, and they are going to travel the world. They will be extremely sociable, hardworking, high achieving, carriers of peace, and producers of good things."

Michael gasped in wonder and admiration, but then asked, "But what about balance, God? You said there would be balance."

God smiled, "I will create Washington, D.C. Wait till you see the idiots I put there."

20110303-02 18:12 Dennis "Fighting Over Crumbs Left from Military Spending"

Who took your cookie?

"Fighting Over Crumbs Left from Military Spending" by Laura Flanders, CommonDreams

Mar. 3, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/view/2011/03/03-14>)

There's been a joke going around the labor protests. It goes something like this:

A union member, a CEO and a Tea Party member are sitting at a table with 12 cookies. The CEO grabs 11, turns to the Tea Partier and says "The Union's out to take your cookie!"

I've been thinking that the joke applies pretty well to another situation. For instance, the military. Our military spending grabs 11 cookies and leaves us all battling over the 12th.

Christopher Hellman at TomDispatch added up all the military-related spending in the budget and came to a startling number: for fiscal year 2012, the actual military budget is something like $1.2 trillion dollars.

Trillion with a T.

Just to put that in perspective for a second, a million seconds is 12 days. A trillion seconds is 31,688 years.

So after all that cash is gone, what are we left with? Not a whole heck of a lot for the rest of us. "Discretionary" spending is nearly 40% of the budget, but if Hellman's numbers are accurate, that $1.2 trillion eats up nearly 90% of discretionary funds, leaving just 10% for the rest of us. (That doesn't include mandatory spending on things like Social Security and Medicare, which are separate.)

To be fair, Tea Partiers have called for military spending cuts, too. Rand Paul, hardly a progressive, pointed out that you could cut all of the non-military discretionary spending and not balance the budget—and Politifact rated it True.

The point behind the joke still holds, though. Instead of fighting over the last crumbs, maybe it's time to team up and grab some of the cookies back from the people who've been hanging on to far more than their share.

20110304-01 09:45 SteveB Re: "Fighting Over Crumbs Left from Military Spending"

Dear Dennis,

Yep, just like Eisenhower warned 50-some years ago!

But all we need is a third war in Libya and everything will be OK!

20110304-02 10:52 SteveB Apple iPad 2

Dear Ben.

Looks like Apple got the iPad 2 right, with Wi-Fi and USB and all. The new Kindle with Wi-Fi and free 3G for life in 100 countries (including Bolivia) is looking pretty cool too. Still glad I sold my Apple stock at $345 (bought at $90-something). I don't think they're going to go too much higher, but if they do, more power to 'em! Now, if I could just get out of my pharmaceutical stocks with a profit!

20110304-03 23:47 Jim Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

I am writing to about everybody in my contact list who lives in Indiana or has ties to Indiana because I am very concerned with the concerted attack on public education by the governor and his cronies like Tony Bennett. I don't usually do something like this but it is a crisis.

I thank the Democratic legislators who left the state to delay action long enough for people to examine the proposals themselves and apply some common sense and pressure on the Republicans, but I am concerned that most people have not done that.

The children and taxpayers of Indiana will suffer greatly if these bills pass and the vengeful Republicans have the votes to force it through the House as soon as they have a quorum. I don't think it can be stopped in the Senate either without a public outcry.

There are a number of bad provisions around but the bill that concerns me most is HB 1479. This sounds like it is concerned for turning around bad schools, but they have done the testing in such a way that all high schools in South Bend and Mishawaka could be given over to a special team set up by or contracted by the state board of education that can be profit-making company. That team can then replace all the teachers and administrators with their own choice of staff and only 51 per cent of the new teachers need to be certified. The team can take over all the buildings and contents with a lease payment of $1 per year for five years. They have five years to make what the state agrees is acceptable progress and if they do they can transform themselves into an independent school district and get all the same tuition money and building funds as a regular corporation. This could mean six or more school districts in St Joseph county.

For some reason the Republicans are also after local school boards as well as teachers. They want to make each building principal responsible for hiring and firing all the teachers in his/her building rather than having the board and superintendent involved.

In licensing for teaching they are removing the current advisory board that works with the state board and actually has people on it who have taught or are involved with preparing teachers.

I hope more citizens will talk to teachers they know and trust and talk with their legislators. If nothing is done to stop it we will have a very centralized school system run from Indianapolis by politicians and their friends who can make a buck at public expense.

20110305-01 08:30 SteveB Coffee Party

<http://www.coffeepartyusa.com/>

20110305-02 12:03 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

THE REPREHENSIBLE REPUBLICAN ATTACKS ON THE EDUCATION OF AMERICA'S CHILDREN!

GEE, LET'S BALANCE THE BUDGET ON THE BACKS OF OUR CHILDREN AND OUR FUTURE, INSTEAD OF MAKING THE CHEAPSKATE RICH PAY THEIR FAIR SHARE!

AH, GOOD IDEA!

20110305-03 12:55 AliceMarie Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear SteveB,

In response to SteveB, first, I have not lived in Indiana since 1975, so I know none of the back story of what is happening. My connection is that Jim was a teacher for me back in Mishawaka and continues as such even today with his "virtual" teaching via educational (and funny) emails. Second, during this recession/depression/QE2 economic disaster of the last few years, at the federal level at least, blame should be borne on both sides of the aisle. Obama's QE2 and darned nigh everything else he and his corporatist crew have done has worked to steal from the little guys to give to the rich.

I grew up the daughter of a man who supported his children (and the leftovers his wife brought from her 1st marriage) by working in the bowels of Ball Band—UniRoyal for those who came lately to Mishawaka, Indiana. As a result of "the union," in the mid-1950s, my father gained health care coverage for his family. As a result of the strength of the union, things were good—for a while. However, it was also because of "the union" that there was a six-month strike in 1967-1968 that ended with a nickel an hour raise. And that strike happened because "the union" had become full of itself and refused to police members and make sure that the side paying the wages was getting its full due from all members of the union. And anyone with Michiana connections knows what happened to all of those good "union jobs" in Michiana in the years soon after the '67-'68 six-month strike where "the union" had the gall to look at its members after six months of no wages and say, "We won a nickel an hour for you."

Regarding the overall economic mess, we are fooling ourselves if we pretend this is just "Republicans trying to steal from children to give to or to protect 'the rich.'" Damned nigh EVERYTHING Obama (a Democrat) and his crew have done since taking office has done no more than steal from the poor and from our children's future to protect the wealthy fat-back bankers and corporatists. If you imagine today's disasters can be analyzed in the form of "GOP = working for the rich, and Dems = working for the poor and the downtrodden," you're not seeing or comprehending what has been happening in this country. And if you understand so little, please don't try to paint in your big (and ignorant) brush strokes. And, yes, I agreed with what Jim had to say enough—and I respect him enough—that I did a copy & paste of his message and sent it to over 250 people from the Mishawaka High School Class of 1968.

But overall, the economic disasters of today are not a case of being able to call the Democrats—lead at the top by Obama—as "the good guys." Obama's QE2 and Obama's bank bailout and Obama's funding money to corporations have been nothing more than taking from the poor and giving to the wealthy.

As my son says, "We can debate over whether it is right to take from the rich and give to the poor after we agree that doing the opposite is criminal." And, thus far, except for a few "crumbs to the starving," everything that Obama and his crew have done has been a case of taking from the poor and giving to the rich and powerful.

20110305-04 12:56 DaveY Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear SteveB,

We are having the same problem in Arizona, not only is Gov. Brewer cutting educational funding by 30%, she is cutting out Medicaid for 250,000 residents (mostly the poor and elderly). So, Steve, lets add balancing the budget on the backs of the poor and elderly too. I am not Democratic nor Republican, but this is just wrong, ethically, morally, and humanitarianly (new word). How shortsighted these politicians are!!! And here's the kicker—they are making it legal for people to carry guns in schools—that should prove real interesting!

20110305-05 13:00 Bill Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear DaveY,

Not quite that bad here but not too far behind.

20110305-06 14:37 SteveBA Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear Bill,

Every year the education lobby asks for more money or children will be stupid, so we give them more money and they are still stupid. There needs to be a change made, after all doing the same thing over and over and expecting a different result is the definition of insanity. I think that it costs us $10,000 a year to educate our children, so we aren't getting our money's worth. Where is the problem, let's start with the ISTA and a bloated bureaucratic structure. In the end we are out of money and we can only support so much, so everything is on the table. Does anyone here not think we can get more for less when have thrown so much money at the problem.

20110305-07 17:53 SteveG Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Hunger, poverty, illnesses, drugs, not having a home, single parents, parents working 2 or more jobs or both parents working all play a part in the decline of the education of American children! If we are truly concerned about our youth and their education a holistic approach needs to be taken rather than a systematic tearing apart of the systems that support youth and their education. The Ben Davis school corporation gave a retiring superintendent a $1M retirement package. None of the school board read the contract when they voted on it. Indiana has counties with population around 35,000 supporting 3-4 school corporations: Montgomery (3), Clinton (4), Putnam (3.5—Cloverdale consolidated with a school corporation from Owen County decades ago). The township systems in Indiana holds a billion dollars worth of unspent and non-invested money because no one wants to give up control of the money or use it as intended. The problem and the solutions are complex and need to be examined individually and collectively in order to solve the problem.

20110305-08 20:23 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

SteveBA,

Yet teachers are still underpaid. Take a look at what it costs to live in America!

Despite all the problems, America's school must be among the world's best. I make that judgment based on three things:

1. My experience with the public schools I and my friends attended.
2. My experience with the public schools my children and friends' children attended.
3. The fact that the world seems to want to come here to attend our schools and universities. Why? Because they largely work, despite underfunding.

Maybe it's time to pony up for our children's education instead of over-funding war and the development of China and India. I say that without prejudice. What other country doesn't place the welfare of its own citizens first?

Republicans have lowered the tax rates to the point where no public structure can be maintained except the war machine. Maybe it's time for that to change.

20110306-01 06:54 Susette Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear SteveBA,

Come on down to a school and give being a teacher a try before your start spouting your invectives. I dare you.

I work at a school every day and in my opinion anyone who is critical of schools had better jump right in. And if you don't have time to give up your lucrative (compared to a teacher's) career come one hour a week and mentor a child who needs just one person who will change their life.

By the way if there were no public school education you would have paid about $10,000 per child for a private school education—or more. Or whatever pittance you think your own children's education is worth.

20110306-02 08:05 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear Susette,

Right on!

[Personal content removed. —SteveB]

20110306-03 08:20 Jim Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Video: <http://www.thedailyshow.com/watch/thu-march-3-2011/diane-ravitch>

Here is a link to Jon Stuart's show. You may have to search for Mar. 3 since new ones will be there too. He does his bit first talking about WI and the governors claim about how rich the teachers are compared to others (although like CBS news pointed out if you compare them to others who also have a bachelor's degree they are lower.)

But then he shows all the talking heads when the discussion was going on about extending the Bush tax cuts and the idea of limiting it to families with less than $250,000 and the comment were all about how nobody can live well on just $250,000.

After that he has Diane Raditch on talking about her book and the effect of poverty on children's readiness to learn.

It is the full show and takes a while but I thought it was well done.

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

Fellow Educators and Friends of Education:

I would like you to watch this and share it with anyone who cares about Education in America. It is available at www.TheDailyShow.com and will probably be available on Facebook. The show is from Mar. 3. I don't know what you think of Jon Stewart or The Comedy Channel but I believe this is an important message.

Diane Ravitch (The Death and Life of the Great American School System) will be a guest on THE DAILY SHOW WITH JON STEWART on the Comedy Channel at 11:00pm Thursday night Mar. 3. It will be rebroadcast at 1:30am, 9:30am, and at 1:00pm and 7:00pm on Friday. I think it might be worth watching. I think Stewart is one of the few insightful, sane, and honest voices on Television. He has been mocking Republican Governors and their approach to School Reform and Unions. Daniels has been mentioned a couple of times.

Video: <http://www.thedailyshow.com/watch/thu-march-3-2011/diane-ravitch>

20110306-04 08:44 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear Alice Marie,

I appreciate your thoughtful reply. I agree with much you say. I have been writing for a long time that both parties are almost totally corrupted by our campaign finance system, which creates nothing but politicians whose hunger for power leaves them deeply indebted to the "fat cats" and, apparently, foreign interests. I agree that I, too, have been disappointed by Mr. Obama.

But it is the Republican ideologues who have led the attack on education, which is the present subject.

It is the Republicans who led the fights during the Reagan and GW Bush administrations to reduce taxes to the point of national bankruptcy, especially the taxes on the "fat cats". This with the promise that the economy and all Americans would benefit. Where is the benefit? Surely this policy has been proven to be the stupidest idea of all time.

It is the Republicans who lead the present and led past attacks on unions. I agree with you that there have been union abuses. But, though not guaranteed by the Constitution the way gun ownership is, surely human beings in America have the right to organize and collectively bargain? Read your history books about what working conditions were like for American's before the unions came along. Read Upton Sinclair's The Jungle, for example. I have seen with my own eyes the abject working conditions here in America sans unions, and in Mexico, China, and Indonesia where so many workers are virtual slaves.

By the way, it was the Republicans who bailed-out Wall St., not Obama, though I think this was a good move and so did Obama. In fact, the government seems to be making a nice profit on the deal. But it was Bush and his stupid wars and overspending that led us to the very brink and to the Great Recession itself. So, your idea of Republican-Democrat equal culpability, though I am no Democrat, I find to be simply incorrect.

20110306-05 11:05 Bill Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear Steve(s) et al.,

Great to audit the discourse and debate and gotta throw in my own two cents' worth, mainly from the middle:

At the state level, where borrowing capacities are far, far smaller than that of the federal government, the budgets pretty much have to be balanced. (It's a constitutional requirement in Indiana, for example, although long term financings confined to a sovereign entity, e. g. a municipality building a bridge, are allowed.) It seems to be that the burden must be jointly shouldered, and what I'm talking about is both a bit more taxation and forbearance on the part of those paid from public funds. Both of these may be anathema to respective viewpoints, but the political process, if operating properly, openly, and honestly, can sort it out. I would acknowledge, with others commenting in this string, that I received a decent public school education and that a public education is all that most people will get. Bludgeoning the teachers by removing their right to bargain collectively is a harsh measure; the political changes precipitated in the last election have brought it to that in many states. The public's gratitude to schools and recognition of their importance may cause that harsh measure to be tempered. Abrasion of the two (or more) sides may be productive in finding compromise. These tough times demand it; Ideological victory is a luxury no one should be allowed to have now.

At the federal level, the need for a balanced budget is far, far more aggravated. I'm sympathetic with the stimulus program and to some degree with bailing out the financial firms that are the nexus of the operation of capitalism. Without these, we'd probably be in for a new iteration of the Great Depression and near insuperable unemployment for God knows how long. The national debt, however, must be dealt with. So often, it seems, Washington, D. C., cannot discipline itself or act without a crisis. The debt now approaches $14 trillion, and debt service on that nearly unreckonable amount will swallow us, if reversal does not materialize—somehow. Our government, a la Argentina and many other undisciplined republics, can inflate the currency and take other sleazy methods to diminish the debt-service load, but, if the load becomes too great, failure to pay means that the treasury won't be able to borrow—at which time the crisis in Biblical proportion is here and government becomes shaky. I suppose there isn't any way a politician can be elected by saying he or she intends to raise taxes, radically cut programs, reduce military spending while staying the hell out of more wars, and temporize on Social Security payments (God forbid!). That is one of democracy's problems; I'll just hope that politicians who do have guts enough to walk that line will find a way to lead.

20110306-06 12:25 AliceMarie Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear SteveB,

I suspect we would agree on little, and my opinion is that you are way wrong on much of your "analysis."

Regarding unions, you didn't see me write that I am opposed to unions, only that there can be and have been problems resulting from unions that become corrupt themselves and that refuse to police members. I don't know about you, but I grew up dirt poor. Jim has known me since I was in 7th grade and he was a young teacher. He has some knowledge of the poverty I grew up in, but not complete knowledge.

Regarding who bailed out Wall Street, that was a joint deal between Bush II and Obama. Don't kid yourself, and don't try to fool others. Save your broad strokes for the ignorant.

The Democratic Party of today long ago walked away from what it was as I grew up. As I understand, you have lived outside the U.S. for many years, and I suspect you may be a little less familiar with what's happening here and perhaps a little more interested in the situation and circumstances existing where you now have your life based.

No matter. That initial knee-jerk response you sent to all of the folks whom Jim wrote about the teacher situation in Indiana was ignorant and typical of left wing liberals who grew up with more privilege than I grew up with. Both of my adult children have been unemployed for about two years now. One had been self-employed and therefore had ZERO unemployment insurance compensation. They are not alone in their circumstances. Things are not good in the U.S.

People are hurting lots. Obama was put in because he was "anyone but Bush," but Obama has shown himself to be equally evil, and Dems who want to beat up on the GOP simply because it's the only song they know aren't part of the solution. There are bad things happening in the U.S. now. You are not on the ground here and cannot see, feel, or comprehend them. Another man on Jim's list responded privately to my tirade basically said my analysis was correct. He's a Ph.D./J.D. economist at U. of Chicago.

So, you began by reading Jim's plea for help to oppose one specific piece of legislation in Indiana and moved it into the typical left-wing attitude of "the GOP are rich and greedy and Bush was awful." Then you misread my comments regarding unions, suggest that I might not have read Upton Sinclair, and suggest that I want to get rid of all labor unions. And then you allow yourself to go back to blaming the GOP for the economic meltdown.

Might I suggest that, regarding the mortgage disaster which is behind much of the economic mess, some big Dems were major causes of the problem. It was the Barney Frank & Pelosi duo who shouted that home ownership was a RIGHT in the U.S., and who promoted the risky mortgage lending that was imposed by the federal government on lenders, and on Fannie and Freddie, who then were forced to buy the often worthless paper.

You've been gone from the U.S. for a long time. [Who says? —SteveB] The Dems no longer are seen as the men in white hats looking out for the little guys.

Talking about "the cheapskate rich" not wanting to "pay their fair share" really does no more than say that all you want done is a redistribution of wealth. Well, your powerful and elected Dems have done lots to redistribute it their way. NEVER, NEVER, NEVER trust a man who became wealthy as a politician. Obama has gained his wealth that way. Bill Clinton gained his wealth that way. Pelosi gained her wealth that way.

The Dems put Obama into the White House. They will have to deal with that shame for decades.

I should end this. We have the mutual friend of Jim, but you and I should simply agree to disagree.

20110307-01	12:40	Dale	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools & "Public vs. Private—Two Entirely Different Animals" & "Time to Restore Voter Control: End the Government-Union Monopoly"
-----------------------------	-------	------	--

Dear SteveB,

I live in Wisconsin and have been bombarded with rhetoric from both sides; however, there are some fundamental differences between Public Unions and Private Unions which conveniently get swept under the rug. Perhaps reading the following will help clear up your very fuzzy thinking.

It has been further reported locally that the Public Unions, the teachers' union in particular, are the major sources of campaign funds for the Democrat Senators who are hiding in Illinois right now. Without their financial support, the election/re-election of these people could be severely affected.

This is in concert with your thesis that the political system is corrupt and basically FUBAR. What we are seeing in Wisconsin and other states is a shakeout of at least one element of the corruption. Will it lead to excesses on the other side? Probably, unfortunately.

"Public vs. Private—Two Entirely Different Animals" posted by Brian Lehman, Pundit League

Mar. 1, 2011, (<http://www.punditleague.us/editorials/public-vs-private-two-entirely-different-animals/>)

[“Perhaps the most frequently uttered word on the news the past few weeks has been “union”. Most of it has centered on the events going on in Wisconsin, but term is not alien to even ESPN, as negotiations begin between the players and owners in the NFL. The first affects the fiscal health of our nation; the second affects whether or not the NFL will play next fall. So, in importance, they are roughly equal. But that is besides the point.” Omitted by Dale.—SteveB] The real thing lacking from coverage of these union debates is the crucial difference between private and public unions.

This distinction is missed by those on both sides of the debate. Those on the left, largely supportive of unions, continue to portray the reforms proposed by Governors Walker, Christie and others as attacks on unions in general. At the same time, many on the right, opposed to unions for both political and ideological reasons, also continue to misunderstand the difference. Both sides are missing the fact that most of what people think of as union successes, such as limits to the work week, child labor, etc. are entirely the doing of private unions. Public unions, on the other hand, are a more recent phenomenon and have little in common with their private brethren.

A private union is, and should be, an example of voluntary association. The rights of free association are crucial to the functioning of a free market system, and thus private unions are going to be a part of any free economy. The market has largely relegated these unions to control over a small portion of the workforce, as their usefulness has decreased and the burdens they impose have weighed many companies down. But this process should be controlled by market forces, not by the decisions of government either for or against unionization. For this reason both liberal and conservative attempts to encourage or limit unions should be very limited. For example, there needs to be a healthy debate over whether “right to work” laws are an appropriate intervention. In short, the subject of private unions is one in which good faith individuals can take various positions while still operating within a common intellectual framework.

Public unions, on the other hand, are a very different beast. Instead of regulating the differences between management and employees, these unions involve two parties that are deeply joined—public workers and politicians. In this system, the workers actually do elect their bosses. Through political action they have immense influence in choosing who will negotiate with them. Because of this, the “management” has little incentive to do anything but accede to union demands, lest their own careers be affected. And because the government does not have to worry about going out of business, the natural market forces do not have any effect. In short, it’s an inherently corrupt system that is essentially designed to lead to unsustainable results.

Both sides must then be clear on this. It is deeply dishonest for liberals to continue to conflate the two types of unions as the same thing. This is done for the sole reason of imputing the occasionally celebrated history of private unions on their twisted public counterparts. At the same time, though, conservatives must make clear that the common perception of unions has nothing to do with public unions. [“We have an extraordinary chance to make a very strong moral and ideological case against the unionization of public employees. We can’t get dragged down by generalized anti-unionism. By understanding a bit about the difference between public and private unions, we can make a much more convincing case.” This is what Dale left out here. Note the strategizing about how the party-line can disseminated. —SteveB]

"Time to Restore Voter Control: End the Government-Union Monopoly" by James Sherk, Heritage Foundation

Feb. 25, 2011, (<http://www.heritage.org/research/reports/2011/02/time-to-restore-voter-control-end-the-government-union-monopoly>)

(Abstract: With Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker attempting to rein in the unbalanced power of government unions, and given the fierce stranglehold that union members have on their ever-increasing taxpayer-provided benefits, now is a crucial time for Americans to understand the difference between private-sector and public-sector unions. Collective bargaining in the private sphere—where companies face competition—is a world away from collective bargaining in government—which faces no competition, and where unions have a legal monopoly. Heritage Foundation labor expert James Sherk explains why it is time to restore voter control over elected government, and how it can be done.)

Collective bargaining by unions takes place very differently in government than it does in the private sector. Private-sector unions have competitors and bargain over the profits they help create. The government earns no profits. Government unions have a legal monopoly and bargain for a greater share of tax dollars. Collective bargaining in government means that voters' elected representatives must agree on tax and spending decisions with union representatives.

Collective bargaining also politicizes the civil service. Government unions negotiate contract provisions that force workers to join and subsidize their fundraising. These subsidies have made them the top political spenders in the country. They use that money to lobby for higher taxes and protect their inflated compensation. America can no longer afford these special-interest subsidies. State and local governments should:

- Restore voter control over government spending by ending collective bargaining with government unions.
- Restore a nonpartisan civil service by ending subsidies for union fundraising and giving workers the choice of paying union dues. Voters should tell the government how to spend their money, not the other way around.

Collective Bargaining: The Process

Under collective bargaining, a union is designated as the employees' "exclusive bargaining representative." The employer must negotiate with the union over pay, benefits, and work rules. The employer may not employ workers for anything other than the union-negotiated terms. This gives the union a monopoly on the labor supplied to an employer. Even if other workers would take the job, the employer may not hire them for anything other than union rates.

The Private and Public Sectors

The labor movement grew out of the difficult working conditions of the industrial revolution. The founders of the labor movement saw unions as a way to prevent employers from exploiting workers. They also believed that labor and capital were opposed to one another. They believed that workers and management fought to divide the profits they mutually created. Labor leaders wanted monopoly bargaining power to gain clout to win more of those profits. Competition moderates union demands in the private sector. Unions know that excessive pay makes their employer uncompetitive and puts their jobs at risk.

The government operates very differently. Government employees need not fear exploitive bosses. Since the late 1800's, public employees have enjoyed the protection of civil service laws. The government also creates no profits over which to bargain. Government unions bargain for a greater share of taxes to go to their members. Since the government has no competitors and no profits, unions have little reason to restrain their demands and government has little incentive to resist them. Taxpayers, not government leaders, bear the cost of concessions.

The arguments for unions in the private sector do not apply to government. Up through the 1950s, the union movement recognized and agreed with this analysis. Movement supporters believed, as AFL-CIO president George Meany did, that "It is impossible to bargain collectively with government." President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who signed the National Labor Relations Act, had the same view. In his words, "the process of collective bargaining, as usually understood, cannot be transplanted into the public service."

Strikes Paralyze Public Services

Private businesses have competitors. Consequently, private-sector strikes have a limited effect on the general public. Consumers can buy from another company during a strike. A strike by the United Auto Workers against General Motors does not shut down the auto industry—Americans simply buy cars from Ford or Toyota instead.

The government generally has no competition. The public cannot purchase alternative police; alternatives to public education and mass transit are not accessible to everyone. A monopoly on essential services gives government unions tremendous leverage to force concessions from the public. Unless the voters' elected representatives give in, they can grind large parts of the economy to a halt.

Unions are willing to use this leverage. Detroit public school teachers went on strike illegally in 2006. The teachers union ignored the Michigan law prohibiting teacher strikes. As a result, 130,000 students started the school year late while the union pressed for concessions. The final contract gave the Detroit teachers raises. In Dec., 2005, New York City transit workers went on strike over a proposal to increase their contributions to their pension plans. The strike paralyzed New York City during the busiest shopping days of the year and cost the city an estimated $400 million a day. The government ultimately agreed to a new contract that did not increase pension contributions.

President Roosevelt deplored the possibility of strikes if government bargained collectively: "A strike of public employees manifests nothing less than an intent on their part to prevent or obstruct the operations of Government until their demands are satisfied. Such action, looking toward the paralysis of Government by those who have sworn to support it, is unthinkable and intolerable."

Binding Arbitration Imposes Terms

Many states recognize the danger of public-sector strikes and have passed laws that prohibit government unions from striking. Instead, "binding arbitration" resolves disputes between the government and unions. Under binding arbitration both unions and management make their case to an arbitrator. The arbitrator considers their arguments and hands down a contract which is binding on both sides. The voters' elected representatives may not choose a different plan. The taxpayers must pay whatever the arbitrator awards, which is often quite generous. Studies show that binding arbitration significantly raises the cost of employing government workers.

Representative Government Undermined

Collective bargaining gives unions a monopoly on the labor supplied to government. This takes away the final say on government policy from the voters' elected representatives. Elected representatives must negotiate with unions over acceptable spending and policy decisions. State and local governments cannot hire nonunion employees to work for different terms. If the government and unions disagree, the union can strike against the public or call in an arbitrator to impose terms.

Collective bargaining forces elected representatives to negotiate a contract with union leaders, excluding all other citizens and potential workers from the bargaining table. Voters' representatives do not fully control spending and tax decisions. They must reach agreement with union leaders who are unaccountable to the general public. This undermines the principle of voter sovereignty. Union leaders once recognized and opposed this. As recently as 1959, the AFL-CIO Executive Council stated flatly that "In terms of accepted collective bargaining procedures, government workers have no right beyond the authority to petition Congress—a right available to every citizen."

Inflated Government Pay

Nonetheless, many state governments decided to bargain collectively. As a result, state and local government employees now earn above-market compensation.

In terms of cash wages, state and local government employees' earnings are comparable to similar private-sector workers, but they receive much more generous benefits. As of Feb., 2011, for instance, government employees in Wisconsin contributed almost nothing to their defined-benefit pension plans, and paid only 6 percent of their health care premiums. In the private sector, workers pay 18 percent of their premiums for single plans and 29 percent for family plans. Including the value of these benefits, state and local government employees earn noticeably more than their private-sector counterparts.

The public pays for these benefits with higher taxes and less spending on other priorities. Some union-funded organizations, such as the Economic Policy Institute, contend that state and local government employees are underpaid. These groups arrive at this conclusion using data from the National Compensation Survey (NCS). The NCS measures private-sector compensation accurately. But for government compensation, it only measures employer pay expenditures—not the value of what the government promises to pay. Thus, the NCS ignores the value of promised pension benefits for which the government has not set aside enough money. It also ignores the value of retiree health benefits.

These benefits systematically inflate government pay. The NCS also omits the value of the strong job security that government employees receive. Studies based on NCS data systematically undercount the value of government benefits, which leads to the claim that state workers are underpaid.

Using Government to Serve Private Interests

Government unions use collective bargaining to profit at the public's expense in ways that go beyond pay. Unions can negotiate contract provisions that direct public resources to the union. The Wisconsin Education Association (WEA) runs a health insurance plan known as WEA Trust. WEA Trust premiums outstrip those of competing insurance carriers. During collective bargaining, however, WEA presses school districts to purchase health insurance through WEA Trust. Currently 64 percent of Wisconsin school districts do so. Allowing school districts to purchase competitively priced health insurance would save Wisconsin taxpayers $68 million a year.

Collective bargaining also enables unions to negotiate work rules that benefit their members at the expense of quality public services. During negotiations, government unions typically insist on seniority pay and job security. No matter how hard or little they work, they will earn the same amount. This eliminates most of the incentive to shine on the job.

Standard pay regardless of performance also hurts the public. School districts find it almost impossible to reward good teachers or fire bad ones. One study has found that merely replacing the worst performing 5 percent of teachers with average quality teachers would move the U.S. near the top of international math and science rankings. Union contracts that prevent schools from replacing failing teachers hurt children.

Unions further negotiate provisions that benefit them institutionally at their members' expense. Many government employees oppose their union's agenda. In the 28 states without right-to-work laws, however, unions negotiate contracts that require government employees to pay union dues or lose their jobs. Unions also negotiate large subsidies for their fundraising. They negotiate for the government to collect union dues through its payroll system. This spares unions the expense of doing their own fundraising.

Without these provisions unions would bring in far less money. Federal law gives most federal employees the choice of belonging to a union. Most choose not to join. The federal unionization rate is only 18 percent—far lower than for states like Wisconsin, where 50 percent of state and local government employees belong to unions.

Politicized Civil Service

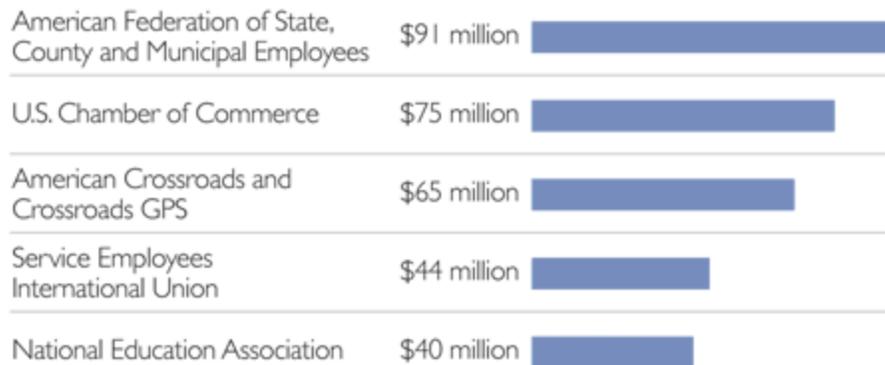

America has embraced the principle of a nonpartisan civil service for more than a century. Government employees should serve the public under the law and under lawful direction of elected officials—not the interests of the union or whichever political party the union favors. Collective bargaining in government politicizes the civil service—because government unions negotiate and decide how much voters and taxpayers will pay for government services. To achieve greater concessions, they campaign for supportive politicians to be their bosses. When they succeed, unions control both sides of the bargaining table: Labor and management will collude to raise government salaries at taxpayer expense.

Unions' special legal privileges give them enormous financial clout. Nationwide, 5.5 million state and local government employees must either pay union dues or lose their jobs. The government subsidizes the collection of these forced dues with its payroll system, raising billions of dollars for government unions.

Part of this money goes to pay union leaders' generous salaries. Gerald McEntee, President of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) earned $376,000 in base salary in 2009. But government unions spend far more of their money on politics. In the election year of 2008, AFSCME's national headquarters spent 32 percent of its budget—$63.3 million—on political activities and lobbying. Local AFSCME chapters spent millions more.

Three of Top Five Political Spenders Are Government Unions

Non-Political-Party Spending During 2009–2010 Election Cycle

Sources: Brody Mullins and John McKinnon, "Campaign's Big Spender," The Wall Street Journal, October 22, 2010; and Steven Greenhouse, "Union Spends $91 Million on Midterms," The Caucus, New York Times Blog, October 22, 2010.

Chart I • B 2522 heritage.org

Government-employee unions now spend more than any other outside group on U.S. elections. Of the five largest spenders in the 2010 election cycle outside of political parties, three were unions that represent government employees. AFSCME took the top spot, spending $91 million to elect its members' bosses. That total dwarfed the Chamber of Commerce's $75 million, and the $65 million raised by Republican Party-allied groups. As Larry Scanlon, head of AFSCME's political operation said: "We're the big dog, but we don't like to brag." This spending gives government unions significant political power.

Government unions use this power to campaign for higher taxes and more government employees—in order to increase union membership and the amount of money flowing to the union from dues. They are the driving force behind most campaigns to raise taxes and prevent budget cuts. They attempt to make government expansion the path of least political resistance. If politicians refuse to support this agenda, government unions will use their power to defeat them.

At times they state this openly. A Service Employees International Union (SEIU) representative told California legislators that "We helped to get you into office, and we got a good memory. And come November, if you don't back our program, we'll help get you out of office." Collective bargaining has thoroughly politicized the civil service in many states. Increasingly—and contrary to basic democratic principles—it is union leaders, not elected officials, who essentially decide how much taxes people pay, and how the government will spend those taxes.

A Policy Choice

Institutional collective bargaining was a policy decision made by state and local governments. Labor unions had traditionally opposed collective bargaining in government. During the 1950s, private-sector union membership peaked and began to decline. The union movement then came to see government employees as valuable new dues-paying members. It reversed its stance on government bargaining in the late 1950s. Beginning with New York City in 1958 and Wisconsin in 1959, many state and local governments across the country began to bargain collectively, largely as a result of union pressure.

Many other states concluded that this decision was a mistake. While 25 states have comprehensive collective-bargaining laws, the remaining 25 states limit collective bargaining for some or all classes of government employees. Voters can exercise full control over their government. Some states, such as Virginia, ban collective bargaining by government unions outright.

Restoring Voter Control and a Nonpartisan Civil Service

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker has proposed restoring voters' control over their elected government. He proposes eliminating negotiations over government benefits and work rules, and requires voters to approve any wage increases beyond inflation. These changes allow Governor Walker to reduce the generosity of government health and pension benefits to close Wisconsin's budget gap.

Walker also proposes significant steps to restore a nonpartisan civil service: He would allow government employees in Wisconsin to keep their jobs without paying union dues. Unions would have to demonstrate support among employees in an annual secret-ballot vote in order to remain recognized as the employees' bargaining representative. The state government would also end collection of union dues through its payroll system. The changes would remove the special privileges that inflate government unions' political clout.

Other states should follow Wisconsin's lead and cease collective bargaining with government unions. Government collective bargaining raises the cost of public services, politicizes the civil service, and directs tax dollars to special interests. The arguments in favor of collective bargaining do not apply to government: The government earns no profits and has a monopoly on its services. Government unions bargain to get more money from taxpayers. This does not serve the public's interests. Elected representatives, not unions, should have the final say on government policy.

States should also stop subsidizing union politicking. The law should not force government employees to hand over hundreds of dollars a year to unions, and should not subsidize union fundraising. Stopping this would go a long way toward restoring a nonpartisan civil service. American government should once again serve the needs of the people.

(James Sherk is Senior Policy Analyst in Labor Economics in the Center for Data Analysis at The Heritage Foundation.)

20110307-02	13:46	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Dale, GaryC et al.,

I might be convinced were it not for the attacks on unions of all kinds that have been going on for years now. These latest attacks on "public unions" are just a small part of the overall pattern of attacks on all unions. I believe there is ample historical evidence.

Let's bring back slave labor such as I've seen in Mexico, Indonesia, and China. Let's eliminate more factories and more jobs. Let's see how long all these part-time "service" jobs at Wal-Mart for minimum wage and no benefits are going to last when there is no one left to buy anything except the rich.

Interesting to me how all of this is allegedly so non-political. It's just a coincidence that unions tend to vote for Democrat candidates and that it is Republicans who have led the fight against them, while protecting, aiding, and abetting the "fat cats". And has any of this led to the promised prosperity? Have the huge tax cuts from Reagan to DW Bush brought the promised prosperity and independence? NO! A thousand times no!

My wife is working on her U.S. citizenship here in Florida, so we have recently gone back and re-read the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

We were struck by four glaring omissions from our freedoms (though we have, of course, the explicit right to guns):

1. There is apparently no right to organize as a union, no right to collective bargaining.
2. We are not "innocent until proven guilty" because of anything in the Constitution.
3. We don't have the right to be free from the blatant political corruption caused by large campaign contribution and their undue influence. (Recently backed- up by the Supreme Court.)
4. We don't have a way to control unbridled war, spending, and/or federal debt.

No wonder the middle class is rapidly disappearing! (Check it out! Do you really think that's a good thing?) No wonder our rights are being stripped. No wonder the jobs are gone. No wonder we're on the fast track to becoming bankrupt.

Ask yourself this, which party has led the way in all these catastrophes? I'll give you a hint, it starts with "R".

And I'm not complaining or vociferating because of myself. I'm pretty blessed. Thank you, America the Great! But I can empathize, and I can see the writing on crumbling walls.

But, hey, I'm just a radical communist, right?

20110307-03 16:21 GaryC Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear SteveB,

All things in life follow a pendulum pattern. At any given time there may be too much or too little (depending on where the pendulum is for an object) of a particular item. Unions are needed, but bad unions are not needed. In most cases, the bad unions have nothing to do with the members, it is the leadership. In addition, when union members are protected by legislation and regulatory agencies, the need for union leadership is focused on feathering their own nest at the expense of the membership or the company they are fighting.

The main reason the middle class is evaporating in the Midwest is the lack of manufacturing jobs for unskilled workers. At a certain point, the pendulum went too far in favor of the unions and companies rightly figured out that to be competitive they needed to move elsewhere. Union leadership did this in most cases without understanding the consequences to their constituency. In Anderson, when I was growing up, over 35,000 union jobs were in that town working for GM. Most workers were making $25 on up. But due to union work rules and labor rate increase, the rates went to over $40 per hour. The net result is there are ZERO GM jobs in Anderson now.

So what is better, $25 per hour jobs with job protection by legislation and state or federal agencies or NO JOBS. Just because it is union doesn't make it better or right.

20110307-04 17:48 Sandy Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

I get tired of reading your tirades back and forth! Don't you have anything else to do? Try teaching in the public school for 31 years, as I did, and then I'll give your opinions credibility. Just like I wish each of you could be president for 6 months before you start tearing apart Obama or any other pres. for that matter.

20110307-05 18:29 Dennis "This Time We're Taking the Whole World With Us"

I've been to Easter Island and next month will travel to Central America to view the remnants of the Mayans, a preview of our own delusions and terminal decline.

"This Time We're Taking the Whole World With Us" by Chris Hedges, TruthDig

Mar. 7, 2011, (<http://www.commondreams.org/view/2011/03/07-0>)

I have walked through the barren remains of Babylon in Iraq and the ancient Roman city of Antioch, the capital of Roman Syria, which now lies buried in silt deposits. I have visited the marble ruins of Leptis Magna, once one of the most important agricultural centers in the Roman Empire, now isolated in the desolate drifts of sand southeast of Tripoli. I have climbed at dawn up the ancient temples in Tikal, while flocks of brightly colored toucans leapt through the jungle foliage below. I have stood amid the remains of the ancient Egyptian city of Luxor along the Nile, looking at the statue of the great Egyptian pharaoh Ramesses II lying broken on the ground, with Percy Shelley's poem "Ozymandias" running through my head:

My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

Civilizations rise, decay and die. Time, as the ancient Greeks argued, for individuals and for states is cyclical. As societies become more complex they become inevitably more precarious. They become increasingly vulnerable. And as they begin to break down there is a strange retreat by a terrified and confused population from reality, an inability to acknowledge the self-evident fragility and impending collapse. The elites at the end speak in phrases and jargon that do not correlate to reality. They retreat into isolated compounds, whether at the court at Versailles, the Forbidden City or modern palatial estates. The elites indulge in unchecked hedonism, the accumulation of vaster wealth and extravagant consumption. They are deaf to the suffering of the masses who are repressed with greater and greater ferocity. Resources are more ruthlessly depleted until they are exhausted. And then the hollowed-out edifice collapses. The Roman and Sumerian empires fell this way. The Mayan elites, after clearing their forests and polluting their streams with silt and acids, retreated backward into primitivism.

People collect scraps from a garbage dump in Hyderabad, India. (AP / Mahesh Kumar A.)

As food and water shortages expand across the globe, as mounting poverty and misery trigger street protests in the Middle East, Africa and Europe, the elites do what all elites do. They launch more wars, build grander monuments to themselves, plunge their nations deeper into debt, and as it all unravels they take it out on the backs of workers and the poor. The collapse of the global economy, which wiped out a staggering $40 trillion in wealth, was caused when our elites, after destroying our manufacturing base, sold massive quantities of fraudulent mortgage-backed securities to pension funds, small investors, banks, universities, state and foreign governments and shareholders. The elites, to cover the losses, then looted the public treasury to begin the speculation over again. They also, in the name of austerity, began dismantling basic social services, set out to break the last vestiges of unions, slashed jobs, froze wages, threw millions of people out of their homes, and stood by idly as we created a permanent underclass of unemployed and underemployed.

The Mayan elite became, at the end, as the anthropologist Ronald Wright notes in A Short History of Progress, "...extremists, or ultra-conservatives, squeezing the last drops of profit from nature and humanity." This is how all civilizations, including our own, ossify and die. The signs of imminent death may be undeniable. Common sense may cry out for a radical new response. But the race toward self-immolation only accelerates because of intellectual and moral paralysis. As Sigmund Freud grasped in Beyond the Pleasure Principle and Civilization and Its Discontents, human societies are as intoxicated and blinded by their own headlong rush toward death and destruction as they are by the search for erotic fulfillment.

The unrest in the Middle East, the implosion of national economies such as those of Ireland and Greece, the increasing anger of a beleaguered working class at home and abroad, the growing desperate human migrations and the refusal to halt our relentless destruction of the ecosystem on which life depends are the harbingers of our own collapse and the consequences of the idiocy of our elite and the folly of globalization. Protests that are not built around a complete reconfiguration of American society, including a rapid dismantling of empire and the corporate state, can only forestall the inevitable. We will be saved only with the birth of a new and militant radicalism which seeks to dethrone our corrupt elite from power, not negotiate for better terms.

The global economy is built on the erroneous belief that the marketplace—read human greed—should dictate human behavior and that economies can expand eternally. Globalism works under the assumption that the ecosystem can continue to be battered by massive carbon emissions without major consequences. And the engine of global economic expansion is based on the assurance that there will always be plentiful and cheap oil. The inability to confront simple truths about human nature and the natural world leaves the elites unable to articulate new social, economic and political paradigms. They look only for ways to perpetuate a dying system. Thomas Friedman and the array of other propagandists for globalization make as much sense as Charlie Sheen.

Globalization is the modern articulation of the ancient ideology used by past elites to turn citizens into serfs and the natural world into a wasteland for profit. Nothing to these elites is sacred. Human beings and the natural world are exploited until exhaustion or collapse. The elites make no pretense of defending the common good. It is, in short, the defeat of rational thought and the death of humanism. The march toward self-annihilation has already obliterated 90 percent of the large fish in the oceans and wiped out half of the mature tropical forests, the lungs of the planet. At this rate by 2030 only 10 percent of the Earth's tropical forests will remain. Contaminated water kills 25,000 people every day around the globe, and each year some 20 million children are impaired by malnourishment. Greenhouse gases in the atmosphere now are at 329 parts per million and climbing, with most climate scientists warning that the level must remain below 350 ppm to sustain life as we know it. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change estimates that the measurement could reach 541 to 970 ppm by 2100. At that point huge parts of the planet, beset with overpopulation, droughts, soil erosion, freak storms, massive crop failures and rising sea levels, will be unfit for human existence.

Jared Diamond in his essay "The Last Americans" notes that by the time Hernan Cortés reached the Yucatán, millions of Mayan subjects had vanished.

"Why," Diamond writes, "did the kings and nobles not recognize and solve these problems? A major reason was that their attention was evidently focused on the short-term concerns of enriching themselves, waging wars, erecting monuments, competing with one another, and extracting enough food from the peasants to support all these activities."

"Pumping that oil, cutting down those trees, and catching those fish may benefit the elite by bringing them money or prestige and yet be bad for society as a whole (including the children of the elite) in the long run," Diamond went on. "Maya kings were consumed by immediate concerns for their prestige (requiring more and bigger temples) and their success in the next war (requiring more followers), rather than for the happiness of commoners or of the next generation. Those people with the greatest power to make decisions in our own society today regularly make money from activities that may be bad for society as a whole and for their own children; those decision-makers include Enron executives, many land developers, and advocates of tax cuts for the rich."

It was no different on Easter Island. The inhabitants, when they first settled the 64-square-mile island during the fifth century, found abundant fresh water and woods filled with the Chilean wine palm, a tree that can reach the size of an oak. Seafood, including fish, seals, porpoises and turtles, and nesting seabirds were plentiful. Easter Island's society, which split into an elaborate caste system of nobles, priests and commoners, had within five or six centuries swelled to some 10,000 people. The natural resources were devoured and began to disappear.

"Forest clearance for the growing of crops would have led to population increase, but also to soil erosion and decline of soil fertility," Paul Bahn and John Flenley write in "Easter Island, Earth Island." "Progressively more land would have had to be cleared. Trees and shrubs would also be cut down for canoe building, firewood, house construction, and for the timbers and ropes needed in the movement and erection of statues. Palm fruits would be eaten, thus reducing regeneration of the palm. Rats, introduced for food, could have fed on the palm fruits, multiplied rapidly and completely prevented palm regeneration. The over exploitation of prolific sea bird resources would have eliminated these for all but the offshore islets. Rats could have helped in this process by eating eggs. The abundant food provided by fishing, sea birds and rats would have encouraged rapid initial human population growth. Unrestrained human population increase would later put pressure on availability of land, leading to disputes and eventually warfare. Non-availability of timber and rope would make it pointless to carve further statues. A disillusionment with the efficacy of the statue religion in providing the wants of the people could lead to the abandonment of this cult. Inadequate canoes would restrict fishing to the inshore waters, leading to further decline in protein supplies. The result could have been general famine, warfare and the collapse of the whole economy, leading to a marked population decline."

Clans, in the later period of the Easter Island civilization, competed to honor their ancestors by constructing larger and larger hewn stone images, which demanded the last remnants of the timber, rope and manpower on the island. By the year 1400 the woods were gone. The soil had eroded and washed into the sea. The islanders began to fight over old timbers and were reduced to eating their dogs and soon all the nesting birds.

The desperate islanders developed a belief system that posited that the erected stone gods, the moai, would come to life and save them from disaster. This last retreat into magic characterizes all societies that fall into terminal decline. It is a frantic response to loss of control as well as despair and powerlessness. This desperate retreat into magic led to the Cherokee ghost dance, the doomed Taki Onqoy revolt against the Spanish invaders in Peru, and the Aztec prophecies of the 1530s. Civilizations in the last moments embrace a total severance from reality, a reality that becomes too bleak to be absorbed.

The modern belief by evangelical Christians in the rapture, which does not exist in biblical literature, is no less fantastic, one that at once allows for the denial of global warming and of evolution and the absurd idea that the righteous will all be saved—floating naked into heaven at the end of time. The faith that science and technology, which are morally neutral and serve human ambitions, will make the world whole again is no less delusional. We offer up our magical thinking in secular as well as religious form.

We think we have somehow escaped from the foibles of the past. We are certain that we are wiser and greater than those who went before us. We trust naively in the inevitability of our own salvation. And those who cater to this false hope, especially as things deteriorate, receive our adulation and praise. We in the United States, only 5 percent of the world's population, are outraged if anyone tries to tell us we don't have a divine right to levels of consumption that squander 25 percent of the world's energy. President Jimmy Carter, when he suggested that such consumption was probably not beneficial, became a figure of national ridicule. The worse it gets the more we demand illusionary Ronald Reagan happy talk. Those willing to cater to fantasy and self-delusion are, because they make us politically passive, lavishly funded and promoted by corporate and oligarchic forces. And by the very end we are joyfully led over the cliff by simpletons and lunatics, many of whom appear to be lining up for the Republican presidential nomination.

"Are the events of three hundred years ago on a small remote island of any significance to the world at large?" Bahn and Flenley ask. "We believe they are. We consider that Easter Island was a microcosm which provides a model for the whole planet. Like the Earth, Easter Island was an isolated system. The people there believed that they were the only survivors on Earth, all other land having sunk beneath the sea. They carried out for us the experiment of permitting unrestricted population growth, profligate use of resources, destruction of the environment and boundless confidence in their religion to take care of the future. The result was an ecological disaster leading to a population crash. A crash on a similar scale (60 percent of the population) for the planet Earth would lead to the deaths of about 1.8 billion people, roughly 100 times the death toll of the Second World War. Do we have to repeat the experiment on this grand scale? Do we have to be as cynical as Henry Ford and say 'History is bunk'? Would it not be more sensible to learn the lesson of Easter Island history, and apply it to the Earth Island on which we live?"

Human beings seem cursed to repeat these cycles of exploitation and collapse. And the greater the extent of the deterioration the less they are able to comprehend what is happening around them. The Earth is littered with the physical remains of human folly and human hubris. We seem condemned as a species to drive ourselves and our societies toward extinction, although this moment appears to be the denouement to the whole sad show of settled, civilized life that began some 5,000 years ago. There is nothing left on the planet to seize. We are now spending down the last remnants of our natural capital, including our forests, fossil fuel, air and water.

This time when we go down it will be global. There are no new lands to pillage, no new peoples to exploit. Technology, which has obliterated the constraints of time and space, has turned our global village into a global death trap. The fate of Easter Island will be writ large across the broad expanse of planet Earth.

© 2011 TruthDig.com

(Chris Hedges writes a regular column for Truthdig.com. Hedges graduated from Harvard Divinity School and was for nearly two decades a foreign correspondent for The New York Times. He is the author of many books, including: War Is a Force That Gives Us Meaning, What Every Person Should Know About War, and American Fascists: The Christian Right and the War on America. His most recent book is Empire of Illusion: The End of Literacy and the Triumph of Spectacle.)

20110308-01	08:17	Pam	Common Dreams
-----------------------------	-------	-----	---------------

Dear SteveB,

Thanks, SteveB, for forwarding those articles from CommonDreams.org. I just joined and suddenly I feel less alone. It's so nice to feel connected—in some fashion—with others who think as I do. I'm not as extreme as some (I use non-organic products and eat meat, though I know I shouldn't do either), but Whew! I've found a community.

20110308-02	08:58	SteveB	Re: "This Time We're Taking the Whole World With Us"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear Dennis,

This should be required reading for all world citizens. I know this article sounds a little like Glenn Beck (Mr. Gloom & Doom), but it comes from a different direction entirely—the realm of truth! Please don't doubt the seriousness of our situation, at least not without serious study and self-examination.

20110308-03 09:19 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear GaryC,

I enjoy our discussions. I'm familiar with the arguments you present here, but I don't buy them. Without greed and unbridled ambition for power, we would have been able to maintain our manufacturing base (even in the Midwest) even with unions. In my experience, $25/hour is about what a wage-earner has needed to make to support a family in America during much of my lifetime. Especially if one parent is going to be able to stay at home and actually raise the children.

I don't see how a decent life for people who toil in factories or garbage or landscaping is too much to ask, is detrimental to America, or is too much of a burden for America to bear. But then, we are not beyond "greed and unbridled ambition for power" of the elite, are we?

And I have actually worked in factories with union work rules (thank God!) and without (when I was nearly killed), so I am not without first-hand knowledge on the subject.

Take care. Hope you make it south sometime soon so we can argue this stuff over some beers and reminisce.

20110308-04 09:44 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear Bill,

This union thing has really raised a firestorm (not just a "forest fire")! I always appreciate your reasoned approach to the topics under discussion. I agree with much you had to say below.

But I think "the pendulum went too far in favor of the unions" only because of free trade. Before that, when I paid $2400 [= $12,632 in 2011 dollars. —SteveB] for a brand-new, union-made Ford Pinto in 1972, that was an affordable price for even a working-class American, let alone a recent college graduate teaching high school for $6500/year [= $34,211 in 2011 dollars. —SteveB].

I guess the recent interchange, above, with an old fraternity brother illustrates the two sides of the issue.

Take care. Don't forget, if you can, please get me a price for Bolivian rights to that coney recipe.

20110308-05 09:51 SteveB Unions & the Middle Class

Dear GaryC,

I don't see how a decent life for people who toil in factories or garbage or landscaping is too much to ask, is detrimental to America, or is too much of a burden for America to bear. And are only the rich entitled to affordable health care and eventual retirement? But then, we are not beyond "greed and unbridled ambition for power" of the elite, are we?

And I have actually worked in factories with union work rules (thank God!) and without (when I was nearly killed), so I am not without first-hand knowledge on the subject. But I support only the rights of unions—unionism, not particular excesses which could also have been curbed with intelligent, fair legislation., just as the excesses of capitalism in general must be. For the good of society, all excessive "greed and unbridled ambition for power" (even that of unions and politicians) must be curbed by some force.

But, in the long run, for the good of America or any free country, the middle class must prevail. No other option seems workable.

20110308-06 12:55 SteveB Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools

Dear Sandy,

I taught for 8 years and never "tear... apart Obama". Maybe, though, you have noticed, as have I, that the country seems to be getting into deeper and deeper trouble? That the standard of living of most Americans has declined over our lifetimes? This worries me. I think of my children and grandchildren and their future. Makes me want to try to help. Sorry.

20110308-07 15:51 SteveB Re: Common Dreams

Dear Pam,

We're currently stuck at a fancy resort in Orlando that I got a great deal on because of my little resort in St. Lucia. And I'm spending a little time pissing off all the Republicans I can...getting my book finally finished up...seeing old friends...trying to cope with the Dept. of Immigration, etc.

It's the last day of Carnival, so we're missing Santa Cruz a lot, missing all the fun. I suppose we could mosey on over to Disney World or somewhere, but I did all that years ago with my kids, so it would not be good now, and those places are all so fake.

One of my old sailing buddies and his wife came over from Jacksonville for the weekend and we always have a lot of fun together. His wife is French but speaks perfect Spanish, so that's a good thing for Marci, though both of them also speak almost perfect English, just with cute accents. Joyce is 69 but looks about 50, so I guess there is hope for us yet.

20110309-01 10:42 Ben Video: Republicans Attack Voters' Rights in 22 States & "Wisconsin Republicans Really Don't Want Me to Vote" & "Texas Attorney General's Wild Goose Chase"

Dear SteveB,

Republicans attack voting rights in 22 states...

Of course, we knew this was a goal all along.

Make no mistake about it. With huge majorities elected in 2010, the Republicans are at it again with their voter ID "fraud".

Below is a great video from 2 students with their own show in North Carolina. They did a great job putting it together calling out Republicans for their utter B.S.

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=yINv61hzHdM>

The Republicans have opened up the flood gates with Citizens United allowing corporations to make UNLIMITED donations to a political candidate or campaign and now they want to cut all public services in order to pave the way to privatization. Making it harder for people to vote is the last plank in their platform.

It's truly amazing and sad. Check out this article written by a student at the University of Wisconsin:

"Wisconsin Republicans Really Don't Want Me to Vote" posted by David Vines, Huffington Post

Feb. 15, 2011, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/david-vines/wisconsin-republicansrea_b_822649.html)

Legislator takes aim at UW programs. Among other things, he wants to cut money to a Sociology Department Center because it's too far left, he says.

http://host.madison.com/news/local/article_bed0652e-035e-51b4-97da-aa8c0df1614b.html

State rep wants to stop city's use of Euro-style bike markers (excerpt). "It's basically about liberal extremists in Madison who hate cars and think everyone should bike to work," Nass said. "It is basically making it difficult to use an automobile."

http://host.madison.com/wsj/news/local/govt_and_politics/article_233e0e24-6602-11df-a306-001cc4c002e0.html

Our very own Attorney General, Greg Abbott, conducted a 2 year investigation in Texas of the "massive voter fraud". When it was all said and done, his office prosecuted less than 10 people in the ENTIRE state! Voter fraud is a totally bogus issue.

"Texas Attorney General's Wild Goose Chase" by Austin Statesman Editorial Board

May 22, 2008, (http://www.statesman.com/blogs/content/shared-gen/blogs/austin/editorial/entries/2008/05/22/texas_ag_wild_goose_chase.html)

After a two-year investigation of voter fraud, Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott has only 26 minor cases of voting irregularities to show for his expenditure from a $1.4 million grant. Some of that money also was spent on other cases.

All of those cases involved Democrats and 18 of them were instances where lawful voters cast proper ballots that were collected and handled by someone else. That's technically illegal unless the carrier's name and address is on the envelope, but it's a petty prosecution.

Actually, the paltry results of Abbott's initiative are a good thing. It shows that vote fraud is hardly the "persistent problem" Abbott claimed it was when he announced the investigation in Jan., 2006. The outcome of Abbott's efforts was published by The Dallas Morning News this week.

Republicans in the Legislature have been pushing for a more stringent voter identification law in Texas. Although the issue died in the chaos at the end of the 2007 session, it is sure to return in January. Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst, who has made tougher voter identification a cornerstone of his administration, will see to that.

Nationally, tougher voter identification laws are favorite issues for Republicans, though there is little evidence of widespread voting fraud. Democrats contend that the GOP effort is a way to suppress turnout, since many of the voters who lack sufficient identification are the poor and elderly and minorities—who tend to vote Democratic.

Abbott's misguided investigation lends credence to the Democrats' argument. Several of the cases prosecuted by the attorney general's office involved people helping homebound senior citizens get and mail absentee ballots.

Is this the great voter fraud that Abbott said triggered an investigation into "a dramatic increase in indictments for voter fraud" in his initial press release? If so, it wasn't worth the time or the money.

In Texas, residents must show identification to obtain a voter's registration certificate that is to be presented when voting. Properly registered voters who don't have the registration card when they go to vote still must show another approved form of identification to cast a ballot.

So it is highly unlikely that Texas is brimming with illegal voters stealing elections. In his two-year probe, Abbott uncovered only eight cases of ineligible voters or manufactured votes. They included one woman who voted for her dead mother, one man who voted twice and three women who used false addresses to get registration cards. While it is proper to find and punish anyone voting improperly, if those eight cases are as bad as it gets, Texas is safe from a takeover at the ballot box.

When Republican lawmakers in January again demand tougher regulations on voters to discourage fraud, they should look at the results of Abbott's assault on what he termed an epidemic of voter fraud. Voting is a right and a privilege, and Texas legislators should make it easier to vote, not deliberately try to suppress it. There is no need to stiffen voter identification beyond what Texas already requires. And, clearly, there is no epidemic of voter fraud as the attorney general first alleged. His own investigation proved it.

"The Greatest Country on Earth?" By Joseph E. Stiglitz, Slate

Mar. 7, 2011, (http://www.slate.com/articles/business/project_syndicate/2011/03/the_greatest_country_on_earth.html)

(What the United States can learn from the tiny island nation of Mauritius.)

Suppose someone were to describe to you a small country that provided free education through university for all of its citizens, transportation for school children, and free health care—including heart surgery—for all. You might suspect that such a country is either phenomenally rich or on the fast track to fiscal crisis.

After all, rich countries in Europe have increasingly found that they cannot pay for university education and are asking young people and their families to bear the costs. For its part, the United States has never attempted to give free college for all, and it took a bitter battle just to ensure that America's poor get access to health care—a guarantee that the Republican Party is now working hard to repeal, claiming that the country cannot afford it.

But Mauritius, a tropical island nation of 1.3 million people off the east coast of Africa, is neither particularly rich nor on its way to budgetary ruin. Nonetheless, it has spent the last decades successfully building a diverse economy, a democratic political system, and a strong social safety net. Many countries, not least the United States, could learn from its experience.

In a recent visit I had a chance to see some of the leaps Mauritius has taken—accomplishments that can seem bewildering in light of the debate in the United States and elsewhere. Consider home ownership: While American conservatives say that the government's attempt to extend home ownership to 70 percent of the U.S. population was responsible for the financial meltdown, 87 percent of Mauritians own their own homes—without fueling a housing bubble.

Now comes the painful number: Mauritius's GDP has grown faster than 5 percent annually for almost 30 years. Surely, you think, this must be some "trick." Mauritius must be rich in diamonds, oil, or some other valuable commodity. But Mauritius has no exploitable natural resources. Indeed, so dismal were its prospects as it approached independence from Britain, which came in 1968, that the Nobel Prizewinning economist James Meade wrote in 1961: "It is going to be a great achievement if [the country] can find productive employment for its population without a serious reduction in the existing standard of living. ... [T]he outlook for peaceful development is weak."

As if to prove Meade wrong, the Mauritians have increased per capita income from less than $400 around the time of independence to more than $6,700 today. The country has progressed from the sugar-based monoculture of 50 years ago to a diversified economy that includes tourism, finance, textiles, and, if current plans bear fruit, advanced technology.

During my visit, my interest was to understand better what had led to what some have called the Mauritius miracle and what others might learn from it. There are, in fact, many lessons, some of which should be borne in mind by American and European politicians as they fight their budget battles. First, the question is not whether we can afford to provide health care or education for all or ensure widespread homeownership. If Mauritius can afford these things, America and Europe—which are several orders of magnitude richer—can, too. The question, rather, is how to organize society. Mauritians have chosen a path that leads to higher levels of social cohesion, welfare, and economic growth—and to a lower level of inequality.

Second, unlike many other small countries, Mauritius has decided that most military spending is a waste. The United States need not go as far. If the United States reduced by just a fraction its defense spending, much of which goes toward weapons that don't work against enemies that don't exist, it would go a long way toward creating a more humane society, including the provision of health care and education to those who cannot afford them.

Third, Mauritius recognized that without natural resources, its people were its only asset. Maybe that appreciation for its human resources is also what led Mauritius to realize that, particularly given the country's potential religious, ethnic, and political differences—which some tried to exploit in order to induce it to remain a British colony—education for all was crucial to social unity. So was a strong commitment to democratic institutions and cooperation between workers, government, and employers—precisely the opposite of the kind of dissension and division being engendered by conservatives in the United States today.

This is not to say that Mauritius is without problems. Like many other successful emerging-market countries, Mauritius is confronting a loss of exchange-rate competitiveness. And as more and more countries intervene to weaken their exchange rates in response to America's attempt at competitive devaluation through quantitative easing, the problem is becoming worse. Almost surely, Mauritius, too, will have to intervene.

Moreover, like many other countries around the world, Mauritius worries today about imported food and energy inflation. To respond to inflation by increasing interest rates would simply compound the difficulties of high prices with high unemployment and an even less competitive exchange rate. Direct interventions, restrictions on short-term capital inflows, capital-gains taxes, and stabilizing prudential banking regulations will all have to be considered.

The "Mauritius miracle" dates to independence. But the country still struggles with some of its colonial legacies: inequality in land and wealth, as well as vulnerability to high-stakes global politics. The United States occupies one of Mauritius's offshore islands, Diego Garcia, as a naval base without compensation, officially leasing it from the United Kingdom, which not only retained the Chagos Islands in violation of international law but expelled its citizens and refuses to allow them to return.

The United States should now do right by this peaceful and democratic country: recognize Mauritius' rightful ownership of Diego Garcia, renegotiate the lease, and redeem past sins by paying a fair amount for land that it has illegally occupied for decades.

(This article comes from Project Syndicate.)

20110312-01	04:32	Sandy	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---

Dear SteveB,

I didn't mean to be attacking you. I was just telling all of you guys that you need to find a worthwhile hobby! Besides, talking about it doesn't do any good. Find a way to help. I did. I manage a free clothing closet for foster children at our church and I have taken in 16 foster children in the past 2 years. God has a purpose for all of us.

20110312-02	07:10	A. Grayson	Did They Die in Vain?
-----------------------------	-------	------------	-----------------------

Dear SteveB:

On May 4, 1886, in Haymarket Square in Chicago, the public rallied peacefully in support of 40,000 workers in Chicago who had gone on strike, to win the right to organize. The police attacked, and eight died.

On July 6, 1892, in Homestead, Pennsylvania, 3800 workers went on strike, to win the right to organize. Three hundred hired and armed goons attacked them. Five people died.

On Apr. 20, 1914, in Ludlow, Colorado, 1200 coal miners went on strike, to win the right to organize. The Colorado National Guard attacked their shantytown, and burned it to the ground. Nineteen people died. Two women and 11 children were asphyxiated, and they burned to death.

Here and around the world, many people have fought and died, so that you and I would have the right to organize.

And so that 250,000 public workers in Wisconsin would have that right, too.

This is not exactly a new idea. Six months after the Ludlow Massacre, President Wilson signed the Clayton Act, prohibiting the prosecution of union members under Antitrust Law. That was almost a century ago.

Two decades later, during the Franklin Roosevelt's first term as President, he signed the National Labor Relations Act into law. It protects the right to organize. That was over 75 years ago.

The right to organize also is a fundamental principle of international law. Over 150 countries have ratified the "Right to Organize" Convention, an international treaty. It was adopted in 1949, over 60 years ago. So why are we even talking about this, 11 years into the 21st Century?

Because the Teabaggers want to "take back America." They want to take it back, all right—take it all the way back to the 19th century. When there was no right to organize. When people worked for a dollar a day. When grown men competed against children for jobs. When women were barred from most jobs entirely. When you worked until you died.

Not to mention slavery.

I want to see an America that is healthy and wealthy.

They want an America that provides cheap labor to our corporate overlords. An America where the middle class is chained by debt.

We didn't ask for this fight. But we have no choice except to fight back. For the survival of the middle class in America. For us, for our children, and for our grandchildren. And so that the victims in Haymarket, in Homestead and in Ludlow did not die in vain.

As Cardinal Spellman said 45 years ago, "It is a war thrust upon us, and we cannot yield to tyranny." I'm ready to fight for what's right. What about you?

Courage, Alan Grayson

20110312-03	09:32	SteveB	Re: Indiana Governor's Attack on Public Schools
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Sandy,

Thanks for the message. People help in different ways. I have found ways to provide support (from partial to complete) to poor families in St. Lucia and Bolivia by starting businesses using local friends to manage them. I give to many good causes which help people and the Earth.

But, let's face it, our great nation is in deep trouble. It doesn't do any good to run away from that fact. When I was a kid growing up in Greencastle, my barbers (the Eitelgeorge brothers), the fellow who worked at the shoe store, janitors, etc. were able to drive decent (if not new) cars, live in decent (if small) homes, and, often, send their children to college without incurring a mountain of debt. Now people in all those jobs are hurting. Those good jobs and the manufacturing jobs, which were even better, have been replaced by part-time jobs at Wal-Mart, without benefits and paying maybe $8/hour. Try to live on that, let alone support a family. We are in decline. There is no need for us to be handing our children and grandchildren a dismal future. I believe in America and Americans.

I have studied this decline. Though there is plenty of blame for both political parties, and though I have been a Republican most of my adult life, I firmly believe it has been the Republicans who have done everything they can to destroy the middle class, move manufacturing offshore, deregulate industries which need regulation (oil companies and banks come to mind), attack education, and enforce their small-minded, often hypocritical morality upon all of us.

If you think I am wrong, you will have to prove it to me. The biggest things leading to our impending bankruptcy are the Reagan and Bush tax cuts and the Bush wars. The deficits created by these overt actions are completely contrary to the proclaimed principles of the Republicans. I also believe their lies (starting with that rat, Richard Nixon) to the American people have been and continue to be monstrous. Like all politicians in our nation completely corrupted by the fat cats and big corporations because of our antiquated campaign finance laws, the Democrats resemble the Republicans, but I have not seen them attack the middle class with the same vigor. Have you?

So I try to do what I can to spread the truth about what is happening in my beloved country. I worry about the fact that we were handed a thriving country and a bright future by our parents (the "greatest generation") and, in one generation, have managed to destroy that promise to leave our children and grandchildren with a future which looks extremely problematical to me and to many other people. Republicans and Democrats alike seem to be extremely worried—and for good reason—but they don't seem to be willing to do much about it.

I commend your efforts to help others. My ways of trying to help may be different than yours. My ways do absolutely nothing to benefit me. I simply believe that it is about time for a call to action. Let us all start trying to work together to start the healing. Let us call to task those who are the problem.

20110313-01 11:53 SteveB The Church of Steve

Dear Larry,

As you might know, I'm always trying to figure things out, think about what could be next, develop theories and dogma, and try to see if any of it could provide a living. So this is one of my latest theories:

for "The Church of Steve" - You've got to try to be someone God would want to spend time with...because you're going to be spending an eternity together. And he doesn't like to hang with bad or boring people. Maybe, otherwise, heaven can get pretty boring, like it was before Earth and people were created. None of this would be good news for boring Fundamentalist Christians.

What do you think?

20110313-02 18:15 SteveB Re: Letter to Sen. Alan Simpson About Social Security

Dear Phil,

I certainly agree with you and my fellow Montanan on this one! Another morally bankrupt Republican who wants to destroy the middle class!

20110313-03 18:21 SteveB Re: Did They Die in Vain?

Dear Pam,

Every time I think the country has taken a turn as bad as possible, so things have to get better, we take a turn in an even worse direction. :-)

But, hey, after robbing Social Security and threatening to further destroy it, a little union busting must seem almost harmless to these a-holes! End the wars now!

20110314-01 17:29 Pam Re: Did They Die in Vain?

Dear SteveB,

It's really hard for me to take in all the dreadful things going on—here and in the rest of the world. I keep trying to tell myself it was ever thus, but somehow things seem worse than usual lately. It's hard to be an optimist.

Good news: flowers are blooming and it's supposed to be 78 this weekend.

20110314-02 06:09 Larry Re: The Church of Steve

Dear SteveB,

I don't know... You're right, of course, that this would not work with fundamentalists for the most part, but many liberal Quakers (Friends) Churches would welcome you openly, I think. They always need Pastor's but the pay is usually very poor. On the other hand you could often get free housing one way or another and such a job would open up many contacts and, who knows what that could lead to.

You would also find such freedom in Unitarian type Churches and Congregational Churches and quite a few others.

To be honest, I am a Christ centered Quaker, but there are many who are not and would welcome you. As a dear cousin your religion would not affect our relationship in any way, of course.

If you have any other questions or would like more specific information, please ask any time.

20110314-03 08:47 SteveB Re: Did They Die in Vain?

Dear Pam,

Hey, welcome to spring, finally! :-) We've been having such great weather here and there's so much to do.

Yep, the news is all bad. I'm thinking of becoming apolitical again. Hope I can pull it off...at least until the election stuff starts in earnest.

I don't know what the rich are going to do when they have finally destroyed the middle class. Start shooting and bombing the poor who are left a la Libya? What the hell are they thinking? Where do they think all their money came from? Themselves? Our very way of life demands consumers who can spend. And that's really all we are to those people. Things who can consume. Like the people in Matrix, who were kept alive by the cold machines only for their body heat.

20110314-04 21:22 Dick "A Speech Every American High School Principal Should Give"

We watched Dennis Prager of Colorado, along with Sara Palin and Tom Brokaw on TV a couple of weeks ago....what a dynamic, down to earth speaker. Even though Palin and Brokaw were also guest speakers they did little but nod and agree with him. This is the guy that should be running for President in 2012!

"A Speech Every American High School Principal Should Give" by Dennis Prager

July 13, 2010, (<http://www.dennisprager.com/columns.aspx?g=07f08515-be95-4197-955e-327f6a0b98f8>)

(If every school principal gave this speech at the beginning of the next school year, America would be a better place.)

To the students and faculty of our high school:

I am your new principal, and honored to be so. There is no greater calling than to teach young people.

I would like to apprise you of some important changes coming to our school. I am making these changes because I am convinced that most of the ideas that have dominated public education in America have worked against you, against your teachers and against our country.

First, this school will no longer honor race or ethnicity. I could not care less if your racial makeup is black, brown, red, yellow or white. I could not care less if your origins are African, Latin American, Asian or European, or if your ancestors arrived here on the Mayflower or on slave ships. The only identity I care about, the only one this school will recognize, is your individual identity—your character, your scholarship, your humanity. And the only national identity this school will care about is American. This is an American public school, and American public schools were created to make better Americans. If you wish to affirm an ethnic, racial or religious identity through school, you will have to go elsewhere. We will end all ethnicity, race and non-American nationality based celebrations. They undermine the motto of America, one of its three central values—e pluribus Unum, "from many, one." And this school will be guided by America's values. This includes all after-school clubs. I will not authorize clubs that divide students based on any identities. This includes race, language, religion, sexual orientation or whatever else may become in vogue in a society divided by political correctness.

Your clubs will be based on interests and passions, not blood, ethnic, racial or other physically defined ties. Those clubs just cultivate narcissism—an unhealthy preoccupation with the self—while the purpose of education is to get you to think beyond yourself. So we will have clubs that transport you to the wonders and glories of art, music, astronomy, languages you do not already speak, carpentry and more. If the only extracurricular activities you can imagine being interested in are those based on ethnic, racial or sexual identity, that means that little outside of yourself really interests you.

Second, I am uninterested in whether English is your native language. My only interest in terms of language is that you leave this school speaking and writing English as fluently as possible. The English language has united America's citizens for over 200 years, and it will unite us at this school. It is one of the indispensable reasons this country of immigrants has always come to be one country. And if you leave this school without excellent English language skills, I would be remiss in my duty to ensure that you will be prepared to successfully compete in the American job market. We will learn other languages here—it is deplorable that most Americans only speak English—but if you want classes taught in your native language rather than in English, this is not your school.

Third, because I regard learning as a sacred endeavor, everything in this school will reflect learning's elevated status. This means, among other things, that you and your teachers will dress accordingly. Many people in our society dress more formally for Hollywood events than for church or school. These people have their priorities backward. Therefore, there will be a formal dress code at this school.

Fourth, no obscene language will be tolerated anywhere on this school's property—whether in class, in the hallways or at athletic events. If you can't speak without using the f-word, you can't speak. By obscene language I mean the words banned by the Federal Communications Commission, plus epithets such as "N*gger," even when used by one black student to address another black, or "b*tch," even when addressed by a girl to a girlfriend. It is my intent that by the time you leave this school, you will be among the few your age to instinctively distinguish between the elevated and the degraded, the holy and the obscene.

Fifth, we will end all self-esteem programs. In this school, self-esteem will be attained in only one way—the way people attained it until decided otherwise a generation ago—by earning it. One immediate consequence is that there will be one valedictorian, not eight.

Sixth, and last, I am reorienting the school toward academics and away from politics and propaganda. No more time will be devoted to scaring you about smoking and caffeine, or terrifying you about sexual harassment or global warming. No more semesters will be devoted to condom wearing and teaching you to regard sexual relations as only or primarily a health issue. There will be no more attempts to convince you that you are a victim because you are not white, or not male, or not heterosexual or not Christian. We will have failed if any one of you graduates this school and does not consider him or herself inordinately lucky—to be alive and to be an American.

Now, please stand and join me in the Pledge of Allegiance to the flag of our country. As many of you do not know the words, your teachers will hand them out to you.

Dear SteveB,

I'm sure it doesn't matter whether I'm "political" or not. My little voice is a drop in the ocean. The only thing we can do is tend to things close to home and hope for the best. At least from where I sit. Maybe if I were President there would be a thing or two I could do. Maybe. I guess you could call me a lucky, grateful pessimist. Yesterday was exhausting with Atty. He didn't feel good, and I felt just about as bad. He screamed, I sighed, and last night I slept about 13 hours. Amazing what a little shut-eye can do.

Isn't it amazing how one news story pushes the last one right off the front page?! No more New Zealand earthquake, no more Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, or Saudi Arabia. Now it's all Japan. There's just too much happening to take it all in. One of my former students is stranded outside Tokyo. She's over there for a year teaching English. She sounds like she's doing OK, a brave girl, but I bet her parents are having fits.

You sound good. Orlando must be what you needed just now. Any thought of returning to Montana? Take care and keep in touch.

20110315-02 11:53 SteveB Re: Did They Die in Vain? Japanese Disasters, Energy

Dear Pam,

I empathize and suffer with the Japanese people. But I also feel so sorry for the Libyan people, who have been so brave and suffered so much. Now, because the stupid world media can only think about and cover one news story at a time, Kadafi what's-his-a*s can do anything he wants. Ridiculous news coverage. I guess only disaster and suffering sells news, so they can only tell the most horrific story.

I once spent a couple of months in Japan, studying Zen Buddhism. I loved it there and loved the people. Despite that, I have never had a Japanese (or even an oriental) girlfriend, and have always felt a little impoverished for that. Now I will probably never fulfill my fantasy of loving one of those cute little porcelain dolls. But I digress. Isn't it amazing the way they handle a crisis? So stoical, strong, and self-contained, even in their suffering. Now, don't get me wrong. I absolutely love black people and so much of black culture too. My very bestest sailing buddy was a very black guy from St. Lucia and we were the very closest of friends for years. I really loved him...in a non-gay sort of way, of course. :-). Then he was lost at sea...

But what a contrast between Japan in disaster and New Orleans, huh? Interesting. Yet how much great music has Japan produced? Maybe a lot, but I can't appreciate it perhaps. I love the way they don't steal or loot, not because they want to go to heaven or are religious, just because they are basically good and shy and don't want to embarrass themselves or be any kind of spectacle. Something like that used to be cause for suicide, I guess it still is, everywhere...

I am as pi*sed as much at the nuclear engineers of the world and the power companies as I am at the Republicans and our other fat cats. For years and years they've been telling us how safe nuclear power is, and I've been saying, "BS!" They may have containment vessels and redundant cooling systems, but that's not nearly enough. How about simple fail-safe, spring-loaded fuel rod extractors that take over when all else fails? Stupid, stupid, arrogant scientists and engineers. They are idiots in their assumptions and demonstrate how much trouble stupid mankind is in. And they have no idea how to transport and store all the nuclear waste these monsters produce. Maybe the Japanese Godzilla movies weren't so far off. All these plants are disasters waiting to happen.

Enough "venting" for one day. Let us all not suffering disaster appreciate the gift of peace and life. I hope Atty and you are feeling much better. I think Montana is looking unlikely this trip. I'm hoping we make it to Indiana for a while.

20110315-03 13:44 Phil Fw: Bill Gates' Rules for Students

Love him or hate himI thought this was interesting, hope you do too.

[According to snopes.com (<http://www.snopes.com/politics/soapbox/schoolrules.asp>), Bill Gates had nothing to do with these "rules". Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

(This should be posted in every school or kid's bedroom. Love him or hate him, he sure hits the nail on the head with this!)

Bill Gates recently gave a speech at a High School about eleven things they did not and will not learn in school. He talks about how feel-good, politically correct teachings created a generation of kids with no concept of reality and how this concept set them up for failure in the real world.

Rule 1: Life is not fair—get used to it!

Rule 2: The world doesn't care about your self-esteem. The world will expect you to accomplish something BEFORE you feel good about yourself.

Rule 3: You will NOT make $60,000 a year right out of high school. You won't be a vice-president with a car phone until you earn both.

Rule 4: If you think your teacher is tough, wait till you get a boss

Rule 5: Flipping burgers is not beneath your dignity. Your Grandparents had a different word for burger flipping: They called it opportunity.

Rule 6: If you mess up, it's not your parents' fault, so don't whine about your mistakes, learn from them.

Rule 7: Before you were born, your parents weren't as boring as they are now. They got that way from paying your bills, cleaning your clothes and listening to you talk about how cool you thought you were So before you save the rain forest from the parasites of your parent's generation, try delousing the closet in your own room..

Rule 8: Your school may have done away with winners and losers, but life HAS NOT. In some schools, they have abolished failing grades and they'll give you as MANY TIMES as you want to get the right answer. *This doesn't bear the slightest resemblance to ANYTHING in real life.

Rule 9: Life is not divided into semesters. You don't get summers off and very few employers are interested in helping you FIND YOURSELF. *Do that on your own time.

Rule 10: Television is NOT real life. In real life people actually have to leave the coffee shop and go to jobs.

Rule 11: Be nice to nerds. Chances are you'll end up working for one.

If you can read this... Thank a Teacher. [If you can't read it, thank a Republican. —SteveB] If you can read this in English... Thank a Soldier! And for life and everything else you have... Thank God!! Now... think about this and smile if you agree and please pass this on... If you don't agree, go stick your head in the sand and take a deep breath!

20110315-04 15:50 SteveB "Power Concedes Nothing Without a Demand"
--

"Power Concedes Nothing Without a Demand" by Chris Hedges, Truthdig

Mar. 14, 2011, (http://www.truthdig.com/report/item/power_concedes_nothing_without_a_demand_20110314/)

The liberal class is discovering what happens when you tolerate the intolerant. Let hate speech pollute the airways. Let corporations buy up your courts and state and federal legislative bodies. Let the Christian religion be manipulated by charlatans to demonize Muslims, gays and intellectuals, discredit science and become a source of personal enrichment. Let unions wither under corporate assault. Let social services and public education be stripped of funding. Let Wall Street loot the national treasury with impunity. Let sleazy con artists use lies and deception to carry out unethical sting operations on tottering liberal institutions, and you roll out the welcome mat for fascism.

The liberal class has busied itself with the toothless pursuits of inclusiveness, multiculturalism, identity politics and tolerance—a word Martin Luther King never used—and forgotten about justice. It naively sought to placate ideological and corporate forces bent on the destruction of the democratic state. The liberal class, like the misguided democrats in the former Yugoslavia or the hapless aristocrats in the Weimar Republic, invited the wolf into the henhouse. The liberal class forgot that, as Karl Popper wrote in The Open Society and Its Enemies, "If we extend unlimited tolerance even to those who are intolerant, if we are not prepared to defend a tolerant society against the onslaught of the intolerant, then the tolerant will be destroyed, and tolerance with them."

Workers in this country paid for their rights by suffering brutal beatings, mass expulsions from company housing and jobs, crippling strikes, targeted assassinations of union leaders and armed battles with hired gun thugs and state militias. The Rockefellers, the Mellons, the Carnegies and the Morgans—the Koch Brothers Industries, Goldman Sachs and Wal-Mart of their day—never gave a damn about workers. All they cared about was profit. The eight-hour workday, the minimum wage, Social Security, pensions, job safety, paid vacations, retirement benefits and health insurance were achieved because hundreds of thousands of workers physically fought a system of capitalist exploitation. They rallied around radicals such as "Mother" Jones, United Mine Workers' President John L. Lewis and "Big" Bill Haywood and his Wobblies as well as the socialist presidential candidate Eugene V. Debs. Lewis said, "I have pleaded your case from the pulpit and from the public platform—not in the quavering tones of a feeble mendicant asking alms, but in the thundering voice of the captain of a mighty host, demanding the rights to which free men are entitled."

Those who fought to achieve these rights endured tremendous suffering, pain and deprivation. It is they who made possible our middle class and opened up our democracy. The elite hired goons and criminal militias to evict striking miners from company houses, infiltrate fledgling union organizations and murder suspected union leaders and sympathizers. Federal marshals, state militias, sheriff's deputies and at times Army troops, along with the courts and legislative bodies, were repeatedly used to crush and stymie worker revolts. Striking sugar cane workers were gunned down in Thibodaux, La., in 1887. Steel workers were shot to death in Homestead, Pa. Railroad workers in the Pullman strike of 1894 were murdered. Coal miners at Ludlow, Colo., in 1914 and at Matewan, W.Va., in 1920 were massacred. Our freedoms and rights were paid for with their courage and blood.

American democracy arose because those consciously locked out of the system put their bodies on the line and demanded justice. The exclusion of the poor and the working class from the systems of power in this country was deliberate. The Founding Fathers deeply feared popular democracy. They rigged the system to favor the elite from the start, something that has been largely whitewashed in public schools and by a corporate media that has effectively substituted myth for history. Europe's poor, fleeing to America from squalid slums and workhouses in the 17th and 18th centuries, were viewed by the privileged as commodities to exploit. Slaves, Native Americans, indentured servants, women, and men without property were not represented at the Constitutional Conventions. And American history, as Howard Zinn illustrated in The People's History of the United States, is one long fight by the marginalized and disenfranchised for dignity and freedom. Those who fought understood the innate cruelty of capitalism.

"When you sell your product, you retain your person," said a tract published in the 1880s during the Lowell, Mass., mill strikes. "But when you sell your labor, you sell yourself, losing the rights of free men and becoming vassals of mammoth establishments of a moneyed aristocracy that threatens annihilation to anyone who questions their right to enslave and oppress. Those who work in the mills ought to own them, not have the status of machines ruled by private despots who are entrenching monarchic principles on democratic soil as they drive downwards freedom and rights, civilization, health, morals and intellectuality in the new commercial feudalism."

Our consumer society and celebrity culture foster a frightening historical amnesia. We chatter mindlessly about something called the "American Dream." And now that the oligarchic elite have regained control of all levers of power, and that dream is being exposed as a cruel hoax, we are being shoved back into the cage. There will be hell to pay to get back to where we were.

Slick public relations campaigns, the collapse of public education—nearly a third of the country is illiterate or semilliterate—and the rise of amoral politicians such as Bill Clinton and Barack Obama, who posed as liberals while they sold their souls for corporate money, have left us largely defenseless. The last vestiges of unionized workers in the public sector are reduced to protesting in Wisconsin for collective bargaining—in short, the ability to ask employers for decent working conditions. That shows how far the country has deteriorated. And it looks as though even this basic right to ask, as well as raise money through union dues, has been successfully revoked in Madison. The only hope now is more concerted and militant disruptions of the systems of power.

The public debate, dominated by corporate-controlled systems of information, ignores the steady impoverishment of the working class and absence of legal and regulatory mechanisms to prevent mounting corporate fraud and abuse. The airwaves are saturated with corporate apologists. They ask us why public-sector employees have benefits—sneeringly called "entitlements"—which nonunionized working- and middle-class people are denied. This argument is ingenious. It pits worker against worker in a mad scramble for scraps. And until we again speak in the language of open class warfare, grasping, as those who went before us did, that the rich will always protect themselves at our expense, we are doomed to a 21st century serfdom.

The pillars of the liberal establishment, which once made incremental and piecemeal reform possible, have collapsed. The liberal church forgot that heretics exist. It forgot that the scum of society—look at the new Newt Gingrich—always wrap themselves in the flag and clutch the Christian cross to promote programs that mock the core teachings of Jesus Christ. And, for all their years of seminary training and Bible study, these liberal clergy have stood by mutely as televangelists betrayed and exploited the Gospel to promote bigotry, hatred and greed. What was the point, I wonder, of ordination? Did they think the radical message of the Gospel was something they would never have to fight for? Schools and universities, on their knees for corporate dollars and their boards dominated by hedge fund and investment managers, have deformed education into the acquisition of narrow vocational skills that serve specialized corporate interests and create classes of drone-like systems managers. They make little attempt to equip students to make moral choices, stand up for civic virtues and seek a life of meaning. These moral and ethical questions are never even asked. Humanities departments are vanishing as swiftly as the ocean's fish stocks.

The electronic and much of the print press has become a shameless mouthpiece for the powerful and a magnet for corporate advertising. It makes little effort to give a platform to those who without them cannot be heard, instead diverting us with celebrity meltdowns, lavish lifestyle reports and gossip.

Legitimate news organizations, such as NPR and The New York Times, are left cringing and apologizing before the beast—right-wing groups that hate "liberal" news organizations not because of any bias, but because they center public discussion on verifiable fact. And verifiable fact is not convenient to ideologues whose goal is the harnessing of inchoate rage and hatred.

Artists, who once had something to say, have retreated into elite enclaves, preoccupied themselves with abstract, self-referential garbage, frivolous entertainment and spectacle. Celebrities, working for advertising agencies and publicists, provide our daily mini-dramas and flood the airwaves with lies on behalf of corporate sponsors. The Democratic Party has sold out working men and women for corporate money. It has permitted the state apparatus to be turned over to corporate interests. There is no liberal institution left—the press, labor, culture, public education, the church or the Democratic Party—that makes any effort to hold back the corporate juggernaut. It is up to us.

We have tolerated the intolerant—from propaganda outlets such as Fox News to Christian fascists to lunatics in the Republican Party to Wall Street and corporations—and we are paying the price. The only place left for us is on the street. We must occupy state and federal offices. We must foment general strikes. The powerful, with no check left on their greed and criminality, are gorging on money while they busily foreclose our homes, bust the last of our unions, drive up our health care costs and cement into place a permanent underclass of the broken and the poor. They are slashing our most essential and basic services—including budgets for schools, firefighters and assistance programs for children and the elderly—so we can pay for the fraud they committed when they wiped out $14 trillion of housing wealth, wages and retirement savings. All we have left is the capacity to say "no." And if enough of us say "no," if enough of us refuse to cooperate, the despots are in trouble.

"Let me give you a word of the philosophy of reforms," Frederick Douglass said in 1857. "The whole history of the progress of human history shows that all concessions yet made to her august claims have been born of struggle. ... If there is no struggle there is no progress. Those who profess to favor freedom and yet deprecate agitation are men who want crops without plowing up the ground. They want rain without thunder and lightning. They want the ocean without the awful roar of its many waters. The struggle may be a moral one; or it may be a physical one; or it may be both moral and physical, but it must be a struggle. Power concedes nothing without a demand. It never did and it never will. ..."

(Chris Hedges, a fellow at The Nation Institute and a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist, is the author of Death of the Liberal Class.)

20110315-05	19:09	SteveB	"Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
-------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------

Yes, irony of ironies...

"Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus" by Phil Zuckerman, Huffington Post

Mar. 3, 2011, (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/phil-zuckerman/why-evangelicals-hate-jes_b_830237.html)

The results from a recent poll published by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life (<http://www.pewforum.org/Politics-and-Elections/Tea-Party-and-Religion.aspx>) reveal what social scientists have known for a long time: White Evangelical Christians are the group least likely to support politicians or policies that reflect the actual teachings of Jesus. It is perhaps one of the strangest, most dumbfounding ironies in contemporary American culture. Evangelical Christians, who most fiercely proclaim to have a personal relationship with Christ, who most confidently declare their belief that the Bible is the inerrant word of God, who go to church on a regular basis, pray daily, listen to Christian music, and place God and His Only Begotten Son at the center of their lives, are simultaneously the very people most likely to reject his teachings and despise his radical message.

Jesus unambiguously preached mercy and forgiveness. These are supposed to be cardinal virtues of the Christian faith. And yet Evangelicals are the most supportive of the death penalty, draconian sentencing, punitive punishment over rehabilitation, and the governmental use of torture. Jesus exhorted humans to be loving, peaceful, and non-violent. And yet Evangelicals are the group of Americans most supportive of easy-access weaponry, little-to-no regulation of handgun and semi-automatic gun ownership, not to mention the violent military invasion of various countries around the world. Jesus was very clear that the pursuit of wealth was inimical to the Kingdom of God, that the rich are to be condemned, and that to be a follower of Him means to give one's money to the poor.

And yet Evangelicals are the most supportive of corporate greed and capitalistic excess, and they are the most opposed to institutional help for the nation's poor—especially poor children. They hate anything that smacks of "socialism," even though that is essentially what their Savior preached. They despise food stamp programs, subsidies for schools, hospitals, job training—anything that might dare to help out those in need. Even though helping out those in need was exactly what Jesus urged humans to do. In short, Evangelicals are that segment of America which is the most pro-militaristic, pro-gun, and pro-corporate, while simultaneously claiming to be most ardent lovers of the Prince of Peace.

What's the deal?

Before attempting an answer, allow a quick clarification. Evangelicals don't exactly hate Jesus—as we've provocatively asserted in the title of this piece. They do love him dearly. But not because of what he tried to teach humanity. Rather, Evangelicals love Jesus for what he does for them. Through his magical grace, and by shedding his precious blood, Jesus saves Evangelicals from everlasting torture in hell, and guarantees them a premium, luxury villa in heaven. For this, and this only, they love him. They can't stop thanking him. And yet, as for Jesus himself—his core values of peace, his core teachings of social justice, his core commandments of goodwill—most Evangelicals seem to have nothing but disdain.

And this is nothing new. At the end of World War I, the more rabid, and often less educated Evangelicals decried the influence of the Social Gospel amongst liberal churches. According to these self-proclaimed torch-bearers of a religion born in the Middle East, progressive church-goers had been infected by foreign ideas such as German Rationalism, Soviet-style Communism, and, of course, atheistic Darwinism. In the 1950s, the anti-Social Gospel message piggybacked the rhetoric of anticommunism, which slashed and burned its way through the Old South and onward through the Sunbelt, turning liberal churches into vacant lots along the way. It was here that the spirit and the body collided, leaving us with a prototypical Christian nationalist, hell-bent on prosperity. Charity was thus rebranded as collectivism and self-denial gave way to the gospel of accumulation. Church-to-church, sermon-to-sermon, evangelical preachers grew less comfortable with the fish and loaves Jesus who lived on earth, and more committed to the angry Jesus of the future. By the 1990s, this divine Terminator gained "most-favored Jesus status" among America's mega churches; and with that, even the mention of the former "social justice" Messiah drove the socially conscious from their larger, meaner flock.

In addition to such historical developments, there may very well simply be an underlying, all-too-human social-psychological process at root, one that probably plays itself out among all religious individuals: they see in their religion what they want to see, and deny or despise the rest. That is, religion is one big Rorschach test. People look at the content of their religious tradition—its teachings, its creeds, its prophet's proclamations—and they basically pick and choose what suits their own secular outlook.

They see in their faith what they want to see as they live their daily lives, and simultaneously ignore the rest. And as is the case for most White Evangelical Christians, what they are ignoring is actually the very heart and soul of Jesus' message—a message that emphasizes sharing, not greed. Peace-making, not war-mongering. Love, not violence.

Of course, conservative Americans have every right to support corporate greed, militarism, gun possession, and the death penalty, and to oppose welfare, food stamps, health care for those in need, etc.—it is just strange and contradictory when they claim these positions as somehow "Christian." They aren't.

20110316-01 05:43 Charis Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"

Dear SteveB,

As an evangelical I find this completely and totally offensive and untrue. But I can be tolerant of the opinions others, even if they haven't a clue what they're talking about.

20110316-02 12:17 Larry Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"

Dear SteveB,

I will accept your premise if you will agree to the following:

All Germans have a trace of Nazism even if they swear on a stack of beer a mile high.

All Frenchmen fill their bathtubs with perfume and bathe with their little brothers.

All Canadians kill their babies in hospitals.

20110316-03 15:10 SteveB Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus" Japanese Disasters

Dear Larry,

Yes, the author overstates his case. But are many of the tenants of the Evangelical movement antithetical to the apparent teachings of Jesus? It seems to me that they are. While it is wrong to over-generalize, the results of polling do seem to strongly suggest that:

"...conservative Americans...support corporate greed, militarism, gun possession, and the death penalty, and oppose welfare, food stamps, health care for those in need, etc.—it is...strange and contradictory when they claim these positions as somehow "Christian." They aren't." Really enjoyed your last email about the "Church of Steve", which is looking for converts all over the globe.

Am praying for the brave, stoical, unlucky Japanese. I don't know what's wrong with these idiot nuclear engineers. Why would they think the nuclear plant would somehow be immune from tsunamis, when tsunami is a Japanese word? Maybe an emergency generator on the roof? Maybe spring-loaded fuel rods which automatically withdraw the fuel upon a complete power failure and/or a preset high temperature? Maybe an emergency, gravity-fed cooling system? Something! Godzilla will arise!

20110316-04 15:22 SteveB Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"

Dear Charis,

Thank you for the tolerance. Didn't mean to offend. The author is , I have to admit, a little over the top, yet I have been struck many times by the lack of tolerance, charity, and forgiveness in many of the positions of the American Evangelical political movement. Maybe Jesus would be struck too.

P.S. The poll is real, not "totally untrue". Now, whether these positions are unchristian, I'm sure that can be debated.

20110316-05 15:32 Charis Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"

Dear SteveB,

Well you didn't offend me—the writer of the article did :-). And I agree, there are lots of people who call themselves evangelical Christians who don't act in a Christian way. Those people can't be truly Christians then can they. I think it's not a whole movement. It's always individuals we have to look at.

Jesus would, of course, be appalled. But then he'd be appalled at a lot of people evangelical or not. I think things like this always should be judged at the individual level. You can't ever make stereotypical or general comments like the writer of the article does about a whole movement of people. It's kind of like our government. If everyone judged us by our government we'd all be total schleps wouldn't we. But the truth is, they don't represent ALL of our personal one-on-one points of view.

Then there's the whole other separate discussion we could have about forgiveness. Many people who truly are Christians don't act in Christian ways 100% of the time. If we did and never made a single mistake we'd BE God. So really what the writer is missing is that ALL of us sin. Christians are not sinless. Christians are, however, forgiven.

20110316-06 16:31 Larry Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"

Dear SteveB,

I do not specifically consider myself to be an evangelical, especially the evangelical as described. The great majority of protestant people I know are like any other segment of society.

Some of them are failures in many ways, but would it be wise to demand that they no longer be seekers? For what sins should we call them "Jesus Haters"? Is the fault always theirs that they got very few breaks in life and have had to struggle with problems that have finally destroyed their hope? Is it because they grew up in families that shouldn't have had children; Is it because society has slapped them around because they were poor and uneducated?

Does Jesus say "Be just like me", or does he say "Follow me". Who are we to judge anybody?

Finally, I have known many people who were maybe not perfect, but they still lived a life of helping others, encouraging others, giving to the poor and spreading kindness and goodwill. Now, even though I say this, how can I prove it? Some things have to be accepted by faith. I would never say that I was one bit better than anyone else in this world, but I will tell you this, I may be an Evangelical but I do not and never have hated the Jesus I love.

20110316-07 17:30 SteveB Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"

Dear Larry,

Yes, the writer of this piece went too far. Let me say, first, that I have never considered you to be an evangelical nor a fundamentalist. You appear to me to be the opposite. It's maybe as wrong to classify or try to over-classify people as it is to judge them, but in general terms, these words, as you know, are used in the political arena—right or wrong—to describe the, often Baptist, often Southern, Christians who vote Republican as a block, oppose Roe vs. Wade, oppose gay union, interpret the Bible literally (the world is 6000 years old), oppose the theory of evolution, oppose welfare and other entitlement programs, increasingly oppose unions, do not believe in the separation of church and state, etc., etc. These views seem almost anti-Christian to me.

These people have become a powerful political force. Perhaps they are a powerful spiritual force, but I think not. They also seem to be characterized by huge congregations, huge homes for ministers, TV and radio evangelism, and scandal after scandal involving the very things they vehemently preach against...adultery, stealing, lying, homosexuality, cavorting with prostitutes, to name a few. So many have gone down in my lifetime that I've lost count. There seems to be a large element of hypocrisy.

I believe these people, as a political group, are dangerous and counter to my principles, at least.

That being said, I have known many members of this ostensible group who are among the most perfect people possible. Angels, as we say. But the angels don't seem to be political activists of a dark nature like Newt Gingrich and Sarah Palin.

You are very right to ask, who are any of us to judge? That's been one of the hardest lessons of my life that I'm still trying to learn and live. It's also something I believe Jesus tried to teach us. We/I are/am so thick! Yet there are political realities which sometimes mandate generalizations and these (below) are from a poll of evangelicals themselves. They just don't seem to be as Christian in reality as they claim to be, at least as applied to political situations.

20110316-08	17:45	SteveB	Re: "Why Evangelicals Hate Jesus"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-----------------------------------

Dear Charis,

All very true. And, as I've struggled to learn and live, and as Jesus and Buddha have tried and tried to teach me, who am I to judge anyway?

It's just, for me, the political realities are important, especially at this time in history, and they involve groups of people with similar views (as the below polls show)...some of these views seemingly dangerous and hypocritical.

But, hey, in my book, Christians are OK too, especially as individuals. :-)

20110317-01	15:30	SteveB	" Get Up, Stand Up : Do Americans Have What It Takes to Stand Up to Corporate Power and Does Wisconsin Offer Hope?"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

I keep finding myself getting more and more radical... Oh, well, I love the stuff here about Bob Marley, and all the rest seems true to me too.

"Get Up, Stand Up: Do Americans Have What It Takes to Stand Up to Corporate Power and Does Wisconsin Offer Hope?"
by Susan Warner and Bruce E. Levine, AlterNet

Mar. 15, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/150260/>)

(Bruce Levine discusses his upcoming book, Get Up, Stand Up, which analyzes why Americans have been crushed into inaction and how recent events in Wisconsin offer hope for change.)

In Dec., 2009, Bruce Levine penned a provocative article on AlterNet entitled "Are Americans a Broken People?" The piece touched a nerve among those who identify themselves as progressive, libertarian, or populist and quickly went viral across the Web. Many respondents and media members who later interviewed Levine wondered why so many Americans have remained passive in the face of attacks on their liberties and their economic well-being. In his latest book, Get Up, Stand Up: Uniting Populists, Energizing the Defeated, and Battling the Corporate Elite (Chelsea Green, 2011), Levine has delved deeper into the cultural forces that have created a politically passive U.S. population. He questions whether "learned helplessness" has taken hold, keeping many Americans locked into an abuse syndrome of sorts. And most importantly, he suggests what can be done to turn this demoralization around. We chatted about his book and some recent efforts by Americans to in fact "get up and stand up."

Susan Warner: If the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq are so unpopular, why aren't people protesting more?

Bruce Levine: Most Americans feel they have no power over whether or not the U.S. invades another nation or for how long it will be occupied. Many Americans know that their government is run by "corporate collaborators" who don't pay attention to their opinions on wars and other big-money issues that large corporations care about. So although polls show the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have become increasingly unpopular—a clear majority of Americans now oppose them—fewer people are protesting against them.

Actually, more protests occurred against these wars when they were more popular. Remember back in Feb., 2003, when many Americans still believed the U.S. government's "weapons of mass destruction" rationale for the invasion of Iraq? Even though the invasion was a more popular idea back then, there were many large demonstrations against the then-imminent war, including 500,000 protesting in New York City. Even larger protests took place in Europe, with a London protest of more than 2 million, the largest demonstration ever there. But Americans' voices and the voices of the people of Great Britain, our junior partner in the Iraq invasion, were of little concern to politicians.

Americans got the message. Their opinion may matter on issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage or other issues that the corporate-government partnership—or the “corporatocracy”—doesn’t care about, but their opinion is ignored when it comes to issues where real money is involved, such as wars and the Wall Street bailout.

SW: What can you say to frustrated anti-war activists?

BL: Anti-war activists—and other activists—routinely become frustrated when truths about lies, victimization, and oppression don’t set people free to take action. But as a psychologist who has worked with abused people for more than 25 years, it does not surprise me to see that when we as individuals or a society eat cr*p for too long, we gradually lose our self-respect to the point that we become psychologically too weak to take action.

Other observers of subjugated societies have recognized this phenomenon. Paulo Freire, the Brazilian educator and author of Pedagogy of the Oppressed, understood this reality, and so did Bob Marley, who is sort of the poet laureate of oppressed people of the world. Many Americans are embarrassed to accept that we, too, after years of domestic corporatocracy subjugation, have developed what Marley calls “mental slavery.” But unless we acknowledge that reality, we won’t begin to heal from what I call “battered people’s syndrome” and “corporatocracy abuse.” In Get Up, Stand Up, I explain how this can be done, including how people let go of the fear of resistance.

SW: You note in your book that even within this widespread passivity, there are instances of Americans “getting up and standing up.” What’s your take on recent events in Wisconsin?

BL: As I make clear in the book, especially for critically thinking pessimists who have given up hope, history teaches us that you never know—until the moment it happens—when the right historical variables will come together to encourage people to let go of their fear and gain the energy to resist.

So in Wisconsin occurred, if not a perfect storm, about as good of a storm as I’ve seen in many years. State employees had actually agreed to eat considerable cr*p, agreeing to accept a major increase in what they pay toward their pensions and healthcare benefits, but even those major concessions were not good enough for Governor Walker, who continued to demand the elimination of collective bargaining in key areas. Telling a union that they have no collective bargaining rights on health insurance, pension, and work safety is a blatant effort to try to completely crush it. By this “union death threat,” Walker put workers and union leaders in a position of having virtually nothing left to lose in terms of having a union—and when people lose their fear, watch out!

Arrogance by oppressive authorities makes them miscalculate the fear and greed variables, important ones in keeping people passive. In the case of Mubarak, his greed and arrogance resulted in him not spreading enough of his loot around with enough thugs, so not enough of them cared about his fall from power. Once Egyptians lost fear and took action, they found even more courage. And, as I discuss in Get Up, Stand Up, the arrogance of oppressive forces makes them a lot more fragile than they appear.

SW: Tell us more about the “corporatocracy,” a term you use in Get Up, Stand Up. What is its role in keeping Americans quiescent?

BL: The corporatocracy is a corporate-government partnership that governs society. In a corporatocracy, while there are elections, the reality is that corporations and the wealthy elite rule in a way to satisfy their own self-interest. Most Americans “get it” that they are not living in a democracy where they have direct power, or in a republic where they have representatives who actually represent them. Most Americans understand that giant corporations and the wealthy rule, and so people feel powerless. And this sense of powerless ultimately results in passivity.

The corporatocracy, through its huge financial resources and control of the corporate media, ensures that only Democratic or Republican candidates have a chance of winning elections. It then buys off those candidates in both parties via campaign contributions, revolving doors of employment, and other bribes in the various industrial complexes. So, people have a sort of “learned helplessness” when it comes to elections—no matter who they vote for they get unnecessary wars, Wall Street bailouts, and so forth. And those few who continue to rebel against the corporatocracy become politically and/or economically marginalized, and that further frightens people into compliance and passivity.

SW: What are other forces that you think are keeping Americans downcast?

BL: As Ralph Waldo Emerson pointed out, “The wave of evil washes all our institutions alike.”

Increasingly, much of our culture and major institutions are only about making money and controlling the population, not about creating critically thinking people who reject authoritarianism. In Get Up, Stand Up, I have a large section called "Understanding How the People Learned Powerlessness," in which I describe how people are broken by a culture and institutions created by the corporatocracy. Besides a pseudo-democratic election system that creates helplessness, Americans are broken by increasing domination of "fundamentalist consumerism" and "money-centrism" at the expense of all other aspects of their humanity—this breaks our integrity and weakens us. We are also broken by increasing social isolation, bureaucratization, surveillance, the corporate media, and by other public institutions.

SW: What about young people, who are traditionally quick to protest against authority. Why aren't they out on the streets?

BL: They're much less apt to protest because the primary socialization forces for young people pacify, zombify, and weaken them. For example, our standard schools teach compliance and following orders far more than how to think critically and resist authoritarianism. And television is such a superb pacifying force that America's for-profit prisons uses more TVs instead of hiring more prison guards, and nowadays, kids are actually watching more television than ever, with more screens than just a television set. And for many kids I talk to, their only experience of potency is a virtual one, for example, winning a video game.

For those kids who do rebel cognitively or behaviorally, and who don't mindlessly comply with any and all authorities, there is an increasing presence of my business—the mental health profession—in their lives, with increasing medication for so-called disruptive disorders such as "oppositional defiance disorder." And it is getting even worse for young people. Nowadays student-loan debt—more than two thirds of college graduates are carrying student-loan debt, often huge amounts—crushes their ability to even consider resisting unjust authority.

SW: What do you think has led to the rise of the Tea Party movement and its subsequent power?

BL: Certainly, a sense of powerlessness and anger has fueled the Tea Party movement, which is made up of many different kinds of people, and has now been exploited and co-opted by the Republican party. It is a mistake to focus only on the bigots in this movement and to focus only on the fat-cat financiers such as the Koch brothers and to focus only on Republican politician opportunists such as Sarah Palin who are exploiting this anger.

The Tea Party movement includes many grassroots members who have a genuine belief in liberty and freedom but, as with any movement, it also includes bigots and opportunists. Following the financial crisis of 2008 and losses—sometimes catastrophic—of homes, savings, or jobs for many, and following the controversial Republican-Democratic bipartisan Wall Street bailout, it would be expected that some kind of angry political movement would form. The corporate elite on Wall Street must have breathed a sigh of relief upon seeing how timid American reaction has been. The corporate elite must be especially delighted that of all the very tame reactions that have occurred, the largest—the Tea Party movement—has not been directed against Wall Street but at its junior partner, the federal government.

SW: How would you compare Tea Party activists and those movements on the Left?

BL: When it comes to cultural issues, there are major differences between those who attend Tea Party demonstrations and those who identify themselves as leftist populists; however, many people in both groups believe that elite forces who rule them do not care about ordinary people. Both left populists and Tea Partiers opposed the Wall Street bailout, and many grassroots Tea Partiers, like left populists, are opposed to the kind of corporate globalization measures—such as the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA)—that have resulted in the outsourcing of U.S. jobs overseas. Like left populists, many grassroots Tea Partiers actually oppose America's recent wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and its longtime war against drugs. Many in both groups oppose the civil liberties abuses of the Patriot Act. At the grass roots, many Tea Partiers hold anger for both Democrats and Republicans, with some grassroots Tea Partiers having even more contempt for Republicans, whom they view as more hypocritical.

SW: What are some of the major activist movements you examine in your book?

BL: In Get Up, Stand Up, I describe all kinds of modern examples, such as the worker and producer cooperatives, as well as historical examples, such as the successes of the agrarian rebels in the Great Populist revolt, successful labor strikes even in the midst of the Great Depression, such as the General Motors sit-down strike in Flint, the Abolitionist movement, and so forth.

However—and this is a big however—a major point of Get Up, Stand Up is that many people today lack the morale and energy to enact time-honored solutions, strategies, and tactics of defeating the elite. And so we must acknowledge this. That's why I spend a large section in Get Up, Stand Up describing how we regain the "energy to do battle." We must first regain self-respect and collective confidence that we can succeed.

SW: Can you give some details of successful recent activism that you detail in Get Up, Stand Up, and how progressives of all stripes can use these examples to re-energize themselves?

BL: First off, I don't particularly like the term "progressive." The corporate media routinely divides Americans as "liberals," "conservatives," and "moderates"—a useful division for the corporatocracy because no matter which of these groups is the current electoral winner, the corporatocracy retains power. In order to defeat the corporatocracy, it's more useful to divide people in terms of "elitism" and "anti-authoritarianism," or to divide them as "pro-corporatists" and "anti-corporatists."

There are many kinds of successful activism against corporations. City Life/Vida Urbana, for example, has won victories over some of America's largest banks, including the Bank of America, and prevented many foreclosures and evictions. I detail this and other successful anti-corporatist efforts in Get Up, Stand Up. But I am realistic enough to know these are a drop in the societal bucket, and I totally understand why people can move into hopelessness and defeatism.

SW: You mentioned worker and producer cooperatives. What exactly are they, and can you give me modern examples of them?

BL: While certainly a strong union gives workers more power than if workers have no union, real worker power only comes when they own and control the business they work in. A worker cooperative is a business entity that is owned and controlled by the people who work in it. A worker coop is the opposite of what occurs in the corporatocracy, since worker coops empower people to have actual control over their economic lives. One current example is Union Cab Cooperative in Madison, Wisconsin, founded in 1979 by a group of drivers, dispatchers, and mechanics. It operates as a truly democratic workplace with one member/one vote. In these worker coops, workers collectively own the business. Worker owned and controlled businesses—whether the business is a mom-and-pop independent, or Union Cab, or even larger worker coops such as Alvarado Street Bakery (with over a 100 workers and over $20 million in annual revenue)—are the antithesis of the corporatocracy.

There also continues to be producer cooperatives in the spirit of the late nineteenth-century Populist agrarian revolt. By banding together, producer cooperatives are not at the mercy of giant corporations. One modern example is the organic farming cooperative called the Coulee Region Organic Produce Pool, or CROPP. In 1988, with increasing numbers of family farms folding and others being threatened with extinction because of the low prices farmers were receiving for their goods, seven Wisconsin farmers created CROPP. It started with organic vegetables but soon moved into organic dairy products. Eventually, the CROPP cooperative developed its own brand name, Organic Valley, and has become the largest source of organic milk in the United States. CROPP has grown to approximately fourteen hundred farmers.

SW: Earlier you mentioned "battered People's syndrome" and "corporatocracy abuse"—how do individuals begin healing from these, and how can we find the courage to stand up and fight in their own lives (such as within schools and in the workplace)?

BL: Many battlefields for democracy occur in the normal course of our daily lives, and many paths can lead to regaining morale, energy, and strength. History tells us that we can extricate ourselves from fatalistic vicious cycles in which the less we do, the more we are oppressed, and the more defeatist we become.

To start, we must maintain our sense of humor. Historically, people caught up in these syndromes have learned that humor can turn pain into energy. But we must be honest with ourselves and forgive ourselves—and each other—for succumbing to this corporatocracy abuse syndrome. Beating ourselves up for having succumbed is a waste of our precious energy that would be better spent redefining ourselves as human beings who have beliefs and values that define us more than our fears and greed. And we need to redefine ourselves as worthy of respect and capable of effecting change. And then we can use our energy to provide respect and create confidence in others, which will produce even more energy for ourselves in battling the corporatocracy.

In other subjugated societies, people have learned to develop what's been called "critical consciousness" to identify both external and self-imposed forms of oppression and then begin to free themselves. By making changes in our self-imposed slavery, we can start to take actions to change our external world, and we replace a vicious cycle with an empowering

one. This is part of "liberation psychology," in which critically thinking people can regain morale, discover the various ways people are energized, learn how to combat social isolation and build community, and understand how we can forge alliances among populists—Get Up, Stand Up talks about how to accomplish this. There's a lot more to "liberation psychology" and a lot more to the book, but hopefully this gives you a taste of it.

20110322-01 08:49 SteveB "Meet the Boy Who Says He Visited Heaven and Saw Jesus"
--

"Meet the Boy Who Says He Visited Heaven and Saw Jesus" by Michael Inbar, TODAY

Mar. 21, 21011, (http://today.msnbc.msn.com/id/42191453/ns/today-today_people/?gt1=43001)

(11-year-old also describes meeting his unborn sister, great-grandfather with 'huge wings'.)

After a burst appendix nearly cost 4-year-old Colton Burpo his life in 2003, his parents were thankful just to have him alive and well. But when he opened up about his brush with death a few months later, they were shocked when he described a very vivid trip to heaven, and spoke of matters about which he had no apparent way of knowing.

During an automobile trip, when Sonja Burpo asked him about his memories of being in the hospital, little Colton replied: "Yes, Mommy, I remember — that's where the angels sang to me." A sweet answer, to be sure — but then Colton made his parents' jaws drop when he told them about sitting in Jesus' lap, watching his parents while he lay seemingly near death, and meeting his great-grandfather.

But most poignantly, Colton described meeting a sibling in heaven — even though he had no way of knowing that his mother had miscarried two years before he was born, since his parents had never told him.

Jesus and John the Baptist

Todd Burpo began telling of his son's heaven-sent visions from the pulpit of the Crossroads Wesleyan Church in Imperial, Neb., where he serves as pastor. Word of mouth spread, and the family landed a book deal. The book — Heaven Is for Real, written by Todd with co-writer Lynn Vincent — has become a best-seller, with some 1.5 million copies in print since its release in November.

Read an excerpt from 'Heaven Is for Real': <http://today.msnbc.msn.com/id/42154263/ns/today-books/t/heaven-real-one-boys-astonishing-account/?ns=today-books>.

Appearing live on TODAY Monday with Sonja and Colton, who's now 11, Todd told Matt Lauer he understands that naysayers may believe Colton's story is a little too heavenly to be true — initially, so did he and Sonja. "At first we were surprised; we never anticipated to talk to our son about these things," Todd told Matt Lauer.

"We didn't share at first, and then once we started sharing, people were amazed," Sonja Burpo added. "They were encouraged by what we were sharing with them."

Colton was stricken with appendicitis shortly before his fourth birthday. Family guilt was heavy — for five days he lay getting sicker and sicker with what the family believed was stomach flu, which had previously hit Colton's older sister Cassie.

Little Colton nearly didn't make it: He lay in a hospital bed for 17 days. When he finally rallied, the family rejoiced — but they were floored when, months later, the boy began matter-of-factly describing what he had experienced when he was in between life and death: seeing Jesus dressed in royal purple, meeting John the Baptist, having angels sing to him to ease his anxiety.

The Burpos believed these were things Colton could have gleaned from his Bible studies. But he also told his mother he saw her talking on the phone in another room while he was having surgery, and saw his father praying in a small room, all while he was seated in Jesus' lap.

"What caught my attention was he could tell me where I was while he was in surgery," Todd told Lauer. "The surgeon couldn't tell me that, the nurses couldn't, my wife couldn't tell me where I was praying. But he could tell me."

Shocking revelation

Colton also spoke of meeting a long-departed relative in heaven, telling NBC News: "I was just sitting by the Holy Spirit and then this guy comes up to me and says, 'Are you Todd's son?' I say yes, and he says, 'Well, I'm his grandfather.'"

Colton said that everyone in heaven has wings. On Monday, he described his great-grandfather "Pops" as being "very big, huge wings, curly hair, a big smile, and he was very nice."

But the real shocker came when Colton told his mother, "Mommy, I have two sisters." Sonja told her son that he had to be referring to his oldest sister, Cassie, and his cousin Traci, but he responded: "No — I have two sisters. You had a baby die in your tummy, didn't you?"

Sonja told Lauer the family had never uttered a word about the miscarriage to Colton — and what's more, they never even learned the sex of their miscarried child. "It was a private hurt that we didn't even share with our friends," Sonja said, adding Colton's revelation was at first "shocking, but then a relief that she's OK, which we didn't know she was a she."

In a subsequent TODAY segment Monday, Sonja filled in Colton's description of his meeting with his sister: "He told us what she looked like, and she wouldn't stop hugging him. And she doesn't have a name."

"When he told us about his sister in heaven, that we hadn't told him about, [it was] another one of those 'holy cow' moments — OK, he can't make this stuff up, he can't invent this; no memory was planted," Todd told Lauer. "But the peace that came over us, and the healing, like, 'Wow, I have a daughter in heaven waiting for me' — I think a lot of people need that type of hope and healing, too. And I think that's what a lot of people are finding when they hear Colton's testimony, to know what they have to look forward to."

When Lauer asked Colton what heaven looked like, the 11-year-old replied, "Well, there's a lot of color. There are a lot of people and a lot of angels."

In his second segment later on Monday, Colton gave Kathie Lee Gifford and Hoda Kotb some additional details — such as the fact that there are no old people in heaven. "Nobody wears glasses, [and] you're in like your 20s, 30s."

Todd Burpo told The New York Times that the family is donating much of the money they make from the book sales. As for Colton, he's mostly happy his story is helping people.

"People are getting blessed, and they're going to have healing from their hurts," the boy told the New York Times. "I'm happy for that."

20110322-02	15:54	SteveB	Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride
-----------------------------	-------	--------	-------------------------------------

Now THIS Is A Great Commercial:

http://joshspecter.com/2011/02/13/now-this-is-a-great-commercial/?utm_source=feedburner&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=Feed%3A+JoshSpector+%28JoshSpector.com%29

20110322-03	16:47	GaryC	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride
-----------------------------	-------	-------	---

Dear SteveB,

Very nice and so true. much better than your socialist bullsh*t.

20110322-04	16:51	SteveB	Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride
-----------------------------	-------	--------	---

Dear GaryC,

And much better than your elitist fascist bullsh*t! :-)

[Wow! This Republican stuff is kinda fun. LOL! —SteveB]

20110322-05 17:40 SteveB Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride

Dear GaryC,

[More seriously, now... —SteveB]

I am not a socialist, but I do believe in a true democracy, not this corrupt sham we have now which has bankrupted the country and destroyed the middle class. I believe in our people and politicians acting in the best interest of the whole country and its future, not foreign countries or a select few, and I believe this is where we've lost our way and gone wrong.

20110322-06 17:59 GaryC Re: Great Commercial: One Farewell Ride

Dear SteveB,

Amen, brother

20110322-07 18:14 SteveB To: Ron Paul: Impeachable, Imschmeechable! [defense]

Mr. Paul,

You are a blatant liar, sir, and you know it, when you say that Obama's actions in Libya constitute an "impeachable offense". You know better. If not, read the Constitution and the War Powers Act. You should be ashamed!

That being said, if you believe the President's actions are unconstitutional, then it is incumbent upon you to take a suit to the Supreme Court, where you will be told that neither Obama's, nor Eisenhower's, nor LBJ's, nor Nixon's, nor Reagan's (well, not Reagan's), nor Clinton's, nor the Bushs' wars were unconstitutional, even where wrong.

I am neither a Republican, nor a Democrat, nor a person who favors war. This "action" in Libya can be paid for with some of the $30 billion in Khadafi assets frozen in the U.S. You need to further study the realities of Mid-East politics and understand that a failure to act would have created grave future dangers with regard to Iran, at least, both for its own freedom fighters, for the U.S., and for the world. It is very much in our national interest to help get this Khadafi piece of cr*p out of power rather than sit on our cowardly hands and do nothing.

Please be a man and take your false words back, even if you cannot support our President. At least, please support our nation in its grave danger caused by free trade, lobbyists, lack of government oversight and regulation of industry, a formerly democratic political system corrupted by unfettered campaign contributions, and the grave errors of your own party.

20110322-08 18:26 SteveB "What People Earn—2011"

The have-nots and the haves...to my mind, the vast disparities are not necessarily earned (Dr. Phil truly amazed me! I always thought the guy was a loser!).

"What People Earn—2011" Parade

Oct. 6, 2011, (http://msn.careerbuilder.com/Article/MSN-2576-Salaries-Promotions-PARADEs-What-people-earn-2011/?SiteId=cbmsnhp42576&sc_extcmp=JS_2576_home>1=23000)

Ever dream of running for mayor? Curious how much a tattoo artist makes? How about a hot air balloon pilot in New Mexico? The answers may surprise you—and may inspire you to rethink your career. Here's what real people from across the country earn in industries far and wide. See how your paycheck matches up, or maybe get some ideas for your dream job.

Allison Coia, 46, Personal Chef, Aston, PA, $55,000

Ed Smith, 50, Owner/Pilot of a Hot Air Balloon Ride Business, Taos, NM, $92,000

Graham Parker, 25, Lifeguard, Ocean City, NJ, $7,000

Michael Cangelosi, 24, Tattoo Artist, New Orleans, LA, $40,000

Steve Cascione, 57, Meteorologist, Warwick, RI, $90,000

Juliette Goodwin, 35, Fashion Designer, Traverse City, MI, $65,000

Jay Wood, 40, Exterminator, Eldon, MO, $66,000

Joe Denning, 65, Mayor, Bowling Green, KY, $16,361

Yolanda Karas, 35, Massage Therapist, Bismarck, ND, $50,000

Michael Edwards, 49, Professional Bowler, Tulsa, OK, $24,700

What People Earn: See Hundreds of Real Americans' Salaries: <http://www.parade.com/what-people-earn/slideshows/real-people.html>.

It's no secret that most celebs can't complain when it comes to their yearly earnings. How much do they actually make? Take a peek inside the paychecks of some of your favorite stars. [Sources Include: Forbes, TV Guide and Vanity Fair]

Charlie Sheen—The Two and a Half Men star may have had a few bumps in the road this year, but his bank account is still intact. The actor earned $30 million in 2010. How's that for winning?

Sandra Bullock—Although Bullock has had a tough personal year, the Oscar-winning actress has most definitely come out on top financially, pulling in $56 million from her box office hits.

Robert Pattinson and Kristen Stewart—Twilight's dreamy Robert Pattinson earned $27.5 million, while his co-star and rumored off-screen love Kristen Stewart raked in an impressive $28.5 million. That should make for one memorable date night!

Oprah Winfrey—Talk isn't cheap, after all! Talk show queen Oprah Winfrey earned $315 million.

Lady Gaga—The "Born This Way" singer entertained the world last year, earning a $62 million nest egg.

Dr. Phil McGraw—Just what the doctor ordered! Dr. Phil McGraw took home $80 million from his day job.

Chelsea Handler—The talk-show host makes audiences laugh daily, but she's laughing all the way to the bank with $19 million in her pocket.

Ryan Seacrest and Donald Trump—A few years ago, would you ever have guessed that Ryan Seacrest would out-earn The Donald? It's close, but Seacrest brought home $51 million, while Donald Trump earned "just" $50 million.

Beyonce and Jay-Z—Wonder if there's any salary competition in Beyonce and Jay Z's house? Beyonce out-earned her hubby last year, with $87 million, while Jay brought home a cool $63 million.

Dear SteveB,

I am not a fascist.

20110323-01 08:57 Bill Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster

Dear SteveB,

Duct tape, rubber bands, wire coat hangers, pliers and screwdrivers, and ingenuity. These are the things that keep the world running.

20110323-02 09:04 SteveB Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster

Dear Bill,

Yes, too bad those a*s-hole engineers who mis-designed the Japanese nuclear plant didn't have any of those things, especially the "ingenuity".

20110323-03 09:19 Bill Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster

Dear SteveB,

Why, hell, it costs too much to design to a 9.0 earthquake, although that kind of thinking is definitely under review now.

20110323-04 10:58 SteveB Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster

Dear Bill,

But the earthquake was not 9.0 at the plant! You notice that it was the tsunami that did the damage...to the plant and everywhere else. The quake was no big deal for Japan. But Tsunami is a Japanese word...all over the world, in almost every language now...and it is the east coast of Japan that gets them. Why not build the plant on the west coast? Why not expect a tsunami? Why not place the emergency back-up generators on the roof? Why not place reactors where they can have an emergency gravity fed or horse powered cooling water system? Why didn't they have an emergency generator and pumps on a truck, waiting on a hill to be wheeled into place and plugged-in in an emergency instead of taking weeks to run wire? Why not get rid of the spent rods before they cause a problem? Why not have fail-safe spring-loaded rods in the reactors which can at least pull back the rods in an emergency so they aren't so hot? Why not use the electricity being generated at the plant to run the pumps? (Though this is what they tried at Chernobyl that backfired.) Why not foresee, before you build these monsters, that if something goes wrong, there is hell to pay! Why build them if they are not perfect (as they must be to exist on the planet)?

Stupid, stupid, stupid...it pi*sses me off!

20110323-05 11:17 Dennis "May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions"

Dear SteveB,

History repeats...abolishing unions...

This is not to insinuate that Hitler was a tea bagger...or that Republican governors are proto-fascists or anything....

"May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions" by Ole Ole Olson, News Junkie Post

Feb 20, 2011, (<http://newsjunkiepost.com/2011/02/20/may-1933-hitler-abolishes-unions/>)

On May 2nd, 1933, the day after Labor day, Nazi groups occupied union halls and labor leaders were arrested. Trade Unions were outlawed by Adolf Hitler, while collective bargaining and the right to strike was abolished. This was the beginning of a consolidation of power by the fascist regime which systematically wiped out all opposition groups, starting with unions, liberals, socialists, and communists using Himmler's state police.

Fast forward to America today, particularly Wisconsin. Governor Walker and the Republican/Tea Party members of the state legislature are attempting to pass a bill that would not only severely punish public unions (with exception for the police, fire, and state trooper unions that supported his campaign), but it would effectively end 50 years to the right of these workers to collectively bargain.

Collective bargaining is a process of voluntary negotiations between employers and trade unions aimed at reaching agreements which regulate working conditions. Collective agreements usually set out wage scales, working hours, training, health and safety, overtime, grievance mechanisms and rights to participate in workplace or company affairs. —Wikipedia

First of all, assaulting the rights of workers to collectively bargain has absolutely nothing to do with any immediate budgetary issues. It does however have everything to do with ending one of the basic rights of labor to organize.

Second, and more importantly, the budget "crisis" in Wisconsin is both exaggerated and created in part by the new Republican power base as a tool to attack political opponents. Walker decreased state revenue when he enacted tax cuts for the rich and big corporations, who are not surprisingly large campaign donors for his political campaign.

To the extent that there is an imbalance — Walker claims there is a $137 million deficit — it is not because of a drop in revenues or increases in the cost of state employee contracts, benefits or pensions. It is because Walker and his allies pushed through $140 million in new spending for special-interest groups in January. If the Legislature were simply to rescind Walker's new spending schemes — or delay their implementation until they are offset by fresh revenues — the "crisis" would not exist. — The Cap Times

(http://host.madison.com/ct/news/opinion/editorial/article_61064e9a-27b0-5f28-b6d1-a57c8b2aaaf6.html)

Decimating unions has long been an objective of the rich and powerful. Growing out of trade guilds in Medieval Europe, they were banned starting with the Ordinance of Labourers 1349 and Statute of Labourers in England. It was not until the Industrial Revolution that labor began to organize again.

Every little gain for the rights of workers was hard fought and bitterly resisted by the rich and powerful. The photo above shows the Lawrence Textile Strike (also known as the Bread and Roses strike) where mostly immigrant workers rebelled against increasingly harsh work conditions and lowered pay caused by mechanization. Specifically, state law mandated a reduction in working hours for women and children from 56 to 54 hours, and factory owners responded by cutting salaries, something the poor workers could not afford.

Over time, organized labor managed to abolish child labor all together, as well as institute an 8 hour work day, 40 hour work week, mandatory breaks, safety guidelines, grievance procedures, a minimum wage, the concept of a work free weekend, workers comp, pensions, health safeguards, and paid sick days, vacation days, and holidays. If you enjoy any of these things, thank a union member and support the passage of a strong Employee Free Choice Act (EFCA).

Collective Bargaining in the U.S. was finally legalized for the private sector on a countrywide scale in 1935 with the National Labor Relations Act signed by FDR. JFK signed an executive order extending this right to the public sector in 1962.

Governor Walker's bill being sped through the Wisconsin legislature would mandate health insurance contributions by public employees, force them to pay more for their promised pensions, and remove bargaining rights. When public employees started protesting, Walker instructed the state National Guard to be "prepared" if any "problems" should arise, in what could be described as a thinly veiled intimidation tactic.

Although this draconian bill will not outlaw unions, it will effectively neuter them, as their CPI adjusted wages will be frozen and all other means cannot be improved as a whole. Public sector unions will lose their freedom to negotiate against the state together. This is a deliberate tactic to punish political opponents and to effectively lessen the rights of working Americans everywhere for the benefit of the rich and multinational corporations.

Walker's plan to eviscerate collective bargaining rights for public employees is right out of the Koch brothers' playbook. Koch-backed groups like Americans for Prosperity, the Cato Institute, the Competitive Enterprise Institute, and the Reason Foundation have long taken a very antagonistic view toward public-sector unions. Several of these groups have urged the eradication of these unions. In Wisconsin, this conservative, anti-union view is being placed into action by lawmakers in sync with the deep-pocketed donors who helped them obtain power. (Walker also opposes the state's Clean Energy Job Act, which would compel the state to increase its use of alternative energy.) At this moment — even with the Wisconsin uprising unresolved — the Koch brothers' investment in Walker appears to be paying off. —Mother Jones

<http://motherjones.com/mojo/2011/02/wisconsin-scott-walker-koch-brothers>

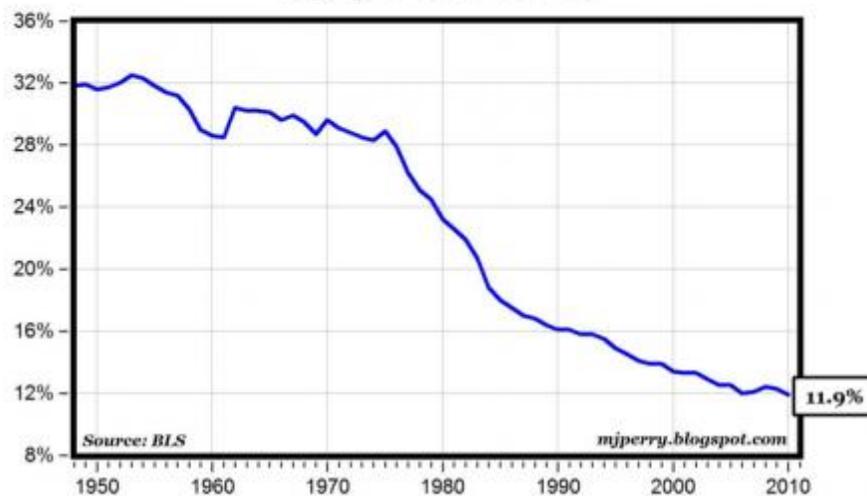

In response to this open revolt on at the Wisconsin state capitol, which saw crowds initially in the hundreds quickly swell to tens of thousands, a Tea Party group hastily organized a counter rally on Sunday. Dozens of free buses were mysteriously available from both inside and outside the state for Tea Partiers, with no mention of who paid for them, leading to speculation that this is blatant corporate astroturfing. At publishing time no camels were being charged into the estimated 70,000 pro-worker/anti-Walker demonstrators [creative humor license].

The Americans for Prosperity group, a Tea Party group that is a Koch Brothers front, has put up a website [for the Tea Party Rally that] attacks all collective bargaining — not just for public employees' unions. —Forbes

Wisconsin is ground zero in the fight for worker's rights in America. Following the ultra-conservative sweep of many state legislatures and governorships in the 2010 midterms, most Republicans are salivating at the opportunity to destroy the last stronghold of organized labor in America: the public sector.

Last year, more working people belonged to a union in the public sector (7.9 million) than in the private (7.4 million), despite the fact that corporate America employs five times the number of wage-earners. 37 percent of government workers belong to a union, compared with just 7 percent of private-sector employees. —Alternet

Union Membership Percent of All U.S. Workers 1948 to 2010

The percentage of the work force that have been organized has been declining (along with many other things) since Reagan and the conservatives took power, ending the Great Compression and starting an epoch in American history known as the Great Divergence (which culminated in the Great Recession, which we are in today). Pro-corporate, fiscally conservative policies (such as deregulation and underfunding) have severely damaged private sector unions, unions that set the bar for standards and pay for all workers (thus, contributing towards the huge wealth concentration that is taking place).

The one point where this anti-union trend has not taken place is in the public sector:

This is precisely why the conservatives (mostly in the Republican Party) and their corporate masters are now planning the next phase in their strategy: to destroy public sector unions across the country. Right now, their assault has triggered a massive and growing revolt by not only public sector unions, but students, progressives, and working men and women across the Upper Midwest region of the U.S.

The corporate front groups are desperately trying to play catch-up and unleash their Tea Party legions, who need little convincing as apparent from the We Stand With Walker Facebook page. The fear and hate caused by disinformation and Fox Propaganda is palpable, and they are only too eager to "fight back" against supposed union transgressions both in the workplace and in demonstrations.

Which brings us back full circle. Union busting measures by Republicans in Wisconsin this week have brought up some disturbing historical parallels to another sad chapter from human history. This writer is not trying to say that Republicans are Nazis and the Tea Party are their Brown shirts, only that the union busting, corporate control over the government is part of the definition of fascism (along with authoritarian nationalism).

The attacks on unions that are taking place in American society today echoes a very sad chapter in Western history where unions were smashed for the benefit of a far right authoritarian corporate regime. When Hitler abolished unions in 1933, it was followed by a 25% drop in real wages, and ended the ability of workers to protect living standards, and this is one of those times where history should not be allowed to repeat itself.

20110323-06	11:20	Bill	Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster
-----------------------------	-------	------	-------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

You're quite right about the magnitude not being 9.0 at the plant. As to other questions, the economics of building such plants is probably the largest cause of inadequacy. Stupidity and feeble foresight are probably the second and third. Moreover, human beings will, sooner or later, probably trash the planet completely.

20110323-07 11:49 SteveB Re: Japanese Nuclear Disaster

Dear Bill.

I share your optimism! :-)

If the reality is that these plants must be built inadequately, maybe they shouldn't be built at all. Or away from tsunamis.

20110323-08 11:54 SteveB Fw: "May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions"

Dear GaryC,

Not that there could possibly be any parallels, but some good stuff here later in the article. Check out this link:

Abolishing Unions: (<http://newsjunkiepost.com/2011/02/20/may-1933-hitler-abolishes-unions/>)

20110323-09 12:06 SteveB Re: "May 1933: Hitler Abolishes Unions"

Dear Dennis,

Thank you for an excellent summary of the price paid with the lives of innocents to achieve a little unionization in America, see SteveG's excellent "Did They Die in Vain?" email.

It's so amazing to me the way these Republicans are out to destroy our great nation and have been for a long time. Unfortunately, the Democrats aren't very far behind. I just have one question, when Khadafy makes a public speech that goes on and on, from a 2nd story balcony no less, why doesn't he get a missile up his a*s, so this whole thing can be put to rest sooner rather than later? War is hell, but if war must be waged, it must be waged with all means necessary! How could all our wars not have taught us this truth?

20110323-10 12:09 Dennis "3/4ths of Senate GOP Doesn't Believe in Science—When Did Republicans Go Completely Off the Deep End?"

Science: not profitable or good politics?

"3/4ths of Senate GOP Doesn't Believe in Science—When Did Republicans Go Completely Off the Deep End?" by Robert Benson, Miller-McCune.com

Mar. 22, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/150340/>)

You've got to go back to the Scopes Monkey Trial of 1925 for a precedent to the anti-science mania that is currently sweeping the GOP. Then, the issue was teaching Darwin's work on evolution in the schools. Today, the issue is global warming. Then, as now, large numbers of politicians tapped into the stratum of popular culture that simply rejects science as the basis for public or personal decisions. The chief prosecutor of high school teacher John Scopes, William Jennings Bryan, gloated that literal interpretation of the Bible trumped scientific knowledge. This resonated with large masses of ordinary folks, the ones H. L. Mencken and the liberal press were calling "yokels" and "morons."

Turns out the yokels and morons won, at least for a generation. Scopes was found guilty of violating the Tennessee law that prohibited teaching evolution, and his conviction (though later overturned on a technicality) galvanized the anti-evolution movement for years. Politicians came pouring in. Scores of resolutions were introduced in state legislatures and school boards all over the country, setting back the teaching of evolution for decades until logic and reason and the scientific method gradually reasserted themselves in the culture.

Today, Republicans are falling over themselves in a rush to ridicule the science that shows our use of fossil fuels is producing greenhouse gases that are warming the planet to disastrous levels. These findings were confirmed even by the Bush administration before it left office, as well as by the U.S. National Academy of Sciences and every other significant scientific academy around the world, not to mention the unpaid global work of hundreds of volunteer scientists for the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change.

But anti-scientists are undaunted by facts. More than half of the incoming Republican caucus denies the validity of climate change science. Some 74 percent of Republicans in the U.S. Senate now take that stance, as do 53 percent of GOP in the House. Here's a sampler of what some of their leading illuminati have to say about it:

"I personally believe that the solar flares are more responsible for climatic cycles than anything that human beings do. ..."—Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner, Wisconsin

"Nobody really knows the cause. The earth cools, the earth warms ... It could be caused by carbon dioxide or methane. Maybe we should kill the cows to stop the methane, or stop breathing to stop the CO₂ ... Thousands of people die every year of cold, so if we had global warming it would save lives ... We ought to look out for people. The earth can take care of itself."—Rep. Duncan Hunter, California

"There was a report a couple of weeks ago that in fact you look at this last year, it was the warmest year in the last decade, I think was the numbers that came out. I don't accept that. I do not say that it is man-made."—Rep. Fred Upton, Michigan

"The greatest hoax ever perpetuated on the American people."—Sen. James Inhofe, Oklahoma

Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois says we need not worry about the planet being destroyed because, citing chapter 8, verse 22 of the Book of Genesis, God promised Noah it wouldn't happen again after the great flood.

Sen. John McCain co-authored a good global warming bill when running for president in 2008. But he did a 180-degree turnabout when running for re-election to Arizona's Senate seat two years later, suddenly saying, "There's great questions about it that need to be resolved."

What happened?

The Tea Party and its allies had made it unacceptable to the GOP base to be anywhere except pandering to the anti-science crowd.

None of this would have surprised historian Richard Hofstadter, who won a Pulitzer in 1964 for his book Anti-Intellectualism in American Life. Starting with the colonies, Hofstadter shows how the vast underlying stratum of anti-elite, anti-reason, anti-science Americans has frequently erupted into political and cultural action. These are folks who never heard of the Enlightenment of the 18th century, and do not experience a lot of reason, logic or the empirical method in their daily lives. They live by "common sense," personal relationships and superstition. They have always been with us, and there are a lot of them. Their outburst into today's anti-science global warming mania would just be the latest chapter in Hofstadter's book.

You might think that the revolution of Internet-blogging-networking technology would work to spread sound scientific knowledge more broadly, but you would be wrong. The new technology spreads a cacophony of voices in which the pre-Enlightenment folks are not only equal but more numerous and dominant than the voices of reason. Journalist Charles Pierce not long ago wrote an essay on "Idiot America," followed by a book of that name, in which he argued that "the rise of Idiot America today represents—for profit mainly, but also, and more cynically, for political advantage and in the pursuit of power—the breakdown of a consensus that the pursuit of knowledge is a good. It also represents the ascendancy of the notion that the people whom we should trust the least are the people who best know what they're talking about. In the new media age, everybody is a historian, or a preacher, or a scientist, or a sage. And if everyone is an expert, then nobody is, and the worst thing you can be in a society where everybody is an expert is, well, an actual expert."

Moreover, the new technology is not working alone. You have the likes of oil interests such as Koch Industries and Exxon Mobil funding a phalanx of anti-science spokesmen, think tanks and lobbyists. They put their money into sowing doubt about the scientific consensus, as many of these same people did on tobacco, ozone and acid rain, playing on the fact that the way science works is to set up repeated challenges of the evidence by peers but ignoring that scientific consensus do indeed exist—otherwise, we would not have made the progress we did on tobacco, ozone and acid rain.

Sheltered by the technological cacophony and the big money available, politicians feel unashamed to stand in front of the National Academy of Sciences and virtually every climate scientist in the world and utter irrational things like “God promised Noah...,” or “solar flares,” or “nobody really knows,” “not man-made” or “hoax.”

“[The deniers’] goal is to create the perception that fundamental aspects of climate science are controversial,” write several scientists connected to the National Academy. “They are not. All their claims, all the studies cited and all the evidence they have presented has been thoroughly reviewed by climate scientists. There is no scientific basis for contesting the academy’s finding.”

We are in Tennessee again, 1925, in the grip of the anti-scientists and their politicians. We will lose a generation in dealing with greenhouse gases. Yet the science says we have only a few years.

20110323-11	12:20	Dennis	“Kochs Profit from Canadian Eco-Nightmare”
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Clean air is bad business for Republicans...

“Kochs Profit from Canadian Eco-Nightmare” by Geoff Dembicki, The Tyee

Mar. 22, 2011, (<http://www.alternet.org/story/150336/>)

What do Tea Party rallies, Republican victories, climate-change deniers, Wisconsin's anti-union push, and attacks on a cap-and-trade market for carbon emissions have in common?

They're all fueled in part by profits derived from Alberta, Canada's oil sands. Those profits, flowing to a single company, are helping bankroll a libertarian offensive many observers think is shifting America's political culture profoundly to the right. One of the central tenets of that campaign is a disbelief not only in the pressing risks of climate change, but that humans are even causing it.

That article of faith is now being embraced by the American public, with only 51 percent concerned about global warming, compared to 66 percent three years ago.

And it's no exaggeration to say the roots of this campaign can largely be traced back to two powerful businessmen: Charles and David Koch. Together, America's fifth richest citizens—each worth $21.5 billion—own Koch Industries, a refining, pipeline, chemical and paper conglomerate that manufactures common household products such as Brawny paper towels and Stainmaster carpets. They're also one of the biggest refiners of Alberta oil sands crude, handling an estimated 25 percent of all imports entering the U.S.

Anytime a clean energy law threatens to impact those operations, the Kochs fight back hard. Not content anymore to wage war from the sidelines, the brothers and their allies have now installed themselves at the heart of Republican power in Washington, D.C.

Never before in the U.S. has the oil sands industry enjoyed such direct political influence.

Kochs pulled out of shadows

Despite being America's second-largest privately run company, Koch Industries was virtually unknown to the wider public until last spring.

That was when Greenpeace released a report detailing how the conglomerate had funneled tens of millions of dollars between 2005 and 2008 to groups skeptical that climate change exists.

Such activism is central to the Koch brothers' hard-line libertarian ideology, which espouses a general distrust of government control.

As more reports surfaced about Koch Industries—notably a lengthy New Yorker expose in August—the company's growing political influence gained national attention.

The brothers are now widely thought to be one of the driving forces behind the Tea Party movement, founding an advocacy group called Americans for Prosperity, which has provided critical funding and logistical support. Americans for Prosperity played a lead role in the Republican takeover of congress in last December's midterm elections. Budgeting $45 million for political advocacy, the group ran hard-hitting radio and TV ads throughout the year extremely critical of Democrat congressmen, especially those who'd endorsed national climate-change laws.

In one, average-looking Coloradans filmed in front of rancher's fields lambast Betsy Markey, their representative, because she "voted for cap and trade, the new energy taxes that would cost Colorado thousands of jobs."

Putting together a Tea Party

At the same time Americans for Prosperity helped coordinate and organize Tea Party rallies from coast to coast. Drawing upon an often confusing mix of grassroots idealism, government distrust and oil company mandates, the movement endorsed right-wing candidates across America, many of whom were elected to the House and Senate last year.

Though David Koch denies any links to the Tea Party movement, an unnamed Republican insider quoted by the New Yorker thought otherwise.

"The Koch brothers gave the money that founded [the Tea Party]," he said. "It's like they put the seeds in the ground. Then the rainstorm comes, and the frogs come out of the mud—and they're our candidates."

It's highly probable that at least some of that money came from Koch Industries' major investments in Alberta's oil sands industry.

Flint Hills Resources, a fully owned Koch subsidiary, operates a Minnesota refinery capable of processing 320,000 barrels of crude a day, about four-fifths of which is sourced from Alberta.

To put that in context, SolveClimate News recently estimated that this single refinery handles one quarter of all oil sands crude entering the U.S. That would make Koch Industries one of the top players in the industry. (It's not clear exactly how much revenue that refinery brings in, because the company is privately held and doesn't make those figures publicly available.)

Kochs target global warming laws

Oil sands crude requires more energy to produce and refine than conventional oil, generally resulting in much higher greenhouse gas emissions. Refineries that depend on it are especially vulnerable to the types of clean energy legislation proposed in growing force over the past few years.

Koch Industries appears to be particularly attuned to global warming laws that could hurt its bottom line. The company was one of the first oil firms to lobby directly against a national low carbon fuel standard in 2007, filing records that state: "Oppose restraints on production and use of energy."

Since then, fuel standards have become one of the fiercest battlegrounds in Washington's war over the oil sands. Those laws, if ever enacted, could be equivalent to taking 30 million cars off the road by 2020, according to research cited by Barack Obama during his presidential election campaign.

They would do this in part by discouraging American suppliers from using road fuels derived from Alberta's oil sands and other high-carbon sources—precisely the type of fuels that Koch-owned Flint Hills Resources produces.

As Koch Industries notes on its Web site: "[This legislation] would be particularly devastating for refiners that use heavy Canadian crude oil because the policy seeks to discourage or even prevent the U.S. from benefiting from this essential, reliable resource."

Republican friends elected

For the time being, it appears the Koch brothers have little to worry about. Every attempt so far to enact a national low carbon fuel standard has been scuttled by intense fossil fuel lobbying, sometimes with the "support" of the Canadian and Alberta governments.

And the last midterm elections produced a Republican stronghold generally hostile to the very idea that climate change is even a problem, much less one that should be addressed.

Koch Industries wields considerable influence in this new political environment, especially on the powerful House Energy and Commerce Committee, where it contributed $279,500 to 22 of the panel's 31 Republicans, the largest donation of any oil and gas player.

Already, the Republican majority in the House voted to cut all American funding for the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, one of the lead organizations studying global warming.

And the House Energy Committee continues to push legislation that would eliminate the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's authority to regulate greenhouse gases. The rationale for such an attack was laid out in a Wall Street Journal op-ed last December, co-authored by Energy Committee head Fred Upton (a Michigan Republican), and Americans for Prosperity leader Tim Phillips.

They called the EPA's plans to reduce America's carbon emissions "an unconstitutional power grab that will kill millions of jobs—unless Congress steps in." Last week, Democrats on the energy panel introduced amendments that would have forced their Republican colleagues to acknowledge that global warming poses major environmental threats.

All 31 Republican members declined to vote in favor of the amendments, claiming instead that the science around climate change "is not settled."

Kochs backed Wisconsin's anti-labor governor

Koch Industries has not restricted its growing political activism to Washington. In Wisconsin, early versions of the state's Clean Energy Jobs Act contained a low carbon fuel standard. But state policymakers dropped that provision last May, possibly a result of nearly $400,000 in Koch lobbying (not to mention pressure from the Alberta and Canadian governments).

The Koch brothers appear to have also played an instigating role in the Wisconsin labor protests. Their company was one of the biggest funders of Republican governor Scott Walker's election campaign. Walker, once in office, proposed spending cuts targeting union benefits and bargaining rights, causing a massive public backlash. Americans for Prosperity executives reportedly encouraged the labor showdown even before Walker was sworn in. The group is now working with policymakers and activists in Indiana, Ohio and Pennsylvania to slash their union spending.

While all this was happening, Americans for Prosperity was coordinating a public relations campaign to kill cap and trade in New Hampshire. The Republican dominated legislature had proposed a bill ejecting New Hampshire from the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, a 10-state coalition attempting to combat climate change.

During the lead-up to the vote, Americans for Prosperity paid for automated phone calls to citizens across the state, urging them to support the bill. It passed recently with a wide margin, effectively terminating New Hampshire's long-term climate change plan.

And that's not all, wrote AFP's Phil Kerpen afterward. "In the process, it could deal the death blow to cap and trade both regionally and nationally." That'd be a huge win for Koch Industries, which wouldn't have to worry about the high emissions caused by refining Alberta oil sands crude, at least until the next clean energy law was proposed.

In the meantime, the Koch brothers hope to consolidate political control not just over Congress, but the White House too. Watch for their hand in the next presidential election.

Don't you just love it when America's financial press exposes the latest corporate tax rip-off scheme? Happy Tax Holiday!

[Here's just one reason why the effective corporate tax rate is much lower than the ostensible 35%. —SteveB]

"Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets" by David Zeiler, Money Morning

Mar. 23, 2011, (<http://moneymorning.com/2011/03/23/corporate-tax-holiday-could-put-1.2-trillion-in-shareholders-pockets/>)

Lawmakers in Washington are mulling a one-time corporate tax holiday on foreign earnings that could provide a bonanza to many U.S. multinational corporations. If enacted, the holiday would allow U.S. corporations to bring home $1.2 trillion in profits they have stashed overseas at a much lower rate—about 5% as compared to the usual 35%.

Many large multinationals, particularly those in the health and tech sectors, say the tax holiday would be the equivalent of a "free" stimulus package: the government would recover tax revenue while the companies would have more money to invest in job creation, factories, equipment, and research and development.

Of course, corporations fed most of the booty from a 2004 tax holiday back to shareholders in the form of dividends and stock buybacks. But that's not what the multinationals want Washington to hear. They've formed a coalition to lobby the job creation/investment angle on Capitol Hill while using the weak economy as an ally.

"The simple truth is there are few policy options left that will inject this amount of money into the economy and cost taxpayers next to nothing," Doug Thornell of SKDKnickerbocker, a public relations firm advising the coalition, told the San Diego Union-Tribune.

To understand why this is so important to the big multinationals, one need only examine how foreign earnings are taxed. Each U.S. corporation initially pays a tax to the country in which it made a profit. The difference between the foreign nation's tax (usually far below the U.S. rate) and the 35% U.S. tax is what a company owes the Internal Revenue Service. So if a company makes $1,000 in a country that has a tax of 10%, it owes that country $100 and the IRS $250. But the IRS can't collect its share until the company brings that money back to the United States.

So the obvious tax dodge is to let the profits pile up in foreign bank accounts—though the catch is that the money can't be spent in the United States until it's repatriated. No wonder the coalition includes so many corporate heavyweights: Oracle Corporation (Nasdaq: ORCL), Cisco Systems Inc. (Nasdaq: CSCO), Apple Inc. (Nasdaq: AAPL), Duke Energy Corporation (NYSE: DUK), Qualcomm Inc. (Nasdaq: QCOM), Google Inc. (Nasdaq: GOOG), Microsoft Corporation (Nasdaq: MSFT), and Pfizer Inc. (NYSE: PFE).

A Taxing Issue

In Congress the tax holiday not only has the support of many Republicans, but also some key Democrats, including Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-CA. Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney has gone so far as to make the one-time tax break a staple in his speeches, promising a recent New Hampshire audience that it would generate "hundreds of thousands—if not millions—of good, permanent, private sector jobs."

Not everyone's enthused about granting the multinationals a tax holiday, however. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-ND, of the Senate Finance Committee told Businessweek that to enact a tax holiday without reforming the overall corporate tax code "makes a farce out of the whole system." Likewise, U.S. Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner has indicated that U.S. President Barack Obama might be open to considering the tax holiday only if it were part of a comprehensive tax reform package.

But comprehensive tax reform could become very complicated. U.S. Rep. Dave Camp, R-MI, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, supports the tax holiday and also has proposed reducing the corporate tax rate from 35% to 25%. The Obama administration has said it might consider both, but only if coupled with the elimination of certain deductions and loopholes—something corporate America is sure to resist.

Many Republicans, however, favor treating the tax holiday as a separate issue. "Forging consensus on this type of fundamental tax reform will take time, so in the meantime I propose that we allow U.S. multi-national companies to bring back almost $1.2 trillion in overseas profits at a lower tax so they can invest in our economy here at home," House Majority Leader Eric Cantor said Monday in a speech at Stanford University.

Whether or not the tax holiday ends up as part of a comprehensive reform plan will likely determine its fate—when it happens or if it happens at all. It's not a shoo-in by any means. The most recent attempt to grant a one-time break on foreign profits, an amendment cosponsored in 2009 by Sen. Boxer and Sen. John Ensign, R-NV, was defeated 42-55 on the Senate floor.

History Lessons

Proponents will need to overcome an arsenal of negative data from the 2004 tax holiday. Then, as now, the big multinational corporations dangled promises of new jobs and investment if given a tax break.

But that's not what happened. Nominally a success—843 companies brought back $362 billion in profits in 2004—the exercise mostly resulted in a bonanza for shareholders, with little spent on job creation or other investments.

One recent joint study by economists C. Fritz Foley of Harvard University, Kristin Forbes of Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Dhammika Dharmapala of the University of Illinois estimated that each $1 in repatriated profit in 2004 translated to a $0.60-$0.92 increase in payouts to shareholders—even though the law granting the holiday specified the repatriated money not be used for dividend payments or stock buybacks.

Because money is fungible, companies were able to work around the restrictions. The repatriated profits were used to pay for already budgeted expenses, thus freeing up money—unhindered by those restrictions—for stock buybacks and distribution to shareholders.

That history has even some business leaders questioning the wisdom of a second tax holiday.

"A one-time repatriation of profits is a bad idea," United Technologies Corporation (NYSE: UTX) Chief Financial Officer Gregory J. Hayes told Businessweek. "My fear is that we'll have a repeat of 2004. If companies repatriate these profits and spend it on things like share buybacks, that will create such negative connotations around tax reform with the public."

Others worry that a second tax holiday will send corporations the message they should continue to stash profits overseas, counting on yet another break in the future.

In fact, a 2009 Congressional Research Service study shows several companies that repatriated large sums in 2004 accumulated much larger amounts of foreign profit in the years that followed.

Pfizer brought back $37 billion in 2004 but then went on to accumulate $101 billion in new foreign earnings; Citigroup Inc. (NYSE: C) repatriated $3.2 billion then added $35.8 billion; PepsiCo Inc. (NYSE: PEP) returned $7.5 billion then accumulated $25.5 billion more.

Worse still, the CRS study shows several corporations that brought back significant profits also shed workers. Pfizer cut 10,000 jobs between 2005 and 2006. Hewlett-Packard Company (NYSE: HPQ) brought back $14.5 billion and cut 14,500 jobs. Merck & Co. Inc. (NYSE: MRK) repatriated $15.9 billion and eliminated 7,000 jobs.

Members of the corporate coalition argue that whatever companies do with the money will boost the still-anemic U.S. economy.

In a guest editorial in The Wall Street Journal last October, Oracle CEO Safra Catz and Cisco CEO John Chambers wrote that a tax holiday could "provide needed stability for the equity markets because companies would expand their activity in mergers and acquisitions, and would pay dividends or buy back stock. And when markets go up, confidence increases and businesses and consumers begin to spend."

Critics remain skeptical. "A tax holiday would bring a substantial amount of cash back to the United States and paying that out to shareholders is good for the economy," Forbes, one of the authors of the economists' study on the previous tax holiday, told Fortune. "But if you're a politician claiming this will create a lot of jobs or new investment, it isn't supported by the data."

Related Links:

- San Diego Union-Tribune: Tapping into Offshore Cash, (<http://www.utsandiego.com/news/2011/mar/18/tapping-into-offshore-cash/>)
- Joint Study: Watch What I Do, Not What I Say: The Unintended Consequences of the Homeland Investment Act, (<http://www.people.hbs.edu/ffoley/HIA.pdf>)
- Fortune: Apple, Cisco, Others Organize for a Tax Holiday Lobby, (http://money.cnn.com/2011/02/16/news/companies/repatriation_lobby.fortune/index.htm)
- Boston Globe: Romney's Plan for Tax Breaks Stirs Debate, (http://articles.boston.com/2011-03-11/news/29339648_1_corporate-tax-rate-tax-code-new-jobs)
- The Wall Street Journal: The Overseas Profits Elephant in the Room, (<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052748704469004575533880328930598.html>)
- Bloomberg Businessweek: Apple, Google May Profit on a Tax Holiday, (http://www.businessweek.com/magazine/content/11_13/b4221064108107.htm)
- Nasdaq: Majority Leader Cantor: U.S. Corporate Taxes Must Be Lowered To At Least 25%, (<http://ericcantor.us/2011/03/majority-leader-cantorus-corporate-taxes-must-be-lowered-to-at-least-25/>)
- Bloomberg: Tax Holiday for $1 Trillion May Lure Back Profits Without Growth, (<http://www.bloomberg.com/news/2011-03-17/tax-holiday-for-1-trillion-may-lure-profits-without-spurring-u-s-growth.html>)
- Congressional Research Service: Tax Cuts on Repatriation Earnings as Economic Stimulus: An Economic Analysis, (<http://openocrs.com/document/R40178/>)
- Wealth Daily: The 10 Year $1.5 Trillion Tax Hike, (<http://www.wealthdaily.com/articles/obamabudget/2974>)
- Top Foreign Stocks: U.S. Has One of the Lowest Taxes Among OECD Countries, (<http://topforeignstocks.com/2011/10/10/usa-has-one-of-the-lowest-taxes-among-oecd-countries/>)

20110325-01 08:31 SteveB Fw: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"

Dear GaryC,

Here's just one reason why the effective corporate tax rate is much lower than the ostensible 35%.

"Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets" by David Zeiler, Money Morning

Mar. 23, 2011, (<http://moneymorning.com/2011/03/23/corporate-tax-holiday-could-put-1.2-trillion-in-shareholders-pockets/>)

20110325-02 09:34 GaryC Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"

Dear SteveB,

YES, FOR SELECTED INDUSTRIES. THIS IS WHAT HAPPENS WHEN POLITICIANS USE THE TAX CODE TO FAVOR SOCIAL INITIATIVES OR FAVORED INDUSTRIES LIKE SOLAR, WIND ETC. IT WOULD BE BEST TO ELIMINATE ALL CREDITS AND OTHER BONUSES SO ALL COMPANIES HAVE A LEVEL PLAYING FIELD. THIS IS ALSO TRUE WITH INDIVIDUAL RATES. TOO MUCH MESSING WITH BASIC CONCEPTS.

[But a level playing field is not always the best thing for a nation, which wants to encourage certain kinds of beneficial economic activity and discourage detrimental activity, as should have been done while our manufacturing base was allowed to be dismantled. —SteveB]

20110325-03 11:32 SteveB Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"

Dear GaryC,

I think we need just the reverse of this proposed amnesty...tax law that rewards investment in this country and penalizes investment abroad. We're in deep sh*t and need to find a way out or we're history. Later, maybe something simpler could work.

20110325-04 11:39 GaryC Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"

Dear SteveB,

The Law of Unintended Consequences would be at play under your theory. If Wal Mart cannot buy from companies in China, then the price of all of their goods in U.S. stores are going to go way up. This hurts the poor the most. If Lilly and other drug companies can't make drugs overseas, then the cost of drugs goes up and the poor suffer the most. What you need is a policy that encourages U.S. production in such a way that U.S. companies can afford to do business in the U.S. Regulations, taxes and higher U.S. wages make this difficult for us entrepreneurs in the U.S. I don't have an easy answer to this mess but I do know that China will not always be a cheap source of labor for the U.S. Of course, Brazil, Turkey, Vietnam or Portugal may be the next cheap labor source.

20110325-05 13:57 SteveB Re: "Corporate Tax Holiday Could Put $1.2 Trillion in Shareholders' Pockets"

Dear GaryC,

I am completely for higher prices and more American jobs. F*ck Wal-Mart! Wages need to rise too and haven't for a long time. American taxes are low, low, low already and it doesn't seem to be helping us, does it? According to the Republican dogma (and that's exactly what it is), all this free trade and low taxes and deregulation should have helped us, but those things have all hurt us and increased the debt, all debt. Look at our slide backwards during your lifetime. Something drastic needs to be done. I know this represents an argument for your flat tax too, but GE made like $8 billion last year and paid no taxes. The effective tax rate is way too low. There are no incentives for investment in America and that has to change!

But instead of thinking in this direction, all the Republicans can come up with is union busting, illegal immigration, no affordable health care, attacks on education and abortion, and more free trade. Damn!

20110326-01 18:08 Larry Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear SteveB,

In Mere Christianity, C.S. Lewis says, "I am trying here to prevent anyone saying the really foolish thing that people often say about Him: "I'm ready to accept Jesus as a great moral teacher, but I don't accept His claim to be God." That is the one thing we must not say. A man who said the sort of things Jesus said would not be a great moral teacher. He would either be a lunatic — on a level with the man who says he is a poached egg — or else he would be the Devil of Hell. You must make your choice. Either this man was, and is, the Son of God: or else a madman or something worse. You can shut Him up for a fool, you can spit at Him and kill Him as a demon; or you can fall at His feet and call Him Lord and God. But let us not come with any patronizing nonsense about His being a great human teacher. He has not left that open to us. He did not intend to."

20110327-01 10:37 SteveB Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear Larry,

Thank you for the passage above. I am always happy to hear your views and to try to understand them, in my spiritually crippled way. And I truly mean that. I am not being sarcastic or insincere.

You know, in the Church of Steve, we worry or concern ourselves more with God than with Jesus. I'm not sure, especially if Jesus is God, why God gets left out of Christianity so much. You don't hear much about God in many churches unless the Old Testament is being quoted. Maybe this is because Jesus was one of us. He's more accessible. Like Mary to the Catholics. They go all the way down to her in the hierarchy because of some humility or shyness on their part. Yet we know so little of Jesus, in reality, and almost nothing of Mary.

But I guess we know even less of God. God is some titanic, alien thing that we can't possibly comprehend, so Christianity mostly leaves Him out, except through the lip service of the Trinity, another great mystery. I know Christianity is about Christ, that's why it exists. But what about the one true God? If He is anything like the Old Testament God, He must be hurt and angry, right? This bothers me.

Once my wife, Marci, was talking with a fundamentalist minister to whose church a dear friend belongs. She told him that she prays to God and that He sometimes answers her, sometimes speaks to her. He told her that was impossible. No one could do that. She must go through Jesus. How could she even think of such a thing? To me, in a word, the ideas of fundamentalism in this regard are weird, despite the fact that Jesus allegedly said that you couldn't get to God except through Jesus, whatever that means.

And speaking of that old, vindictive, pi*sed-off God...it bothers me that the only thing Christianity seems to know about God is what is in the collection of wild, discredited myths in the holy book of a completely different religion—the Old Testament of the Jews. To me, except for possible, tenuous predictions about Jesus, the OT has nothing to do with the Christian God. It is an alien religion just like Islam, and we don't include the Koran in the Bible, do we? Or the Babylonian and Sumerian holy books which are the sources of the OT myths. We don't even include all the texts concerning Jesus, like the ones from the Dead Sea scrolls. Exceedingly strange! The bureaucracy of even the very early Church seems to distort everything.

In Buddhism, God is the center of all things and, strangely, so is Man. God is known as something that is part of us, that we are part of. He is everything and everyone and every star, not something alien, aside, ignored. He is rarely studied or even talked about in isolation. I guess you would say that it is only through His manifestations in this life—as people, as animals, as plants, as the Earth and universe, as life and love—that we can know Him. Yet we can know Him, at least as much as is possible, even within the confines of our own minds, if we will just be still enough to listen, if we will just truly pray.

To me this would not be an alien concept to Christ, and should not be to Christians. I think Jesus would want us to know God and concentrate less on His worldly servant, messenger, son.

But that's just me and, as you say, who are we to judge...anything. The Church of Steve has only one member, so far, and we don't—in all honesty—really know who Jesus was, but we do believe in the one true God.

20110327-02	10:51	Charis	Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)
-----------------------------	-------	--------	--

Dear SteveB,

a) An interesting fact: Did you know that initially CS Lewis was a raging atheist for most of his life?

b) I'm not sure what kind of Christians you hang out with Steve. Most of the ones I know do not separate God from Christianity at all. In our minds God and Christ cannot exist separately. Once cannot exist without the other because they are one and the same.

Maybe it would help you to think of it in LESS human terms (and by this I mean try NOT to think of it like there is God and he's one guy, the dad, and then there's Jesus and he's another, the son) like they're on different hierarchical levels

Maybe visualize it this way instead: there is only one God. God makes man. God knows man won't understand him if he appears to man in his "un-human" form so he manifests himself to humans in a "human" form so we'll be able to relate to him. But it's the same guy.

20110327-03 10:57 SteveB Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear Charis,

Very Buddhist, and He also manifests himself to all of us, who will listen, directly, without son, without minister, without priest, without church...

20110327-04 11:09 Charis Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear SteveB,

I think what I'm trying to say is that God used language and "visuals" he knew humans would be able to relate to.

I was never taught that the Bible was written by God himself. I was taught the Bible was written by men inspired by God to spread a message he wanted humans to have.

There are similarities between Christianity and a lot of other religions or belief systems in terms of the lessons, morals and values they teach us.

There are differences, however. Some religious preach that God is within us therefore humans ARE god and we just have to tap into a sufficiently high sphere to become godlike or reach the same level as God (scientology, the Moonies, metaphysicists, etc.). Others preach similar values but don't claim their prophets were the son of God or God himself. Just prophets. (Bahai, etc.) Some do claim their prophets were actual manifestations of God himself. Those ones claim Jesus wasn't the son of God - only a prophet himself. (Islam, etc.)

20110327-05 16:13 SteveB Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear Charis,

Well, it's always a pleasure to discuss things with you. I hope we can all do a lot of that together when we return to Santa Cruz soon. And religion and spirituality have always been fascinating to me.

I don't exactly claim to be an actual Christian, but I know the dogma. I have read the whole Bible word-for word twice in my life, and parts many more times. Though that hardly makes me an expert, I don't think most people have done that. I have read every word of the Koran and many, many Buddhist texts and commentaries, the "missing books" of the Bible, and studied all the Western philosophers. I have always wanted to know and searched for answers.

When I was a boy, we went to church. My father was a Quaker (as is my cousin, Larry, who is a minister and a great one), but my Dad never went to church with us. My Mom would take us to a church until someone would do something to pi*s her off, then we would go to a different church. I know this wasn't very Christian of her, but that's the way she was. So I became acquainted with all the divisions of Protestantism. Later, my first wife was a Lutheran, so I ostensibly became a Lutheran and that became the church of our three children. Later still, my second wife is a Catholic, so I ostensibly became a Catholic. I love the good of the traditions of both of these churches and feel closer to God, somehow, in Church (as though I believe the fallacy of Him being "other"). So I know the dogma.

And, right now, I am finishing up my longest poem ever, "Dark Matter", which will conclude my book of poems from the last fifteen years—Sun and Moon. This poem is largely about my spiritual quest and God, whoever or whatever He may be. So this subject is near and dear to my heart right now.

Please allow me to tell you a small story. I have always worked. I worked around our little "farm" for my father from the age of about ten. He paid me by the hour rather than giving me an allowance. When I was thirteen, I set pins at the local university's bowling alley (non-automated) for ten cents a line (game). I started my first real business (Baker Electronics) when I was still in high school. We must be a lot alike in our entrepreneurial spirits.

In high school I played in rock bands, so I was able to get a better (than the bowling alley) part-time job at a music instrument store. My boss was a very great, very good man named Ken Kersey. He taught me so much...how to repair musical instruments, how a piano is tuned, how to sell, how the customer is always right but may need to be educated a little, how to deliver giant upright pianos with just one other guy. I was lucky to have known him, and his son, a musician himself, is still a friend of mine.

Anyway, in those days, tape recorders were fairly rare and expensive. They were one of the things we sold, very good ones. One three day weekend, I was hired by a local Baptist church to use one of our best models to record a three day debate between two ministers. The subject was whether God was one or three. The event was held in a large building on the local fair grounds. There were hundreds of people in attendance. I was right there in front with my equipment and microphones. The ministers went on for three solid days, plus time for questions. Neither side actually won, but both sides presented interesting arguments. I can't pretend that, at that age, I understood everything that was said, but I paid close attention. I decided then and in later years that if these two learned, devout men couldn't really figure this out, except as a matter of differing faith, then I certainly wasn't going to. Who am I to judge anyway?

So I can't ever be a member of any church or faith or system of faith which pretends to know the answers to questions such as these. If other people can find their way to faith in such matters, to some certainty that they know the mind and nature of the mysterious God, then more power to them. I am happy for them and for you, if you are one of them. I choose to stand back a little. Actually, I don't exactly choose that position. It is the only one possible for me.

20110327-06	17:02	SteveB	Re: Fw: 28th Amendment / Congressional Reform Act
-------------	-------	--------	---

Dear Robert,

I think an amendment to totally stop all campaign contributions of more than $100, and to severely limit lobbying and revolving regulatory doors are much more important than term limits, etc. I also think we need amendments forcing balancing the federal budget except for dire emergencies, guaranteeing the right to collective bargaining, separation of church and state, and the right to innocence until proven guilty are just as important as term limits.

But I have no arguments against the amendment as presented. Let's do it!

from Robert, Mar. 27, 2011, 4:49 pm

My vote is for two six year terms!!!

[Source of original email unknown. —SteveB]

The 26th amendment (granting the right to vote for 18 year-olds) took only 3 months & 8 days to be ratified! Why?

Simple! The people demanded it. That was in 1971...before computers, before e-mail, before cell phones, etc. Of the 27 amendments to the Constitution, seven (7) took 1 year or less to become the law of the land...all because of public pressure.

I'm asking each addressee to forward this email to a minimum of twenty people on their address list; in turn ask each of those to do likewise. In three days, most people in The United States of America will have the message. This is one idea that really should be passed around.

Congressional Reform Act of 2011

1. Term Limits. 12 years only, one of the possible options below:

- A. Two Six-year Senate terms
- B. Six Two-year House terms

C. One Six-year Senate term and three Two-Year House terms

2. No Tenure / No Pension. A Congressman collects a salary while in office and receives no pay when they are out of office.
3. Congress (past, present & future) participates in Social Security. All funds in the Congressional retirement fund move to the Social Security system immediately. All future funds flow into the Social Security system, and Congress participates with the American people.
4. Congress can purchase their own retirement plan, just as all Americans do.
5. Congress will no longer vote themselves a pay raise. Congressional pay will rise by the lower of CPI or 3%.
6. Congress loses their current health care system and participates in the same health care system as the American people.
7. Congress must equally abide by all laws they impose on the American people.
8. All contracts with past and present Congressmen are void effective 1/1/12. The American people did not make this contract with Congressmen. Congressmen made all these contracts for themselves.

Serving in Congress is an honor, not a career. The Founding Fathers envisioned citizen legislators, so ours should serve their term(s), then go home and back to work.

If each person contacts a minimum of twenty people then it will only take three days for most people (in the U.S.) to receive the message. Maybe it is time. THIS IS HOW YOU FIX CONGRESS!!!! If you agree with the above, pass it on. If not, just delete

20110327-07 21:09 Larry Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear SteveB,

Actually, I am more a part of "the Church of Larry" than I am a part of the Quaker Church. I don't believe things just because Quaker's believe them and I am free to make God central and I am free to make Christ central. I am also free to keep my feelings about deity totally to myself, and I never barge into sensitive religious issues that might offend others. I have even criticized the Quaker Church publicly when I felt like they deserved it, and this has made me more friends than not.

I never tell people that they are wrong about religious issues, and I am ashamed of the preacher who was unkind to Marci.

When my children were growing up I would tell them, "There is absolutely nothing in this world that you can do to keep me from loving you". And our kids were as close to being perfect as any kid could be.

Cousin, I have always treasured you as a dear friend and there is nothing in this world that you could do to make me feel differently. So never worry about "offending" me about religion or anything else. You can't do it. It can't be done.

Tell your wife that she looks truly lovely in those pictures that you sent us the other day.

20110328-01 21:36 SteveB Re: Mere Christianity (On a Spring Sunday)

Dear Larry,

Thank you. I feel the same way about you, cuz. You know I'm always trying to figure this stuff out. I have questions and mysteries instead of answers, especially for anyone else...but I know I get a little preachy sometimes. I get frustrated sometimes when so many people seem to know the mind of God, yet they all disagree, and I can never figure out how they managed to crack the nut to begin with.

For myself, I prefer "retirement" in Santa Cruz, Bolivia (very, very low cost of living)—2 million people, a taxi ride costs $1-$2, a bus is 20 cents, a full time maid is about $120/month. Climate is semi-tropical, but not as cold, hot, or humid as Florida. Incredible fruits and vegetables, even the old-style, real tomatoes, are available year-round. The women are among the most beautiful in the world.

But for those of you stuck with retirement in the U.S., see below from "The Best Retirement Places" by William P. Barrett, Forbes

Mar. 27, 2011. (http://www.forbes.com/2011/03/23/best-retirement-places-cities-living-costs-doctors-crime_slide.html?partner=yahoo)

Lists of best places to retire are a popular mainstay of personal finance journalism. Here at Forbes we've published our share, producing rosters focusing on favored locations for retirees seeking an active lifestyle, a foreign residence and even, in the U.S., an urban neighborhood.

As part of the new Forbes "2011 Retirement Guide," our latest offering — "The Best Retirement Places" — considers a wide range of factors but focuses especially on two bottom-line issues: tax burden and cost of living. That's why you won't see any locations in the highest-tax, highest-cost states like California, New Jersey, New York and Connecticut.

Still, in canvassing cities with populations starting at around 100,000, we look at a lot of issues besides costs. They include weather, availability of doctors, driving environment, crime rates and opportunities for an active retirement, which we defined by the extent of volunteering and outdoor paths for bicycling and walking. The roster of cities skews toward more temperate climates but not completely: It contains Fargo, N.D., Pittsburgh and some other chilly-in-the-winter places like Indianapolis, Colorado Springs, Kansas City and Salt Lake City.

Evaluating jurisdictions for taxes can be deceptive. Texas, for instance, lacks a state income tax, an omission it touts far and wide in its economic development efforts. But the Lone Star State more than makes up for that with a hefty sales tax and the nation's third-highest property tax (measured as a percent of fair market value). These taxes are not touted far and wide. Result: Texas ranks only in the middle on tax burden. Nevertheless, San Antonio makes our list, largely on the basis of low living costs and availability of doctors.

Washington State is another place without an income tax, making it a bit of a bug light for people seeking jobs at companies like Microsoft, Amazon, Boeing, and Google have large facilities in the Evergreen State. But sales tax burden per capita is the nation's second highest (after Wyoming, another income tax-less state), and the property tax hit is also above average. Accordingly, despite a temperate climate and a big cultural scene, Forbes is sleepless in Seattle, as well as, at the state's other end, in Spokane, which we once called the "scam capital of America."

Eleven states give special tax breaks to retirees, and we weigh that in our evaluations. This helps to earn spots for Lexington, Pittsburgh and Charleston, S.C. As we see it, the states with the best tax climates for retirees are Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Idaho, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montana, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah and West Virginia.

Every city on the list has a low cost of living as measured by government statistics. Five — Charlotte, Colorado Springs, Indianapolis, Kansas City and Tucson — also made our recent Best Places for Bargain Retirement list.

This list is displayed alphabetically. So New Mexicans should not be unduly excited that Albuquerque comes first, nor residents of Tucson upset their city sits at the end. In our judgment, all are meritorious from a retirement perspective.

The Best Retirement Places:

1. Albuquerque. N.M.

Fast Fact: Home of world's largest hot-air balloon event.

Pros: Terrific weather, low taxes, lot of doctors, modest cost of living.
Cons: Crime, difficult environment for driving.

2. Charleston, S.C.

Fast Fact: U.S. Civil War began in harbor.
Pros: Lowest tax bite of all, low cost of living, agreeable climate, plenty of physicians.
Con: Hurricane threats.

3. Charlotte, N.C.

Fast Fact: Nation's largest banking center after New York.
Pros: Cheap housing and living, temperate climate, good place for drivers, abundant physicians
Cons: Crime, tax climate only so-so.

4. Colorado Springs, Colo.

Fast Fact: Unofficial nonprofit capital of America.
Pros: Affordable housing, low cost of living, safe streets, lots of volunteer opportunities.
Cons: Cold winters, a bit light on doctors.

5. Fargo, N.D.

Fast Fact: Named for a Wells Fargo co-founder.
Pros: Lowest crime rate on list, inexpensive living, numerous doctors, opportunities for staying active.
Cons: Cold, snowy winters, floods

6. Indianapolis, Ind.

Fast Fact: Hometown of writer Kurt Vonnegut.
Pros: Very affordable housing, encouragement for active seniors, robust medical establishment.
Cons: Cold winters, crime.

7. Jacksonville, Fla.

Fast Fact: Florida's largest city.
Pros: Fine climate, low living costs, no state income or estate tax, plenty of doctors.
Con: Other taxes high.

Article continues...

20110328-03	11:14	GaryC	"The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	--------------------------------

"The Price of Taxing the Rich" by Robert Frank, The Wall Street Journal

Mar. 26, 2011 (http://online.wsj.com/article_email/SB10001424052748704604704576220491592684626-1MyQjAxMTAxMDIwODEyNDgyWj.html#project%3DWealthReport_0311%26articleTabs%3Darticle)

(The top 1% of earners fill the coffers of states like California and New York during a boom and leave them starved for revenue in a bust.)

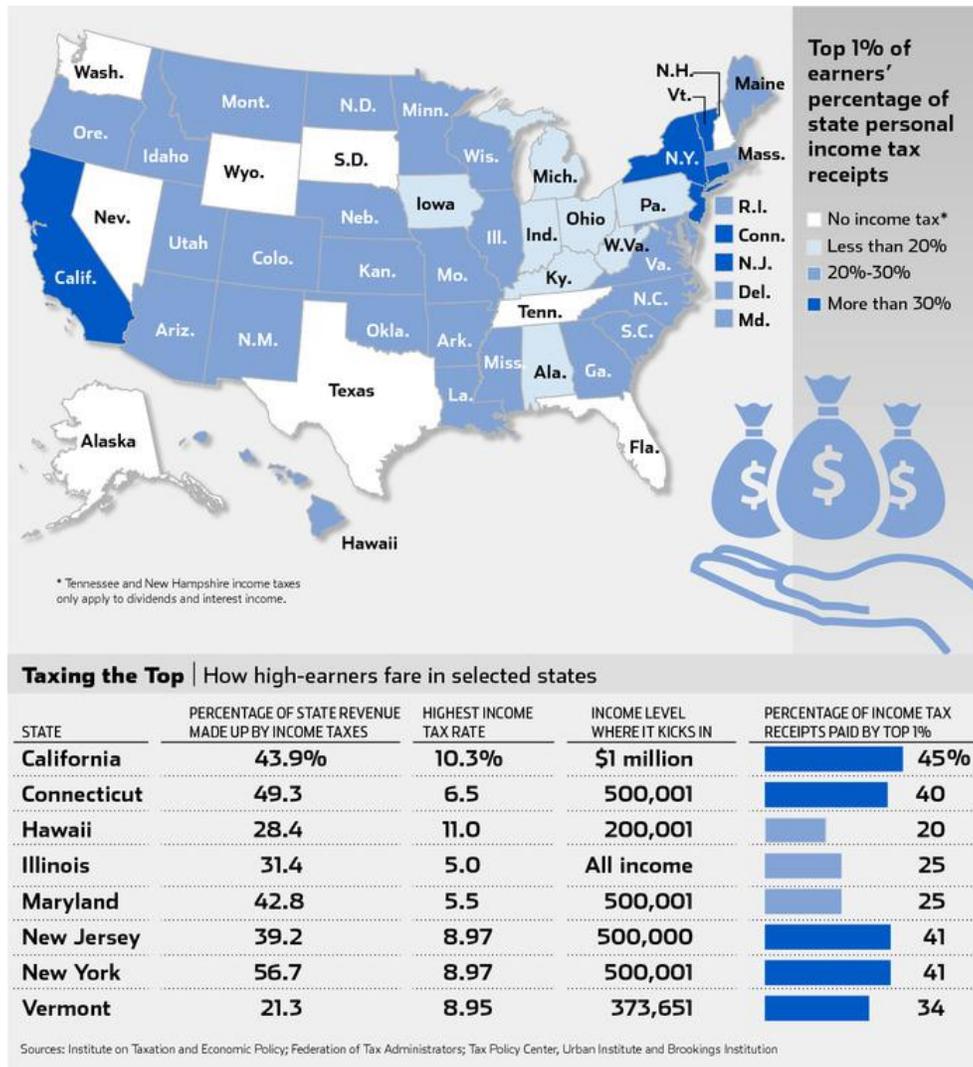

As Brad Williams walked the halls of the California state capitol in Sacramento on a recent afternoon, he spotted a small crowd of protesters battling state spending cuts. They wore shiny white buttons that said "We Love Jobs!" and argued that looming budget reductions will hurt the Golden State's working class.

Mr. Williams shook his head. "They're missing the real problem," he said.

The working class may be taking a beating from spending cuts used to close a cavernous deficit, Mr. Williams said, but the root of California's woes is its reliance on taxing the wealthy.

Nearly half of California's income taxes before the recession came from the top 1% of earners: households that took in more than $490,000 a year. High earners, it turns out, have especially volatile incomes. Their earnings fell by more than twice as much as the rest of the population's during the recession. When they crashed, they took California's finances down with them.

Mr. Williams, a former economic forecaster for the state, spent more than a decade warning state leaders about California's over-dependence on the rich. "We created a revenue cliff," he said. "We built a large part of our government on the state's most unstable income group."

New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Illinois, states that are the most heavily reliant on the taxes of the wealthy, are now among those with the biggest budget holes. A large population of rich residents was a blessing during the boom, showering states with billions in tax revenue. But it became a curse as their incomes collapsed with financial markets.

Arriving at a time of greatly increased public spending, this reversal highlights the dependence of the states on the outside incomes of the wealthy. The result for state finances and budgets has been extreme volatility.

Falling Fortunes:

Interactive Map: (http://online.wsj.com/article_email/SB10001424052748704604704576220491592684626-1MyQjAxMTAxMDIwODEyNDgyWj.html#project%3DWealthReport_0311%26articleTabs%3Dinteractive)

Many states are drawing in less money, partly due to lower incomes among high earners. Compare income tax receipts state by state and see the change from 2007 to 2009.

In New York before the recession, the top 1% of earners, who made more than $580,000 a year, paid 41% of the state's income taxes in 2007, up from 25% in 1994, according to state tax data. The top 1% of taxpayers paid 40% or more of state income taxes in New Jersey and Connecticut. In Illinois, which has a flat income-tax rate of 5%, the top 15% paid more than half the state's income taxes.

This growing dependence on wealthy taxpayers is being driven by soaring salaries at the top of the income ladder and by the nation's progressive income taxes, which levy the highest rates on the highest taxable incomes. The top federal income-tax rate has fallen dramatically over the past century, from more than 90% during World War II to 35% today. But the top tax rate, which applies to joint filers reporting $379,000 in taxable income, is still twice as high as the rate for joint filers reporting income of $69,000 or less.

The future of federal income taxes on the wealthy remains in flux. The top tax rate is 35%, following the Congressional tax battle last year. But in 2013, the rate is scheduled to go back to 39.6% unless Congress takes further action.

State income taxes are generally less progressive than federal income taxes, and more than a half-dozen states have no income tax. Yet a number of states have recently hiked taxes on the top earners to raise revenue during the recession. New York, for instance, imposed a "millionaire's tax" in 2009 on those earning $500,000 or more, although the tax is expected to expire at the end of 2011. Connecticut's top income-tax rate has crept up to 6.5% from 4.5% in 2002, while Oregon raised the top tax rate to 11% from 9% for filers with income of more than $500,000.

As they've grown, the incomes of the wealthy have become more unstable. Between 2007 and 2008, the incomes of the top-earning 1% fell 16%, compared to a decline of 4% for U.S. earners as a whole, according to the IRS. Because today's highest salaries are usually linked to financial markets through stock-based pay or investments, they are more prone to sudden shocks.

The income swings have created more extreme booms and busts for state governments. In New York, the top 1% of taxpayers contribute more to the state's year-to-year tax swings than all the other taxpayers combined, according to a study by the Rockefeller Institute of Government. In its January report downgrading New Jersey's credit rating, Standard & Poor's stated that New Jersey's wealth "translates into a high ability to pay taxes but might also contribute to potential revenue volatility."

State budget shortfalls have other causes, of course, from high unemployment and weak retail sales to falling real-estate values and the rising costs of health-care and pensions. State spending has expanded rapidly over the past decade. California's total spending grew from $99.2 billion in 2000-01 to a projected $136 billion in 2010-11, not including federal funds, according to the state Department of Finance. Though California's spending slipped by 15% during the recession, it has since returned to near prerecession levels.

Some states may get a lifeline this year from the financial markets. Starting late last year, California, New Jersey and others began seeing higher-than-expected income-tax revenues and capital-gains revenues, suggesting the start of the next boom cycle. Still, because many states based their spending plans on the assumption that the windfalls from the wealthy would return every year, they are now grappling with multibillion-dollar shortfalls.

A recent study by the Pew Center on the States and the Rockefeller Institute found that in 2009, states overestimated their revenues by more than $50 billion, due largely to the unexpected fall-off in personal-income taxes. Sales and corporate taxes have also fallen, but they account for a much smaller share of tax revenue in many states.

Tax experts say the problems at the state level could spread to Washington, as the highest earners gain a larger share of both national income and the tax burden. The top 1% paid 38% of federal income taxes in 2008, up from 25% in 1991, and they earned 20% of all national income in 2008, up from 13% in 1991, according to the Tax Foundation.

"These revenues have a narcotic effect on legislatures," said Greg Torres, president of MassINC, a nonpartisan think tank. "They become numb to the trend and think the revenue picture is improving, but they don't realize the money is ephemeral."

Kicking the addiction has proven difficult, since it's so fraught with partisan politics. Republicans advocate lowering taxes on the wealthy to broaden state tax bases and reduce volatility. Democrats oppose the move, saying a less progressive tax system would only add to growing income inequality.

College students and faculty protest budget cuts in Sacramento on Mar. 14. Income taxes account for more than half of California's general revenue.

In a blog post called "The Volatility Monster," California Democratic State Sen. Noreen Evans wrote that "the true response to solving the volatility problem is to make sure Californians are fully employed and decently paid. Preserving the state's progressive tax system is fundamental to combating the rising riches at the top and rising poverty at the bottom. Flattening our tax system would simply increase this already historic income inequality," she wrote.

U.S. Rep. Tom McClintock (R., Calif.) has for years advocated a flat tax in California to reduce volatility and keep high-earners from leaving the state. "California has one of the most steeply disproportionate income taxes in the nation," he said. "A flatter, broader tax rate would help stabilize the most volatile of California's revenues."

Rainy-day funds, which can help bail out governments during recessions, have also run into political opposition or proven too small to save state budgets. A study by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities found that effective rainy day funds should be 15% of state operating expenditures more than three times the state average before the crisis. Massachusetts, which saw a 75% drop in capital-gains collections during the recession, won plaudits from ratings firms and economists for creating a rainy-day fund in 2010 using future capital-gains revenues.

Economists and state budget chiefs say the best hedge is better planning. Budget staffers in New York, for instance, now spend more time studying Wall Street pay and bonuses to more accurately predict state revenues. The state's budget director avoids overly optimistic forecasts based on a previous year's strong growth.

"We're glad we have the revenue from the wealthy, and we want to encourage these people to stay and prosper," said Robert L. Megna, budget director for New York state. "But we have to recognize that because you have them, you'll have this big volatility."

The story of Mr. Williams, the former chief economist and forecaster for the California Legislative Analyst's Office, shows just how vulnerable states have become to the income shocks among the rich, and why reform has proven difficult.

In the mid-1990s, shortly after taking the job, Mr. Williams discovered he had a problem. Part of his job was to help state politicians plan their budgets and tax projections.

A lanky, 6-foot-4-inch 58-year-old, with piercing blue eyes and a fondness for cycling, Mr. Williams prided himself on his deep data dives. The Wall Street Journal named him California's most accurate forecaster in 1998 for his work the prior decade. He and his team placed a special focus on employment and age data and developed their own econometric models to make improvements.

Historically, California's tax revenues tracked the broader state economy. Yet in the mid-1990s, Mr. Williams noticed that they had started to diverge. Employment was barely growing while income-tax revenue was soaring.

"It was like we suddenly had two different economies," Mr. Williams said. "There was the California economy and then there were personal income taxes."

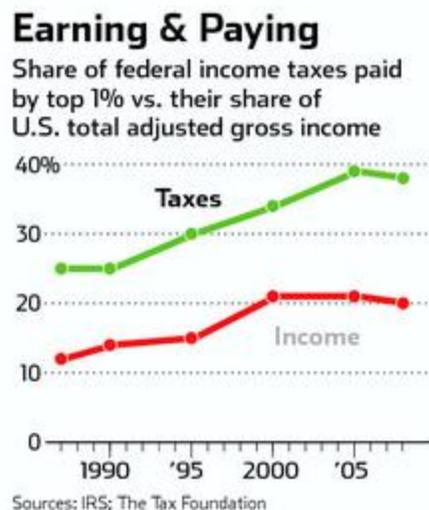

In all his years of forecasting, he had rarely encountered such a puzzle. He did some economic sleuthing and discovered that most of the growth was coming from a small group of high earners. The average incomes of the top 20% of Californian earners (households making $95,000 in 1998) jumped by an inflation-adjusted 75% between 1980 and 1998, while incomes for the rest of the state grew by less than 3% over the same period. Capital-gains realizations, largely stock sales, quadrupled between 1994 and 1999, to nearly $80 billion.

Mr. Williams reported his findings in early 2000, in a report called "California's Changing Income Distribution," which was widely circulated in the state capital. He wrote that state tax collections would be "subject to more volatility than in the past."

Mr. Williams wasn't the only one noticing the state's dependence on the wealthy. Economists and governors had for years lamented the state's high tax rates on the rich, and in 2009 a bipartisan commission set up by then Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger recommended an across-the-board reduction in income-tax rates and a broader sales tax to reduce the state's dependence on the wealthy. The income-tax rate on Californians making more than $1 million a year is 10.3%, compared to less than 6% for those making under $26,600. Combined with the rising share of income going to the top, the state's progressive rates amplify the impact of the income gains or losses of the wealthy.

California's dependence on income taxes has also grown because of its shifting economy. Income taxes now account for more than half of its general revenue, up from about a third in 1981. Because the state's sales and use tax applies mainly to goods, rather than faster-growing services, it has declined in importance. The state's corporate tax has also shrunk relative to income taxes because of tax credits and other changes.

By the late 1990s, Mr. Williams realized that his job had changed. California's future was no longer tied to the broader economy, but to a small group of ultra-earners. To predict the state's revenue, he had to start forecasting the fortunes of the rich. That meant forecasting the performance of stocks, specifically, a handful of high-tech stocks.

He pored over SEC filings for Apple, Oracle and other California tech giants. He met with the financial advisers to the rich, asking them about the investment plans of their clients. He watched daily stock movements and stock sales reported by the state's tax collectors.

Working with the state's tax collectors, he did a geographic breakdown of capital gains. The vast majority were in Silicon Valley.

"We knew there was a bubble," he said, "We just didn't know when it would fall, or by how much."

After the dot-com bust, the state's revenues from capital gains fell by more than two-thirds, to $5 billion in 2003 from $17 billion in 2001, while personal-income taxes fell 15% over the same period. The recession created a mirror image of the boom, with the wealthy leading the crash and dragging tax revenues down with them. By 2002, California had a budget shortfall of more than $20 billion.

The deficit lingered for years, but its lessons seemed to be quickly forgotten in the state capital. By 2005, California was enjoying another surge in spending fed by the incomes of the wealthy.

Mr. Williams started warning of another government crisis. In 2005, he released a report stating that the state's tax revenues could vary by as much as $6 billion in a single year, and that such swings were "more likely than not." He recommended several potential reforms, including flatter income-tax rates, "income averaging," which allows the wealthy to spread their tax payments for unusual windfalls over a longer period of time, and a rainy-day fund.

His proposals failed to gain any traction with the legislature. Many Democrats refused to consider tax hikes on the middle class and lower rates for the rich. In 2009, voters rejected a proposed spending cap, which among other things, would have helped to create a rainy-day fund.

One of the leading advocates for such a fund is Roger Niello, a former Republican assemblyman who has long been among the top 1% of state earners. He and his family own a chain of luxury car dealerships, and during the recession, his income fell by more than half because of the decline of auto sales. Though he's still "fine financially," he said, his personal experience taught him that "people in this income group have the most variable incomes."

Darrell Steinberg, the Democratic leader of the state senate, agrees that the dependence on the wealthy is "one of our most fundamental problems." Yet he concedes that his own spending priorities, including a large expansion of mental-health programs funded by a millionaire's tax, have added to the current mismatch between revenues and spending.

"I have no regrets given the number of people we've helped," he said. "But I guess you could say I did my part with spending."

As time went by, Mr. Williams became increasingly frustrated. To do his job properly, he had to predict the stock market. "And that's impossible," he said. He also felt that all of his research and warnings fell on deaf ears. In 2007, he decided to retire, and he now he works for a consulting firm.

"I was a broken record," he said. "I just kept saying the same thing over and over. And with my job, there was no real pleasure in being right."

(Vauhini Vara contributed to this article.)

20110328-04	16:30	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

Dear GaryC,

Rupert Murdoch!

All these numbers also show the rich getting richer. They are paying a higher share of the taxes with less income because everyone else is so much worse off. And, yes, all government has spent too much. This also further corroborates my view that tax rates on the rich are shockingly, embarrassingly low.

So what's the solution? Make the damned poor pay their fair share, because their incomes are more dependable? Haha.

20110328-05	16:33	GaryC	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	-------	------------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

BTW You never have responded to my query regarding the responsibility of the poor. Apparently the responsibility of the rich is to work their a*s off to support the poor and the government. What is the poor's responsibility?

20110328-06 17:14 SteveB Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"

Dear GaryC,

I did reply! Even this article stated how unprogressive state income taxes are. The sales taxes are totally unprogressive. The poor pay their share. The obligation of the poor, as I said, is to work their a*s'es off too. And they are, to the degree that is possible. What do you expect them to do? Starve? So Rupert Murdoch can pay less taxes?

The future does not look bright. I was struck, during the revolt in Egypt, how similar were the conditions of the people seeking change to the conditions of the poor and lower middle classes in the U.S. The unemployment rate was similar. The degree of hopelessness was similar. The hatred and suspicion of the government were higher in Egypt, but not at impossible levels for the U.S.

I suppose people would say that American pu*sies would never have the balls to do what the Egyptians did and what the Libyans are doing, but how low do you think people can be pushed before they rise up? I, for one, do not wish to find out, but I'll tell you, things had better improve sooner rather than later, and not on the backs of the poor.

20110328-07 17:14 SteveB Alternative Vehicle Fuels, Hydrogen

Dear GaryC,

Say, did you know that almost all the taxis and many of the cars in Santa Cruz, Bolivia run on natural gas?

They often use a tank in the trunk just like your BBQ uses, and all the gas stations sell gas, as well as gasoline. I wonder, with gasoline costing what it does, and with our plentiful supplies of natural gas, why we aren't doing that here?

Last night, I woke up in the middle of the night thinking of a way the new, cheap hydrogen could also be used to do the same thing without fuel cells, which aren't really ready yet. One way—hydrogen might be to be used to power existing internal combustion engines (modified a little) just as natural gas can.

The hydrogen would be diluted to about the energy level of natural gas, or a little higher, using CO₂ or N₂.

It's kind of an invention needing a patent. Any interest?

20110328-08 21:02 Dick Fw: What Has America Become?

Dear SteveB,

What the hell has happened to our great country?

What has America become?

(<http://www.examiner.com/christianity-culture-in-fort-worth/what-has-america-become-by-ken-huber-of-tawas-city>)

Editor,

Has America become the land of special interest and home of the double standard?

Let's see: if we lie to the Congress, it's a felony and if the Congress lies to us, it's just politics; if we dislike a black person, we're racist and if a black person dislikes whites, it's their 1st Amendment right; the government spends millions to rehabilitate criminals and they do almost nothing for the victims; in public schools you can teach that homosexuality is OK, but you better not use the word God in the process; you can kill an unborn child, but it is wrong to execute a mass murderer; we don't burn books in America, we now rewrite them; we got rid of communist and socialist threats by renaming them progressive; we are unable to close our border with Mexico, but have no problem protecting the 38th parallel in Korea; if you protest against President Obama's policies you're a terrorist, but if you burned an American flag or George Bush in effigy it was your 1st Amendment right.

You can have pornography on TV or the internet, but you better not put a nativity scene in a public park during Christmas; we have eliminated all criminals in America, they are now called sick people; we can use a human fetus for medical research, but it is wrong to use an animal.

We take money from those who work hard for it and give it to those who don't want to work; we all support the Constitution, but only when it supports our political ideology; we still have freedom of speech, but only if we are being politically correct; parenting has been replaced with Ritalin and video games; the land of opportunity is now the land of hand outs; the similarity between Hurricane Katrina and the gulf oil spill is that neither president did anything to help.

And how do we handle a major crisis today? The government appoints a committee to determine who's at fault, then threatens them, passes a law, raises our taxes; tells us the problem is solved so they can get back to their reelection campaign.

What has happened to the land of the free and home of the brave?

—Ken Huber, Tawas City

What has America become?

Editor,

Has America become the land of the special interest and home of the double standard?

Lets see: if we lie to the Congress, it's a felony and if the congress lies to us its just politics; if we dislike a black person, we're racist and if a black dislikes whites, it's their 1st Amendment right; the government spends millions to rehabilitate criminals and they do almost nothing for the victims; in public schools you can teach that homosexuality is OK, but you better not use the word God in the process; you can kill an unborn child, but its wrong to execute a mass murderer; we don't burn books in America, we now rewrite them; we got rid of the communist and socialist threat by renaming them progressives; we are unable to close our border with Mexico, but have no problem protecting the 38th parallel in Korea; if you protest against President Obama's policies you're a terrorist, but if you burned an American flag or George Bush in effigy it was your 1st Amendment right.

You can have pornography on TV or the internet, but you better not put a nativity scene in a public park during Christmas; we have eliminated all criminals in America, they are now called sick people; we can use a human fetus for medical research, but it's wrong to use an animal.

We take money from those who work hard for it and give it to those who don't want to work; we all support the Constitution, but only when it supports our political ideology; we still have freedom of speech, but only if we are being politically correct; parenting has been replaced with Ritalin and video games; the land of opportunity is now the land of hand outs; the similarity between Hurricane Katrina and the gulf oil spill is that neither president did anything to help.

And how do we handle a major crisis today? The government appoints a committee to determine who's at fault, then threatens them, passes a law, raises our taxes; tells us the problem is solved so they can get back to their reelection campaign.

What has happened to the land of the free and home of the brave?

— Ken Huber
Tawas City

20110329-01	15:15	Pam	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	-----	------------------------------------

Dear SteveB,

Most people who can work are on welfare for only a year or two and go on to jobs, having been given a boost. The rest are children, the aged, and the disabled. There is nothing those people can do, work ethic or no. My daughter works with families with disabled children (some of them adults) and sees first hand, every day, what these families have to cope with. Where is your friend's compassion? Why does he focus on what he believes to be the poor's laziness and ignore those who are falling off the cliff? I just had my house painted—by a crew of partly employed, desperate for work fellows who did a beautiful, professional job. I paid them more than they asked, because I thought they were asking too little. Most people identify strongly with their work. It's demoralizing not to have a job. Pride comes with working. No one who isn't damaged volunteers to be disconnected from the mainstream, i.e. working.

20110329-02	15:57	SteveB	Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"
-----------------------------	-------	--------	------------------------------------

Dear GaryC,

Actually, I prefer the answer I gave before, that the responsibility of the poor and middle-class in America in the 21st century is to CONSUME! Without that, the whole house of cards comes crashing down. All they want to fulfill that obligation is jobs.

Surely it is the obligation of the movers and shakers in industry and government to make sure these people have money, have jobs, so they can CONSUME. I won't even talk about the pursuit of dreams and happiness.

Look at all the numbers you want, it seems like the fat cats have done a much worse job of creating the necessary wealth and distributed money than the "lower classes" have done working, consuming, trying to work, or trying to consume. In the end, this works more against the rich than the poor, but it is guaranteed pain for both eventually. But, "Let them eat cake!"...

20110329-03 16:14 GaryC Re: "The Price of Taxing the Rich"

Dear SteveB,

I agree but with certain caveats. I grew up poor in a factory town—Anderson. There were 4 kids and my mom did not work. Dad worked for Guide Lamp. I didn't know we were poor but we were. We got a few new clothes once a year. Never went out to eat. Only took two vacations while I was home—both to northern Indiana lakes to cottages rented by my aunts. I started working when I was 14.

However, here is what my parents did. They taught me a work ethic to be on time and do my best. They taught me the value of education. They taught me to save and be frugal. They taught me to be respectful and polite. They taught me to strive for a better standard of life than they experienced. They taught me to be generous when I did make money and was successful.

Now, I don't see these same principles being taught by the poor in most cases. While I am generous I want to make sure that the recipient does something with the gift and not expect more without effort on their part. How many of the poor value education? How many of the poor appreciate the opportunities they have in the U.S.? Unfortunately, Congress has developed a welfare state that rewards those who do not want to be better off with a little effort.

Your points are all well taken and I agree with many of them. I just think the approach is different. I want the poor to be successful and be able to upgrade their standard of living. But, I want them to learn a skill so that they can be self sufficient and not rely or expect hand outs. If you look at most income surveys, most poor people (myself included) over time improve their standard of living but the % that stay at the bottom and never move up seems to be increasing. Is that their fault, Congress' fault or the fault of society. I think it is a little of the first two.

In my businesses, I am constantly appalled at how little effort we get from young people (educated or not) even when big opportunities are offered to them for a little effort. Recently, we are seeing people quit or turn down jobs after a few weeks as they prefer to go back on unemployment and work part time without reporting the income.

It is a sad state of affairs, but I am convinced that many of the government social programs of the past 40 years have created more harm to the underclass than these programs have helped the poor.

20110329-04 16:55 SteveB "Genius at Work: 12-Year-Old is Studying at IUPUI"

"Genius at Work: 12-Year-Old is Studying at IUPUI" by Dan McFeely, Indianapolis Star

Mar. 20, 2011, (<http://www.indystar.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2011103200369>)

When Jacob Barnett first learned about the Schrödinger equation for quantum mechanics, he could hardly contain himself.

For three straight days, his little brain buzzed with mathematical functions.

From within his 12-year-old, mildly autistic mind, there gradually flowed long strings of pluses, minuses, funky letters and upside-down triangles — a tapestry of complicated symbols that few can understand.

He grabbed his pencil and filled every sheet of paper before grabbing a marker and filling up a dry erase board that hangs in his bedroom. With a single-minded obsession, he kept on, eventually marking up every window in the home.

Strange, say some.

Genius, say others.

But entirely normal for Jacob, a child prodigy who used to crunch his cereal while calculating the volume of the cereal box in his head.

"Whenever I try talking about math with anyone in my family," he said, "they just stare blankly."

So do many of his older classmates at Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis, who marvel at seeing this scrawny little kid in the front row of the calculus-based physics class he has been taking this semester.

"When I first walked in and saw him, I thought, 'Oh my God, I'm going to school with Doogie Howser,' " said Wanda Anderson, a biochemistry major, referring to a television show that featured a 16-year-old boy-genius physician.

Elementary school couldn't keep Jacob interested. And courses at IUPUI have only served to awaken a sleeping giant.

Just a few weeks shy of his 13th birthday, Jake, as he's often called, is starting to move beyond the level of what his professors can teach.

In fact, his work is so strong and his ideas so original that he's being courted by a top-notch East Coast research center. IUPUI is interested in him moving from the classroom into a funded researcher's position.

"We have told him that after this semester . . . enough of the book work. You are here to do some science," said IUPUI physics Professor John Ross, who vows to help find some grant funding to support Jake and his work.

